The Bible singles out this crime as representing crime in general. The perpetrator thinks he will not be caught. He thinks that God will not see or will not care or will not intervene on behalf of the victims. This is characteristic of criminals.

The wicked, through the pride of his countenance, will not seek after God: God is not in all his thoughts. His ways are always grievous; thy judgments are far above out of his sight: as for all his enemies, he puffeth at them. He hath said in his heart, I shall not be moved: for I shall never be in adversity. His mouth is full of cursing and deceit and fraud: under his tongue is mischief and vanity. He sitteth in the lurking places of the villages: in the secret places doth he murder the innocent: his eyes are privily set against the poor. He lieth in wait secretly as a lion in his den: he lieth in wait to catch the poor: he doth catch the poor, when he draweth him into his net. He croucheth, and humbleth himself, that the poor may fall by his strong ones. He hath said in his heart, God hath forgotten: he hideth his face; he will never see it (Ps. 10:4–11).

The Psalmist—Solomon's father—then called on God to avenge the victims.

Arise, O LORD; O God, lift up thine hand: forget not the humble. Wherefore doth the wicked contemn God? he hath said in his heart, Thou wilt not require it. Thou hast seen it; for thou beholdest mischief and spite, to requite it with thy hand: the poor committeth himself unto thee; thou art the helper of the fatherless. Break thou the arm of the wicked and the evil man: seek out his wickedness till thou find none (Ps. 10:12–15).

Conclusion

God sees. He evaluates in terms of His permanent ethical standards. He judges men's weights and measures in terms of His weights and measures. Through the supernatural handwriting on the wall, God told Babylon's final king, "TEKEL; Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting" (Dan. 5:27).

A constant theme in the Mosaic law and Old Testament revelation is the necessity of honest weights and measures. This is a crucial manifestation of a society's commitment to God's covenant.

DEFENSIVE WALLS

Riches profit not in the day of wrath: but righteousness delivereth from death (Prov. 11:4).

A. The Day When Everything Changes

There is no concept of the final judgment in the Old Testament. The doctrines of the final judgment, hell, heaven, the lake of fire, and the post-resurrection new heaven and new earth are all exclusively New Testament doctrines.¹ So, this proverb refers to history. This is not to say that these dual principles do not apply also to eternity. They do. But that is not its focus here. If we are to understand how it applies to us, we must first understand how it was believed to apply under the Mosaic covenant.

The day of wrath in the Old Testament was a day of judgment that altered a person's life. This might be a military battle. It might be a personal confrontation between rivals. It was a day of judgment for men or institutions. Such an event would permanently change the pattern of history, either personal or national. The prophet Isaiah warned Judah of the day of the Lord.

The lofty looks of man shall be humbled, and the haughtiness of men shall be bowed down, and the LORD alone shall be exalted in that day. For the day of the LORD of hosts shall be upon every one that is proud and lofty, and upon every one that is lifted up; and he shall be brought low (Isa. 2:11–12).

When that judgment arrived over a century and a half later, the prophet Jeremiah lamented,

1. The new heavens and the new earth are both taught in Isaiah 65, but they refer to the earth. There are still sinners. There is still death (Isa. 65:17–20). This is a millennial prophecy, not a final judgment prophecy.

The young and the old lie on the ground in the streets: my virgins and my young men are fallen by the sword; thou hast slain them in the day of thine anger; thou hast killed, and not pitied. Thou hast called as in a solemn day my terrors round about, so that in the day of the LORD'S anger none escaped nor remained: those that I have swaddled and brought up hath mine enemy consumed (Lam. 2:21–22).

B. The Walls of Protection

Men build up walls. In the era of gunpowder, city walls no longer protect against invaders. Cities no longer bother to build walls. But there are walls nonetheless. The favored wall is wealth. “The rich man’s wealth is his strong city, and as an high wall in his own conceit” (Prov. 18:11).² The rich man’s assumption is this: “Every person has a price.” He assumes that he can buy his way out of every predicament. But to do this, he needs wealth. The greater the predicament he expects, the greater the wealth he thinks he will require.

This proverb challenges this assumption. There will come a predicament that is too great for a rich man to escape through his wealth. When an invading army penetrates the city’s walls, its troops will collect the wealth of all the inhabitants. Why bargain with a rich man? Besides, who can enforce the terms of the agreement? The more ruthless the army, the less reliable the enforcement of contracts.

In contrast is the wall of righteousness. It offers hope that wealth does not. But why? This proverb does not say. But we know this: in an impersonal universe, there could be no such guarantee, no such hope. There would be no sovereign agent to enforce the promise. So, this proverb is a testimony to the cosmic personalism of the created universe.³ Causation is not impersonal, nor is it ethically neutral.

This being the case, this proverb’s message is that ethics is preferable to riches as a way to avoid the threat of destruction. The rich man’s wall will be breached by the enemy. The righteous man’s wall will not.

Conclusion

This proverb deals with faith. It raises this question: What should a wise person trust as his barrier against disaster, money or righteousness? This proverb is clear: righteousness. Yet this covenantal fact is difficult for even covenant-keepers to believe in their own lives. It takes years of self-discipline in terms of God's law to persuade a person that this proverb is true. A covenant-keeper should know this in principle from the day he reads this proverb and others like it, but it usually takes years of evidence to persuade him. People are slow learners. They are also evidentialists rather than presuppositionalists when it comes to truths that are difficult to believe.

2. Chapter 54.

3. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1.

31

A MULTITUDE OF COUNSELORS

Where no counsel is, the people fall: but in the multitude of counselors there is safety (Prov. 11:14).

A. Corporate Society

Here we have a corporate view of society. The Hebrew word, 'am, is a collective noun. The context is national. The national covenant forms the basis of this collective.

Societies require counselors. Every society has counselors. At every level of society, decision-makers seek counsel. So, the phrase, "where no counsel is," has to be a metaphor for unwise counsel. It is empty counsel. It counts for nothing. This principle is not limited to civil government.

In Israel, there were court prophets who were on the king's payroll. They were usually false prophets. They spoke what the king wanted to hear, but in the name of God. This counsel is contrasted with a multitude of counsel. So, it must be a form of poor counsel. This proverb's words contrast no counsel with a multitude of counsel. But this is never the situation, for someone is always advising the representatives of society to take a particular course of action on behalf of the society. I conclude that the contrast is between unitary counsel and a cross-section of opinion.

Unitary counsel has multiple defects. First, it must exclude competing views. To do this, there must be a system of information filtering, so that the decision-makers hear only one side regarding any decision. This filtering system must involve conscious deception of those at the top by those in charge of the flow of information. This proverb indicates that this kind of unitary counsel is the equivalent of no counsel at all.

The second problem is that a committee with a unified agenda is after something. Its members have something to gain: fame, influence with key groups outside the counsel, money from a special-interest group, or the approval of the decision-makers, who hear only what they want to hear. When the decision-makers seek confirmation rather than counsel, the Bible speaks of this arrangement as being without counsel.

B. What Is Counsel?

Counsel is an assessment of the unknown future by specialists who know something about the past. The problem for the decision-maker is to assess the degree of correspondence of counsel regarding the past with that which is unknown about the future. First, counselors with expertise regarding the past are always in conflict. The more of them who are consulted, the greater the degree of disagreement over what really happened, what it meant, and what the objective results were.

Second, that which is asserted about the past must be assessed by the decision-makers in terms of three problems: its accuracy, its relevance to the problem at hand, and its enforceability by the hierarchical system of control available to the decision-maker. A decision-maker can issue lots of orders. Will the orders be carried out as he intended, or even at all? Bureaucrats are self-serving. They are also specialists in blocking or deflecting orders from above, as well as requests from below.

This proverb assumes that there is covenantal agreement, established by confession and institutional discipline, in the nation. That is, it assumes that there is a unitary worldview regarding God, man, law, causation, and time. This is a society created by covenant. There is a unitary confession: "Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God is one LORD" (Deut. 6:4).

Second, this proverb assumes that within this unitary confession there is disagreement regarding the appropriate course of action. There are experts and non-experts in society who have strong opinions. They are in possession of truth. Information is widely dispersed. In order to gain the advantage of access to the truth that is relevant to the decision at hand and enforceable by the chain of command, the decision-makers must listen to a wide range of opinions.

These opinions are not matched with authority. They are opinions without judicial responsibility. The decision-makers have both authority and responsibility. They cannot evade the problem at hand. So, they seek to deal with it by gaining access to information that a screening committee of court prophets could not possess.

C. The Division of Intellectual Labor

The economist and social theorist F. A. Hayek made this principle, the intellectual division of labor, the cornerstone of his long and distinguished academic career. In what has become a classic essay, “The Use of Knowledge in Society” (1945), Hayek argued against central economic planning because no committee of planners can possess the knowledge that individuals possess across the society. They know the relevant facts of their particular situations. No distant committee can know this.¹

Unlike a free market, which has a price system to adjust specific supply and demand, which in turn pressures market participants to adjust their plans in terms of prices, the central government possesses no comparable method of bringing this decentralized knowledge to bear on the problem at hand. The decision-makers are not able to collect and assess all the relevant information. So, they listen to representatives of particular groups or viewpoints. There is always screening of information. Decision-makers are not God. They are not omniscient. But by putting information suppliers on notice that many viewpoints will be heard and assessed, the decision-makers call forth far more information than a closed screening committee representing one interest group could possibly produce.

This proverb recommends that decision-makers listen to many points of view before deciding. Their goal should be better information. Solomon understood another principle of decision-making. “He that is first in his own cause seemeth just; but his neighbour cometh and searcheth him” (Prov. 18:17). This also applies to decision-making outside of the courtroom.

D. Every Level of Decision-Making

The principle of multiple counsel applies to every level of decision-making. The individual must make decisions. He should seek multiple counselors.

The free market is the consummate social institution for seeking and gaining counsel. The price system is a constant source of updated information. People buy and sell in terms of a price, which in turn sends more signals and therefore more information.

1. F. A. Hayek, “The Use of Knowledge in Society” (1945), in Hayek, Individualism and Economic Order (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/HayekIAEO>)

Everyone is responsible for what he does. Jesus warned: “A good man out of the good treasure of the heart bringeth forth good things; and an evil man out of the evil treasure bringeth forth evil things. But I say unto you, That every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment. For by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned” (Matt. 12:35–37). If this applies to words, how much more does it apply to deeds. This should create an incentive for every individual to seek counsel from others who have experience in the area of decision-making that faces him.

Conclusion

A society will fall when the people have no counsel. In this context, this refers to empty counsel: counsel in opposition to God’s counsel, as revealed in the Bible. A society of covenant-breakers operates in terms of empty counsel.

Within the covenantal confession of subordination to the trinitarian God of the Bible, there is a wide range of experience, information, and opinion. While decision-makers should be self-governed under biblical law, they also are told to seek a wide range of opinions. The one—the unitary covenant under the trinitarian God—must not exclude the many: a multitude of counsel. Biblically, this principle honors the Trinity. In the Trinity, the one and the many are equally ultimate. This unitary confession requires the consideration of many applications of the confession.

TURN LOOSE TO GATHER IN

There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty. The liberal soul shall be made fat: and he that watereth shall be watered also himself. He that withholdeth corn, the people shall curse him: but blessing shall be upon the head of him that selleth it (Prov. 11:24–26).

This string of proverbs is held together by one theme: scattering and prospering. This concept relies on what appear to be contradictions or antinomies. Throw away and gather in; hold on tight and become poor: these seem contradictory. These linked proverbs point to a system of cause and effect that operates outside of men's familiar patterns.

Yet, on closer observation, these patterns are familiar after all. A farmer knows that by scattering seeds, he will reap a great crop. Similarly, if he withholds too much of his seed—more than is “meet,” meaning fit—and refuses to scatter them, he will reap almost no crop. He will fall into poverty.

This is a principle of investment. Investment requires future-orientation. A person looks at what he possesses now. He wants greater wealth in the future. In order to attain this goal, he must surrender control over that which he possesses today.

He can plant seed. This seed he cannot grind into flour and bake into bread. To eat seed that is fit—meet—for planting is to “eat your seed corn,” the traditional phrase tells us. We eat our future increase. We consume more in the present at the price of consuming less in the future. There is no such thing as a free lunch.

A. The Process of Time

Time is on the side of the righteous. All of cause and effect is. Paul wrote: “And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose” (Rom. 8:28).¹

When men scatter seed, they expect to prosper over time. When men become grasping, refusing to scatter seed, they become poor over time. The process of compounding—positive and negative—takes time.

Time is relentless. It waits on no man. It has a negative aspect for covenant-breakers and a positive aspect for covenant-keepers. An individual is soon forgotten, but covenant-keepers flourish through the ages. God intervenes to keep the inheritance of covenant-keepers growing.

As for man, his days are as grass: as a flower of the field, so he flourisheth. For the wind passeth over it, and it is gone; and the place thereof shall know it no more. But the mercy of the LORD is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear him, and his righteousness unto children’s children; To such as keep his covenant, and to those that remember his commandments to do them (Ps. 103:15–18).

The process of scattering and withholding are aspects of rival views of cause and effect. The covenant-keeper perceives that time is on his side and the side of his covenantal heirs. The covenant-breaker knows, as Satan knows, that his time is short. His legacy compounds at a negative rate. “For the wind passeth over it, and it is gone; and the place thereof shall know it no more.” Here today; gone tomorrow.

B. Ownership and Disownership

A farmer owns seed. He will also own any crop produced by this seed. He can increase his wealth in the future by surrendering seed in the present. He invests. What the individual knows to be true within the judicial context of ownership, this proverb implies—but does not explicitly say—also applies to the principle of wealth transfer. This proverb implies that the same principle of wealth accumulation also applies to the realm of disownership.

This is contrary to what the world regards as common sense. Cause and effect teach that if you give away wealth, you will possess less wealth. There is a finite quantity of goods, including time. That which is given away is transferred to someone else. Aristotelian logic says that one object cannot be in two places at once. Is this proverb arguing against Aristotelian logic?

1. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

The farmer surrenders control over seeds in the present. He hopes to own more seeds in the future. The process of agricultural production takes time.

This proverb relies on the same concept of time. When men surrender control over their wealth in the present, they can accumulate greater wealth in the future. But in this case, the control is legal control. Donors will not own the increase, if any, of whatever they give away. When you turn grain into bread and then give away the bread, you have neither seed nor bread. You do not have grain in the ground, either. Yet this proverb says that in fact you do have the equivalent of seed in the ground. The Preacher—Solomon—wrote elsewhere: “Cast thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days” (Eccl. 11:1).

“The liberal soul shall be made fat: and he that watereth shall be watered also himself” (v. 25). The Hebrew word, berakah, is translated “liberal.” This is a rare translation. In dozens of passages, it is translated as “blessing” or “blessed.” We see this in these related passages:

I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread. He is ever merciful, and lenient; and his seed is blessed (Ps. 37:25–26).²

He that hath a bountiful eye shall be blessed; for he giveth of his bread to the poor (Prov. 22:9).

A faithful man shall abound with blessings: but he that maketh haste to be rich shall not be innocent (Prov. 28:20).³

He that giveth unto the poor shall not lack: but he that hideth his eyes shall have many a curse (Prov. 28:27).

Give, and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your bosom. For with the same measure that ye mete withal it shall be measured to you again (Luke 6:38).⁴

The blessed soul is the liberal soul. He is also the blessings soul—the source of others’ blessings. He waters the parched soil. So will he

2. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 6.

3. Chapter 83.

4. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 11.

be watered. There is cause and effect. This is a system of expansion—growth—but not for the covenant-breaker.

In contrast is the man who withholds corn in a crisis. “He that withholdeth corn, the people shall curse him: but blessing shall be upon the head of him that selleth it” (v. 26). Note: the blessed man sells grain. He does not give it away. He asks for something in return. But the cursed man keeps grain for himself. Presumably, he is not planning to eat it. Someone with only enough corn to feed his family will not be the target of curses. The accused is a forestaller: a person who controls a sufficient quantity of grain to raise the price by refusing to sell it. What he does is in contrast with the liberal man.

What is unique here is the suggestion that the man who sells grain in a food shortage is like one who scatters his wealth. He will tend toward prosperity. In contrast, the man who holds onto more than is meet—fitting—tends toward poverty. Yet the grain seller receives less money than if he waited until the famine grew worse. The grain hoarder hopes to receive more money per quantity of grain. Yet he tends toward poverty.

This is not the system of cause and effect imagined by the modern economist, who affirms a world of cosmic impersonalism. It is rather the system of cause and effect proclaimed by God, in both the Old and New Testaments. Jesus Christ is the ultimate liberal soul, the example of the system of prospering by letting go.

And Jesus answered them, saying, The hour is come, that the Son of man should be glorified. Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit. He that loveth his life shall lose it; and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal (John 12:23–25).

Conclusion

We live in God’s world. Men are governed by God in terms of the ethical principles of biblical law. This includes societies. God governs cause and effect in terms of biblical law. This is the Bible’s covenantal theory of sanctions.

This proverb describes the principle of turning loose in order to gather in. This principle applies to seeds in farming, where the farmer owns the seeds and also any future crop. It also applies to entire societies. So, a covenant-keeper can turn loose (disown a little) and confidently expect to gather in (own more), even though he surrenders ownership of whatever is turned loose. This covenantal system of cause and effect operates within God's sphere of ownership, not just inside the individual's sphere of ownership. God owns everything: "For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills" (Ps. 50:10).⁵ The individual covenant-keeper, acting as a steward of God's property, can safely give away God's property for covenant-honoring projects. More will follow, as surely as a crop follows planting, because it is God's property.

5. North, Confidence and Dominion, ch. 10.

33

TWO KINDS OF EXPANSION

He that trusteth in his riches shall fall: but the righteous shall flourish as a branch (Prov. 11:28).

This proverb parallels Proverbs 11:4: “Riches profit not in the day of wrath: but righteousness delivereth from death.”¹ This proverb is more general. The earlier proverb is true because this proverb is true.

This proverb is an application of an even more general proverb: “No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon” (Matt. 6:24). What is mammon? It is this principle: “More for me in history.”²

A. Across Generations

The Old Testament had no explicit concept of a final judgment. So, this proverb refers to this world: history. Yet we know that some people who pursue riches do not fall. They die rich. How can this fact—a fact acknowledged by Asaph in Psalm 73—be reconciled with this proverb? The proverbs are rules illustrating the operation of God’s covenant in history. The fifth point of the biblical covenant is inheritance.³ The following principle governs inheritance: “A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children’s children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just” (Prov. 13:22).⁴ Applying this insight to this assertion—he who trusts in his riches shall fall—we conclude that

1. Chapter 30.

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 14.

3. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

4. Chapter 41.

the mammon-worshipping person falls by way of inheritance. What a man does in this life will be judged by God finally. This was not an Old Testament insight. But there is a preliminary manifestation of final judgment: God's judgment of the heirs. This is a constant theme of the Old Testament: Who will inherit, and what will he inherit? This was Abram's question to God in what he believed (inaccurately) was his old age.⁵

And Abram said, Lord GOD, what wilt thou give me, seeing I go childless, and the steward of my house is this Eliezer of Damascus? And Abram said, Behold, to me thou hast given no seed: and, lo, one born in my house is mine heir (Gen. 15:2–3).

Inheritance was on his mind. Inheritance had been the positive sanction God had offered him before he left Ur.

Now the LORD had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will shew thee: And I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing: And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed (Gen. 12:1–3).

So, the biblical covenant testifies against any concept of personal success that is limited to the lifetime of the achiever. To assess a man's success, we must ask: "Who were his heirs, and what did they do with their inheritance?"

Solomon was a personal failure. His son Rehoboam lost the kingdom because of his policy of high taxation (I Kings 12). He did not possess his father's wisdom—a wisdom that his father had surrendered by marrying hundreds of wives (I Kings 11:3), which violated God's law for Israel's kings (Deut. 17:17),⁶ a law that Solomon's father David had also violated (I Sam. 25:42–43; II Sam. 5:13), with terrible consequences for his family (II Sam. 13).

Solomon did not pursue riches, but riches came to him. He did not give these riches away. Thus, he accumulated riches, in violation of God's law for Israel's kings. "Neither shall he multiply wives to himself,

5. "And Isaac brought her into his mother Sarah's tent, and took Rebekah, and she became his wife; and he loved her: and Isaac was comforted after his mother's death. Then again Abraham took a wife, and her name was Keturah. And she bare him Zimran, and Jokshan, and Medan, and Midian, and Ishbak, and Shuah" (Gen. 24:67–25:2).

6. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 42:C.

that his heart turn not away: neither shall he greatly multiply to himself silver and gold” (Deut. 17:17).⁷ He acted contrary to his own principles, as set forth in the Book of Proverbs. These wealth-related proverbs are difficult to believe. They are even more difficult to implement personally.

B. A Flourishing Branch

In most instances, the KJV translators translated this Hebrew word as “leaf.” The word relates to foliage. Leaves are temporary things. Branches are more permanent. So, the translators selected “branch.” There are multiple Hebrew words translated as “branch.”

A leaf reflects the health of a tree. A deciduous tree with no leaves in summer is a dead tree. Leaves in abundance indicate growth. This proverb indicates that righteousness is like a flourishing leaf. To flourish is to possess a benefit. “The righteous shall flourish like the palm tree: he shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon. Those that be planted in the house of the LORD shall flourish in the courts of our God” (Ps. 92:12–13).

To be righteous is to become the recipient of God’s tokens of the good life. There is expansion. Yet this is what the man who pursues riches also desires. He wants the expansion of his wealth because riches are a positive sanction. Yet this proverb and others tell us that the pursuit of riches is a snare and a delusion.

Surely every man walketh in a vain shew: surely they are disquieted in vain: he heapeth up riches, and knoweth not who shall gather them (Ps. 39:6).⁸

The righteous also shall see, and fear, and shall laugh at him: Lo, this is the man that made not God his strength; but trusted in the abundance of his riches, and strengthened himself in his wickedness (Ps. 52:6–7).

Wilt thou set thine eyes upon that which is not? for riches certainly make themselves wings; they fly away as an eagle toward heaven (Prov. 23:5).⁹

As the partridge sitteth on eggs, and hatcheth them not; so he that

7. Idem.

8. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 7.

9. Chapter 72.

getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be a fool (Jer. 17:11).

Conclusion

This proverb is clear: he who trusts in riches will fall. He trusts in a visible sanction rather than in the God who awards positive sanctions. This is what Moses warned against. “And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth. But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:17–18).¹⁰

In contrast, the righteous man flourishes. It is not what he owns but what he is ethically that marks him as a beneficiary of covenant blessings. Ethical conformity to God’s law is of great positive consequence. The piling up of riches is of great negative consequence.

And he spake a parable unto them, saying, The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully: And he thought within himself, saying, What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits? And he said, This will I do: I will pull down my barns, and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods. And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry. But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then whose shall those things be, which thou hast provided? So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God (Luke 12:16–21).¹¹

10. North, Inheritance and Dominion, chaps. 21, 22.

11. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 25.

34

CONFIDENCE IN THE FUTURE

The wicked are overthrown, and are not: but the house of the righteous shall stand (Prov. 12:7).

This proverb deals with inheritance. Inheritance is the fifth point of the biblical covenant.¹

The proverbs refer to temporal affairs. There was no explicit concept of final judgment in the Old Testament. So, the events described here relate to history: in time and on earth.

A. Dreams and Schemes

The general contrast is between the wicked and the righteous. The wicked are overthrown. They do not survive. Yet no person survives. Death takes all men. So, in what does the contrast consist?

This proverb indicates that there is no trace of the wicked after they are gone. This does not mean that the historical record does not provide documentation of their deeds. It means that their dreams and schemes do not survive their overthrow. Their institutions do not persevere. In modern times, this was demonstrated on December 31, 1991, when the Soviet Union committed suicide. The Communist Party ceased to rule the nation. There was a revolution without bloodshed. The leaders simply gave up their attempt to rule as the Party had ruled since 1917. The Soviet Union was the largest empire in recorded history to surrender power without bloodshed.

The context of this proverb becomes clearer with respect to the righteous. This proverb says that “the house of the righteous shall stand.” Whereas the wicked are no more, the righteous leave an institutional legacy: a house. It is not overthrown. It sustains the dreams and schemes of the founders.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

The issue is covenantal. Covenants are established by confession, mutual promises, and oath-signs. To survive the process of time, these three factors must persevere. The confession may be modified. "Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God is one LORD (Deut. 6:4) does not change, but it is modified. "And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory" (I Tim. 3:16). The promises do not change, but the recipients do.

But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should shew forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light: Which in time past were not a people, but are now the people of God: which had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy (I Peter 2:9–10).

Finally, the requirement of the oath is not abolished, but the oath-signs are replaced with new ones. The Lord's Supper has replaced Passover. Baptism has replaced circumcision.

B. The Perseverance of the Saints' Legacy

There is preservation through time for the institutional legacy of the righteous. This does not apply to the wicked. There is an historical problem here: Islam. It came out of nowhere in 632. Islam conquered North Africa in eight decades, 632–712, and there has been no trace of reconquest by Christianity. In 732, Arab warriors crossed the Pyrenees and moved into what is now France. They were defeated at the Battle of Tours that year. They retreated back into Spain. They were not completely driven out by Spanish military forces until 1492. Today, Muslims are in the process of reconquering Spain through immigration and high birth rates. They are doing the same in Italy and France. Unless their birth rates fall—as seems to be happening—below the non-Muslim population's birth rates—this is not happening—Europe will go Islamic unless Muslims abandon Islam or else Christian revival sweeps through Europe's non-Muslim population.

If this proverb remains true, then it has yet to be proven by all the facts. Christianity and Islam are the two largest religions. They have about the same number of adherents. Each side professes belief in this proverb. Each side awaits the disappearance—the overthrow—of the other.

C. Confidence in the Future

The righteous have a legitimate hope in the future. Their legacy will persevere. The legacy of the wicked will not. The capital and labor that they invest today will produce consequences in the future. The work of the covenantally faithful is cumulative. This proverb denies that the righteous will be overthrown in history. It affirms that the wicked will be overthrown, just as their covenant-breaking ancestors were overthrown. The forces of history are not impersonal. They are personal.² God in history brings to pass what this proverb insists must happen.

Covenant-keepers can confidently sacrifice present income and leisure for the sake of building up the house of the righteous. This house will not be overthrown in history. In contrast, covenant-breakers have no legitimate hope that their house will not be overthrown in history, for it will be. This proverb is clear.

Conclusion

Covenant-keepers possess legitimate hope in the process of compound growth. Their house will persevere. Investments made today in building up God's kingdom institutions will multiply: compound over time. This is not true of investments made by covenant-breakers. While some of their institutional legacy can persevere, covenant-keepers will inherit it. "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov. 13:22).³

When covenant-keepers understand and believe this proverb, they receive a remarkable gift: confidence in the long-run pay-off of their efforts. This is a tremendous psychological advantage.

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1.

3. Chapter 41.

35

MORE IS BETTER

He that is despised, and hath a servant, is better than he that honoureth himself, and lacketh bread (Prov. 12:9).

Here are a pair of comparisons, each with two aspects. The first person is despised: a negative factor. He possesses sufficient wealth to afford a servant: a positive factor. The second person is a self-inflated person who possesses so little wealth that he lacks bread, which is a low-priced yet vital commodity. He therefore suffers from two negative factors. The first person is said to be better than the second.

In what sense is he better? The Hebrew word translated as “better,” towb, is as broad as the English word, “good.” It conveys the sense of positive. “And God saw the light, that it was good: and God divided the light from the darkness” (Gen. 1:4). It also can mean ethically good, as in the tree of the knowledge of good and evil (Gen. 2:9). It can mean good as in good looking. “And the damsel was very fair to look upon” (Gen. 24:16a).

The first man is despised. Those around him assess his contribution to society negatively. They impute a negative image to him. But no one doubts that he possesses wealth. He has a servant. He has therefore earned or inherited wealth. He is not respected as a person, but what he possesses is desirable.

The second man is a self-promoter. Perhaps he has great self-esteem. If so, he is severely self-deceived. He has achieved nothing of value. He does not sell a service to the community for which anyone is willing to pay him much. His lack of accomplishment is revealed by his economic condition: hunger. There is therefore a great discrepancy between his words and his deeds.

A. Wealth as a Positive Factor

This proverb contrasts two negatives: being despised and self-promotion that is not justified by actual performance. Being despised is a negative factor. Self-promotion is also a negative factor. “Let another man praise thee, and not thine own mouth; a stranger, and not thine own lips” (Prov. 27:2). But this proverb insists that the despised man is better than the self-promoter.

The distinguishing factor between them is wealth. This is why this proverb is important in an economic commentary on the Bible. The first man possesses wealth. The second man does not. The disparity is considerable. To have enough wealth to hire a servant is to possess considerable wealth. Human labor is the most versatile factor of production. It can be used to produce value in many ways. It therefore commands a high price, for many employers compete for labor services. A servant has numerous employment opportunities. If he is a slave, he is nonetheless valuable. Other men will bid for his labor services by seeking to purchase him from his owner. His owner has wealth.

In stark contrast to the servant’s owner, the self-promoter cannot even afford bread. Bread is a low-cost commodity in most circumstances. It is widely produced. It is at the low-price end of the food supply. It is also vital. A person who cannot afford bread is in desperate shape. He surely cannot afford more expensive food. Yet if he cannot obtain food, he will die of starvation. He is therefore close to becoming either a thief or a charity case. Anyone in Mosaic Israel who was a charity case had no services worth purchasing for the price of bread. Such a person might seek to become a gleaner during the harvest season, which did not last very long. The laws governing this form of charity were seasonal; they did the poor person no economic good outside of the harvest season. Gleaners worked hard in the fields to collect the morally compulsory charity that God specified for the poor (Lev. 19:10;¹ Deut. 24:26²). But that law applied only during the harvest season, a short period. This man is so destitute of productive skills that he cannot feed himself.

This proverb does not compare negatives: being despised vs. self-promotion. It compares a positive factor to a negative. The positive factor is wealth. The negative is poverty.

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 11.

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 62.

This would seem to be a straightforward conclusion. Few societies would not recognize its truth. But in modern Christian socialist circles, this conclusion is unacceptable. The socialist endorses some version of egalitarianism. He insists that the primary economic role of civil government is forcibly to redistribute income and capital toward equality. The socialist regards great disparities of wealth as morally objectionable and therefore socially objectionable. So, he must reject the conclusion I have made regarding the presence of a significant disparity of wealth as being the biblically deciding factor in evaluating the preferability of being either a despised man with a servant or a hungry self-promoter.

If my conclusion is correct, then egalitarianism is a false ideal. The Bible not only does not recommend the use of force to redistribute wealth, it presents wealth as a legitimate success indicator. The despised man with a servant is better off than a hungry self-promoter. This concept of “better off” is to be taken here in a broad sense, not merely as an accounting concept.

B. Accurate Self-Assessment

The person who is despised is not despised for having a servant. From Abram to the kings of Israel, men hired servants. There are almost 600 references to the Hebrew word for “servant” or “servants” in the Old Testament.

Having a servant is part of the social division of labor. A servant does work of lower value, or work that is beyond the skill of his employer. More work gets done by two men working together than by one man working alone. The Preacher—Solomon—insisted: “Two are better than one; because they have a good reward for their labour. For if they fall, the one will lift up his fellow: but woe to him that is alone when he falleth; for he hath not another to help him up” (Eccl. 4:9–10).³ A servant is low in the hierarchy, but he is nonetheless part of the social division of labor.

To hire a servant requires productivity or inherited wealth. This person has enough wealth or productivity to put a servant to work. He provides employment to the servant. Together, they provide output for others. For some reason, the person with the servant is despised. But those who despise him are aware that he is sufficiently successful to hire a servant.

3. Gary North, Autonomy and Stagnation: An Economic Commentary on Ecclesiastes (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 14.

In contrast is a person who announces to others that he is a success. He honors himself. Yet he lacks sufficient wealth or productivity to buy bread, let alone hire a servant. This proverb says that he is a failure—worse than a despised person. He should not be imitated.

The Bible is clear on this issue: the self-promoter is self-deluded. He is skating on thin ice. Jesus warned:

When thou art bidden of any man to a wedding, sit not down in the highest room; lest a more honourable man than thou be bidden of him; And he that bade thee and him come and say to thee, Give this man place; and thou begin with shame to take the lowest room. But when thou art bidden, go and sit down in the lowest room; that when he that bade thee cometh, he may say unto thee, Friend, go up higher: then shalt thou have worship in the presence of them that sit at meat with thee. For whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted (Luke 14:8–11).⁴

C. A False Front

This man lacks bread. In an urban setting, where most people do not know each other, he may be able to get away with the deception for a time. If he wears good clothes, using debt to buy these clothes, he may escape detection. A salesman may buy an expensive new car in an attempt to create the illusion of his success. But such subterfuge rarely works. He runs out of money before his false front produces the deals he hopes to make as his way out of poverty. In a rural or small-town community, this deception has no possibility of being successful. People know that he does not have money. They are well aware of the discrepancy between his talk and his performance.

This proverb does not indicate that this man is an urban resident. He is pictured as a more universal personality type. He is a man who seeks to inflate his own ego by claiming a degree of success that he does not possess. He has no success. He is poverty-stricken.

This proverb indicates that such a person is at the bottom of the social pyramid. He is the model of what not to be. He is used for comparison's sake. Better to be despised with only one servant than a self-honoring poor person. He lacks humility. As Jesus pointed out, such a person is ready to sit at the head of the table. But his self-assessment is not the assessment that matters. The host's assessment is what counts. The host is not deceived. He will lead the person to the lowest place—not exactly a place of dishonor, but barely inside the feast. It becomes a place of dishonor because the host leads the man, in full public view, to the fringes of social acceptance.

4. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 33.

In some cases, according to Jesus, the stakes are even higher. “Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity” (Matt. 7:22–23).

Conclusion

Wealth is not the only success indicator. This proverb implies that it would be better to be wealthy and loved than wealthy and despised. What society would not acknowledge this? But the contrast here is not between a wealthy despised man and a wealthy beloved man. It is between two negative conditions: being despised and being a self-promoter. The distinguishing characteristic is not found in the primary descriptions of these two men. It is the secondary characteristic: wealth vs. poverty. Wealth is better than poverty.

A self-promoter had better have a degree of success that corresponds to the level of his self-promotion. This is not the case here.

It is best to follow Jesus' recommendation: start at the bottom and let the host lead you to a higher position. Entry is easier at the bottom.

36

THE OBJECT OF OUR LABOR

He that tilleth his land shall be satisfied with bread: but he that followeth vain persons is void of understanding (Prov. 12:11).

A. Contentment

A farmer tills his land. He produces the grain that in turn produces bread. His labor input—tilling the soil—is part of the necessary process for producing bread. His labor has a specific goal: the production of bread. This is a universally known product. It is a source of life, but it is common. Common men produce it. There is nothing prestigious about producing bread. There is also nothing prestigious about producing the grain used to bake it.

The core issue here is personal satisfaction: contentment. This is one of God's greatest gifts. This is stressed in the New Testament far more than in the Old Testament.

Not that I speak in respect of want: for I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content (Phil. 4:11).¹

And having food and raiment let us be therewith content (I Tim. 6:8).²

Let your conversation be without covetousness; and be content with such things as ye have: for he hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee (Heb. 13:5).³

The farmer has found his area of service to God and to the society at large. He is content to plow the fields. It is hard work, but he is content to be doing it. His work and knowledge and tools over time produce his food. He is not looking to do big things. He is looking to do personally important things, beginning with producing a crop.

1. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 27.

2. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 10.

3. North, Ethics and Dominion, ch. 29.

B. The Pursuit of Vanity

The Hebrew word translated here as “vain” is elsewhere translated as “empty.” “And they took him, and cast him into a pit: and the pit was empty, there was no water in it” (Gen. 37:24). The Bible compares this kind of moral emptiness with lack of moral weight. “And they gave him threescore and ten pieces of silver out of the house of Baal-berith, wherewith Abimelech hired vain and light persons, which followed him” (Jud. 9:4).

We speak of someone important in his field as a heavyweight. We speak of someone without importance in his field as a lightweight. The word in this context goes beyond importance. These people are leaders. They are able to attract followers. Yet they themselves are empty. They do not perceive that they are empty. If they did, they would depart from their leadership positions. Their followers also do not perceive that they are empty. If they did, they would follow others.

The follower is devoid of understanding. So, there is a match-up. Empty people without sufficiently good judgment to assess their own emptiness attract followers who are devoid of understanding, who do not have the ability to assess the condition of their leaders. Jesus had a metaphor for this situation. “Let them alone: they be blind leaders of the blind. And if the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch” (Matt. 15:14).

If a vain person and his judgment-lacking followers pursue a goal, it is clear what the goal is: vanity. This is what the Preacher—Solomon—warned against in Ecclesiastes. “I have seen all the works that are done under the sun; and, behold, all is vanity and vexation of spirit” (Eccl. 1:14). Then what is to be done? After surveying the affairs of life, he comes to a recommendation:

Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth; and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes: but know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment. Therefore remove sorrow from thy heart, and put away evil from thy flesh: for childhood and youth are vanity. Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them (Eccl. 11:9–12:1).

This recommendation is based on a conclusion—a conclusion that in turn was based on a lifetime of contemplation, observation, and personal experience.

Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil (Eccl. 12:13–14).⁴

C. Satisfaction With Conventional Returns

The issue of satisfaction is one of the most difficult to solve. The more opportunities that men possess for both service and consumption, the more complex the problem of satisfaction becomes. The dying words of Cecil Rhodes of Rhodesia come to mind: “So much to do. So little time.”

This proverb contrasts two people: a tiller of the soil and a follower of vain people. The farmer has a goal: bread. The goal of the follower is unspecified.

The farmer’s goal is limited. Bread is called the staff of life, but it is exceedingly common. It was far more common in Mosaic Israel. Grain was the chief product of most farming in the Middle East. For a low-productivity, pre-capitalist agricultural society, grain is the source of life. It sustains most of the population. A man toils over the ground to grow grain, which is used to make bread, which sustains life. Bread is a no-frills product that is central to society. Jesus’ recommended prayer request, “Give us this day our daily bread” (Matt. 6:11),⁵ encapsulates the fundamental request: to sustain life.

This is a central goal. It is also a limited goal. The farmer must devote most of his time to the procedures of producing bread. There is neither significant spare time nor spare output in a pre-capitalist agricultural society. Output is low. The farmer is not easily sidetracked. He budgets his time and his capital well in advance. He pursues a narrow goal by means of a specific plan. The plan reflects decades of tradition. Things are to be done in a familiar pattern. There is limited creativity involved.

4. Gary North, Autonomy and Stagnation: An Economic Commentary on Ecclesiastes (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 45.

5. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 12:A–B.

In contrast is the man who follows vain persons. The word for “follows” is literally “runs after.” The meaning of vanity here is emptiness. The person’s life is marked by vain pursuits. A later proverb says: “He that tilleth his land shall have plenty of bread: but he that followeth after vain persons shall have poverty enough” (Prov. 28:19).⁶ Following empty leaders, he comes up empty-handed.

People do not deliberately follow losers. They prefer to follow winners. They hope to participate in the successful ventures of successful people. They expect success to trickle down to them because of their joint participation.

The person described here is not following winners. He is following empty people. But these empty people radiate the trappings of success. Their followers do not perceive that the leaders’ dreams and schemes are futile. It is a case of the blind leading the blind into the ditch.

Then came his disciples, and said unto him, Knowest thou that the Pharisees were offended, after they heard this saying? But he answered and said, Every plant, which my heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up. Let them alone: they be blind leaders of the blind. And if the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch (Matt. 15:12–14).

Folk sayings drive home the warning: “All that glitters is not gold.” In Texas, they say: “He is all hat and no cattle.” There is a deception as old as paper money: a roll of worthless counterfeit bills wrapped in a high-denomination bill. There is also the hidden phenomenon of consumer debt. A person may wear fine clothes and drive an expensive car, but he is living on the edge of bankruptcy.

Such people attract followers. If they also talk a good line, their appeal is even greater. But they are empty in every sense. They live a lie. Those who are attracted to them will participate, not in their success, but in their failure.

D. Rates of Return

The message of this proverb is this: the day-to-day activities of a farmer who plants seed and cares for his crop will pay off. He and his family will eat. There is no hint that he will get rich. But he will survive. In contrast is the vain pursuit of the man who follows empty people. His plans will come to nothing.

6. Chapter 82.

The systematic pursuit of conventional returns on one's conventional labor is the working model of this proverb. There is nothing spectacular about bread. There is nothing spectacular about farming. Yet the man who diligently sets a conventional goal and follows a conventional plan will find success. The person who has big plans for achieving above-average returns, and who then seeks out smooth talkers who promise above-average returns, will find that he achieves below-average returns.

When a man adopts an innovation in the field in which he has experience, he is seeking an above-average rate of return. He is not satisfied with his previous level of success. He seeks greater output per unit of resource input. This is the motivation for economic progress. It is the underlying impetus for compound growth in every field. Does this proverb suggest that such a motivation is illegitimate?

The proverb's farmer is not being contrasted with a highly innovative farmer. He is being contrasted with a chaser after dreams. The man who runs after vain persons has no experience in the day-to-day activities of specialized production. Or, if he has such experience, he has abandoned it. He is not evaluating the potential success of a new technology in terms of his long experience with older technology. Instead, he is following after empty people. He does not recognize counterfeit claims and strategies when he sees them.

Real estate entrepreneur John Schaub sells a seminar, "Making It Big on Little Deals." The wealth-accumulation strategy works. For over three decades, I watched as he accumulated dozens of homes, now mostly paid off by his renters. He has done this one house at a time. His long-term goal is to leave most of them to charity when he dies, with the funds to be used to build housing for the working poor. Meanwhile, he has provided clean housing for renters at slightly below-market rents. This way, they move out of his houses less often, which saves him time and money in replacing them with new tenants.

In the congested field of get-rich-quick schemes, real estate is a popular one. Late-night television hucksters sell the dream of great wealth through real estate speculation. Schaub does not promote his courses or newsletter in this way. He barely promotes at all, as I have been telling him for three decades. He recommends buying strategies similar to those recommended by the hucksters, but accompanied by careful, self-disciplined, time-intensive preparation. He does not oversell his subscribers and attendees. He has made a fortune in real estate, not through the sale of courses on real estate. He offers only two courses per year, always in the same two cities.

The difference between the two sorts of information sellers is the difference between plowing a field and speculating in grain futures. The farmer will probably bring in a crop and re-plant next season. The commodity speculator will probably lose his money. Most of them do.

Conclusion

The farmer is a steady-as-you-go fellow. The vanity-chaser is ready to buy based on flash, glitter, and promises. The farmer knows his field. The vanity-chaser does not. The farmer is satisfied with the most mundane of products: bread. The vanity-chaser is not satisfied with anything. The farmer wants bread. The vanity-chaser wants more. The pursuit of more is the pursuit of mammon. Jesus warned: "No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon" (Matt. 6:24).⁷

Bread sustains life. More is unbounded: beyond mere sustenance. Bread is produced with a systematic plan with a specific time of completion. More is open-ended, which means that no plan is appropriate. Successful plans must have identifiable, measurable goals, i.e., limits. Vanity-chasers resist the concept of limits. Therefore, they reject the idea of systematic plans with limited, measurable goals.

The steady work of a farmer tilling his fields is preferable to a life spent in pursuit of goals announced by empty men. The grand schemes of empty men can absorb a lifetime of effort. But when life is over, all the effort has been wasted. It is like seed planted in rocky soil in a parched place (Matt. 13:5–6).⁸ The labor theory of value is incorrect. Labor's value derives from the value of labor's output. In the case of farmers: bread. In the case of vain men: emptiness that matches their spiritual condition.

7. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 14.

8. Ibid., ch. ????

DILIGENCE AND DOMINION

The hand of the diligent shall bear rule: but the slothful shall be under tribute (Prov. 12:24).

This proverb deals with hierarchy, point two of the biblical covenant.¹ There will always be rulers who rule over servants. The institutional question is this: What is the basis of hierarchy in any organization? This is an application of a more comprehensive question: What is the foundation of rulership in a godly social order?

What is the meaning here of “hand”? It means power in the sense of rulership. It implies taking responsibility. We see this meaning in God’s transfer of civil power to Noah after the Flood. “And surely your blood of your lives will I require; at the hand of every beast will I require it, and at the hand of man; at the hand of every man’s brother will I require the life of man” (Gen. 9:5).

What does “tribute” mean? It has to do with subordination. “Yet it came to pass, when the children of Israel were waxen strong, that they put the Canaanites to tribute; but did not utterly drive them out” (Josh. 17:13). This was tribute extracted politically. The Canaanites were forced to serve the Israelites by paying them something of value.

The text of this proverb does not imply political tribute. It implies economic tribute. But what is economic tribute? This proverb does not say.

Deuteronomy 28 outlines a two-fold system of sanctions: positive and negative. Verses 1–14 present the positive.² Among the list is this:

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

The LORD shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his season, and to bless all the work of thine hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow. And the LORD shall make thee the head, and not the tail; and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath; if that thou hearken unto the commandments of the LORD thy God, which I command thee this day, to observe and to do them (Deut. 28:12–13).³

Verses 15–68 present the negative sanctions, among which is this:

The stranger that is within thee shall get up above thee very high; and thou shalt come down very low. He shall lend to thee, and thou shalt not lend to him: he shall be the head, and thou shalt be the tail (Deut. 28:43–44).

The defining issue here is debt. He who is in debt is subordinate to his creditor. “The rich ruleth over the poor, and the borrower is servant to the lender” (Prov. 22:7).⁴ The servant is paying the ruler for the loan that the ruler had extended to him. He is in a form of legal bondage.

This proverb indicates that the slothful person is not in a strong bargaining position in relation to the diligent person. This could mean debt. It could also mean employment options. The slothful person has no economic reserves. When labor becomes plentiful at yesterday’s wages, the slothful person may have to lower his asking price for his labor. He has no money or food in reserve. He cannot take time to shop for better employment opportunities. He pays tribute to the employer in the form of low-cost labor services.

This proverb in no way hints that this hierarchical relationship is immoral. Throughout Proverbs, the reader is warned of negative economic sanctions that face slothful workers. These warnings are consistent with the negative sanctions presented in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. There is a system of ethical cause and effect in history. Ethical performance has predictable wealth effects. This is an aspect of point four of the biblical covenant.⁵

The diligent person becomes the beneficiary of the tribute paid by the slothful person. The focus here is on production. The slothful person is not highly productive. This is his problem. He would be far better off financially if he were diligent. So, for that matter, would the dili-

3. Ibid., ch. 70.

4. Chapter 67.

5. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 4. North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 4.

gent person be. It is better to hire the services of a productive person than an unproductive person. This is why the unproductive person must offer to work at low wages. This is all that his productivity warrants.

A diligent person is better off in a society of diligent people than in a society of slothful people. In a land of sloth, he may find more people to pay tribute to him, but their output is below par. This is why they are cheap to hire. He is a ruler in a land of losers. It is better to be a common person in a society of high producers. The economic competition is stiffer, but the wealth per capita is higher.

There is a phrase, "in the land of the blind, the one-eyed man is king." But he is king over people who cannot see. Better to be a two-eyed man in a society of two-eyed men.

Conclusion

Dominion through diligence is the pattern. The slothful person is unlikely to exercise dominion. He is more likely to be in debt to, or on the payroll of, the diligent person. The diligent person leads. He makes decisions as to what must be done. The slothful person is a follower. He is not in a position to make decisions for others. He does what he is told. He does this ineffectively.

CHARACTER AND CAPITAL

The soul of the sluggard desireth, and hath nothing: but the soul of the diligent shall be made fat (Prov. 13:4).

A. The Dreamer and the Doer

Here are another pair of contrasts: the sluggard and the diligent. The first is a dreamer. The second is a doer.

The Book of Proverbs is forthrightly opposed to sluggards. Lazy people are contemptuous of work, Solomon informs us in proverb after proverb. They are losers, and they deserve to be losers. A continuing message of Proverbs is that God's system of causation is rigged against sluggards (3:9–10).¹ They cannot win.

We have to deal with the Hebrew word translated here as “soul.” It refers to anything that breathes. It means “life.”

And it came to pass, when they had brought them forth abroad, that he said, Escape for thy life; look not behind thee, neither stay thou in all the plain; escape to the mountain, lest thou be consumed (Gen. 19:17).

Behold now, thy servant hath found grace in thy sight, and thou hast magnified thy mercy, which thou hast shewed unto me in saving my life; and I cannot escape to the mountain, lest some evil take me, and I die (Gen. 19:19).

The soul of the sluggard, like the soul of the diligent, is his life. It defines him. His life is marked by longings. He wants to achieve certain things or obtain certain things. Yet he faces a problem: he has nothing. He has no capital. Without capital, he cannot finance projects that might enable him to buy the things of his dreams.

In contrast is the soul of the diligent. It will be made fat. What is fatness? Sometimes, it refers to bodily weight. “The light of the eyes rejoiceth the heart: and a good report maketh the bones fat” (Prov. 15:30). In this case, the fatness promised is not the product of calories. The soul of man is not fattened up like an animal being prepared for the butcher. What does fat have to do with life? This passage refers to the fatness of life.

1. Chapter 8.

The sluggard has a lean soul. This condition is expressly attributed to the Israelites in the wilderness. “They soon forgot his works; they waited not for his counsel: But lusted exceedingly in the wilderness, and tempted God in the desert. And he gave them their request; but sent leanness into their soul” (Ps. 106:13–15).² The word for soul here is nephesh—just as it is in this proverb.

B. Dreaming and Doing

This proverb says that the soul of the sluggard desires. The soul of the diligent will be made fat. This contrasts what the sluggard wants with what the sluggard possesses. The sluggard is frustrated by his lack of wealth. He has great dreams and no assets. There is a complete disconnect between dream and reality.

The diligent person is defined by his work. This proverb points to the connection between cause and effect. He works, and the result is fatness. His life is complete. He is not longing after things he cannot have. He has a strong work ethic. This is the source of his fatness. There is a tight connection between labor and reward. “He becometh poor that dealeth with a slack hand: but the hand of the diligent maketh rich” (Prov. 10:4).³

One man dreams but does not do. The other man does and reaps a reward. These are two ways of life. The apostle James offered a similar connection: “But be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves” (James 1:22). The sluggard is self-deceived. He has great dreams and no output. He does not have a path to his dreams based on diligent labor.

The diligent person also has dreams. “The thoughts of the diligent tend only to plenteousness; but of every one that is hasty only to want” (Prov. 21:5).⁴ He has a pathway in mind: from here to there. What is the meaning of plenteousness? The Hebrew word only occurs three times in Scripture. It is translated as “profit” and “preeminence.”

2. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 23.

3. Chapter 21.

4. Chapter 62.

In all labour there is profit: but the talk of the lips tendeth only to penury (Prov. 14:23).⁵

For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them: as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath; so that a man hath no preeminence above a beast: for all is vanity (Eccl. 3:19).⁶

Plenteousness means advantage. The diligent person seeks personal advantage. He wants to distinguish his work, and therefore himself, from the run-of-the-mill performer. He has great things in mind. What distinguishes him from the sluggard is not the presence of dreams. What distinguishes him is his diligence. He does high quality work. God rewards him for both his dreams and his effort.

C. Fat Souls

The Hebrew word translated “soul” is nephesh. It can mean breath. It means life.

Fatness in the Old Covenant era was a thing to pursue. It was a sign of God’s blessing. “The sword of the LORD is filled with blood, it is made fat with fatness, and with the blood of lambs and goats, with the fat of the kidneys of rams: for the LORD hath a sacrifice in Bozrah, and a great slaughter in the land of Idumea” (Isa. 34:6). In a low-productivity agricultural world, meat was a special meal. Meat was for special occasions. Fat is what gives flavor to meat. Fat was reserved for God in the sacrificial system: the whole burnt offering (Lev. 1).⁷

The meaning of this proverb is that the diligent person’s life is marked by special blessing. There is therefore a predictable relationship between diligence and success. This success is not merely the accumulation of possessions. It is successful living generally.

D. Unfulfilled Dreams

In contrast to the full life of the diligent person is the life of the sluggard. This person is not committed to his work. He prefers leisure to work. This attitude is reflected in his performance.

5. Chapter 46.

6. Gary North, Autonomy and Stagnation: An Economic Commentary on Ecclesiastes (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 7:C.

7. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 1.

The sluggard desires success. He dreams of success. He possesses nothing. Here, the focus is on goods. The contrast between dream and reality is sharp.

Why does he possess nothing? This proverb does not say, but it implies that his performance is substandard. He is a sluggard. He is not marked by a commitment to labor. He is not diligent about his work.

The message here is clear: there is a relationship between laziness and poverty. The sluggard has great dreams, but these dreams are not translated into performance.

There is a book written by a mind-over-matter promoter, Napoleon Hill: Think and Grow Rich. It has sold millions of copies. His most famous statement is this: "What the mind of man can conceive and believe, it can achieve." This is humanism's creed. It is also a form of mysticism: an affirmation of temporal causation that is directed by autonomous thought without physical mediation. Those who adopt his techniques of mental visualization are generally unaware that these are techniques of eastern mysticism, which kept Asia poverty-stricken while the West grew rich, 1500–2000. The basic outlook of this philosophy of causation is this: "You can become anything you believe you can become. This is because you make your own reality through imagination." There is a pseudo-Christian variant of this philosophy, made famous in the 1950s by Rev. Norman Vincent Peale, especially in his best-selling book, The Power of Positive Thinking (1953). Peale became a national figure in the United States. He was a pastor in the Reformed Church of America, whose official theology has nothing to do with Peale's philosophy.

This proverb challenges any philosophy of think and grow rich. The sluggard can think all he wants; he is still a sluggard. He can think of himself as overcoming the limits around him. He is still a sluggard. The biblical concept of causation has to do with a positive confession—not of faith in man but faith in God. It is tied to goal-setting and careful planning, not visualization and repetition of self-affirming formulas. The most famous of these formulas in the early twentieth century was French pharmacist Emile Coué's dictum, to be repeated at the beginning and end of each day: "Every day in every way, I am getting better and better." He called his system "autosuggestion."

Conclusion

The sluggard is not dreaming of achieving psychological satisfaction. He is dreaming of measurable wealth. He possesses nothing.

His condition is contrasted with the condition of the diligent person. This contrast leads to a conclusion. The diligent person has a legitimate expectation of measurable wealth. This success is not limited to psychological satisfaction, which is perceptible only to the individual. The fatness described here is not limited to the internal realm of feeling.

Solomon does not denigrate measurable wealth. On the contrary, he affirms its legitimacy. He disparages the slothful person because that man's dreams of success—dreams not matched by diligence—produce poverty. Poverty is seen as a liability.

Here is another presentation of the basics of success and failure. The sluggard is a moral failure; therefore, he fails visibly. His character marks him as a moral failure. He is lazy. His character manifests itself in his behavior and then in his capital. He has nothing.

The contrast is between laziness and diligence. This is a continuing theme in Proverbs. "How long wilt thou sleep, O sluggard? when wilt thou arise out of thy sleep?" (6:9). He is easily thwarted by discomfort. "The sluggard will not plow by reason of the cold; therefore shall he beg in harvest, and have nothing" (20:4). He is conceited, believing himself to be beyond limits than hamper others. "The sluggard is wiser in his own conceit than seven men that can render a reason" (26:16). In contrast is the diligent man. The diligent man is a moral success; therefore, he succeeds visibly. His character marks him as a moral success. He is not lazy. His character manifests itself in his behavior and then in his capital. He has a fat soul.

WEALTH AND POVERTY

There is that maketh himself rich, yet hath nothing; there is that maketh himself poor, yet hath great riches (Proverbs 13:7).

A. Success: Real and Illusionary

This proverb presents two views of wealth and poverty. The rival views divide over the correct covenantal definition of success. A man is described as successfully accumulating riches, yet he is really poor. Another man deliberately pursues poverty, yet he is rich.

Riches are an illusion, the proverb says. An individual heaps up possessions, yet none of it counts for anything. Why not? The author does not say. Poverty is also an illusion. A man pursues a life of poverty, yet he attains riches. How? The author does not say.

To make sense of this proverb, we must answer two questions. The first question is this: Who is deceived by the illusion of wealth? The person who has pursued wealth is self-deceived. But, given the widespread desire to attain marketable wealth, the illusion of a man's wealth is shared by those who know of the extent of his possessions. The proverb warns us not be taken in by the illusion.

The second question is this: Who is deceived by the illusion of poverty? Answer: all those who are deceived by the illusion of wealth. But the person who actually pursues poverty is not taken in. He understands that the road to great riches is poverty.

The author was familiar with the Mosaic law. He understood Deuteronomy 28, which lists sanctions for covenant-keeping and covenant-breaking.¹ He understood Deuteronomy 8, which speaks of wealth as a testimony to the covenant (v. 17).² Then why does he teach here that wealth and poverty are illusions?

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

2. Ibid., ch. 21.

There are two views of wealth and two views of poverty. The first view can be described as trust in tangible riches. These are assets that can be bought and sold in markets. The second view can be described as trust in non-tangible riches. These assets cannot be bought and sold in markets.

We can say that riches are success indicators. They are not success. Wealth as a success indicator is valid, Moses said, but it is not a substitute for right standing with God. The psalmist said the same thing in Psalm 73. Evil men can attain wealth for a time, but they stand on slippery slopes (v. 18).³ This proverb describes such a condition. Those who regard themselves as rich are in fact impoverished.

There are poor men who are poor for the sake of the kingdom of God. Jesus is the supreme example. He did not have a place to lay His head (Matt. 8:20).⁴ He taught His disciples not to pursue marketable riches, but to seek first the kingdom of God. All these marketable things will be added (Matt. 6:33).⁵ It is not that they are wrong to own. It is that they are worth owning only when they are the result of covenant-keeping, not the result of autonomy.

B. The Source of Wealth

The source of wealth matters. It can be attained in two general ways: covenant-keeping and covenant-breaking. The only basis of long-term wealth is covenant-keeping (Deut 28:1–14). The positive sanctions of God are visible and historical. But there are ways to attain wealth that are not the result of covenant-keeping.

The man described here as wealthy yet impoverished has mistaken the success indicator, marketable wealth, for success. Success is what the poor man attains. He has pursued a course of life that produces poverty. Think of the foreign missionary. A good example is J. Hudson Taylor, who started the China Inland Mission in the late nineteenth century. He ate and dressed like the Chinese in his region. He began a regimen of eating simple Chinese food in England, before he went on his first mission. He ate very little, just as most of his future cultural peers did. He pursued poverty for the sake of riches. These riches were

3. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 18.

4. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 19.

5. Ibid., ch. 15.

non-marketable.

Most religions maintain the distinction between wealth as a snare and poverty as a holy ideal. Biblical religion is no exception. But biblical religion sees marketable wealth as neither exclusively a snare nor a testimony of spiritual success. The criteria for judging the success or failure of wealth are ethical. This also applies to poverty as a failure indicator. Neither wealth nor poverty is an autonomous, self-justifying standard of success.

Jesus amplified the insight of this proverb. He asked a rhetorical question: What does it profit a man to gain the whole world and lose his soul (Matt. 16:36).⁶ This contrast is based on the New Testament's doctrine of final judgment and resurrection. Jesus also taught that covenant-keepers are supposed to lay up treasures in heaven by giving away marketable wealth in history (Matt. 6:19–20).⁷ This was more explicit than anything taught in the Old Testament, but it was not inconsistent with Old Testament doctrine, as this proverb indicates.

Conclusion

The rich man accumulates marketable wealth, yet he is poor. The poor man accumulates little marketable wealth, yet he is rich. This gives an indication of God's evaluation of wealth and poverty. He imputes nothing of value to wealth accumulated on the basis of autonomy. It does not matter if the rich man obeyed biblical law or not, whether he was a thief or highly productive. What matters is his judicial standing with God: "guilty" or "not guilty." Legal standing is a matter of God's grace. It is not purchased by the recipient. The grace of eternal life is the greatest wealth of all, yet it is non-marketable.

6. Ibid., ch. 35.

7. Ibid., ch. 13.

WEALTH ACCUMULATION

Wealth gotten by vanity shall be diminished: but he that gathereth by labour shall increase (Prov. 13:11).

This proverb acknowledges that it is possible for morally empty people to accumulate wealth. It also asserts that this wealth will eventually be diminished. That which is accumulated in the short run is not retained in the long run.

In contrast, the fruits of labor are positive. In this case, labor means honest labor. It is not that vain people do not labor. It is that their labor is an extension of their worldview. They are spiritually empty. Thus, the visible results of their efforts do not persevere. This view is consistent with the more general proverb: “A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children’s children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just” (13:22).¹

What is vanity? The word appears again and again in Ecclesiastes. It refers to emptiness. Something looks appealing; in fact, it is empty. It does not deliver what the seeker had expected. Ecclesiastes dismisses as vanity all of the world’s preferred benefits.

Then there is outright deception. This also is a form of vanity. “The getting of treasures by a lying tongue is a vanity tossed to and fro of them that seek death” (21:6).² This deception is literally suicidal.

A. Built on Emptiness

Men can accumulate wealth through vanity. Vanity is one basis of accumulation. But in what sense? Is this vanity in the mind of the seller or the buyer? Is the foundation of the accumulated wealth the producer’s vanity or the consumer’s?

1. Chapter 41.

2. Chapter 63.

To answer this, we must look at the contrast. The person who accumulates assets through honest labor will see his wealth increase. The focus of this proverb is the dedication of the producer. There is no mention of the buyer.

The vain person also heaps up wealth. This wealth is insecure. It rests on the efforts of a spiritually empty person.

Why should his wealth be threatened? If he is spiritually empty, but his product meets the desires of buyers, the buyers will continue to buy. The flow of funds from the buyers to the producer is not threatened by the spiritual condition of the producer, just so long as he meets the wants of the buyers at prices they are willing to pay.

There are several threats. First, the empty person or his heirs will squander the income, shrinking the net worth of the capital base. Second, the vain person will eventually reduce the value of his output by trying to cut costs by cutting quality. Third, demand will fall because of new competition. Fourth, the buying public's tastes will change, leading to falling demand. The producer's moral flaw will eventually begin to affect the competitiveness of his output.

B. Built on Honest Work

In contrast, the person who works honestly and pays attention to his budget will accumulate capital. He recognizes the positive relationship between good work and high income. He goes about his business in a methodical way. Over time, this attitude toward wealth produces an increase. The laborer does not attempt to take shortcuts that reduce the buyer's benefits. He may try to become more efficient, but the buyer is not short-changed.

This proverb promotes the idea of the value of labor. It does not teach that the value of labor's output is based on the labor's input. In other words, it does not teach the labor theory of value. It does not teach that labor, apart from consumer demand, produces wealth. It does teach that the person who seeks to gather through his own efforts has the correct attitude toward wealth. Wealth can be attained through vanity or through honest labor. The correct approach is honest labor, which secures increasing wealth. Labor is necessary for the preservation of wealth.

God labored to create the world. This gives meaning to the mandated day of rest (Ex. 20:11).³ This also serves as an example for those who seek wealth. God has built into the social order a system of causation. Labor, when added to land (the environment), produces lasting wealth.

3. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus

Inherent in creation is the requirement that people work. All warnings that labor-saving machinery or software will produce widespread unemployment are misguided. Labor-saving innovations release men from laboring in one field. This does not reduce the quantity of labor required to maintain the social order. Human labor is the least specific of production inputs. It can be shifted to new fields. There is always more work to be done. Manufacturing in the twentieth century declined in economically advanced countries, but service industries replaced manufacturing. Labor became ever-more valuable as capital accumulated. This was because labor became ever-more productive as capital accumulated.

Conclusion

Built into the creation is a program of capital accumulation. At the heart of this process is labor. Men must devote time, thought, and energy in their quest to accumulate wealth. Labor is desirable as a tool of self-dominion. It is part of the dominion covenant.⁴ When labor is applied to a program of wealth accumulation, the results are positive. Any attempt to get rich apart from labor is a snare and a delusion. It is an empty quest. Such a quest may work for a while, but the program is self-destructive. It undermines long-term capital appreciation.

(Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 24.

4. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

41

ETHICS AND INHERITANCE

A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just (Prov. 13:22).

This is the most important verse in the Bible that deals with inheritance: point five of the biblical covenant.¹ It establishes a principle of interpretation: economic sanctions² are related to ethical performance.³ This brief aphorism summarizes the system of sanctions that is presented in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28.

A. Generation-Skipping

The proverb establishes the legitimacy of wealth accumulation. A good man accumulates wealth, which he passes on to his grandchildren. In summary, “you can’t leave it behind if there isn’t any.”

Why doesn’t the proverb specify children? Why does it refer to grandchildren? The text does not say, but I can offer possible suggestions.

First, the behavior of grandchildren reveals the success of their parents in transferring the ethical precepts of the grandparents. There is visible evidence of the degree of intergenerational covenantal inheritance. Depending on how old the grandchildren are, the grandfather can see which grandchildren are likely to extend the kingdom of God in history. This is a matter of their confession and performance: word and deed.

Second, parents should be accumulating capital to transfer to their

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 5.

2. Ibid., ch. 4.

3. Ibid., ch. 3.

as yet unborn grandchildren. Wealth from the grandparents can be used to capitalize the grandchildren. This saves the parents money, which can then be used to build up family capital. Part of this accumulated capital will in turn go to their children.

Third, the grandparents should not let the parents inherit all of their wealth. The heirs may squander this legacy. By leaving wealth to grandchildren, a grandfather reduces the risk of the decapitalization of the family's inheritance. This is a strategy of risk diversification.

This raises the question of the administration of capital. The parents may not be effective trustees. If the grandparents place the grandchildren's legacy under the authority of the parents, the grandchildren may be disinherited through parental mismanagement. This is why trusts can be effective instruments for transferring wealth. An independent trustee, chosen by the grantor, will act on behalf of the trust's beneficiaries until they come of age, as specified by the trust.

B. The Flow of Funds

The second part of this proverb is the heart of the matter: the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just.

There is a common saying: "The rich get richer, and the poor get poorer." This saying is refuted by the effects of compound growth in the West after 1780. The rich have indeed grown richer, but so have the poor. The poor person today lives better than most rich people did in 1800 or even 1900. He has access to far better medical care. His children are more likely to survive childhood diseases and accidents. He has more entertainment.

This proverb says that the righteous get richer at the expense of the unrighteous. How? Through inheritance. Wealth accumulated by the covenant-breaker is inherited by the covenant-keeper. How can this be?

There are two ways. First, the heirs abandon covenant-breaking for covenant-keeping. This is inheritance through adoption into the family of God. Second, covenant-keepers become more productive than covenant-breakers. The covenant-breaking heirs of rich covenant-breakers spend their inheritances on goods and services produced for sale by covenant-keepers.

This proverb rests on an assumption: the structure of covenantal inheritance favors covenant-keeping over the long term. There can be a build-up of wealth. But this is alienable wealth. Covenant-breakers cannot maintain possession of it in the long run. The covenantal structure of society militates against covenant-breaking. God has not established a level playing field. He has tilted it in favor of His covenant people.

How is it tilted? In five ways. First, God is sovereign over creation. He who acknowledges this publicly is specially favored by God. “Wherefore the LORD God of Israel saith, I said indeed that thy house, and the house of thy father, should walk before me for ever: but now the LORD saith, Be it far from me; for them that honour me I will honour, and they that despise me shall be lightly esteemed” (I Sam. 2:30).

Second, men must covenant with either God or Satan. God is the source of blessings. Satan is not. “Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning” (James 1:17).⁴

Third, society is governed by biblical law. This law is inherently ethical. There is a difference between right and wrong. This is the difference between covenant-keeping and covenant-breaking.

Fourth, there are predictable sanctions in history, positive and negative. Covenant-keeping brings positive sanctions (Deut. 28:1–14).⁵ Covenant-breaking brings negative sanctions (Deut. 28:15–68).

Fifth, the process of positive sanctions compounds wealth over time as a testimony to God’s covenantal faithfulness. “But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:18).⁶ This process transfers the inheritance of history to God’s people. “For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth” (Ps. 37:9).

C. Per Capita Economic Growth

This proverb directs our attention to the future. It reminds us that our efforts in history extend down through history through our grandchildren. But they also come under the covenantal structure of inheritance. They will someday be reminded of the intergenerational nature of inheritance in history.

The compounding process through time is a way to extend God’s

4. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 33.

5. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

6. Ibid., ch. 22.

dominion in history. Population multiplies. Heirship extends to numbers like the sand of the sea. God promised Abraham: “That in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore; and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies; And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed; because thou hast obeyed my voice” (Gen. 22:17–18). But the heirs do not get poorer as a result: same size pie, but with more pieces to share. On the contrary, they get richer. The promise of God’s covenant is per capita economic growth. There will be leisure for all of God’s people. “But they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree; and none shall make them afraid: for the mouth of the LORD of hosts hath spoken it” (Micah 4:4).⁷

Not only does the Bible teach linear history—creation, Fall, redemption, final judgment—it teaches historical progress: ethically, intellectually, economically. Nowhere in the Bible is this made clearer than in Isaiah 65.

And ye shall leave your name for a curse unto my chosen: for the Lord GOD shall slay thee, and call his servants by another name: That he who blesseth himself in the earth shall bless himself in the God of truth; and he that sweareth in the earth shall swear by the God of truth; because the former troubles are forgotten, and because they are hid from mine eyes. For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people: and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying. There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed. And they shall build houses, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them (Isa. 65:15–21).⁸

Conclusion

If the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just, then God’s people should be optimistic regarding the future. A high level of future-orientation should mark their thinking. Future-orientation is the premier

7. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 26.

8. Ibid., ch. 15.

feature of an upper-class individual.⁹

To maintain this outlook, men must act consistently with it. This means that they should strive to build up an inheritance, not merely for their children but also for their grandchildren. They must transfer wealth and vision to grandchildren, who are too young to have secured their place in the world, but whose confessions and outward behavior mark them as covenant-keepers. Such a transfer of wealth takes faith that God will keep the terms of His covenant and not dissipate the inheritance.

9. Edward C. Banfield, The Unheavenly City: The Nature and Future of Our Urban Crisis (Boston: Little, Brown, 1970), pp. 48–50.

DESTRUCTIVE INJUSTICE

Much food is in the fallow ground of the poor, but it is swept away by injustice (Prov. 13:23).

This is the translation of the New American Standard Bible. The King James translation is not clear: “Much food is in the tillage of the poor: but there is that is destroyed for want of judgment.”

A. Fallow Ground

The Hebrew word translated by the King James as “tillage” is translated as “fallow ground” elsewhere in the Old Testament.

For thus saith the LORD to the men of Judah and Jerusalem, Break up your fallow ground, and sow not among thorns (Jer. 4:3).

Sow to yourselves in righteousness, reap in mercy; break up your fallow ground: for it is time to seek the LORD, till he come and rain righteousness upon you (Hosea 10:12).

Fallow ground is ground that has not been plowed or seeded. It may be fallow for a season, as was to have been the case in the seventh, sabbatical year (Lev. 25:1–7).¹ It may be fallow only until plowing time.

The contrast of Proverbs 13:23 with Hosea 10:12 indicates that fallow land in this case was temporarily fallow. The prophet called on the Israelites to ethical behavior: “Sow to yourselves in righteousness, reap in mercy.” Seeding the land is described here as practicing righteousness. Repentance is the equivalent of plowing fallow soil, which precedes planting: “Break up your fallow ground.” When Israelites repent and work in terms of their new ethical vision, there will be a positive sanction from God: “rain righteousness upon you.” Then will come the harvest. Hosea spoke of repentance and restoration in terms of plowing, seeding, and harvesting what had been fallow land.

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 24.

This prophetic context points to the exegetical content of this proverb. The fallow ethical land of Israel contains the fruits of righteous labor. But to produce these fruits, there must be conformity to the Mosaic law. This was the continuing message of the prophets: a call to restore the nation by conforming to the Mosaic law.

B. Injustice

Injustice under the Mosaic covenant was any law enforcement that was in conflict with the terms of the Mosaic law, including its civil sanctions. The prophets did not come before the nation to call the people back to ethics in general or to natural law as revealed to autonomous human wisdom. King David set the example for every future king of Israel.

Now the days of David drew nigh that he should die; and he charged Solomon his son, saying, I go the way of all the earth: be thou strong therefore, and shew thyself a man; And keep the charge of the LORD thy God, to walk in his ways, to keep his statutes, and his commandments, and his judgments, and his testimonies, as it is written in the law of Moses, that thou mayest prosper in all that thou doest, and whithersoever thou turnest thyself (I Kings 2:1–3).

After the Babylonian captivity, the people who returned to the land of Israel made this public confession to God.

Howbeit thou art just in all that is brought upon us; for thou hast done right, but we have done wickedly: Neither have our kings, our princes, our priests, nor our fathers, kept thy law, nor hearkened unto thy commandments and thy testimonies, wherewith thou didst testify against them (Neh. 9:33–34).

With this in mind, consider the message of this proverb. In fallow land there is a means of growing food. To fallow ground must be added labor: plowing it, seeding it, irrigating it, and keeping it free of crop-consuming insects. Labor must be paid for. So must seeds. All this takes time. Time has a price: interest.

Fallow ground does not normally produce a crop that will sustain an owner economically. So, for fallow ground to bear fruit, the owner or renter must add something of value. He makes an investment: time. A poor man makes a large investment proportional to his capital. He has no reserves if he makes a mistake. Converting a fallow field to food is a high-risk proposition for him.

What is the effect of the threat of injustice on the motivation of a poor man? Highly negative. He is just barely scraping by. Now he faces a new uncertainty: the misuse of the legal system to reduce his income. People with power become his enemies. He can do little to thwart their plans, once his seeds are sown. His land cannot be concealed. The fruits of his labor will be visible to everyone. He is vulnerable. He has no money to hire a lawyer or bribe an official. He operates at the mercy of the legal system. But he cannot trust the legal system.

Injustice is like a harvesting tool. It sweeps away the crop. But this proverb does not say that a crop is ready for harvesting. It says that food is in a fallow field. It speaks metaphorically. Injustice is like a pre-planting harvesting tool. It sweeps away the crop that will not be planted. How is an unplanted crop swept away? By sweeping away the planter's willingness to plant.

C. Marginal Loss = Total Loss

Men make investments of land, labor, time, and capital for the sake of a hoped-for return on their investments. They expect to harvest a return that is higher than what they invested. They work in hope.

Hope is undermined by the threat of injustice. If the land's owner or renter does not expect to gain more than he invests, he will look for other places to make his investment. He will not willingly sacrifice money, time, and energy for the sake of a negative rate of return. He will not work for free in order to benefit unjust people.

Injustice is destructive. This proverb says that it is as destructive as a harvesting tool that sweeps away an entire crop. The threat of injustice at the margin produces the complete destruction of the crop. There will be no crop.

The disincentive produced by injustice is very great, this proverb says. It does not explain why this is true. Solomon expected the reader to understand how men plan for the future. But even if the reader does not understand the logic of the example, he perceives the basic message: injustice is destructive. It could be compared with a plague of locusts that strips away a crop.

Conclusion

Injustice is destructive. The poor man who does not plant a field is harmed. The would-be buyers of his crop are harmed. Even the purveyors of injustice are harmed. They will have less wealth to confiscate through their misuse of the legal system.

Injustice reduces production, but it does so in a way that cannot be perceived directly. A fallow field that remains fallow can be blamed on many factors. But the supreme factor, according to this proverb, is injustice. Someone had planned to gain part of someone else's crop at a below-market price. Now he will do without. So will everyone else.

COSTS OF PRODUCTION

Where no oxen are, the crib is clean: but much increase is by the strength of the ox (Prov. 14:4).

The opening clause points to one seemingly beneficial aspect of low productivity: it takes less work. A man owns a stall, suitable for an ox. He does not own or lease an ox. The stall is economically useless unless it is inside a building, which could be used for storage. A holding pen for an animal is a highly specific form of capital. If there is no animal to be penned in, what good is it?

When used, an ox's stall is a mess. It is filled with droppings. Nobody wants the job of cleaning out an ox's stall. But the two available alternatives are even more unpleasant: an uncleaned stall or an empty stall. The former may kill the ox through disease. The latter indicates the lack of a tool of production.

A. Increasing Returns to Capital Investment

The second clause gets to the economic point: "much increase is by the strength of the ox." The Hebrew word translated here as "increase" is elsewhere translated as "fruit" or "fruits." The meaning is the same: the net output of the land.

Then I will command my blessing upon you in the sixth year, and it shall bring forth fruit for three years (Lev. 25:21).¹

Thou shalt truly tithe all the increase of thy seed, that the field bringeth forth year by year (Deut. 14:22).²

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 27.

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 34.

The man who owns an ox and land can combine these capital assets to produce a crop. Without an ox, the landowner is limited to whatever he and hired workers can plant by hand. The work is arduous and time-consuming. A man's physical strength is minimal compared to an ox's strength. So, the output of land plus human labor is low when compared to the output of land plus a trained ox's labor. It is a matter of strength, as this proverb says.

Farmland without an ox is not productive. This is because of the low output of human labor in agriculture, compared to an ox's labor. Land becomes far more productive agriculturally by the addition of an ox. Put in economic terminology, there is an increasing rate of return to both land and labor when the labor moves from human labor to ox labor. The ox makes the land more productive for the owner of the land. The land makes the ox more productive for the owner of the ox.

An owner was required to care for both the land and the ox. The land was not to be planted in year six (Lev. 25:1–6).³ Fallow land had time to be restored. The ox was to share a portion of this increased output with the ox. “Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn” (Deut. 25:4).⁴ Paul invoked this law to make the same point with respect to men. “For the scripture saith, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn. And, The labourer is worthy of his reward” (I Tim. 5:18;⁵ cf. I Cor. 9:8–9⁶).

Separated, ox and land are not highly productive for their owner. Together, as part of an integrated system of production, they are quite productive. This is another example of the division of labor in action. By combining two different forms of capital, a person can greatly increase his wealth.

B. Good News and Bad News

The good news is that by adding an ox to the production mix, the owner can increase his wealth. The word “increase” is the equivalent of wealth. The bad news is that the ox requires additional capital: a stall. This tool of production must be maintained. Someone must clean the stall. Either the owner does this, or else he hires someone to do this.

3. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 25.

4. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 62.

5. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: [2001] 2012), ch. 8.

6. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 11.

This is a cost of production.

The owner can defer this maintenance expense for a time. He can let the stall get worse and worse. But the end result will be the loss of his capital asset. The ox will get sick or die.

Of course, this same principle of maintenance applies to every capital good. Capital wears out. In a cursed world, though not in the pre-Fall uncursed world, this is the result of entropy: the tendency of everything to become random.⁷ Sharp blades get dull. Sharp minds get dull. Things wear out.

Land wears out, too. Agricultural land is depleted of minerals and vegetation. This is why farmers adopt counter-depletion measures: crop rotation, fertilizer, and fallow land for a season. In this sense, land is a capital good. There is pure land: bedrock support that does not wear out. Then there are topsoil, earthworms, and other living matter, which are consumed by agricultural production.

One of the nice things about the interrelationship between oxen and land is that the contents of stalls can then be spread over land to increase its productivity. This is more work to do, but the result of this work is increase.

All of this points to extra work for men. This is all part of the curse (Gen. 3:17–19).⁸

Conclusion

The lesson of scarcity is this: there are no free lunches. Output requires inputs. In the case of agricultural land, output requires input: land and work animals. Both land and work animals are capital assets. Capital requires additional investment in order to maintain it. This cost of production is required to maximize output.

When an asset's output is significantly increased by the addition of a complementary factor of production, the owner of the initial asset finds that it pays to buy or lease the complementary factor. But in making this decision, he should count the cost of maintaining the complementary factor. Only when the expected value of the expected increased output is greater than the expected value of the increased inputs should he hire or purchase the second factor of production.

7. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

8. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

BUYING FRIENDSHIP

The poor is hated even of his own neighbour: but the rich hath many friends (Prov. 14:20).

The translators underplayed the power of riches. The Hebrew word translated as “friends” is more accurately translated as “lovers.” This word is stronger than the other Hebrew word for “friend” and “friendly.” “A man that hath friends must shew himself friendly: and there is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother” (Prov. 18:24). The loving friend is more faithful than a brother. This is the meaning of friendship available to the rich person.

We teach our children that money cannot buy friendship. This proverb says the opposite. If we tell children that a friend loves us for ourselves, we must face the dual truth of this proverb. First, poverty produces hatred by neighbors who know a person. Second, wealth produces love. This hatred or love is specifically said to be the result of one’s economic condition.

A. The Use of Irony

Why should we imagine that parents in Solomon’s day taught their children any differently from the way parents teach their children today? Parents want to protect their children from false friends. From an early age, parents warn their children against trusting in friends who exhibit friendship for the sake of whatever the child possesses. Such friends are false friends. They are committed only to sharing the wealth of the possessor.

He who possesses great wealth usually has an entourage close by. Those who are poor do not have anyone close by. A popular song in the United States during the economic depression of the 1930s was Nobody Knows You When You’re Down and Out (1922). The song closely paralleled Proverbs 14:20.

Nobody knows you when you're down and out.
 In your pocket, not one penny,
 And your friends, you haven't any.
 And as soon as you get on your feet again,
 Everybody is your long-lost friend.
 It's mighty strange, without a doubt, but Nobody wants you when you're down and out.

In his empty pockets phase, the person had no friends. This proverb goes even further: "The poor is hated even of his own neighbour." This is actual animosity. I think this is literary irony, just as "lovers" is. He is hated in the same sense that a rich man is loved. The poor person feels rejected. His neighbors abandon him. They are not part of his entourage. He has no entourage. The person with a lot of money has an entourage.

Solomon was not unaware of this love-and-hate phenomenon. He described life as it has been down through the ages. Some people's commitment to others is based on what they expect to receive from this commitment. The rich man is expected to spend money on his friends. The poor man is expected to ask his friends for a loan. So, people are generally favorable to the rich people they associate with. This is a great ethical error, Jesus warned the Pharisees. He said to consider the poor when making out the invitation list for your feast.

When thou makest a dinner or a supper, call not thy friends, nor thy brethren, neither thy kinsmen, nor thy rich neighbours; lest they also bid thee again, and a recompence be made thee. But when thou makest a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind: And thou shalt be blessed; for they cannot recompense thee: for thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just (Luke 14:12–14).¹

So, the neighbor described by this proverb is not neighborly. The lover is unlovely. Both are motivated by what they expect to receive from the other person. They are motivated by economic self-interest.

1. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 34.

B. Winners and Losers

This proverb describes something familiar. People are motivated by economic self-interest. To the extent that this motivation is at the foundation of personal relationships, friendship becomes a matter of wealth. To gain such a friend requires that you gain wealth first. To keep such a friend requires that you retain your wealth and share it. Such friendship is fleeting.

Those who are committed to a personal relationship because of wealth are generally poorer than the recipient of their commitment. The likelihood that they will be named in the person's will is remote. So is his death. The likelihood that he will hand over a large portion of his wealth to friends is also remote. So, the hanger-on is seeking only spare change. He may receive trickle-down wealth, but nothing substantial. He is not productive. He sees his time as most profitably spent with a rich man for the trickle-down wealth and the token benefits it may provide. He establishes a relationship of dependance. He sees this as the highest return on his time.

A seller of goods or services is not equally dependent. He establishes a relationship based on mutually beneficial exchange. He sells something he produces. In all likelihood, he does not seek to establish a relationship of friendship with a wealthy buyer. He keeps the relationship professional, for his competitive advantage in the marketplace is based heavily on the reputation of excellence that his output possesses. Excellence rests on objective merit, irrespective of favoritism based on personal friendship. He seeks repeat business. He also seeks referrals if he is a good marketer. If the rich man recognizes that the seller supplies an inferior product, which is offset only by friendship, he may not be ready to recommend the seller to his associates, for they will think him deceived. No one wants to appear to be hampered by poor judgment, least of all a highly successful person.

This means that the rich man's lovers are losers. They probably know this. They correctly perceive themselves to be dependent on creating an illusion of unself-interested friendship. If they do not recognize this, then they are self-deceived as well as self-interested.

Furthermore, their goals are minimal. They do not seek a professional relationship with the rich man based on their objective productivity. They do not seek a stream of predictable income based on supplying something desired by the rich person because of the advantage it gives him. Instead, they seek handouts disguised as participation in joint celebrations. Basically, they are party people. Their personal horizons are limited to whatever wealth can be obtained at a party. This is legitimate as a career, but only if you are a professional party planner or performer. The difference here is the difference between a fee for services rendered and a handout for old times' sake.

Conclusion

Solomon was a very rich man. He was also powerful. He possessed the power of life and death, even to the point of executing his conniving half-brother (1 Kings 2). Such men attract hangers-on. If they are wise, they do not let such people into their inner circles. They do not become dependent on them. They treat them, at best, as party people: fun people to have around at unimportant functions. Being invited to unimportant functions is important to unimportant people. A wise man recognizes this. An unscrupulous rich man will take advantage of this moral defect of hangers-on. They become his prey.

DEALING WITH THE POOR

He that despiseth his neighbour sinneth: but he that hath mercy on the poor, happy is he (Prov. 14:21).

This proverb follows a related one: “The poor is hated even of his own neighbour: but the rich hath many friends.”¹ Here, Solomon focuses on the neighbor, who is contrasted with the merciful person.

In the previous proverb, the neighbor’s hatred is related to his victim’s poverty. The contrast is between the poor man’s hating neighbor and the rich man’s hanger-on. The difference is not based on comparative moral fiber. Both are morally weak and short-sighted. But the hanger-on is not sinning. The hating neighbor is.

A. Pressured to Give

The hating neighbor has no judicially objective claim against his neighbor. He has not been harmed in any way. The poor man’s plight did not come at the expense of his neighbor. Thus, there is no legitimate reason for the hatred. Then on what is it based? The previous proverb tells us: the person’s poverty. This proverb is related to the previous proverb. We can legitimately conclude that this is based on the proverb’s contrast: the merciful person who gives to the poor.

The poor man is in need of charity. This may be in the form of a charitable zero-interest loan (Deut. 15:1–6).² It may be in the form of an outright gift. The point is, his presence places his neighbor in a painful moral situation. Will the neighbor turn his back on the suffering man, just as the priest and Levite did to the robbed man lying in the road (Luke 10:31–32)?³ Or will he lend, asking nothing in return?

1. Chapter 44.

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 36.

3. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd

Jesus commanded:

Give to every man that asketh of thee; and of him that taketh away thy goods ask them not again. And as ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise. For if ye love them which love you, what thank have ye? for sinners also love those that love them. And if ye do good to them which do good to you, what thank have ye? for sinners also do even the same. And if ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye? for sinners also lend to sinners, to receive as much again. But love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again; and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be the children of the Highest: for he is kind unto the unthankful and to the evil. Be ye therefore merciful, as your Father also is merciful (Luke 6:30–36).⁴

The sinner reacts by blaming the victim. He despises the victim because of his own dilemma: to give or not to give? He sees the poor man as the source of guilt. It is easier to blame the poor person for his condition than to open one's wallet. It is easier to find an explanation of his poverty that is related to some moral weakness on his part. He is seen as deserving his poverty. He is therefore deserving of condemnation. Condemnation then becomes hatred. Such hatred is sinful, this proverb says.

B. Happy to Give

In contrast to the hate-filled person is the merciful person who gives to the poor. This proverb says that this person is happy. This is consistent with what Jesus taught. Indeed, it is the foundation of what Jesus taught: "It is more blessed to give than to receive" (Acts 20:35b).⁵

Why should this be true? People are self-centered. Modern economics ever since Adam Smith has rested, above all, on this assertion: "After the assumption of scarcity, individual self-interest is the most fruitful assumption undergirding economic theory and practice." Why should we conclude that giving makes people happy?

We can begin with grandparents' attitude toward their grandchildren. This is the most obvious example, in every culture, at all times. Then there is gift-giving between spouses. This is not done in the spirit of mutual exchange. So, within the context of the family, giving is

ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 21.

4. Ibid., ch. 10.

5. Gary North, Sacrifice and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Acts, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000], 2012), ch. 9:A:2.

more common than mutual exchange. It is when we move beyond the family that most people's motivation moves to self-interest.

This proverb says that giving to the poor makes the giver happy. This is the testimony down through the ages of those who have been exceptional givers. But their number has been limited. Their attitude is generally respected, but their example is not widely imitated.

Why should this positive psychological connection between giving to the poor and happiness exist? To answer this, consider God, in whose image man is made. God is the source of all good gifts. "Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning" (James 1:17).⁶ Peter concluded:

And above all things have fervent charity among yourselves: for charity shall cover the multitude of sins. Use hospitality one to another without grudging. As every man hath received the gift, even so minister the same one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God (I Peter 4:8–10).

Grace is best defined as an unmerited gift—unmerited by the recipient. God is the source of original grace. God has this advantage: He is not affected by scarcity. He did not have to pay for whatever He owns. He is the original owner. "For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills" (Ps. 50:10).⁷ So, when He gives something, He loses nothing. Jesus taught that this is also true of covenant-keepers. What they give up in history for the sake of Christ and His kingdom, they amass in eternity. Jesus said:

Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom. Sell that ye have, and give alms; provide yourselves bags which wax not old, a treasure in the heavens that faileth not, where no thief approacheth, neither moth corrupteth. For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also (Luke 12:32–34).⁸

Conclusion

The attitude we have toward the poor is important. If we despise them and blame them for their poverty in order to reduce the sense of

6. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five press, 2012), ch. 33.

7. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 10.

8. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 26.

obligation that we should have for them, then we sin. If we open our wallets to them when they are in trouble through no fault of their own, we gain happiness. This is not a matter of giving in order to receive back from the poor. But it surely is a matter of giving in order to gain great gifts from God: happiness in history and treasure in eternity.

EXPENSIVE TALK

In all labour there is profit: but the talk of the lips tendeth only to penury (Prov. 14:23).

Here is another proverb of comparisons. One result is beneficial. The other is not. We should choose which action to take in terms of the respective result.

The opening clause is a universal statement: "In all labour there is profit." Did Solomon include theft, arson, and other crimes? No. Then why did he make such a sweeping statement? To emphasize this fact: the superiority of labor over talk.

There are people who talk for a living: teachers, preachers, television news anchors, and other members of the chattering class. Some of them make a lot of money. Was Solomon really convinced that talk always leads to poverty? No. Then why did he make such a sweeping statement? To emphasize the superiority of labor over talk.

There are times when a biblical author makes an outrageous statement for effect. This communications technique is called rhetoric. For example, a lazy man really does not defend his laziness by referring to a lion in the streets. Yet Solomon used this example twice (Prov. 22:13;¹ 26:13). This is a comparable example of rhetoric.

A: "Action Speaks Louder Than Words"

This is a familiar slogan in American history. Americans like to think of themselves as doers more than talkers. They contrast action, which produces objective results, with talk, which wastes time by not producing any results. This attitude is grounded in the message of Proverbs 14:23. A related passage is James 1:22. "But be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves." The main idea in both passages is not to dismiss talk as worthless, for that would dismiss hearing as worthless. What is worthless is talk without action consistent with the talk. Americans have another saying: “You must walk the talk.” To act inconsistently with whatever you say you believe is hypocritical and self-destructive. To do nothing is equally hypocritical.

1. Chapter 68.

In this passage, “talk with the lips” means talk without action. A person talks in order to impress the listener with his own wisdom. But then the speaker does not take action. His words subsequently condemn him. In order for the talk to become meaningful, the speaker must take action—action that is consistent with what he said.

If a speaker is limited to talk, those around him are unwise to follow his advice. He is not “putting his money where his mouth is.” He does not really believe what he is saying, or if he does, then he suffers from mental paralysis. In either case, the listener should not follow his advice without verifying what he has heard. He should also not subordinate himself to this person.

This proverb says that talk without action produces poverty. Why should talk lead to poverty? Because action is what makes a profit. Doing nothing produces a loss. Why? Because of the curse of the ground. The land produces weeds and thorns (Gen. 3:17–19).² If left to itself, it reverts to wilderness. Wilderness is fit for beasts, not for men. Men are required by God to take dominion (Gen. 1:27–28).³ Put differently, taking no action leads to the triumph of entropy: nature’s constant movement toward disorder.

To work on projects that customers do not want to pay for produces a loss. Talk, when it leads to consumer-satisfying action, produces an increase. The deciding factor is ultimately a sanction. Someone with the power to provide a reward—a paying consumer—decides retroactively that the laborer’s effort was praiseworthy.

B. Wasted Time

Talk is cheap, an American proverb says. This proverb says that talk is expensive. It produces poverty. In contrast is labor, which takes effort but produces an increase. Effort is a cost, but this cost produces a profit: a net increase.

Solomon indicates here that talk without action appears to be cost-free, but it produces poverty. It is therefore expensive. Why? Because the talker has wasted precious time, which is an irreplaceable resource. He is making a point: he who seeks something for nothing will fall into poverty. In contrast, labor is costly, but it produces an increase. Time spent on labor is profitable. The worker seeks something of greater value from the time he invests in labor. The distinguishing feature is time.

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

3. Ibid., ch. 4.

This conclusion is not stated in this proverb. But it is implied by this proverb. What do talk and labor have in common? Time. Neither the talker nor the laborer can escape the expenditure of time. Both must surrender time back to its owner: God. God gives it, then reclaims it, moment by moment. So, God expects us not to waste our time. We possess it only as stewards.

Conclusion

Solomon uses overstatement to make a point: the investment of time and effort in labor produces superior results to the investment of time and talk without labor. He who says nothing and then works will gain a better reward than he who talks and then does not work.

Jesus used this structure of cause and effect in a parable.

But what think ye? A certain man had two sons; and he came to the first, and said, Son, go work to day in my vineyard. He answered and said, I will not: but afterward he repented, and went. And he came to the second, and said likewise. And he answered and said, I go, sir: and went not. Whether of them twain did the will of his father? They say unto him, The first. Jesus saith unto them, Verily I say unto you, That the publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you. For John came unto you in the way of righteousness, and ye believed him not: but the publicans and the harlots believed him: and ye, when ye had seen it, repented not afterward, that ye might believe him (Matt. 21:28–32).

Action speaks louder than words.

OPPRESSION AND MERCY

He that oppresseth the poor reproacheth his Maker: but he that honoureth him hath mercy on the poor (Prov. 14:31).

A. Oppression Is Theocentric

This proverb highlights the ethical aspect of several Mosaic laws dealing with the economic oppression of the poor. Ultimately, the Mosaic laws prohibiting oppression are theocentric. How you treat the poor reveals what you think of God. The oppressor is said to reproach God. The Hebrew word can also mean “defy.” But the contrast here is with honoring in the sense of upholding. So, the translators chose an English word that is an antonym of “honoring.” To reproach God is to act as though God is not the kind of God He says He is. The person rebukes God in the sense of dishonoring him.

The merciful person has an open hand. Legally, he does not have to show favor to the poor man. This is a matter of voluntary action. Mercy is optional, judicially speaking. The Hebrew word is often translated as “gracious.” “And he said, I will make all my goodness pass before thee, and I will proclaim the name of the LORD before thee; and will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and will shew mercy on whom I will shew mercy” (Ex. 33:19). Grace is an unearned or undeserved blessing from God. God is not obligated to show His grace. David called on God to lift him up. “Have mercy upon me, O LORD; consider my trouble which I suffer of them that hate me, thou that liftest me up from the gates of death” (Ps. 9:13). The imagery here is that of God’s bending down and lifting up. He stoops to give aid.

This is the sense of the Hebrew word in this proverb. Someone lifts up another person, who has fallen. He puts the person back on his feet. This decision is at the discretion of the one who shows mercy or grace.

In my commentary on Leviticus 25:17, “Ye shall not therefore oppress one another; but thou shalt fear thy God: for I am the LORD your God,” I made the point that this oppression involved the misuse of civil government. A political insider gains power over others through the monopoly of violence possessed by the civil government.¹ This same misuse of civil government applied in a law of Exodus, “Thou shalt neither vex a stranger, nor oppress him: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt” (Ex. 22:21).² The element of legalized coercion was involved.

This connection with the state is not self-evident in this proverb. The reader is assumed by Solomon to be aware of Mosaic laws relating to oppression. Whatever the source of the advantage possessed by the oppressor, he reproaches God by taking advantage of the person subordinate to him. This same element of subordination is implied by the Hebrew word translated as “mercy” in this proverb. The hierarchical relationship is not to be used to take advantage of the weaker party. To do this is to make a statement about God.

God is the supreme party in every relationship. He possesses complete power. If He wishes to impose negative sanctions on anyone, for any reason, He is legally able to do so. This was the main lesson that God taught Job (Job 38–41).³ Judicially, man cannot claim innocence before God. He deserves whatever God hands out to him. But God is said to be merciful in history. So, in imitating God, covenant-keepers are not to take unfair advantage of the poor. On the contrary, they are to show mercy in the sense of grace: an unearned gift. This is what God does for mankind. Thus, when those calling themselves by His name show mercy and refrain from oppression, they testify accurately to the nature of God in history. They honor God.

B. The Welfare State

Verses such as this one can be misused in the name of God. Promoters of coercion by the state in the name of social justice invoke Old Covenant passages that commend mercy. But their appeal to such passages is a cover for oppression. The heart of mercy is its voluntarism.

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 26.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 48.

3. Gary North, Predictability and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Job (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 6.

The fact that a person is not compelled by civil law to lift up another person is what constitutes an act of compassion as merciful. If the person in need of assistance has a legal claim on compassion, then the issue is obedience to the civil law rather than grace.

Coercion goes beyond the undermining of mercy. The state takes money from one group and transfers it to another group. This transforms politics into special-interest competition. Gaining a majority in a civil government allows wealth redistribution by force. This is the essence of judicial oppression. It is common for defenders of the welfare state to justify this because the official targets of state power possess greater wealth than the official recipients. But the issue of economic oppression has to do with the use of the state's monopoly of violence to extract wealth from a targeted group of voters who did not win elections.

Consider the example of Nazi Germany. State laws restricting Jews and businesses operated by Jews were passed in the late 1930s. The fact that Jews as a voting bloc possessed greater per capita wealth than the Nazis who ran the government did not justify the use of state power to place them in a subordinate position. This should be obvious to every defender of the welfare state. So should the real name of the Nazi Party: the National Socialist Democratic Workers Party. But the universal response of welfare state advocates is to criticize these oppressive laws because of their racist and religious official justification, not because a socialist government took money from a group whose members possessed greater per capita wealth than the average German voter. They ignore the fact that had the German government not been socialistic, such legislation would not have been legal. It is the old issue of whose ox gets gored. It is not the fact of Nazi Germany's economic oppression that bothers welfare state proponents. Rather, it is the religious targets of this economic oppression that gains the criticism. Had the Jews been Presbyterians, welfare statists would be quite content with the state-enforced redistribution of wealth.

Conclusion

Oppression is evil. This includes economic oppression by the state. Mercy is righteous. Both statements constitute an affirmation of voluntarism. The state is to be put on a tight leash, neither oppressing the poor nor oppressing the less poor. In order to allow men to act mercifully, the state is not supposed to extract wealth by force from members of one group and then transfer it to members of other groups, all in the name of mercy. State-enforced mercy is state-enforced compulsion. The state is to be an agency of justice, not an agency of plunder.

48

THE FEAR OF THE LORD

Better is little with the fear of the LORD than great treasure and trouble therewith (Prov. 15:16).

Proverbs is filled with comparisons: better this than that. The this is usually reduced economic means. Consider the next proverb. “Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox and hatred therewith” (v. 17).¹ Or these:

Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding. For the merchandise of it is better than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold (3:14).²

Better is a little with righteousness than great revenues without right (16:8).³

How much better is it to get wisdom than gold! and to get understanding rather to be chosen than silver! (16:16).⁴

Solomon understood the universality of men’s quest for wealth. This quest was as all-encompassing then as it is today, whenever your today happens to be. Jesus referred to this desire to lay up treasure on earth. “But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal: For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also” (Matt. 6:20–21).⁵

The contrast here is between two conditions: (1) little with the fear of God and (2) great treasure with vexation or turmoil. The economist

1. Chapter 49.

2. Chapter 9.

3. Chapter 51.

4. Chapter 53.

5. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 15.

never wants to deal with rival conditions with more than one criterion in each. He wants to compare more with less. He wants especially to compare prices, which are conveniently numerical. He wants condition A with condition B, "other things being equal." But this is not the procedure of Solomon. He made his point by comparing mixtures.

He is really comparing the fear of the Lord vs. great treasure, but he adds qualifiers to catch our attention: a lack of wealth vs. vexation. Given the universality of the quest for great treasure, readers down through the ages and across borders have lived in societies that fully understood the benefits of wealth. Wealth is widely regarded as bringing happiness rather than vexation. Wealth is higher on most people's operational scale of values than the fear of the Lord. They spend more time worrying about their lack of wealth than worrying about their lack of any fear of the Lord.

To catch the reader's attention, Solomon compartmentalizes great treasure and vexation. This is what the great religious leaders have taught down through the ages, but it is still not widely believed by their followers. "I'm different," they think. "I would be content with great wealth." The great religious leaders have not been great in terms of the number of people, including their disciples, who personally adopted the leaders' teachings on wealth. There have always been more official believers than begging monks, which is why monks can make a living by begging. If there were more monks than followers, the competition for alms would be very great indeed.

Great treasure brings vexation to most people. This is because wealth has a social function. It requires owners to allocate it. There are many requests for wealth, many alternative and mutually exclusive uses for wealth. With great wealth comes great responsibility. Close behind wealth comes a stream of people, each with a suggestion about what the owner should do with his money. Jesus said, "For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more" (Luke 12:48b).⁶

So, a wise person would rather possess little rather than accumulate trouble. But most people are not wise. Most people possess little and accumulate trouble. They think, "Better to have a lot plus trouble than little plus trouble." This is the economist's preferred decision. But Solomon does not offer this choice. He offers the fear of God accompanied by little vs. great treasure accompanied by vexation.

6. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

The assumption underlying this proverb is that the fear of the Lord will provide ways of dealing with poverty, whereas great treasure is impotent in the face of vexation. In other words, there is greater legitimate hope in overcoming poverty by fearing God than in overcoming vexation by accumulating wealth. This proverb does not teach that poverty is a likely outcome of the fear of the Lord. It does teach that vexation is a likely outcome of great treasure.

This proverb is about two rival quests: the fear of the Lord vs. treasure. We are told that the fear of the Lord plus poverty is better than treasure plus vexation. This comparison would elicit a universal “So what?” if this proverb’s presupposition were not that treasure leads to vexation.

This proverb does not assume that the fear of the Lord generally leads to poverty. The Mosaic law affirms the opposite (Deut. 28:1–14).⁷ It makes a comparison: the fear of the Lord plus poverty (possible) is better than great treasure plus vexation (probable). If this were not the case, this proverb would not persuade treasure-seeking men to mend their mammon-governed ways.

Conclusion

The central issue here is the fear of the Lord. This is the central theme of the Bible’s wisdom literature.

And unto man he said, Behold, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; and to depart from evil is understanding (Job 28:28).

The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom: a good understanding have all they that do his commandments: his praise endureth for ever (Ps. 111:10).

The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom: and the knowledge of the holy is understanding (Prov. 9:10).

The comparison here is between great wealth and the fear of the Lord, which was also Jesus’ primary comparison fear or love of God vs. fear or love of mammon. “No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon” (Matt.

7. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

6:24).⁸ Here is the proverb's argument. If the fear of the Lord accompanied by poverty is preferable to great wealth accompanied by vexation, how much more is the fear of the Lord with wealth preferable to wealth with vexation? It is not arguing that the fear of the Lord produces poverty. It is arguing that even if it did, poverty would be preferable to great wealth, for with great wealth comes vexation.

8. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 14.

LOVE IS NOT FOR SALE

Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox and hatred therewith (Prov. 15:17).

A. Love Before Wealth

Here we have another contrast where wealth is on the losing side: love vs. hatred. A dinner of herbs indicates poverty. There is no meat. There is no bread. There is basic nutrition, but calories are lacking. In contrast, there is an ox in a stall. There is capital. Presumably, there is productivity. The ox is working; his owner is benefitting. But his life is cursed by hatred.

Love, which is the superior possession, is accompanied by poverty. Love no more causes poverty than the fear of the Lord does, which is the superior possession in the previous proverb. This proverb rests on the possibility that love and poverty do go together on occasion.

The specific manifestation of poverty is worth considering. The dinner is sparse. Herbs are what people plant in a garden or collect in the woods. They provide flavor and some nutrition, but they cannot sustain life by themselves. If this diet lasts too long, the person dies of starvation. Eating only herbs is therefore a temporary condition. It reflects extreme poverty. This person is close to the bottom of the economic strata. Will he starve? No. David wrote: “I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread” (Ps. 37:25).¹ Times will get better very soon, but the transition will be to reduced poverty, not wealth.

In contrast is a person with an ox and a stall. He is not facing disaster. He is nowhere near the bottom of the economic strata. But in his house is hatred. The very poor man will soon escape his life-and-death situation. This man has no comparable assurance of deliverance from hatred. He may get richer. He may get poorer. In either case, his situation would remain less preferable than the poor man's, for the poor man has love.

1. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 6.

B. Love and Hatred

In neither case is the person's economic condition said to be either the cause or the effect of his emotional condition. Love and poverty can and do accompany each other. So do wealth and hatred. So desirable is love in comparison with hatred that this proverb insists that poverty with love is superior to wealth with hatred. This is not to say that poverty and hatred would not be worse. They would be worse, as surely as love and wealth would be better than love and poverty.

The focus of concern is not the economic condition of each of the two people, but rather their respective emotional conditions. This proverb implies that love and hatred are of greater concern than wealth and poverty. It implicitly recommends that we deal with first things first. The nearly universal concern of the poor man is to escape poverty. The almost equally universal concern of the rich man is to avoid poverty. Rich people and poor people focus their concern on their economic situation. This proverb indicates that this is a mistake. Of much greater concern are matters of the heart.

It is possible to work your way out of poverty. More important, it is possible to sleep your way into poverty. Several of Solomon's proverbs say this. If you can sleep your way into poverty, the presumption is that you can work your way out. Love and hatred are not so easily dealt with. Someone who works three extra hours a day and saves his wages will begin to climb out of poverty. There is no comparably predictable procedure for working your way out of hatred.

This proverb does not say whether the hatred is directed outward or inward. Hatred being what it is, it is usually a joint effort. Someone who responds with love to one who hates steadily undermines the hater's ability to maintain the hatred. Love disarms hatred. Jesus said: "Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you" (Matt. 5:43–44).² It takes a supremely self-conscious hatred to survive the weapon of love.

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 10.

People are more ready to pay for a program on how to get rich than they are for a program on how to achieve love. This may be because they are more interested in wealth than love. It could also be that they think they are less likely to achieve love than wealth. They go for what they believe is likely to have greater success.

People who do not have riches are so besieged with problems related to poverty, which are highly specific, that they cannot imagine that being delivered from these problems will not make them happy. But with greater wealth inescapably comes greater responsibility. “For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more” (Luke 12:48b).³ These responsibilities involve greater care and wisdom to deal with than the decision to buy food at the market or to pay to get a car repaired.

There is a familiar aphorism: “Money can’t buy happiness.” Most adults are aware of this, yet they find it difficult to internalize it and make it a principle of their own decision-making process. The suggestion that money can buy love is not taken seriously even by children. In 1964, the Beatles had a #1 song, “Can’t Buy Me Love.” Supposedly, it expressed a fundamental principle of the revolutionary generation of 1965–70—“the ’sixties.”

Can’t buy me love, love
Can’t buy me love.

I’ll buy you a diamond ring, my friend, if it makes you feel all right.
I’ll get you anything, my friend, if it makes you feel all right.
’Cause I don’t care too much for money; money can’t buy me love.

The irony here is that the person singing it had been able to accumulate so much money that buying the listener a diamond ring was nothing special. The Beatles went on to make more money—hundreds of millions of dollars, yen, pounds, deutschmarks—than any singing group in history.

Can’t buy me love, everybody tells me so.
Can’t buy me love, no, no, no, no.

The group broke up in 1970, abandoning a gigantic stream of income. They could no longer stand to work with each other. Each of the members had at least one divorce. Ringo Starr, the drummer, became an alcoholic. (Alcoholics Anonymous helped restore him to sobriety.) In 1980, John Lennon was shot in front of his New York City apartment by someone who a few hours before had him autograph a record album cover. He died a few hours later. Money did not buy them love—not for long, anyway.

3. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

As for their American fans, the 1970s became the “me decade,” marked by self-centeredness and the pursuit of wealth. The message of the 1964 lyrics did not stick.

Conclusion

The lure of wealth is great. So is the lure of love. Wealth is not evenly distributed. The ability to create it or receive it is limited to an elite. Love appears to be more randomly distributed, although proving this would be impossible. Wealth is expressed numerically. Love is not.

This proverb indicates that love is available to those who seek it. Otherwise, there would be no reason to put this in a long list of calls to ethical action. Men can pursue wealth. They can pursue love. But the ways to wealth are clearer than the ways to love.

MOVING FORWARD

The way of the slothful man is as an hedge of thorns: but the way of the righteous is made plain (Prov. 15:19).

A. Why Sloth Is an Ethical Issue

The contrast here is ethical: slothful vs. righteous. Initially, the passage seems to compare different patterns of behavior: sloth vs. righteousness. Sloth is a preference for doing as little as possible. Righteousness is a commitment to do that which is bounded by ethical standards. Why the contrast? It makes sense only if sloth is an ethical matter. A preference for doing as little as possible in any situation is identified here as a violation of God's ethical standards.

The Book of Proverbs is hostile to sloth. This proverb offers a unique assessment of sloth. It compares the slothful person's way of life with a hedge of thorns.

The way of the righteous person is different. The question is: In what way? The Hebrew word translated here as "plain" is misleading. It means to cast up or raise. "Sing unto God, sing praises to his name: extol him that rideth upon the heavens by his name JAH, and rejoice before him" (Ps. 68:4). "Exalt her, and she shall promote thee: she shall bring thee to honour, when thou dost embrace her" (Prov. 4:8). "Go through, go through the gates; prepare ye the way of the people; cast up, cast up the highways; gather out the stones; lift up a standard for the people" (Isa. 62:10). It is like a highway. It is raised higher than the drainage ditch at the side of the road. The righteous person's path in life is above the worst of the mud.

The indication here is that a slothful person's path is hedged by thorns. But why should this be? Does God direct the slothful person onto a pathway specially designed to thwart his efforts? Is life for a slothful person difficult because of an objective difference in his pathway? Or is his pathway filled with thorns subjectively? Is it resistant because he finds all effort distasteful?

B. Subjective Effort

The slothful man prefers ease to effort. He does not like to work. This proverb indicates that his pathway in life is a burden compared to that which the righteous person experiences.

A burden must be either carried or set down. The slothful person wants to lay his burden down. The righteous person wants to carry his own load. He does not want to be a burden to others.

The slothful person faces a life of thorns. It is not just that his path resists him. It is that it inflicts pain on him. It scratches him and scars him as he moves forward. It is easier not to move. It is easier to wait for someone else to clear the path.

The righteous person moves along a different pathway. It does not resist him. He can move faster than the slothful person can. He can move with less pain. He can move for a longer period before resting.

The slothful person sees the world as being against him. The righteous person does not. The slothful person sees the world around him as a threat. The righteous person does not. The slothful person's assessment of the challenge he faces persuades him that it is safer to stand pat. The righteous person's assessment of the challenge he faces persuades him to keep moving forward because he is better off on the highway than in the ditch. Besides, if he sits down on the highway, he may get run over.

This passage identifies the covenant-keeper's path as objectively easier than the covenant-breaker's. Jesus taught the same thing.

Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light (Matt. 11:28–30).

Yet He also taught this: "Enter ye in at the strait gate: for wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat: Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it" (Matt. 7:13–14).¹ The implication is that the more burdensome path is the wider path. Most people choose it. Therefore, either they hate righteousness so much that they prefer the extra burden of the wider path or else they do not perceive that the righteous life is less burdensome.

1. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 17.

So, the contrast in this proverb is between the slothful person's perception of the challenge vs. the righteous person's perception of the challenge. By "perception," I do not mean a preliminary assessment of what lies ahead. I mean the actual experience.

This indicates that the righteous person will not only achieve more in life than the slothful person, his psychological experience will be superior. His tasks will seem easier to him than the slothful person's tasks will seem to him.

We are unable scientifically to measure difficulty, as perceived by one person. This is a subjective category. There are no measurements of subjective perception. We are unable to say just how much more difficult life seems to the slothful person in comparison to the righteous person. Yet this proverb speaks authoritatively to this issue. It tells us that life for the slothful person seems more of a burden to him than it seems to a righteous person.

Conclusion

The slothful person is hampered by his own ethical defect. Life seems too painful for him to commit the kind of resources and effort that are necessary to overcome life's challenges. In contrast, the righteous person perceives his challenges as those appropriate to highway existence. His environment does not seem as a threat to him.

Both perceptions are self-reinforcing. The slothful person does not like to work. He pays for this ethical defect by experiencing more trouble and no permanent triumph. In contrast, the righteous person is rewarded by experiencing a sense of liberation. His environment does not overcome his inner strength, which reinforces his perception that moving forward does not require superhuman effort.

51

LAWFUL OWNERSHIP

Better is a little with righteousness than great revenues without right (Prov. 16:8).

A. Righteousness vs. Corruption

This is another comparison: righteousness and corruption. This contrast is heightened by a secondary contrast: more vs. less. This proverb does not call on the righteous person to pursue poverty rather than wealth. It calls on him to pursue righteousness rather than corruption.

The word translated “right” is the word mishpat. It usually relates to a judicial proceeding. “Thou shalt not wrest the judgment of thy poor in his cause” (Ex. 23:6). This law is aimed at members of a court. The sin of rendering false judgment can be the sin of judicial corruption. It can also be injustice, meaning the misuse of the civil law even though the case does not go to court.

This proverb makes its point by comparing a pair of combinations: poverty and righteousness vs. wealth and corruption. It does not imply that righteousness generally produces poverty. It does imply that one of corruption’s goals is wealth. It says that when righteousness is accompanied by poverty, it is preferable to corruption accompanied by wealth. The negative condition of poverty is preferable when the price of wealth is corruption.

This proverb does not say that the price of righteousness is poverty. One cannot purchase righteousness with poverty. This proverb is not an affirmation of a vow of poverty or a monastic life. On the other hand, one can sometimes purchase wealth with corruption. This proverb advises against this. It does so by comparing economic outcomes: wealth vs. poverty. Poverty is preferable.

This proverb makes ethical sense because the comparison is illustrated by rival economic conditions. Solomon knew that men rarely pursue poverty deliberately. Poverty is widely recognized as an undesirable condition. Later, we read: "Remove far from me vanity and lies: give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me: Lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the LORD? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain" (30:8–9).¹ Yet Solomon says that poverty is superior to riches when riches have been achieved through corruption.

B. A Question of Sanctions

Poverty is not a sanction for righteousness, for it is a negative sanction. Wealth is a sanction for corruption. It is a positive sanction, for it is the goal of corruption. Men do not normally pursue negative sanctions when they break the law. We do not think of corrupt judges placing themselves at risk for the sake of poverty.

This proverb raises a question. Why is a negative sanction preferable to a positive sanction? The deciding factor is corruption. This raises a second question. What is it about corruption that weighs the case against wealth? Wealth is so universally perceived as something worth sacrificing for, and poverty is so universally avoided, that the deciding factor associated with corruption must be weighty indeed.

This proverb does not say what this factor is. There are several possible answers. First, corruption is its own curse, in the same sense that righteousness is its own reward. Corruption, like righteousness, stands alone as a negative value. There are ethical systems built in terms of this presupposition regarding righteousness for its own sake, most notably Immanuel Kant's.² Second, corruption brings inescapable eternal negative sanctions that are more fearful than the positive sanction of great wealth. This is the New Testament's teaching. Jesus said: "For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" (Matt. 16:26).³ Third, corruption may bring negative sanctions in history when it is discovered. This risk is not worth the benefits of great wealth. Fourth, corruption brings guilt, and guilt must be confessed publicly (Lev. 5:17; 6:4; Num. 5:6–7).

1. Chapter 85.

2. Immanuel Kant, Lectures on Ethics (New York: Harper Torchbooks, [1780–81?] 1963).

3. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 35.

This proverb says that great wealth is not worth the price of being corrupt. It is not just that it is better not to gain the wealth that corruption can bring. It is actually better to be poor. Why, then, would a just and wise man become corrupt for the sake of wealth?

Conclusion

Injustice is to be avoided. No matter how much wealth a person can gain from injustice, it produces loss. The loss is so great that poverty is preferable.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES

A just weight and balance are the LORD'S: all the weights of the bag are his work (Prov. 16:11).

This proverb presents the theological foundation of a related pair of Mosaic laws.

Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, in meteyard, in weight, or in measure. Just balances, just weights, a just ephah, and a just hin, shall ye have: I am the LORD your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt (Lev. 19:35–36).¹

Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, a great and a small. Thou shalt not have in thine house divers measures, a great and a small. But thou shalt have a perfect and just weight, a perfect and just measure shalt thou have: that thy days may be lengthened in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee. For all that do such things, and all that do unrighteously, are an abomination unto the LORD thy God (Deut. 25:13–16).²

The law in Leviticus refers back to the exodus as the law's justification. This points to God's office as cosmic Judge. He executes judgment in history. He delivered the Israelites out of the injustice of slavery in Egypt. The law in Deuteronomy presents a positive sanction for obedience: long life in Canaan. This is the same promise that is attached to the commandment to honor parents (Ex. 20:12),³ which Paul identified as the first commandment with a promise (Eph. 6:2). Clearly,

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 19.

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 65.

3. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 25.

this was a fundamental law in Mosaic Israel.

This proverb speaks of just (mishpat) weights as belonging to God. This is peculiar language. Everything belongs to God (Ps. 50:10).⁴ In what way are just weights uniquely His—sufficiently unique to be designated here as His?

Weights and measures are representative of God's law, meaning His ethical standards.⁵ To use a false weight is to substitute a deceptive standard for the true one. This is analogous to calling God a deceiver. He establishes standards, and men are to honor these standards. The false weight deviates from a representative standard. It is used to benefit the person who uses the false weight, who is generally the seller of a good. It means treating different people differently judicially. This is a violation of God's rule of law.

Ye shall not respect persons in judgment; but ye shall hear the small as well as the great; ye shall not be afraid of the face of man; for the judgment is God's: and the cause that is too hard for you, bring it unto me, and I will hear it (Deut. 1:17).⁶

Thou shalt not wrest judgment; thou shalt not respect persons, neither take a gift: for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous (Deut. 16:19).⁷

The seller of goods is a specialist in these goods. He possesses specialized information, including information on how to cheat a buyer. Yet he is trusted by the buyer. So, when he uses false weights to deceive the buyer, he has adopted different weights. He buys from his professional suppliers with one set of weights, but he then sells to retail buyers with a different set. This is a violation of the rule of law.

Standard weights are mandatory for every society. These standards must be legally enforceable in a civil court. Of course, there can also be private courts that enforce specialized standards. But final jurisdiction in history requires an agency of law enforcement that possesses the lawful authority to impose negative sanctions on convicted violators. The civil government possesses this authority with respect to weights and measures. There is no other common government in society. Weights and measures are supposed to apply equally to everyone in-

4. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 10.

5. North, Boundaries and Dominion, op. cit.

6. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 4.

7. Ibid., ch. 40.

side the geographical borders of a civil government.

So important are predictable and legally enforceable weights and measures that this proverb identifies these as belonging to God. Therefore, any alteration of these standards by self-interested individuals constitutes theft. This is more than theft. This is theft of God's property.

God, as the creator and sovereign sustainer of the universe, possesses lawful ownership of the creation. He delegates to individuals, voluntary organizations, and lawfully covenanted associations the authority to impose negative sanctions for violating God's laws. The law of weights and measures is highly important in the overall civil legal order. This law decentralizes law enforcement to individuals whose profession requires weights and measures. In this sense, weights are a matter of civil law and therefore possess covenantal importance. Everyone is required to honor the law, but because the actual weights are owned by profit-seeking sellers, sellers become agents of the court. Any attempt on their part to tamper with these weights constitutes a flagrant violation of God's law. This is why a related proverb says, "Divers weights, and divers measures, both of them are alike abomination to the LORD" (20:10),⁸ which is a recapitulation of Deuteronomy 25:16. An abomination in the Mosaic law was a flagrant sin. It was often associated with idolatry (Deut. 13:13–15; 17:1–4; 18:10–12).

Conclusion

This proverb identifies weights and measures as belonging to God. Tampering with them is a serious offense: the theft of God's property. A false weight is an abomination in God's sight.

The law of weights and measures decentralizes law enforcement. It begins with self-government. Civil law serves as a back-up to this law. But God warns men that He is the ultimate enforcer of this law. He weighs all men in His balances, which are reliable.

8. Chapter 57.

VALUE AND PRICE

How much better is it to get wisdom than gold! and to get understanding rather to be chosen than silver! (Prov. 16:16).

A. Wisdom Over Gold

This is a famous proverb. It compares the value of wisdom to the value of gold. Understanding is similarly more valuable than silver.

In what way did Solomon contrast wisdom with silver? Gold is always worth more per ounce than silver. Does this proverb imply that wisdom is more valuable than understanding because gold is more valuable than silver? No. The Hebrew words for wisdom and understanding are found together at least 50 times in the same verses. The phrase, “wisdom and understanding,” is used as a kind of poetic device. We rarely find the phrase, “understanding and wisdom,” and the two most prominent cases where we do are in Daniel, in the mouths of Babylonians.

Solomon selects gold and silver as reference points in order to make a point: the supreme value of wisdom. Elsewhere, he selects rubies. “For wisdom is better than rubies; and all the things that may be desired are not to be compared to it” (8:11). Men throughout history have searched for gold and silver. They have sacrificed time and health to accumulate gold and silver. The metals’ desirability, coupled with their scarcity, gives them great value. The implication is that wisdom and understanding are even more scarce, but they are not equally desired. Solomon insists that they are even more desirable.

Why are they not highly desired? Because they are in short supply. It takes wisdom and understanding to perceive the high value of wisdom and understanding.

What is the essence of wisdom? Understanding the word of God and God’s interpretation of it. Solomon insists, “There is no wisdom nor understanding nor counsel against the LORD” (21:30). Wisdom means being like-minded with God. It means thinking God’s thoughts after Him. Paul wrote: “Casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ” (II Cor. 10:5). In short, wisdom is the ability to think theocentrically. God, not man, is the center of the universe. Men should think accordingly.

B. Unreliable Riches

Once accumulated, riches can be lost. Solomon says, “Labour not to be rich: cease from thine own wisdom. Wilt thou set thine eyes upon that which is not? for riches certainly make themselves wings; they fly away as an eagle toward heaven” (23:4–5).¹ Jesus said: “Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal” (Matt. 6:19).²

Wisdom can also flee, as Solomon discovered. In his old age, he worshipped the false gods of his wives (I Kings 11:4). But the implication of the Proverbs is that wisdom is more stable than wealth.

The Book of Proverbs from beginning to end is about the benefits of possessing wisdom. Everything else is second best, or even less. Yet the market for wisdom is limited. This is why Solomon compiled these proverbs. These proverbs are designed to impart wisdom. Part of that wisdom is the understanding that wisdom is so valuable. Most men do not recognize this, and fewer still follow what wisdom reveals, including Solomon. Solomon multiplied wives, which was prohibited to kings by the Mosaic law. “But he shall not multiply horses to himself, nor cause the people to return to Egypt, to the end that he should multiply horses: forasmuch as the LORD hath said unto you, Ye shall henceforth return no more that way. Neither shall he multiply wives to himself, that his heart turn not away: neither shall he greatly multiply to himself silver and gold” (Deut. 17:17).³ Solomon multiplied all of the above (I Kings 10:28). He kept his horses, wives, and gold. He lost his wisdom, which had brought him renown.

1. Chapter 72.

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 13.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 42:E.

C. Marketability

There is a ready market for gold and silver. Where such markets are prohibited by law, there are black markets for them. They are universally desired.

There is no comparable market for wisdom. There are markets for knowledge, since knowledge brings money, power, fame, and influence. Knowledge is not the same as wisdom. Wisdom is knowing and obeying God's law. Knowledge is information, and accurate information about the world's affairs can be marketed.

The wide market for gold and silver provides value. Value is imputed by acting individuals. They say, "this is valuable," and if they put their money where their mouths are, the price of the asset increases. In contrast, wisdom has no comparable market. Rulers through history have gone out of their way to exclude counselors who have possessed wisdom.

So, the market price of gold exceeds the price of wisdom. This fact is what gives this proverb its punch. Men can monitor the price of gold; they cannot monitor the price of wisdom.

There is a discrepancy between value and price. This discrepancy lies at the heart of economic theory. If value is subjective, as modern economists say that it is, then it cannot be measured. There is no objective measure of subjective value. There is more or less value, but not exactly this much more or less.⁴ In contrast, prices are objective. The price of harlotry is higher to the buyer than the price of the gospel is to the recipient. This does not mean that harlotry is more valuable than the gospel. The opposite is true.

Conclusion

There is a saying attributed to a skeptic, Oscar Wilde, that a cynic knows the price of everything and the value of nothing. This saying is an application of this proverb's insight. The value of wisdom is higher than the value of gold. There is an objective price of gold at this moment. There is no objective price of wisdom at this moment. Wisdom can be purchased, which is what the Book of Proverbs is all about. The price of wisdom is obeying God's word. It is too high a price for imperfect men to pay. But Christ paid it, and He makes wisdom available through grace to His people. "But he that is spiritual judgeth all things,

4. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State: A Treatise on Economic Principles, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), ch. 1:5:A.

yet he himself is judged of no man. For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him? But we have the mind of Christ" (I Cor. 2:15–16).⁵

5. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 2.

THE HIGH WALL OF WEALTH

The rich man's wealth is his strong city, and as an high wall in his own conceit (Prov. 18:11).

This proverb asserts that wealth is a rich man's strong city. A strong city in the ancient world was a walled city. A wall slowed down invaders. Wealth serves as the equivalent of an ancient high wall for the rich person. It resists invaders. The stated advantage here is the ability to insulate yourself from the calamities that poor people faced until the twentieth century in industrial societies, and which billions of poor people face in India and China in the early twenty-first.

The rich man's family is the next-to-the last to face starvation in a famine, after senior government officials. His family does not freeze in the winter. In summers, he and his family members can journey to a cooler location if he lives without air conditioning, which became universal in the middle-class West after 1960.

The rich man has a lot of money. Money is the most marketable commodity. At some price, everyone wants more of it. So, the rich man can buy protection from specialists who are in a position to provide it. This purchase of safety can take many forms. One is outright bribery of government officials. Another is "protection money" paid to a local criminal gang. Another is commercial insurance. A crisis that a rich man cannot escape through surrendering a portion of his wealth is usually either a society-wide crisis, such as a plague or a lost war, or else a disease that medical science has not yet eliminated.

Money offers protection because it is the most marketable commodity. People under almost all situations are willing to exchange goods and services for money. This means that whatever the circumstances, a rich man can find someone to sell him whatever he wants or needs. So, he need not plan carefully for the future. No matter what time brings, he will be able to buy whatever he wants. This puts him in a situation that few people in history have enjoyed. He is part of an elite.

If events around a rich man cannot penetrate his shield of money, then he is tempted to imagine that he needs no outside agency to protect him. He forgets where he got his wealth. Moses warned against this attitude of confidence, “And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth. But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:17–18).¹ Wealth has a covenantal purpose. It is not to make a man impervious to disaster, but rather to make him more aware of God’s covenant and its positive sanctions. He should also not forget its negative sanctions. “And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish” (Deut. 8:19).²

Men are to trust the God of the covenant. Men’s trust should be in the Giver, not the gift. “Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning” (James 1:17). Yet men who accumulate great wealth tend to attribute their success to their own abilities. This is their downfall. “And again I say unto you, It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God” (Matt. 19:24).³

This proverb adds, “as an high wall in his own conceit.” This is an odd translation. The Hebrew word is usually translated as “image” (Lev. 26:1; Num. 33:52) or “picture” (Prov. 25:11). It is translated as “imagery” once (Ezek. 8:11). Closer to the meaning here is this: “Their eyes stand out with fatness: they have more than heart could wish” (Ps. 73:7). The English word “wish” is misleading. The word “imagination” is much closer. The New American Standard Version translates the clause, “and like a high wall in his imagination.”

A high wall is his image of the meaning of his wealth. It surrounds him. It keeps troubles away.

This proverb makes this comparison of wealth and an image of safety. It does not say that the wealthy person is self-deluded. It does not have to. Moses taught this in Deuteronomy 8. High walls offer no protection against negative covenant sanctions. This was the message of the fall of Jericho, the first city inside Canaan to fall to the invading Israelites.

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 22.

2. Ibid., ch. 23.

3. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 38.

Conclusion

We are not to trust in anything but the God of the covenant. “Some trust in chariots, and some in horses: but we will remember the name of the LORD our God” (Ps. 20:7). Wealth is a weak reed to rest on in history. It is utterly useless to trust in wealth for eternity. “For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out” (I Tim. 6:7).⁴

Wealth seems to offer protection. Under most circumstances, it does. But this protection for a time in history is an illusion in eternity. To trust in wealth testifies to spiritual error. Yet it is an almost universal error among adults. In this sense, children are much wiser. They trust in their parents, not in their wealth. They trust in a highly personal world of people and commitments. It is adults who trust more in pieces of metal, or worse, plastic.

4. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 10.

RIVAL INHERITANCE PROGRAMS

House and riches are the inheritance of fathers and a prudent wife is from the LORD (Prov. 19:14).

This proverb identifies the proximate source of earthly blessings. A house and wealth come from one's father. God supplies a wise wife. The recipient gains all of these assets from others. Those men who are the heirs of great wealth should not attribute their success to themselves. Neither should a husband of a wise wife attribute this benefit to himself.

In some cases, a man may have accumulated houses and wealth through his own efforts. But a wise wife is uniquely a gift from God. He can take no credit for her. He may be tempted to attribute his economic success to his own efforts, but this is forthrightly a mistake when speaking of a wise wife.

Proverbs identifies a wise wife as an asset of greater value than jewels. "Who can find a virtuous woman? for her price is far above rubies" (31:10).¹ So, Solomon offers a contrast: objects that can be inherited can be attributed to men's efforts, either the original wealth builder or the heir, but a wise wife is a gift from God. This is the greater gift. An inheritance is desirable, but a wise wife is a greater blessing. This greater blessing is not the work of any man's hands or efforts. It is the work of God.

This proverb points to the legitimacy of inherited wealth. The recipient is not warned to beware of his inheritance. This implies that the builder of a fortune can legitimately pass the wealth to his sons. Intergenerational wealth is a good thing. "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (13:22).² Wealth gained through righteous behavior is not

1. Chapter 85.

2. Chapter 41.

stigmatized in the Bible. "The LORD shall command the blessing upon thee in thy storehouses, and in all that thou settest thine hand unto; and he shall bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee" (Deut. 28:8). "And the LORD shall make thee plenteous in goods, in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy ground, in the land which the LORD sware unto thy fathers to give thee" (Deut. 28:11).³

So important was inheritance in the Mosaic law that a father was not permitted to disinherit a son without judicial cause. The eldest son of a despised first wife received a double portion, based on his legal status as firstborn, irrespective of a man's greater favor shown to a later wife (Deut. 21:15–17).⁴

The biblical law of inheritance was rejected by European societies. They substituted primogeniture, where the eldest son inherited the landed estate. Then they added entail: a prohibition on the sale of the landed estate. Inheriting eldest sons got around this by indebting the estate. They spent the money, and the creditors inherited the land.

In the twentieth century, this system came under attack. Heavy inheritance taxes stripped European families of large landed estates. Taxes also stripped them of large amounts of money, even if they had no land. A growing hostility of intra-family inheritance became visible, decade by decade. The most famous early advocate of heavy inheritance taxes was Andrew Carnegie, the atheistic, Darwinian American industrialist, in his 1889 essay, "The Gospel of Wealth."

The state has substituted itself for the family. It provides old age pensions and old age medical services, just as sons have done for millennia. It also pays for the education of children, and it has made school attendance compulsory. To pay for all this, the state has drastically increased taxes. So, sons now pay the state rather than their own parents. The inheritance-disinheritance system has become impersonal and statist. This way, politicians get credit for helping people supposedly in need, bureaucrats receive high salaries for administering the programs, and ethical considerations relating to family inheritance are abandoned. Numerical criteria, such as age and income level, are substituted for ethics.

Rich families have evaded taxes in the United States by setting up public trusts and foundations. They have transferred control of the family inheritance to boards of trustees, where the donors and their heirs sit. They can exercise indirect control over the use of what had been family assets. These funds legally must be used for government-approved purposes. The families have maintained influence over the specifics of how the now tax-exempt assets would be used down through the generations. Often, the foundations have borne the donating family's names. A major goal of great families—fame—has thereby been preserved.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

4. Ibid., ch. 50.

Conclusion

We inherit things of real value. The family supplies houses and other physical assets. God the Father supplies a prudent wife. Both inheritances are governed by God's family covenant, which has laws. These laws are the basis of a good inheritance (Deut. 28:1–14).

There is a war against God's laws of inheritance. Unwise men choose imprudent wives. Then they squander their inheritances. The modern state also undermines the family inheritance by substituting tax-funded welfare programs. These programs undermine the ethical standards of the covenant. They substitute the political covenant for the family covenant.

LENDING TO GOD

He that hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the LORD; and that which he hath given will he pay him again (Prov. 19:17).

A. An Open Hand for the Poor

The Hebrew word here translated as “pity” elsewhere is translated as “mercy.” “He that despiseth his neighbour sinneth: but he that hath mercy on the poor, happy is he” (14:21).¹ “He that oppresseth the poor reproacheth his Maker: but he that honoureth him hath mercy on the poor” (14:31).² The idea is not that a person has silent emotional empathy—pity—for the poor but rather that he does something good for the poor.

He who gives something of value to the poor man, which would include his time, is said to lend to God. The meaning of the Hebrew word is the same as it is in the Mosaic law: “He shall lend to thee, and thou shalt not lend to him: he shall be the head, and thou shalt be the tail” (Deut. 28:44). But does this language apply to someone who lends to God? Does God become his tail, to be wagged at will?

The relationship of God to man is always that of lender and borrower. Jesus told His disciples to pray: “And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors” (Matt. 6:12).³ This reflects a fundamental biblical principle: grace precedes law. Man is always beholden to God. So, in what way can it be said that by showing mercy to a poor person, a man lends to God?

The second part of this proverb supplies the answer: “and that which he hath given will he pay him again.” The English text suffers from what English teachers call “indefinite pronoun reference.” Who is

1. Chapter 45.

2. Chapter 47.

3. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 12:C.

“he” who will pay “him” again? It is obvious conceptually, though not grammatically, that God is the person who will repay. Can the giver count on God? Yes. God is reliable. But this willingness on God’s part to repay does not place the merciful person in a net creditor position in relation to God. Rather, it marginally reduces the magnitude of the debt owed to God, which is enormous.

Every good gift comes from God. “Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning” (James 1:17).⁴ Moses said the same thing: “But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:18).⁵ The motivation to show mercy to the poor is no less a gift from God than any other mark of grace in someone’s life. The person who shows mercy to the poor is still in debt to God. But in terms of success in history, the message of this proverb is clear: that which is given up for mercy’s sake will return. “Cast thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days” (Eccl. 11:1).

B. Representation

Why is a gift to the poor a loan to God? The answer is in the biblical doctrine of representation. Jesus taught this regarding the final judgment.

Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: For I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me in: Naked, and ye clothed me: I was sick, and ye visited me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me. Then shall the righteous answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee an hungred, and fed thee? or thirsty, and gave thee drink? When saw we thee a stranger, and took thee in? or naked, and clothed thee? Or when saw we thee sick, or in prison, and came unto thee? And the King shall answer and say unto them, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me (Matt. 25:34–40).

The act of mercy to the poor is an act of repayment to God. The act of mercy to the poor man is not legally mandated. The repayment to God is legally mandated, but by God's court, not man's. Man does not possess sufficient wealth to repay God. God is not in need of repayment economically, but man is in need of a means of repayment judicially. God's honor must be upheld. Adam violated it. Justice, mercy, and humility are the coin of God's realm.

4. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 33.

5. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 22.

Will the LORD be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? shall I give my firstborn for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul? He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the LORD require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God (Micah 6:7–8)?

So, there is a great need for suitable representatives. The poor serve as God's representatives. What men do for the least of these, they do unto God.

C. Repayment in History

Jesus taught that whatever of marketable value is surrendered in history will be repaid in eternity.

Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal: For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also (Matt. 6:19–21).⁶

The Old Covenant had no concept of eternity as a warehouse of treasure to be stockpiled in history. The Old Testament's concept of causation was historical. The kingdom of God is a temporal kingdom, the Old Testament taught. The New Testament teaches that God's kingdom is both temporal and eternal.

Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom. Sell that ye have, and give alms; provide yourselves bags which wax not old, a treasure in the heavens that faileth not, where no thief approacheth, neither moth corrupteth. For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also (Luke 12:32–34).⁷

6. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 13.

7. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 26.

Being a temporal kingdom, there is repayment in history.

And Jesus said unto them, Verily I say unto you, That ye which have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. And every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my name's sake, shall receive an hundredfold, and shall inherit everlasting life (Matt. 19:28–29).⁸

So, covenantal causation is not limited to eternity. It operates in history, as a foretaste of eternity—a down payment or earnest payment. This inheritance is mediated by the Holy Spirit, Paul wrote. “In whom ye also trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation: in whom also after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of promise, Which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of his glory” (Eph. 1:13–14).

Conclusion

Showing mercy to the poor is both sacrificial and self-interested. It is an act of sacrifice on behalf of others—immediate loss—but also a self-interested act: future returns. The giver must have faith in God as a creditor who forgives. Otherwise, the act of mercy is perceived by the donor a one-way event. To imagine that it is a one-way event is to lack faith in God's system of covenantal causation. This reduces the amount of mercy shown, since it removes a positive sanction that is a great motivation.

We must not regard God as a debtor who faithfully repays. Such an outlook places man in control over God. After all, the borrower is servant to the lender (22:7).⁹ God's covenant is seen as a way to manipulate God. Yet the purpose of the sanctions is to reinforce men's faith in the reliability of God's covenant (Deut. 8:18).¹⁰ The incorrect view is analogous to a cartoon I saw in the early 1960s. Two rats are in a psychologist's rat-training cage, called a Skinner box in honor of experimental psychologist B. F. Skinner. In front of one rat is a horizontal lever and a vertical slot. The rat says to his associate, “I've got this psychologist completely trained. Every time I press this lever, he drops

8. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 39.

9. Chapter 67.

10. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 22.

food through the slot.”

The giver represents God to the recipient: the true source of undeserved benefits, i.e., the source of grace. The giver is to give thanks to God. Simultaneously, the recipient represents God to the giver. Man lends to God by way of the recipient. He also is to give thanks to God: for the wealth to give, for the opportunity to give, and for the motivation to give.

DIVERSE WEIGHTS

Divers weights, and divers measures, both of them are alike abomination to the LORD (Prov. 20:10).

This is a reconfirmation of Proverbs 11:1: “A false balance is abomination to the LORD: but a just weight is his delight.”¹ It also recapitulates Proverbs 16:11: “A just weight and balance are the LORD’S: all the weights of the bag are his work.”² These are all brief summaries of the law: “Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, in meteyard, in weight, or in measure. Just balances, just weights, a just ephah, and a just hin, shall ye have: I am the LORD your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt” (Lev. 19:35–36).³ The link between the honest weights and justice is made explicit in this text.

The nature of the prohibition is clarified here: deception. There are more than one standard being used in exchanges. Presumably, this applies to the sellers of goods. They possess the technical tools of weighing and measuring. When they buy, they use one set. When they sell, they use another set. They play upon the ignorance of buyers and sellers. But it is more likely that buyers are the primary victims. In a division-of-labor society, there is a chain of sellers, from manufacturer to the final retailer. Sellers are likely to possess the weighing and measuring devices of their trade. A wholesaler is less likely to use diverse weights, because he knows that the buyer is a specialist in his particular market niche in the chain of distribution. He will have the same measuring devices. The likelihood of a successful deception is low. The more transactions take place, the more likely there is an opportunity for the deception to be revealed.

1. Chapter 29.

2. Chapter 52.

3. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 19.

The retail seller is therefore the most likely culprit. The consumer relies on the seller to use honest scales. He is more likely to be the first victim than a wholesaler further down in the chain of transactions.

The term is used for truly heinous infractions of the Mosaic law. Some were sexual. They threatened the land. "Ye shall therefore keep my statutes and my judgments, and shall not commit any of these abominations; neither any of your own nation, nor any stranger that sojourneth among you" (Lev. 18:26). Others were related to witchcraft. These were crimes for which God drove the Canaanites out of the land. "For all that do these things are an abomination unto the LORD: and because of these abominations the LORD thy God doth drive them out from before thee" (Deut. 18:12). Others were theological. "The graven images of their gods shall ye burn with fire: thou shalt not desire the silver or gold that is on them, nor take it unto thee, lest thou be snared therein: for it is an abomination to the LORD thy God" (Deut. 7:25). "Cursed be the man that maketh any graven or molten image, an abomination unto the LORD, the work of the hands of the craftsman, and putteth it in a secret place. And all the people shall answer and say, Amen" (Deut. 27:15). In short, these were the most serious crimes in Mosaic Israel.

This proverb identifies diverse weights as an abomination. This was also true of Proverbs 11:1. What is the nature of the infraction that justified such a condemnation? There is no other business practice that is so identified.

Conclusion

The use of deceptive scales is a form of theft. It is a continuing form of theft. The false weights are not used only one time. This crime reveals a mentality hostile to justice. God abhors it.

The judicial responsibility associated with every sin is in part related to the representation of God made by the sin in question. False measures seem disproportionately condemned. We should attempt to understand the reason for this condemnation. The use of diverse measures representatively attributes to God the character of an unjust ruler. Such a ruler refuses to honor the rule of law. "One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you" (Ex. 12:49).⁴ God is pictured as pretending to honor the principle, just as the businessman pretends to have one set of weights as both buyer and seller. God is therefore represented as a deceiver in His capacity as a judge. This is a false witness. We are reminded that God's justice is at the heart of the covenant.

4. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985),

THE HIGH PRICE OF SLUMBER

Love not sleep, lest thou come to poverty; open thine eyes, and thou shalt be satisfied with bread (Prov. 20:13).

This is another proverb that identifies an unwillingness to work with poverty. A person who prefers sleep to work had better prefer poverty to wealth. In two other proverbs—actually one, which is then repeated—laziness is described as folded hands. “Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep” (Prov. 6:10; cf. 24:33¹). From excessive slumber to poverty: this is causation. A demonstrated preference for sleep is sufficient to produce poverty.

This cause-and-effect relationship is the result of God’s curse of the earth (Gen. 3:17–19).² People must labor in order to get the earth to produce the goods they want in the quantities they want. People must become productive. This means that their output should be valued more highly than their inputs. The crucial input, for humanity and for most individuals, is labor. Without labor, the land’s output is insufficient to provide people with the environment they want.

We say that a person sees an opportunity. Rarely does anyone see an opportunity, other than a coin in a gutter. He imagines an opportunity. He perceives an opportunity. But we say that he sees an opportunity. This is poetic language. This proverb uses poetic language.

The second clause says, “open thine eyes, and thou shalt be satisfied with bread.” Opened eyes are contrasted with closed eyes. Solomon is using sleep as a poetic identification of laziness. So, open eyes are the poetic identification of work. Literally, a person with open eyes who is watching a television screen is not productive. He might as well be sleeping.

1. Chapter 75.

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

Causation in history is not from mere open eyes to bread, which is the poetic symbol of abundance. It is from work to bread. So, the terminology is poetic, not literal. A person could have his eyes closed and be imagining the details of some new invention. That could be very productive. Sleep is different. It is a mental escape from coherent causation. Dreams are not limited by the normal processes of nature.

Benjamin Franklin in a letter made the comment, “time is money.” He meant this: with time, you can make money. Waste time, and you will not make money.

He who is lazy is not merely a time-waster. He is a wealth-waster. He throws away a crucial source of wealth: time. The result of not gaining wealth is poverty. This proverb is clear about economic cause and effect.

“Open thine eyes, and thou shalt be satisfied with bread.” To open one’s eyes is to wake up. Of course, waking up is not sufficient. Getting up is also important. So is getting busy.

To be satisfied with bread means to be filled with food, and the text can be translated this way. The person who is an active worker is unlikely to go hungry. The person who is lazy, unless he inherited wealth, is likely to be hungry.

Conclusion

This passage reaffirms a continuing theme in Proverbs. To gain poverty, all it takes is to do nothing. The manifestation of doing nothing is sleep. The sleeping person is not in touch with reality and its limitations. He does not change the world around him. The curse of the ground (Gen. 3:17–19) is not overcome by his active labor.

There is economic cause and effect in history. There is a predictable relationship between work and prosperity, and also between laziness and poverty. This proverb does not affirm the labor theory of value. It affirms the labor theory of opportunity. He who slumbers will miss out. He will not be able to make good use of the opportunities that are out there, ready to be implemented.

DECEPTIVE BARGAINING

It is naught, it is naught, saith the buyer: but when he is gone his way, then he boasteth (Prov. 20:14).

The buyer is described as saying two different things about the same transaction. It is clear from this proverb that what he tells the seller is one thing. What he tells his associates is another.

In the first case, he is in a competitive situation. He is trying to avoid paying what the seller has asked for his good. The buyer wants to pay less. Free market economics ever since Adam Smith has rested on the axiom that people prefer to pay less than more, unless charity is involved. What the buyer says to the seller here is consistent with what free market economics teaches about pricing.

In the second case, he is the proud owner of the item he was seeking to purchase. Part of his pride stems from the low price he paid to purchase it. He wants to impress others with his skill as a bargainer. So, the item he told the seller was worth nothing, he now tells others was a tremendous bargain.

This proverb does not recommend this kind of sharp bargaining. It merely describes what was common in Solomon's day, and what is still common in my day.

A. Negotiating the Price

Buyers (sellers of money) want to buy low. They do not want to pay a seller more than the seller is willing to accept. The description here indicates that the market was open to bargaining. Sellers asked more than they expected to receive. Buyers offered less than they expected to pay.

"It is naught." The prospective seller knows that the prospective buyer does not really believe this. The phrase is merely rhetoric—a code phrase for “offer me a lower price.” No one pays good money for something he believes is worth nothing. The fact that he is willing to spend time negotiating indicates that he thinks the item is worth something.

Why should the prospective buyer believe that the prospective seller is willing to lower the price? Because the marketplace is commonly marked by sellers who trade on the ignorance of buyers. Buyers do not know for sure what the seller is willing to accept. Sellers do not know what a particular buyer will pay. So, the two compete because of the existence of a zone of ignorance.

When someone walks into a large retail store that has priced all items with bar codes connected to a computer system, he does not bother to negotiate with a clerk. The clerk has no authority or ability to change the price. The price has been set by a third party who does not meet with buyers. The buyer pays and leaves. Pricing is established in terms of volume. The store makes a low profit margin per sale. Its profit comes from large volume: high turnover per unit of time. Large volume requires rapid individual sales. If the buyer wants a lower price, he must go to another store.

The zone of ignorance between buyer and seller is nonexistent in a store that sells with computerized bar codes. The buyer knows exactly what the seller is willing to take for the item. The seller is not concerned with what the individual buyer is willing to pay. Profit comes from high-volume sales, not from successful negotiation with each seller. The seller saves time by refusing to negotiate on price. So does the buyer.

If a buyer wants a lower price, he must spend time shopping. The seller competes against other sellers. The buyer competes against other buyers. In a market in which knowledge is widely distributed and cheap to buy, sellers do not compete against buyers. Such negotiation takes place only where there are zones of ignorance about alternatives. The broader the information base about a specific product, the less relevant is information about what a particular buyer or seller will accept as a transaction price.

The residential real estate market has zones of ignorance because each home is different. Sellers announce prices higher than they are willing to accept. Buyers offer lower prices than they are willing to pay. Negotiation is not face to face. It is done through intermediaries: real estate agents. But any home buyer who says “It is naught” in front of a seller is making a big mistake. The seller’s wife will resent such an as-essment. The wise approach is to say, “This is lovely. It is too bad we just can’t afford it.” But in most cases, the agent who shows the home asks the seller to be absent at the time of the walk-through. Bargaining is much more impersonal. It is done with a signed contract and earnest money.¹

B. More Truth, More Sales

If a seller has a reputation for hard bargaining, well-informed buyers will either bargain sharply or go elsewhere to buy, because they do not think their bargaining skills are superior to the seller’s skills.

Sellers who do not stick to their initial prices invite sharp-bargaining buyers. They also lose time negotiating. The time cost per sale increases.

Modern capitalism is generally price competitive. It seeks to broaden the market by lowering prices. A seller seeks to increase his product’s market share by lowering prices and attracting buyers who had been priced out of the market.

There are niche markets that are not price competitive. These are usually markets for the rich or the poor. The seller who sells a unique service to rich people, like the junk dealer who sells one-of-a-kind used goods to poor people, does not price their goods to sell in large numbers. So, both men trade on buyers’ ignorance of alternatives. The vast majority of buyers do not shop regularly at junk stores or boutiques for custom-made goods.

Mass production encourages more truth. Buyers announce their best price and stick to it unless they are losing a lot of money. If they lose money, they change their pricing structure in one shot by entering new prices in the bar code computer.

Mass production encourages high-volume sales. By lowering prices, highly competitive sellers meet the market. They target a specific kind of buyer and price their goods accordingly. They try to figure out what a representative though hypothetical buyer will pay. This hypothetical buyer represents many buyers who will make a purchase. The seller is highly concerned about what this hypothetical buyer will pay. Once he decides, individual buyers matter only as members of a statistically relevant group.

1. Earnest money is money paid by the potential buyer in advance. It is forfeited if the seller agrees to the buyer’s contract, and the buyer then refuses to complete the transaction. It is also called “good faith” money.

Conclusion

This proverb applies to a pre-capitalistic society or to niche markets with one-of-a-kind products for sale. There is negotiation between buyer and seller because of zones of ignorance. Neither party knows what price the other party is willing to accept. Because of ignorance, buyer competes against seller. The less the ignorance, the more that buyers compete against buyers, and sellers compete against sellers.

60

DEMAND COLLATERAL FROM FOOLS

Take his garment that is surety for a stranger: and take a pledge of him for a strange woman (Prov. 20:16).

This proverb appears again in Proverbs 27:13. This indicates that Solomon took its message seriously.

A. Avoid Co-Signing

The old English word “surety” means “co-signer.” A co-signer pledges that if a debtor defaults on a loan, he will pay off the debt. He places his own assets on the line. Otherwise, the lender will not lend to the debtor. The lender wants someone who has a high credit rating to act as guarantor for the loan. The co-signer owns something worth accepting if the loan goes bad.

The Proverbs are clear: it is unwise to become a co-signer.

My son, if thou be surety for thy friend, if thou hast stricken thy hand with a stranger, Thou art snared with the words of thy mouth, thou art taken with the words of thy mouth. Do this now, my son, deliver thyself, when thou art come into the hand of thy friend; go, humble thyself, and make sure thy friend. Give not sleep to thine eyes, nor slumber to thine eyelids. Deliver thyself as a roe from the hand of the hunter, and as a bird from the hand of the fowler (6:1–5).¹

He that is surety for a stranger [zoor] shall smart for it: and he that hateth suretiship is sure (11:15).

A man void of understanding striketh hands, and becometh surety in the presence of his friend (17:18).

Be not thou one of them that strike hands, or of them that are sureties for debts (22:26).

1. Chapter 11.

This proverb refers to taking a garment. This refers back to the Mosaic law.

If thou at all take thy neighbour's raiment to pledge, thou shalt deliver it unto him by that the sun goeth down: For that is his covering only, it is his raiment for his skin: wherein shall he sleep? and it shall come to pass, when he crieth unto me, that I will hear; for I am gracious (Ex. 22:26–27).

The garment had to be returned in the evening. Thus, it was not useful to the lender directly. But it was very useful indirectly. It kept the borrower from indebting himself beyond the value of his assets: one garment, one loan. The lender made sure by collecting it during the day that the borrower was not using it to collateralize multiple loans.²

B. Foolish Debtors

This proverb rests on this assumption: a person who co-signs for a person outside the covenant is unwise. The word translated here as “stranger” is zoor. This word connotes perversion and rebellion. It is neither geyr nor nokree, which referred to foreigners residing inside Israel. It is something sinister.

And Nadab and Abihu died, when they offered strange fire before the LORD (Num. 26:61).

They provoked him to jealousy with strange gods, with abominations provoked they him to anger (Deut. 32:16).

It is always unwise to become a co-signer. It is doubly unwise when the debtor is zoor. So, this proverb instructs the listener to collect the garment from the co-signer. It assumes that the stranger will default. Thus, be sure that the co-signer possesses something of value.

The same applies to the strange woman. Here, the Hebrew word is nokree. It does not imply perversity, but it does imply foreign legal status. This is a foreign resident inside the land who has not covenanted with God, unlike a geyr. Proverbs warns against associating closely with such a woman. “To keep thee from the evil woman, from the flattery of the tongue of a strange woman” (6:24). The co-signer not only associates with such a woman, he goes into debt on her behalf. This is a person devoid of good judgment. Take a pledge from such a person. You may need to foreclose.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 49:J.

Conclusion

It is not mandatory that a creditor demand collateral from a brother in the faith. Moses warned, “If thou at all take thy neighbour’s raiment to pledge. . . .” The key word is if. In contrast, this proverb says that a wise lender must take collateral from someone who co-signs for a covenant-breaker. This person is devoid of good judgment. If it is unwise to become a co-signer for a friend (6:1–5), how much more unwise is it to become a co-signer for a rebel?

61

EASY COME, EASY GO

An inheritance may be gotten hastily at the beginning; but the end thereof shall not be blessed (Prov. 20:21).

A. Covenantal Inheritance

The concept of inheritance was central to Hebrew culture. Inheritance was part of the national covenant. The Book of Deuteronomy is structured in terms of this concept.¹ Inheritance was viewed as part of an intergenerational program of dominion. Each generation was required by God to build up capital to pass on. “A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children’s children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just” (13:22).²

The inheritance was more covenantal-ethical than economic.

And these words, which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart: And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up (Deut. 6:6–7).³

The foundation of a sustained inheritance was moral-judicial.

And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God (Deut. 8:19–20).⁴

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012).

2. Chapter 41.

3. Ibid., ch. 15.

4. Ibid., ch. 23.

B. Early Inheritance

Jesus' parable of the prodigal son rests on this proverb. The son asks for his inheritance early. His father gives it to him. He then goes to a far country, becoming a stranger in a strange land. He squanders his inheritance in riotous living. He is left with nothing (Luke 15:11–16).⁵

The message of this proverb is that an economic inheritance is not autonomous. It must be sustained by personal adherence to the covenantal legal order by which it was created. The heir must govern his life by the same moral order that governed his father's life. The inheritance is more comprehensive than mere wealth. Wealth is not autonomous. This was Moses' warning.

And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth. But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day (Deut. 8:17–18).⁶

The heir is unwise to seek an early inheritance. It comes in a lump sum. The heir does not understand the process of the slow, steady accumulation of wealth. He does not understand that the economic surplus over time, which made possible his inheritance, was an outcome of covenant-keeping entrepreneurship. The heir does not understand how rapidly an inheritance can be consumed. The hasty inheritance can be squandered hastily.

C. Covenantal Sanctions

The sanctions were an integral part of the Mosaic covenant. The blessings of the covenant are listed in Deuteronomy 28:1–14.⁷ The cursings are listed in verses 15–68. These are corporate sanctions.

In this proverb, the absence of positive sanctions is a mark of God's negative response to an inheritance hastily received. These are personal sanctions. They apply to individual heirs. The person who inherits hastily, meaning without personal experience in administering wealth, should not expect to retain this wealth.

5. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 37.

6. North, Inheritance and Dominion, chaps. 21, 22.

7. Ibid., ch. 69.

This proverb is a warning to heirs. It is also a warning to parents. Parents have an obligation to train their prospective heirs in the basics of the covenantal administration of capital. For a child to inherit great wealth without prior training in capital management is a curse. It does not appear to be a curse at the time of the inheritance, but this will become obvious over time. The prodigal son learned this lesson firsthand. "And when he came to himself, he said, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger!" (Luke 15:17). By then, his inheritance had been transferred to the covenant-breakers who sold him all those good times.

The sanctions serve as a warning. God's blessings are not random. They are part of a covenantal legal order. We are to assess events as either blessings or cursings in terms of the content of God's Bible-revealed law. This is what the prodigal son did as he slept with the pigs. He had time to repent and then to return to his father's house. The external reality of his condition could not be denied. He had wound up exactly as this proverb says.

Conclusion

Inheritance is covenantal. It is part of the covenantal order established by God. Those who understand the covenant are more likely to recognize the threat of an early inheritance than someone who has not understood it. This proverb is a pithy summary of Deuteronomy 8:17–20.

PAY ATTENTION TO DETAILS

The thoughts of the diligent tend only to plenteousness; but of every one that is hasty only to want (Prov. 21:5).

A. Diligence as the Model

The diligent person serves as a morally correct model for others. The Book of Proverbs returns repeatedly to this theme.

This proverb can also be translated, “The thoughts of the diligent tend surely to plenteousness.” This is closer to the meaning of the text than any suggestion that a diligent person’s thoughts are focused solely on plenteousness or profitability. This proverb is saying that there is a correlation between a diligent person’s care in thinking through a plan of action and the outcome of this action, which is plenteousness.

Is this correlation 100%? The Hebrew text indicates that it is. The translators added “tend.” But did Solomon believe that diligent people’s plans produce plenteousness all the time? Elsewhere, he seems to. “The hand of the diligent shall bear rule: but the slothful shall be under tribute” (12:24).¹ Yet in the Bible, evil-doers are said to rule over the righteous. Psalm 73 is a good example.

But as for me, my feet were almost gone; my steps had well nigh slipped. For I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked. For there are no bands in their death: but their strength is firm. They are not in trouble as other men; neither are they plagued like other men. Therefore pride compasseth them about as a chain; violence covereth them as a garment. (Ps. 73:2–6).²

This is not a permanent condition, the Psalmist said. “Surely thou didst set them in slippery places: thou castedst them down into destruction. How are they brought into desolation, as in a moment! they are utterly consumed with terrors” (Ps. 73:18–19). But, for a time, the unrighteous do prosper. So, the translators added “tend” to the verse, which reflects the overall message of the Bible. Still, Solomon wrote more emphatically than this. He sought to persuade his readers that diligent attention to one’s plans produces personal success in history.

1. Chapter 37.

2. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 17.

This is a case where an author’s rhetoric conveys what both he and readers know is not true. Diligent plans do not surely produce success in history for diligent individuals. The prophets were diligent, yet they suffered at the hands of covenant-breakers. Jesus told the disciples, “Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad: for great is your reward in heaven: for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you” (Matt. 5:11–12). Diligence produces positive sanctions, but not always in history.

B. Haste Makes Waste

In contrast to the diligent planner is the hasty individual. “Every one that is hasty only to want.” Again, we find that hasty people sometimes do prosper. But the connection between hasty decisions and poverty does exist. Lot was hasty in his decision to choose Sodom as his dwelling place (Gen. 13:10–11). This eventually cost him his capital and his family (Gen. 19).

Diligence requires attention to detail. Haste involves great confidence that things will work out well despite a lack of attention to details. “Come ye, say they, I will fetch wine, and we will fill ourselves with strong drink; and to morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant” (Isa. 56:12).

The hasty person believes that the world is based on luck. He does not delay taking action until he can verify the truth of what has been placed before him. He assumes that he has been blessed by impersonal fate or personal luck. This is thought to negate the risks of decision-making based on insufficient facts.

The Bible teaches that there is no such thing as luck. There is also no such thing as impersonal fate. The Bible teaches that God providentially sustains the universe and works out His decree for history.

Drop down, ye heavens, from above, and let the skies pour down righteousness: let the earth open, and let them bring forth salvation, and let righteousness spring up together; I the LORD have created it.

Woe unto him that striveth with his Maker! Let the potsherd strive with the potsherds of the earth. Shall the clay say to him that fashioneth it, What makest thou? or thy work, He hath no hands?" (Isa. 45:8–9).

Proverbs speaks of wisdom as personified. "When he gave to the sea his decree, that the waters should not pass his commandment: when he appointed the foundations of the earth: Then I was by him, as one brought up with him: and I was daily his delight, rejoicing always before him" (8:29–30).

Careful planning, including diligent prayer, is basic to success in life. The hasty person does not believe this. He does not see the requirement to prepare oneself for years by studying God's law (Ps. 119). He does not think that years of attention to one's occupation are necessary for mastery. He thinks that enthusiastic commitment on short notice will overcome all resistance.

The hasty person thinks, "This is the opportunity of a lifetime. I must not allow it to get away." Yet a person's lifetime is in God's hand. God can bring other major opportunities. The question is: "Is this opportunity consistent with my calling—the most important thing I can do in which I would be most difficult to replace?" God called Moses to become His spokesman before Pharaoh and to lead Israel out of Egypt. This was surely more important than working as a shepherd for another 40 years. It was the opportunity of a lifetime. But it came after 40 years of herding sheep. With Aaron at his side, Moses became an overnight sensation as far as Pharaoh and Israel were concerned. But he had served time faithfully at a small task in preparation for this new calling.

Conclusion

Diligence is superior to haste as a way of life. Careful attention to detail is a reliable course of action. Haste is not.

The requirement of diligence points to the availability of sufficient time to complete our life's tasks before God. God is not in a hurry. His people should therefore not be in a hurry.

NOTHING FOR SOMETHING

The getting of treasures by a lying tongue is a vanity tossed to and fro of them that seek death (Prov. 21:6).

A. The Misuse of Deception

This proverb says that it is possible to gain treasure through deliberate deception. It is a form of vanity—chasing after emptiness. Solomon already has warned: “Wealth gotten by vanity shall be diminished: but he that gathereth by labour shall increase” (13:11).¹ In this passage, Solomon escalates the warning. Those who pursue wealth in this way are seeking death. To seek death is suicidal. We have already been informed, regarding wisdom, “But he that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul: all they that hate me love death” (8:36). Pursuing treasure through deception requires that the pursuer hate wisdom.

The temptation of great wealth is one of the most powerful temptations in life. The question arises: Why? What is it about great wealth that lures people into death? In a very poor society, such wealth might mean the difference between life and death in a crisis, but in modern society, people rarely die from poverty. Great wealth does not add years compared to middle-class wealth. It allows people to live in special ways, yet even here, most people cannot say exactly what these ways are.

In terms of eating, sleeping, learning, and being entertained, the middle-class person has most of the advantages that a wealthy man has. There are middle-class men who would not want great wealth if it meant that their wives would drag them to the opera and ballet, then write large checks to support these narrowly appreciated arts. These men would prefer to write checks in order to escape attending.

The major differences between middle-class living and wealthy living in my era are the ability to afford three things: full-time servants, very large homes, and homes located at a great distance from a street. A wealthy person hires numerous full-time servants to run his household. Given the value of his time, this is an economically rational decision. Second, the very rich live in large homes that cannot be seen from a highway. They can afford expensive land that offers seclusion to large homes. Their properties have long, winding driveways. Servants, large homes, and seclusion are social goods, sometimes called positional goods.² They identify wealth. Rich men usually want this recognition. So do rich men's wives, especially the second or third wife.

1. Chapter 40.

Positional goods are not life-and-death goods. To sacrifice one's integrity in order to obtain positional goods—or, more likely, merely an opportunity to obtain enough wealth to buy positional goods—is to become self-deceived. The price of the positional goods is too high. Jesus asked: “For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul? (Matt. 16:26).³ This rhetorical question is an extension of Proverbs 21:6 to eternity.

B. Vanity

The biblical meaning of vanity is a combination of success and emptiness. A person pursues something that he considers valuable or worth having, but when he obtains or attains it, he finds that it does not fulfil his expectations. The Book of Ecclesiastes dismisses all things pursued for their own sake as vanity.

Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher, vanity of vanities; all is vanity (Eccl. 1:2).⁴

I have seen all the works that are done under the sun; and, behold, all is vanity and vexation of spirit (Eccl. 1:14).⁵

Then I looked on all the works that my hands had wrought, and on the labour that I had laboured to do: and, behold, all was vanity and

2. Fred Hirsch, The Social Limits to Growth (London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1976).

3. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 35.

4. Gary North, Autonomy and Stagnation: An Economic Commentary on Ecclesiastes (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 1.

5. Idem.

vexation of spirit, and there was no profit under the sun (Eccl. 2:11).⁶

The warning here is against autonomy. Nothing pursued for its own sake is anything but vanity. Only that which is pursued under the law of God for the glory of God escapes from vanity. Self-judgment must be conformed to God's judgment. Nothing is autonomous.

Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil (Eccl. 12:13–14).⁷

Men pursue wealth because it seems to offer a wide range of options. But all of these options are vanity—empty. They all command a price. If wealth is pursued through deception, it produces death. This is nothing (vanity) for something (life).

Conclusion

Solomon identifies a common misconception: imagining that wealth is worth lying to attain. This is a monumental misconception. Yet the lure of treasure is so great that men sacrifice their integrity in order to attain it. Great wealth is vanity whenever pursued for its own sake: empty. When pursued by means of deception, it is suicidal.

6. Ibid., ch. 2.

7. Ibid., ch. 45.

MORAL CAUSATION

The robbery of the wicked shall destroy them; because they refuse to do judgment (Prov. 21:7).

This is the common view of moral causation in the Mosaic law. Deuteronomy 28:15–68 presents it. There is moral causation in history. Morality shapes economic results. In this case, the message relates to a violation of morality: robbery. The word can also be translated as “spoil” or “oppression.”

A. Robbers Lose in History

Wicked men rob others. They do this to benefit themselves. They use coercion or the threat of coercion, or they use deception, to obtain wealth owned by others. They use ungodly methods to lay up treasure. That which God had delivered into the hands of other people, who had acted lawfully, the robbers obtain apart from moral performance or legal claim. The robbers attempt to thwart God’s allocation of resources. They seek ownership on a legal foundation other than God’s mandated legal order. They seek to establish a new world order, one which favors them uniquely.

This proverb says that robbers will reap a disaster for their efforts. It offers a reason for this: the refusal of the wicked to do judgment. By “judgment,” Solomon meant righteous judgment. The Mosaic law says: “Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty: but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour” (Lev. 19:15).¹ These are God’s judgments.

“Ye shall do my judgments, and keep mine ordinances, to walk

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 14.

therein: I am the LORD your God. Ye shall therefore keep my statutes, and my judgments: which if a man do, he shall live in them: I am the LORD" (Lev. 18:4–5).

B. Winners and Losers

The wicked person robs others. He does this in order to increase his wealth at the expense of his victims. His gain is their loss. The exchange between them is not voluntary. It is not an arrangement based on the expectation of mutual benefit. The victim may be the victim of deception, hoping for gain, but the robber understands in advance that the exchange will not rest on mutually shared benefits.

In a free market exchange, both parties benefit, or expect to benefit, from an exchange. Each understands that the other expects to gain from the transaction. The relationship is not based on the expectation of either party that he will gain at the other person's expense. Adam Smith, in Book I, Chapter 2 of The Wealth of Nations (1776), wrote these words, which have survived the test of time.

But man has almost constant occasion for the help of his brethren, and it is in vain for him to expect it from their benevolence only. He will be more likely to prevail if he can interest their self-love in his favour, and show them that it is for their own advantage to do for him what he requires of them. Whoever offers to another a bargain of any kind, proposes to do this. Give me that which I want, and you shall have this which you want, is the meaning of every such offer; and it is in this manner that we obtain from one another the far greater part of those good offices which we stand in need of. It is not from the benevolence of the butcher, the brewer, or the baker, that we expect our dinner, but from their regard to their own interest. We address ourselves, not to their humanity but to their self-love, and never talk to them of our own necessities but of their advantages.

The exchange relationship is not a zero-sum game, where every gain comes at the cost of another player's loss. Both parties expect to gain.

The robber knows better. He knows that his victim will lose. He initiates the transaction on this basis. This is the essence of robbery. It relies either on coercion or deception. It is based on the assumption that gain results from loss. This is not the basis of the free market economy. It is also not the basis of biblical morality. God's law establishes a system of moral causation in history. Righteousness produces materi- al benefits. These are not one-sided benefits. All the participants in society can perceive this, even covenant-breakers.

But ye that did cleave unto the LORD your God are alive every one of you this day. Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it. Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day? (Deut. 4:4–8).²

So powerful is this testimony in the hearts of men that God says that the very unwillingness of an individual to evaluate the results of God's law in this positive fashion—in other words, to suppress this understanding—constitutes wilful rebellion against God, a form of rebellion which is the origin of idolatry: worshipping animals and insects (Rom. 1:18–23).³ The robber refuses to accept this. He believes that he can safely substitute deception or coercion in place of mutually beneficial voluntary exchange. He believes that he can benefit from a violation of God's covenantal legal order.

This proverb says that the robber's assessment is incorrect. It says that such wicked behavior will result in his destruction. The robber expects to benefit from his coercion, but he will not benefit. He will sustain a massive loss. He will become a far greater loser than his victim.

Conclusion

A just man is in a position to extend judgment in history. So is an unjust man. What men do in history reflects their concept of causation.

The robber denies the cause and effect relationship that God announces in His law governs the world of man. His actions reflect his denial of God's legal order. This proverb warns men not to act on any such assumption. It warns them to adhere to the standards established in God's revelation.

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 8.

3. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 2.

THE CRY OF THE POOR

Whoso stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he also shall cry himself, but shall not be heard (Prov. 21:13).

A poor person has a right to cry out to God for deliverance. The Hebrews in Egypt cried out to God for deliverance. God heard them and delivered them under Moses. God raised up Moses, who initially resisted the call (Ex. 4:1–13), to deliver His people.

A poor person may also cry out to men who possess more wealth than he does. He seeks deliverance from his immediate situation. He sees that another person may be in a position to help him. He asks for help.

Is this a loud cry? Sometimes the Hebrew word is correctly translated this way. “My heart shall cry out for Moab; his fugitives shall flee unto Zoar, an heifer of three years old: for by the mounting up of Luhith with weeping shall they go it up; for in the way of Horonaim they shall raise up a cry of destruction” (Isa. 15:5). It can also be understood as crying in the sense of shedding tears. “And Tamar put ashes on her head, and rent her garment of divers colours that was on her, and laid her hand on her head, and went on crying” (II Sam. 13:19). It is more likely a cry in the sense of a corporate appeal in the midst of a crisis. It is not an audible cry. It is a representative cry. “At the noise of the taking of Babylon the earth is moved, and the cry is heard among the nations” (Jer. 50:46).

The Hebrew word translated here as “stoppeth” can mean “closed up.” It can also mean “narrow.” The meaning here is “an unwillingness to consider.” Poor people are in need. A somewhat less poor person is in a position to help, yet he does nothing.

There are cause and effect in God’s covenantal social order. What a person sows, so shall he reap. “But this I say, He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully” (II Cor. 9:6). “Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap” (Gal. 6:7). The laws of society are ultimately covenantal; hence, there is an ethical component.

A merciless person does not listen to the cry of a person in need. Neither will others listen to him, should he come under distress. Every person is threatened by something. Everyone can come under distress of some kind. There is no immunity from distress in this life. Solomon says that so personal are social cause and effect that the person who refuses to help the poor when he can help is going to be overtaken by external events that threaten him.

Hearing the cry of the poor is an ethical issue. Solomon does not call for the civil government to tax members of one income group in order to fund another group. He is not directing his warning to civil magistrates. He is warning people with assets to assist the poor.

Conclusion

The warning is personal. The threatened sanction is personal. Poor people in society should be able to present their case to the public at large. If their case has merit, yet no one lifts a hand to help, then those who have remained judicially deaf will find that their day of trouble will come. What they have sown, they will reap.

BIBLICAL BRIBERY

A gift in secret pacifieth anger: and a reward in the bosom strong wrath (Prov. 21:14).

A. God Cannot Be Bribed

Solomon, as the king of Israel, was familiar with the strategic use of gifts. The Hebrew word translated as “gift”—mattawn—appears three times in Proverbs. The context of Proverbs 21:14 is not clearly that of civil government. It is in Proverbs 19:6. “Many will intreat the favour of the prince: and every man is a friend to him that giveth gifts.” Proverbs 18:16 may refer to civil rulers. “A man’s gift maketh room for him, and bringeth him before great men.” Great men may be civil rulers. If not, then these men have access to civil rulers.

The general principle governing these proverbs is found in Proverbs 18:8. “A gift is as a precious stone in the eyes of him that hath it: whithersoever it turneth, it prospereth.” In this proverb, the Hebrew word is different: sachad. It is used repeatedly to describe bribery. In most, the texts are hostile. They are governed by this presupposition. “For the LORD your God is God of gods, and Lord of lords, a great God, a mighty, and a terrible, which regardeth not persons, nor taketh reward” (Deut. 10:17). What applies to God must also apply to those who act as judges in His name.

And thou shalt take no gift: for the gift blindeth the wise, and perverteth the words of the righteous (Ex. 23:8).

Thou shalt not wrest judgment; thou shalt not respect persons, neither take a gift: for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous (Deut. 16:19).

Cursed be he that taketh reward to slay an innocent person. And all the people shall say, Amen (Deut. 27:25).

A wicked man taketh a gift out of the bosom to pervert the ways of judgment (Prov. 17:23).

Thy princes are rebellious, and companions of thieves: every one loveth gifts, and followeth after rewards: they judge not the fatherless, neither doth the cause of the widow come unto them (Isa. 1:23).

Then what of the proverb in question? “A gift in secret pacifieth anger: and a reward in the bosom strong wrath.” Why in secret? What anger is it pacifying? Isn’t the context the same as the other Hebrew word for gift?

B. What We Owe Corrupt Rulers

There is no question that God prohibits bribery that produces corrupt judgments. But this does not directly deal with the question of becoming a willing victim of a corrupt judgment. Corrupt rulers are marked by a willingness to accept bribes. This puts the covenant-keeper at a disadvantage. In a court of law, his opponent may have paid a bribe. A practical question arises: What should a covenant-keeper do to reduce the likelihood of being the victim of paid-for corrupt judgment?

Solomon does not suggest that anything is wrong with this: “A gift in secret pacifieth anger: and a reward in the bosom strong wrath” (21:14). Nor here: “A gift is as a precious stone in the eyes of him that hath it: whithersoever it turneth, it prospereth” (17:8). Yet in the second case, the Hebrew word is sachad. We are faced with what initially appears to be an ethical dilemma. Solomon points to the benefits of bribery without condemning it.

There is a reason for this. The Bible condemns bribery. The question is, how does the Bible define bribery? There are two choices.

1. To pay a civil official to deliver a corrupt judgment, i.e., a judgment at odds with what biblical law mandates.
2. To pay a civil official to deliver a judgment different from what he otherwise would hand down.

The Bible clearly condemns the first practice. If the proverbs under consideration here, which deal with the benefits of giving gifts, do not refer to civil government, then bribery may be defined according to the second option. But nowhere in the Bible is gift-giving condemned in this way. Bribery is condemned because it perverts righteous judgment. There would have been a righteous decision handed down, but bribery has led to a different decision.

C. Rival Approaches to Law

Here, we see a fundamental difference between rival views of civil law. One view defines righteous judgment as consistent with a code of ethics. A decision is substantively righteous. Why? Because it upholds the ethical foundation of the specific statute or tradition. The other view defines righteous judgment as procedurally correct. A decision is formally righteous. Why? Because it is technically predictable. The modern world has moved systematically toward formal rationalism: procedure over ethics. It steadily has abandoned substantive rationalism: ethics over procedure.

If we define righteous judgment as procedurally correct law, then all bribery is condemned. If we define righteous judgment as ethically correct law, then bribery is condemned when it tempts a civil official to enforce ethically incorrect law.

The critic may respond: "Civil law should be both ethically grounded and procedurally predictable." Yes, this is what civil law should be. But what is the biblically correct view of bribery in an ethically corrupt legal system?

Jesus provided a practical answer to this question.

Ye have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth: But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil: but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloke also. And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain (Matt. 5:38–41).¹

Did Jesus abandon the Mosaic law as an ideal? Moses declared: "Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, Burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe" (Ex. 21:24–25).² The context was two men fighting, where an injured pregnant woman loses her child. If this law is no longer in effect, then the judicial case against abortion is surrendered.³

1. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 9.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 37.

3. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press,

Jesus was speaking to Jews who lived under Roman oppression. They were not in charge of the legal system. So, He recommended that people make an extra payment to those who used compulsion against them. This payment was not owed. It was not even demanded. In the context of civil compulsion, this is correctly identified as a bribe. It is a payment in advance to buy the favor of a person in authority.

There is another example. It involves a positive sanction in the context of a negative sanction. Jesus said,

There was in a city a judge, which feared not God, neither regarded man: And there was a widow in that city; and she came unto him, saying, Avenge me of mine adversary. And he would not for a while: but afterward he said within himself, Though I fear not God, nor regard man; Yet because this widow troubleth me, I will avenge her, lest by her continual coming she weary me (Luke 18:2–5).

The widow faces an unjust judge. She wants justice. So, she bangs on his door. She nags him. She makes his life miserable. She offers a bribe: “I will stop pestering you if you render judgment.” He accepts the bribe. He decides to get some peace and quiet by rendering righteous judgment.

Jesus was illustrating the correct approach to prayer. Be persistent. Treat God as if He were an unjust judge.⁴ But if we are allowed to treat God as if He were an unjust judge, when He is not an unjust judge, then we are allowed to treat unjust judges similarly.

Conclusion

Solomon taught that paying a judge to render a judgment against what biblical law mandates is a corrupt form of bribery. God cannot be bought off to render unrighteous judgment. Therefore, do not try to buy off a judge to render unrighteous judgment.

Solomon also taught that “a gift in secret pacifieth anger: and a reward in the bosom strong wrath.” When dealing with a judge who systematically renders ethically corrupt judgments, it is legitimate to persuade him to render an incorrupt judgment by paying him in secret. It may not be wise in a particular instance. It is always risky. But it is not morally corrupt.

There is no universal definition of justice that fits all cases. There is no neutral law. There is no neutral court procedure. There are God's law and man's law. There is covenant-keeping and covenant-breaking. The quest for universal definitions of law and law enforcement that reconcile God's Bible-revealed law and man's law is an assault on the Bible, for it is an assertion of covenant-breaking man's ethical neutrality and judicial autonomy. It is an attempt to bring God's law into sovereign man's law court. So, there is no universal definition of bribery.⁵ This definition is biblically incorrect: "To pay a civil official to deliver a judgment different from what he otherwise would hand down." This definition is correct: "To pay a civil official to deliver a corrupt judgment, i.e., a judgment at odds with what biblical law mandates."

1973), pp. 263–69. Cf. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 37:A.

4. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 42.

5. Gary North, "In Defense of Biblical Bribery," in Rushdoony, Institutes of Biblical Law, pp. 843–44.

ECONOMIC HIERARCHIES

The rich ruleth over the poor, and the borrower is servant to the lender (Prov. 22:7).

Hierarchy is not a bad thing. On the contrary, hierarchy is an incapable concept. It is point two of the biblical covenant structure.¹ The question that everyone faces is the nature of the multiple hierarchies under which he or she lives. The hierarchy described in this proverb is economic.

A. The Rich Rule Over the Poor

The rich man has many opportunities. This is the best definition of riches. The poor man has far fewer opportunities.

The rich man can make mistakes and still not have to change his lifestyle. The poor man must make many changes in his pattern of consumption if he makes mistakes. He will be in a weak bargaining position, for he has no economic reserves. The trade-off between money and time works against him. He has little money, so he soon runs out of time in a crisis. He could buy more time with money. He has no money. So, he must accept an employment or credit offer that he would not accept, had he not run out of money and if he were not running out of time.

When a rich man enters the free market and offers to hire less rich men, he faces competition from other rich men. Similarly, when a poor man enters the market, he is competing against other poor men. The free market is highly competitive, but it is not the competition of one-on-one competition between a rich man and a poor man, or a creditor and a debtor. Only when the contract is signed does the hierarchy become one-on-one.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

Think of the analogous competition of courtship. Males compete against males; females compete against females. Only after marriage does a hierarchy prevail.

B. The Creditor Rules Over the Debtor

This proverb teaches that as surely as a rich man is in a superior position in relation to a poor man, so is a creditor in a superior position to a poor man. Poor men know this.

The hierarchy is based on a credit-debt relationship. For most people, it is better to be under economic authority. Most people are not entrepreneurs. They do not want to live with the extensive uncertainty that offers the entrepreneur the opportunity to make a profit, provided he is willing to risk taking a loss. No one can avoid uncertainty entirely, for only God is omniscient. But most people try to limit uncertainty in their lives. This is why most people prefer a wage to investing as a way to support themselves.

Earning a wage is a mark of subordination. A proverb could accurately announce, "The rich ruleth over the poor, and the wage-earner is servant to the wage-payer." The difference is, the wage-earner probably is bound by a revocable contract. He can lawfully quit, and his employer in a free society can lawfully fire him, unless there is a signed contract to the contrary.

A debt contract is more permanent than most wage contracts. It binds the debtor to a repayment schedule. This is a more rigid form of hierarchy. This proverb reminds a potential debtor that debt is a form of servitude.

Servitude is not morally wrong. The Mosaic law had a provision that allowed a servant to pledge lifetime service to his master or employer (Ex. 21:4–6; Deut. 15:16–17). Paul recommended that a slave remain content with his position (I Cor. 7:20). But if he is offered a legal way to go free, he should take it (I Cor. 7:21).²

Paul also recommended debt-free living. "Owe no man any thing, but to love one another: for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law" (Rom. 13:8). But because almost every economic relationship has a time component, there is always some short-term credit/debt.³

2. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 8.

The debtor is a servant because he has promised to pay. He is less mobile because of this. This mobility may be geographical. It may be related to career. If the debt was used to purchase a capital asset, the income generated by the asset may be well above whatever is required to service the debt. This increases mobility. The problem is the uncertainty of future income compared to the certainty of the debt's repayment schedule. The inherent servitude of the permanent obligation stands as a threat to the person who has contracted the debt.

A debt secured by inanimate collateral is different from debt secured by personal obligation. If someone borrows money to buy a house, and the house serves as collateral for the mortgage, then the threat of foreclosure is always there, but it is not the equivalent of personal bondage. It is not the same as a loan secured by a person's earning ability. The debtor whose home is foreclosed for non-payment can move—indeed, will be probably be asked to move by the new owner of the home. But this threat does not extend to his person or his savings. He retains mobility.

Conclusion

The rich man rules over the poor man because he has financial reserves that the poor man does not have. He can offer a loan to a poor man in a poor man's time of crisis. The poor man is not in a strong bargaining position.

Similarly, the creditor is in a strong bargaining position in relation to the debtor. The debtor may be only one payment away from a crisis. Few creditors are.

The economic hierarchy in a free market is a hierarchy of competition. Rich men compete against rich men for the services of less rich men. Poor men compete against poor men. Creditors compete against creditors. Debtors compete against debtors. There are limits to the severity of the hierarchy.

3. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 12.

A LION IN THE STREETS

The slothful man saith, There is a lion without, I shall be slain in the streets (Prov. 22:13).

A. Excuses, Excuses

Actually, slothful men do not say this. It is doubtful that they said it in Palestine in Solomon's day. Who would believe it? That is Solomon's point. He is implying that all of the other excuses that slothful men offer for not leaving the house every morning are in the same category as worrying about being killed by a lion in the streets. Solomon's contempt for sloth is seen in a parallel passage later in this book.

The slothful man saith, There is a lion in the way; a lion is in the streets. As the door turneth upon his hinges, so doth the slothful upon his bed. The slothful hideth his hand in his bosom; it grieveth him to bring it again to his mouth. The sluggard is wiser in his own conceit than seven men that can render a reason (26:13–16).

The slothful man rolls from side to side in his bed. He is too lazy to eat. He is puffed up. He is altogether a contemptible person.

He offers an excuse for his sloth: "A lion is in the street." Solomon's intense ridicule indicates that slothfulness in Israel was widely regarded as a moral defect. The slothful person searches for an acceptable excuse for not going to work. He does not want to come out and say, "Look, I am lazy. Work does not agree with me. It never has. I find it a lot more pleasant to just stay home and relax." The public, then as now, looks on such excuses as evidence of a weak moral character. People also think, "I am forced by external circumstances to go to work. Why should this person escape the negative sanctions of not going to work? Who does he think he is?"

There is a familiar American saying, "An honest day's labor for an honest day's pay." Its opposite was popular in the Soviet Union before it collapsed in 1991. "We pretend to work, and they pretend to pay us." Soviet work habits were terrible, and so was output. So was the currency system.¹ The American outlook on work is that it is more than a necessary evil. A man defines himself by what he does for a living, not what he does in his spare time. This is characteristic of Protestantism in general. There really was a Puritan work ethic in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Work was regarded as a holy calling from God, something not to be taken lightly or escaped, even by rich men. Puritans had contempt for the Cavaliers, meaning Great Britain's upper crust society, which was based on inherited wealth in land, not on labor and especially commercial labor. Traces of this pro-work attitude remain in modern Anglo-American society.

B. Evading Responsibility

Work is a form of personal responsibility. Each person is called by God to exercise dominion on God's behalf in his appropriate boundary of responsibility. This is the biblical worldview from Genesis 1 to Revelation 22.

When a person refuses to exercise responsibility in preference for a life of leisure, he rebels against God. Because service to God in the realm of economics is service to other men, who represent God, a refusal to work is an attempt to evade service to others. It is not surprising that people recognize the threat to themselves posed by other people's sloth. It means that fewer goods and services are offered for sale or as charitable gifts. Almost everyone is a little poorer. Only those who sell to the slothful are benefited, and only for as long as the slothful have money to spend.

The most memorable case of a slothful man that I can recall was reported in the central column of the Wall Street Journal: the human interest section. It was the story of an heir who lived on cruise ships. He had never married. He would hire a prostitute to spend a week or two with him on a cruise. He would hire a different one for the next cruise. He would eat as much as he wanted; cruises are famous for their policy of unlimited servings. Eventually, he would gain so much weight that he would have to go to a weight-reduction "fat farm" for a few weeks. Then he would return to the cruises. He had lived on cruise ships for all of his adult life. He was finally running low on money. He was unsure of how he would spend the rest of his life after the money ran out.

1. A humorous book on the irrationality of the Soviet economic system is Leopold Tyrmand, The Rosa Luxemburg Contraceptives Cooperative (New York: Macmillan, 1972).

A vacation cruise is seen as a special treat for married couples. Because of price competition, it is possible for middle-class couples to take a cruise once or twice. There are expensive cruises, too. It does not take many cruises to become jaded with what they offer. But, as a lifetime special event, they have an appeal. Yet the thought of spending one's life on cruises as a passenger is unthinkable to most people, which is why the Wall Street Journal ran the story: the bizarre factor. Productive people know the difference between a life of work interspersed with leisure vs. a life of leisure interspersed with crash dieting. They prefer the former.

C. Dropping Out

In 1963, Timothy Leary, a Harvard University lecturer in psychology, was fired for recommending psychedelic drugs to his students. In the second half of the decade, he cashed in on a five-year international cultural rebellion of college-age students. He adopted flowing robes, as if he were an Indian mystic living a life of poverty. He flew around the United States to deliver well-paid lectures, which ended with this slogan: "Turn on. Tune in. Drop out." He became famous for this slogan. He was still promoting the use of psychedelic drugs: "Turn on." What his listeners were supposed to tune into was vague. To drop out would require continuing subsidies from members of the conventional society. His audiences were filled mostly with parentally funded teenagers and young adults, who had temporarily dropped out of middle-class society.

The counter-culture fad faded in 1970, when the United States went into an economic recession. Jobs became scarce. Leary continued to live a chaotic life thereafter, including two prison terms in the first half of the 1970s. He continued to lecture, though without much media attention. In the late 1980s, he resurfaced as a computer software writer. He died of cancer in 1996.

People with Leary's message are found in every society. Usually, they are on the society's fringes. Occasionally, they receive wide attention for a time, but they fade into the shadows again. Their outlook requires subsidies from productive people. Eventually, the subsidies end.

Scarcity was imposed on covenant-breaking mankind and the world in order to keep men from dropping out, i.e., forcing them to cooperate (Gen. 3:17–19).² The need to work is imposed by scarcity. Men understand that men who seek to escape from the scarcity-imposed requirement to work are a threat to the social order. The requirement to work preceded the curse (Gen. 2). Scarcity reinforced this requirement after the Fall.

Conclusion

This proverb uses ridicule to reject a view of life that threatens society and threatens the family headed by a person who adopts subterfuge to justify his sloth. It is not a lion in the streets that threatens him. Rather, his own rejection of work threatens him. If adopted widely, this outlook would threaten the progress of society.

The future will not be captured by men who are slothful. It will be captured by people who are not afraid of non-existent lions in the street, but who are afraid of a life of sloth.

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

POVERTY PREVENTION

If thou hast nothing to pay, why should he take away thy bed from under thee? (Prov. 22:27).

To understand this proverb, we must first understand the Mosaic law governing collateral.

If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as an usurer, neither shalt thou lay upon him usury. If thou at all take thy neighbour's raiment to pledge, thou shalt deliver it unto him by that the sun goeth down: For that is his covering only, it is his raiment for his skin: wherein shall he sleep? and it shall come to pass, when he crieth unto me, that I will hear; for I am gracious (Ex. 22:25–27).

A person comes to a potential lender, seeking a loan. The lender can lawfully ask for collateral. But it is a strange form of collateral. It must be returned in the evening. It is a coat or other covering for cold weather. So, the borrower can use it when he really needs it. It seems to be useless to the lender, who must return it when it is needed.

This form of collateral is in fact very useful. The borrower is restricted from using the collateral to secure multiple loans. The lender can lawfully require the person to hand over the coat during the day. When he hands it over, he cannot take it to another lender as security for a loan. This law restricts multiple indebtedness.¹

This proverb assumes the following scenario. A poor man has gone to a lender. As collateral, he has offered his bed. As with a coat, which must be returned to the borrower at night, the bed is useful during the night. The lender must return it during the night. Also like the coat, the bed is not needed during the day. The lender can lawfully demand that the borrower deliver it to him during the day.

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 49:J.

This proverb says that someone is trying to take away a man's bed from under him. This would be illegal during the evening. So, if the bed is under the person, this is because the sun has risen. He should be off his bed and off to work. But he is still on his bed.

The lender sees the situation. The borrower is lazy. He does not want to get up in the morning. He has an aversion to work. This explains his poverty. This is why he needed a loan in the first place.

The lender has a problem. How will he be repaid? This debtor is a lazybones. He is not driven by conscience to repay loans. He has no money. There is a reason why he has no money. He is lazy.

He needs to change his ways. He needs motivation to change. One way for the lender to motivate him to change his ways is to demand that he surrender his collateral each morning. The lure of staying in bed in comfort can be removed. If the borrower wishes to sleep, he can sleep on the ground.

Solomon presents a rhetorical question: "If thou hast nothing to pay, why should he take away thy bed from under thee?" The answer is this: "Because you are lazy. You prefer to spend your time in bed rather than at work. Your income will fall. You will have to go into debt. You have been so unwise in the past that the only item that you can offer as collateral is your bed. Now that you cannot pay what you owe, your bed will be removed by the lender every morning." This is a warning to lazy men not to stay in bed before they fall into poverty to such a degree that they must get a loan to stay afloat financially. If they are so unwise as to borrow on this basis, the lender may exercise his authority and demand that you get out of bed every morning.

At the same time, this proverb is a warning to lenders not to violate the law governing collateral. If a lender comes at night to collect this form of collateral, the borrower will not sleep well. If he does not sleep well, he will not be efficient on the job. If he loses his job or if his production on the job declines because of sleep deprivation, the lender is unlikely to be repaid. So, to increase the likelihood of being repaid, the lender should honor the law governing collateral.

Conclusion

This proverb is another in a series of proverbs warning men against the sin of laziness. This one is more subtle than the others. It reminds lazy men of a possible outcome of their refusal to work. They will be in their beds when their creditors come to the door demanding the return of their only collateral: their beds. Here is the message: it is better to get out of bed early in the morning and go to work before poverty strikes.

LANDMARKS

Remove not the ancient landmark, which thy fathers have set (Prov. 22:28).

This is a reaffirmation of a Mosaic law: “Thou shalt not remove thy neighbour’s landmark, which they of old time have set in thine inheritance, which thou shalt inherit in the land that the LORD thy God giveth thee to possess it” (Deut. 19:14).¹ To this law, a curse was attached: “Cursed be he that removeth his neighbour’s landmark. And all the people shall say, Amen” (Deut. 27:17).²

This proverb indicates that what Moses had revealed as judicially binding five centuries earlier (I Kings 6:1) was still in force in Israel. The landmarks were still visible and still legally binding. The Assyrian and Babylonian captivities were in the future.

A landmark was a rural land boundary marker. Landmarks marked off the property that had been distributed to Israelite families after the conquest of Canaan. Any land marked by these boundaries could not be transferred permanently to other families (Lev. 25:8–13),³ except under the unique condition of a broken and then unredeemed pledge to a priest (Lev. 27:15).⁴

This law was intended to produce social cooperation. It established property rights. This means that it increased the likelihood that families in specific tribes would cooperate with each other. If an heir resided on the family’s land, he would be familiar with the customs of the neighborhood. Nevertheless, the owner could lawfully lease the land to anyone, including a covenantal stranger.

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 44.

2. Ibid., ch. 68.

3. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 25.

4. Ibid., ch. 27.

These markers could be more easily removed and moved than boundary markers in a city. Because of the low cost associated with moving a marker, the law imposed a special curse. So binding was this curse that all those who heard this law read by Levites or priests were required to affirm it by shouting "Amen." This was a public, corporate covenantal act. God presented Himself as the guardian of land markers.

Conclusion

Boundary markers identify ownership. They literally apply in real estate: stakes placed on property. But the principle of marked ownership also applies to other items, such as automobiles. Records must be kept. Boundaries must be enforced by civil courts. To break continuity with boundaries is to break continuity with the past. This breaks continuity with the future.

IN THE PRESENCE OF KINGS

*Seest thou a man diligent in his business? he shall stand before kings;
he shall not stand before mean men (Prov. 22:29).*

Here we find another example of the theme of diligence. The Hebrew word translated here as “business” is usually translated as “work” or “workmanship.”

The word for “stand” is sometimes translated as “present.” A person who stands in front of a king possesses some kind of authority. “And the LORD said unto Moses, Rise up early in the morning, and stand before Pharaoh; lo, he cometh forth to the water; and say unto him, Thus saith the LORD, Let my people go, that they may serve me” (Ex. 8:20). This is repeated in Exodus 9:13. A different Hebrew word for “stand,” but conveying the same meaning, is found in the description of Joseph’s authority before Pharaoh. “And Joseph was thirty years old when he stood before Pharaoh king of Egypt. And Joseph went out from the presence of Pharaoh, and went throughout all the land of Egypt” (Gen. 41:46). The ruler invested him with official authority because he trusted Joseph’s judgment.

The diligent man will not stand before “mean” men. The Hebrew word translated here as “mean” is found in only one other verse, where it is translated “drowned.” “Pharaoh’s chariots and his host hath he cast into the sea: his chosen captains also are drowned in the Red sea” (Ex. 15:4). The root Hebrew word means “dark.” In this context, the word means “obscure” (NASB), which is appropriate for such an obscure word.

This proverb conveys the idea that a diligent man will not have to waste his time dealing with obscure people. Taken together—kings and obscure people—this proverb conveys the sense of service. It is not that kings grant the diligent person some kind of award for good work. The parallel would not make sense. Obscure people do not grant awards. They are too obscure. The awards would not mean anything. So, the sense of this proverb is that the diligent person serves in some kind of advisory capacity. Kings listen to him. Obscure people would also listen to him, but he has no time to advise everyone. So, he advises kings.

In the world of finance, we see an analogous procedure. As a money manager gains the reputation for making his clients lots of money, he finds that rich people want to invest their money with him. He can then screen access by raising the amount of money required to invest in his fund. Or he can charge a higher percentage for administering the funds. People without much money to invest cannot afford him. There was a time when he might have taken them on as clients, but no longer. There are only so many hours in the day. If a man must devote time to mastering a field, he might as well serve people with money or influence rather than poor people without influence. His time is scarce. He has to allocate it. Those without influence or wealth are no longer able to purchase his labor.

This proverb describes a positive sanction for diligence: to stand before kings. Why is this a positive sanction? Because most people wish to be in the presence of important people. They wish to be known as people with sufficient importance to gain access to the circles of the blessed. This is why people give favors to people who need no favors. They are not seeking money. They are seeking a kind of rubbed-off fame. The public imputes importance to famous people. Other people seek a kind of reflected fame by being in the circles of the famous. This is why people ask famous people to sign autographs. In a few cases, this may be for money, such as an autographed baseball made in a record-breaking game. But normally, people just want a scrap of paper with a celebrity's signature on it.

Here, King Solomon speaks of obtaining an audience before kings. The king wants top-quality service. This person is in a position to provide it. Kings do not want services rendered by obscure people, any more than people with expertise want to serve obscure people. Kings want the best and can afford the best. This person's performance on the job has won him a reputation for excellence. This is the kind of person kings wish to deal with.

So fundamental is diligence in a person's ability to deliver consistently above-average performance that Solomon says diligence will be rewarded by exceptional acclaim. This indicates that diligence is rare. If everyone were equally diligent, most people would not gain access to kings. So, because diligence is exceptional, the reward is exceptional.

Conclusion

There are winners and losers in life. Kings are usually winners. So, to stand before kings is to bask in the reflected light of winners. Solomon presents this as a positive sanction for diligence. In contrast, obscure people are losers. Diligent people will not have to spend time dealing with losers.

This proverb makes it clear that it is better to win than lose. It calls men to greater diligence, so as not to be acclaimed by losers.

UNRELIABLE RICHES

Labour not to be rich: cease from thine own wisdom. Wilt thou set thine eyes upon that which is not? for riches certainly make themselves wings; they fly away as an eagle toward heaven (Prov. 23:4–5).

Solomon was rich. He had asked for wisdom and had gained great wealth. He did not lose his wealth. Instead, he lost his wisdom. He married too many women.

His wealth did not fly away. But he had not pursued kingship in order to gain wealth. He had hoped to gain the ability to provide sound judgment for the nation. He had achieved this goal. He lost it with respect to his own household. He worshipped the gods of his foreign wives. This cost his son Rehoboam the kingdom. The prophet told Jeroboam, Solomon's successor in the Northern Kingdom, that God would take action after the death of Solomon.

Howbeit I will not take the whole kingdom out of his hand: but I will make him prince all the days of his life for David my servant's sake, whom I chose, because he kept my commandments and my statutes: But I will take the kingdom out of his son's hand, and will give it unto thee, even ten tribes (I Kings 11:34–35).

Solomon pursued wisdom, a good thing. He attained wisdom, a good thing. But wisdom then escaped him. That which he had pursued with all his might, he lost. He kept what he had not pursued, his wealth.

A. Pursuing Vanity

Nothing pursued for its own sake is reliable. Autonomy fails to secure permanent benefits. Solomon initially pursued wisdom for the sake of the nation. But he lost this vision. He turned against God's law. He broke the laws of kingship.

When thou art come unto the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee, and shalt possess it, and shalt dwell therein, and shalt say, I will set a king over me, like as all the nations that are about me; Thou shalt in any wise set him king over thee, whom the LORD thy God shall choose: one from among thy brethren shalt thou set king over thee: thou mayest not set a stranger over thee, which is not thy brother. But he shall not multiply horses to himself, nor cause the people to return to Egypt, to the end that he should multiply horses: forasmuch as the LORD hath said unto you, Ye shall henceforth return no more that way. Neither shall he multiply wives to himself, that his heart turn not away: neither shall he greatly multiply to himself silver and gold (Deut. 17:14–17).¹

His heart turned away, just as Moses had predicted. This is the danger of anything pursued for its own sake or for what it offers to men in history. To pursue anything for its own sake is to pursue the wind. This is vanity.

This proverb singles out riches. Why riches? Why not the other parts of the triumvirate: sex and power? Because money is the most commonly available of the three. Almost anyone can pursue money. Power is not available to as many people as money is. The number of women available to any man is limited, other than through prostitution. There has been only one Solomon in this respect, and his unique example stands as a lasting testimony to the utter foolishness of the quest.

Money is the most marketable commodity. It makes available most of the other sins, which are for sale.

The popular T-shirt slogan, “He who dies with the most toys wins,” is popular for two reasons. First, people know it is not true, that it is a child’s outlook. Second, they also know that what the would-be rich and the already rich do to amass ever-greater wealth indicates that they really do believe it. Their behavior testifies to their belief in it. If they do not believe it, then they are sorely confused.

B. Riches Are Fleeting

The imagery of riches making wings to fly away is graphic. Riches are fleeting. So is life. The fleeting nature of life should remind men of the fleeting nature of riches. But, for most people, it is difficult to accept this fact emotionally. Jesus warned his disciples of this error.

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 42.

And he spake a parable unto them, saying, The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully: And he thought within himself, saying, What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits? And he said, This will I do: I will pull down my barns, and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods. And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry. But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then whose shall those things be, which thou hast provided? So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God (Luke 12:16–21).²

Are riches uniquely fleeting, compared to other attributes of success? Solomon did not say they are. Isaiah indicated that all of life suffers from this condition of easy departure.

The voice said, Cry. And he said, What shall I cry? All flesh is grass, and all the goodliness thereof is as the flower of the field: The grass withereth, the flower fadeth: because the spirit of the LORD bloweth upon it: surely the people is grass (Isa. 40:6–7).

Then why did Solomon single out riches? Because riches are the universal surrogate for all the other fleeting pursuits in life. The prices of the other popular vanities are usually denominated in money. If there is a market for a specific vanity, money is the unit of exchange. A person can change his mind about which vanity to pursue. Money lets him make this transition with the least loss to his accumulated portfolio of vanity. Money is the lowest common denominator in the pursuit of vanity, for it is the universal medium of exchange.

Riches are fleeting because wealth can be used to pursue so many false trails. Ecclesiastes described all the vanities that he pursued. Solomon had the money to indulge himself. Men with riches face many opportunities to dissipate their wealth, just as the prodigal son dissipated his (Luke 15:11–32).³

For most people, it is easier to spend money than to accumulate it. For a tiny elite, this is not true. Their wealth accumulates faster than they can spend it on themselves. There is not enough time in the day to spend it all in consumption. These people are uniquely dangerous to others when they attempt to put their wealth to use in a larger cause. Customers impose limits on wealth-seekers: objective profit and loss.

2. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 25.

3. Ibid., ch. 37.

Customers bid money to be served. But in giving money away, the rich man finds that there is no agreement regarding objective measures of success. Everyone encourages him to give away even more. He finds himself surrounded by men with grand plans to redeem the world through money—messianic men who dream of spending rich men's money to achieve their own agendas. For most wealth-pursuers, the world is better off when they pursue their wealth than when they begin to give it away.

Conclusion

The central question here is broad: "Wilt thou set thine eyes upon that which is not?" That which is not is vanity.

Riches fly away. So does vanity in general. That which is pursued for its own sake becomes vanity. To accumulate it is to accumulate the wind.

It is difficult to see this with respect to riches, so Solomon singles out riches as the universal deceiver of the easily deceived. It is the common representative of man's autonomous wisdom. He warns us: "cease from thine own wisdom."

SUPERNATURAL SANCTIONS

Remove not the old landmark; and enter not into the fields of the fatherless: For their redeemer is mighty; he shall plead their cause with thee (Prov. 23:10–11).

This refers back to a previous proverb, “Remove not the ancient landmark, which thy fathers have set” (Prov. 22:28).¹ This in turn refers back to a Mosaic law: “Thou shalt not remove thy neighbour’s landmark, which they of old time have set in thine inheritance, which thou shalt inherit in the land that the LORD thy God giveth thee to possess it” (Deut. 19:14).² This proverb adds two additional pieces of information: (1) there is special protection accorded to orphans; (2) a mighty redeemer will defend their cause against the proverb’s violator.

It is clear that the redeemer in question is God. The Hebrew word for redeemer, ga’al, is occasionally used to identify God. The most famous example is Job’s declaration: “For I know that my redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth” (Job 19:25). God redeemed Israel from Egypt. “Wherefore say unto the children of Israel, I am the LORD, and I will bring you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians, and I will rid you out of their bondage, and I will redeem you with a stretched out arm, and with great judgments” (Ex. 6:6). The word refers to the next of kin, who is not only the redeemer—one who buys his relative out of bondage (Lev. 25:48–49)³—but also the blood avenger. “The revenger of blood himself shall slay the murderer: when he meeteth him, he shall slay him” (Num. 35:19). God holds this dual office with respect to His redeemed people: redeemer and blood avenger.

1. Chapter 70.

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 44.

3. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 32.

A. Pleading the Orphan's Cause

To plead a cause is to act as a defense attorney for the victim. But, unlike a modern attorney who merely argues a case, the person described here also executes judgment. God sees the evils done to the defenseless. He intervenes on their behalf.

Ye shall not afflict any widow, or fatherless child. If thou afflict them in any wise, and they cry at all unto me, I will surely hear their cry; And my wrath shall wax hot, and I will kill you with the sword; and your wives shall be widows, and your children fatherless (Ex. 22:22–24).⁴

For the LORD your God is God of gods, and Lord of lords, a great God, a mighty, and a terrible, which regardeth not persons, nor taketh reward: He doth execute the judgment of the fatherless and widow, and loveth the stranger, in giving him food and raiment (Deut. 10:17–18).

This is a description of a blood avenger. God declares that He serves as the blood avenger of those who have no earthly next of kin to intervene on their behalf.

This was common knowledge in Israel. So, Solomon did not have to go into detail regarding the background of his command here. When a person secretly moves a landmark to gain a little extra property for his family, he takes a high-risk step that threatens to undo him. When God pleads a person's cause, the offender has nowhere to hide. The Psalmist described what such people can expect.

They encourage themselves in an evil matter: they commune of laying snares privily; they say, Who shall see them? They search out iniquities; they accomplish a diligent search: both the inward thought of every one of them, and the heart, is deep. But God shall shoot at them with an arrow; suddenly shall they be wounded (Ps. 64:5–7).

The evil-doers do not experience immediate negative sanctions. This gives them confidence.

LORD, how long shall the wicked, how long shall the wicked triumph? How long shall they utter and speak hard things? and all the workers of iniquity boast themselves? They break in pieces thy people, O LORD, and afflict thine heritage. They slay the widow and the stranger, and murder the fatherless. Yet they say, The LORD shall not see, neither shall the God of Jacob regard it (Ps. 94:3–7).

4. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 48.

This proverb reminds such men that God does see what they do, and He will intervene in history to right such wrongs.

B. Beyond Cosmic Impersonalism

Thieves do cost-benefit analyses, just as other men do. They see how easy it is to move a landmark. They see how difficult this will be to detect, let alone prove in a court of law. They do not look beyond the social order to identify possible flaws in their plan. They do not believe that there is anything beyond the impersonal forces of history to bring them to judgment, should there be no human witnesses.

This is foolish, says this proverb. There is a God who intervenes in history. He judges in terms of a legal code. He does not withdraw indefinitely from the affairs of men.

It is not just modern man who views justice in history as a matter of power rather than ethics. In Solomon's day, there were men who took the same view of historical cause and effect as modern man does. While most people in Solomon's day may have believed in some sort of supernatural background for the universe, just as most moderns do, they did not regard this supernatural realm as sufficiently aware or sufficiently interested in men's affairs to intervene in order to bring justice to victims. Such intervention was too specific, too immediate, and too predictable to be taken seriously in a rational criminal's cost-benefit analysis.

Modern covenant-breaking men dismiss such a view of historical cause and effect as implausible. Modern covenant-keeping men accept this view as a statistical possibility, but they are not sufficiently persuaded of its validity to believe that God actually intervenes in specific cases when society refuses to enforce God's law. Most of them relegate God's Bible-revealed law to the Old Covenant. That is to say, they deny that the sanction described in this proverb is still a factor to be considered when thinking about the enforcement limits of written or customary law. Their view of God's intervention on behalf of the victim is not significantly different from covenant-breaking men's view. Both groups regard this proverb as expressing a view of God that is no longer relevant in modern times, because cause and effect no longer operate in this fashion.

This outlook makes law enforcement more expensive. It persuades criminals that their acts of theft will not expose them to negative supernatural sanctions in history. They fear only the civil government. Similarly, covenant-keepers are equally persuaded that criminals' acts of theft will not expose them to negative supernatural sanctions in history. So, covenant-keepers are tempted to increase the power of the civil government to extend its techniques of law enforcement. They trust an expanded state, just as criminals fear it. Neither side fears God as a blood avenger.

Conclusion

This proverb presents a covenantal view of cause and effect. It asserts that the God who revealed His law to Moses is also the enforcer of last resort in history. This means that civil government need not be trusted to provide anything like the degree of justice presented in this proverb. It must not be so trusted. God is omniscient; the state is not.

UNDISCIPLINED LIVING

Be not among winebibbers; among riotous eaters of flesh: For the drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty: and drowsiness shall clothe a man with rags (Prov. 23:20–21).

Wine-lovers and meat-lovers, drunkards and gluttons, and people who just cannot seem to keep their eyes open: they share a common destiny. They will eventually wind up in poverty. This proverb does not say why, but it takes little imagination to understand why. They are undisciplined.

It is not that they are all lazy. The sleepy fellow may be, but not the drunkard or the glutton. They share the same personality trait. They do not say no. The drunkard does not stop drinking. The party-goer does not stop attending parties. The glutton does not stop eating. They all waste time and money on excessive consumption. They are unwilling to make the adjustments necessary in their lives to bring their appetites under control. The self-discipline required to regain control over their lives is beyond their will.

It is not that they do not know what they are doing. They know, but they do not care enough to change their ways. This brief proverb identifies their character flaw. Solomon did not spend space by explaining why such behavior produces poverty. He merely reminded his readers of the existence of the cause-and-effect relationship between undisciplined living and poverty.

Thrift is based on deferred gratification. An individual sees something he would like to own or like to experience. It costs money. It costs time. The person then makes a judgment regarding time: now, later, or never. If he decides “now,” then he must forfeit the money and time that he could have used to invest.

He can also use the money and time to enjoy something else. He can consume many things. These are singled out as producing poverty when consumed in large quantities: wine, meat, and food. They are irresistible to the people described in this proverb. Other things could be consumed in large quantities, but these are singled out. This one sounds odd to our ears: “riotous eaters of flesh.” This is because meat in the modern world’s industrial economies is so common that to eat it, even lots of it, is not considered deviant. Riotous parties where meat is consumed in large quantities are not common, not because riotous parties are uncommon, but because meat is so common. Until the mid-nineteenth century, meat was so expensive that a riotous party marked by high meat consumption would have been regarded as an expensive luxury available only to the rich. Anyone attending such parties on a regular basis would have had to be a party giver, not just a party attendee.

The person who is unable to say no to riotous, expensive parties, or to wine, or to food is a wastrel. He is wasting what could be exchanged for capital. He is consuming when he could be producing. More wealth is going out than is coming in. The end result is poverty.

A person who refuses to say no to his appetites is unable to budget. Yet budgeting is basic to success in a world under a cursed scarcity (Gen. 3:17–19). The curse was imposed in order to force men to choose among options. Left to themselves without the environmental restrictions imposed by scarcity, men would be murderous and destructive.¹ So, God has imposed limits on what men can accomplish with the resources they possess. This forces those who wish to maximize their accomplishments to allocate their wealth carefully. They must not surrender to their desire for present gratification. They must not allocate too much wealth to consumption.

Addiction to liquor, food, or partying is common in history. These seem to be irresistible for some people. This proverb warns readers that if they have difficulty resisting any of these, as well as sleep, then they should begin to exercise self-control now. The alternative is to risk becoming addicted. The reader is warned not to pursue a pattern of behavior based on self-indulgence. This is the warning: to be addicted is to die in poverty. The negative sanction of poverty is as universally feared as these behaviors are addicting. This proverb rests on a premise: poverty is to be avoided. If this were not the premise, then the threat of poverty in the long run could not overcome the lure of self-indulgence in the short run.

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

Conclusion

If you want to avoid poverty, avoid addictive behavior. Addictive behavior leads to the undisciplined consumption of wealth. It undermines thrift. It undermines capital formation.

Why do you and most other people want to avoid poverty? Because poverty is a negative sanction in history. As a general rule, he who owns very little can accomplish very little. He does not possess tools of production: capital.

Those who fear poverty because they fear restrictions on their consumption are warned that if they are not self-disciplined, they will find themselves in tighter straits than they prefer: fewer choices. Those who fear poverty because they fear restrictions on their ability to extend the kingdom of God in history are warned that if they are not self-disciplined, they will find themselves in tighter straits than they prefer: fewer choices. The negative sanction is the same in both cases.

THE PRICE OF PROSPERITY

I went by the field of the slothful, and by the vineyard of the man void of understanding; And, lo, it was all grown over with thorns, and nettles had covered the face thereof, and the stone wall thereof was broken down. Then I saw, and considered it well: I looked upon it, and received instruction. Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep: So shall thy poverty come as one that travelleth; and thy want as an armed man (Prov. 24:30–34).

This proverb has a structure different from all the others. It is not in the form of detailed instruction, as with the first nine chapters and chapters 30 and 31. It is also not in the form of pithy statements that convey a single idea. Instead, it is in the form of an observation, followed by an assessment of what Solomon had seen. The lesson learned affirms what Solomon had already announced: “Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep: So shall thy poverty come as one that travelleth, and thy want as an armed man” (Prov. 6:10–11).

Solomon says that he observed the condition of the capital assets owned by a slothful person—perhaps two people—who had no understanding. The assets were a field, a vineyard, and a stone wall. All showed signs of decay. The land was filled with thorns and nettles. These were signs of God’s curse of the ground in response to Adam’s rebellion. “Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field” (Gen. 3:18).¹ They had covered over the ground. This was evidence of long-term neglect. The stone wall was broken down. A stone wall does not fall apart overnight, except in an earthquake. Whoever owned this property had allowed it to fall into autonomy.

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 12.

A. Autonomous Nature

This proverb testifies to the existence of an environment that is hostile to mankind. Left to itself, it will cease to be productive in terms of the needs and desires of men. Nature's autonomous productivity is a threat to mankind. What nature produces on its own is contrary to the plans of productive men.

Solomon says that poverty is the outcome of men's acceptance of nature on nature's terms. Nature is uninterested in men. Men are interested in nature. They are supposed to bring nature under their dominion, which in turn brings nature under God's dominion. This is the requirement of the dominion covenant. "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth" (Gen. 1:26).²

Solomon describes poverty as if it were active: like a person on a journey. He walks along and finds victims. The lazy person's lack of goods is also like the results of an attack by an armed thief. He who refuses to labor is like a person who disarms himself in a world of armed thieves. This indicates that wealth is abnormal. It is the product of labor. Poverty is normal. Do nothing, and it will arrive at your doorstep—your broken-down doorstep.

Things do not take care of themselves. Men must take care of them. The environment resists alterations by man for man. This is not passive resistance. It is active resistance. That which is normal for nature brings poverty to man. Men must therefore actively resist nature's normal operations in order to achieve their goals. "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return" (Gen. 3:19).³

It is clear throughout the Proverbs that poverty is normal but not normative. It is something to be avoided. Solomon pointed to sloth and slumber as two primary sources of poverty. He did not have to devote space to an explanation of why poverty is something to be avoided. Poverty is a curse. This fact is almost universally recognized.

2. Ibid., ch. 3.

3. Ibid., ch. 12.

B. Overcoming Poverty

The first step, Solomon teaches here, is to avoid the lifestyle of the slothful. This takes a change of heart. This is why Solomon keeps returning to this message. Reformed lazybones, through their capital accumulation and their increased productivity, raise the operational living standards of all men. Poverty is then redefined upward. The West has experienced this, beginning around 1780.

It takes work to clear away thorns and thistles, to replace the fallen stones in fences. Solomon calls his listeners and readers to a life of hard work. This is what it takes to roll back the kingdom of poverty. Sloth is the default mode of mankind, which is why God cursed the land. Men must be motivated to work. Overcoming scarcity is the primary motivation for most people to get out of bed.

There is a saying in the United States: “You can get rich if you work just half a day. It doesn’t matter which half.” This saying recognizes the centrality of labor in overcoming poverty.

Yet hard work alone is not sufficient to overcome poverty. Men must work in order to produce something valuable enough and scarce enough to get paid for. If no one is willing to pay, then the labor will not achieve the goal of overcoming poverty unless God intervenes because He honors the specific work being performed at no pay. Poverty-overcoming work must be buyer-directed work.

Conclusion

The environment was redesigned by God after Adam’s Fall. It was re-designed to thwart man’s plans. It now automatically imposes costs on him. He must give up the things he wants in order to gain things he wants even more. One of the things he must give up is leisure. He has no free time. All of his time must be paid for.

REWARDING OUR ENEMIES

If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink: For thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head, and the LORD shall reward thee (Prov. 25:21–22).

A. Treating Enemies Lawfully

Most of this passage was quoted by Paul:

Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord. Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good (Rom. 12:19–21).¹

This passage establishes a principle of action: we must treat our enemies according to God's law. But we must then go the extra mile (Matt. 5:41).² We must show mercy to them. This has the effect of disarming them. It also disarms us. To do good to our enemies makes us less willing to inflict harm if we are ever in a position to do so. Vengeance is God's, not ours.

This command rests on a fundamental principle: vengeance really is God's. He brings negative sanctions. This passage indicates that he brings these sanctions in history. But the image of coals on a man's head points to the final residence of covenant-breakers.

It rests on a second principle: God brings positive sanctions in history. "The LORD shall reward thee." For showing mercy to an enemy, the covenant-keeper accomplishes two things: (1) he delivers his enemy into God's hands for judgment; (2) he gains positive rewards for himself. This is far better than sitting on the sidelines and seeing an enemy go hungry.

1. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 10.

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 9:D.

What is the cost? First, submission to a law of God. Second, some bread and water. The food is not the best. It sustains the beneficiary for a few hours. It gets him to the next step in his journey. Except in a famine or drought or a war, the cost is minimal.

The contrast between the low cost and the high return is striking. For the cost of bread and water, the covenant-keeper places his enemy under an extreme threat. He delivers him into God's court of justice. If the enemy is also God's enemy, this is a fearful place to be.

This proverb reminds men that their instinctive reaction is incorrect. They want to keep their enemies under a minimal restraint: either hunger or thirst. Their enemies' condition is little more than an annoyance to them, something that can be solved by bread and water. Instead of taking this approach, this proverb says, take an action that will bring the enemy under fearful sanctions.

B. Fearful Negative Sanctions

The passage rests on the assumption that God will impose fearful negative sanctions. This is an Old Testament passage, reaffirmed by Paul. The supposed contrast between the fearful God of the Old Testament and the loving Jesus of the New Testament is negated by this passage. The stated goal of this strategy is to place enemies under fearful negative sanctions. The goal here is revenge, but revenge applied by a specialist in revenge. Rather than revenge autonomously applied by withholding something of very little value, it is revenge of enormous proportions applied by God.

Negative sanctions are legitimate. They are necessary. They are part of the covenantal cause-and-effect system that governs human relationships. They are the foundation of positive sanctions shown to an enemy. But it goes beyond this. Negative sanctions are accompanied by positive sanctions shown to the person who shows low-cost mercy. Positive sanctions also are part of the created system of social causation in history.

This proverb calls covenant-keepers to show mercy in the name of God, who in turn will not show mercy when He gets the opportunity to deal with the recipients of His servant-mediated mercy. This promise points to hell (Luke 16:19–31) and the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14–15).

Men receive God's common grace in history.³ Those who remain covenant-breakers then must suffer eternally for their lack of gratefulness to God for His common grace. The more common grace they have received, the greater their torment in eternity.

And that servant, which knew his lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more (Luke 12:47–48).⁴

The modern world hates Christianity, but people hate it more for its doctrine of hell than any other. Men in the West do not tolerate the thought that God does not tolerate them. This passage indicates just how complete God's hatred of them is. He calls His people to show mercy to them in order that He may punish them for more.

Negative sanctions are part of God's kingdom-building process. The extension of God's kingdom in history is accomplished by the rolling back of Satan's. By bringing the enemies of God under negative sanctions imposed by God, the covenant-keeper extends God's kingdom. The aid provided by bread and water is marginal. The negative sanctions invoked by this act of mercy are not marginal.

Conclusion

The covenant-keeper must show minimal mercy to his enemies. God will reward those who do. This reward includes the positive sanction of seeing one's enemies ruined. Covenant-keepers are encouraged to seek this end because God seeks it. He sets the pattern; His followers should imitate it. This is not the sort of God modern men want to believe in, but it is the only God there is.

This does not mean that covenant-keepers should not pray that their mercy will bring the recipients of mercy to repentance. The goal is the expansion of God's kingdom in history. This can be through either redemption or destruction. Both work well. God initiates both. But here, men are told that positive sanctions produce negative sanctions. The focus is on negative sanctions.

3. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

4. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

THE LABORER'S REWARD

Whoso keepeth the fig tree shall eat the fruit thereof: so he that waiteth on his master shall be honoured (Prov. 27:18).

The imagery of keeping the tree hearkens back to keeping the tree in Eden. “And the LORD God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden to dress it and to keep it” (Gen. 2:15). Yet the Hebrew word for “keep” in Genesis 2:15 is the same as the word for “wait” in this proverb. The two tasks are similar.

The person who takes care of the fig tree establishes a moral claim to the fruit of the tree. Obviously, he is not a hired servant, whose pay is his reward for service. This case is different. The person invests time and effort in caring for the fig tree. He does not do this for the sake of the tree. He does it in expectation of a reward.

This is similar to a servant who serves a master, or should be, says Solomon. The Hebrew word for master here is used throughout the Old Testament for the person at the top of a hierarchy. So close was this master-servant relationship under the Mosaic law that it could be made permanent on request by the servant.

If his master have given him a wife, and she have born him sons or daughters; the wife and her children shall be her master's, and he shall go out by himself. And if the servant shall plainly say, I love my master, my wife, and my children; I will not go out free: Then his master shall bring him unto the judges; he shall also bring him to the door, or unto the door post; and his master shall bore his ear through with an aul; and he shall serve him for ever (Ex. 21:4–6).¹

The servant is subordinate to his master. This proverb indicates that the servant is to exercise the same degree of concern for his master as a husbandman does for his fig tree, whose output he will own. The motivation of the tree-owner is eating or selling the figs. The motivation of the servant is to gain praise from the master. Praise is said to be the equivalent of eating the fruit of one's labor.

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia; Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 32:D:3.

Praise here is seen as a major benefit. This should not be surprising. Entertainers who perform in front of a live audience respond favorably to applause, which is a form of praise. The American comedian Bob Hope was popular longer than any other American entertainer: seven decades. He set a world record with his 61-year contract with the same network (radio and television). The Guinness Book of World Records also lists him as the world's most honored entertainer. He was extremely wealthy, worth several hundred million dollars. Yet he refused to retire until he could no longer perform because of deafness. He died at age 100 in 2003. When asked at age 59 why he had cut short a fishing vacation, he replied, "Fish don't applaud."

Public honor for a servant is a special reward. The servant's task is to serve selflessly. He is not to call attention to himself. Things under his administration should run smoothly. His focus is directed upward, toward his master. The relationship is personal, yet it is also one of reward for services rendered. It is not a father-son hierarchy.

This proverb does not say how the servant will be honored. The Old Testament had no clear concept of final judgment, so the frame of reference was social. Within the context of his role as a servant, he would someday receive honor.

This honor is therefore owed to him, even as figs are owed to the person who cares for the fig tree. The master builds up a debit account over time, one which is not in a household ledger book, but which is a liability nonetheless. Faithful service is a rarity, so the servant is entitled to some form of public recognition. In corporations, a man with decades of service commonly has a party held in his honor at company expense upon his retirement. Superiors make speeches, and the man may be given a symbolic gift, which used to be a gold watch, which was a symbol of his years of predictable service. But this recognition is not the same as that owed to a servant. These men were very often middle-level employees. They were never bound by loyalty to their superiors, but only to the company.

The servant's loyalty is to his master's person. It is also to his master's household. The element of personal service marks the relationship. Honor received in recognition of such service in this context is personal. It is earned. To withhold it is regarded as worse than an oversight. Although it has no market value, because it cannot be sold, it is valuable. The master has an obligation to make public recognition of service rendered.

In Jesus' parable of the talents, this theme of public reward is basic. A ruler leaves his kingdom and places subordinates in charge.

After a long time the lord of those servants cometh, and reckoneth with them. And so he that had received five talents came and brought other five talents, saying, Lord, thou deliveredst unto me five talents: behold, I have gained beside them five talents more. His lord said unto him, Well done, thou good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord (Matt. 25:19–21).²

The grant of authority over many additional things was not part of the master's initial offer. He simply assigned each an area of responsibility: capital. They put this to productive use. They were doing this on his behalf. The parable appears in the section of the New Testament that deals with the final judgment.

So, the proverb regarding predictable praise has implications far beyond the master-servant relationship in a household. The relationship is central to the extension of God's kingdom in history. The servant's care for the master is a form of training. The goal is praise.

Conclusion

The laborer is worthy of his hire (Luke 10:7). In this case, because of the close personal relationship between master and servant, the final payment involves public honoring of the servant. This costs the master no money. It costs him only a public acknowledgment that the servant had made the master's own work more effective, that whatever the master had achieved rests heavily on the performance of his servant. This is too much for some masters to pay. But those who do will reap rewards: greater commitment from servants and hence greater output from them. Over time, those masters who understand and honor the motivation of their servants will replace those who do not. The free market is competitive. It rewards those who achieve greater output per unit of resource input. A servant is a resource input.

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 47.

REDEMPTION AND PRICES

Hell and destruction are never full; so the eyes of man are never satisfied (Prov. 27:20).

Hell in the Old Testament referred to the grave. As surely as graves will not fill up for as long as men are alive, so are the eyes of man not satisfied. The Hebrew word translated as “full” is the same word translated as “satisfied.” To speak of the eyes of man as full does not convey the meaning. The word “satisfied” does.

From the economic point of view, this proverb rivals the importance of the verse describing curse of the ground (Gen. 3:18).¹ Free market economic theory teaches that demand is unlimited at zero price. It also teaches that supplies are always limited: the doctrine of scarcity. This was Adam Smith’s starting point in The Wealth of Nations (1776). The world does not supply at zero cost all the things that men want to use or own. Out of men’s study of the interplay of these two phenomena—demand and supply—has arisen the science of economics.

A. Mises on Discontentment

The economist who has made the most comprehensive use of the principle of permanent dissatisfaction is Ludwig von Mises. In his magnum opus, Human Action (1949), he included a section in Chapter 1 titled, “The Prerequisites of Human Action.” The first prerequisite is discontentment.

We call contentment or satisfaction that state of a human being which does not and cannot result in any action. Acting man is eager to substitute a more satisfactory state of affairs for a less satisfactory.

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

His mind imagines conditions which suit him better, and his action aims at bringing about this desired state. The incentive that impels a man to act is always some sense of uneasiness. A man perfectly content with the state of his affairs would have no incentive to change things.²

Mises was open about the origin of this theory of human action. It rests on hedonism. "The idea that the incentive of human activity is always some uneasiness and its aim always to remove such uneasiness as far as possible, that is, to make the acting men feel happier, is the essence of the teachings of Eudaemonism and Hedonism."³ This is Epicureanism, he says. It has never been refuted. "The theological, mystical, and other schools of a heteronomous ethic did not shake the core of Epicureanism because they could not raise any other objection than its neglect of 'higher' and 'nobler' pleasures."⁴ Mises rejected all such criticisms. Why? Because the individual is autonomous. There is no higher court of appeal.

The ultimate goal of human action is always the satisfaction of the acting man's desire. There is no standard of greater or lesser satisfaction other than individual judgments of value, different for various people and for the same people at various times. What makes a man feel uneasy and less uneasy is established by him from the standard of his own will and judgment, from his personal and subjective valuation. Nobody is in a position to decree what should make a fellow man happier.⁵

B. Destruction and Hedonism

Solomon compares death and destruction with human discontentment. Solomon had enormous wealth and power. In Ecclesiastes, he surveyed a representatively wide range of hedonism's options: the pursuit of pleasure and fame. It is all vanity, he concluded.

I communed with mine own heart, saying, Lo, I am come to great estate, and have gotten more wisdom than all they that have been before me in Jerusalem: yea, my heart had great experience of wisdom and knowledge. And I gave my heart to know wisdom, and to know madness and folly: I perceived that this also is vexation of spirit. For

2. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), p. 13. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

3. Ibid., p. 15.

4. Idem.

5. Ibid., p. 14.

in much wisdom is much grief: and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow. I said in mine heart, Go to now, I will prove thee with mirth, therefore enjoy pleasure: and, behold, this also is vanity (Eccl. 1:16–2:1).

His conclusion was straightforward: “Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil” (Eccl. 12:13–14).⁶

Mises and all those who claim ethical neutrality, methodological neutrality, and value-free analysis are wrong. Man is not autonomous. There are higher standards than those that men in their ethical rebellion adopt for themselves at any point in time. These standards apply in history and will govern the final judgment. God imputes—assigns and evaluates—value to all things, in terms of ethics and in terms of meaning. His imputation establishes the standard of value.

So, it matters what the source of dissatisfaction is. If it is the world’s lack of conformity to God’s standard of value, then dissatisfaction is legitimate. It reflects men’s desire to make things better in history.

Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain (I Cor. 9:24).⁷

Wherefore seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us (Heb. 12:1).

In contrast, the quest for an unlimited and undefined “more” for oneself in history is illegitimate: the religion of mammon. This is an unbounded quest. That is why it is illegitimate: man is finite and bounded. Jesus warned: “No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon” (Matt. 6:24).⁸ Jesus spoke these words of warning to His disciples regarding the dead-end nature of this quest.

6. Gary North, Autonomy and Stagnation: an Economic Commentary on Ecclesiastes (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 45.

7. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 12.

8. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 14.

And he said unto them, Take heed, and beware of covetousness: for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth. And he spake a parable unto them, saying, The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully: And he thought within himself, saying, What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits? And he said, This will I do: I will pull down my barns, and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods. And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry. But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then whose shall those things be, which thou hast provided? So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God (Luke 12:16–21).⁹

And he said unto his disciples, Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat; neither for the body, what ye shall put on. The life is more than meat, and the body is more than raiment. Consider the ravens: for they neither sow nor reap; which neither have storehouse nor barn; and God feedeth them: how much more are ye better than the fowls? And which of you with taking thought can add to his stature one cubit? If ye then be not able to do that thing which is least, why take ye thought for the rest? Consider the lilies how they grow: they toil not, they spin not; and yet I say unto you, that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. If then God so clothe the grass, which is to day in the field, and to morrow is cast into the oven; how much more will he clothe you, O ye of little faith? And seek not ye what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink, neither be ye of doubtful mind. For all these things do the nations of the world seek after: and your Father knoweth that ye have need of these things. But rather seek ye the kingdom of God; and all these things shall be added unto you (Luke 12:22–31).¹⁰

C. Establishing Prices

In a free market, prices are established through competitive bidding. Individuals compete for scarce resources by offering something in exchange. The price system operates in terms of this general rule: “High bid wins.”

The array of prices reflects the competing bids. Covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers compete for resources. They seek to achieve their ends through the means of private property. The New Testament speaks of redemption. Redemption means buying back something originally owned. Jesus bought back the fallen world from God's wrath (common grace). This included individual souls (special grace).¹¹ "But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, To redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons" (Gal. 4:4–5). His work was definitive, meaning complete. His people's representative redemptive work on His behalf is progressive. "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them" (Eph. 2:10).

9. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 25.

10. Ibid., ch. 26.

The price of everything reflects the efforts of all men to establish a kingdom in history: man's or God's. This is the war between mammon and God. It is a covenantal war that encompasses every area of life. The fact that evangelism is called redemption indicates the nature of the process. It involves purchasing the entire world, one item at a time, on behalf of Christ. This involves the whole world.

For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body (Rom. 8:22–23).¹²

For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith, all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted, which did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all (I Cor. 15:25–28).¹³

Ownership is always stewardship. It is never autonomous. The distribution of property, like the array of prices, reflects men's stewardship on behalf of either mammon or God.

11. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

12. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 5.

13. North, Judgment and Dominion, ch. 16.

Conclusion

The eyes of men are never satisfied. There is always more to buy. The question is: By whom and for whom is it being purchased? Secular free market economics focuses on the consumer: the final owner. Socialist economics focuses on the state: the final owner. Biblical economics focuses on God: the original owner, present owner, and final owner.

Each approach has a doctrine of stewardship. The free market economist proclaims the individual as steward on his own behalf and also on behalf of the highest-bidding consumer. The socialist proclaims the state bureaucrat as steward on behalf of the People, who are collectively sovereign. The Christian economist proclaims (or should proclaim) the individual and the association as stewards on behalf of the triune God.

The Christian should be dissatisfied with his previous performance, but not dissatisfied with its outcome.

Not that I speak in respect of want: for I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content. I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound: every where and in all things I am instructed both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need. I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me (Phil. 4:11–13).¹⁴

And having food and raiment let us be therewith content (I Tim. 6:8).¹⁵

Let your conversation be without covetousness; and be content with such things as ye have: for he hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee (Heb. 13:5).

14. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 23.

15. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 10:B:1.

ENTROPY AND CAPITAL

Be thou diligent to know the state of thy flocks, and look well to thy herds. For riches are not for ever: and doth the crown endure to every generation? (Prov. 27:23).

This proverb is directed to those who have amassed capital. It focuses on what might be called the entropy of capital. Without an owner's attention to details, the entropy process takes control. Things grow more chaotic. Economic value declines. Solomon has already described this process. "I went by the field of the slothful, and by the vineyard of the man void of understanding; And, lo, it was all grown over with thorns, and nettles had covered the face thereof, and the stone wall thereof was broken down" (24:30).¹ Care of the flocks, like care of the fields, requires attention to details.

Riches are easily dissipated by heirs. "For riches are not for ever: and doth the crown endure to every generation?" Heirs can squander their inheritance. This reverses the expansion of family wealth over time. A family's dominion is thereby reduced. In the process of redemption—buying back the kingdom of Satan—the dissipation of family capital is a threat.

In good times, the owner is tempted to imagine that they are permanent. This proverb reminds owners that this is not the case. Circumstances change, and he who wants to maintain his capital must adjust accordingly. While successful men prefer to think that they deserve their wealth, this proverb points to the fact of capital dissipation. It takes active efforts to preserve capital.

There is a phrase in agricultural circles: "The best fertilizer is the owner's shadow." Because he cannot oversee everything personally, the owner delegates authority to his employees. They are unlikely to take the same care with his resources as they do with their own. Furthermore, if they were as productive as the owner, they would not be employees. They would own their own businesses. Their skills at making a profit are limited. So, the owner has an economic incentive to monitor the management of his subordinates. This proverb encourages this kind of responsible oversight.

1. Chapter 75.

Solomon asks rhetorically: “Doth the crown endure to every generation?” It does not. What crown? Probably his own. Kingly crowns are passed from father to son. But sons who cannot defend their authority lose their crowns. This happened to Solomon’s son, Rehoboam, with respect to the northern tribes: Israel. They revolted and separated from the nation. He retained authority only over Judah and the tribe of Benjamin (I Kings 12:21). God had revealed to Solomon that this would happen (I Kings 11:11–13).

Conclusion

This proverb is simple. It advises people with capital to “mind the store.” Things do not autonomously take care of themselves. God requires owners and managers, as good stewards of His capital, to monitor it. Someone must monitor capital. This service is not done at zero cost. It must be paid for. This means that purely passive income is a form of capital consumption. This proverb warns against passive income. Passive income is an illusion.

THE MYTH OF VALUE-FREE ECONOMIC THEORY

Better is the poor that walketh in his uprightness, than he that is perverse in his ways, though he be rich (Prov. 28:6).

A. Righteousness Above Wealth

This proverb reminds men that righteousness is more important than wealth. It is an extension of Proverbs 1:1–4.¹ Few religions have ever taught anything else. Even murderous cults, such as thuggee, have a concept of ethics governing those inside the cult.

Throughout history, people have taught their children this principle. Also throughout history, men have pursued wealth at the expense of ethics. The lure of great wealth is so powerful that people with the ability to get rich through evil actions have done so. They have abandoned the ethical principles they learned in their youth and in school.

This proverb makes a value judgment. It does not pretend to be ethically neutral. It does not deal with means to the neglect of ends. It makes a judgment regarding ends and means. The end of great wealth, when attained through ethically perverse means, is not worth the cost. To make plain the extent of the high cost of perversity, Solomon compares the rich man with a poor man. The poor man is better off than the rich man. The deciding factor is ethics, not wealth.

Solomon does not hesitate to tell his listeners which condition is best. The suggestion of modern free market economists that such a judgment is not scientifically valid, because it makes interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility, would not have impressed Solomon. This is because God does not begin with the hypothetically autonomous value scale of the acting individual. He begins instead with His covenant with mankind, which has established a system of moral cause and effect in society.

1. Chapter 1.

Christian economics makes no pretense of value neutrality. Value neutrality is a myth, and a highly unneutral one, given the fact of God's assertion of absolute sovereignty. Value neutrality constitutes a rebellion against God and His covenant. Its defenders assume that each individual is autonomous. But on such a basis, there can be no scientifically valid universal ethical system, including the ethics of neutrality.

Such an assertion of individual men's autonomy is inherently a form of nominalism: every man is a king, no man is a servant. Reality is whatever individual men think it is. Each person imputes meaning to the universe. But he does not impute corporate meaning. What he imputes has authority only for himself.

Under such a philosophy, the quest for wealth and power easily becomes an obsession. If the universe reflects what an individual thinks and does, then to gain immunity from other men's rival imputations and power, the self-proclaimed autonomous individual must seek to establish his own authority. This outlook leads to the error described in this proverb: seeking wealth perversely. Wealth is seen as a means of buying immunity and power.

Who imputes good or evil, success or failure, to anyone or any group? God does. Deny God this ability, and you must attribute it to something else. The state has been an obvious candidate through the ages. For a few theorists, the free market has replaced God as the agency of imputation. But the free market is merely the social arrangement that has developed as a result of the concept of private property. This concept rests on ethics: "Thou shalt not steal." "The Lord is not a respecter of persons." "Do not move thy neighbor's landmark." The free market has no external source of legitimacy in a world without God or permanent ethics. Everything is said to evolve. Power-seekers then seek to direct evolutionary forces to their benefit.²

B. Poverty

Poverty is best defined as a lack of affordable options. The individual poor man has fewer choices than a rich man does. It appears that a poor man operates at the mercy of the wealthy or else in the shadows, where the wealthy pay no attention. Poverty is the absence of immunity. Poverty is weakness.

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), Appendix A.

Then why should Solomon insist that a poor man in his righteousness is better than a rich man in his perversity? What did he mean, better? The Hebrew word can be translated “good,” in the sense of righteousness. As in English, it can also mean valuable, as in “good land.” It can be translated as “prosperity.” “Thou shalt not seek their peace nor their prosperity all thy days for ever” (Deut. 23:6). It can mean “better off.” “And wherefore hath the LORD brought us unto this land, to fall by the sword, that our wives and our children should be a prey? were it not better for us to return into Egypt?” (Num. 14:3).

Then why is righteousness in poverty better than perversity in prosperity? This proverb does not say, but there is enough information in the Bible to answer the question. “Thou shalt be perfect with the LORD thy God” (Deut. 18:13). “Let your heart therefore be perfect with the LORD our God, to walk in his statutes, and to keep his commandments, as at this day” (I Kings 8:61). Jesus warned: “Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect” (Matt. 5:48).

In contrast is the rich perverse man. His condition was summed up by Jesus. “For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?” (Matt. 16:26).³

Conclusion

There is no neutrality. There is also no neutral science. Neutrality is always a disguise for man’s pretended autonomy. It begins with a presupposition: whatever is logical for all men is neutral. First, there is this problem: all men never agree on what is logical. There are many forms of logic, and lots of illogical men. Second, God establishes what is logical and true; men’s individual minds do not.

There is ethical causation in history. The Bible teaches that societies that adopt laws that are more consistent with biblical laws get richer than societies whose laws are less consistent with biblical laws (Lev. 26; Deut. 28). In contrast, for individuals there can be anomalies (Ps. 73). So, this proverb brings us to the great religious rivals, God and mammon, by way of anomalies: righteous poverty and perverse wealth. Better the former than the latter, this proverb teaches.

3. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 35.

THE DISINHERITANCE OF COVENANT-BREAKERS

He that by usury and unjust gain increaseth his substance, he shall gather it for him that will pity the poor (Prov. 28:8).

This proverb is a variation of another: “A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children’s children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just” (Prov. 13:22).¹ It presents a view of economic causation that is tied directly to ethics. Righteousness is a predictable source of wealth. The generous will inherit. This proverb is not saying that righteousness is its own reward. It is saying that righteousness brings positive economic sanctions in this life. It also announces that unrighteousness is a predictable source of impoverishment: gathering for others. Bad actions produce bad results. The world is not ethically random.

It takes things a step further. It says that he who devotes his efforts to unrighteousness ultimately is working on behalf of the person who deals righteously with people. Previously, Solomon announced that the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just. Here, he repeats this assertion.

This system of covenantal economic causation does not announce that the good do well and the evil do poorly. It says that the good do well at the expense of evildoers. It is not that there are two fields of grain, with one field flourishing and the other field blighted. It goes far beyond this. It says that the output of one field will benefit the owner of the other field.

A. Dominion Through Inheritance

This proverb rests on a concept of inheritance that is unique to the Mosaic covenant. This concept of inheritance is symbolized by the conquest of Canaan. That was a conquest by force, a one-time event. But the nature of the transaction is clear from this proverb: inheritance through disinheritance.

1. Chapter 41.

And it shall be, when the LORD thy God shall have brought thee into the land which he swore unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give thee great and goodly cities, which thou buildedst not, And houses full of all good things, which thou filledst not, and wells digged, which thou diggedst not, vineyards and olive trees, which thou plantedst not; when thou shalt have eaten and be full; Then beware lest thou forget the LORD, which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage. Thou shalt fear the LORD thy God, and serve him, and shalt swear by his name (Deut. 6:10–13).

The covenant-breaker labors to build up an inheritance that he can pass on to his heirs. He makes himself a name. He leaves behind a legacy. The concept of intergenerational wealth transfer is inherent in humanity. This is an aspect of the dominion covenant. Adam was supposed to multiply and fill the earth. The concept of economic growth as stewardship on behalf of God is misapplied by covenant-breakers, who labor for themselves. The goal of dominion through expansion of wealth is legitimate (Deut. 28:1–14).² The question is: Dominion on whose behalf?

This proverb reinforces the earlier one, which clearly places wealth in the context of inheritance. The sense of long-term inheritance through the transfer of accumulated wealth is inescapable. This proverb is less forthright regarding the context of inheritance. The phrase, “he shall gather it for him that will pity the poor,” does not specify a time frame. It does not indicate when the wealth transfer will take place: in the lifetime of the covenant-breaker or in his heirs’ lifetimes. This proverb is silent on whether this transfer will be intergenerational or not. The man who uses unethical practices to accumulate wealth may not see his capital transferred to a righteous man of his own generation. But Solomon gives a warning to every such person: the end result of his efforts will be to enlarge the inheritance of his covenantal enemies.

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

B. Kingdoms in Conflict

This is God's message to Satan throughout history. The kingdom of God will replace the kingdom of Satan, not just in eternity, but also in time. "And the LORD God said unto the serpent, Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field; upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life: And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel" (Gen. 3:14–15). This will be manifested in civil rule.

Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing? The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against the LORD, and against his anointed, saying, Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us. He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh: the Lord shall have them in derision (Ps. 2:1–4).

A Psalm of David. The LORD said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool. The LORD shall send the rod of thy strength out of Zion: rule thou in the midst of thine enemies (Ps. 110:1–2).

This principle of dominion applies in economic affairs in the same way. The expansion of God's kingdom in history is not limited to one manifestation of His covenantal order, but extends to all. The conquest is comprehensive because redemption is comprehensive.³

This proverb teaches that the covenant-breaker may well be able to expand his control over wealth through usury. He can increase his wealth by lending at interest to covenant-keepers who are in poverty through no fault of their own. This proverb does not say that unrighteousness produces losses from beginning to end. On the contrary, it affirms that the covenant-breaker can build up wealth. It says only that this wealth will eventually wind up under the control of a covenant-keeper. This is the essence of the dominion covenant: the steady replacement of covenant-breakers by covenant-keepers. The social world operates in terms of a covenantal order that elevates ethics over all other sources of economic success.

Why is this historical process not obvious to covenant-breakers and covenant-keepers alike? Why are two proverbs necessary to remind economic actors of the nature of economic causation? One answer is that covenant-breakers suppress the truth (Rom. 1:18–22).⁴ But this does not explain why covenant-keepers seem equally blind to economic causation. The most likely answer is the long-term nature of this process of wealth transfer. Asaph suffered from an inability to see that covenant-keepers' success would eventually lead to their destruction.

3. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

For I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked. For there are no bands in their death: but their strength is firm. They are not in trouble as other men; neither are they plagued like other men. Therefore pride compasseth them about as a chain; violence covereth them as a garment. Their eyes stand out with fatness: they have more than heart could wish. They are corrupt, and speak wickedly concerning oppression: they speak loftily (Ps. 73:3–8).

But Asaph eventually came to his senses. "Until I went into the sanctuary of God; then understood I their end. Surely thou didst set them in slippery places: thou castedst them down into destruction. How are they brought into desolation, as in a moment! they are utterly consumed with terrors" (Ps. 73:17–19).

Conclusion

Economic causation is covenantal. It is hierarchical, because God controls events. It is ethical, because God establishes rules of right and wrong. It is predictable, because God governs through a system of sanctions. Finally, it is eschatological, because of the structure of inheritance in history: inheritance through disinheritance.

This proverb reflects the covenantal structure of kingdom history. Satan is disinherited in history. This means that, for a time, he accumulates capital that is worth inheriting in history. He build up a kingdom. Then he loses it. Sometimes redemption is strictly by purchase. Covenant-keepers buy back the kingdoms of man. They offer for sale what covenant-breakers want. They exchange trinkets for ownership of long-term, culture-transforming capital. But they also inherit. The ideal way is through conversion. The heirs of rich sinners transfer allegiance to a new king and a new kingdom. In doing so, they disinherit their forefathers, who had other goals for their wealth.

4. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd. (Dallas, Georgia: [2000] 2012), ch. 2.

PATHWAY TO SUCCESS

He that tilleth his land shall have plenty of bread: but he that followeth after vain persons shall have poverty enough (Prov. 28:19).

This is a variation of Proverbs 12:11: “He that tilleth his land shall be satisfied with bread: but he that followeth vain persons is void of understanding.”¹ The contrast there is between steady though uninspiring physical labor vs. following the schemes and dreams of vain (empty) people. Here, the contrast is between plenty of bread and “poverty enough.” This is a poetic phrase. Solomon could have said “poverty” and conveyed the idea. But “poverty enough” puts an edge to it, a kind of ridicule. It raises the question: Poverty enough to do what? The idea here is sufficient poverty to make God’s point.

A. Unreliable Leaders

What is God’s point? This: there are vain people in every society who lure unsuspecting and naive followers into making economically disastrous decisions. These people thrive on having followers. They get a sense of satisfaction out of the deference shown to them, even if this deference comes from people with minimal ethical awareness. Solomon reminds his readers of the danger associated with following such people. The end result is poverty.

But why would anyone follow vain leaders? The implication is that the followers are unwilling to submit to the requirements of conventional labor: tilling one’s own land. Such labor is undistinguished in an agricultural society. The fact that a man owns land, tools, and seed does not distinguish him from all the other farmers who also own land, tools, and seed. It distinguishes him from field hands who own no land, tools, or seed, but he does not have his eye on those whom he might employ. He has his eyes on his peers. He wishes to stand out from them in the way that he stands out from field hands: higher.

1. Chapter 36.

Most people dream of attaining personal distinction in life. They want to be remembered as people who stood out from the crowd in some way, even if this means joining another crowd. Becoming the follower of an unconventional person who has the gift of attracting followers seems to many people to be the pathway to distinction. Men seek distinction through being represented by significant people. The fact that these people are empty does not register in the thinking of their followers.

Solomon says that it is wise to stick with what is conventional and thereby put bread on the table rather than venturing into unknown realms as followers of vain people. Stick with the tried and true. If you fail to stand out from the crowd, but you have bread on your table, you are better off than dreaming of wealth untold in the entourage of vain people.

B. Conventional Roads to Success

This proverb affirms tilling as the road to success, with success defined as bread on the table. This is an affirmation of conventional labor, long and hard, in the mid-summer sun. It affirms a theory of conventional labor. He who wishes to escape from this conventional pathway to success is opening himself to poverty-inducing leadership by vain people.

Until the advent of mass agricultural production, which accelerated rapidly with mechanical harvesters in the 1840s, and also with the transportation revolution of the railroads, which began in the same decade, most people tilled the soil for a living. They did not produce enough food to support a predominately urban society. Most people lived on farms, whether they raised grains or edible-wearable animals. A farmer pursued a vocation that extended back into the mists of unrecorded history. This occupation has been the archetype of conventional production.

The Bible speaks of bread as the symbol of life: that which sustains life. It teaches that bread is necessary but insufficient for sustaining life. Moses spoke to the generation of the conquest, reminding them of God's four decades of miracles in the wilderness: "And he humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know; that he might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the LORD doth man live" (Deut. 8:3). This was spoken about a generation that lived in the presence of constant daily miracles. These miracles occurred in order to confirm their faith in God. But the manna ceased after the nation crossed the Jordan River and entered the promised land (Josh. 5:12). Their faith in God was supposed to remain intact, despite the removal of daily miracles.² Jesus quoted Moses' words: "But he answered and said, It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God" (Matt. 4:4). This was a warning against the quest for miracles—turning stones into bread—as a substitute for faith.³

In Canaan, farming replaced manna-gathering. The drudgery of daily labor in the fields became the basis of success from then on. But this was not the only basis of success. Adherence to God's covenantal legal order was also required (Deut. 28:1–14).⁴ It was this combination of conventional labor and adherence to biblical law that repelled (and still repels) those who seek personal success by identifying with vain people, who offer other, less rigorous avenues to success.

Conclusion

The common visual representation of a traditional farmer tilling his fields is a picture of a man behind a plow. Pulling the plow is an ox or a mule or a water buffalo. The common visual representation of a traditional follower of vain persons is a picture of a huge political rally. At the center is a now-dead, notorious, and defeated politician raising his fist. His victorious enemies paint the pictures and publish the archived photos. These images are essentially correct.

There is a famous painting of an old man, head bowed, giving prayerful thanks for a loaf of bread. In front of him on the table is an old, fat book—probably a Bible—with his metal-rimmed glasses folded on top of it. This is the most accurate visual representation of all. He is no longer of working age, but he has a full loaf of bread in front of him. He did not follow vain men.

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 18.

3. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 1.

4. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 69.

NO SHORTCUTS TO SUCCESS

A faithful man shall abound with blessings: but he that maketh haste to be rich shall not be innocent (Prov. 28:20).

He that hasteth to be rich hath an evil eye, and considereth not that poverty shall come upon him (Prov. 28:22).

These are reinforcing proverbs. A common warning is given to a person who is impatient in his goal to gain riches. Proverbs 28:20 indicates that riches are legitimate. What is not legitimate is riches as a goal. “Labour not to be rich: cease from thine own wisdom” (Prov. 23:4).¹ Even less legitimate is the desire to get rich quick.

A. Positive Sanctions in History

In verse 20, we are informed of the way to positive sanctions in life: faithfulness. Faithfulness is an attribute of God. “And the heavens shall praise thy wonders, O LORD: thy faithfulness also in the congregation of the saints” (Ps. 89:5). What this proverb says regarding an individual, Deuteronomy 28:1–14 says of Israel as a nation. “And all these blessings shall come on thee, and overtake thee, if thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God” (Deut. 28:2). “The LORD shall command the blessing upon thee in thy storehouses, and in all that thou settest thine hand unto; and he shall bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee” (Deut. 28:8).²

This proverb says the blessings shall abound. This indicates considerable wealth. It is not speaking of a comfortable life. It is speaking of a life marked by exceptional blessings. This need not be limited to wealth. The passage in Deuteronomy 28 is comprehensive in its description of the variety of blessings. This proverb indicates something comparable for the individual.

1. Chapter 72.

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

Then why does Solomon warn against riches more than once? Why is something which is a legitimate outcome of faithfulness not legitimate as a personal goal? If there is a predictable covenantal relationship between ends and means, why are the means legitimate, the end legitimate, but not the goal of attaining the end? Why would Solomon encourage faithfulness by pointing to the positive sanctions that result from faithfulness, yet warn people not to pursue riches?

B. Success vs. Success Indicators

There are success indicators in life, yet they do not always indicate success. Here is a familiar example. A student is encouraged to learn. To aid him in his quest for knowledge, the teacher enforces a system of sanctions: grades. Poor grades indicate a lack of success in gaining knowledge. Good grades indicate success. The student is then motivated to achieve good grades. He learns the tricks of taking examinations. His grades rise. He learns how to take shortcuts on studying. His grades rise. He finds that he can cram for an exam the night before the exam and get better grades, although whenever he does this, he forgets most of what he has studied as soon as the exam is over. His grades rise. At some point, the pursuit of good grades undermines his quest for knowledge.

It may go beyond this. He may find ways to cheat on the exams. The quest for good grades then undermines his morality. The success indicators no longer measure his success. They measure his failure.

In every field of life, this dilemma appears. It is a universal problem. Success indicators do not automatically detect performances that are based on illegitimate means—means that are counter-productive to the end for which the indicators were designed. No matter what the objective indicators of success are, they can be misused by performers when adopted as ends in themselves.

Money is a universal success indicator. There are few others that are valued more highly. Of those indicators that are readily measured, only life extension is higher on most men's scales of value, at least when death is imminent. Yet even here, mere temporal extension of life can become a false standard. A man may be granted a longer life for betraying something or someone. Every society has standards that are said to be superior to life extension. But these are not equally measurable: honor, integrity, and reliability. Money and time are supremely objective and universally honored. This is why they are morally dangerous. But money is more dangerous than time, for it is exchangeable at all times. There may not be a buyer for whatever one is willing to give up in order to gain extra time. There is always a ready market for money.

The Bible is clear on this point: riches alone are illegitimate as a success indicator. Blessings are more comprehensive than riches. To the extent that someone defines success exclusively as riches, he has misunderstood life's proper goal. Such a person is easily tempted to adopt means to riches that are inconsistent with covenantally defined blessings. If a person's sole end is money, the means selected are likely to be illegitimate. If the means are illegitimate, the end will be the opposite of the goal sought. "He that hasteth to be rich hath an evil eye, and considereth not that poverty shall come upon him" (v. 22).

Conclusion

God's blessings are a legitimate goal in life. They are basic to covenantal cause and effect. But the moral cause is more precious than the measurable effect. Men should remain faithful to God even in cases where the immediate effect is negative. The positive blessings are God's means to confirm the legitimacy of the moral means. Moral cause and positive effect together confirm God's covenant. "But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day" (Deut. 8:18).³

Riches are the outcome of a life of covenantal faithfulness. He who seeks shortcuts to wealth is like the student who seeks shortcuts to wisdom. He will not only not achieve his goal, he will achieve its opposite: poverty.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 22.

THE POOR MAN'S JUDICIAL CAUSE

The righteous considereth the cause of the poor: but the wicked regardeth not to know it (Prov. 29:7).

The issue here is the system of justice. A poor person comes into a court of law, and the righteous person considers his case. The wicked pay no attention. This is what Jeremiah later identified as the ethical condition of Israel.

Your iniquities have turned away these things, and your sins have withholden good things from you. For among my people are found wicked men: they lay wait, as he that setteth snares; they set a trap, they catch men. As a cage is full of birds, so are their houses full of deceit: therefore they are become great, and waxen rich. They are waxen fat, they shine: yea, they overpass the deeds of the wicked: they judge not the cause, the cause of the fatherless, yet they prosper; and the right of the needy do they not judge. Shall I not visit for these things? saith the LORD: shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this? (Jer. 5:25–29).

The context is civil judgment. God warned the Israelites that they had to obey His law. “Ye shall do my judgments, and keep mine ordinances, to walk therein: I am the LORD your God” (Lev. 18:4). This is repeated over and over in the Mosaic law. The rule of law was to govern Israel. “Ye shall have one manner of law, as well for the stranger, as for one of your own country: for I am the LORD your God” (Lev. 24:22).¹ Everyone inside the boundaries of Israel came under biblical law. “Ye shall not respect persons in judgment; but ye shall hear the small as well as the great; ye shall not be afraid of the face of man; for the judgment is God’s: and the cause that is too hard for you, bring it unto me, and I will hear it" (Deut. 1:17).²

1. For the exegesis of this principle, see my comments on Exodus 12:49. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 14.

This proverb, like the Mosaic law as a whole, in no way authorizes the perversion of justice on behalf of the poor. It does not teach, nor did the Mosaic law teach, that the poor man is entitled to anything except an impartial application of the Mosaic law to his case. "Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty: but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour" (Lev. 19:15). This law is opposed to the welfare state's programs of coercive wealth-redistribution.³

The wicked person ignores the cause of the poor man. Note: this does not say that he ignores the cause of the poor man's poverty. He ignores his cause, meaning his judicial case against an opponent. This is a strictly judicial matter, not an economic matter. The Mosaic law was clear: the judge must not respect persons, meaning favor one person or the other in a lawsuit based on the person's national origin or economic condition. The New Testament is equally clear. "For there is no respect of persons with God" (Rom. 2:11). God's court is the model. "But he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons" (Col. 3:25). A court must not care what a person owns, only what he has done. It must seek to reflect God's judgment.

The wicked man in this proverb pays no attention to the poor man's cause or case. He is unconcerned with the outcome of the court. He has no concern with justice. He is ignorant of the principle of the rule of law. He is unaware of such matters. This proverb does not say that he is a self-conscious oppressor. He is barely conscious at all, judicially speaking.

This is a wicked person, this proverb says. Such a lack of concern with the law of God is the mark of a wicked person. To turn a blind eye to the judicial cause of the poor is to imagine that God is equally blind and also does not care. The Bible insists that God does care. "Shall I not visit for these things? saith the LORD: shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this?" (Jer. 5:29).

Conclusion

He who turns a blind eye to the poor's judicial cause is a wicked

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 4.

3. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 14.

person. Why? Because he disregards the rule of law. But if this is the reason, then he who turns a blind eye to the rich man's judicial cause is also a wicked person. "Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty: but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour" (Lev. 19:15).

The modern-day defender of the welfare state turns a blind eye to the judicial cause of the rich man. The law punishes the rich man, not for breaking a statute, but for achieving success.

Both the rich man and the poor man should be protected by the terms of biblical law. They should both be secure in their property, their marriages, and their liberties. Both should seek to extend God's kingdom in history. Neither should therefore infringe on the other's God-assigned stewardship responsibilities.

A MIDDLE-CLASS LIFESTYLE

Two things have I required of thee; deny me them not before I die: Remove far from me vanity and lies: give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me: Lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the LORD? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain (Prov. 30:7–9).

Here, Solomon equates vanity and lies with both poverty and riches. Yet he was very rich. He was rich enough to support 700 wives and 300 concubines (I Kings 11:3). Why would he warn men against riches? Possibly because of what he had learned from having 700 wives and 300 concubines.

A. A Warning Against Riches

Are the two requests related? Yes. A person with great wealth is under constant pressure to spend his money in ways that benefit suppliers of motivation. These motivation-suppliers are called salesmen. They sell vanity. They also sell lies. Of course, vanity and lies are not sold as vanity and lies. They are disguised. They are packaged as must-have and must-do items. They are sold by means of deception, so their essence is lies. Inside the packaging is vanity: emptiness.

Solomon uses food as the representative symbol of what he seeks. He asks for neither too much nor too little food. If he has too much food, he will become full. When he is full, he will deny God. He will say, “Who is the Lord?” This response is what Moses had warned against. God had fed them in the wilderness with manna, Moses reminded the generation of the conquest. Here was the great temptation: “And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth. But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day”

(Deut. 8:17–18).¹

On the other hand, a person with too little food is hungry. He may capitulate to his hunger by stealing food. The heart of this sin is to bring God's name into disrepute, to "take the name of my God in vain." Why is this the case? Because of the five-point covenantal structure of the Ten Commandments: a parallel pair of five commandments, the first priestly and the second kingly.²

The third commandment places a legal boundary around God's name. "Thou shalt not take the name of the LORD thy God in vain; for the LORD will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain" (Ex. 20:7).³ Boundaries are an aspect of part three of the five-point biblical covenant.⁴ Commandment three is in the first group of five commandments, dealing with priestly matters. The eighth commandment is the prohibition against theft. "Thou shalt not steal" (Ex. 20:15). This commandment is the third in the second series of five, dealing with kingly matters. It places a legal boundary around property.⁵ By stealing, which is a boundary violation of property, a covenant-keeper necessarily also takes God's name in vain. As a covenantal representative of God, he brings God into disrepute.

B. Middle-Class Income

The proper goal is middle-class income. Whatever the distribution of wealth is at any point in time, the covenant-keeper should seek middle-class income. He should not seek poverty, which is generally a curse. He should not seek riches, which is generally a curse. The cursed aspect of the first condition is more readily apparent than the second condition, but this proverb indicates that both are more likely to be curses than blessings. Poverty is a curse because it reflects the curse of the ground (Gen. 3:17–19): more weeds than fruit. Riches are a curse because they bring great temptation. Jesus affirmed this cursed

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 22.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), Preface.

3. Ibid., ch. 23.

4. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstyp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

5. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 28.

status of riches when He said, “Verily I say unto you, That a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven. And again I say unto you, It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God” (Matt. 19:23b–24).⁶

When men seek riches, they do not compare riches in history with poverty in eternity. “For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?” (Matt. 16:26).⁷ Instead, they compare riches in history with poverty in history. They then choose riches over poverty.

So, the question of wealth arises: “Compared to what?” Most Americans, Canadians, Western Europeans, Australians, New Zealanders, and Japanese are middle class. They think of themselves as middle class. Yet in terms of the distribution wealth worldwide, they are upper class. They are the dominant groups in the top 20% of the world’s population, who own 80% of the capital. To be in the middle class in the United States in the early years of the twenty-first century is to be wealthy by the world’s standards.

So, when people think of themselves as middle class, they think of their neighbors. In the United States, we have a phrase: “Keeping up with the Joneses.” The Jones family lives next door, or else lives in the circle of acquaintances in which we travel. We judge our economic success in terms of what we can see of theirs. Presumably, they do the same with us.

This is a serious error. First, we do not know about their level of consumer debt. They may be at the ragged edge of bankruptcy. Second, they are not representative of the masses of the world’s population. There are billions of people who live in such poverty that middle-class Westerners cannot empathize with them. We have no criteria for comparison. Even the poor people we may see on the streets are wealthy by comparison. We see a mentally disturbed person walking up and down a downtown sidewalk, pushing a shopping cart full of junk. That shopping cart represents a capital base not shared by a billion poor people in the unpaved streets of Asia.

C. Class Morality

It has long been common among the heirs of upper-class fortunes

6. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 38.

7. Ibid., ch. 35.

to dismiss middle-class morality. From Great Britain's Puritan era in the late sixteenth century to the Victorian era in the late nineteenth century to the jet set today, middle-class people have been likely to be tradesmen, entrepreneurs, and skilled professionals. For centuries, they were dismissed by the landed ruling classes as either middle class or on their way to becoming newly rich. Money-grubbing was not for the rich. The Puritans and their social successors, the Protestant dissenters, favored hard work, thrift, attention to business details, and customer service. This was correctly viewed as middle-class morality by the ruling classes, whose wealth was protected by primogeniture laws (oldest son inherits all) and entail laws (forbidding the sale of an oldest son's land). Members of the ruling landed class could gamble their land away, but their gambling peers were of the same class.

The working classes had a similar contempt for middle-class morality, much preferring the lifestyle of the rich and famous, which was their lifestyle, but without the money to fund it. The features of these lifestyles were the same, but the poor could afford them only part-time: leisure (unemployment), gambling, partying (gin mills), and mistresses (prostitutes).

Middle-class living has a tendency over time to produce economic growth. It produces steadily rising income. From monks who took vows of poverty in the medieval era, and whose orders grew rich over centuries as a result of hard work and reinvested capital, to immigrant Jews whose sons became lawyers and accountants, and whose grandsons became media moguls and real estate tycoons, the story has been the same: middle-class morality produces society-wide economic growth and occasional individual wealth. Two percent growth per annum, compounded over two and a half centuries, has produced the modern world. In contrast, the lifestyle of the rich and famous rests on capital consumption. Eventually the heirs run out of money.

Middle-class morality is biblical morality. It is the bedrock foundation of wealth accumulation. When men pray for middle-class income and then work for it, their heirs become incomparably rich by the criteria of their grandparents. My grandparents were born in a world without automobiles, airplanes, commercial electricity, radio, and most of the other common features of middle-class life in the West. Their grandparents were born in a world without railroads, steamships, anesthetics, or even something as common as toilet paper. Their grandparents' grandparents were born in a world that would have been recognizable by Moses. This transformation of the world

did not take very long.⁸

Two percent per annum, either up or down, is barely observable in any area of life. Yet over decades, such slow, directional change will transform the social landscape. Middle-class morality can be maintained in the conditions of compound economic growth, just as it was in North America from 1750 to 1960. But if it declines at a steady rate—the divorce rate or the illegitimacy rate—over time, it erodes the foundations of positive growth (Deut. 28:15–68). Such social orders are eventually replaced (Deut. 8:19–20).⁹

D. Compounding Responsibility

As wealth grows, responsibility grows. Ownership is inescapably a social function.¹⁰ The owner of every asset is a steward acting on behalf of God the Creator, but this stewardship must be manifested in history. Other men, made in God's image and also acting as His stewards, bid for ownership or control over every scarce resource, which is what defines a scarce resource. The owner must decide what to do with his property. Whose bid will he accept, including his own? He can consume it, invest it, let it waste away on its own, or give it away. He must make a choice. There are no choices without personal responsibility. The more we own, the more choices we have, and therefore the more responsibility we have. Jesus warned:

And that servant, which knew his lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more (Luke 12:47–48).¹¹

This being the case, there had better be a parallel development: moral decision-making and economic decision-making. A person had

8. John Tyler, President of the United States in 1841–45, was born in the first term of George Washington's presidency (1790), less than a year after the French Revolution began. His grandson, Harrison Ruffin Tyler, is still alive (2012) and lives on his grandfather's land. His brother Lyon is also alive. I interviewed him in December 2010.

9. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 23.

10. Gary North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 28. (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>) better get rich slowly, because he improves his understanding of moral causation slowly. He develops his moral skills slowly. Theologians call this process progressive sanctification. Wealth accumulated over decades is not the threat to a person that overnight wealth is. Overnight wealth is far easier to achieve than overnight moral maturity. The only widely sought-after goal more dangerous than “get rich quick” is “get power quick.”

11. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

A man should learn how to handle his wealth through experience—experience evaluated in terms of God’s Bible-revealed law. He should learn from others’ experience, too. These others are likely to be people in his own social circle and economic class. The upper classes’ contempt of newly rich people has rested on an accurate insight. The newly rich do not “mind their manners,” i.e., are unfamiliar with the rules of polite society, which is confident about its future because it has long held the reins of both wealth and power. The newly rich are still intent on “making it,” when their concern should be focused on “conserving it.” Yet the rich and powerful are rarely reliable judges of what is required to conserve social order. They have abandoned middle-class morality.

Conclusion

This proverb warns against both riches and poverty. We readily understand the warning against poverty. But few people pray, or have ever prayed, against riches. Solomon did not pray soon enough. He prayed for wisdom (II Chron. 2:10), received wisdom (I Kings 4:29–30) and riches (I Chron. 29:4), and then lost wisdom (I Kings 11:4). His son lost most of his kingdom. Solomon would have been better off with wisdom in a cave than wisdom and riches in a palace. He would have been a far better prophet than a king. We would still read two of his books, which are more prophetic than kingly. As for his Song, one wife would have been sufficient. Better one wife like her than 699 like the other ones he married, let alone the 300 concubines without dowries.

VIRTUE AND PRODUCTIVITY

Who can find a virtuous woman? for her price is far above rubies (Prov. 31:10).

A. A Virtuous Woman

This introduces the longest section in the Bible describing the characteristics of a virtuous woman. The advice comes from a woman. “The words of king Lemuel, the prophecy that his mother taught him” (Prov. 31:1). The passage leads to a conclusion. “Favour is deceitful, and beauty is vain: but a woman that feareth the LORD, she shall be praised” (31:30). This is surely good advice to every son. Solomon ignored it on a scale unmatched in recorded history. But his end confirmed it.

And he had seven hundred wives, princesses, and three hundred concubines: and his wives turned away his heart. For it came to pass, when Solomon was old, that his wives turned away his heart after other gods: and his heart was not perfect with the LORD his God, as was the heart of David his father. For Solomon went after Ashtoreth the goddess of the Zidonians, and after Milcom the abomination of the Ammonites. And Solomon did evil in the sight of the LORD, and went not fully after the LORD, as did David his father (I Kings 11:3–6)

Wherefore the LORD said unto Solomon, Forasmuch as this is done of thee, and thou hast not kept my covenant and my statutes, which I have commanded thee, I will surely rend the kingdom from thee, and will give it to thy servant. Notwithstanding in thy days I will not do it for David thy father’s sake: but I will rend it out of the hand of thy son (I Kings 11:11–12).

B. Value Measured in Rubies

There is a familiar phrase, “as good as gold.” The phrase here presents an even more favorable comparison: “Her price is far above rubies.” It indicates that a man with a virtuous wife would be foolish to sell her for rubies if such a market existed. This is poetic, not literal. It does not mean that there was an active market for wives in Solomon’s day, in which men bid for other men’s wives. (Such a practice did exist—illegally but traditionally—in Great Britain for several centuries, ending only in the late nineteenth century. A man who was tired of his wife would bring her into the town square, where men bid for her. The highest bidder got her.)¹

The comparison is economic: the price of a wife in terms of the price of multiple rubies. Yet the passage deals with a virtuous woman. The connection between her virtue and her family’s increased wealth is inescapable. There is no passage in the Bible that is more detailed in this regard. Proverbs presents a series of pithy snippets on the ways to wealth. It then culminates with this, the key passage in the Bible on the ways to wealth.

C. Trustworthy

“The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her, so that he shall have no need of spoil” (v. 11). What has spoil—confiscated military booty—have to do with a wife? Nothing. The translators did a poor job here. The New American Standard Bible is on target: “He will have no lack of gain.” The rest of the chapter describes why he will have no lack of gain.

This raises a question: What has his trust in her got to do with his prosperity? There are two answers: income and outgo. She makes money as an entrepreneur, and she also buys carefully. She watches the ledger.

The woman is reliable: trustworthy. “She will do him good and not evil all the days of her life” (v. 12). What is the nature of this good? “She seeketh wool, and flax, and worketh willingly with her hands” (v. 13). The Hebrew word translated as “willingly” is elsewhere translated as “pleasure” or “desire.” It indicates an active, enthusiastic performance of duties. “She is like the merchants’ ships; she bringeth her food from afar” (v. 14). A merchant journeys to distant places in search of underpriced, undiscovered bargains to bring back home in order to sell at a high mark-up. So does the virtuous wife. She goes looking for bargains in out-of-the-way markets, where there are fewer buyers making competitive bids and therefore lower prices.

1. Samuel Menefee, Wives for Sale: An Ethnographic Study of British Popular Divorce (New York: St. Martin’s, 1981).

This woman has a servant's heart. "She riseth also while it is yet night, and giveth meat to her household, and a portion to her maidens" (v. 15). She serves her maidens, whose job is to serve her. This shows kindness, but this fact appears in the midst of a passage describing economic productivity. Why should the person in charge of the household sacrifice time and effort for her servants? Because of the response. The maidens will see that they are not slaves, but are members of a working household. The evidence of this is the service rendered downward from the wife to the maidens. The wife works extra hard for everyone in the household. The maidens perceive themselves as parts of this household. What is the morally correct response? To work at least equally hard. The entire household then benefits. The division of labor increases everyone's output. A maiden, left on her own while the wife looks for bargains in distant markets, will be less likely to reduce her efforts. It would look bad to the other maidens. She would appear to be a slacker, not a model to be imitated. The model to be imitated is the wife. This model was adopted by Christ as the model for leadership in the church.

But Jesus called them unto him, and said, Ye know that the princes of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great exercise authority upon them. But it shall not be so among you: but whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister; And whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant: Even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many (Matt. 20:25–28).²

It is not just that the virtuous wife is thrifty and hard working. She also is an investor. "She considereth a field, and buyeth it: with the fruit of her hands she planteth a vineyard" (v. 16).

"She girdeth her loins with strength, and strengtheneth her arms" (v. 17). She works hard physically. Her body reflects this commitment to hard work. She has strong arms. She does some heavy lifting. She is not spending time at the local gymnasium, a Greek invention and a place for men. She does not need an exercise program.

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 41.

“She perceiveth that her merchandise is good: her candle goeth not out by night” (v. 18). She understands that she has a competitive edge in what she produces. She keeps at it late into the evening. Yet she also rises early. “She riseth also while it is yet night.” Late to bed and early to rise.

She sews. “She layeth her hands to the spindle, and her hands hold the distaff” (v. 19). She gives. “She stretcheth out her hand to the poor; yea, she reacheth forth her hands to the needy” (v. 20). “She is not afraid of the snow for her household: for all her household are clothed with scarlet” (v. 21). As the colloquial phrase puts it, she has everything covered. Come what may, her family is prepared.

She dresses well. “She maketh herself coverings of tapestry; her clothing is silk and purple” (v. 22). Purple clothing was for rich people in the ancient world. Purple dye was expensive. She recognizes that her success is reflected in how she dresses. She dresses well. Her attire reflects the level of her performance. She has given to the poor. So, she thinks nothing of spending a lot of money on clothing. She is not guilt-ridden about this. Queens dress well, Queen Elizabeth II’s hats to the contrary. She is not putting on airs. Her clothing reflects her status as biblically virtuous.

“Her husband is known in the gates, when he sitteth among the elders of the land” (v. 23). Her husband has leisure to serve as an advisor. He has leisure because she generates income for his household. She has social status in the community because he has social status. He has status because she knows how to make money and run an orderly household. He is not tied down at home, making decisions and settling disputes.

She is running a small business. “She maketh fine linen, and selleth it; and delivereth girdles unto the merchant” (v. 24). The merchants rely on her as a source for products to sell. This means that her product line has a good reputation. It is in constant demand. More than one merchant understands this. She makes them look good to their customers. This guarantees repeat business and higher prices: more bidders for her products.

She is already well known. “Strength and honour are her clothing” (v. 25a). She will become even better known: “and she shall rejoice in time to come” (v. 25).

She has good judgment. “She openeth her mouth with wisdom; and in her tongue is the law of kindness” (v. 26).

“She looketh well to the ways of her household, and eateth not the bread of idleness” (v. 27). We are back to the earlier description: care about others as head of the household, and not one to waste time.

D. Her Great Reward

She has a good reputation. She has a vineyard. She has a successful business. Her family’s income serves as protection in cold times: scarlet clothing. Yet the culmination of her life of successful production is the praise her family will give her. “Her children arise up, and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her” (v. 28). Her husband tells her, “Many daughters have done virtuously, but thou excellest them all” (v. 29). He pronounces judgment. His judgment matters to her. This is a powerful positive sanction.

She labored within her household. She ran businesses. She was a real estate developer. She slept little. But she never forgets her assignment: to serve her children, her maidens, and above all, her husband. She was not in this for the money. The money was a tool of dominion. Her household’s dominion expanded: in business, in real estate, in charity, and in her husband’s influence in the gates, i.e., civil authority and judgment.

Then comes the warning of the king’s mother: “Favour is deceitful, and beauty is vain: but a woman that feareth the LORD, she shall be praised” (v. 30).

The book concludes with this: “Give her of the fruit of her hands; and let her own works praise her in the gates” (v. 31). This is of course poetry. Her works do not literally praise her. It means that those who see her works praise her. They are objectively superior, a fact perceived subjectively by those who are aware of what she has accomplished.

Conclusion

A good-looking good woman is hard to find and harder to marry. But a virtuous woman is much harder to find. If a woman is one in a hundred in looks, one in a hundred in wisdom, and one in a hundred in business savvy, then she is one in a hundred times a hundred times a hundred, i.e., one in a million. These odds are against even kings, let alone the average guy. Reduce these odds, the king’s mother advised. If the prospect is one in a hundred in wisdom and one in a hundred in business savvy, she is one in ten thousand. One in ten thousand is as much as any husband can legitimately expect. So, sacrifice good looks for wisdom and business savvy.

Solomon understood this from experience. “As a jewel of gold in a swine’s snout, so is a fair woman which is without discretion” (Prov. 11:22). He married more than his share of women without discretion.

CONCLUSION

The overall theme of the Book of Proverbs is the contrast between the wise man and the fool.

The supreme economic theme in the Book of Proverbs is this: biblical ethics is the basis of personal success.¹ Proverbs deals with success. It identifies what success is: diligent living in conformity to God's Bible-revealed laws.² Diligence is required.³ Solomon contrasts success with success indicators. Success indicators can sometimes be the product of diligent living in defiance of God's Bible-revealed laws.⁴ Personal success generally includes visible riches.⁵ Success is not limited to riches. Biblical wisdom counts for more than riches.⁶ Nevertheless, biblical wisdom generally brings riches.⁷ The goal of riches is to serve as a means of exercising dominion.⁸ This requires stewardship, which in turn requires private ownership.⁹ It also requires the accumulation of assets for the purpose of inheritance.¹⁰

The Book of Proverbs' distinguishing feature, compared to other rule books for personal success, is its assertion of God's providential system of cause and effect. Biblical causation is based on the concept of cosmic personalism. The universe is under God's sovereignty because it was created out of nothing by God's verbal command. So, economic causation operates in terms of God's Bible-revealed laws.¹¹

If there is success, then there is also failure. What produces poverty, which is a universally recognized mark of personal failure?

1. Chapters 1, 3, 4, 5, 19, 20, 21, 25, 30, 41, 64, 78, 80, 81, 85.

2. Chapters 14, 16, 62, 79.

3. Chapters 61, 71, 77.

4. Chapters 33, 48, 49, 53, 73, 83, 85.

5. Chapters 6, 17, 18, 23, 24, 25, 26, 35, 38, 82, 83.

6. Chapters 1, 4, 5, 9, 17, 18, 53.

7. Chapters 9, 18, 20, 63, 80.

8. Chapters 4, 8, 21, 25, 26, 34, 81.

9. Chapters 67, 70, 75, 85.

10. Chapters 3, 9, 18, 27, 33, 34, 40, 41, 55, 56, 61, 79, 81.

11. Chapters 2, 3, 5, 7, 8, 9, 20, 21, 27, 30, 32, 61, 64, 73, 81.

Two things are identified: laziness¹² and debt.¹³

What are the supreme marks of biblical ethics in an economy? Honest weights and measures.¹⁴

Solomon compiled these proverbs at the height of Israel's power and wealth. After Solomon, things went downhill rapidly and never recovered. There is no better evidence in history of the causal relationship between visible success and temptation unto destruction, which was the theme of Deuteronomy 8. No sooner had Solomon attained visible success than he began violating the terms of kingship set forth in Deuteronomy 17. He began accumulating gold and horses (I Kings 10:26–28). He also accumulated foreign wives. The wives tempted him to worship their gods (I Kings 11). No sooner had Solomon died than his son and his counselors hiked taxes (I Kings 12). The result was Jeroboam's successful revolt and the separation of Israel into two rival kingdoms, northern (Israel) and southern (Judah).

This reminds us of a painful principle: "Nothing fails like success." Biblically speaking, this statement is incorrect. It should read: "Nothing fails like positive success indicators in a covenant-breaking society." Moses said it best:

And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth. But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day. And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God (Deut. 8:17–20).

Solomon was wise enough to compile the Book of Proverbs. He was not wise enough to implement them in his own life or in the life of the civil government that he commanded. His failure, as well as the failure of his son, testifies to the fundamental message of the Bible, from Genesis to Revelation: knowledge does not save. Grace saves.

He knew this. He then forgot. He was God's servant. Servants have a common characteristic: "A servant will not be corrected by words: for though he understand he will not answer" (Prov. 29:19). God spoke to him, but he did not listen (I Kings 11:10). So, God corrected him by telling him that his son would lose the kingdom which he would inherit from his father (I Kings 11:11–12).

12. Chapters 21, 22, 37, 38, 50, 58, 68, 69, 74, 75.

13. Chapters 9, 10, 11, 60, 67, 69.

14. Chapters 29, 52, 56.

The truth of the Book of Proverbs is found in its opening words.

A wise man will hear, and will increase learning; and a man of understanding shall attain unto wise counsels: To understand a proverb, and the interpretation; the words of the wise, and their dark sayings. The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge: but fools despise wisdom and instruction. My son, hear the instruction of thy father, and forsake not the law of thy mother: For they shall be an ornament of grace unto thy head, and chains about thy neck. My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not (Prov. 1:5–10).¹⁵

This truth is consistent with the closing words of Ecclesiastes.

And further, by these, my son, be admonished: of making many books there is no end; and much study is a weariness of the flesh. Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil (Eccl. 12:12–14).¹⁶

Solomon's example down through the ages testifies against the fundamental error of Greek philosophy, which proclaimed that to know what is good is to do what is good. Greek philosophy proclaimed a two-step religion: salvation by knowledge leading to salvation by works. The history of Western civilization has been marked by a struggle between Greek philosophy and biblical wisdom. Biblical wisdom points to the need for God's grace. If Solomon became the wisest fool in history, then the precepts of wisdom are not sufficient to save. This was the message of the prophet Habakkuk: "Behold, his soul which is lifted up is not upright in him: but the just shall live by his faith" (Hab. 2:4). This is why the proverbs, for all their specific wisdom, point to the New Covenant.

For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: Not of works, lest any man should boast. For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them (Eph. 2:8–10).

15. Chapter 3.

16. Gary North, Autonomy and Stagnation: An Economic Commentary on Ecclesiastes (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 45.

AUTONOMY AND STAGNATION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON ECCLESIASTES

Other Books by Gary North

An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)

Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)

An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)

Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)

None Dare Call It Witchcraft (1976)

Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)

Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)

Government by Emergency (1983)

Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)

75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)

Coined Freedom (1984)

Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)

Honest Money (1986)

Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)

Dominion and Common Grace (1987)

Inherit the Earth (1987)

Liberating Planet Earth (1987)

Healer of the Nations (1987)

The Pirate Economy (1987)

Is the World Running Down? (1988)

When Justice Is Aborted (1989)

Political Polytheism (1989)

Judeo-Christian Tradition (1990)

The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)

Victim's Rights (1990)

Millennialism and Social Theory (1990)

Westminster's Confession (1991)

Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar

The Coase Theorem (1992)

Salvation Through Inflation (1993)

Rapture Fever (1993)

Tithing and the Church (1994)

Baptized Patriarchalism (1995)

Crossed Fingers (1996)

The Covenantal Tithe (2011)

Mises on Money (2012)

AUTONOMY AND STAGNATION
AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON ECCLESIASTES

GARY NORTH

Autonomy and Stagnation: An Economic Commentary on Ecclesiastes

Copyright © Gary North, 2012

First Edition

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

| | |
|---|-----|
| Introduction | 1 |
| 1. Cyclical History vs. Progress (Eccl. 1:2) | 7 |
| 2. Imputation and Value (Eccl. 2:11) | 13 |
| 3. The Sovereignty of Death (Eccl. 2:15–17) | 16 |
| 4. Uncertain Inheritance (Eccl. 2:18–21) | 20 |
| 5. Transition to Biblical Covenantalism (Eccl. 2:22–24) | 27 |
| 6. Predictable Ethical Sanctions (Eccl. 2:26) | 30 |
| 7. Godly Time and Beastly Time (Eccl. 3:1) | 33 |
| 8. The Joy of Consuming (Eccl. 3:10–11) | 38 |
| 9. Oppression and the Oppressed (Eccl. 4:1) | 43 |
| 10. Envy Undermines Success (Eccl. 4:4) | 48 |
| 11. Sloth and Starvation (Eccl. 4:5) | 51 |
| 12. Peace and Quiet (Eccl. 4:6) | 54 |
| 13. Mindless Accumulation (Eccl. 4:8) | 57 |
| 14. The Division of Labor (Eccl. 4:9–12) | 61 |
| 15. Wisdom and Social Mobility (Eccl. 4:13–14) | 65 |
| 16. Vows and Promises (Eccl. 5:4–5) | 68 |
| 17. Delayed Sanctions (Eccl. 5:8) | 72 |
| 18. Purposeful Nature (Eccl. 5:9) | 76 |
| 19. Insatiable Discontent (Eccl. 5:10–16) | 79 |
| 20. In Praise of Consumption (Eccl. 5:18–20) | 87 |
| 21. When a Stranger Inherits (Eccl. 6:1–2) | 89 |
| 22. Autonomy vs. Economic Growth (Eccl. 6:7–12) | 94 |
| 23. Autonomy and Sorrow (Eccl. 7:1–4) | 98 |
| 24. Oppression and Bribery (Eccl. 7:7) | 103 |
| 25. Faith in Progress (Eccl. 7:8–10) | 106 |
| 26. Wisdom and Kingdom (Eccl. 7:11–12) | 110 |
| 27. Lukewarm Ethics (Eccl. 7:15–17) | 114 |
| 28. Constant Improvement (Eccl. 7:29) | 118 |
| 29. The Uncertainty of Timing (Eccl. 8:6–7) | 122 |
| 30. Time Runs Out (Eccl. 8:10–13) | 126 |
| 31. Eat, Drink, and Be Merry (Eccl. 8:14–15) | 131 |

| | |
|---|-----|
| 32. Ignorance is Not Bliss (Eccl. 8:16–17) | 134 |
| 33. Dead Lions and Economic Stagnation (Eccl. 9:2–4) | 138 |
| 34. With All Your Strength (Eccl. 9:7–10) | 142 |
| 35. The Secondary Sovereignty of Chance (Eccl. 9:10–11) | 147 |
| 36. Money and Power Religion (Eccl. 9:14–16) | 150 |
| 37. Hierarchy and Judgment (Eccl. 10:5–7) | 153 |
| 38. Justifying Paralysis (Eccl. 10:8–9) | 158 |
| 39. Wasted Efforts (Eccl. 10:15) | 163 |
| 40. The Costs of Sloth (Eccl. 10:18) | 165 |
| 41. Money: The Most Marketable Commodity (Eccl. 10:19) . . | 169 |
| 42. Charity Pays Dividends (Eccl. 11:1–2) | 172 |
| 43. Inputs and Output (Eccl. 11:3–6) | 175 |
| 44. The Vanity of Death (Eccl. 12:5–8) | 180 |
| 45. The Answer is Theonomy (Eccl. 12:13–14) | 183 |
| Conclusion | 190 |

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Ecclesiastes is a series of pithy observations on the human condition. No other book in the Bible, and surely no other book in ancient literature, matches it for the profoundness of its insights in so short a document.

The main theme of the book is the hopelessness of the philosophy of autonomy. The key word is vanity. The book conveys this theme by means of two connected sub-themes: inheritance¹ and death.²

A. A Major Problem

There is a major problem with this book. It offers profound insights that are inconsistent with each other. Some of them are screamingly, defiantly inconsistent. Let me provide three examples.

On the benefits of labor:

Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher, vanity of vanities; all is vanity. What profit hath a man of all his labour which he taketh under the sun? (Eccl. 1:2–3).

Behold that which I have seen: it is good and comely for one to eat and to drink, and to enjoy the good of all his labour that he taketh under the sun all the days of his life, which God giveth him: for it is his portion (Eccl. 5:18).

On the superiority of wisdom:

Then said I in my heart, As it happeneth to the fool, so it happeneth even to me; and why was I then more wise? Then I said in my heart, that this also is vanity. For there is no remembrance of the wise more than of the fool for ever; seeing that which now is in the days to come shall all be forgotten. And how dieth the wise man? as the fool. Therefore I hated life; because the work that is wrought under the sun is grievous unto me: for all is vanity and vexation of spirit (Eccl. 2:15–17).

1. Chapters 2, 3, 4, 8, 13, 16, 21, 23, 25, 26, 30, 34, 45.

2. Chapters 2, 3, 4, 7, 21, 22, 23, 25, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 39, 44, 45.

Wisdom strengtheneth the wise more than ten mighty men which are in the city (Eccl. 7:19).

On the benefits of riches:

There is an evil which I have seen under the sun, and it is common among men: A man to whom God hath given riches, wealth, and honour, so that he wanteth nothing for his soul of all that he desireth, yet God giveth him not power to eat thereof, but a stranger eateth it: this is vanity, and it is an evil disease (Eccl. 6:1–2).

Every man also to whom God hath given riches and wealth, and hath given him power to eat thereof, and to take his portion, and to rejoice in his labour; this is the gift of God (Eccl. 5:19).

Well, which is it? In each case, which is it? This trio of conflicting observations cannot all be correct. We must pick and choose. On what basis? By what standard?

Why must we pick and choose? Why not say this? “You have heard it said. . . . But I say unto you.” Jesus did. The Preacher didn’t.³

B. Goads and Goadings

As you read the Book of Ecclesiastes, keep these words in mind: “The words of the wise are as goads, and as nails fastened by the masters of assemblies, which are given from one shepherd” (Eccl. 12:11). Obscure, aren’t they? These words appear almost at the end of the book. Two verses later, the book concludes with these words:

Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil (Eccl. 12:13–14).⁴

These words are not obscure. They are specific, explicit, and altogether humbling to the reader.

What are goads? There is only one other reference in the Bible to goads. “Yet they had a file for the mattocks, and for the coulter, and for the forks, and for the axes, and to sharpen the goads” (I Sam. 13:21). This, too, is obscure. There is a reference to an ox goad in Judges, but the Hebrew word is different. “And after him was Shamgar

3. “Preacher” is an English identification of the Hebrew word, Qoheleth. It has no literal translation.

4. Chapter 45.

the son of Anath, which slew of the Philistines six hundred men with an ox goad: and he also delivered Israel (Jud. 3:31). The article on “goad” in The International Standard Bible Encyclopedia (1915) says this:

The goad used by the Syrian farmer is usually a straight branch of oak or other strong wood from which the bark has been stripped, and which has at one end a pointed spike and at the other a flat chisel-shaped iron. The pointed end is to prod the oxen while plowing. The flattened iron at the other end is to scrape off the earth which clogs the plowshare. The ancient goad was probably similar to this instrument. It could do villainous work in the hands of an experienced fighter (Judges 3:31).

So, we are not really sure what the goad of Ecclesiastes was. We do know how the word was used. It was a metaphor. It was a metaphor based on a device that may have been used as a cattle prod and also as a tool to scrape dirt off a plow in order to make the plow more efficient. If this was the goad that the Preacher had in mind, then it was tool for getting things moving forward.

C. Rival Covenantal Outlooks

The Preacher presents a series of observations and conclusions in this book. His arguments are brief and graphic. But exactly what is he getting at with his book? This question is at the heart of the expositor's problem. This is his challenge.

I have come to a conclusion. The Book of Ecclesiastes is directed against the philosophy of human autonomy. Its observations regarding the futility of life—life's all-encompassing vanity—are inescapable conclusions of the logic of human autonomy.

The Preacher also offers counter-observations. These observations are consistent with man's complete subordination to the law of God: theonomy (Eccl. 12:13–14). There is nothing more for him to say, and so he does not say it. (This is a very good rule for authors in every era.)

The supreme task of an expositor of the Book of Ecclesiastes is to identify the category of each of the observations and conclusions. There are two categories. One category is autonomy: man's self-law. The other category is theonomy: the law of God. The first category proclaims man's independence from God. The second category proclaims man's dependence on God.

Each view is marked by a covenant. All outlooks are. The biblical covenant establishes the framework for every covenant. This model is as follows: (1) sovereignty, (2) authority, (3) law, (4) judgment, and (5) progress.⁵ The biblical covenant proclaims the following.

Sovereignty. God alone is sovereign. He is the source of meaning in eternity and also in history.

Authority. The special revelation of God in history is authoritative. It represents God.

Law. God has revealed his law in the Bible.

Judgment. God imputes meaning to all things: what is worthwhile and what is not.

Progress. History is both linear and progressive. God grants inheritance to His people in history.

In contrast is the covenant of self-proclaimed autonomous man, as described by the Preacher.

Sovereignty. Death is sovereign. It consumes all things.

Authority. The mind of each man is authoritative for himself, but only for as long as he lives.

Law. All law is subject to flux.

Judgment. Men proclaim judgment, but death triumphs over life. Death imputes no meaning.

Cycles. History is cyclical. Progress is an illusion.

The Preacher highlights what he believes are the fundamental dividing lines between autonomy and theonomy. The main one is death as the final judge vs. God as the final judge. Death is impersonal. God is personal. Death does not impute meaning to the world. God does. Death does not distinguish performance in terms of ethical standards. God does.

Autonomous man does not accept the concept of an absolutely sovereign God who cannot be manipulated by man, only persuaded (Ex. 32:9–15). Such a God denies man's autonomy.

5. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992). (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010).

D. The Preacher's Methodology

The Preacher uses a combination of testimony and logic. He testifies to what he has seen. He has seen a great deal. He uses logic, not to develop the case for theonomy but rather to develop the case against autonomy. He uses a unique approach: following the logic of autonomy to its inescapable conclusions. He lets people see where a rival view of God and man leads: to despair.

Man is not sovereign, the Preacher reveals. Either death is sovereign or else the God of the Bible is sovereign. The Preacher argues throughout his presentation that these are the only two options: the sovereignty of death or the sovereignty of God. In his final words, he announces his conclusion: God is sovereign, not man and not death.

The crucial dividing point between the Preacher's two sets of observations is this: imputation.⁶ The Preacher's use of imputation involves three steps: the assessment of life's meaning, the public declaration of this assessment, and the imposition of visible historical sanctions in terms of this assessment. Who wins? Who loses?

The Preacher never openly says that imputation is the central philosophical issue he is raising. He never says the following:

There are only two possible sources of meaning: God and death. God and death are interpreted in radically different ways by the philosophy of autonomy and the philosophy of theonomy. Autonomy cannot escape the sovereignty of impersonal death. Theonomy proclaims the sovereignty of a personal God. The dividing line between autonomy and theonomy is the answer to this question: "Which factor is sovereign in history: God or death?"

The Preacher's discussion of imputation centers on this distinctly economic issue: inheritance. Inheritance is the supreme economic issue in the Book of Ecclesiastes, because the inescapable factor dividing autonomy from theonomy is death. The Preacher explores the implications of death for every person's life. He presents inconsistent conclusions, because he speaks as a one-man debate team.

The Preacher's methodology is to present the case against autonomous man by offering brief summaries of what he has personally observed about the way the world works. These observations conflict with each other. He recognizes that all facts are interpreted facts. Facts are neither autonomous nor self-evident. Van Til called these hypothetically autonomous facts “brute facts.” He denied that brute facts can exist.

6. Chapters 2, 3, 4.

Scripture teaches that every fact in the universe exists and operates by virtue of the plan of God. There are no brute facts for God. As to his own being, fact and interpretation are co-extensive. There are no hidden unexplored possibilities in God. And as to the universe, God’s interpretation logically precedes the denotation and the connotation of all facts of which it consists.⁷

Believer and non-believer have opposite philosophies of fact and opposite philosophies of law. They also have, behind both of these, opposite views of man. Corresponding to the idea of brute fact and impersonal law is the idea of the autonomous man. Corresponding to the idea of God-controlled fact and law is the idea of God-controlled man. The idea of creation out of nothing is not found either in Greek or in modern philosophy.⁸

Because all facts are interpreted facts, the Preacher presents fundamental aspects of the world as autonomous man sees them. Then he presents these same aspects of life as a covenant-keeper sees them. They do not see the world in the same way.

Conclusion

The book of Ecclesiastes confuses Christians. They do not understand that the bulk of this book is devoted to refuting foolishness in the name of foolishness. It is an attempt to draw out the consequences of foolishness from the presuppositions of foolishness. The author presents his case against autonomous man. He does so in the name of God, but this is not clear until the final chapter of the book. There, he affirms theonomy: the law (nomos) of God (theos).

The book has two fundamental themes: (1) autonomy vs. theonomy; (2) the sovereignty of death vs. the sovereignty of God.

7. Cornelius Van Til, Christian-Theistic Evidences (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1978), p. 64.

8. Cornelius Van Til, Common Grace and the Gospel (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1977), p. 6.

1

CYCLICAL HISTORY VS. PROGRESS

Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher, vanity of vanities; all is vanity. What profit hath a man of all his labour which he taketh under the sun? One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh: but the earth abideth for ever. The sun also ariseth, and the sun goeth down, and hasteth to his place where he arose. The wind goeth toward the south, and turneth about unto the north; it whirleth about continually, and the wind returneth again according to his circuits. All the rivers run into the sea; yet the sea is not full; unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again (Eccl. 1:2–7).

A. The Ancient World

The ancient world in every culture except Israel's affirmed cyclical history.¹ Men saw the cycles of nature, and they adopted cycles as the basis for understanding man's history and future.² In this passage, the Preacher speaks in the name of autonomous man.

The Preacher asks a question that thoughtful men throughout history have asked: "Of what profit is a man's labor?" As with other thoughtful men in history, he looks to the future as a way of verifying the worthiness of his labors. He says that one generation passes away, and another generation comes. The earth abides forever (v. 4). The sun rises and sets. The wind goes toward the south; then it goes toward the north. It whirls around continually and returns again to its circuits (v. 6). Rivers run into the sea, yet the sea is not full (v. 7).

1. Stanley Jaki, Science and Creation: From Eternal Cycles to an Oscillating Universe (Edinburgh: Scottish Academic Press, 1974), ch. 6.

2. The great cycle was astrology's Great Year: the 26,000-year cycle called the precession of the equinoxes. The zodiac slowly changes in relation to the sky. This comes from the inclined axis of the earth. The poles change their position. New stars become the north star. The ancients were well aware of this. See Giorgio de Santillana and Hertha von Dechend, Hamlet's Mill: An Essay on Myth and the Frame of Time (New York: Gambit, 1969).

There are patterns in life, but these patterns do not seem to establish relevance. All things are full of labor, he says, but the eye is not satisfied with seeing, and the ear is not filled with hearing. The thing that has been is the thing which shall be, and that which is done is that which will be done. "There is no new thing under the sun" (v. 9).

This is a famous passage. It indicates that life is futile. Life comes and goes without progress. Things change, yet they do not change. In the famous phrase of the French, the more things change, the more they stay the same. There is no satisfaction. There is no conclusion to men's labors. There is no meaning to men's labors. There is no memory of former things, and neither will there be memory of things that are to come (v. 11).

This is the worldview known as cyclical history. There appears to be progress, but there is no progress. Everything that takes place today is essentially the same as everything that took place yesterday, and is not fundamentally different from everything that will take place tomorrow.

This outlook destroys the concept of progress. Without the concept of progress, men are tempted to despair about the meaning of their own existence. Thoughtful men worry that even their thoughtfulness is irrelevant. This worry is the essence of almost all of the Book of Ecclesiastes.

The effect of the concept of cyclical history, when widely accepted in a civilization, is to undermine science, technology, economic growth, and progress in general.³ If the future is the same as the past, and the past cannot be distinguished from the present, then anything we do in the present is irrelevant. The present does not develop anything from the past, and it does not leave a legacy to the future. Man finds himself in a universe governed by meaninglessness. Whatever appears to be progress is an illusion.

B. The Preacher's Legacy

This is why the Preacher asks the question regarding the profit of his labor. If he cannot supervise how his legacy will be used, and if his legacy will be used in much the same way as any legacy is ever used, meaning that is squandered, then what is the use of laboring hard for a lifetime in order to accumulate sufficient goods to constitute a legacy? One generation passes away, and another generation comes. The earth endures forever, but generations come and go. This means that legacies come and go.

3. Jaki, Science and Creation.

Labor is hard work. It must be endured by most people, but this was not the case with the Preacher. He was in a position not to work. Thus, his labors were a liability. They did not gain him anything of long-term value. Nothing he could do would have any effect on the long term. Things come and go. But if things must be labored for and sacrificed for in order to come, then of what use is the labor? Why bother to sacrifice? It is all vanity.

“Vanity, vanity, all is vanity.” This is a famous phrase from the book of Ecclesiastes. Everywhere the Preacher looks, he sees vanity. Success is an illusion. People are proud about what they own or what they have accomplished. Yet of what good is any of it? Things come and go. Everything that comes eventually goes. The earth abides forever, but the works of men do not. This is the worldview of most of the Book of Ecclesiastes. The Preacher examines numerous philosophies of life, and he finds them all to be vanity. They lead nowhere.

His conclusion is pessimistic. He has seen all the works that are done under the sun, and behold, they are all vanity and vexation of spirit (v. 14). This is a counsel of despair. He continues in his despair. He says that whatever is crooked cannot be made straight, and whatever is lacking cannot be numbered (v. 15). Nothing can be changed. But if nothing can be changed, then of what use is labor? It is vanity. It is futile. It is a gigantic waste of time.

He says that he gave his heart to know wisdom, and also to know madness and folly. It is all vexation of spirit (v. 17). If wisdom is equated with madness and folly, then wisdom is without value. Yet we know from the Book of Proverbs that wisdom is most valuable. “Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom: and with all thy getting get understanding” (Prov. 4:7). The author of Ecclesiastes was in all likelihood the author of Proverbs.⁴ Why are we told to get wisdom if wisdom is not fundamentally different from madness and folly? This makes no sense.

This is the point of the Book of Ecclesiastes. The philosophies of life which the Preacher summarizes are madness and folly. They are all vanity.

What matters, he concludes in the final chapter, is to obey God’s law. This is the correct conclusion. But men, especially intelligent men who think about the meaning of life, do not like this conclusion. They prefer their own economy. They want to make their own laws. They do not wish to subordinate themselves to the cosmic Lawgiver. So, they indulge in vanity. They seek meaning in a world that cannot provide meaning. They seek meaning as autonomous men in an autonomous universe. Neither they nor the universe are autonomous. Their search ends in vanity.

4. “The proverbs of Solomon the son of David, king of Israel” (Prov. 1:1). “The words of the Preacher, the son of David, king in Jerusalem” (Eccl. 1:1).

He says that he communed with his own heart. He says that he had inherited a great estate. He has gotten more wisdom than those who had been before him in Jerusalem. His heart had great experience with wisdom and knowledge (v. 16). He gave his heart to know wisdom and also to know madness and folly. He concludes that “in much wisdom is much grief: and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow” (v. 18). Grief and wisdom are equated; so are sorrow and knowledge. Things which are widely believed to be good lead to things that are widely acknowledged to be bad.

It takes concentration and effort and leisure to develop wisdom, yet wisdom produces much grief. Why should any rational person continue the hard work of seeking and obtaining wisdom, when success in attaining wisdom leads to grief? Philosophers have been asking themselves this question for a long time. They have not come up with any agreed-upon answers.

C. Economic Progress

From an economic standpoint, the philosophy of time that is articulated in this passage undermines economic progress. Economic progress requires capital. Capital is formed by combining land and labor over time.⁵ All three must be paid for: rent, wages, and interest. Why should people sacrifice land and labor over time if all that their efforts ever produce is vanity? Whenever people believe that this cause-and-effect system is universal—that hard work produces nothing of value—they cease to work hard. They eat, drink, and are merry rather than forfeit present value on behalf of future value.⁶ Why forfeit the pleasures of the present for the sake of vanity in the future? If pleasure is vanity, and hard work is vanity, let us pursue pleasure. Pleasure is fun. Pleasure is now. Get pleasure. Pleasure is the principal thing.

5. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State: A Treatise on Economic Principles, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), ch. 7:4–5.

6. Chapter 31.

Throughout the Bible, but especially in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28, we find a completely different view of history. Moses told the generation of the conquest that God blesses covenant-keeping and curses covenant-breaking. He told them that if they obeyed the laws of God, God would prosper them. There is no hint in either passage that poverty is a benefit.

Men legitimately strive in order to amass property. They are not to do this as if property were of any value in and of itself. Nothing is autonomous except God. Only He has value in Himself. Men are to amass property for the sake of God. Their administration of His assets is a moral and legal responsibility. So, the view of history that the Preacher presents in the Book of Ecclesiastes is utterly pagan. It is in opposition to the biblical worldview. The biblical worldview affirms the legitimacy of progress. It therefore assumes the legitimacy of economic growth.

There is a big difference between wealth and poverty. There is also a big difference between wisdom and folly. This difference increases over time. Covenant-keepers are supposed to extend the kingdom of God in history. Covenant-breakers are supposed to surrender their kingdom. The kingdom of God is not vanity. It must not be equated with the kingdom of Satan or the kingdom of man, which is the same kingdom.

If men were to accept the philosophy of life that is presented in this initial chapter, there would be no sustained economic progress. If there is no progress from the past into the present or from the present into the future, then all is meaningless. The author of the book does not accept this philosophy of life, as he shows in the final chapter. But he argues this philosophy in a straightforward way in this book. He shows that its conclusion is unpalatable: everything is vanity in its own way.

Conclusion

Because the book of Ecclesiastes is a sophisticated rejection of the philosophy governing the first chapter, covenant-keepers have had a view of time very different from the cyclical view presented here. The linear and progressive view of time that is taught by both Judaism and Christianity has stood as a challenge against the entire ancient world and its view of cyclical time.

The centrality of Christianity's view of the future on Christian social thought⁷ is rarely mentioned in Christian circles, but it is sometimes perceived by humanists. They understand that the view of time presented in the Bible, which is not presented in this chapter, is a powerful incentive for self-sacrifice in the present on behalf of the future. It is a call to thrift. It is a call to future-orientation at the expense of present-orientation.

7. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

2

IMPUTATION AND VALUE

Then I looked on all the works that my hands had wrought, and on the labour that I had laboured to do: and, behold, all was vanity and vexation of spirit, and there was no profit under the sun (Eccl. 2:11).

A. Compared to What?

In Ecclesiastes 1, the Preacher dismisses life as being filled with vanity. Everything that a person does is vanity. He offers a counsel of despair. He says that one thing follows another, but there is no progress, no meaning, and much vexation of spirit. He concludes the lesson by saying that he had given his heart to know wisdom, but in much wisdom there is much grief. He who increases his knowledge increases his sorrow (vv. 17–18).

In Ecclesiastes 2, he reports on his journey down a different track. He has pursued laughter and pleasure (vv. 1–2). But this also is vanity. He equates laughter and madness. He has pursued wine as well as wisdom (v. 3). He has pursued folly in order to see what is good for mankind (vv. 3, 12). In other words, he has explored the full range of human emotion and human experience, in order to make sense of it. His conclusion: it makes no sense.

By assessing what he has experienced, he renders judgment. He draws a conclusion. He has compared his experience with a standard. He does not tell us what this standard is. This is the universal problem for self-proclaimed autonomous man. He has access to no self-validating, self-revealing standard. How can anyone assess anything without a fixed standard? There is a story of a man who has just been told that Einstein's theory of relativity teaches that space is curved. He retorts: "Compared to what?" This is the Preacher's problem. He concludes that everything is vanity. Compared to what?

B. The Futility of Accumulation

As part of his pursuit of experience, he built great works. He built houses. He planted vineyards (v. 4). He planted gardens and orchards (v. 5). He planted trees that bore many kinds of fruit. In other words, he invested for the future. He spent wealth on the creation of long-term capital goods. He sacrificed in the present in order to benefit in the future.

He also accumulated servants and maidens. He had a large enough household of servants so that children were born in his house. He had great possessions of cattle. He lived in the capital city of Jerusalem (v. 7), which was the most expensive real estate in the nation. This was where the center of population was, because it was where the temple was.

He accumulated silver and gold. He accumulated goods associated with kings. He brought in male and female singers. He experienced the delights of mankind, which included music (v. 8). He describes his condition: "So I was great, and increased more than all that were before me in Jerusalem: also my wisdom remained with me" (v. 9). He appeared to have the best of life. "And whatsoever mine eyes desired I kept not from them, I withheld not my heart from any joy; for my heart rejoiced in all my labor: and this was my portion of all my labor" (v. 10).

He then looked at all that he had accumulated, and he concluded, once again, that it was all vanity and vexation of spirit. Conclusion: there is no profit under the sun (v. 11).

He continued to pursue wisdom, madness, and folly (v. 12). He despaired of the present because there is no progress in life. Everything that follows is simply a repetition of everything that has preceded (v. 12). This is his theme of cyclical history.¹ On the one hand, he concludes that wisdom is better than folly, in the same way as light is better than darkness (v. 13). The wise man can see, but the fool walks in darkness. On the other hand, one event happens to both the wise man and the fool (v. 14). Death swallows up all of a person's legacy. The Preacher will die, as surely as a fool dies. "For there is no remembrance of the wise more than of the fool for ever; seeing that which now is in the days to come shall all be forgotten. And how dieth the wise man? as the fool" (v. 16). Then why is he any wiser than the fool? No good reason. Conclusion: it is all vanity. "Therefore I hated life; because the work that has wrought under the sun is grievous unto me: for all is vanity and vexation of spirit” (v. 17).

1. Chapter 1.

Conclusion

The Preacher explored the main avenues of autonomous human performance and enjoyment. Everything he tried on this basis was vanity. It meant nothing. He acted in terms of various theories of autonomous human achievement and meaning, and he found them all lacking. They are all swallowed up by death and uncertainty.

This is humanism. When men claim autonomy, they thereby abandon the foundations of meaning and value. Death is life’s common denominator. It is impersonal. It undermines all meaning. Without imputation by God, there is no meaningful imputation by man.

This has the methodology of modern economics ever since the 1870s. It teaches that all economic value is imputed subjectively by individuals. But mortals cannot impute authoritatively and finally. Man’s imputation is vetoed by death. It is also undermined by uncertainty about the future and therefore about the present.

3

THE SOVEREIGNTY OF DEATH

Then said I in my heart, As it happeneth to the fool, so it happeneth even to me; and why was I then more wise? Then I said in my heart, that this also is vanity. For there is no remembrance of the wise more than of the fool for ever; seeing that which now is in the days to come shall all be forgotten. And how dieth the wise man? as the fool. Therefore I hated life; because the work that is wrought under the sun is grievous unto me: for all is vanity and vexation of spirit (Eccl. 2:15–17).

A. In Defense of Autonomy

The Preacher speaks here on behalf of the philosophy of autonomy. His observations reflect the autonomous man's supreme stumbling block: the sovereignty of death. For autonomous man, death is the great equalizer. Death swallows all men: good and evil, wise and fool, rich and poor. Nothing is remembered about any of them. Death undermines men's confidence. The Preacher lays out the case against the philosophy of autonomy by articulating the concerns of someone who does not believe in the sovereignty of the God of the Bible.

A person capable of thinking carefully about the central issues of life has greater perception than a person who drifts through life. The former thinks of himself as wise. He is wise enough to perceive that wisdom in a world governed by death has no advantage over foolishness. Death does not distinguish between wisdom and foolishness. Both are grist for its cosmic mill. "Then said I in my heart, As it happeneth to the fool, so it happeneth even to me; and why was I then more wise? Then I said in my heart, that this also is vanity." "And how dieth the wise man? as the fool. Therefore I hated life; because the work that is wrought under the sun is grievous unto me: for all is vanity and vexation of spirit."

B. Life and Death

Life is the source of hope. Death overcomes this hope. Life does not overcome death. The Preacher insists that “one generation passeth away, and another generation cometh: but the earth abideth for ever” (Eccl. 1:4). Surely, this is an affirmation of life. It may seem so on first glance, but it is not. Every generation passes away. It dies off.¹ The only way for life to overcome death is through inheritance. The inheritance of each generation from the preceding one aids it in overcoming the effects of sin in history, thereby thwarting the effects of death. Each generation can leave a predictably positive legacy to the next generation. But the Preacher denies that there is any legitimate hope in this intergenerational inheritance. How? By raising the issue of uncertainty.

Yea, I hated all my labour which I had taken under the sun: because I should leave it unto the man that shall be after me. And who knoweth whether he shall be a wise man or a fool? yet shall he have rule over all my labour wherein I have laboured, and wherein I have shewed myself wise under the sun. This is also vanity. Therefore I went about to cause my heart to despair of all the labour which I took under the sun. For there is a man whose labour is in wisdom, and in knowledge, and in equity; yet to a man that hath not laboured therein shall he leave it for his portion. This also is vanity and a great evil (Eccl. 2:18–21).²

If there is no legitimate hope in inheritance, then there is no legitimate hope in progress. If there is no hope in progress, then history remains undifferentiated. Good and bad, wisdom and foolishness, wealth and poverty can and do offset each other. Death, being impersonal, does not care, one way or the other. Death does not differentiate. Inheritance is not guaranteed.

C. Imputation

For autonomous man, death does not impute—assess and declare—anything to history. It just swallows up history. Death does not favor one belief over another, or one behavior over another. It imposes the same negative sanction on all living creatures: the end.

The Preacher sees this, and he despairs. “Therefore I went about to cause my heart to despair of all the labour which I took under the sun” (Eccl. 2:20). He loses hope. He does so representatively on behalf of autonomous man. He declares his confidence that death swallows all living creatures. It does so indiscriminately. There is no meaning to death. Therefore, there is no meaning to life, which death overcomes, species by species. The sovereignty of death is greater than the sovereignty of life.

1. Chapter 1.

2. Chapter 4.

D. Laying Down the Law

Faith in the sovereignty of death stands in sharp contrast to faith in the sovereignty of God. The Book of Ecclesiastes presents both positions. This is why it is difficult for expositors to deal with this book.

The Preacher makes his case against autonomy in terms of the most fundamental fact in the philosophy of autonomy: death. The philosophy of autonomy declares its commitment to mankind, but mankind is composed of dying men. The Preacher reminds his readers of the sovereignty of death. He does not want his readers to avoid this most fundamental doctrine of autonomy. Autonomy declares that, because no God has laid down the law, man gets to. This means, paraphrasing C. S. Lewis, that some men lay down the law for others.³ Here is a great incentive for ambitious men to obtain positions of authority. They want to lay down the law to others, not have the law laid down to them. Their religion is the power religion.⁴

3. C. S. Lewis, The Abolition of Man (New York: Touchstone, [1944] 1996), pp. 68–70.

4. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985).

Conclusion

Death is sovereign in the philosophy of autonomy. There is no eternal God who lays down the law and imposes sanctions. Lacking a cosmic personal sovereign who lays down the law to the cosmos, autonomous man attempts to lay down the law to nature. But man is part of nature. Every living creature dies. Death swallows up all legal claims. Man's legal claim to the right to lay down the law to nature, including other men, is based exclusively on power. Autonomy leads to the power religion. But death swallows up every man. Autonomous man is ultimately powerless against death. He cannot legitimately declare, as Paul declared, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory" (I Cor. 15:55).⁵

5. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 15.

4

UNCERTAIN INHERITANCE

Yea, I hated all my labour which I had taken under the sun: because I should leave it unto the man that shall be after me. And who knoweth whether he shall be a wise man or a fool? yet shall he have rule over all my labour wherein I have laboured, and wherein I have shewed myself wise under the sun. This is also vanity. Therefore I went about to cause my heart to despair of all the labour which I took under the sun. For there is a man whose labour is in wisdom, and in knowledge, and in equity; yet to a man that hath not laboured therein shall he leave it for his portion. This also is vanity and a great evil (Eccl. 2:18–21).

A. Laboring in Vain

In retrospect, he says, he hates all of his labor. Why? Because he must leave it to the person who will inherit it. There is no way for him to know whether the person who will inherit the works of his labor will be a wise man or a fool. In either case, he will rule over all of the Preacher's labor (v. 19).

The Preacher understands the meaning of labor. A person labors to buy goods, and these goods are then inherited by someone else. This is the same, economically speaking, as inheriting the person's labor. Labor is manifested in its fruits. It is also manifested in capital equipment. We say that labor is embodied in this equipment. This is a metaphor, not a measurable phenomenon. It is not a metaphysical process.¹

The Preacher has an implicit argument. The value he places on his

1. Karl Marx spoke of capital as being congealed labor time. "As values, all commodities are only definite masses of congealed labour-time." Karl Marx, Capital: A Critique of Political Economy (1867) (New York: Modern Library edition, a reprint of the 1906 edition, published by Charles H. Kerr), p. 46. He really did believe that labor time's role in establishing value is somehow measurable. He built his system on this fallacy. Gary North, Marx's Religion of Revolution: Regeneration Through Chaos (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1968] 1989), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/gnmrro>) past labor is dependent on the value of uses to which his capital will be put in the future. He believes that if a fool inherits his capital, he has wasted his time. He has accumulated wealth for a fool. The fool may value this inheritance, but he will use it foolishly. In this sense, it would have been better had the Preacher not devoted labor to accumulating his vast stores of capital. This inheritance can be squandered by his heir. There is no way of knowing in advance whether or not the heir will be competent.

This passage points to the inescapable connection between past, present, and future. He assesses the value of his past labor, but in doing so, he must make an assessment of the uses to which the output of his labor will be put in the future. This establishes a fundamental principle of economic imputation: the retroactive value of the past is dependent upon the expected value of the future. If a fool inherits his wealth, the value of his present goods is an illusion. It is nothing but vanity. He has wasted his time.

He imputes value to his present capital on the basis of his assessment of its future value in the hands of a fool. He therefore concludes that all is vanity. This presumes that a fool will inherit his wealth. But a wise person may inherit his wealth. The Preacher does not know who will inherit his wealth. But, because he cannot be sure that the outcome will be positive, he imputes no value to his present goods. He also retroactively imputes zero value to his past labor. He calls it all vanity. Nothing has any value, because he cannot be sure that the person who inherits his wealth will be competent.

The Preacher is legitimately concerned about the use to which his capital will be put. But the fact that he does not know for sure what use his capital will be put leads to a false conclusion: all is vanity. On the basis of his inability to impute future value to his present goods, he imputes no value at all to his future goods, and retroactively dismisses the value of his past labor. Because he is not omniscient regarding the future, he concludes that all is vanity.

This is a counsel of despair. No one can know the future exhaustively. No one can be sure that the person who inherits his legacy will put it to productive use. For a covenant-keeper, the fact that the future is uncertain is not the same as saying that the future is vanity. Covenant-keepers lay up treasure in the present in order that their heirs will continue to put it to good use. They trust in God's promises of inheritance by covenant-keepers. This inheritance is the foundation of the expansion of the kingdom (civilization) of God in history.

B. No Autonomy

Autonomous man's error is to assume that his lack of omniscience is sufficient to dismiss all value and meaning. The Preacher is arguing on the assumption that an individual is sovereign in imputing value to the present and the past. Because he cannot accurately predict the future use of his capital, he imputes no value to the future, the present, or the past. He calls it all vanity. This is the statement of a self-professed autonomous man. But no man is autonomous. God is autonomous, but man is not. God imputes value in a sovereign way, but man does not. The fact that man is not God is not a legitimate reason to conclude that all is vanity. Some things are vain, but other things are not. God imputes value and meaning, so covenant-keepers, who are made in God's image, are also supposed to impute value and meaning. Indeed, there is no way for any rational person to escape this responsibility, for which he will be judged. Men are to use God's standards to do this. They are not to act as autonomous beings. They are to regard themselves as subordinate evaluators who are working on God's behalf as God's stewards.

The Preacher is arguing in terms of the logic of self-professed autonomous man. He is showing that the assertion of autonomy is futile. Because no man is omniscient, every assertion of autonomy leads to a conclusion: all is vanity. Because man cannot impute final value, he supposes that no one can. If no one can, then there is no final value. If there is no final value, then there is no present value. All is vanity.

Here is the economic application of this logic. The value of capital goods in the present is dependent on expectations of the value of capital's output in the future. This is the logic of modern economics, beginning with the marginalist revolution of the early 1870s, when economists began abandoning the labor theory of value as well as all cost-of-production theories of value. Value is imputed subjectively, economists concluded. Capital's value today is dependent on expected consumer demand.

The Preacher speaks of the wise use of an inheritance. The economist does not speak of wise use. He speaks of profitable use. But both analyses depend on present imputation of expected future value. If the value of capital goods today is dependent upon the wise uses to which these goods will be put in the distant future, this creates an endless chain of meaninglessness. Because we cannot perfectly foresee the future use of our capital, and because those who inherit will also not be able to see into the future, value and meaning disappear. Future value is like the mythological elephant that supports the world. It stands on a giant turtle. What does the turtle stand on? Another turtle. It is turtles all the way down. There is no system of imputation that autonomous man can legitimately establish as authoritative.

Expectations regarding the future always shape the present. Uncertainty regarding the future reduces the value of assets in the present. If the future is uncertain, then the present value of everything is equally uncertain. If the present is uncertain, the Preacher says, it is vanity.

The implication of this passage is that humanism has no way of confidently declaring that something is either good or bad, valuable or worthless, or anything in between. If the correct assessment of the present is dependent on an autonomous and infallible prediction of the future, then there can be no correct assessment of value in the present. The Preacher calls all such imputation vanity. He has already argued that death swallows up the fool and the wise man. Death is the common denominator. The only way for an individual to assess accurately the present value of anything is to know what value it will have in the future, after his own death. But death swallows up all imputations. Every person who imputes will die. Every person who imputes value lacks knowledge of the future. So, the Preacher says, all is vanity.

Imputation is a process in time. It is dependent on expectations about the future. Christian economics rests on the theory of an omniscient Creator who sees the future perfectly. This God also imputes value authoritatively in terms of His standards. He makes no mistakes. He perfectly assesses the meaning and value of everything in terms of His own permanent ethical standards. God knows the future, so He can accurately impute value in the present. He can also impute value retroactively, which He will do at the final judgment. Imputation by God is past, present, and future. God is omniscient.

In coming to the conclusion that all is vanity, the Preacher speaks as a consistent humanist must speak. He speaks in the name of an uncertain future. He concludes that uncertainty undermines the concept of value. Everything in the future is like a kaleidoscope's image: constantly shifting. Result: vanity.

C. Subordinate Imputation

Christian economics affirms the absolute sovereignty of God, the absolute accuracy of God's imputation of economic value, and the perfection of the final judgment. Christian economics also teaches the men are made in the image of God. Therefore, they possess the ability to think God's thoughts after Him. They can impute economic value in history because God imputes economic value in history. Also, they can impute economic value because they have access to permanent standards of judgment. They have access to the Bible and Bible-revealed law. They can make accurate assessments as creatures because they are made in the image of God. God holds them responsible for making assessments in the present. They must do so on the basis of what they know is coming, which is the final judgment. They possess the law and the prophets. They possess the revelation of Jesus Christ. They possess access to the Bible. So, they are capable of making imperfect but relevant judgments regarding the past, present, and future.

Not until the final section of the Book of Ecclesiastes does the Preacher issue his conclusion. He states it plainly. Men are to obey God's law. "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil" (Eccl. 12:13–14).² If covenant-keepers do this, they will make accurate though imperfect economic judgments. They will perceive that all is not vanity. Having perceived this, they can work confidently in the present for the sake of an uncertain future. It is uncertain to them, but it is not uncertain to God. God imputes value to their work in the present, because He imputes value to the work of their heirs.

D. Inheritance and Historical Linearity

In the name of autonomous man, the Preacher has affirmed the death of every generation. "One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh: but the earth abideth for ever" (Eccl. 1:4). This statement appears in a passage that affirms the cyclical pattern of natural events.

The sun also ariseth, and the sun goeth down, and hasteth to his place where he arose. The wind goeth toward the south, and turneth about unto the north; it whirleth about continually, and the wind returneth again according to his circuits. All the rivers run into the sea; yet the sea is not full; unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again (Eccl. 1:5–7).

2. Chapter 45.

This outlook favors the ancient world's assumption that history is cyclical.³ Without inheritance, the replacement generations do not change the pattern of life.

The Old Covenant rejects such a view of history. It affirms that a personal God created the universe. God also brings judgments in history. History is linear. The proof of this linearity is the pattern of inheritance.

What man is he that feareth the LORD? him shall he teach in the way that he shall choose. His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth. The secret of the LORD is with them that fear him; and he will shew them his covenant (Psalm 25:12–14).

For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth (Psalm 37:9).

But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace (Psalm 37:11).

For such as be blessed of him shall inherit the earth; and they that be cursed of him shall be cut off (Psalm 37:22).⁴

E. Death and Inheritance

Whether the heir is a wise man or a fool makes no difference to death. Death is sovereign.

Then said I in my heart, As it happeneth to the fool, so it happeneth even to me; and why was I then more wise? Then I said in my heart, that this also is vanity. For there is no remembrance of the wise more than of the fool for ever; seeing that which now is in the days to come shall all be forgotten. And how dieth the wise man? as the fool. Therefore I hated life; because the work that is wrought under the sun is grievous unto me: for all is vanity and vexation of spirit (Eccl. 2:15–17).⁵

No assured ethical principle governs the inheritance, once the autonomous owner dies. No pattern of predictable sanctions exists to direct the inheritance to covenant-breakers.

3. Chapter 1.

4. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 6.

5. Chapter 3.

All things have I seen in the days of my vanity: there is a just man that perisheth in his righteousness, and there is a wicked man that longeth his life in his wickedness. Be not righteous over much; neither make thyself over wise: why shouldest thou destroy thyself? Be not over much wicked, neither be thou foolish: why shouldest thou die before thy time? (Eccl. 7:15–17).⁶

Because death is impersonal, there is no meaning. Because death swallows up all forms of life, life is meaningless. Because inheritance is random in its effects, there is no pattern of victory or growth.

This is a counsel of despair. The Preacher recognizes this. He says that he has despaired over this knowledge. But he says this as a partisan of the philosophy of autonomy. He is making his case against autonomy by presenting the world as interpreted by autonomous man.

Conclusion

The uncertainty of inheritance undermines men's confidence in their posthumous futures. This makes men less effective entrepreneurs and accumulators of capital. Consumption is preferable to capital accumulation. "Then I commended mirth, because a man hath no better thing under the sun, than to eat, and to drink, and to be merry: for that shall abide with him of his labour the days of his life, which God giveth him under the sun" (Eccl. 8:15).⁷

The value of capital in the present is dependent in part on its value in the future. But that is true of the future, too. There is no sure economic value in the present if there is no final imputation of economic value in the future. There is no final judgment, the Preacher says. There is only cyclical nature, cyclical history, and individual death. This is vanity.

6. Chapter 27.

7. Chapter 31.

5

TRANSITION TO BIBLICAL COVENANTALISM

For what hath man of all his labour, and of the vexation of his heart, wherein he hath laboured under the sun? For all his days are sorrows, and his travail grief; yea, his heart taketh not rest in the night. This is also vanity. There is nothing better for a man, than that he should eat and drink, and that he should make his soul enjoy good in his labour. This also I saw, that it was from the hand of God (Eccl. 2:22–24).

When presented as a unit, these three verses create confusion. Without warning, the Preacher moves from a counsel of despair to a counsel of confidence. Why?

The Preacher asserts that the burdens of labor are great, and the results of our labor are problematical. He asks a rhetorical question: “For what hath man of all his labour, and of the taxation of his heart, wherein he hath labored under the sun” (v. 22)? So far in the book of Ecclesiastes, we have read that all is vanity. If all is vanity, then the output of labor is vanity. Then what are the blessings of labor, in and of themselves? There are none. “For all his days are sorrows, and his travails grief; yea, his heart taketh not rest in the night. This is also vanity” (v. 23).

A. Adam’s Curse

The curse on Adam involved the curse of his labor. “In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return” (Gen. 3:19).¹ The negative sanction brought pain to mankind. Labor was not originally a painful activity. It was a responsible activity, but it was not painful. The pain of labor is God’s curse for the sin of

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

Adam. It is not surprising that the Preacher has discovered that labor is filled with grief. That was the whole idea of the curse. If labor were constantly joyful, then the curse would be removed. The curse has not been removed, so labor has negative features.

God has brought judgment in history, and He will bring final judgment at the end of history. The pain of labor points to the pain of final judgment. But this pain will not be experienced by covenant-keepers. The pain of labor can be regarded as an advantage, for it points to deliverance in the future. This deliverance is based on progressive sanctification in history.

The Preacher is presenting the arguments of a covenant-breaking man. He finds that everything is vanity. It is vanity because covenant-breaking man asserts his autonomy from the God of the Bible, the law of the Bible, and the sanctions of this law. Autonomous man wants to believe that he does not have to consider the covenant. This is a fatal mistake. The Preacher is exploring covenant-breaking man's hoped-for avenues of escape from the sanctions of God. One of the negative sanctions of God is the curse on man's labor. The Preacher insists that his own labor has been futile. It has produced nothing but vanity. Because it has produced nothing but vanity, it can be said that labor itself is vanity. It is a waste of time. It is more than a waste of time; it is negative in and of itself.

B. A Call to Enjoyment

Next, he says that there is nothing better for a man to do in life than to eat and drink. A man should make his soul enjoy his labor. At this point, the expositor faces a challenge. Is this conclusion an extension of the logic of autonomous man, or is it a transition to biblical covenantalism?

Autonomous man is present-oriented. Death is sovereign.² Incompetents inherit.³ This exhortation to enjoy what you possess could be a logical conclusion of autonomy. Thrift is a curse. Thrift builds up capital for another person to inherit. So does excessive work. The past is vanity. The future is vanity. The present is enjoyable. Why not enjoy whatever you have accumulated so far? The present is assured. The future is uncertain. A bird in hand is worth two under the bush.

But there is a phrase that indicates that he has made a transition:

2. Chapter 3.

3. Chapter 4.

“he should make his soul enjoy good in his labour.” Why should autonomous man enjoy his labor? Isn’t labor a burden? Isn’t it vanity? This is what he has just said. “For what hath man of all his labour, and of the vexation of his heart, wherein he hath laboured under the sun? For all his days are sorrows, and his travail grief; yea, his heart taketh not rest in the night.”

Then, without warning, he praises labor. He says that his insight is based on this fact: a man’s wealth and labor are from the hand of God (v. 24). This appears to be an affirmation of the God of the Bible. This interpretation is confirmed by what he says in verse 26. “For God giveth to a man that is good in his sight wisdom, and knowledge, and joy: but to the sinner he giveth travail, to gather and to heap up, that he may give to him that is good before God. This also is vanity and vexation of spirit.”⁴ “In verse 24, he has begun his move from pessimism to optimism. He has moved from autonomy to theonomy. He will soon praise ethics as the basis of prosperity (v. 26).

Conclusion

In these verses, we see a shift of argumentation from covenant-breaking to covenant-keeping. The Preacher switches arguments because he switches his perspective. What he has said previously applies to the covenant-breaker. It does not apply to the covenant-keeper. Labor is vanity and vexation of spirit for covenant-breakers. It should not be for covenant-keepers.

4. Chapter 6.

6

PREDICTABLE ETHICAL SANCTIONS

For God giveth to a man that is good in his sight wisdom, and knowledge, and joy; but to the sinner he giveth travail, to gather and to heap up, that he may give to him that is good before God. This also is vanity and vexation of spirit (Eccl. 2:26).

A. Vanity and Vexation

Moses in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28 announced that God brings positive corporate sanctions to covenant-keeping societies. God also imposes negative corporate sanctions on covenant-breaking societies. This passage announces that God does the same with individuals. The Preacher then announces that this is vanity and vexation of spirit.

Why should he regard this system of historical sanctions as vanity and vexation of spirit? Throughout the book, he refers to the sovereignty of death as dominant.¹ Death swallows all of a man's output in life. Through the wealth left behind at a man's death, an heir will inherit. The accumulator of capital does not have any control over what his legacy will accomplish. The morality and skills of the heirs are indeterminate.²

He says that the sinner is given travail, "to gather and to heap up, that he may give to him that is good before God." This is what Solomon announced: "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov. 13:22).³ Why should this be vanity and produce vexation of spirit?

For a covenant-keeper, this system of historical causation can and

1. Chapters 3, 7, 30, 33, 35.

2. Chapters 2, 4, 5, 7, 13, 19, 21.

3. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 41.

should serve as the basis of an explicitly covenantal view of history. It offers legitimate hope for compound growth in every area of life. It means that the kingdom of God will steadily and inevitably dislodge the kingdoms of men in history. The wealth of the just is not laid up for the sinner. The covenant affirms that positive sanctions compound over time. The Preacher affirms this in this passage.

Then why does he dismiss this system of causation as vanity and vexation of spirit? Because he is speaking about the covenant-breaker's assessment of cause and effect. The covenant-breaker is vexed, not the covenant-keeper.

B. A Search and Expose Mission

The Preacher is conducting a search-and-expose mission against the philosophy of autonomous man. For a defender of autonomous man to realize that God has structured His system of individual sanctions in history to take away wisdom and joy from covenant-deniers, leaving them the unpleasant task of heaping up capital that will be inherited by covenant-keepers, is a form of vexation. The righteous get both wisdom and joy; the unrighteous get a life of meaningless hard labor.

The Preacher complains repeatedly about the hard work that careful thinking involves. The end of wisdom is a dead end. It is futile.

When I applied mine heart to know wisdom, and to see the business that is done upon the earth: (for also there is that neither day nor night seeth sleep with his eyes:) Then I beheld all the work of God, that a man cannot find out the work that is done under the sun: because though a man labour to seek it out, yet he shall not find it; yea further; though a wise man think to know it, yet shall he not be able to find it (Eccl. 8:16–17).⁴

Yet righteous men escape this burden. They get wisdom plus joy. This fact is vexatious for a covenant-breaker. It means that the universe is a personally rigged system. The battles of life do not take place on a level playing field. They take place on a playing field that is tilted to give advantages to covenant-keepers. The teams do not change sides on the field in the second half.

4. Chapter 32.

Conclusion

There is no clearer statement in the Bible than this verse with respect to the ethical basis of God's covenantal structure of individual causation. Covenant-keepers get blessings and capital. Covenant-breakers get the hard labor, risk, and the uncertainty involved in accumulating wealth, only to see it transferred to covenant-keepers. The Preacher acknowledges that this system was operational in his day. That it did exist vexes him. It vexes him in his self-designated capacity as a debater on the side of autonomous man.

If this system of ethical causation were annulled by the New Testament, it would no longer vex the Preacher, were he still alive, insofar as he spoke in the name of autonomous man. Autonomous man hopes that economic causation is not rigged in favor of covenant-keepers. So do millions of Christians.

Christians who fear the increase in personal responsibility that always accompanies greater wealth and influence (Luke 12:47–48)⁵ may find the Preacher's observations compelling: vanity and vexation. This is their theological problem. They do not understand that the reason why God gives wealth and influence to covenant-keeping individuals and societies is so that they can exercise greater responsibility. Responsibility-evading Christians do not acknowledge the dominion covenant.⁶

Unless this system of ethics-based economic causation has been explicitly reversed by the New Covenant, it still operates in New Testament times. I began studying this question in detail in 1973. It is now 2012. I have written 31 volumes indicating that this system of ethical causation still operates in economic affairs. It is the critics' responsibility to provide counter-evidence. So far, they have refused to respond to my evidence. I have waited a long time. I gather that I will have to wait even longer.

5. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

6. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, Christian Economics, 2012), ch. 4.

7

GODLY TIME AND BEASTLY TIME

To every thing there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven (Eccl. 3:1).

A. Time for Everything

The third chapter of the book of Ecclesiastes is probably its most famous chapter.¹ Chapter three describes familiar aspects of life. It covers the full range of human experience.

There is a poetic aspect to the chapter that makes it memorable.

A time to be born, and a time to die; a time to plant, and a time to pluck up that which is planted; A time to kill, and a time to heal; a time to break down, and a time to build up; A time to weep, and a time to laugh; a time to mourn, and a time to dance; A time to cast away stones, and a time to gather stones together; a time to embrace, and a time to refrain from embracing; A time to get, and a time to lose; a time to keep, and a time to cast away; A time to rend, and a time to sew; a time to keep silence, and a time to speak; A time to love, and a time to hate; a time of war, and a time of peace (vv. 2–8).

This list covers life-and-death issues and also minor issues. The reigning principle is this: each event has its own time. Each event is associated with comprehensive purposes under heaven. The timing of each event is not random. “He hath made every thing beautiful in his time: also he hath set the world in their heart, so that no man can find out the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end” (Eccl. 3:11).

This passage is not only poetic; it is profound. It is profound because it rests on a dual presupposition: the omniscience of God and the providence of God. It begins with the concept of purpose. If there is a time for every purpose under heaven, the implication is that purpose is simultaneously divine and temporal. The events of life are related to the events of eternity. This is why he says that the events cannot be changed. "I know that, whatsoever God doeth, it shall be for ever: nothing can be put to it, nor any thing taken from it: and God doeth it, that men should fear before him" (Eccl. 3:14). These events are permanent. Furthermore, God judges them. The Preacher speaks of the judgment of God in relation to purpose for every work. "I said in mine heart, God shall judge the righteous and the wicked: for there is a time there for every purpose and for every work" (v. 17).

1. There was a popular song in the 1960s, Turn, Turn, Turn, which was based on this chapter. (<http://bit.ly/TurnByrds>). Millions of young people heard it, never knowing its origin.

B. Rival Views in One Passage

There are elements of this passage that indicate that he is still arguing on the basis of cyclical history.² He says that what happens today has happened before. "That which hath been is now; and that which is to be hath already been; and God requireth that which is past" (v. 15). This was the common view of history in the ancient pagan world. It was only after the triumph of Christianity that the concept of linear time spread beyond the geographical limits of Palestine.

What does the author mean by saying that what is today has already been? If this is to be reconciled with the concept of linear history, which was a uniquely biblical concept in his day, then it must refer to the decree of God. It refers back in time to God's plan for the ages. If there is a time for every purpose under heaven, this purpose is God's purpose. If it is God's purpose, then it is part of a decree which unfolds in time. This decree rests on the concept of the sovereignty of God. Events are not random.

Cyclical history is not the primary meaning of this passage. The idea that the past cannot be changed is clearly based on the concept of linear history. If history is cyclical, then the past is irrelevant. It has happened before, and it will happen again. There is nothing unique about any event in history if history is cyclical. In contrast, if history is linear, then one thing leads to another. If there is coherence in history, and if there is meaning in history, then each event plays a role. This is the message conveyed by chapter three. There is a time for every purpose under heaven. Each period of time has relevance in relationship to all the other periods of time.

2. Chapter 1.

If history is linear, and if God judges every aspect of history, then history has meaning in terms of the imputation of meaning by God. God judges every aspect of history (v. 17). If God judges historical events, then He judges in terms of standards. This imputation of meaning to every event in history secures the relevance of every act in every man's life.

The concept of linear history is basic to Western civilization. It underlies another concept, which has its origin in Deuteronomy 28:1–14: long-term economic growth. The Book of Ecclesiastes does not speak of long-term economic growth, but this passage does indicate that history is linear.

C. The Role of Death

The chapter contains inconsistent principles. The author keeps referring back to death. He had already done this in chapter 3. The divide between biological life and death is the fundamental divide in the thinking of non-Christians. For Christianity, there is also a divide between life and death, but it takes place in history. There is physical death, but there is also eternal death. The division between eternal life and eternal death is grounded in history. The divide between covenantal life and death is the fundamental divide in Christianity. This divide takes place in history. “He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him” (John 3:36). Physical death delivers an individual into eternity. Eternity is marked by life and death. The Bible calls eternal death the second death. “And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death” (Rev. 20:14). Entry into eternal life takes place in history. It is confessional. It is judicial. It has to do with the special grace of God.

None of this was revealed under the Old Covenant. The division between physical life and physical death was seen as the supreme division. There are only a few passages in the Old Testament relating to life beyond the grave.³ The author of the Book of Ecclesiastes focuses on the division between physical life and death. He does so from the perspective of the covenant-breaker. He equates the life of the beast with the life of a man, because both of them die physically. “For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them: as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath; so that a man hath no preeminence above a beast: for all is vanity. All go unto one place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again" (Eccl. 3:19–20). He is emphatic: "I said in mine heart concerning the estate of the sons of men, that God might manifest them, and that they might see that they themselves are beasts" (v. 18). He also equates the life of the wise man and the fool, because both of them die physically (Eccl. 2:14).⁴

3. Job 14:14–15; Psalm 49:15; Isaiah 26:19; Daniel 12:1–2, 13; Hosea 13:14.

But he also says that God judges the righteous and the wicked (Eccl. 3:17). Because God judges the righteous and the wicked, then the differentiating criterion is ethics. It is not death. Autonomous death is impersonal and universal. If a man is no different from a beast, then ethics has nothing to do with the individual's judicial status or his role in history. But if man is judged by God, in every act in his life, then ethics serves as the relevant criterion to distinguish man from beast, a fool from a wise man, the righteous from the wicked. Chapter 3 presents both viewpoints. This is why the chapter is difficult to interpret.

He says that a beast and a man go to the same place (v. 20). This is an application of one aspect of God's curse on Adam. "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return" (Gen. 3:19).⁵ If Adam had not been made in God's image, then the end of Adam and the end of every beast would be the same: dust. But are they the same? The author indicates that they are not. He raises a question. He asks if anyone knows the spirit of man that goes upward and the spirit of the beast that goes downward into the earth (v. 21). So, there is a difference between a beast and a man. There is more to a man than there is to a beast. The author does not speak of God's judgment of the beasts. He does speak of God's judgment of men (v. 17).

D. What Is Good for Man

He says that there is nothing better than that a man should rejoice in his own works, for they are his portion (v. 22). Why does he conclude this? He asks this rhetorical question: Who shall bring him to see what shall be after him (v. 22)? The implied answer: no one. So, he has to be content with whatever he does in his life, because he does not know how his legacy will turn out. He does not know how his legacy will be used by his heirs. This theme is found in the second chapter. The Preacher is concerned about legacy. He is concerned about what the legacy is after the death of the testator.

4. Chapter 3.

5. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

The recurring theme of the Book of Ecclesiastes is vanity, i.e., hopelessness. The Preacher repeatedly insists that time is characterized by vanity. Then how can covenant-keepers make sense of time? If time is cyclical, then it has no meaning. There is no cosmic judge. Everything repeats itself. Therefore, everything is equally irrelevant. On the other hand, if God judges men's actions in history, then these events are relevant in terms of the purposes of God. Individuals have purposes, but God is the judge. God evaluates the righteousness or wickedness of a particular act. Everything that takes place takes place in terms of the decree of God. There is a time for every purpose under heaven.

From an economic point of view, the concept of linear time makes possible the linked concepts of progress and economic growth. If time is cyclical, there is no permanent progress or economic growth. Everything will repeat itself. Everything that takes place today is as relevant or as irrelevant as everything that took in a previous identical yesterday.

Conclusion

In Ecclesiastes, we are presented with rival views of time until the last few verses. The Preacher goes back and forth between the pagan view of time and the biblical view, between meaninglessness and providence. The internal debate is clearest in chapter 3. If history is cyclical, it is without purpose.⁶ If history is purposeful, it is not cyclical. It is linear: beginning, development, culmination, followed by God's judgment. Then it is transcended by glorification. This is the message of the Bible and its imitations.

6. The highly popular comedy film, Groundhog Day (1993), is a good presentation of this theme. A man who is trapped in a recurring day unsuccessfully seeks suicide. The movie cheats, because he does recall the previous days. He learns. Eventually, he repents.

8

THE JOY OF CONSUMING

I have seen the travail, which God hath given to the sons of men to be exercised in it. He hath made every thing beautiful in his time: also he hath set the world in their heart, so that no man can find out the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end. I know that there is no good in them, but for a man to rejoice, and to do good in his life. And also that every man should eat and drink, and enjoy the good of all his labour, it is the gift of God (Eccl. 3:10–13).

A. The Fruits of Our Labor

The Preacher continues his exposition of the purposefulness of historical events.¹ God is in charge. He has made everything beautiful in His time. He is sovereign over time. This is not autonomous man speaking.

The King James' translators made a mess of the next two verses. "I know that there is no good in them." No good in what? This makes no sense. The phrase "in them" is not in the Hebrew. The American Standard Version, published in 1901, is much clearer. It substitutes "for them" for "in them."

He hath made everything beautiful in its time: also he hath set eternity in their heart, yet so that man cannot find out the work that God hath done from the beginning even to the end. I know that there is nothing better for them, than to rejoice, and to do good so long as they live (vv. 11–12).

Quite similar is the recent English Standard Version.

He has made everything beautiful in its time. Also, he has put eternity into man's heart, yet so that he cannot find out what God has done from the beginning to the end. I perceived that there is nothing better for them than to be joyful and to do good as long as they live (vv. 11–12).

1. Chapter 7.

The Preacher makes three points. First, men have a sense of eternity in their hearts. This testimony confronts them all their lives. Second, men have limited understanding of past events. The details of God's work in history are closed to them. History is extremely complex. Third, men are to be content with their limited knowledge. They are to spend their lives doing good. This ethical framework undergirds this entire passage. It is clearly covenantal in its perspective.

A person should enjoy the fruits of his labor. "And also that every man should eat and drink, and enjoy the good of all his labour, it is the gift of God." This emphasis on consumption is found in several passages in his book.² This is guilt-free consumption. This is not the lifestyle of an ascetic, nor is it the way of a monastic order.

B. Legitimate Consumption

The good products of a man's labor are God's gift to him. He possesses them lawfully. Therefore, he can consume them legitimately. There is no suggestion that consumption is some form of ethical deviation. A man has expended what lawfully belonged to him: his labor. From this expenditure has come a reward. The Preacher calls it a gift from God.

This is not the first time he uses the language of consumption. "There is nothing better for a man, than that he should eat and drink, and that he should make his soul enjoy good in his labour. This also I saw, that it was from the hand of God" (Eccl. 2:24). The context of this affirmation was one of despair and futility. The fruit of a man's labor can be inherited by another. This seems to be a great waste.

For there is a man whose labour is in wisdom, and in knowledge, and in equity; yet to a man that hath not laboured therein shall he leave it for his portion. This also is vanity and a great evil. For what hath man of all his labour, and of the vexation of his heart, wherein he hath laboured under the sun? For all his days are sorrows, and his travail grief; yea, his heart taketh not rest in the night. This is also vanity (Eccl. 2:21–23).³

The future is uncertain. The present is certain. Therefore, he concluded, a wise man should enjoy whatever belongs to him for as long as he can. There is no hope in inheritance. This is a present-oriented outlook. It makes sense for autonomous man.

2. Chapters 5, 8, 20.

3. Chapter 5.

How much sense does it make for a covenant-keeper? Here, he concludes the same as he did before, but he does so on a different basis. It has to do with the providence of God. "I know that, whatsoever God doeth, it shall be for ever: nothing can be put to it, nor any thing taken from it: and God doeth it, that men should fear before him" (Eccl. 3:14). God is absolutely sovereign over the affairs of men. When labor produces fruits, they may lawfully be consumed by the owner. But this legal right of consumption is not the result of despair over the future. On the contrary, the Preacher affirms that God is in control over all things. Why should a godly man despair? Consumption is an affirmation of the future. "There is more where that came from!"

C. The Decree of God

Then the Preacher adds something that has baffled commentators. "That which hath been is now; and that which is to be hath already been; and God requireth that which is past" (v. 15). The Hebrew word translated "requireth" is obscure. Commentators and translators cannot agree about its meaning. Some have translated it as "driven away" (ESV). Others have translated it as "passed away" (ASV). Another: "does everything over and over again" (CEV).⁴ The mid-nineteenth-century commentator, E. W. Hengstenberg, invoked a Psalm to explain it. "Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being unperfect; and in thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them" (Psalm 139:16). He explained the passage as a matter of God's decree. The decree is past; the event is recent. He wrote that "our whole existence from beginning to end is pre-ordained by God. . . . What was (or became) is already, existed already in the divine counsels before it was openly manifested, and hence we learn, that God's decrees decide everything. . . ."⁵ The phrase, "That which hath been is now; and that which is to be hath already been," refers to the decree of God. The events of today and tomorrow have their origin in the distant past, before the foundation of the world. Paul wrote:

4. Contemporary English Version.

5. E. W. Hengstenberg, Commentary on Ecclesiastes (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clarke, 1860), p. 111.

Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ: According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love: Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will, To the praise of the glory of his grace, wherein he hath made us accepted in the beloved (Eph. 1:3–6).

This approach to the text makes more sense than numerous commentators' convoluted attempts to explain this passage without adopting the theory of cyclical history that the Preacher presents in the book's opening words. One commentator proclaims, "It is God who keeps the cycles of nature and history going; the believer's hope is as immutable as the pessimist's despair."⁶ But if history is cyclical, where is the hope of progress? That is the heart of the pessimist's despair.

D. Judgment and Progress

The Preacher then ties what he has said about a time for every purpose under heaven to the doctrine of God's judgment. This is the doctrine of sanctions. Recall that the Preacher was speaking of history, not eternity. The chapter is about the events of history. "And moreover I saw under the sun the place of judgment, that wickedness was there; and the place of righteousness, that iniquity was there. I said in mine heart, God shall judge the righteous and the wicked: for there is a time there for every purpose and for every work" (Eccl. 3:16–17). God will judge evil judges in His good time. He will restore justice.

The idea here is that history is not random, nor is it cyclical. It is under the sovereignty of God, whose decree governs all things. Unjust judges will be brought under God's judgment. The reign of evildoers will end. Later, he declares: "If thou seest the oppression of the poor, and violent perverting of judgment and justice in a province, marvel not at the matter: for he that is higher than the highest regardeth; and there be higher than they" (Eccl. 5:8).⁷

The hope of a future reign of justice is not thwarted by the doctrine of cyclical history. It is strengthened by the doctrine of the providence of God. What appears to be a reaffirmation of cyclical history—"That which hath been is now; and that which is to be hath already been"—is in fact its refutation. History moves forward according to God's decree. His promise to Adam and Eve is inescapable. "And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel" (Gen. 3:15).

6. Michael A. Eaton, Ecclesiastes: An Introduction and Commentary (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1983), p. 82.

7. Chapter 17.

Conclusion

The Preacher recommends joyful consumption, not because this is man's only refuge in a hostile, meaningless world in which the future is uncertain, but because God is in complete control. We can consume today because we have hope in tomorrow. As the prophet Jeremiah proclaimed, "It is of the LORD'S mercies that we are not consumed, because his compassions fail not. They are new every morning: great is thy faithfulness. The LORD is my portion, saith my soul; therefore will I hope in him" (Lam. 3:22–24).

Covenant man is a producer and a consumer. He consumes in confidence because the fruits of his labor are assured, not just in his own lifetime but in years to come. Given God's decree before the foundation of the world, "That which is to be hath already been."

9

OPPRESSION AND THE OPPRESSED

So I returned, and considered all the oppressions that are done under the sun: and behold the tears of such as were oppressed, and they had no comforter; and on the side of their oppressors there was power; but they had no comforter (Eccl. 4:1).

A. A Sign of Corruption

One of the marks of a corrupt society is this: there is extensive oppression of the weak. The weak are generally categorized by three groups: widows, orphans, and strangers. Throughout the Old Covenant, there are warnings to oppressors. The Mosaic law was hostile to oppressors. The Preacher is hostile to oppression.

This passage says explicitly that the oppressor uses power to oppress people. What is the meaning of “power”? The Hebrew word means what it does in English: strength. It also can refer to ability. “And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth” (Deut. 8:17).¹ The Preacher says that the oppressors have power, but the victims have no comforter. This indicates that the Preacher is concerned about the misuse of power. The oppressors had power on their side; the oppressed had no one. This indicates that both the power and the comforter were personal. He was not speaking of impersonal forces. He was speaking of judicial authorities. He was speaking of people standing ready to intervene on one side or the other.

B. No Comforter?

The Preacher identifies the problem: the misuse of power by oppressors. These people know that the civil government will not intervene to defend the victims. The victims have no comforter. They are helpless. This is why the oppressors are in a position to oppress them.

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 21.

The Preacher is ignoring what the Bible teaches about God as the Comforter. The psalmist cried out: "Judge me, O God, and plead my cause against an ungodly nation: O deliver me from the deceitful and unjust man" (Psalm 43:1). The Psalms contain many passages about God as Deliverer. The phrase "right hand," referring to God's power, appears repeatedly.

I have called upon thee, for thou wilt hear me, O God: incline thine ear unto me, and hear my speech. Shew thy marvellous lovingkindness, O thou that savest by thy right hand them which put their trust in thee from those that rise up against them (Psalm 17:6–7).

We will rejoice in thy salvation, and in the name of our God we will set up our banners: the LORD fulfil all thy petitions. Now know I that the LORD saveth his anointed; he will hear him from his holy heaven with the saving strength of his right hand. Some trust in chariots, and some in horses: but we will remember the name of the LORD our God. They are brought down and fallen: but we are risen, and stand upright (Psalm 20:5–8).

So, the Preacher is speaking as a covenant-breaker. He is not testifying faithfully to the character of God. He is saying that the oppressed appear to be without a comforter.

What he saw with his eyes is not in fact the case. The vanity that he sees in this oppression is an illusion. There is a source of justice in history. "Thou hast a mighty arm: strong is thy hand, and high is thy right hand. Justice and judgment are the habitation of thy throne: mercy and truth shall go before thy face" (Psalm 89:13–14).

C. Biblical Law

The Preacher does not suggest a reform in this passage, but he does in the final verses of the book. "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil" (Eccl. 12:13–14).²

There is a standard of justice: biblical law. The question then is this: What does biblical law teach about oppression and deliverance?

2. Chapter 45.

First, it tells the oppressed to call on God's name. "Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth, and let the wicked be no more. Bless thou the LORD, O my soul. Praise ye the LORD" (Psalm 104:35).

Second, it provides standards of justice: biblical statutes. Those seeking deliverance from injustice need to have a standard of justice that is reliable and permanent. This standard exists.

Biblical economic law rests on the concept of God as sovereign Owner. Its fundamental economic law of justice is this: "Thou shalt not steal" (Ex. 20:15).³ Then there is the principle of restitution.

If a man shall steal an ox, or a sheep, and kill it, or sell it; he shall restore five oxen for an ox, and four sheep for a sheep. If a thief be found breaking up, and be smitten that he die, there shall no blood be shed for him. If the sun be risen upon him, there shall be blood shed for him; for he should make full restitution; if he have nothing, then he shall be sold for his theft. If the theft be certainly found in his hand alive, whether it be ox, or ass, or sheep; he shall restore double (Ex. 22:1-4).⁴

The principle of the landmark must be obeyed. This is another defense against theft.

Thou shalt not remove thy neighbour's landmark, which they of old time have set in thine inheritance, which thou shalt inherit in the land that the LORD thy God giveth thee to possess it (Deut. 19:14).⁵

Remove not the ancient landmark, which thy fathers have set (Prov. 22:28).⁶

The Mosaic law protected society against oppressors. When it was not enforced by government, beginning with self-government, oppressors began to emerge.

This view of oppression is rarely discussed by the social critics who want to substitute other law-orders for biblical law.

D. The Social Gospel

Defenders of the Social Gospel and other proponents of increased

3. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 5.

4. Ibid., Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 43.

5. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 44.

6. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 70.

state power in the name of Christian evangelicalism see the words “oppress” and “oppression,” and they conclude that the text is talking about rich people who oppress poor people by hiring them at low wages or by paying them too little money for the goods they sell. The focus of their outrage is the free market. They are hostile to the principle of voluntary exchange. They are hostile to the concept of a social order which is based on voluntary exchange, contracts, and markets for making bids to buy and sell. They believe that the free-market social order is characterized by oppression. They never explain the free-market as the product of the private property system which the Mosaic law required, and which Jesus and the authors of the New Testament epistles did not oppose and did not criticize. Their hostility to the free market is total. They give no sign whatsoever of understanding even the most fundamental of free-market principles, such as supply and demand. They are actively opposed to that other fundamental principle of the free market: high bid wins. They want other winners and other winning principles. They do not discuss the details of these alternatives, such as allocation by political power or allocation by standing in line. Then there is that other familiar distribution system, allocation by sexual favors.

This hostility to the free-market social order colors everything that Social Gospel advocates write about the economy or what the Bible supposedly says about economics.⁷ This is to be expected. What I write is colored my understanding of the free-market social order, which is the result of the system of private property which was established by the Mosaic law. There is no escape from one’s presuppositions about the way the world works. The main question is not what the writers’ presuppositions are. The main question is what the Bible really says.

7. Joel McDurmon, God Versus Socialism: A Biblical Critique of the New Social Gospel (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2009).

Conclusion

“So I returned, and considered all the oppressions that are done under the sun: and behold the tears of such as were oppressed, and they had no comforter; and on the side of their oppressors there was power; but they had no comforter.” The Preacher is speaking as a covenant-breaker. He is criticizing the social order around him. If he was Solomon, as seems likely, he was in a position to deliver the oppressed from the hand of the oppressors. He could serve as a comforter. Why such despair?

He was commenting on the way of the world. This is the way the world operates in the eyes of decent autonomous men. There is no deliverance from oppression. All this is vanity. It is also incorrect.

10

ENVY UNDERMINES SUCCESS

Again, I considered all travail, and every right work, that for this a man is envied of his neighbour. This is also vanity and vexation of spirit (Eccl. 4:4).

A. Envious Neighbors

The Preacher speaks representatively as a covenant-breaker. He speaks as if there were no God who evaluates human actions, and who then brings judgment, both in history and eternity.

He says that men—literally males, the Hebrew word indicates—are envied by their neighbors. Those close to a man are his silent enemies. They resent him. Why? Because of the advantages he possesses: right works. The phrase is not talking about good works in the sense of charitable works. It means works that offer a person an advantage.

The man works hard, the text says. Tasks impose costs. The man does not operate on the assumption that he can get something for nothing. He sacrifices in the present for the sake of the future. This buys him no favor with his critics. They resent his success just as much as if he had inherited his wealth. It is his success that they resent. He is unable to justify his wealth to his critics.

The Preacher understands that envy is a common sin in every society that has not taken active steps to reduce it. I do not mean judicial steps. I mean social steps. Children must be taught from an early stage not to resent those who are more successful than they are. Much of the process we call socialization is a system of instruction to increase social cooperation by reducing people's indulgence in envy.

B. The Seeming Futility of Success

In a society in which envy is common, success is not worth the effort it requires. The Preacher dismisses success as vanity. It elicits envy. Who needs success on these terms?

This assumes that success is generic, that no one distinguishes one success from another. Success of every kind elicits envy. Because most people seek to avoid envy, their quest for success is futile. Their success comes not only at the price of the travail required to reach it and maintain it. It comes at the price of envy.

But what if this assumption is incorrect? What if other people do distinguish one form of success from another? What if envy is selective? What if people do possess and honor standards of success that distinguish between vanity and productivity? In a society that resents all success, then the Preacher's point is well taken. To achieve success is vanity. It will not satisfy the achiever if he wishes to be respected or loved or honored. This is the society the Preacher perceives. It is a society that is not affected by biblical preaching.

Success is legitimate. It is the appropriate reward for covenant-keeping.

This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein: for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success (Josh. 1:8).

And keep the charge of the LORD thy God, to walk in his ways, to keep his statutes, and his commandments, and his judgments, and his testimonies, as it is written in the law of Moses, that thou mayest prosper in all that thou doest, and whithersoever thou turnest thyself (1 Kings 2:3).

The Preacher is not speaking on behalf of a society that is governed by the providence of God in terms of His law. It is governed by some other god or principle of judgment.

Conclusion

The Preacher disdains success. He does so in the name of a covenant-breaking society. He is hammering another nail into the coffin of covenant-breaking society. Success is not worth the required price, either on the front end—travail—or the back end: envy. He performs a cost-benefit analysis of success in a covenant-breaking society, and concludes that success is not worth the effort. Autonomy leads to a view of the world that despairs of permanent progress. Such an outlook is anti-growth. Growth requires sacrifice in the present and a transfer of an ever-larger inheritance to successive generations. The cost of this sacrifice is too high for the uncertain benefits obtainable.

11

SLOTH AND STARVATION

The fool foldeth his hands together, and eateth his own flesh (Eccl. 4:5).

A. Folded Hands, Empty Stomach

This is a graphic metaphor. The image of a man eating his own flesh is memorable. But what does the metaphor mean?

The key to understanding this metaphor is the image of folded hands. In the Book of Proverbs, the author repeats this proverb: “Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep: So shall thy poverty come as one that travelleth, and thy want as an armed man” (Prov. 6:10–11; 24:33–34).¹ Folded hands are an image of sloth. They are not folded in prayer.

The Preacher has provided a proverb. This proverb is placed in between two observations about the futility of the pursuit of wealth.

Again, I considered all travail, and every right work, that for this a man is envied of his neighbour. This is also vanity and vexation of spirit (v. 4).

Better is an handful with quietness, than both the hands full with travail and vexation of spirit (v. 6).

Yet this proverb rejects sloth as a way of life. Sloth is a way of death. It is a form of consumption: self-consumption. It purchases leisure with poverty. That is too high a price to pay, he says.

This is a covenant-keeper talking. A covenant-breaker is talking in verse 4. The Preacher in his role as a covenant-breaker dismisses all great productivity as vanity. It gets a man envied in a covenant-breaking society.² The price is too high.

1. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 75.

If a man folds his hands together, he cannot work to redeem society: to buy it back subordinately because Christ bought it back definitively (Matt. 28:18–20).³ He cannot get rich. He cannot make any significant impact on society. He is a consumer of wealth, not a producer of wealth. He is a fool.

B. Hostility to Poverty

The Bible is hostile to poverty as a way of life. It is a condition that people are supposed to avoid.

Remove far from me vanity and lies: give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me: Lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the LORD? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain (Prov. 30:8–9).⁴

They should pray for deliverance, not parity, just as Mary prayed.

He hath shewed strength with his arm; he hath scattered the proud in the imagination of their hearts. He hath put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree. He hath filled the hungry with good things; and the rich he hath sent empty away (Luke 1:51–53).⁵

The Preacher dismisses great wealth as a source of anxiety (Eccl. 2:26).⁶ Here, he dismisses sloth as source of poverty. He recommends avoiding both.

He blames poverty on sloth. Sloth is a fool's game. It is destructive. It is like feeding on your own limb. It is suicidal.

He could have blamed poverty on oppression. He had already dealt with oppression (4:1).⁷ He could have referred back to oppression, but he did not. Instead, he came up with a metaphor that has survived the test of time. Three millennia later, people still imagine a man eating

2. Chapter 10.

3. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 48. Cf. Kenneth L. Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

4. North, Wisdom and Dominion, ch. 85.

5. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 1.

6. Chapter 6.

7. Chapter 5.

part of his body.

Conclusion

This metaphor targets sloth. Vanity, vanity, all is vanity, but sloth is foolish vanity, which is worse than street-smart vanity. Better is one handful with quiet than two hands full with vexation of spirit. Better two hands full with vexation of spirit (v. 6)⁸ than two hands folded and therefore empty. Something is better than nothing.

8. Chapter 12.

12

PEACE AND QUIET

Better is an handful with quietness, than both the hands full with travail and vexation of spirit (Eccl. 4:6).

A. A New Experience

The Preacher was a man with great wealth. He could afford to savor all sides of life in his quest for meaning, including leisure and high consumption. Either he inherited his wealth or else he earned it. He had not experienced quietness.

He sees the advantages of quietness. It is preferable to travail and vexation of spirit. He has experienced travail and vexation of spirit. He sees vanity everywhere. This vexes his spirit. Here, he compares less with more. He recognizes that travail and vexation of spirit often accompany more. Better to have less.

He is not comparing something with nothing. He is comparing more with less. He speaks of a handful in one situation and two hands full in another. There is a two-to-one ratio. Under such circumstances, better one handful than two.

He is admitting that sometimes it is possible to avoid travail and vexation of spirit. He does not compare one handful, accompanied by half the travail and vexation of spirit, with two hands full and twice the travail and vexation of spirit. The negatives associated with two hands full are not present with one handful. The implication is that a person can attain a life free of the negatives.

He is not saying that there is a fixed relationship between fewer possessions and the absence of vexations. He is saying only that when the opportunity exists to choose a lifestyle with fewer goods and no vexation, a wise man takes it. A case in point was Lot. He chose the more desirable region to live in when he departed from Abraham (Gen. 13:10–11). In Sodom, he was vexed (II Peter 2:7–8). He was surrounded by evil men. His wealth did not relieve his vexation. God delivered him by taking him away from Sodom. He lived in the hills with only his two scheming daughters to comfort him. But this was better than remaining in Sodom, even in its pre-judgment days.

B. The Spirit of Enterprise

The Preacher recommends quietness. This is not the road to riches. To accumulate great wealth peacefully, a person must be entrepreneurial. He must be willing to bear uncertainty.¹ He can lose substantial portions of his wealth. Few entrepreneurs live lives of quietness, especially when they are accumulating their wealth.

This raises a crucial question. How can the economy grow if there are few entrepreneurs? How will technology be improved? If having a little with quietness is better than having a lot with anxiety, then the God-fearing entrepreneur must either give up innovating and take a salary or else succeed in being a calm entrepreneur. This skill is so rare as to be unheard of. Yet this is what the covenant-keeping entrepreneur must strive to become. If he lives a life of constant turmoil in his quest for profit, he has fallen into a trap.

He must trust in God. The Psalms are filled with advice in this regard, most famously, the twenty-third Psalm. “Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me” (Psalm 23:4). If death does not scare him, why should he worry about a 23% decline in earnings in the third quarter?

C. The Apostles

What of the early apostles? They did not experience quietness. They also did not possess great wealth. Their work was kingdom-building. Yet Paul had a form of quietness: contentment.

Not that I speak in respect of want: for I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content. I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound: every where and in all things I am instructed both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to

1. From the point of view of economic theory, he does not take risks. Risks can be dealt with by insurance because they are part of a class of events governed by the law of large numbers. The entrepreneur deals with events that are not part of a class. These events cannot be insured. The classic study on this is Frank H. Knight, Risk, Uncertainty, and Profit (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1921). (<http://bit.ly/KnightRUP>) suffer need. I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me (Phil. 4:11–13).²

For Paul, quietness was a matter of inner peace, not a low-risk environment.

With increased wealth comes increased responsibility. Jesus said,

And that servant, which knew his lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more (Luke 12:47–48).³

If added responsibility creates anxiety in someone's life, then the solution is to avoid additional wealth. This also applies to power, fame, and prestige.

Conclusion

To reduce the disquietude of wealth, either reduce your wealth or else reduce your concern about wealth. There is no third option. Both strategies require faith. The first requires faith that you will not fall into poverty. The second requires the same. It also requires faith that becoming less rich is not a setback worth worrying about.

2. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 23.

3. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

13

MINDLESS ACCUMULATION

There is one alone, and there is not a second; yea, he hath neither child nor brother: yet is there no end of all his labour; neither is his eye satisfied with riches; neither saith he, For whom do I labour, and bereave my soul of good? This is also vanity, yea, it is a sore travail (Eccl. 4:8).

A. Labor on Whose Behalf?

This is a lone wolf talking. He has no close relatives. In terms of the Mosaic law, his kinsman-redeemer was distant. Who would inherit his property? No one close to him. Nevertheless, he works hard. He accumulates wealth. In the words of the Preacher, his eye is never satisfied. He is a devoted practitioner of the religion of Mammon (Matt. 6:24–25). Mammon’s disciples work out their confession: “More for me in history.”¹

He does not sit quietly to examine his life. “Neither saith he, For whom do I labour, and bereave my soul of good?” By “soul,” the Preacher does not mean eternal soul. He means life. But Jesus extended this to refer to his eternal soul.

And he spake a parable unto them, saying, The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully: And he thought within himself, saying, What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits? And he said, This will I do: I will pull down my barns, and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods. And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry. But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then whose shall those things be, which thou hast provided? So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God (Luke

1. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 14.

12:16–21).²

The Preacher recognizes the foolishness of the lone wolf. This is a rugged individualist. The Preacher does not say that he works alone. The man's isolated status is familistic. He has no close heirs. He slaves away for the benefit of near-strangers. He does so knowingly, unlike the residents of Canaan in the years before the invasion of the Israelites.

A man in Israel who had no heir had no name. The law governing the inheritance of a married man without a son required his nearby brother to father a child with the widow. Why? To maintain his name in Israel.

If brethren dwell together, and one of them die, and have no child, the wife of the dead shall not marry without unto a stranger: her husband's brother shall go in unto her, and take her to him to wife, and perform the duty of an husband's brother unto her. And it shall be, that the firstborn which she beareth shall succeed in the name of his brother which is dead, that his name be not put out of Israel (Deut. 25:5–6).³

This law applied only to a brother who lived in close proximity. It did not apply to a distant brother.

The man described by the Preacher has no child and no brother. It is not said whether he has a wife. As far as his inheritance mattered—his name in Israel—this did not matter. There would be no brotherly marriage. If he died and his widow remarried, the land would go to her children. Her new husband's name would be established in Israel. His would be forgotten—judicially forgotten. This was a great curse in Mosaic Israel.

B. Rugged Individualism

There is an American tradition extolling the rugged individualist. Given the intensely cooperative history of the United States, this is a tradition without meaningful examples. There were trappers and explorers in early America, but they are extolled for their exploits of bravery and survival, not their legacy. The most famous of these rugged individualists, Daniel Boone, was in fact a land developer in the late eighteenth century. He moved west, but only after he had established a community: Boonesborough, Kentucky. He left for Missouri in 1799 when he could not get his land claims settled.

2. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 25.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 64.

Alexis de Tocqueville, visiting the United States for less than a year in the spring of 1831, penned these memorable words, widely read and widely accepted, which were published in 1840 and which have remained in print ever since.

Americans of all ages, all conditions, and all dispositions, constantly form associations. They have not only commercial and manufacturing companies, in which all take part, but associations of a thousand other kinds—religious, moral, serious, futile, extensive, or restricted, enormous or diminutive. The Americans make associations to give entertainments, to found establishments for education, to build inns, to construct churches, to diffuse books, to send missionaries to the antipodes; and in this manner they found hospitals, prisons, and schools. If it be proposed to advance some truth, or to foster some feeling by the encouragement of a great example, they form a society. Wherever, at the head of some new undertaking, you see the government in France, or a man of rank in England, in the United States you will be sure to find an association.⁴

The Preacher has little use for the rugged individualist. He has no use for any kind of individualism. Men are covenant creatures. They live in communities bound by covenants. They are bound to each other through family, tradition, exchange, and formal covenants.

The man who works exclusively for himself is an aberration. He has given his life to the pursuit of vanity. If there is one character in Anglo-American literature who embodies this lifestyle, it is Ebenezer Scrooge. His deliverance—his redemption—is achieved through holiday celebration of a Christless Christmas. His heir, through his own choice, is Tiny Tim. The rugged individualist dies when he sees the grave of Christmas future.

C. Methodological Individualism

The logic of the free market explains economic motivation as self-interest. The Preacher explains this as a matter of blindness. He is accumulating an inheritance for strangers. His legacy is under his control only for a few years. His ability to shape the use of that inheritance is non-existent. This does not apply to him: "Train up a child in the way he should go: and when he is old, he will not depart from it" (Prov. 22:6). He has no child.

4. Alexis de Tocqueville, Democracy in America, 2 vols., translated by Henry Reeve (Gutenberg Project, [1840]), II:II:V.

This means that the methodological individualism of Adam Smith's economics is also a matter of blindness. Economic theory must be qualified by covenantal considerations, the most important being inheritance. Family inheritance, like family resource allocation, is not governed by the free market's supreme law of pricing: high bid wins.

The principle of methodological covenantalism governs Christian economics. The free market is more than a system based on private property and voluntary exchange. Covenant is superior to contract, both judicially and conceptually.

Conclusion

The Preacher identifies a blind man. He accumulates wealth, but for what purpose? His covenantal legal status is in conflict with his contractual economic status. He is building up wealth for strangers to inherit. He is a one-generation man. Such a person is blinded by vanity, according to the Preacher.

14

THE DIVISION OF LABOR

Two are better than one; because they have a good reward for their labour. For if they fall, the one will lift up his fellow: but woe to him that is alone when he falleth; for he hath not another to help him up. Again, if two lie together, then they have heat: but how can one be warm alone? And if one prevail against him, two shall withstand him; and a threefold cord is not quickly broken (Eccl. 4:9–12).

A. Trinitarian Economics

The origin of this recommendation is the Trinity. God is three persons. In relation to the creation, each has specific tasks. Jesus said of the Holy Spirit,

But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you (John 14:26).

But when the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me: And ye also shall bear witness, because ye have been with me from the beginning (John 15:26–27).

He said of Himself, “I must be about my Father’s business” (Luke 2:49b). The context was work.

But Jesus answered them, My Father worketh hitherto, and I work (John 5:17).

I can of mine own self do nothing: as I hear, I judge: and my judgment is just; because I seek not mine own will, but the will of the Father which hath sent me (John 5:30).

Then said Jesus unto them, When ye have lifted up the Son of man, then shall ye know that I am he, and that I do nothing of myself; but as my Father hath taught me, I speak these things. And he that sent me is with me: the Father hath not left me alone; for I do always those things that please him (John 8:28–29).

B. Adam's Labor

With respect to point two of the biblical covenant, hierarchy,¹ mankind reflects what God is. God promised Himself that He would provide a partner for Adam. Adam needed help. God promised a helper fit (meet) for him. But first, Adam had to complete an assignment. He would learn about work. This work was definitional. He would name the animals. He would define them and their place in the world.

And the LORD God said, It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him an help meet for him. And out of the ground the LORD God formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air; and brought them unto Adam to see what he would call them: and whatsoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof. And Adam gave names to all cattle, and to the fowl of the air, and to every beast of the field; but for Adam there was not found an help meet for him (Gen. 2:18–20).

Then God gave Eve to Adam. He immediately named her in terms of her origin. “And Adam said, This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh: she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of Man” (Gen. 2:23).

Before sin, there was a harmony of interests. People were not at war with each other. They were supposed to cooperate. This would make their work more productive.² The original goal for mankind has not changed: exercising dominion over the creation (Gen. 1:27–28).³ This involves the extension of man's authority over nature. This is a cooperative venture.

C. Scattering and Dominion

God thwarted the sin of man at the Tower of Babel by scattering them. This reduced their power. Otherwise, they would have pursued

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 10.

3. Ibid., ch. 4.

their goal of building a symbolic tower that would reach to heaven.

And the LORD said, Behold, the people is one, and they have all one language; and this they begin to do: and now nothing will be restrained from them, which they have imagined to do. Go to, let us go down, and there confound their language, that they may not understand one another's speech. So the LORD scattered them abroad from thence upon the face of all the earth: and they left off to build the city (Gen. 11:6–8).

This weakened mankind politically and culturally, for it decreased the division of labor. The people were no longer one. Yet this geographical scattering also extended man's influence over nature. Mankind spread out across the face of the earth. Subsequently, international trade made possible the division of labor.⁴ There was a re-establishment of unity through diversity: diversity of talents, vision, and programs. The quest for profit brought limited cooperation. But one factor above all others maintained separation: confession of faith. Man had been of one tongue, both linguistically and theologically. He had worshipped man. "And they said, Go to, let us build us a city and a tower, whose top may reach unto heaven; and let us make us a name, lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth" (Gen. 11:4). They wanted to make a name for themselves: to define themselves and their place in the world. God put a stop to this. Their greatest fear became God's negative sanction against them: scattering.

D. Overcoming Individualism

Individualism is rugged. It is rugged because it is inefficient.

The division of labor benefits those who are less rugged. They can achieve together what they could not have achieved individually. The division of labor makes each of the participants more efficient. It also reduces risk for all participants. "But woe to him that is alone when he falleth; for he hath not another to help him up."

The text indicates that more is better than fewer. "And if one prevail against him, two shall withstand him; and a threefold cord is not quickly broken." The larger the community of cooperation, the less there is to fear from invaders.

"Two are better than one; because they have a good reward for their labour." They both benefit, which means their output is increased more than two-fold.

4. Ibid., ch. 15.

The introductory chapters of Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations (1776) is an application of this passage. Smith shows that a team of men of limited skills can cooperate to produce a simple pin. A solitary producer must be highly skilled to make a pin. He can produce few per day. A factory with the proper equipment can produce thousands of pins. Pins become common consumer goods because of mass production and price competition. This is made possible by the specialization involved in the division of labor. Each person concentrates on what he does best.

Conclusion

The division of labor has empowered the weak. It has made all participants more productive. This has increased per capita wealth. What one person cannot accomplish, two can do. It pays them both to do it.

This is not the central fact of Christian economics. Neither is scarcity. Ownership is. God's ownership is the starting point. Adam Smith made the division of labor the starting point. Modern economists make scarcity the starting point. Both of these starting points can be subsumed under the physical limits of nature. This makes them seem morally neutral starting points. They conceal the fundamental fact of Christian economics: God owns everything. This fact is anything but neutral.

By subsuming the division of labor under the doctrine of the Trinity, I have made my discussion of the division of labor highly unneutral. That is my task in every volume in this commentary: to make Christian economics unneutral. That which is theocentric is not neutral, and everything in creation is theocentric. Nothing is anthropocentric. Nothing is diabolocentric.

WISDOM AND SOCIAL MOBILITY

Better is a poor and a wise child than an old and foolish king, who will no more be admonished. For out of prison he cometh to reign; whereas also he that is born in his kingdom becometh poor (Eccl. 4:13–14).

A. Hierarchy and Social Mobility

Here, the Preacher speaks as a covenant-keeper. He announces that someone is better than someone else. This means that there is a standard of performance. Wisdom is the decisive differentiating factor between better and worse. In contrast, autonomous man says that there is no difference between wisdom and foolishness, for death consumes everyone (Eccl. 2:15–17).¹

The biblical structure of society allows for two-way social mobility. Individuals can rise and fall. There is no security in any high position, and there is also no permanent servitude. Ezekiel warned the kings of Israel: “Thus saith the Lord GOD; Remove the diadem, and take off the crown: this shall not be the same: exalt him that is low, and abase him that is high. I will overturn, overturn, overturn, it: and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is; and I will give it him” (Ezek. 21:26–27). This was a messianic prophecy regarding the prophecy made by Jacob/Israel in his old age. “The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be” (Gen. 49:10).

This prophecy was fulfilled by Jesus Christ. His mother had prophesied before His birth, “He hath shewed strength with his arm; he hath scattered the proud in the imagination of their hearts. He hath put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree. He hath filled the hungry with good things; and the rich he hath sent empty away" (Luke 1:51–53).²

1. Chapter 3.

Here, the Preacher speaks of the biblical basis of upward mobility: wisdom. The poor but wise child has better prospects than a king so unwise as to be beyond correction. The meaning of the Hebrew word for "child" is the same as in English. It does not specify age. It generally refers to a young child, but not always. The child in this passage is older: "For out of prison he cometh to reign." The role model here is Joseph, who was in Pharaoh's prison and rose to become second in command in Egypt. He was wise, but his wisdom did not keep him out of prison. On the contrary, it got him into prison.

The Hebrew is obscure. The King James reads: "He that is born in his kingdom becometh poor." The English Standard Version translates the verse differently: "For he went from prison to the throne, though in his own kingdom he had been born poor" (v. 14). This is the accepted translation in modern translations. It is not speaking of downward mobility.

For a prisoner to become king was possible in the ancient world only through a military victory or a domestic revolution. Even today, it is unlikely that an ex-convict will lead a nation apart from a military victory or a revolution. The normal career path to supreme authority does not include time behind bars. But the Preacher is making a point. So empowering is wisdom that a wise person has an enormous advantage. So great is this advantage that it can lead to a reversal of status on the scale of a prisoner's becoming king.

The Preacher is not warning unwise kings to become wise. Basic to a lack of wisdom is a refusal to hear counsel. He is warning the rest of us. Better to imitate a wise youth than remain stubbornly closed to advice. Old age is not a substitute for wisdom. We presume that wisdom is associated with age, but this text indicates that this rule of thumb is not universal. Wisdom is the key asset—not age, not power.

Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding. For the merchandise of it is better than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold. She is more precious than rubies: and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared unto her (Prov. 3:13–15).³

2. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 1.

3. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 9.

Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom: and with all thy getting get understanding (Prov. 4:7).

For wisdom is better than rubies; and all the things that may be desired are not to be compared to it (Prov. 8:11).

Conclusion

If you want riches, cultivate wisdom. If you want power, cultivate wisdom. Wisdom is the royal road to wealth and power. While this passage does not define wisdom, it identifies its benefits. Wisdom is the basis of progress in the life of a covenant-keeper.

16

VOWS AND PROMISES

When thou vowest a vow unto God, defer not to pay it; for he hath no pleasure in fools: pay that which thou hast vowed. Better is it that thou shouldest not vow, than that thou shouldest vow and not pay (Eccl. 5:4–5).

A. Vows as Debt

A vow is a promise made to God. The Preacher warns against taking a vow. A vow cannot lawfully be revised later. It locks in the vow-taker. Although conditions may change, the obligation does not change. The vow is like a burden that must be carried. It places the vow-taker in a position of servanthood.

By committing himself to the performance of some obligation, the vow-taker establishes a binding debt. A vow is the most binding form of personal debt. No other debt has comparable authority. A vow to God is binding. The Mosaic law had a detailed set of rules governing vows (Num. 30). It began with this: “If a man vow a vow unto the LORD, or swear an oath to bind his soul with a bond; he shall not break his word, he shall do according to all that proceedeth out of his mouth” (Num. 30:2).¹

Covenants are established by vows. A marriage is established by a vow before God. People are supposed to take marriage vows seriously. Unless one of the partners dies, either physically or covenantally by committing a biblically specified sin, the marriage vow remains binding.² The Preacher’s warning against taking a vow applies to marriage. Neither party can lawfully be compelled to take such a vow. This applies to arranged marriages. Either party can lawfully veto the decision of the parents. The vow is established by public verbal profession.

1. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 16.

2. Ray R. Sutton, Second Chance: Biblical Blueprints for Divorce and Remarriage (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/rssecond>)

Civil government is established by vows. These may be explicit or implicit. This is why there is no right of revolution for an individual acting outside of civil government. Only lower magistrates may lead a revolution, and only for violations by the higher government of the terms of the covenant.

A church covenant is binding. There are only three ways out of a church covenant: by death, letter of transfer, or excommunication. The vow is established by baptism.

B. To Break or Not to Break

A vow is not the same as a promise. It has greater authority. A vow is analogous to a covenant. A promise is analogous to a contract. A promise can lawfully be broken for the sake of covenantal authority.

Israel's most famous lawfully kept promise in the Old Covenant was its fulfilling of its promise to the Gibeonites that they could remain in the land. Although they tricked the Israelites, they had secured the promise. God had told Israel to exterminate all of the Canaanites, but they dared not obey. "But all the princes said unto all the congregation, We have sworn unto them by the LORD God of Israel: now therefore we may not touch them" (Josh 9:19).

The most famous lawful broken promise in Scripture is Solomon's.

And Adonijah the son of Haggith came to Bath-sheba the mother of Solomon. And she said, Comest thou peaceably? And he said, Peaceably. He said moreover, I have somewhat to say unto thee. And she said, Say on. And he said, Thou knowest that the kingdom was mine, and that all Israel set their faces on me, that I should reign: howbeit the kingdom is turned about, and is become my brother's: for it was his from the LORD. And now I ask one petition of thee, deny me not. And she said unto him, Say on. And he said, Speak, I pray thee, unto Solomon the king, (for he will not say thee nay,) that he give me Abishag the Shunammite to wife. And Bath-sheba said, Well; I will speak for thee unto the king.

Bath-sheba therefore went unto king Solomon, to speak unto him for Adonijah. And the king rose up to meet her, and bowed himself unto her, and sat down on his throne, and caused a seat to be set for the king's mother; and she sat on his right hand. Then she said, I desire one small petition of thee; I pray thee, say me not nay. And the king said unto her, Ask on, my mother: for I will not say thee nay. And she said, Let Abishag the Shunammite be given to Adonijah thy brother to wife. And king Solomon answered and said unto his mother, And why dost thou ask Abishag the Shunammite for Adonijah? ask for him the kingdom also; for he is mine elder brother; even for him, and for Abiathar the priest, and for Joab the son of Zeruiah.

Then king Solomon swore by the LORD, saying, God do so to me, and more also, if Adonijah have not spoken this word against his own life. Now therefore, as the LORD liveth, which hath established me, and set me on the throne of David my father, and who hath made me an house, as he promised, Adonijah shall be put to death this day. And king Solomon sent by the hand of Benaiah the son of Jehoiada; and he fell upon him that he died (I Kings 2:13–25).

The best explanation for Adonijah's request has to do with inheritance. He thought that by taking as his wife the woman who had slept beside his aged father, he might enhance his position with the people. He had already revolted against David, establishing himself as king. It had taken the intervention of Bathsheba to reverse this. She went to David on his deathbed and asked who should succeed him. He said Solomon (I Kings 1).

Adonijah planned to deceive her. He tested her. He began with a false statement. "Thou knowest that the kingdom was mine, and that all Israel set their faces on me, that I should reign." It was not his by inheritance. It was his by usurpation. All of Israel had not revolted against his usurpation. This did not mean that they were behind his revolt. Would she deny his assertions? If so, she would be unlikely to cooperate. This would cost him nothing. He would not be at risk. But she did not challenge him. He therefore proceeded with the rest of his strategy.

Adonijah was still after the throne. The legal issue here was lawful inheritance. This inheritance was covenantal: family and state. Adonijah's request was another move to capture the state. Solomon had him executed. He broke his promise to his naive mother. His promise had not been a vow before God, as a biblical vow must be.

C. Quid Pro Quo

The vow-taker must consider carefully the cost of performance. What is in this for him? What is the benefit? A vow may be part of an exchange. The vow-taker can promise to do something if he receives a specific benefit. If he promises God that he will do something specific, he must assume that the specific benefit received came from God. He is obligated to perform as vowed. He owes the service to God. He therefore must regard the benefit received as coming from God.

This acknowledges God as sovereign over history. The vow-taker wants God to intervene in order to achieve his goal. The positive sanction received from God is evidence of the negative sanctions implied by God for non-performance. Neither the Preacher nor the Mosaic law specifies what these negative sanctions are. Presumably, they are double the positive sanctions. The Mosaic law specified double restitution for theft (Ex. 22:4).³ Refusing to perform the terms of a vow is a form of theft. It is value unpaid for value received.

Conclusion

The Preacher is wary of vows. They impose considerable risk for non-performance. It is easy to let the terms of obligation slide. It is better not to take the vow than to let it slide.

3. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 43.

DELAYED SANCTIONS

If thou seest the oppression of the poor, and violent perverting of judgment and justice in a province, marvel not at the matter: for he that is higher than the highest regardeth; and there be higher than they (Eccl. 5:8).

This is a covenant-keeper speaking. He understands that God intervenes in history to defend the oppressed. God is active in history. He rules the oppressors. There is hierarchy.¹

A. Civil Government

The oppression of the poor is here related to civil government. There is perversion of civil justice. This civil focus is consistent with the Mosaic law. As I have argued, economic oppression in the Mosaic law was always an aspect of civil government. The Mosaic law was not being enforced by the civil courts. There is no biblical definition of economic oppression in terms of percentages or other numerical indicators.² When the civil law is perverted in order to benefit one party or group over another, this is oppression, as defined by the Mosaic law and identified by the prophets.

The person who sees injustice should not be astounded. Why should he be astounded in the first place? Isn't injustice common? The Preacher is concerned with the temptation to become cynical about God's sovereign control over the universe. He is heading off the refrain of the atheist: "If God is just, He is not omnipotent. If He is omnipotent, he is not just." The Preacher says that God is in control. He uses a rhetorically powerful phrase to identify God's authority: higher than the highest. This refers to the highest court in the land, the final court of appeal.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 48.

B. Final Court of Appeal

God is not under the judicial hierarchy. He is above it. He is not unobservant. He is not the distant hypothetical god who was proclaimed by a handful of eighteenth-century deists. He did not wind up the cosmos like a clock eons ago and then retreat into the shadows to see how things would work out.

God observes the affairs of men. He is opposed to oppression. His Bible-revealed law warns against oppression of the weak.

Ye shall not afflict any widow, or fatherless child. If thou afflict them in any wise, and they cry at all unto me, I will surely hear their cry; And my wrath shall wax hot, and I will kill you with the sword; and your wives shall be widows, and your children fatherless (Ex. 22:22–24).³

And when we cried unto the LORD God of our fathers, the LORD heard our voice, and looked on our affliction, and our labour, and our oppression: And the LORD brought us forth out of Egypt with a mighty hand, and with an outstretched arm, and with great terrible-ness, and with signs, and with wonders: And he hath brought us into this place, and hath given us this land, even a land that floweth with milk and honey (Deut. 26:7–9).

The humanist proclaims a universe closed to God. If he believes in any god, it is not the God of the Bible, who executes judgment, in time and eternity, in terms of Bible-revealed law. He sees the events of history as independent of any divinely revealed legal code. In such a universe, there can be no meaningful appeal to anything outside of human institutions, let alone outside of history.

This assertion of autonomy transfers the authority to make changes to men who possess power. Civil power is the most important power men can possess, most humanists believe. He who opposes such a view of social causation must look to a higher power to overturn the decisions of corrupt judges, who see no authority above them.

Sometimes the critics of prevailing power look to revolutionary violence as deliverance. Other critics look to free market institutions and power to overturn the decisions of civil governments. Others look to foreign armies. But all of these are subject to the same sort of corruption.

3. Idem.

The person who sees oppression all around him cannot legitimately hope for predictable deliverance unless there is a court of appeal with the power to impose negative sanctions on evildoers. The Preacher says that there is such a court of appeal. God's court is always in session. The fact that He has not yet imposed negative sanctions is not a legitimate reason for believing that His court does not exist.

C. Eternal Standards

There is a standard of justice: biblical law. The Preacher is aware that his readers and listeners can and do perceive the discrepancy between this standard and the injustice around them.

The author was Solomon. Under him, there was little injustice. He had an international reputation for providing justice. So, he wrote these words for all societies at all times. This indicates that God's law is universal. All men understand it. Paul wrote: "For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves: Which shew the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the mean while accusing or else excusing one another;" (Rom. 2:14–15).⁴ God's law crosses borders. It extends through time. People reading his words millennia later can still understand injustice when they see it. His affirmation of the existence of a superior court is still as reliable today as it was then.

Men can have legitimate confidence in God's law. They can have legitimate confidence in God's court. They can have legitimate confidence in God's justice. The Preacher is not providing motivation for praying to a local god in his own day. He is affirming the existence of an eternal God who imposes sanctions in terms of a permanent legal code that has authority across borders. It is not that God was above all human courts only in the Preacher's day. It is that God is above all human courts throughout the ages.

Conclusion

This passage is an affirmation of God's law, which includes God's system of sanctions. The fact that, at any point in time, rival human courts are imposing sanctions in terms of a rival system of law does not mean that God's law and God's sanctions are not operative. The timing of the trial is in God's hands, not man's hands.

4. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 2.

18

PURPOSEFUL NATURE

Moreover the profit of the earth is for all: the king himself is served by the field (Eccl. 5:9).

A. The Earth as a Servant

The Preacher affirms that the earth is a servant. It serves the king. It serves mankind. If the earth serves man, it means that man is superior to the earth. His desires are met by the productivity of nature. There is a hierarchy: man > nature.

The Preacher is not making an observation. He is saying that there is justice in this hierarchy. It is not that man exploits nature. He is saying that the land serves man. The Preacher is not an animist. He is not saying that Mother Earth dutifully serves mankind. He is saying that the output of nature legitimately belongs to the human race.

The profit of the earth is for all. This implies purpose. If something is for another, that other is superior. The earth is subordinate to mankind. This is not merely a matter of power. It is a matter of design. In Genesis 1, we read: “And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven to divide the day from the night; and let them be for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and years: And let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the earth: and it was so ” (vv. 14–15). The heavens were made for man. The very cosmos was purposeful, made to serve a being not yet created. No passage in the Bible is more antithetical to Darwinism.¹

B. Ownership

“The profit of the earth is for all.” This verse could be used by socialists to defend the concept of state ownership. But this does not get to the heart of the problem. There can be various civil governments, each insisting on monopolistic control over a particular geographical territory. This does not solve the problem of resource allocation. The three-part question must be answered by every legal system: What, how, and for whom?

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 2.

The fact that the output of the entire earth is for the benefit of everyone raises issues of production and distribution. It also raises the question of time. The earth survives longer than individuals do. So, future generations have a legal claim on the present generation. Who is to decide what constitutes that claim and what system of allocation honors it? Who is to enforce it? By what standard? By what sanctions?

Private ownership establishes a representative who acts on behalf of future claimants. Civil magistrates also claim this authority in many cases. But a civil magistrate holds his office briefly. His time frame of personal costs and personal benefits is limited. In contrast, a man who owns property recognizes the claims of future heirs. He plans for this. He wants to leave an inheritance. Furthermore, an investor wants his investment to remain profitable. If others perceive that the value of a company's assets is falling, they will sell their shares of ownership, thereby driving the market price of shares even lower. The future counts heavily in assessing present value. This is why the owner in a private property system has a greater stake in acting as the agent of future consumers and future owners.

Someone must be in charge of any particular asset. Someone must take responsibility for its use. If it is not under someone's judicial authority, there will be fierce competition for it if its value is significantly greater than the cost of obtaining it. Think of fishermen sailing in the oceans. No one can establish legal title to the fish. The result is open competition outside predictable civil law. The threat of war may impede fishermen. But any international legal code must be enforced through tradition unless there is a one-world civil government.

The text does not specify a system of ownership. The Mosaic law did. The Preacher operated under the Mosaic law. There is no suggestion that the civil government should assert its inherently monopolistic authority over all the land within its jurisdiction. He said only that the earth in general is for all mankind in general.

Conclusion

Nature is not impersonal. It is highly personal. It is not self-conscious. It is nevertheless purposeful. This is because it was created by a personal God to serve man, who is the image of God, both individually and corporately.

Ownership is personal. It is also hierarchical. Men serve God. Nature serves men. The authority that men exercise over nature rests on the authority that God exercises over men. This biblical hierarchy of authority is the basis of biblical ownership. There is no hint anywhere in the Bible that the civil government should exercise bureaucratic authority over nature on behalf of God.

19

INSATIABLE DISCONTENT

He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver; nor he that loveth abundance with increase: this is also vanity. When goods increase, they are increased that eat them: and what good is there to the owners thereof, saving the beholding of them with their eyes? The sleep of a labouring man is sweet, whether he eat little or much: but the abundance of the rich will not suffer him to sleep. There is a sore evil which I have seen under the sun, namely, riches kept for the owners thereof to their hurt. But those riches perish by evil travail: and he begetteth a son, and there is nothing in his hand. As he came forth of his mother's womb, naked shall he return to go as he came, and shall take nothing of his labour, which he may carry away in his hand. And this also is a sore evil, that in all points as he came, so shall he go: and what profit hath he that hath laboured for the wind (Eccl. 5:10–16)?

This is a lengthy passage. It has one theme: the vanity of riches. This is the most comprehensive critique of the pursuit of wealth found in the Old Testament.

A. Insatiability

C. S. Lewis wrote that torture would be to eat food that makes you hungry. His point was that one of the joys of desire is that it can be fulfilled. If it could not be fulfilled, it would be a curse.

Addiction is marked by an insatiable desire to consume more. The individual is trapped by a lust to consume. This addiction can apply to different substances or practices, depending on the individual.

The Preacher identifies the addiction to more. This addiction is not discriminating. Silver is a sign of this addiction, but the addiction is to abundance in general.

Elsewhere, I have summarized the confession of faith of Mammonites: “More for me in history.” This religion attracts followers in every generation and across all geographical borders. Its followers are discontented. Jesus identified this addiction as the most widespread alternative to faith in God.

No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon. Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment? Behold the fowls of the air: for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they (Matt. 6:24–26)?¹

The Apostle Paul described the outlook of Mammonism's rival religion: Christianity.

But godliness with contentment is great gain. For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out. And having food and raiment let us be therewith content. But they that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all evil: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows. But thou, O man of God, flee these things; and follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness (I Tim. 6:6–11).²

Paul was echoing the words of the Preacher.

B. The Economic Function of Discontent

One of the familiar teachings of economic science is this: "Men's desires are infinite. Resources are finite." If nothing else, time is limited. We are mortal. The disparity between wants and resources is the origin of scarcity. Scarcity is manifested in price. At zero price, there is greater demand than supply.

1. Scarcity and Priorities

Scarcity mandates priorities. What are we willing to pay for first? Second? Third? We cannot afford to purchase everything, but we can afford to buy more when we become more productive. If I want more, and if I resort neither to stealing nor voting to enrich myself, then I must increase my productivity in order to purchase goods that I regard as lower on my scale of priorities, i.e., my scale of values.

1. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 14.

2. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 10.

Ludwig von Mises placed discontentment the center of his economic theory. In Human Action, his magnum opus, he wrote that man is distinguished from God by means of discontent.

Scholastic philosophers and theologians and likewise Theists and Deists of the Age of Reason conceived an absolute and perfect being, unchangeable, omnipotent, and omniscient, and yet planning and acting, aiming at ends and employing means for the attainment of these ends. But action can only be imputed to a discontented being, and repeated action only to a being who lacks the power to remove his uneasiness once and for all at one stroke. An acting being is discontented and therefore not almighty. If he were contented, he would not act, and if he were almighty, he would have long since radically removed his discontent.³

The Preacher presents discontentment as a sin. Why? Because it is inherently insatiable. This form of discontentment cannot be satisfied. It always wants more.

Economists of all persuasions see the summum bonum of an economy as economic growth. It is seen as the universal cure-all. A growing number of people are enabled to satisfy their desires because of economic growth.

2. The Theoretical Problem of Addiction

This assumes that the problem of addiction does not exist. If someone said that greater efficiency in the production of heroin or cocaine would be a benefit to individual addicts and society in general, because the price of the substance would fall, would you agree? I would not. The problem is not a lack of supply; rather, it is the short-sighted, present-oriented nature of demand. Where addiction exists, the goal should be the reduction of demand, not an increase in supply.

To identify an addiction, we must have standards of evaluation. These standards are moral. “Addiction is bad.” The modern economist denies that morality has anything to do with economic science. Economic science is said to be value-free. But if it is, then economists should not recommend economic policies. They should not proclaim the benefits of either efficiency or economic growth. But they do. Economists draw conclusions that they say favor economic growth. This is inconsistent with the premise of moral neutrality.⁴

3. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), p. 69. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

3. The Pursuit of Riches

The Bible acknowledges the legitimacy of economic growth, for it reduces poverty, which the Bible views as a curse to be overcome. But the Bible does not recommend the pursuit of riches. Solomon wrote of wealth and poverty, “Remove far from me vanity and lies: give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me: Lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the LORD? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain” (Prov. 30:8–9).⁵

Vilfredo Pareto in 1897 published his discovery of the 20-80 distribution of capital in modern society. Twenty percent of the population owns 80% of the capital. This unequal distribution of capital has been found in all societies. There are no exceptions. To raise a nation’s masses out of poverty, society must therefore allow a minority of rich people to become very rich. A fifth of the population must become comparatively rich, and 4%⁶ of the population very rich. About 1% become super-rich. This is the inescapable cost of economic growth in every society.

4. Accumulation as Addiction

The Preacher identifies the problem: insatiability for personal wealth. It is vanity. It is vanity because it is autonomous. It does not put God at the center. Men seek to accumulate goods for themselves. Jesus said this is foolishness.

And he said unto them, Take heed, and beware of covetousness: for a man’s life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth. And he spake a parable unto them, saying, The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully: And he thought within himself, saying, What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits? And he said, This will I do: I will pull down my barns, and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods. And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry. But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then whose shall those things be, which thou hast provided? So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God. And he said unto his disciples, Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat; neither for the body, what ye shall put on. The life is more than meat, and the body is more than raiment (Luke 12:16–23).⁷

4. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 5; Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), Appendix H.

5. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 85.

6. That is, 20% of 20%.

These words are among the Bible's most difficult ethical injunctions to implement. People who would not be tempted to violate any of the Ten Commandments have difficulty believing these words. If they did truly believe them, they would not worry about money. But they do.

There is nothing wrong with barns. Barns store food, and food benefits the poor. Barns make possible laying up food in the harvest for sale and distribution in the months just before the next harvest, when the supply of food is low. The ethical issue here is motivation. "And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry." His dream was to be contented. He never achieved his dream. Time ran out that night.

C. Increased Expenses

The Preacher indicates that increased wealth increases costs. "When goods increase, they are increased that eat them: and what good is there to the owners thereof, saving the beholding of them with their eyes?" The rich man increases his level of responsibility. He must surround himself with people to carry out his plans.

Rich men also attract hangers-on. These are people who want hand-outs. They want to attend the rich man's parties. They want to become part of his entourage. These people are difficult to escape or get rid of. They congregate where the rich man visits. This is one reason why very rich people live in houses that are remote from a highway. They have gates around their property. They employ screeners. But screeners must be paid for.

Related to hangers-on are visionaries who want the rich man to fund their projects. They paint glowing pictures of all that can be accomplished. Rich men often listen to these dreamers. They fund their visions. Rarely do these visions succeed, which is true of all new ventures. There is a long line of replacement visionaries, each with a story to tell and a dream to be achieved.

7. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 25.

D. Responsibility and Worry

“The sleep of a labouring man is sweet, whether he eat little or much: but the abundance of the rich will not suffer him to sleep.” I suggest that the difference between these sleep patterns has to do with the level of personal responsibility. A laboring man does his job as assigned, goes home, has a meal, and sleeps. He has no further responsibility to his employer. His degree of responsibility is limited. In contrast, the owner of a company has many employers to keep contented: customers. They can change their minds at any time. They ask: “What have you done for me lately? And what do you intend to do for me next week? I intend to shop around.” He also has many employees to keep contented.

A rich man must stay ahead of the competition if he is to increase his wealth, or even preserve it. He must manage his wealth in a world of uncertainty.⁸ He could lose his money by a bad investment or an unexpected new source of competition. Possessing more money, he has more responsibility. Jesus said, “And that servant, which knew his lord’s will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more” (Luke 12:47–48).⁹ This responsibility troubles his sleep.

The Preacher says, “There is a sore evil which I have seen under the sun, namely, riches kept for the owners thereof to their hurt.” He has already explained why riches kept for owners hurt their owners. First, the owners are not satisfied. Second, their production costs rise. Third, their sleep fades.

E. Nothing to Show for His Labor

“But those riches perish by evil travail: and he begetteth a son, and there is nothing in his hand.” The Hebrew words translated as “evil travail” can also be translated as “adverse business.” The context of these words indicates that the latter is a better translation. His wealth has disappeared. His heir will not inherit, because there is nothing left to inherit. This family’s story is the story of rags to riches to rags.

8. Mises, Human Action, ch. 6.

9. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 28.

The accumulator loses his riches. But he could not have retained ownership anyway. “As he came forth of his mother’s womb, naked shall he return to go as he came, and shall take nothing of his labour, which he may carry away in his hand. And this also is a sore evil, that in all points as he came, so shall he go: and what profit hath he that hath laboured for the wind.” The correct answer to the old question, “How much did he leave behind?” is clear to the Preacher: “All of it!”

The Preacher here speaks of a man’s legacy in terms of the assumption of personal autonomy. A man has labored to accumulate riches. If he dies before this legacy erodes away, he still cannot benefit personally. The assumption of autonomy leads to a conclusion: the individual works for himself. But he will die just as he arrived: naked. The clothing he put on is left behind with the body it clothed. What remains of the person who accumulated this wealth? On the assumption of autonomy, nothing.

The Preacher is speaking of a specific form of wealth: “riches kept for the owners thereof.” The accumulator labored in vain, for when he departed, the riches remained behind. To be used by whom? Someone else. For what purposes? The heir’s.

If this wealth does somehow achieve much good, what is that to the departed? He will not know. He will not rejoice. He will not impute value to the outcome of his labor. Any value that it may retain will be imputed by the heirs and by market participants.

In an estate sale, the assets are auctioned off, piece by piece, to the highest bidders. The owner in his lifetime can offer no assured evaluation of his estate’s future value. He offers this representatively, on behalf of future decisions of the buyers. His evaluation will carry no weight after he is dead. That which is past carries weight only representatively. “What would the founder have thought?” At an estate sale, nobody cares. High bids win, asset by asset, with no consideration of the opinions of the deceased. Such is the fate of everyone’s legacy, given the assumption of human autonomy.

Conclusion

The Preacher warns that discontent, when applied to money or goods, is vanity. It is wasteful. It is not fulfilling. Yet there is no suggestion in the Bible that the accumulation of tools is inherently vain. The questions are: “What is the accumulator’s motivation for accumulating tools? For himself as an autonomous agent or as God’s steward?” The former is vanity. The latter motivation is not dealt with here. It is dealt with in the last verses of the book. “Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil” (Eccl. 12:13–14).¹⁰

All people are discontented. This is a consequence of sin. Men’s desires far outstrip their wealth. The more they own, the more they want. They soon get used to the pleasure and satisfaction of new possessions.¹¹ To restore their lost satisfaction, they seek to accumulate even more. The treadmill of accumulation has no end and offers no rest. They incarnate the most famous lyric of the supremely recognizable song of the rock and roll era: “I can’t get no satisfaction. I can’t get no satisfaction. ‘Cause I’ve tried. And I’ve tried. And I’ve tried. And I’ve tried.”¹²

10. Chapter 45.

11. In the field of economics known as behavioral economics, this phenomenon is called the hedonic ratchet. Only the transition out of extreme poverty offers a permanent increase in personal satisfaction. By God’s grace, this phenomenon works both ways. People who have experienced a major loss soon adjust. Their former level of satisfaction returns.

12. Comparatively few people have ever deciphered the lyrics of the loud, muddled, and most memorable song that catapulted Mick Jagger and the Rolling Stones to worldwide fame in 1965. He made a fortune with this anti-consumption song. He has never ceased trying to get satisfied. In their mid-sixties in 2006–7, the Rolling Stones had a year-long worldwide tour that grossed an estimated $437 million, when gold was around $625 an ounce.

IN PRAISE OF CONSUMPTION

Behold that which I have seen: it is good and comely for one to eat and to drink, and to enjoy the good of all his labour that he taketh under the sun all the days of his life, which God giveth him: for it is his portion. Every man also to whom God hath given riches and wealth, and hath given him power to eat thereof, and to take his portion, and to rejoice in his labour; this is the gift of God. For he shall not much remember the days of his life; because God answereth him in the joy of his heart (Eccl. 5:18–20).

He is speaking as a covenant-keeper. How do we know? Because he identifies as a blessing a man's ability to rejoice in his labor. In his positioning as an autonomous man, he always identifies labor as vanity, chasing after wind. Not here. In an earlier passage, he favorably compares the lifestyle of the laboring man to that of a rich man. "The sleep of a labouring man is sweet, whether he eat little or much," in contrast to the rich producer: "the abundance of the rich will not suffer him to sleep" (Eccl. 5:12).¹ In this passage, the rich man possesses enough wealth so that he does not eat little, unless he is on a diet. The Preacher twice says that such a condition is the gift of God: "Every man also to whom God hath given riches" and "God answereth him in the joy of his heart." This is not the outlook of autonomy.

The Preacher speaks only of the present: "For he shall not much remember the days of his life; because God answereth him in the joy of his heart." The person who takes his advice and celebrates the present will not dwell on the past. "For he shall not much remember the days of his life; because God answereth him in the joy of his heart."

He has recommended this consumption-affirming lifestyle previously. "There is nothing better for a man, than that he should eat and drink, and that he should make his soul enjoy good in his labour. This also I saw, that it was from the hand of God" (Eccl. 2:24).² "And also that every man should eat and drink, and enjoy the good of all his labour, it is the gift of God" (Eccl. 3:13).³

1. Chapter 19.

The kingdom of God is to be enjoyed in the present. The kingdom grows through present sacrifices, another word for thrift. Thrift funds the creation of tools. Without tools, there is no advance. Peter and the disciples fished with nets. Those nets allowed a great catch.

Now when he had left speaking, he said unto Simon, Launch out into the deep, and let down your nets for a draught. And Simon answering said unto him, Master, we have toiled all the night, and have taken nothing: nevertheless at thy word I will let down the net. And when they had this done, they inclosed a great multitude of fishes: and their net brake. And they beckoned unto their partners, which were in the other ship, that they should come and help them. And they came, and filled both the ships, so that they began to sink. When Simon Peter saw it, he fell down at Jesus' knees, saying, Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord. For he was astonished, and all that were with him, at the draught of the fishes which they had taken: And so was also James, and John, the sons of Zebedee, which were partners with Simon. And Jesus said unto Simon, Fear not; from henceforth thou shalt catch men (Luke 5:4–10).

If they had spent more on additional nets, they would have caught more fish. Jesus was making a point: better to bring men the gospel than to catch lots of fish. But had they possessed additional nets and boats, the point would have been that much more memorable. We are limited by a lack of tools. We can always use better tools. They must be paid for.

Conclusion

The Bible does not teach asceticism. The Preacher made this clear. He repeatedly told his readers that they should enjoy the comforts of success. These are God's gift to men. Men are not to despise God's gifts. But there is still the question of wisdom in allocating these gifts. Solomon had 700 wives and 300 concubines (I Kings 11:3). There were better uses for his money and time.

2. Chapter 5.

3. Chapter 8.

21

WHEN A STRANGER INHERITS

There is an evil which I have seen under the sun, and it is common among men: A man to whom God hath given riches, wealth, and honour, so that he wanteth nothing for his soul of all that he desireth, yet God giveth him not power to eat thereof, but a stranger eateth it: this is vanity, and it is an evil disease (Eccl. 6:1–2).

The Preacher returns to a familiar theme in his book: inheritance. This means death. Death is the inescapable barrier to meaningful accumulation, he argues. No matter how much wealth a person accumulates, he will not be able to enjoy it for long. No matter how much honor is imputed to him by those around him—those whose opinions matter in society—it will not last.

A. The Issue is Death

Why do I think the issue here is death? First, the problem he mentions is universal: “common among men.” Second, it applies to rich men, not just common people. Third, it has to do with power: “God giveth him not power to eat thereof.” The lack of what kind of power keeps a rich man from eating his own food? I can think of only two things: lack of life or lack of wealth. He either dies or loses his wealth. Fourth, “a stranger eateth it.” This is the difficult case.

If the issue here is not death, then it is the loss of wealth. How might a rich man lose his money? Military conquest, but this is not common. Then what about bad business ventures? This is possible. But how common is this? Not very. Most people do not own businesses. Most people keep most of what they possess most of the time. This is especially true in a predominately agricultural society. A man dies on the farm he was born on, if he inherited the farm from his father.¹ The Preacher is dealing with a problem that is universal. It applies

1. This has not been true in the United States, but the United States is arguably the to common people, too.

Even if the issue he is dealing with is not death, but rather the loss of a man's wealth due to poor business dealings, this is still the problem of inheritance. He leaves nothing to his heirs. The Preacher has already mentioned this. "There is a sore evil which I have seen under the sun, namely, riches kept for the owners thereof to their hurt. But those riches perish by evil travail: and he begetteth a son, and there is nothing in his hand" (Eccl. 5:13–14).² The heirs of a dead man's legacy will be strangers. So, the Preacher's warning here could be related to the loss of his goods in his lifetime. Given his assessments that follow, I think it is more likely that his concern in this passage is death.

If a man beget an hundred children, and live many years, so that the days of his years be many, and his soul be not filled with good, and also that he have no burial; I say, that an untimely birth is better than he. For he cometh in with vanity, and departeth in darkness, and his name shall be covered with darkness. Moreover he hath not seen the sun, nor known any thing: this hath more rest than the other. Yea, though he live a thousand years twice told, yet hath he seen no good: do not all go to one place? All the labour of man is for his mouth, and yet the appetite is not filled. For what hath the wise more than the fool? what hath the poor, that knoweth to walk before the living (Eccl. 6:3–8)?

He asks rhetorically, "do not all go to one place?" That has to be the grave. He is speaking about eating: "All the labour of man is for his mouth, and yet the appetite is not filled." He does not mean that we labor only for food. He also mentions honor. Furthermore, the early sections of this book deal with his experiment: to taste all of life. Everything came out the same: vanity. "For what hath the wise more than the fool? what hath the poor, that knoweth to walk before the living." It all comes down to this: the grave. It all goes down to this, too.

B. The Stranger

A stranger eats the rich man's food. The Hebrew word translated here as "stranger" is nok-ree. This referred to a foreigner who refused to covenant with God. He was outside the faith confessionally. He was most mobile (and rootless) large nation in history. From the first generation of Puritans in the seventeenth century, Americans moved to better land. Sumner Chilton Powell, Puritan Village: The Formation of a New England Town (Middletown, Connecticut: Wesleyan University Press, 1963).

2. Chapter 19.

uncircumcised. He had no part in the congregation of the Lord. It was legal to lend to him at interest in a charitable loan (Deut. 23:20).³ If this is who the Preacher has in mind, then the inheritance is transferred either to a foreign conqueror or else to a successful foreign businessman living inside Israel. Neither of these events would have been common in Israel. Surely, they were not universal features of life outside of Israel in the Preacher's day. They have been non-existent in the world since the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.

I think the stranger who eats the rich man's food is his son. A man thinks he knows his own son, but no man can know the heart of another. No one knows what his son will do with his inheritance. He may act as a stranger acts. This is a common fear in history. The prodigal son of Jesus' parable is a rarity: one who inherits early, squanders the inheritance, and returns unto his father's house (Luke 15:11–21).⁴

A rich man is concerned about the heir. A son may squander his father's posthumous legacy. This concern has been universal in history, among rich men and poor men alike. The Preacher is saying that the concern of the successful man is the same as the concern of the common man: the posthumous wasting of all that he strived for in life. The man worked to eat, meaning that he worked to be successful—in modern American slang, “to know where his next meal is coming from.” He achieved his goal. He did not have to worry about “putting food on the table.” Yet he knows that his inheritance may fall into the hand of a confessional stranger.

C. So What?

If a man lives only to eat, what does it matter what happens to his wealth after he dies? Who cares? The Preacher cares because he knows what most men know: we do not work hard only to eat. We work hard to leave a legacy of some kind. If a man's legacy is dissipated in one generation, what did all his work accomplish? What if the inheritance is put to worthless uses? This is the Preacher's concern. “For who knoweth what is good for man in this life, all the days of his vain life which he spendeth as a shadow? for who can tell a man what shall be after him under the sun” (Eccl. 6:12)?⁵

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 56.

4. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 37.

5. Chapter 19.

The accumulator will die. So will the man who leaves no visible legacy. Are their legacies really the same? In a world of pure autonomy, the answer is yes. The only thing that matters for a purely autonomous man is his personal use of whatever it is that he accumulates. Yet even self-proclaimed autonomous men seek honor. They want to be remembered. Why? What does it matter if future autonomous people honor a dead man's efforts? He cannot enjoy the acclaim. Also, to the extent that his sense of success depends on future generations' retroactive imputation of honor, he is not autonomous. He is dependent on prevailing future standards, future events, and future people he cannot control. This is a denial of autonomy. It is an affirmation of dependence on others.

So, maintaining the legacy matters. If a man's legacy is maintained, his work today is meaningful. The Preacher believed this. How do we know what he believed? Because he told us what the basis of meaningless work is: a squandered inheritance. He did not argue that an inheritance maintained down through the generations is equally meaningless as an inheritance squandered by the heir or maintained by a stranger. This implies that a legacy maintained or even expanded by confessionally orthodox heirs is meaningful. It is the threat of inheritance by a stranger that makes a man's work vanity. An autonomous man should not care. But he does care. Hence, he does not really regard himself as autonomous.

Conclusion

The Preacher writes of a common fear: inheritance by someone who does not share the confession of the accumulator. If a rich man cannot buy a solution to this problem, then no one can. The problem cannot be solved through exchange in a free market or in any other institutional arrangement. The problem is common because the lack of a solution is universal.

If a man's wealth is inherited by a confessional stranger, then his efforts were in vain. This is the Preacher's concern. The rich man eats well, but life is more than eating well. If life were merely eating and drinking, then death would end all of our concerns. It would not matter one way or the other who eats and drinks with the wealth we leave behind. This concern over a stranger's inheritance has meaning only in a world in which life is more than eating and drinking. The meaning of our efforts has to do with covenantal inheritance in the broadest sense.

This is the primary message of Ecclesiastes. It is a message conveyed in a subtle way. It requires that the reader think carefully about what he reads.

AUTONOMY VS. ECONOMIC GROWTH

All the labour of man is for his mouth, and yet the appetite is not filled. For what hath the wise more than the fool? what hath the poor, that knoweth to walk before the living? Better is the sight of the eyes than the wandering of the desire: this is also vanity and vexation of spirit That which hath been is named already, and it is known that it is man: neither may he contend with him that is mightier than he. Seeing there be many things that increase vanity, what is man the better? For who knoweth what is good for man in this life, all the days of his vain life which he spendeth as a shadow? for who can tell a man what shall be after him under the sun? (Eccl. 6:7–12).

A. The Philosophy of Autonomy

In developing his case against the philosophy of human autonomy, the Preacher here uses a metaphor of man's journey through life: eating. He knows, as we know, that men work to do far more than eat, yet he speaks as though man is merely an organism of consumption. The mouth is his metaphor of man's consumption. Men eat and are soon hungry. "The appetite is not filled." They must constantly feed themselves. More than once a day, they must shove food into their mouths. There is no permanent contentment. If they cease to eat, they will die of starvation. They are reminded daily of their dependence on food and therefore their dependence on labor. "He that laboreth laboreth for himself; for his mouth craveth it of him" (Prov. 16:36).

He returns to the theme of the vanity of equality. The fool possesses as many things of value as the wise man. "For what hath the wise more than the fool?" He has wisdom, but how does this make his life different? He, too, must fill his mouth daily. He has to work to consume. He is trapped on the same treadmill as the fool. The basics of their lives are the same. Wisdom counts for nothing.

This conclusion is contrary to the Book of Proverbs, where wisdom is the supreme good. “Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom: and with all thy getting get understanding” (Prov. 4:7). Wisdom is the true source of happiness. “Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding” (Prov. 3:13). Therefore, we must regard the Preacher’s statement as part of his critique of the logic of autonomy. Wisdom rejects autonomy. “The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge: but fools despise wisdom and instruction” (Prov. 1:7).

The philosophy of autonomy sees nothing superior to man. Man is not subordinate to a higher authority. So, he must derive meaning from himself. The Preacher is exploring answers to this question: “What is the essence of autonomous man’s condition?” Here, speaking on behalf of the philosophy of autonomy, he says that the wise man and the fool are equally men. To exist as a man is sufficient to establish a man’s authority. There is no higher standard. In the world of human autonomy, who has the authority to impute (assess and declare) superiority to a wise man over a fool? The wise man may like to think that he possesses this authority, but where is the proof? What is the basis of his claim? Not his humanity as such. A fool possesses humanity. A wise man is as trapped by dependence on food as a fool . . . or a beast. His autonomy is constrained by his need to eat. It is also constrained by death, as the Preacher noted in the previous passage: “Yea, though he live a thousand years twice told, yet hath he seen no good: do not all go to one place” (v. 6). He makes this same conclusion repeatedly.¹ Death swallows meaning as surely as men swallow food. Death is the great equalizer: the equality of nothing.

Similarly with the poor man. “What hath the poor, that knoweth to walk before the living?” The poor man has nothing of value other than his ability to survive, to “walk before the living.” But he is a dead man walking. His advantage over the dead will end soon enough.

Then one way of life is as good as another . . . or as bad. It is all vanity. Conclusion: “Better is the sight of the eyes than the wandering of the desire: this is also vanity and vexation of spirit.” In other words, be content with what you possess or can easily possess. This is so much easier than striving after more. The wandering of desire is insatiable.

If nothing matters, because everything is vanity, then a wise man seeks to buy vanity at the lowest possible price. Do not seek wisdom or wealth. To do so is the wandering of desire. What is the point? You are a dead man eating. You are a dead man walking. You might as well limit your goals. This is so much more pleasant.

1. Ecclesiastes 2:15–17; 3:19–20.

Then said I in my heart, As it happeneth to the fool, so it happeneth even to me; and why was I then more wise? Then I said in my heart, that this also is vanity. For there is no remembrance of the wise more than of the fool for ever; seeing that which now is in the days to come shall all be forgotten. And how dieth the wise man? as the fool. Therefore I hated life; because the work that is wrought under the sun is grievous unto me: for all is vanity and vexation of spirit (Eccl. 2:15–17).²

B. Reduced Economic Growth

The philosophy of autonomy undermines the impetus for economic growth. If all of life's results are equal, then what is the point of sacrificing in the present for the sake of the future? "Seeing there be many things that increase vanity, what is man the better? For who knoweth what is good for man in this life, all the days of his vain life which he spendeth as a shadow? for who can tell a man what shall be after him under the sun" (vv. 11–12). The heirs will inherit, and what they will do with the inheritance is uncertain. Only death is certain. The philosophy of autonomy, when pursued to its logical conclusion—the equality of vanity and death—is intensely present-oriented.

Present-orientation, or what Ludwig von Mises called high time preference, leads to high interest rates.³ People are not induced to save unless they are offered high rates of interest by borrowers. High rates of interest reduce the number of profitable projects. Profits are what remain after all expenses. Interest rates are an expense. People who care little about the future are willing to pay high interest rates in order to consume now. The competition for funds in a present-oriented society favors consumption loans at the expense of production loans. This reduces economic growth. People get what they pay for: present consumption at the expense of greater future consumption.

Wherever the philosophy of autonomy is both understood and widely pursued, it leads to stagnation. It leads to consumption rather than economic growth. The man who dreams of wealth without sacrifice in the present believes in a fantasy. Isaiah described this outlook two centuries later. “Come ye, say they, I will fetch wine, and we will fill ourselves with strong drink; and to morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant” (Isa. 56:12).

2. Chapter 3.

3. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. 19. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

Conclusion

The Preacher continues his exploration of the implications of the philosophy of human autonomy. He concludes that the wise man has no advantage over the fool. The poor man is wiser than the rich man, because he does not sacrifice in the present in order to live the same kind of life that the rich man leads: a life of vanity. The poor man pays so much less to live in vain. This shows wisdom on his part, assuming that wisdom offers an advantage, which it does not, according to the Preacher’s assessment of the philosophy of human autonomy.

23

AUTONOMY AND SORROW

A good name is better than precious ointment; and the day of death than the day of one's birth. It is better to go to the house of mourning, than to go to the house of feasting; for that is the end of all men; and the living will lay it to his heart. Sorrow is better than laughter: for by the sadness of the countenance the heart is made better. The heart of the wise is in the house of mourning; but the heart of fools is in the house of mirth (Eccl. 7:1–4).

A. Reputation After Death

In the preceding section, the Preacher made the case against the philosophy of autonomy by arguing that, in terms of this philosophy, death swallows up everything. Nothing has meaning, because death has no meaning and is the great equalizer.

Death mandates inheritance. It is folly to labor long and hard to build up an inheritance that will be appropriated by people of uncertain character. It makes no sense.

In this passage, he abandons the argument of the previous section. He does so in the name of autonomy. He fully understands that those who defend the philosophy of autonomy will resist the conclusions that he had previously drawn from its presuppositions. These conclusions are just too pessimistic for the average man, who will search for an alternative. The Preacher here discusses one hoped-for alternative: a good reputation. Surely, this survives one's death. Surely, this is worth sacrificing for. The Preacher examines this possibility. "A good name is better than precious ointment." But why is this the case? He does not say. The philosophy of autonomy offers no reason to believe this, so he merely states it as a fact. He then explores its implications.

B. The Economics of a Good Name

If a good name is worth having because it survives death, how does someone obtain it? After all, we do not get something for nothing.

Most people assume that a good name cannot be purchased with money in a marketplace. This is incorrect. In the early twentieth century, a new profession arose: public relations. It made scientific what civil rulers had learned centuries before, most notably in Machiavelli's book, The Prince: public opinion can be manipulated. Rich men and corporations began to hire specialists in developing and promoting a good name. These specialists wrote favorable news reports and persuaded newspapers to run them as if they were neutral feature articles. They used many other sophisticated techniques.¹ Most people would say that a good name attained through public relations is ersatz: fool's gold, not real gold. But who is to say? A good name is always conferred, meaning imputed. If those doing the conferring are deceived, or at least manipulated, what does this matter to the beneficiary? He gains the benefit.

A good name is always purchased. This purchase involves forfeiting something of value in exchange for obtaining a good name. This fact is not widely understood. Generally, people assume that a person's high integrity cannot be purchased. They are incorrect. Integrity has a price: forfeited income. A good name implies that a person has sacrificed something of value to obtain it. It is true that you do not buy integrity with your excess earnings, although you can buy the public's perception of integrity. Here is how you buy integrity: avoid excess earnings, which are taxable, by adhering to your principles. The economic outcome is the same as if someone had bought integrity in a market: less wealth. What is inescapable is this exchange: integrity for money.

Integrity is not directly marketable, but it is marketable indirectly. You can profit from it. A person with a good reputation for repaying debt can borrow money at a lower rate of interest than a man with a bad reputation for repaying debt. "The wicked borroweth, and payeth not again: but the righteous sheweth mercy, and giveth" (Psalm 37:21).² A person with a good reputation can gain cooperation from

1. The most famous of these specialists was the nephew of the psychologist Sigmund Freud, Edward Bernays (1891–1995). He wrote many books on his techniques. The other founder was Ivy Lee. Scott Cutlip, The Unseen Power: Public Relations. A History (Hillsdale, New Jersey: Lawrence Eichelbaum Associates, 1994).

2. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms

others at a low price. There is less risk in dealing with him. As we say, “His reputation precedes him.” To gain a reputation for integrity, a person sacrifices marketable wealth in the present. To obtain what? His future reputation. Again, his reputation will precede him. It will open doors. It will gain him respect.

Is this autonomy? No, it is dependence. Others must impute to him his good reputation. These others must be “the right sort of people.” But how do they obtain their reputations for being the right sort of people? From others? This merely pushes the question out another step. From themselves? Then by what authority?³ By what standard?⁴ With what sanctions?⁵ With what long-term impact?⁶

The Preacher says that a good name is a very good thing. But why is this true? Because of what it can do for you in the future. Why is it better than precious ointment? Because precious ointment is used only once and is gone. A good reputation is permanent. Well, not quite. It is as permanent as the reputations of those who impute a good name. It is as permanent as the memories of those who impute a good name. It is as permanent as the ability of those who impute a good name to impose sanctions that uphold their judgment. But there is one thing a good name is not: autonomous.

C. The Day of Death

The Preacher once again returns to the theme of death. The day of death is better than the day of one’s birth. Why should this be true? Because death puts an end to responsibility, to sacrifice in the present, and to striving after wind. On that day, a good name is neither here nor there. This is because the deceased is no longer here.

So, that which is better than precious ointment is lost forever to the autonomous man on the day of his death. If anything, this is his day of precious ointment. Jesus said: “For in that she hath poured this ointment on my body, she did it for my burial” (Matt. 26:12). Conclusion: “It is better to go to the house of mourning, than to go to the (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 6.

3. Part two of the biblical covenant. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

4. Part three of the biblical covenant. Ibid., ch. 3.

5. Point four of the biblical covenant. Ibid., ch. 4.

6. Point five of the biblical covenant. Ibid., ch. 5.

house of feasting: for that is the end of all men; and the living will lay it to his heart.”

Death ends both production and consumption. It ends vanity. There is no more striving after wind. For autonomous man, this is his day of deliverance. But, as a day of deliverance, it is also a day of meaninglessness. Death is impersonal. It imputes nothing. It is also supreme. It overcomes all imputation. The good reputation, the bad reputation, the absence of reputation: death swallows all.

What is the logical implication of all this? The Preacher tells us: “It is better to go to the house of mourning, than to go to the house of feasting: for that is the end of all men; and the living will lay it to his heart.” Visiting a house of mourning prepares us for the inescapable reality of death. Death is not autonomous man’s crowning achievement. Death is the annulment of all achievement. Death ratifies nothing. Get used to it, the Preacher says. “The living will lay it to his heart.” The Preacher was highly skilled in laying such things on his heart, as his book reveals.

“Sorrow is better than laughter: for by the sadness of the countenance the heart is made better.” Why is this the case? Because death is sorrowful. To contemplate the triumph of death is a sorrowful activity, but it is a realistic one. Samuel Johnson, the eighteenth-century literary critic who is famous today only because of James Boswell’s multi-volume biography of him, once quipped to Boswell: “Depend upon it, sir, when a man knows he is to be hanged in a fortnight, it concentrates his mind wonderfully.” He thought a great deal about death, and the thought horrified him, despite his Christianity.⁷

For autonomous man, death is the end of all that has meaning. Nothing has meaning, because of death. For the modern cosmic evolutionist, who believes that everything will end with the heat death of the universe—absolute zero—however distant in time, impersonal death swallows up meaning as surely as it did for the Preacher’s autonomous man.⁸ This is a sorrowful thought. Most men prefer not to think about it, just as David Hume, a believer that death ends everything, preferred not to think about it.

7. Mortality Quotes: The Samuel Johnson Sound Bite Page. (<http://bit.ly/JohnsonDeath>)

8. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

Conclusion

The Preacher did not say that the transition from life to death is easy. It is sorrowful. If death is the final end of man, then this sorrow spreads its tentacles across the living. Sorrow is superior to laughter because death is not a laughing matter. The more realistic the heart, the better the heart, he says. For the autonomous man, realism produces sorrow.

The deliverance from this death-induced sorrow was announced by Jesus Christ. “The thief cometh not, but for to steal, and to kill, and to destroy: I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly” (John 10:10). Paul told us why sorrow is not to be preferred to laughter.

So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye stedfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord (I Cor. 15:54–58).⁹

Both Jesus and Paul rejected the philosophy of autonomy. So did the Preacher.

9. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 16.

OPPRESSION AND BRIBERY

Surely oppression maketh a wise man mad; and a gift destroyeth the heart (Eccl. 7:7).

A. The Meaning of Oppression

I have argued ever since 1990 that the Mosaic law did not define oppression exclusively in economic terms. The Mosaic law did not set forth objective economic criteria for identifying oppression.¹ It did identify oppression as a great evil.

The context of the word sometimes points to a violation of civil law, always with the cooperation of judges. This verse rests on such a view of oppression. The Preacher had previously written: “If thou seest the oppression of the poor, and violent perverting of judgment and justice in a province, marvel not at the matter: for he that is higher than the highest regardeth; and there be higher than they” (Eccl. 5:8).² The context was the perversion of justice—a legal context.

Here, he connects oppression with gifts. The Hebrew word translated here as “gift” refers to a donation. Usually, the word’s context indicates a gift to God: a sacrifice.³ It is also used as an offering to an idol.⁴ It is not the other Hebrew word that is translated as “gift,” whose frequent context is bribery. So, grammar does not confirm that the context here is bribery. But it does not deny it, either.

Consider the context. First, why would an offering to God destroy the heart? It wouldn’t. Second, the context does not indicate idolatrous worship. The context is oppression. By a process of elimination, the context indicates bribery.

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 48.

2. Chapter 17.

3. Exodus 28:38; Leviticus 23:38; Numbers 18:6–7, 29.

4. Ezekiel 20:26, 31.

B. Oppression by the Wise

A wise man is a man who understands God's law. Such a man possesses wisdom and understanding. David had told this to Solomon.

And David said to Solomon, My son, as for me, it was in my mind to build an house unto the name of the LORD my God: But the word of the LORD came to me, saying, Thou hast shed blood abundantly, and hast made great wars: thou shalt not build an house unto my name, because thou hast shed much blood upon the earth in my sight. Behold, a son shall be born to thee, who shall be a man of rest; and I will give him rest from all his enemies round about: for his name shall be Solomon, and I will give peace and quietness unto Israel in his days. He shall build an house for my name; and he shall be my son, and I will be his father; and I will establish the throne of his kingdom over Israel for ever. Now, my son, the LORD be with thee; and prosper thou, and build the house of the LORD thy God, as he hath said of thee. Only the LORD give thee wisdom and understanding, and give thee charge concerning Israel, that thou mayest keep the law of the LORD thy God. Then shalt thou prosper, if thou takest heed to fulfil the statutes and judgments which the LORD charged Moses with concerning Israel: be strong, and of good courage; dread not, nor be dismayed (I Chron. 22:7–13).

A wise man therefore understands the great evil of oppression, for the Mosaic law repeatedly identifies oppression as a sin. The word “oppression” here could refer to economic oppression, but then the reference to the gift would make no sense. Why would a private party oppressor receive a gift? He wouldn't. A corrupt judge would.

The context indicates that a wise man is sitting as a judge. He has received a bribe to persuade him to impose a decision that violates biblical law. He knows that this is a corrupt bargain, but he nevertheless accepts the gift. In a courtroom setting, this destroys the heart. Why? Because the wise judge knows this transaction is wrong.

The Preacher also says that this transaction will make him mad. The Hebrew word here indicates madness, not anger.⁵ It is madness in the sense of judicial foolishness: “He leadeth counsellors away spoiled, and maketh the judges fools” (Job 12:17). “That frustrateth the tokens of the liars, and maketh diviners mad; that turneth wise men backward, and maketh their knowledge foolish” (Isa. 44:25).

5. “And he changed his behaviour before them, and feigned himself mad in their hands, and scabbled on the doors of the gate, and let his spittle fall down upon his beard” (I Sam. 21:13). “Babylon hath been a golden cup in the LORD'S hand, that made all the earth drunken: the nations have drunken of her wine; therefore the nations are mad” (Jer. 51:7).

The Preacher understood that the wise man’s wisdom is dependent on his conformity to biblical wisdom. He knew what biblical wisdom is. “Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil” (Eccl. 12:13–14).⁶ When the wise man succumbs to bribery, he corrupts his own heart. He no longer can be trusted to declare an act as having conformed to or violated God’s law. He abandons the art of casuistry: applying God’s law to specific cases.

Conclusion

This verse indicates a concern with corrupt judgments by a civil judge. It is not talking about cheating by a businessman. Oppression here is not an economic act. It is a judicial act. It is a corrupting act.

6. Chapter 45.

25

FAITH IN PROGRESS

Better is the end of a thing than the beginning thereof: and the patient in spirit is better than the proud in spirit. Be not hasty in thy spirit to be angry: for anger resteth in the bosom of fools. Say not thou, What is the cause that the former days were better than these? for thou dost not enquire wisely concerning this (Eccl. 7:8–10).

This verse announces that the end is better than the beginning. Speaking as an autonomous man, he has already argued that sorrow is preferable to laughter. Why? Because sorrow is more realistic than laughter regarding the implications of death. The end of life is better than the beginning, because death puts an end to vanity.¹

What is patience? The Hebrew word translated here as “patient” is translated as “slow” in all other cases in the King James Version. The Preacher contrasts a slow spirit with a hasty one. What is the meaning of hasty? The Hebrew word generally means troubled, vexed, or fearful. The context usually implies agitation. So, by “slow,” the Preacher means calm. The phrase “steady as you go” is appropriate.

A. Patience vs. Pride

Why is the patient spirit better than the proud spirit? What does he mean by “proud”? The Hebrew word is best translated as “high.” “Behold, the Assyrian was a cedar in Lebanon with fair branches, and with a shadowing shroud, and of an high stature; and his top was among the thick boughs” (Ezek. 31:3). The patient spirit focuses on the future: the end of the process. The proud spirit revels in the present: success attained as a result of the past. The patient spirit pays attention to the pathway to the future. The proud spirit rejoices in what has already been accomplished. The patient spirit has a goal: moving up by moving forward. The proud spirit rejoices in previous attainments.

1. Chapter 23.

The patient spirit sees the future as better than the present. The proud spirit sees the past as superior to the present. The proud spirit asks: “What is the cause that the former days were better than these?” The patient spirit sees the future as an uphill process. The proud spirit sees the future as a downhill process. The patient spirit sees victory in the future. The proud spirit sees defeat in the future. The patient spirit sees the future as progress. The proud spirit sees the future as decline. The patient spirit sees a benefit in exchanging the present for the future. The proud spirit sees the threat of loss in exchanging the present for the future.

The proud person rejoices in what he has attained. But when you are king of the hill, moving forward means moving down. The proud person wants to defend territory. The cost of moving forward is moving into the unknown. What is already known is success. The cost of moving forward is to risk the loss of success.

For the patient person, moving forward is an advantage. He sees the future as superior to the present. He believes this: “Better is the end of a thing than the beginning thereof.” The past is inferior to the present. The future is superior to the present.

B. An Uphill Battle

The Preacher advises this: “Say not thou, What is the cause that the former days were better than these? for thou dost not enquire wisely concerning this” (v. 10). For a person who is engaged in the work of extending the kingdom of God, all of life is an uphill battle. This work requires patience. Patience in turn requires confidence in the outcome of one’s efforts. Confidence in the outcome of one’s efforts requires confidence that the present is superior to the past. If the present is inferior to the past, then there is no legitimate confidence that the future will be better than the present. If things are going downhill, why would a wise person apply himself to an uphill task? Defending territory already secured is as much as a wise man would commit to. A program for moving uphill is illogical. It would waste resources. In the words of the dispensationalist radio pastor of the 1950s, J. Vernon McGee, “You don’t polish brass on a sinking ship.”

The proud man and the historical pessimist share a commitment to the present. The proud man counts the cost of change. The odds seem poor. Why risk success in the present for the chance of attaining even more? The economist would analyze this in terms of marginal utility theory. Each additional unit of utility is worth less to a decision-maker than the previous unit. With each new unit of income, we satisfy those wants that are highest on our scale of economic value. Past wants were higher on our scale of value than those that remain now, other things remaining equal. Why continue to lay up treasure—success—when the cost of laying up treasure involves putting one's existing treasure at risk? Only if success is addictive—"The more you get, the more you want"—would such risky behavior make economic sense. The historical pessimist concludes much the same. Why risk whatever little remains when it takes everything we have just to slow the speed of sliding down even faster? The emphasis in both cases is on preserving existing territory rather than extending dominion.

The person who believes that the future will be superior to the present could take the attitude of sitting back and letting things drift. But he also knows that things roll down, not up. Things drift downstream, toward either the falls or the end of the river. Things do not drift upward. Put in scientific terms, entropy in a closed system inevitably undermines the remaining order of the present. The only way to reverse entropy is to import energy from outside the system. This is what God's grace provides: access to order from outside the sin-cursed realm of history.² This is why progressive sanctification, both personal and institutional, requires patience. It requires attention to detail. It requires time and capital.

Conclusion

The Preacher had faith in progress. He believed that the end is better than the beginning. He presented this perspective from the point of view of rival worldviews: autonomy and biblical covenantalism.

The autonomous man announces that the end is better than the beginning. Death is superior to birth. Sacrificing benefits in the present for benefits in the future is vanity. Why? Because death negates all success and all meaning. Death transfers the inheritance to a stranger of questionable motives and habits. The dissipation of the inheritance is inevitable. In modern terms, entropy rules the cosmos. Conclusion: there is no progressive sanctification. There is only vanity.

In contrast is biblical covenantalism. The end is better than the beginning. Death is not the end. God brings final judgment. He distinguishes between success and failure, between meaningful labor and vanity, between patience and pride. “Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil” (Eccl. 12:13–14).³

2. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988). (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

The Preacher keeps exploring the implications of human autonomy. They lead only to dead ends.

3. Chapter 45.

WISDOM AND KINGDOM

Wisdom is good with an inheritance: and by it there is profit to them that see the sun. For wisdom is a defence, and money is a defence: but the excellency of knowledge is, that wisdom giveth life to them that have it (Eccl. 7:11–12).

A. Wisdom: Good or Meaningless?

The Preacher returns here to biblical covenantalism. He extols wisdom. Wisdom along with an inheritance is a good thing. Wisdom provides a profit. The Hebrew word translated as “profit” is more often translated as “more.” It means “better.” This observation is in contrast to an earlier observation:

Then said I in my heart, As it happeneth to the fool, so it happeneth even to me; and why was I then more wise? Then I said in my heart, that this also is vanity. For there is no remembrance of the wise more than of the fool for ever; seeing that which now is in the days to come shall all be forgotten. And how dieth the wise man? as the fool. Therefore I hated life; because the work that is wrought under the sun is grievous unto me: for all is vanity and vexation of spirit (Eccl. 2:15–17).¹

There is no meaningful wisdom, he writes. A fool and a wise man end up the same: dead. As for the value of an inheritance,

There is an evil which I have seen under the sun, and it is common among men: A man to whom God hath given riches, wealth, and honour, so that he wanteth nothing for his soul of all that he desireth, yet God giveth him not power to eat thereof, but a stranger eateth it: this is vanity, and it is an evil disease. If a man beget an hundred children, and live many years, so that the days of his years be many, and his soul be not filled with good, and also that he have no

1. Chapter 3.

burial; I say, that an untimely birth is better than he. For he cometh in with vanity, and departeth in darkness, and his name shall be covered with darkness. Moreover he hath not seen the sun, nor known any thing: this hath more rest than the other. Yea, though he live a thousand years twice told, yet hath he seen no good: do not all go to one place? All the labour of man is for his mouth, and yet the appetite is not filled. For what hath the wise more than the fool? what hath the poor, that knoweth to walk before the living? (Eccl. 6:1–8).²

Here, we have rival concepts of the light of day. One is positive. “There is profit to them that see the sun.” The other is negative. “For he cometh in with vanity, and departeth in darkness, and his name shall be covered with darkness. Moreover he hath not seen the sun, nor known any thing: this hath more rest than the other.”

Unless we recognize that the Preacher is conducting a literary debate, theonomy vs. autonomy, we cannot make sense of the Book of Ecclesiastes. It is filled with contradictory observations.

B. A Wise Inheritance

The Preacher sees the great advantage that a wise man receives from an inheritance. The inheritance produces more, meaning a profit. But why is possessing more an advantage? To possess more means that a person becomes responsible for its management. With every increase in wealth comes an increase in opportunities. With every increase in opportunities comes an increase in responsibility.

And that servant, which knew his lord’s will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more (Luke 12:47–48).³

But what is the profit of profit? The Preacher wrote earlier: “Then I looked on all the works that my hands had wrought, and on the labour that I had laboured to do: and, behold, all was vanity and vexation of spirit, and there was no profit under the sun” (Eccl. 2:11).⁴ He denied that there is such a thing as vanity-free profit. This is a correct implication of life outside the covenant.

2. Chapter 21.

3. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

4. Chapter 2.

Life inside the covenant is different. When a man is inside the covenant, he has access to wisdom. If he gains an inheritance, he can put it to profitable uses. His wisdom allows an increase in the inheritance. This is the covenantal system of inheritance: increase through time.⁵ Using modern economists' terminology, this is value-added production.

Their key asset is wisdom, not the inheritance. "Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom: and with all thy getting get understanding" (Prov 4:7). "How much better is it to get wisdom than gold! and to get understanding rather to be chosen than silver!" (Prov. 16:16). Without wisdom, the inheritance can be dissipated. It can be put to unwise uses. It is wisdom that puts the inheritance to good uses.

The goal here is capital accumulation. Increased capital is necessary for the expansion of the kingdom. The kingdom of God competes with the kingdom of Satan. Each asserts total sovereignty in history. Each demands unconditional surrender of the other.⁶ Each occupies territory. Each requires capital to occupy existing territory and to add to territory occupied.

A wise man inherits from the previous generation. How did the previous generation have capital to pass down? Because it had the skills of capital accumulation. The requirement of kingdom expansion in history requires capital accumulation. Each generation is to pass down more than it inherited to the next generation.

This refers more to intellectual and moral capital than to physical or economic capital. Intellectual and moral capital are multiplied by the number of covenantal heirs. The larger a family, the smaller the per capita monetary inheritance. The Psalmist wrote: "As arrows are in the hand of a mighty man; so are children of the youth. Happy is the man that hath his quiver full of them: they shall not be ashamed, but they shall speak with the enemies in the gate" (Psalm 127:4–5). The recommendation here is a large family. This dilutes the per capita inheritance of physical or economic capital, but it multiplies the inheritance of intellectual and moral capital. This is an implication of this: "Two are better than one; because they have a good reward for their labour” (Eccl. 4:9).⁷ The principle of the division of labor applies to intellectual labor. The broader the base of those who hold to a covenant, the more effective each member’s knowledge and skills become, assuming that the covenant is favorable to cooperation.

5. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1987] 2010), ch. 5.

6. North, Unconditional Surrender.

The kingdom of man at the tower of Babel possessed an extensive division of labor. This offered that kingdom more opportunities.

And the LORD said, Behold, the people is one, and they have all one language; and this they begin to do: and now nothing will be restrained from them, which they have imagined to do. Go to, let us go down, and there confound their language, that they may not understand one another’s speech. So the LORD scattered them abroad from thence upon the face of all the earth: and they left off to build the city (Gen. 11:6–8).

God scattered the people of the tower. This is the final outcome of autonomy. People do not cooperate in hell. A kingdom that begins with the autonomy of man as its presupposition cannot complete a tower stretching to heaven.

God undermined that kingdom by scattering it. But, through trade, men can overcome the limits of separation.⁸ This is because trade is a denial of autonomy. It is a form of mutual dependence.

Conclusion

Biblical wisdom is required for the long-term building of the kingdom of God in history. So is an inheritance, which extends through history. An inheritance is more than physical. It is ultimately confessional. The scattering of mankind at Babel was linguistic and geographical, but it was also confessional.

7. Chapter 14.

8. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 19.

LUKEWARM ETHICS

All things have I seen in the days of my vanity: there is a just man that perisheth in his righteousness, and there is a wicked man that longeth his life in his wickedness. Be not righteous over much; neither make thyself over wise: why shouldest thou destroy thyself? Be not over much wicked, neither be thou foolish: why shouldest thou die before thy time? (Eccl. 7:15–17).

Here, the Preacher speaks in terms of a way of practical living. He rejects the systematic pursuit of righteousness and wisdom. The middle path is the place of minimum expense. The rigorous pursuit of either righteousness or wisdom is contrary to an accurate cost-benefit analysis, he says.

Why should anyone believe this? Because he believes that there is no predictability of the Bible's specified covenantal sanctions. "There is a just man that perisheth in his righteousness, and there is a wicked man that longeth his life in his wickedness." If a person pursues perfection as his goal in this world, the Preacher says, that person is self-deceived. Such a pursuit will get him nowhere. It could destroy him. Somewhere in between righteousness and wickedness lies safety and sanity. This also applies also to wisdom and foolishness. Life is not black and white; it is mostly gray. A prudent man walks a path between extremes, says the Preacher.

A. Psalm 73

This position rests on a rejection of what Psalm 73 teaches. The psalmist had observed that the sanctions seem to be perverse, not just random.

For I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked. For there are no bands in their death: but their strength is firm. They are not in trouble as other men; neither are they plagued like other men (Psalm 73:3–5).

They are corrupt, and speak wickedly concerning oppression: they speak loftily. They set their mouth against the heavens, and their tongue walketh through the earth (Psalm 73:8–9).

Subsequently, he concluded that his initial observations were misguided. “When I thought to know this, it was too painful for me; Until I went into the sanctuary of God; then understood I their end. Surely thou didst set them in slippery places: thou castedst them down into destruction. How are they brought into desolation, as in a moment! they are utterly consumed with terrors” (Psalm 73:16–19).¹ He chastised himself. “So foolish was I, and ignorant: I was as a beast before thee” (Psalm 73:22).

The system of covenantal sanctions in history is ethically reliable, the psalmist said. Psalm 73 is an affirmation of the long-term reliability of these sanctions.

B. The Counter-Argument

The Preacher has an odd way of arguing. He presents an argument in one section. He counters it in another. Here, he argues on behalf of autonomous man. Later, he will argue on behalf of covenant-keeping man.

And so I saw the wicked buried, who had come and gone from the place of the holy, and they were forgotten in the city where they had so done: this is also vanity. Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil. Though a sinner do evil an hundred times, and his days be prolonged, yet surely I know that it shall be well with them that fear God, which fear before him: But it shall not be well with the wicked, neither shall he prolong his days, which are as a shadow; because he feareth not before God (Eccl. 8:10–13).²

This encapsulates the argument of Psalm 73. There is ethical cause and effect in history. The covenant-breaker is lured into a trap by the delay of judgment. “Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil.” He walks on a slippery slope.

1. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 17.

2. Chapter 30.

The Preacher immediately responds on behalf of autonomous man. "There is a vanity which is done upon the earth; that there be just men, unto whom it happeneth according to the work of the wicked; again, there be wicked men, to whom it happeneth according to the work of the righteous: I said that this also is vanity" (Eccl. 8:14). Conclusion: "Then I commended mirth, because a man hath no better thing under the sun, than to eat, and to drink, and to be merry: for that shall abide with him of his labour the days of his life, which God giveth him under the sun" (v. 15). This does not answer the supreme question for an ambitious autonomous man: the fate of his legacy, on which his relevance rests. This is point five of the biblical covenant.³

How can the reader resolve this constant back-and-forth debate? Where is solid ground?

Autonomous man does not trust the social order to provide predictable sanctions. Neither does he trust God to provide such sanctions. Prudence under such circumstances involves finding a middle ground between righteousness and wickedness. He does not believe that there is a God who calls men to a high standard, nor does he believe that God enforces such a standard.

This outlook was condemned by the author of the Book of Revelation.

And unto the angel of the church of the Laodiceans write; These things saith the Amen, the faithful and true witness, the beginning of the creation of God; I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot: I would thou wert cold or hot. So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth (Rev. 3:14–16).

Conclusion

The Preacher speaks for those who see no connection between the pursuit of righteousness and the expectation of positive sanctions. Such people are content with half-way measures.

This outlook undermines the pursuit of excellence. The pursuit of excellence begins with the pursuit of righteousness. This pursuit is a lifetime pursuit. It should begin young.

3. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1987] 2010), ch. 5.

Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way? by taking heed thereto according to thy word. With my whole heart have I sought thee: O let me not wander from thy commandments. Thy word have I hid in mine heart, that I might not sin against thee. Blessed art thou, O LORD: teach me thy statutes (Psalm 119:9–12).

CONSTANT IMPROVEMENT

Lo, this only have I found, that God hath made man upright; but they have sought out many inventions (Eccl. 7:29).

A. Creativity

The Hebrew word translated “upright” has to do with ethics. The word is used to designate a righteous person.¹ The Hebrew word translated “inventions” refers to devices of any kind. It is used only twice in the Old Testament. It is derived from a root word meaning “inventive.” The implication of this verse is that righteous people are creative.

This verse does not say that unrighteous people are not creative. It does say that righteous people are creative. This implies that a characteristic feature of the kingdom of God is its creativity. Members of this kingdom seek out new ways of achieving their goals. They are not content with the range of opportunities they possess now. They imagine that there are better ways of doing things. They devote time and money to their search for better ways. There are several implications associated with such a view of righteous living.

This goes back to the creation week.

And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them. And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth (Gen. 1:26–28).

1. Exodus 15:26; Numbers 23:10; Deuteronomy 6:18; 12:25; 21:9; 32:4.

First, the dominion impulse is built into mankind.² Second, this fact was manifested in the garden of Eden. “And the LORD God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden to dress it and to keep it” (Gen. 2:15).³ In paradise, there was room for improvement.

B. Entrepreneurship

To discover a new way of doing things takes a combination of skills that are possessed by everyone. To some extent, everyone who seeks a better way of achieving his goals is an entrepreneur. But there are specialists who possess these skills in a unique combination.

The entrepreneur looks into the future to see if there might be a market for a new way for people to achieve their goals. He looks at available products and services. He also imagines future demand. Then he seeks out new ways of meeting this expected demand.

He must buy resources: raw materials, land, capital, and labor. He then puts these to work in the production of a new product or service. He prices it to sell. He buys low in order to sell higher. His goal is either money or service. Either he uses the service as a way to accumulate money, or else he uses the money to continue to supply the service. The first goal is Adam Smith’s self-interest. The second goal adheres more closely to the biblical standard of stewardship: service to God through service to His creation.

The world of the entrepreneur is filled with uncertainty.⁴ Others have not seen this opportunity. Or maybe they have seen it and regard it as a trap. The entrepreneur may be confident that some service will be profitable in the future, but he cannot be sure. He could lose his money. In the United States, the number of patented inventions that fail to find a profitable market is high. The actual percentage is higher, because not all inventions are patented. Only those inventions whose inventors or financial backers think are worth the money to patent get patented. Estimates of failures of patented inventions range between 80% (Pareto’s law) and 99.9%.⁵ No one knows. The percentage is either high or astronomically high—probably the latter.

The entrepreneur bears uncertainty for the sake of a large profit.

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

3. Ibid., ch. 8.

4. Frank H. Knight, Risk, Uncertainty and Profit (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1921). (<http://bit.ly/KnightRUP>)

5. “Odds of Success for Inventors.” (<http://bit.ly/InventionSuccess>)

He wastes his time and his money—and then investors’ money—in the vast majority of cases. Yet the rate of progress of invention is high. Technological progress is so high that our world changes noticeably every other decade. Technological obsolescence is a way of life in the modern world. The rate of invention seems to be accelerating. This unquestionably is true in what is by far the most important single area of social transformation: the cost of accumulating, storing, and retrieving information.⁶

So, what is almost a sure thing—the failure of any given new invention—is the foundation of what has been attained by modern society, beginning no earlier than 1775 in Great Britain and no later than 1820: compound economic growth. The social process of transforming that which is doomed individually into that which guarantees benefits for society is the private property order and ethical outlook required by the Bible.

C. Confidence

For a person to invent a product, gain funding for it, and market it successfully is statistically so close to impossible that it would seem that no rational person would attempt it. Yet millions of people do. Small improvements in existing systems are common in every successful business. These are inventions. They are not patented inventions. Each one offers improvement so small that there is no way to measure it in the economy. Yet, taken as a whole, they provide sufficient economic growth to change the world we live in every other decade.

An inventor must be confident that his sacrifice in the present will produce a benefit in the future that is great enough to repay him for his effort. Jesus warned us to count the cost.

For which of you, intending to build a tower, sitteth not down first, and counteth the cost, whether he have sufficient to finish it? Lest haply, after he hath laid the foundation, and is not able to finish it, all that behold it begin to mock him, Saying, This man began to build, and was not able to finish (Luke 14:28–30).⁷

Despite the costs, covenant-keepers are supposed to innovate. This is not just for the foreign mission field, where the Wycliffe Bible translation program is innovative linguistically. It is for innovations of all kinds. There is room for improvement in every area of life. This includes economic theory.

6. Raymond Kurzweil, “The Law of Accelerating Returns” (2001). (<http://bit.ly/AcceleratingReturns>)

7. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 35.

Conclusion

The greater the level of confidence imparted by a worldview to its adherents, the more likely they will bear the uncertainty associated with innovation. The Psalms provide such confidence.⁸ The Book of Ecclesiastes is divided. Most of it is not intended to inspire confidence. It is intended to expose the dead ends of the philosophy of autonomy. But this passage is surely confidence-building.

8. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012).

29

THE UNCERTAINTY OF TIMING

Because to every purpose there is time and judgment, therefore the misery of man is great upon him. For he knoweth not that which shall be: for who can tell him when it shall be? (Eccl. 8:6–7).

Is the Preacher speaking on behalf of the covenant-keeper or autonomous man? I think it is the latter. This is because autonomous man does not believe in prophecy or prophets. Under the Mosaic Covenant, there were prophets who did have access to God's purposes and His timing. Before the Mosaic Covenant, Joseph was given this ability in Egypt.¹ The lack of reliable guidance on the timing of decisions, great and small, produces misery, the Preacher says. This is a great burden for autonomous man.

For covenant-keepers, this lack of authoritative guidance is not a source of misery, or should not be. It is a source of confidence. They know that they have access to God's law as stewards of God. They are more likely to be the recipient of guidance than covenant-breakers are. They have a competitive advantage.

A. Using the Advantage

Do covenant-keepers take advantage of this advantage? The Bible provides evidence that they do not. One example is the reaction of the disciples to the death and entombment of Jesus. They scattered. Yet the Jewish authorities were well aware of what Jesus had taught about His resurrection.

Jesus answered and said unto them, Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up. Then said the Jews, Forty and six years was this temple in building, and wilt thou rear it up in three days? But he spake of the temple of his body. When therefore he was risen from the dead, his disciples remembered that he had said this unto them; and they believed the scripture, and the word which Jesus had said (John 2:19–22).

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 32.

The disciples did not initially understand Jesus' words. The Jewish authorities were unaware that the disciples were unaware of what Jesus had taught.

Now the next day, that followed the day of the preparation, the chief priests and Pharisees came together unto Pilate, Saying, Sir, we remember that that deceiver said, while he was yet alive, After three days I will rise again. Command therefore that the sepulchre be made sure until the third day, lest his disciples come by night, and steal him away, and say unto the people, He is risen from the dead: so the last error shall be worse than the first. Pilate said unto them, Ye have a watch: go your way, make it as sure as ye can. So they went, and made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone, and setting a watch (Matt. 27:62–66).

The disciples not only did not plan to steal the body, they had no understanding that Jesus had predicted His resurrection.

Covenant-keepers often seem to possess no advantage over covenant-breakers. This is because of their unwillingness to do what the Bible says they must do: obey God's law. The issue is ethics, not foreknowledge.

B. Ethics, not Foreknowledge

A covenant-keeper is supposed to believe that God is in charge of all things. God intervenes in history to achieve His purposes.

I form the light, and create darkness: I make peace, and create evil: I the LORD do all these things. Drop down, ye heavens, from above, and let the skies pour down righteousness: let the earth open, and let them bring forth salvation, and let righteousness spring up together; I the LORD have created it. Woe unto him that striveth with his Maker! Let the potsherd strive with the potsherd of the earth. Shall the clay say to him that fashioneth it, What makest thou? or thy work, He hath no hands? Woe unto him that saith unto his father, What begettest thou? or to the woman, What hast thou brought forth? Thus saith the LORD, the Holy One of Israel, and his Maker, Ask me of things to come concerning my sons, and concerning the work of my hands command ye me. I have made the earth, and created man upon it: I, even my hands, have stretched out the heavens, and all their host have I commanded (Isa. 45:7–12).

The fact that covenant-keepers do not know the timing of events should not discourage them. God knows. He does not need to reveal Himself to covenant-keepers regarding His plans. They have God's Bible-revealed law to guide them. "The secret things belong unto the LORD our God: but those things which are revealed belong unto us and to our children for ever, that we may do all the words of this law" (Deut. 29:29). The predictable sanctions of God's law offer sufficient guidance: positive and negative feedback.

The Jewish leaders asked Jesus about the timing of the kingdom of God.

And when he was demanded of the Pharisees, when the kingdom of God should come, he answered them and said, The kingdom of God cometh not with observation: Neither shall they say, Lo here! or, lo there! for, behold, the kingdom of God is within you² (Luke 17:20–21).

The disciples asked what they imagined was the same question.

When they therefore were come together, they asked of him, saying, Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel? And he said unto them, It is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power. But ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you: and ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judaea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth (Acts 1:6–8).

So, from the point of view of God, covenant-breakers' lack of knowledge about timing should not be a source of misery for covenant-keepers. Because covenant-keepers have the law and the prophets, but members of competing kingdoms do not, they have an advantage. They may decide not take advantage of this advantage, but they possess it. The key factor in the extension of the kingdom of God is ethics, not timing.

Conclusion

The Preacher identifies a source of misery: our lack of knowledge about the correct timing for implementing our purposes. "Because to every purpose there is time and judgment.” Implementation is what he means by judgment.

2. The Greek words translated as "within you" (entos humone) should probably be translated "in your midst," according to expositor Ned B. Stonehouse, The Witness of Luke to Christ (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1951), p. 155.

The knowledge of timing is not crucial for covenant-keepers. It is useful, but it is not crucial. Time is not a threat to them, because God is sovereign over history. Timing is crucial for covenant-breakers, because they are running out of time. Time is their enemy, for the final judgment is their enemy (Rev. 20:14–15). Time is a tool for them, but it is a tool that works against them. “A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children’s children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just” (Prov. 13:22).³

What is crucial for covenant-keepers is ethics. Biblical ethics rests on biblical law. This is the conclusion of the Preacher in the final verses of his book. “Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil” (Eccl. 12:13–14).⁴

3. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 41.

4. Chapter 45.

30

TIME RUNS OUT

And so I saw the wicked buried, who had come and gone from the place of the holy, and they were forgotten in the city where they had so done: this is also vanity. Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil. Though a sinner do evil an hundred times, and his days be prolonged, yet surely I know that it shall be well with them that fear God, which fear before him: But it shall not be well with the wicked, neither shall he prolong his days, which are as a shadow; because he feareth not before God (Eccl. 8:10–13).

Here, the Preacher speaks on behalf of covenant-keeping man. Previously, he presented a goad in his case against autonomous man by pointing to the indeterminacy of ethical outcomes in autonomous man's cosmos. "All things have I seen in the days of my vanity: there is a just man that perisheth in his righteousness, and there is a wicked man that longeth his life in his wickedness" (Eccl. 7:15).¹ Here, he presents an explanation for this randomness: insufficient time.

A. Death

He begins here with death, which was his starting point in his critique of autonomous man. Autonomous man cannot escape death and its implications. Death is impersonal. Death impersonally consumes generations. "One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh: but the earth abideth for ever" (Eccl. 1:4).² Death impersonally consumes individuals. "For there is no remembrance of the wise more than of the fool for ever; seeing that which now is in the days to come shall all be forgotten. And how dieth the wise man? as the fool" (Eccl.

1. Chapter 27.

2. Chapter 1.

2:16).³ This is one of the book's recurring sub-themes. "All things come alike to all: there is one event to the righteous, and to the wicked; to the good and to the clean, and to the unclean; to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not: as is the good, so is the sinner; and he that sweareth, as he that feareth an oath" (Eccl. 9:2).⁴

Autonomous man is defenseless against the limited sovereignty of time, a defenselessness manifested in the final sovereignty of death. Nothing escapes death. The philosophy of autonomy begins with the sovereignty of time, but then perishes in the sovereignty of death. For modern man, this is the heat death of the universe: the cosmic triumph of impersonal entropy.⁵ Each generation hopes to discover a way to structure its worldview in terms of life, but this attempt always fails. Autonomy is a philosophy of death.

The Preacher has already laid the groundwork. He continues to develop this theme. "And so I saw the wicked buried, who had come and gone from the place of the holy, and they were forgotten in the city where they had so done: this is also vanity." These people had gone in and out of the temple for years. They had escaped judgment on their evil deeds. The ecclesiastical authorities had not brought successful covenant lawsuits against these sinners. They had enjoyed free access to the house of God. They had seemed to be beyond negative sanctions. But then death arrived. Soon, they were forgotten.

Why did this matter? Because, in terms of the philosophy of individual autonomy, fame is all that remains after death. The economic inheritance, if any, passes to men of unknown commitments and talents (Eccl. 4:8).⁶ It passes to strangers (Eccl. 6:1–2).⁷ Men can take no legitimate hope in the outcome of their accumulation of riches. This leaves them with only hope in their fame. Here, the Preacher shuts the door on that hope. They will not be remembered.

3. Chapter 3.

4. Chapter 33.

5. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

6. Chapter 13.

7. Chapter 21.

B. The Death of Time

Time is the god of autonomous man, for time alone is creative in his system. But time runs out. Death is like an ogre's mouth at the end of days, chewing up everything that enters. The sinner has a fixed amount of time.

To every thing there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven: A time to be born, and a time to die; a time to plant, and a time to pluck up that which is planted (Eccl. 3:1–2).⁸

I said in mine heart, God shall judge the righteous and the wicked: for there is a time there for every purpose and for every work (Eccl. 3:17).

For man also knoweth not his time: as the fishes that are taken in an evil net, and as the birds that are caught in the snare; so are the sons of men snared in an evil time, when it falleth suddenly upon them (Eccl. 9:12).

The end comes. When time is your god, death is your devil. In the cosmos of autonomous man, the devil wins. The creativity of time ends for every living thing. For modern man, time itself ends in the heat death of the universe. Time's arrow falls to the frozen ground. There is no future; there is no memory of the past. Meaninglessness envelops all things. The end.

C. Delayed Sentencing

Sinners had come and gone from the temple with impunity. This had given them confidence. "Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil." This is an insecure confidence.

Men who escape sentencing for many years do not thereby escape judgment. "Though a sinner do evil an hundred times, and his days be prolonged, yet surely I know that it shall be well with them that fear God, which fear before him: But it shall not be well with the wicked, neither shall he prolong his days, which are as a shadow; because he feareth not before God." There are ethical standards. These standards do govern the imposition of God's sanctions. God is the source of the standards and the sanctions.⁹ The future therefore belongs to God and

8. Chapter 7.

9. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler,

His people.¹⁰

Delayed sanctions constitute slippery places. David had seen delayed sanctions, and what he saw disturbed him for a while.

For I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked. For there are no bands in their death: but their strength is firm. They are not in trouble as other men; neither are they plagued like other men. Therefore pride compasseth them about as a chain; violence covereth them as a garment. Their eyes stand out with fatness: they have more than heart could wish. They are corrupt, and speak wickedly concerning oppression: they speak loftily. They set their mouth against the heavens, and their tongue walketh through the earth. Therefore his people return hither: and waters of a full cup are wrung out to them. And they say, How doth God know? and is there knowledge in the most High? Behold, these are the ungodly, who prosper in the world; they increase in riches (Psalm 73:3–12).

He did not understand that delayed sanctions are a judgment against sinners.

When I thought to know this, it was too painful for me; Until I went into the sanctuary of God; then understood I their end. Surely thou didst set them in slippery places: thou castedst them down into destruction. How are they brought into desolation, as in a moment! they are utterly consumed with terrors. As a dream when one awaketh; so, O Lord, when thou awakest, thou shalt despise their image. Thus my heart was grieved, and I was pricked in my reins. So foolish was I, and ignorant: I was as a beast before thee (Psalm 73:16–22).¹¹

The Preacher did understand this. He was not fooled by the delayed sanctions. The days of wicked are like a shadow. Reality is permanent.

Conclusion

The Preacher denies here that the philosophy of autonomy has legitimate hope. Good is not the same as evil. Wisdom is superior to foolishness. Time is not swallowed up by death. The end of life is not the end. Sinners will not finish well.

Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), chaps. 3, 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstypm>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), chaps. 3, 4.

10. Sutton, ch. 5; North, ch. 5.

11. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 17.

This gives legitimate hope to covenant-keepers. The wicked will be forgotten. "And so I saw the wicked buried, who had come and gone from the place of the holy, and they were forgotten in the city where they had so done: this is also vanity." The Preacher does not say here that covenant-keepers will be forgotten. He says elsewhere that they will be, but there, he speaks on behalf of autonomous man.

The work that a covenant-keeper does today has influence in the future. Death does not swallow up the future. The inheritance can compound over time.

31

EAT, DRINK, AND BE MERRY

There is a vanity which is done upon the earth; that there be just men, unto whom it happeneth according to the work of the wicked; again, there be wicked men, to whom it happeneth according to the work of the righteous: I said that this also is vanity. Then I commended mirth, because a man hath no better thing under the sun, than to eat, and to drink, and to be merry: for that shall abide with him of his labour the days of his life, which God giveth him under the sun (Eccl. 8:14–15).

A. Causation

The Preacher speaks here as autonomous man. The world is still all vanity. The world is ethically random. Good men lose. Bad men win. Yet he is beginning to waver. While it is true that good men lose and bad men win, the normal course of events is the opposite. The key phrase is “according to the work of.” “There is a vanity which is done upon the earth; that there be just men, unto whom it happeneth according to the work of the wicked; again, there be wicked men, to whom it happeneth according to the work of the righteous: I said that this also is vanity.”

For autonomous man, there is no good reason why good men should prosper and bad men should lose. He has affirmed such a view before. “All things have I seen in the days of my vanity: there is a just man that perisheth in his righteousness, and there is a wicked man that longeth his life in his wickedness” (Eccl. 7:15).¹ He is arguing against a rival view, the view presented in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. There is predictability between covenant-keeping and success. There is covenantal predictability between righteousness and a long life, and also between covenant-breaking and a short life.

Honour thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon

1. Chapter 27.

the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee (Ex 20:12).²

This applies also to life-threatening diseases.

And said, If thou wilt diligently hearken to the voice of the LORD thy God, and wilt do that which is right in his sight, and wilt give ear to his commandments, and keep all his statutes, I will put none of these diseases upon thee, which I have brought upon the Egyptians: for I am the LORD that healeth thee (Ex. 15:26).

If thou wilt not observe to do all the words of this law that are written in this book, that thou mayest fear this glorious and fearful name, THE LORD THY GOD; Then the LORD will make thy plagues wonderful, and the plagues of thy seed, even great plagues, and of long continuance, and sore sicknesses, and of long continuance. Moreover he will bring upon thee all the diseases of Egypt, which thou wast afraid of; and they shall cleave unto thee. Also every sickness, and every plague, which is not written in the book of this law, them will the LORD bring upon thee, until thou be destroyed (Deut. 28:58–61).³

The Preacher here comes in the name of autonomous man. He challenges the reliability of these covenantal patterns of sanctions in history. He calls into question the promises of God.

B. Let the Good Times Roll

He says that there is no reliable covenantal predictability based on obedience to God's Bible-revealed law. This leads to a conclusion. "Then I commended mirth, because a man hath no better thing under the sun, than to eat, and to drink, and to be merry: for that shall abide with him of his labour the days of his life, which God giveth him under the sun" (v. 15). His labor sometimes produces food, drink, and leisure. This is what abides with him during his lifetime. This is what lasts. This is what has continuity. But not for long. After he dies, there will be nothing. Death ends all continuity.

There is no remembrance of former things; neither shall there be any remembrance of things that are to come with those that shall come after (Eccl. 1:11).

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 25.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

For there is no remembrance of the wise more than of the fool for ever; seeing that which now is in the days to come shall all be forgotten. And how dieth the wise man? as the fool (Eccl. 2:16).

Because death ends continuity, death is sovereign.⁴ Death is the only continuous thing is history. The god of autonomous man is death. All other gods bow down to death. No other god can deliver man from death. Death inescapably imposes the great discontinuity. It is therefore the only continuity.

The Preacher affirms the benefits of enjoying the good times. He has done this before. He will do it again (Eccl. 9:7–12).⁵ He has done so in the name of autonomous man. He has done so in the name of covenant man. As autonomous man, he recommends enjoyment as the best that we can hope for, while we have the opportunity. Nothing else is secure. “For that shall abide with him of his labour the days of his life, which God giveth him under the sun.”

Conclusion

The present-orientation of the Preacher is obvious. If the present enjoyment of consumer goods is the one thing that we can count on, then thrift is a will-o-the-wisp.

Its outcome is unsure. Capital consumption is wise; capital formation is problematical. This is a prescription for impoverishment. This undermines inheritance. It undermines economic growth, including the growth of the kingdom. Because there is no predictability between ethical conformity to covenantal law and economic growth, he concludes that capital consumption is logical. The world is upside-down ethically. The wise course of action is to grab what you can whenever you can.

4. Chapter 3.

5. Chapter 33.

IGNORANCE IS NOT BLISS

When I applied mine heart to know wisdom, and to see the business that is done upon the earth: (for also there is that neither day nor night seeth sleep with his eyes:) Then I beheld all the work of God, that a man cannot find out the work that is done under the sun: because though a man labour to seek it out, yet he shall not find it; yea further; though a wise man think to know it, yet shall he not be able to find it (Eccl. 8:16–17).

A. A Speechless God

This is autonomous man speaking. The Preacher acknowledges that there is a god, but he insists that this god does not reveal himself to men, even to wise men. This god is therefore wholly other: transcendent unto irrelevance.

The Preacher insists that a wise man cannot discover the work of God. This is incorrect. He can discover it in the Bible. It is legitimate to say that the wise man cannot discover all of the work of God (Deut. 29:29). Man is not omniscient. But the fact that he cannot discover the work of God comprehensively does not mean that he cannot discover it truly. Van Til summarized this position.

Berkouwer quite rightly says that on the biblical approach there is no dualism in the idea of God. But this does not mean that man claims to have at any point an exhaustive understanding of things. It does not even mean that in some field, for instance, the field of science or that of philosophy, man aims at an exhaustive knowledge of reality. On the contrary, the biblical views involve the recognition of mystery everywhere. There is no fact in the universe that man understands or will understand comprehensively. But his presupposition is that, because God has created all things, therefore he also controls and directs all things. Of course the believer does not seek to prove the existence of such a God. This God must be presupposed as the basis of all proof in any field. Thus the biblical position is not like that of rationalism or like that of irrationalism. Nor is it like any combination of these two. It is based on the presupposition that man knows truly though not comprehensively because God does know all things in terms of his self-contained being and has revealed himself to man.¹

The Preacher comes as the Kantian theologian Karl Barth came: in the name of autonomous man.² The god of autonomous man is so far above man, so mysterious, that it does no good for man to search out the works of this god or the ways of this god. This has always been the underlying presupposition of autonomous men, for they seek to deny the God who brings final judgment (Rev. 20:14–15). If He has not revealed his work to men, then men are not responsible subordinate agents. This makes them supreme autonomous agents for as long as they can enforce their claim against god or any rival claimant. The god of autonomous man does not bring predictable judgments in history. History is the realm of autonomous man, who seeks to bring history under his control. This not the God of the Bible. Van Til wrote:

No one has an exhaustive knowledge of God as revealed in the world. The Parmenidean idea that man has or can have such knowledge of God presupposes that man is autonomous. The Kantian notion that man can have no knowledge of the triune God also presupposes that man is autonomous. . . .

As a covenant being man must seek to implicate himself into the revelation of God. If he is to see the facts of his environment for what they are, he must see them as being nothing more or less than bearers of the covenant requirements and promises of God. We may therefore say that man's proper method of obtaining knowledge is that of implication into God's revelation. . . .

Our basic approach then is to accept on authority what Christ says in Scripture. Our basic presupposition is based on our belief that in Scripture God speaks to us. We cannot comprehend, i.e., exhaustively understand, what God says to us about anything.³

1. Van Til, Christianity and Barthianism (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1962), pp. 432–33.

2. Ibid.

3. Van Til, in E. R. Geehan (ed.), Jerusalem and Athens Critical Discussions on the Theology and Apologetics of Cornelius Van Til (Nutley, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1971), p. 302.

B. A Matter of Responsibility

The Preacher, in the name of autonomous man, offers a counsel of despair. He says that a wise man can have no knowledge of the work of God. This, if true, places man outside the covenant. Logically speaking, as the Preacher speaks, we are not responsible if we have no knowledge of what God requires. But his premise is false. Men do have knowledge of what God requires. This condemns them. Paul wrote: "For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves: Which shew the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the mean while accusing or else excusing one another;)" (Rom. 2:14–15).⁴

The Preacher uses a phrase that has confused translators: "there is that neither day nor night seeth sleep with his eyes." Does this refer to him in his quest for knowledge? Some translators have so translated it. The English Standard Version reads: "how neither day nor night do one's eyes see sleep." This refers to the magnitude of the task of understanding God's work.

The Preacher has hit the barrier announced by Moses: "The secret things belong unto the LORD our God" (Deut. 29:29a). This is an aspect of God's omniscience, which is an incommunicable attribute of God. When man confronts a barrier established by this attribute, he is supposed to back off. "Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour" (Rom. 9:20–21). To seek a degree of knowledge comparable to what God possesses is to seek to become God.

Autonomous man does not rely on the doctrine of the omniscience of God to provide his own derivative understanding. He does not believe that there is understanding derived from God. Thus, he must grasp the cosmos by means of his own mind. He builds his kingdom as the people at the Tower of Babel built theirs: without reference to God.

Conclusion

The Preacher articulates a fundamental presupposition of autonomous man: God has not revealed himself to us. This, autonomous man believes, gets him off the covenantal hook. He will die, but that will end things. Autonomous man is willing to live in despair about history, despair about the meaninglessness of a life spent in a universe that is governed by death. For him, the first death is acceptable, just so long as he does not face the second death. “And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death” (Rev. 20:14). The Bible reveals a very different God and a very different end for covenant-keeping men.

4. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 3.

And I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea. And I John saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. And I heard a great voice out of heaven saying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God. And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things are passed away (Rev. 21:1–4).

DEAD LIONS AND ECONOMIC STAGNATION

All things come alike to all: there is one event to the righteous, and to the wicked; to the good and to the clean, and to the unclean; to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not: as is the good, so is the sinner; and he that sweareth, as he that feareth an oath. This is an evil among all things that are done under the sun, that there is one event unto all: yea, also the heart of the sons of men is full of evil, and madness is in their heart while they live, and after that they go to the dead. For to him that is joined to all the living there is hope: for a living dog is better than a dead lion (Eccl. 9:2–4).

A. Death and Differentiation¹

The Preacher returns to one of his two major sub-themes regarding autonomous man: the absolute sovereignty of death. He goes to the heart of the matter once again.

For the living know that they shall die; but the dead know not any thing, neither have they any more a reward; for the memory of them is forgotten. Also their love, and their hatred, and their envy, is now perished; neither have they any more a portion for ever in any thing that is done under the sun (Eccl. 9:5–6).

He then says something that has become an aphorism in the Christian West: a living dog is better than a dead lion. It would make a fine inscription on the tombstone of autonomous man.

He speaks here on behalf of autonomous man. His observations are consistent with the philosophy of autonomy. He concludes that thinking defines a person. When thinking ceases because of death, everything else ceases. “For the living know that they shall die; but the dead know not any thing, neither have they any more a reward; for the memory of them is forgotten” (v. 5). The living know that they shall die. What does this mean for the living? That there is nothing to hope for. There will be no reward after death. There will be no memory of the dear departed, either. Even if there is some recollection initially, this will pass with the deaths of those who remember. The hope of fame comforts an elite among the living. It is a false hope.

1. Chapter 3.

What will remain of today’s activities, emotions, and dreams? Nothing. “Also their love, and their hatred, and their envy, is now perished; neither have they any more a portion for ever in any thing that is done under the sun” (v. 6). History is all there is, and once a person departs from history, there is nothing.

These verses are used by defenders of the concept of soul sleep to deny the existence of hell. But these passages, so interpreted, are equally as effective in countering heaven as hell. They are supportive of autonomous man in history. The price paid by autonomous man to gain such support is the destruction of meaning and hope. Without differentiation in terms of either ethics or historical significance, the present has no meaning. When death swallows up everything, it swallows up differentiation. Love, hatred, and envy are relevant in life because of the pleasure or pain they bring in the present, but there is no ratification by the future. “All things come alike to all: there is one event to the righteous, and to the wicked” (v. 2).

B. Dogs and Lions

A dog in Bible times was not a respected animal.

But against any of the children of Israel shall not a dog move his tongue, against man or beast: that ye may know how that the LORD doth put a difference between the Egyptians and Israel (Ex. 11:7).

And the Philistine said unto David, Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves? And the Philistine cursed David by his gods (I Sam. 17:43).

But be not thou far from me, O LORD: O my strength, haste thee to help me. Deliver my soul from the sword; my darling from the power of the dog (Psalm 22:19–20).

In contrast, a lion was respected as a beast of prey.

Behold, the people shall rise up as a great lion, and lift up himself as a young lion: he shall not lie down until he eat of the prey, and drink the blood of the slain (Num. 23:24).

He couched, he lay down as a lion, and as a great lion: who shall stir him up? Blessed is he that blesseth thee, and cursed is he that curseth thee (Num. 24:9).

And of Gad he said, Blessed be he that enlargeth Gad: he dwelleth as a lion, and teareth the arm with the crown of the head (Deut. 33:20).

The fear of a king is as the roaring of a lion: whoso provoketh him to anger sinneth against his own soul (Prov. 20:2).

When the Preacher writes that it is better to be a live dog than a dead lion, he is making a powerful statement in favor of life over death. Death transforms a lion to such an extent that being a live dog is preferable. The fame of a dead lion is nothing. A live dog is better off.

C. Live It Up

Autonomous man lives without hope. He can enjoy only the present. The Preacher recommends this.

Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; for God now accepteth thy works. Let thy garments be always white; and let thy head lack no ointment. Live joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest all the days of the life of thy vanity, which he hath given thee under the sun, all the days of thy vanity: for that is thy portion in this life, and in thy labour which thou takest under the sun. Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest.

I returned, and saw under the sun, that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, neither yet bread to the wise, nor yet riches to men of understanding, nor yet favour to men of skill; but time and chance happeneth to them all. For man also knoweth not his time: as the fishes that are taken in an evil net, and as the birds that are caught in the snare; so are the sons of men snared in an evil time, when it falleth suddenly upon them (Eccl. 9:7–12).²

Time and chance happen to all living things. There is no predictable cause and effect in history. The earthly future of autonomous man is random. Death alone is predictable: the termination of cause and effect.

2. Chapter 34.

In such a world, future-orientation is naive, even foolish. The present is here; the future is problematical. The grave is certain.

In such a worldview, high interest rates are the result. To persuade a person to give up the use of consumer goods in the present in order to gain additional consumer goods in the future is a difficult sell to a consistent autonomous man. Sacrifice in the present for the sake of greater wealth in the future is a high-risk venture. There is no advantage worth paying for, since time and chance are supreme. The present alone is sure.

This outlook is hostile to economic growth. It is hostile to progress. Economic growth and progress are financed by thrift. People turn over to entrepreneurs the money or tools that could be used for present enjoyment in order to fund future output. The more present-oriented a culture is, the higher the rate of expected return must be in order to persuade people to save.³ Also, entrepreneurs must compete with present-oriented consumers for the funds made available by savers. Consumer loans pay higher rates of interest on producer loans.

Conclusion

The Preacher recommends present-orientation. On behalf of autonomous man, he proclaims a philosophy of life.

Then I commended mirth, because a man hath no better thing under the sun, than to eat, and to drink, and to be merry: for that shall abide with him of his labour the days of his life, which God giveth him under the sun (Eccl. 8:15).⁴

This is a philosophy of stagnation, of history without progress.

3. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. 19. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

4. Chapter 31.

34

WITH ALL YOUR STRENGTH

Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; for God now accepteth thy works. Let thy garments be always white; and let thy head lack no ointment. Live joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest all the days of the life of thy vanity, which he hath given thee under the sun, all the days of thy vanity: for that is thy portion in this life, and in thy labour which thou takest under the sun. Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest (Eccl. 9:7–10).

A. The Sovereignty of Death

The Preacher again relies on his now-familiar exhortation regarding the sovereignty of death.¹

All things come alike to all: there is one event to the righteous, and to the wicked; to the good and to the clean, and to the unclean; to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not: as is the good, so is the sinner; and he that sweareth, as he that feareth an oath. This is an evil among all things that are done under the sun, that there is one event unto all: yea, also the heart of the sons of men is full of evil, and madness is in their heart while they live, and after that they go to the dead. For to him that is joined to all the living there is hope: for a living dog is better than a dead lion. For the living know that they shall die: but the dead know not any thing, neither have they any more a reward; for the memory of them is forgotten (Eccl. 9:2–5).²

Here, he draws a conclusion: enjoy the moment. Live for the moment. The moment is all that we have. He had already come to this conclusion.³ But the final component of his conclusion here does not make sense, given the other implications of his worldview. Why should anyone work with all his might? The Preacher had already denied the wisdom of such effort with respect to the pursuit of righteousness and wickedness.

1. Chapter 3.

2. Chapter 33.

3. Chapters 5, 20.

In the day of prosperity be joyful, but in the day of adversity consider: God also hath set the one over against the other, to the end that man should find nothing after him. All things have I seen in the days of my vanity: there is a just man that perisheth in his righteousness, and there is a wicked man that longeth his life in his wickedness. Be not righteous over much; neither make thyself over wise: why shouldest thou destroy thyself? Be not over much wicked, neither be thou foolish: why shouldest thou die before thy time? (Eccl 7:14–17).⁴

He concludes that the ethical randomness of the lifetime outcomes of our labor should lead us to take things easy. To strive to attain either righteousness or wickedness is a waste of time and effort. “Go with the flow. Lighten up. Easy does it. Don’t work yourself to death.” “Why shouldest thou die before thy time?”

B. Hard Work

Then, without warning, he recommends hard, relentless work. He offers this reason: there will be no work in the grave. So what? If no man’s memory survives in the grave (v. 10), and if no inheritance is secure,⁵ and if the world will eventually forget about you,⁶ what possible advantage is hard work in the present? Work for its own sake is madness. Work is either for the worker, or for itself, or to help others. He says here that work is for the sake of the worker, whose work will cease in death. But why should the worker revel in work? Why not revel in leisure? “Let thy garments be always white; and let thy head lack no ointment.”

He speaks here in the name of autonomous man, who has no hope in the future. He has only the present. He must therefore savor all things, one by one, in the present. He must put his heart and soul into his work, for he has only the present.

This is present-orientation with a vengeance. It is grasping at straws. It is vanity. He knows it is vanity. “Live joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest all the days of the life of thy vanity, which he hath given thee under the sun, all the days of thy vanity: for that is thy portion in this life, and in thy labour which thou takest under the sun.” He previously had said that both righteousness and wickedness should be pursued moderately. But what applies to ethics does not apply to work.

4. Chapter 27.

5. Chapters 4, 13, 21.

6. Chapters 3, 30.

There is no logic to this conclusion, yet he draws it. The conclusion does not follow from his presuppositions regarding autonomous man. He is thrown back to the original covenant, the dominion covenant.

And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them. And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth (Gen. 1:26–28).⁷

This covenant defines man. Man cannot be understood correctly apart from this. The Preacher invokes hard work because hard work, not consumption, defines man. High consumption is a product of hard work, but only randomly, according to the Preacher (Eccl. 9:10–11).⁸ Hard work is its own reward. This is the essence of autonomy: the quest for self-reliance. It affirms that the Bible’s system of covenantal sanctions in history is not reliable. It says that God does not bring sanctions in history according to His ethical requirements. Autonomy opposes theonomy.

In God’s kingdom, work is always for God’s sake, as mediated (represented) by some aspect of the creation. This is an implication of the doctrine of the sovereignty of God. The Preacher not only does not make this clear here, he recommends a philosophy of life that militates against the covenantal view of work.

C. Why Invoke God?

The Preacher says: “Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; for God now accepteth thy works” (v. 7).

7. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

8. Chapter 35.

On what basis can autonomous man invoke God? The Preacher has done this before. “There is nothing better for a man, than that he should eat and drink, and that he should make his soul enjoy good in his labour. This also I saw, that it was from the hand of God” (Eccl. 2:24).⁹

This god grants blessings, but these blessings are not predictable. So, a man should enjoy them while he can. They are not reliable. They are not the product of ethical causation. They are the random blessings of a god who does not grant blessings on the basis of ethical conformity to His law.

In such a universe, man is a co-laborer with god. God has greater power, but He is not the god of the biblical covenant. A man does not need to subordinate himself to this god, through grace by faith. He merely enjoys whatever blessings this god arbitrarily bestows on people, according to no predictable system of causation. This is the god of autonomous man. This god allows men to make their own way through life. He intervenes, but capriciously. He is like a rich uncle who occasionally sends his nephew a present for no known reason. The nephew enjoys it while he can.

D. Present-Orientation vs. Entrepreneurship

The Preacher exhorts us to live for the moment, for the moment is all we have. Nothing else has any reliable foundation. The future is inherently unreliable. It leads to death, and death is sovereign.

The present-orientated person is ready to sacrifice future income for present consumption. The future is insecure, at best. The present is here. A bird in hand is better than two under the bush. Why risk a loss when the present is doing well?

This attitude is hostile to entrepreneurship. The future is too uncertain to justify entrepreneurship. The accent is on consumption now.

The Preacher recommends hard work. This is not logical. If the future is insecure and besieged by randomness, then hard work is no guarantee of future success. At best, it is indulged in for the pleasures it brings. But it brings pleasure only because God has made man in His image. God worked six days out of seven. The Preacher, in the name of autonomous man, rests his case for work on nothing. The recommendation makes sense only on the assumption that man is under the

9. Chapter 5.

God of the covenant, not the god of autonomous man.

Hard work is not the essence of entrepreneurship. The laborer digging a ditch with a shovel works hard. He is not an entrepreneur. The driver of an earth-moving machine works less hard and accomplishes far more. Entrepreneurship is the vision, the forecasting, and the uncertainty-bearing¹⁰ that are required to invent a better earth-moving machine.

The world is transformed more by entrepreneurs than by ditch-diggers. The Preacher here offers no encouragement to entrepreneurs. He does offer a way of self-justification for ditch diggers. He offers the labor theory of value: work for its own sake.¹¹

Conclusion

The Preacher offers what appears initially to be a counsel of hope to offset his counsel of despair. His doctrine of the sovereignty of death offers no meaningful hope. Impersonal death swallows up everything in the end, thereby undermining all meaning. Some men seek power; others prefer escape. Neither strategy makes any meaningful difference in the cosmology of autonomous man. The Preacher therefore abandons all meaning in the name of consumption. Enjoy! Yet he also recommends hard work. Why would anyone enjoy work in preference to leisure? With this philosophy of history, a commitment to hard work undermines the commitment to leisure. Hard work is not logical in a world in which death is sovereign, inheritance is uncertain, and outcomes are ethically random.

The Preacher is grasping at logical straws, for this is what autonomous man does. In full public view, the Preacher is making the case for autonomous man's worldview. This worldview is self-defeating. It is a counsel of despair.

10. Frank H. Knight, Risk, Uncertainty, and Profit (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1921). (<http://bit.ly/KnightRUP>)

11. This was the error of classical economics. The subjective value revolution in economic theory that began in the early 1870s rejected the labor theory of value.

THE SECONDARY SOVEREIGNTY OF CHANCE

I returned, and saw under the sun, that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, neither yet bread to the wise, nor yet riches to men of understanding, nor yet favour to men of skill; but time and chance happeneth to them all (Eccl. 9:10–11).

A. Random Outcomes

The Preacher speaks here as autonomous man. For him, death is the ultimate sovereign.¹ Time is a tertiary sovereign. Why? Because time cannot overcome death. Time is governed by the secondary sovereign: chance. For autonomous man, chance governs history until death intervenes. It is death > chance > time.

He says here that there is no predictable causality between swift-ness and victory in a race, or between strength and victory in a war. There is no predictable bread to the wise, nor predictable riches to men of understanding. The outcomes are inherently random, no matter what history seems to indicate. Men are deceived by randomness. What appear to be causal sequences are in fact illusions. Autonomous man should not count on anything.

The priests of Philistia knew better. When the victorious army brought back the Ark of the Covenant, each city that hosted it was struck by a plague. Each city then passed the Ark on to the next city, and the scenario was repeated. The priests decided that the presence of the Ark might be the source of the plagues. So, they devised a test.

Now therefore make a new cart, and take two milch kine, on which there hath come no yoke, and tie the kine to the cart, and bring their calves home from them: And take the ark of the LORD, and lay it upon the cart; and put the jewels of gold, which ye return him for a trespass offering, in a coffer by the side thereof; and send it away, that it may go. And see, if it goeth up by the way of his own coast to Beth-shemesh, then he hath done us this great evil: but if not, then we shall know that it is not his hand that smote us; it was a chance that happened to us.

1. Chapter 3.

And the men did so; and took two milch kine, and tied them to the cart, and shut up their calves at home: And they laid the ark of the LORD upon the cart, and the coffer with the mice of gold and the images of their emerods. And the kine took the straight way to the way of Beth-shemesh, and went along the highway, lowing as they went, and turned not aside to the right hand or to the left; and the lords of the Philistines went after them unto the border of Beth-shemesh (I Sam. 6:7–12).

The priests recognized the difference between God's negative sanctions and random events. The priests were not intimidated by what might have been chance. They saw that they had to make a decision. They let untrained but domestic animals do this for them. They even rigged the test in favor of the retroactive explanation of chance. They left the calves inside Philistia. The outcome was what they had suspected.²

B. Covenantal Causation

God revealed to Moses that social causation is governed by ethics. There are positive sanctions.

And it shall come to pass, if thou shalt hearken diligently unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to observe and to do all his commandments which I command thee this day, that the LORD thy God will set thee on high above all nations of the earth: And all these blessings shall come on thee, and overtake thee, if thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God. (Deut. 28:1–2).

There are also negative sanctions.

And thou shalt not go aside from any of the words which I command thee this day, to the right hand, or to the left, to go after other gods to serve them. But it shall come to pass, if thou wilt not hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to observe to do all his commandments and his statutes which I command thee this day; that all these curses shall come upon thee, and overtake thee (Deut. 28:14–15).³

2. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 13.

This outlook is what the Preacher, speaking on behalf of autonomous man, forthrightly denies here. He is making the case against the predictability of the world around us. If all things are governed by chance, then the case for righteousness is blunted. So is the case against sin. Men should seek a middle way.

All things have I seen in the days of my vanity: there is a just man that perisheth in his righteousness, and there is a wicked man that longeth his life in his wickedness. Be not righteous over much; neither make thyself over wise: why shouldest thou destroy thyself? Be not over much wicked, neither be thou foolish: why shouldest thou die before thy time? (Eccl. 7:15–17).⁴

The concept of covenantal causation militates against such a view. When it comes to righteousness, here is the rule: “Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might” (v. 10a). This places work within a covenantal context.

Conclusion

The Preacher is not arguing for chance in preference to necessity, as modern man does. He is arguing for chance in preference to the covenant. The covenant affirms predictability in terms of God’s law and God’s sanctions in history (Lev. 26; Deut. 28). The Preacher here denies such predictability.

When Christians deny that covenantal predictability exists in the New Covenant, they must move in one of three directions, toward: (1) the Preacher’s affirmations here; (2) modern man’s affirmation of necessity (Kant’s phenomenal realm of science) over chance; or (3) modern man’s affirmation of chance (Kant’s noumenal realm of personality) over impersonal scientific necessity.⁵ None of these views self-consciously promotes the extension of the kingdom of God.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

4. Chapter 27.

5. Richard Kroner, Kant’s Weltanschauung (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1914] 1956).

MONEY AND POWER RELIGION

There was a little city, and few men within it; and there came a great king against it, and besieged it, and built great bulwarks against it: Now there was found in it a poor wise man, and he by his wisdom delivered the city; yet no man remembered that same poor man. Then said I, Wisdom is better than strength: nevertheless the poor man's wisdom is despised, and his words are not heard (Eccl. 9:14–16).

A. Poverty and Influence

The Preacher says that the poor wise man may be able to persuade rulers to adopt a city-saving policy, but only when the city is visibly facing a defeat. After it survives, no one remembers the name of the poor man.

Why should this be? He implies that this is because wisdom is associated with wealth. There is a phrase, “If he’s so smart, why isn’t he rich?” Put another way, “Intelligence is as intelligence does.” If a man does not use his intelligence to accumulate a lot of money, what good is it?

This is a misunderstanding of wisdom and wealth. The author of the Book of Proverbs prayed this:

Two things have I required of thee; deny me them not before I die:
Remove far from me vanity and lies: give me neither poverty nor riches;
feed me with food convenient for me: Lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the LORD? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain (Prov. 30:7–9).¹

Biblical wisdom is casuistry: the application of biblical law to specific circumstances. The pre-eminent passage in the Bible on wisdom is Psalm 119, which is devoted to declaring the magnificence of God’s law. It is not a declaration of natural law.

1. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 85.

B. Power Religion

The Preacher is speaking on behalf of autonomous man. He describes autonomous man's autonomous society. There, a wise man's wisdom is accepted only when there is no alternative. Everyone else has offered his opinion. No one's opinion offers legitimate hope. There is no escape. Now what? "Now there was found in it a poor wise man." In other words, someone went looking for a person who could offer a plausible way of escape. This man was nobody's first choice of counsel. He had no ready access to the corridors of power. He was out of the loop.

This was a unique situation. It is not every day that a king besieges a city. Those inside the gates had no experience in dealing with such a problem. The experts had been caught flat-footed. Their opinions carried little weight. There was no plausible plan of action. Defeat was imminent. Only at this point did the recommendation of a wise man have an opportunity to be heard. Only then did the Establishment allow an outsider to invade its turf. As soon as the emergency had passed, the Establishment dismissed the wise man. It did not elevate him to a place of permanent influence. It covered up the evidence that an outsider had saved the city. He was soon forgotten.

The premier example biblical of this process of rags to riches to forgetfulness is Joseph. He was a poor man: a foreigner in a prison. He was found—remembered—by the king's servant, but only after none of the wise men of Egypt could interpret Pharaoh's dream. He saved Egypt from the worst effects of famine. Yet within 135 years,² "there arose up a new king over Egypt, which knew not Joseph" (Ex. 1:8). Egypt had no profitable use for the God of Joseph any longer. It wanted profitable slaves, not heirs of a prophet.

Autonomous man wants the benefits of subordination to an all-powerful God. He does not want actual subordination. He wants strength, not wisdom. "Then said I, Wisdom is better than strength: nevertheless the poor man's wisdom is despised, and his words are not heard." Autonomous man and autonomous society seek power, not subordination. Theirs is the power religion. The Pharaoh of the exodus was a representative of the power religion. He was completely defeated. He did not perceive the value of wisdom. Biblical wisdom begins with subordination to God. "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge: but fools despise wisdom and instruction" (Prov. 1:7).

2. The Israelites' stay in Egypt was 215 years: half of the 430 years mentioned by Paul (Gal. 3:17). Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 1:A:1. The exodus took place when Moses was 80 (Ex. 7:7).

Conclusion

Autonomous man equates wisdom with money, and money with power. He wants power. He does not want subordination.

The Preacher describes a city that was facing the ultimate subordination: military defeat. No one had a plan to escape defeat. Only then did a poor man get a hearing. After his plan worked, the powers that be made sure that the public's memory of his victory and their embarrassment was suppressed.

This criticism does not apply to biblical religion. Moses was never forgotten in Israel after the exodus. He was not remembered as a shepherd. David, another ex-shepherd, was not forgotten as a king. Jesus, the Good Shepherd (John 10:11), is not forgotten as the King of kings. All three demanded and received subordination. Those who rejected this subordination perished: Korah and Dathan, Nabal and Ahithophel, and Judas Iscariot.

HIERARCHY AND JUDGMENT

There is an evil which I have seen under the sun, as an error which proceedeth from the ruler: Folly is set in great dignity, and the rich sit in low place. I have seen servants upon horses, and princes walking as servants upon the earth (Eccl. 10:5–7).

A. A Poor Judge

A ruler rules by exercising judgment. He assesses the circumstances; then he issues a command. The language here indicates that a ruler has shown poor judgment.

This ruler elevates folly to a position of dignity. He sets the rich in a low place. The Preacher sees this as a reversal of correct priorities. The foolish ruler places something first that ought to be last. Folly is clearly something to be avoided. The Preacher contrasts this with placing something at the bottom that ought to be at the top: the rich. The contrast does not make sense if the rich do not belong on top.

The Preacher is speaking here as a covenant-keeper. He does not declare that bad judgment is vanity. Everyone knows this. When he speaks as an autonomous man, there is equality of vanity. Judgment makes no difference. Wisdom makes no difference. Folly makes no difference. By identifying folly as occupying the high position, he is invoking the concept of permanent standards. This implies the existence of wise judgment—judgment that conforms itself to permanent standards. This ruler does not exercise wise judgment.

The Preacher's contrast between riches and folly rests on a conclusion: riches as legitimate rather than evil. A wise ruler ought to acknowledge that rich men have attained their wealth through wise judgment. They either accumulated wealth or else maintained an inheritance. In either case, they are doing something right. Not many men are rich. These men have distinguished themselves from others, who do not possess the skills required to get rich.

The Preacher is not saying that the ability to get rich is the sole criterion for being elevated to a position of dignity. He is saying that the ability to get rich is superior to folly. Wealth is an objective criterion of superior performance. Those people who perform in a superior way ought to be regarded by a ruler as people whose judgment is more reliable than the judgment of those who are undistinguished. If a ruler is to receive wise counsel, he should consult with rich people.

B. Criteria for Judgment

William F. Buckley, Jr., the most prominent American political conservative intellectual in the second half of the twentieth century, once quipped that he would rather be governed by the first 200 people whose names appear in the Boston telephone directory than by the faculty of Harvard University. He did not say this because he graduated from Yale. His book-long critique of Yale, which he wrote at age 25, made him a national figure overnight.¹ He was making a point that was not unlike the Preacher's: folly is not to be elevated to high civil office. He regarded the criteria for being appointed to Harvard's faculty by a committee of Harvard professors as resting on ideological folly. Thus, their superior academic performance is evidence of ineligibility in positions of civil responsibility.

We could dismiss the quip as clever but not to be taken seriously. Yet in one crucial area of Anglo-American civilization, we demand that the principle of judgment underlying Buckley's quip be honored by law: jury selection. One foundation of liberty is a jury of one's peers. Any attempt by the state's judicial agents to screen access to a jury by means of academic criteria employed by the Harvard faculty to screen itself would be regarded by common men and most educated men as a threat to their liberty.

A candidate for a politically appointed judgeship might gain an advantage by having graduated from the Harvard Law School. A judge is supposedly a skilled interpreter of the law. But in criminal cases, people in Anglo-Saxon nations do not want judges to interpret the criminal law. They want juries to interpret the criminal law. They want judges to confine themselves to ruling on matters of courtroom procedure. This is not the same thing as exercising rulership.

Wealth is one criterion for exercising rulership. The Preacher singles out wealth as the opposite of folly. It is better to be rich than a fool. It is better for a ruler to listen to rich people than to listen to foolish people. They are more likely to be wise than fools.

1. William F. Buckley, God and Man at Yale (Chicago: Regnery, 1951).

The Preacher assumes that the criteria for becoming rich are not based on corruption or violence. What disturbs him in this passage is that objective standards for success are not honored by rulers and those who imitate foolish rulers. “I have seen servants upon horses, and princes walking as servants upon the earth.” There is always a hierarchy of values in a society.² There is always a hierarchy of performance in terms of this hierarchy of values. Winners are few.

C. The Religion of Revolution

Hierarchy is an inescapable concept. It is never a question of hierarchy vs. no hierarchy. It is always a question of which hierarchies, in which spheres of life, enforcing which laws and values. Those who meet the criteria for rulership must not be treated as servants, nor should servants be treated as rulers. It was one of the great evils of ancient pagan societies that they celebrated Chronos festivals, where fools would rule for a week and then be executed. Such an inversion of hierarchy was regarded as a source of social regeneration: chaos over order. This was an intensely anti-biblical worldview. I wrote the following in the mid-1960s.³

* * * * *

In all but the Biblical cosmology, the creation was seen as the imposition of order upon a chaotic matter. Thus, in the festivals and other rituals of chaos, society was thought to have access to that vital matter which existed before form was imposed to stifle its free action. Roger Caillois has explained this pagan cosmology, focusing his attention on the festival: “It is a time of excess. Reserves accumulated over the course of several years are squandered. The holiest laws are violated, those that seem at the very basis of social life. Yesterday’s crime is now prescribed, and in place of customary rules, new taboos and disciplines

2. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2012), ch. 2.

3. Gary North, Marx’s Religion of Revolution: Regeneration Through Chaos (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1968] 1989), pp. 74–75. (<http://bit.ly/gnmr>) are established, the purpose of which is not to avoid or soothe intense emotions, but rather to excite and bring them to climax. Movement increases, and the participants become intoxicated. Civil or administrative authorities see their powers temporarily diminish or disappear. This is not so much to the advantage of the regular sacerdotal caste as to the gain of secret confraternities or representatives of the other world, masked actors personifying the Gods or the dead. This fervor is also the time for sacrifices, even the time for the sacred, a time outside of time that recreates, purifies, and rejuvenates society. . . . All excesses are permitted, for society expects to be regenerated as a result of excesses, waste, orgies, and violence.”⁴

The festival is a ritual recreation of some key event in the life of a society. Perhaps the most famous of the creation festivals were the Saturnalia, the New Year, and the spring fertility rites. There was an identification with those first days of the universe where no rules bound creation. “It is the Golden Age: the reign of Saturn and Chronos, without war, commerce, slavery, or private property.”⁵ “It was an age of total abundance, but also one of terror, where dark forces were loose in the universe. Both elements were therefore present in the festivals.”⁶ Here was the primitive conception of the form-matter controversy or the nature-freedom scheme: law was seen both as a limitation on man and simultaneously a barrier against the terrors of the unknown. The function of the excesses was to pour vitality into the world of order: “All living things must be rejuvenated. The world must be created anew.”⁷ “The traditions of the festival have been preserved in modern times in isolated primitive cultures, as well as in many folk customs, such as the Mardi Gras and the Carnival.”⁸

* * * * *

4. Roger Caillois, Man and the Sacred (Glencoe, Illinois: Free Press, 1959), p. 164. Cf. Thorold Jacobson's analysis of the meaning of festivals in Henri Frankfort, et. al., Before Philosophy (Baltimore, Maryland: Pelican, [1946] 1964), pp. 213-16. This volume was previously published by the University of Chicago Press under the title, The Intellectual Adventure of Ancient Man. [It has been republished under the older title.]

5. Caillois, op. cit., p. 105.

6. Sir James George Frazer, The Scapegoat, vol. 4 of The Golden Bough (London: Macmillan, 1925), pp. 306-7.

7. Caillois, op. cit., p. 101. Cf. A. J. Wensinck, “The Semitic New Year and the Origin of Eschatology,” Acta Orientalia, Old Series, I (1923), pp. 158-99.

8. Cf. Mircea Eliade, Rites and Symbols of Initiation (New York: Harper Torchbooks, 1965).

Conclusion

Social order is strengthened by a consistent implementation at every level of biblical ethics, which in turn should be governed by biblical law. This is the judicial art of casuistry: the application of biblical law to specific situations. The Bible's hierarchy of values is to be visibly honored by rulers.

Rich people are winners in a godly society. Wherever rich people are not regarded as winners, a society is not consistently biblical. This is an inescapable conclusion inferred from this passage. Another conclusion is that men who are eligible for high office should not walk when servants ride. Society always honors hierarchy. It had better honor a biblical hierarchy.

JUSTIFYING PARALYSIS

He that diggeth a pit shall fall into it; and whoso breaketh an hedge, a serpent shall bite him. Whoso removeth stones shall be hurt therewith; and he that cleaveth wood shall be endangered thereby (Eccl. 10:8–9).

A. A Threatening Environment

The Preacher speaks here in the name of autonomous man. This autonomous man is not the self-confident image of autonomy that Karl Marx liked to promote as his lifetime model: Prometheus.¹ Rather, he sees himself as surrounded by threatening limits. Whenever he makes a cost-benefit analysis, he sees mostly costs.

The Preacher's predictions represent a pattern of causation. They are all negative. Men are surrounded by limits that hamper their efforts to change their environment. Everywhere autonomous man turns, his environment constitutes a threat. Anyone who takes these predictions seriously begins at a disadvantage when compared with someone who sees God as absolutely sovereign and the cosmos under the dominion of covenant-keepers. He sees costs where the covenant-keeper sees opportunities.

The covenant-breaker sees the universe as hostile to man. The covenant-keeper sees the universe as under man's lawful authority. The covenant-breaker sees risk and uncertainty everywhere. These negative forces undermine most people's efforts to overcome them, the Preacher says. The covenant-keeper believes that these limits are part of God's curse, and that this curse can be progressively overcome in history, which is what God revealed to Moses, and through Moses to the people of God.

1. Leonard P. Wessell, Jr., Prometheus Bound: The mythic structure of Karl Marx's scientific thinking (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1984).

B. God's Curse

The limits described here are aspects of God's curse on Adam and Adam's field of dominion (Gen. 3:17–19).² The goal of this dual curse was two-fold: to restrict mankind's ability to commit gross evil and to offer hope of dominion through God's grace. The first aspect of the curse is reflected in the traditional saying, "The devil loves idle hands." When covenant-breakers possess extended leisure, they are dangerous. They will pursue evil because they have time on their hands. The common curse on man and his labor is God's common grace of restricting debauchery and violence.

The second aspect of the curse offers a way of release from this curse. Through grace-initiated adherence to biblical law, covenant-keepers can advance both their self-interest and the kingdom of God. The system of covenantal sanctions described in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28 reveals a world in which there are positive sanctions for obedience and negative sanctions for disobedience. This ethical cause-and-effect system favors the extension of the kingdom of God at the expense of the kingdom of man. Autonomous man rejects the thought of lifelong individual and corporate covenantal subordination to God's Bible-revealed law-order. He wants to avoid such subordination. So, he is at a competitive disadvantage to covenant-keepers whenever they conform themselves to God's law.

The covenantal system of cause and effect is a subsidy to covenant-keepers. It is a subsidy to the kingdom of God. The world is not a level playing field between covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers. It is a rigged arena that favors covenant-keepers.

Covenant-breakers do have two major advantages. First, there is common grace.³ Covenant-breakers are numerous. They are influential. They receive God's blessings. Second, the division of labor favors those societies and civilizations that are united through confession. During those periods of covenant-breaking in which there is widespread social co-operation, through voluntary exchange or empire or both—as in Jesus' day—the kingdom of man advances alongside the kingdom of God. The division of labor is productive for all men. It extends men's dominion. Because the Adamic covenant extends so widely, those who are united by various confessions of faith opposed to the

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

3. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economic, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

God of the Bible enjoy high productivity. Think of the hundreds of millions of covenant-breaking graduates of the modern humanistic education system. Compare their numbers and opportunities with the graduates of under-funded Christian day schools and Bible colleges. The humanists are committed to building a civilization. They possess enormous capital. They have an extensive division of labor. By comparison, the tiny numbers of Bible college graduates or Christian liberal arts college graduates are not interested in building a civilization, and they possess little capital.

Nevertheless, covenant-breaking man cannot remain permanently committed to a social order that honors the externals of biblical law: private property, personal responsibility, profit and loss, the rule of law, decentralized civil government, and the enforcement of contracts. Sooner or later, covenant-breakers rebel.⁴ They lose their advantages. The fall of the Roman Empire and its replacement by Christian civilization is the consummate indicator of this process. The replacement took two forms, eastern and western Christendom, but neither was Roman. Polytheism disappeared, except as underground aspects of folk culture.⁵

C. Reversing the Curse

The Preacher's points are well taken. "He that diggeth a pit shall fall into it." There is a solution. "And if a man shall open a pit, or if a man shall dig a pit, and not cover it, and an ox or an ass fall therein. The owner of the pit shall make it good, and give money unto the owner of them; and the dead beast shall be his" (Ex. 21:33–34).⁶ By an expenditure of time and money, a person can reduce the threat by covering the pit. Biblical law offers an incentive to do this: responsibility. There are negative sanctions for causing an injury.

"Whoso breaketh an hedge, a serpent shall bite him." Serpents live in hedges. So, a wise man uses tools to break down a hedge. He watches for serpents. He beheads them with a spade or other tool. The serpent is ultimately subservient to man. His resistance shall be overcome.

4. Ibid., chaps. 6, 7.

5. John Cuthbert Lawson, Modern Greek Folklore and Ancient Greek Religion: A Study in Survivals (New Hyde Park, New York: University Books, [1910] 1964). Published originally by Cambridge University Press.

6. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 41.

And the LORD God said unto the serpent, Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field; upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life: And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel (Gen. 3:14–15).

“Whoso removeth stones shall be hurt therewith.” Quarrymen do face risks. This is why they have safety codes. Every high-risk profession does.

“He that cleaveth wood shall be endangered thereby.” Wood-splitting is dangerous. There are few occupations more dangerous than logging. Men should therefore be careful with their tools. One of the ways to do this is to sharpen the axe’s blade. The Preacher knew this. “If the iron be blunt, and he do not whet the edge, then must he put to more strength: but wisdom is profitable to direct” (Eccl. 10:10). Axes are a threat, too. The Mosaic law acknowledged this.

As when a man goeth into the wood with his neighbour to hew wood, and his hand fetcheth a stroke with the axe to cut down the tree, and the head slippeth from the helve, and lighteth upon his neighbour, that he die; he shall flee unto one of those cities, and live: Lest the avenger of the blood pursue the slayer, while his heart is hot, and overtake him, because the way is long, and slay him; whereas he was not worthy of death, inasmuch as he hated him not in time past (Deut. 19:5–6).

This was the law of the blood avenger.⁷ The negative sanction—execution for manslaughter—was an incentive to take care of dangerous tools. Safety is important. There are ways to reduce the likelihood of injury. These ways increase short-term costs, but they reduce long-term costs by reducing injuries.

Conclusion

For each limit placed on the sons of Adam there are ways of overcoming it. A consistent covenant-keeper seeks out these ways. A consistent covenant-breaker is content to remain hedged in. His goal is consumption, not increased production. “Then I commended mirth, because a man hath no better thing under the sun, than to eat, and to drink, and to be merry: for that shall abide with him of his labour the days of his life, which God giveth him under the sun" (Eccl. 8:15).⁸ The dual motivations reflect rival covenants.

7. It was annulled operationally after the return from the exile: no cities of refuge, and no civil government that enforced the Mosaic code. It was annulled theologically when the office of high priest was annulled at the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.

8. Chapter 31.

39

WASTED EFFORTS

The labour of the foolish wearieth every one of them, because he knoweth not how to go to the city (Eccl. 10:15).

The foolish man suffers from a lack of information. He works, but his efforts are wasted. He knows how to achieve a limited task, but he does not know how to market his output. He grows weary in his labor, but when he has produced whatever it is that he has labored to produce, he does not know how to profit from it.

The Preacher uses the city as a metaphor of the market place. A city is a place of commerce. There, the division of labor is more extensive than in the countryside. There is a higher population density. Urban people do not consume the output of their labor. They exchange their output for money. They buy most of what they consume. Their per capita output is greater than in the countryside.

The foolish person does not know the way to the city. He does not understand how to access the place of commerce, where his output will find a ready market. He is able to produce something of value, but he is unable to maximize the value of his output by carrying it to a city, where there will be far more bidders for his output.

It is not sufficient to know how to produce something of value. If you do not know how to find a market for your output, you will waste your effort. You can invest time and money in the production process, but this is not enough. Products do not sell themselves. Marketing sells products. The foolish man believes in the labor theory of value. He thinks that just by producing an item, he will benefit from its sale. This is incorrect. The key to profitability is the ability and willingness to bring the work of your hands to a buyer.

There are more buyers in cities than in the countryside. But the fool does not possess the information required to turn his output into income. He needs to know the way to the city. This means that must know how to market whatever he produces. He must know how to give consumers the opportunity to bid against each other for his product.

Conclusion

The futility of working for a rate of return that does not compensate the fool for his time and effort wearies him. Weariness is more burdensome to someone who is not profiting from his work than to someone who is. He loses hope. He cannot get from here to there —“there” being success.

The Preacher dismisses as a fool anyone who does not understand how to find a market for his output. His efforts are wasted.

THE COSTS OF SLOTH

By much slothfulness the building decayeth; and through idleness of the hands the house droppeth through (Eccl. 10:18).

A. Entropy and Time

Things wear out. This is a universal observation. Entropy is a manifestation of the second law of thermodynamics. Things move toward randomness. Order breaks down. Order is not a free resource. The second law of thermodynamics is this: in a closed system, heat moves from hotter to colder. Put differently, energy disperses over time.

The Preacher did not know the second law of thermodynamics, but he recognized its operation. It takes effort to keep things from wearing out. The world is under a curse. The curse is not the tendency toward randomness. A carburetor would have operated in the garden of Eden. So would the distribution of molecules to men's olfactory organs. Flowers would have smelled good to men there. The curse is the extension of the decay of randomness to aspects of the creation who had not been affected before God cursed the ground (Gen. 3:17–18).¹

To offset the universal decay associated with the second law of thermodynamics, men must invest time, raw materials, and labor. They must forfeit the use of these valuable assets in order to repair the erosion that time causes. To do nothing is to fall behind.

Time is an irreversible capital asset. Once gone, it cannot be recovered. Within the confines of time, a person can reverse the effects of entropy. He can offset disorder. This takes effort and resources. This means that the slothful person faces a challenge. Whatever he owns is under assault. His sloth places him at a disadvantage with an industrious person. A slothful person lets time get away from him without converting it into something useful to anyone else. Time gets away from everyone, but the fruits of time are different for different people. The slothful person does not devote labor and resources to overcoming the corrosive effects of entropy. Things wear out, including people. At some point, entropy kills all living forms.

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

The sovereignty of death can be seen in entropy. But entropy is not final. God's final judgment is final. Then the curse will be removed from covenant-keepers and all things under their jurisdiction. Paul wrote:

For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope, Because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body (Rom. 8:20–23).²

Because entropy can exist without the sovereignty of death in an open system, the world under God's grace can and will overcome death. This is taught in First Corinthians 15.

For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death (I Cor. 15:25–26).

So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption: It is sown in dishonour; it is raised in glory: it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power: It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body (I Cor. 15:42–44).

For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? (I Cor. 15:53–55).³

2. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 5.

3. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 16.

B. The Greatest Reversal

The greatest reversal is the transition from wrath to grace. This is seen in the transition from death to life. John the Baptist announced: “He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him” (John 3:36).

The transition from death to life is seen in economic growth. The effects of entropy are overcome through the combination of raw materials and labor over time, which produces capital.⁴ As capital increases, assuming that it is used efficiently by future-oriented entrepreneurs to serve God through serving the creation, the effects of entropy are reversed. This reversal is an aspect of the grace of God. The universe is not a closed entity. It is open to God, who created it and sustains it.

Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son: In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins: Who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of every creature: For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him: And he is before all things, and by him all things consist (Col. 1:13–17).

Thus, Paul wrote, “Whereunto I also labour, striving according to his working, which worketh in me mightily” (Col. 1:29). God worked in him, overcoming weariness. This was a form of supernatural capital.⁵

Conclusion

The slothful man is a loser. He loses capital. That which he owns erodes away if he does nothing to reverse this process. The Preacher describes the negative effects of sloth. He does not call for a slothful man to labor. He merely warns him of the consequences of not laboring. This warning assumes that the listeners do not want to see their buildings decay and their houses fall. But this desire must be qualified with the economist’s universal qualification, “at some price.” At some very high wage, a slothful person may work. But slothful people place a high value on the present and a low value on the future. “How long wilt thou sleep, O sluggard? when wilt thou arise out of thy sleep? Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep: So shall thy poverty come as one that travelleth, and thy want as an armed man” (Prov. 6:9–11). He who wishes to hire a slothful person must offer above-market wages. This reduces the quantity demanded.

4. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State: A Treatise on Economic Principles, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), ch. 7:3–5.

5. Gary North: Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 23.

41

MONEY: THE MOST MARKETABLE COMMODITY

A feast is made for laughter, and wine maketh merry: but money answereth all things (Eccl. 10:19).

The Preacher announces what is obvious. A person who wants an opportunity for laughter should attend a feast. There, laughter is expected. It is part of the celebration. At a feast, wine is consumed. This increases the likelihood of laughter. People are less inhibited, more merry.

Why did he announce this? What was his point? To make a contrast between feasting and drinking on the one hand and money on the other. But what is the nature of this contrast? What is it about feasting and drinking that sets them apart from money?

Specialization. If a person wants laughter, he pays for a feast. If he wants to be merry, he pays for wine. A specific desire is fulfilled by a specific asset. The Hebrew word translated “feast” is the word for “bread.” The uses of bread are varied, but they are not universal. The same is true of wine. If you want laughter, the price is the consumption of food. If you want to make merry, the price is the consumption of wine. Food is the means to an end: laughter. Wine is a means to an end: merriment.

A. The Universal Means to Multiple Ends

In contrast is money. Money is a means to multiple ends. The Preacher uses poetic language: “money answers all things.” A specific goal figuratively cries out for specific means. As a means to laughter, bread cries out: “Use me.” As a means to merriment, wine cries out: “Use me.” As a means to all things, money cries out: “Use me.”

The Preacher recognizes the universality of money. There is no money that does not offer near-universality. That is money's claim to fame. Money is widely recognized as a means of exchange. It can be used in many situations as a means to achieve one's goals. It can be used to pay for a feast or pay for wine. Caterers of feasts are happy—even insistent—to be paid in money. So are sellers of wine. Wherever we turn, there are sellers who are ready to hand over ownership of whatever it is that they sell in exchange for money.

Economists identify money as possessing these characteristics: (1) recognizability, (2) divisibility, (3) durability, (4) portability, and (5) high value per unit of weight. Some economists identify money as a means of exchange. Others identify it as a store of value. Others identify it as a unit of account. Ludwig von Mises identified it as the most marketable commodity.¹ He said that the other characteristic functions of money are secondary.²

Money is desired because people see that it has been highly desired in the past. They extrapolate this into the future. They see money as possessing market value in the future. This is the store-of-value function. It is more accurate to say that money is a valuable thing to store. There is nothing of intrinsic value to money, or anything else. All economic value is imputed subjectively. If this were not true, then the money would not have failed in the second year of the famine in Egypt (Gen. 47:15–16).³ It would not have failed in Jerusalem during the famine in Elisha's day (II Kings 6:25).

B. Autonomous Man and Money

The Preacher generalizes: “money answereth all things.” But is this really true? No. There are many things that money cannot buy. One of these is the supernatural power to perform miracles on behalf of God. Simon the magician tried to buy this.

But there was a certain man, called Simon, which beforetime in the same city used sorcery, and bewitched the people of Samaria, giving out that himself was some great one: To whom they all gave heed, from the least to the greatest, saying, This man is the great power of God. And to him they had regard, because that of long time he had bewitched them with sorceries. But when they believed Philip

1. Ludwig von Mises, The Theory of Money and Credit (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1912] 1953), pp. 32–33. (<http://bit.ly/MisesTMC>)

2. Ibid., pp. 34–37.

3. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 34.

preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized, both men and women (Acts 8:9–12).

And when Simon saw that through laying on of the apostles' hands the Holy Ghost was given, he offered them money, Saying, Give me also this power, that on whomsoever I lay hands, he may receive the Holy Ghost. But Peter said unto him, Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money. Thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter: for thy heart is not right in the sight of God. Repent therefore of this thy wickedness, and pray God, if perhaps the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee (Acts 8:18–22).⁴

Money makes possible the modern division of labor. Without money, the division of labor would be that of a barter society: primitive. Money buys whatever is offered for sale by money. Yet most aspects of man's social life are not based on the exchange of money. Most services inside the family are not purchased by money. The same is true of churches, fraternal groups, and other voluntary associations. Money does not answer all things. It is used in the area of market exchange. To say that money answers all things is to deify the market. Clearly, the Preacher speaks here as representing autonomous man.

Conclusion

The Preacher offers a view of man that is misleading. He says that money answers all things. It does not answer the most important things: confession of faith, marriage, honor, voluntary sacrifice, integrity, and most other human relationships. His statement is a classic case of reductionism: reducing man and reducing society to self-interest and market exchange.

Money is the most marketable commodity. It is the basis of the modern division of labor. It makes possible modern mass production. It is far more important today than it was in the Preacher's day. Yet he made this statement. He knew it was not true. But autonomous man acts as though he believes it is true. We can see this in folk wisdom. "Every man has his price." "If he is so smart, why isn't he rich?"

4. Gary North, Sacrifice and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Acts, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

CHARITY PAYS DIVIDENDS

*Cast thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days.
Give a portion to seven, and also to eight; for thou knowest not what evil shall be upon the earth (Eccl. 11:1–2).*

A. A Positive Rate of Return

The Preacher speaks as a covenant-keeper here. He says that there is a positive rate of return (ROI) on charitable giving. There is therefore a system of ethical cause and effect in history. This is not what he has said previously in his role as autonomous man.

What does it mean to cast bread upon waters? This is not a familiar phrase. Some expositors have thought it refers to casting seeds into lakes or rivers. John Gill, the eighteenth-century Baptist who commented on every verse in the Bible and who had a mastery of the Talmudic literature, invoked images of tears. This exegesis is stretching the phrase out of shape.

... a man casts seed into the earth; but here it is said to be “upon the waters”; bread is to be given to such as are in distress and affliction, that have waters of a full cup wrung out unto them, whose faces are watered with tears, and foul with weeping, from whom nothing is to be expected again, who can make no returns; so that what is given thorn seems to be cast away and lost, like what is thrown into a river, or into the midst of the sea; . . .¹

The idea of casting something onto a flowing river or into the sea does seem to relate to what the Preacher advises. Were it not for this confirmation, a man who gives away food would have no way of knowing that his generosity will ever be repaid. What is not intuitive is said to be part of a system of causation. A man surrenders ownership over food, yet he can rest assured that he will find it again “after many days.”

1. Gill had an almost pathological hatred of periods.

This text does not say that he will make a profit, only that the bread will be returned. In the next verse he explains that the world is uncertain. “Thou knowest not what evil shall be upon the earth.” A man cannot know all of the dangers that may threaten him. He is in this sense flying blind. But the previous verse reassures the generous man that his gift will not be in vain. “Give a portion to seven, and also to eight.” Open your hand wide, the Preacher advises. The threats are many. This calls for exceptional generosity.

B. Return on Investment

A standard measurement in business is return on investment (ROI). Money goes out. Even more money had better come back in. If it does not, then a profit-seeking enterprise is doomed. It will run out of funds.

The Preacher recommends that a man be generous because life’s threats are uncertain. In the Preacher’s day, there was no way for a man to estimate these threats. Today, there is: the law of large numbers. Certain kinds of events can be classified together. The probability of a particular type of event within this large class can be estimated mathematically. This is the basis of insurance. This discovery transformed medieval civilization in the West.² It led to modern society.

A man can insure against an evil event by participating in a community. Communities are marked by generosity. Membership provides access to aid from others. But the Preacher does not use this argument. He says that bread cast upon the waters does return. Men should therefore be highly generous.

It takes exceptional faith to act in terms of the Preacher’s discussion of cause and effect. When someone surrenders ownership of an asset without receiving something in return, he is poorer. His net worth is less. Yet the Preacher says that he is not that much poorer. The bread will be returned.

This return would actually be a negative because of the phenomenon of interest: a discount of future goods against present goods.³ If I will receive that which I surrender, I lose the use of the asset for a time. Present goods are more valuable than the same future goods. So, other things remaining equal, a return of my forfeited bread constitutes a loss. But other things do not remain equal. There are unknown evils out there. The uncovered pits of life are many, and it is dark outside. The Preacher says that generosity will be repaid. He does not say how.

2. Peter Bernstein, Against the Gods: The Remarkable Story of Risk (New York: Wiley, 1996).

3. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. 19. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

C. Voluntarism

Generosity must be voluntary. Gill understood this.

... it must be "thy" bread, a man's own; not independent of God who gives it him; but not another's, what he owes another, or has fraudulently obtained; but what he has got by his own labour, or he is through divine Providence in lawful possession of; hence alms in the Hebrew language is called "righteousness": and it must be such bread as is convenient and fit for a man himself, such as he himself and his family eat of, and this he must cast, it must be a man's own act, and a voluntary one; his bread must not be taken and forced from him; it must be given freely, ...

This denies legitimacy to the welfare state and its theological foundation, the Social Gospel. Gill understood the principle, "thou shalt not steal." He knew that the commandment did not say, "thou shalt not steal, except by majority vote." The Preacher recommends charity, not special-interest legislation that uses state coercion to transfer wealth from one voting bloc to another.

Conclusion

Charity pays dividends. It returns after many days. All is not lost. Furthermore, what you do to others in need will reduce your risk of unknown disasters. He does not say how. To assert such a system of causation implies a system of providence.

This is why I conclude that he is speaking as a covenant-keeper here.

INPUTS AND OUTPUT

If the clouds be full of rain, they empty themselves upon the earth: and if the tree fall toward the south, or toward the north, in the place where the tree falleth, there it shall be. He that observeth the wind shall not sow; and he that regardeth the clouds shall not reap. As thou knowest not what is the way of the spirit, nor how the bones do grow in the womb of her that is with child: even so thou knowest not the works of God who maketh all. In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand: for thou knowest not whether shall prosper, either this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good (Eccl. 11:3–6).

A. If . . . Then

The Preacher begins with an observation. “If the clouds be full of rain, they empty themselves upon the earth: and if the tree fall toward the south, or toward the north, in the place where the tree falleth, there it shall be.” This is an “if . . . then” explanation of causation. Men have no control over the ifs of nature. They therefore have no control over the thens.

A farmer who is a keen observer of nature makes decisions about his proper course of action. “He that observeth the wind shall not sow; and he that regardeth the clouds shall not reap.” Wind blows away the seed. Rain ruins harvested crops. He can control his labor. He can plant or not; he can reap or not. He has no control over nature. He must adjust to nature.

This explanation of causation ignores magic and prayer, both of which assume that the nature can be influenced by individual actions within a cosmos broader than nature. Magic relies on ritual manipulation within a cosmos governed by this principle: “As above, so below.” We can supposedly manipulate nature by manipulating representative physical objects. Sovereignty is not final. It is shared between man and a personal cosmos.

Prayer relies on a petition before the throne of God, who is sovereign over history. Moses' prayer invoked God's reputation in response to God's threat to destroy the Israelites and create a new nation for Moses.

And Moses said unto the LORD, Then the Egyptians shall hear it, (for thou broughtest up this people in thy might from among them;) And they will tell it to the inhabitants of this land: for they have heard that thou LORD art among this people, that thou LORD art seen face to face, and that thy cloud standeth over them, and that thou goest before them, by daytime in a pillar of a cloud, and in a pillar of fire by night. Now if thou shalt kill all this people as one man, then the nations which have heard the fame of thee will speak, saying, Because the LORD was not able to bring this people into the land which he swore unto them, therefore he hath slain them in the wilderness (Num. 14:13–16).

God answered this prayer.

Nature is under God. It operates predictably in general, but unpredictably in specifics. Weather forecasting is a good example. Men can predict the path of a tornado, but they cannot predict where one will form. With the advent of weather satellites, predictions have become far more accurate. But as to what causes patterns, there is great disagreement. As for controlling the weather, little can be done. We must adjust to nature.

B. Man's Ignorance

The Preacher asserts that man knows very little—nothing important—about the specifics of either nature or God. “As thou knowest not what is the way of the spirit, nor how the bones do grow in the womb of her that is with child: even so thou knowest not the works of God who maketh all.” This is not a denial that we know the patterns of both. Human pregnancies generally last nine months.

We work all day. We are not sure of the outcome. “In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand: for thou knowest not whether shall prosper, either this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good.” Yet there is a pattern over time. What are the actions recommended by the Preacher? The first is work. “In the morning sow thy seed.”

What is the second recommendation? “Withhold not thine hand.”

The meaning of this phrase is obscure. It appears nowhere else in the Bible. If it also refers to work, then it is work associated with the evening. This is not reaping, which is the contrast of the earlier verse: refusing to reap because of the rain clouds. Farmers do not reap when the sun is going down.

The phrase could refer to some other form of labor. Not withholding one's hand would then be the opposite of folding one's hands in sloth. "The fool foldeth his hands together, and eateth his own flesh" (Eccl. 4:5). A refusal to work produces poverty.¹ If this is the meaning, then the Preacher is recommending work from morning to evening. But no matter how hard one works or how long, the outcome is random.

I think it refers to charity. This is a carry-over from verse 2: "Give a portion to seven, and also to eight; for thou knowest not what evil shall be upon the earth."² Why give charity? Because of the ethical cause-and-effect system of the universe. Why should charity produce the same positive result as labor? In what kind of cosmos is charity an input, in the same way that labor is? Answer: a world governed by the God who is both sovereign and ethical.

The Preacher here insists that the daily outcome is unknown. "Thou knowest not whether shall prosper, either this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good." Labor in the morning may produce a good outcome, or it may not. Charity in the evening may produce a good outcome, or it may not. Both may produce good. The outcome is unknown, in contrast to the inputs, which are known.

This reveals man's condition. We know what outcomes will cost: the cost of inputs. We make plans in terms of these costs. We forfeit leisure and consumption to fund these plans. Yet we cannot be sure that at the end of the day, we will be ahead of schedule or behind. The specifics are elusive in the morning. But we can still have legitimate confidence in the outcome of the overall plan.

In the free market, most innovations fail. This is not the same as saying that most plans fail. Most of life is in maintenance mode. Most plans are successful. By sticking to tried and true practices, men achieve success. They must also innovate in order to continue to succeed or succeed at a rate above average. A standard recommendation based on Pareto's law would be 80% maintenance and 20% innovation. This allows for a failure rate of innovations of 80%: 16% of everything.

1. Chapter 11.

2. Chapter 42.

The Preacher is saying something different: a failure rate in maintenance mode of 50%, i.e., random. This is a denial that men learn from history, selecting those production processes that produce a positive rate of return. Success in the past offers no guidance in the present. There is no historical continuity. There would not only be no progress, there would be capital consumption. This would lead to death. This is a counsel of despair.

C. Theonomy or Autonomy?

In whose name is the Preacher speaking: covenant-keeping man or autonomous man? In the view affirmed here, is causation biblical or humanistic? His conclusion: men should be hard working and charitable. This is consistent with the Bible. It is inconsistent with any system of cosmic causation that relies on the view of the cosmos as impersonal, whether random or deterministic.

Men do not possess omniscience. "Thou knowest not the works of God who maketh all." Men do not know all of the works of God, but they can know His law. "The secret things belong unto the LORD our God: but those things which are revealed belong unto us and to our children for ever, that we may do all the words of this law" (Deut. 29:29). This is why he concludes: "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil" (Eccl. 12:13–14).³ This is theonomy.

The Preacher here is affirming the randomness of daily output, not randomness of final output. The producer must sacrifice leisure in the morning and assets in the evening, day after day. He must forfeit present income, which includes leisure. Why? Because, if he refuses, he will surely fail.

Conclusion

The Preacher affirms the randomness of daily economic cause and effect. A producer can add inputs to the production mix until the cows come home. The cows, if they even come home, may be either fat or lean. The inputs, including accurate knowledge of nature, do not determine the daily outcome. There is no predictable daily relationship between inputs and output. But there can be predictability of patterns in nature. This is why men should pay attention to the weather if they farm. Similarly, there is predictability between obeying God's law and success.

3. Chapter 45.

Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful. But his delight is in the law of the LORD; and in his law doth he meditate day and night. And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper. The ungodly are not so: but are like the chaff which the wind driveth away (Psalm 1:1–4).⁴

4. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 1.

THE VANITY OF DEATH

Also when they shall be afraid of that which is high, and fears shall be in the way, and the almond tree shall flourish, and the grasshopper shall be a burden, and desire shall fail: because man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets: Or ever the silver cord be loosed, or the golden bowl be broken, or the pitcher be broken at the fountain, or the wheel broken at the cistern. Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was: and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it. Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher; all is vanity (Eccl. 12:5–8).

A. The City's Cycle

The Preacher returns to the theme of cyclical history. He concludes much as he began: in despair over the cycles of life. He began with the cycles of nature (Eccl. 1:2–7).¹ He concludes here with the cycle of the city. Once, the city had been productive and optimistic. It had become wealthy. But the day of decline will arrive. The golden bowl will be broken. The pitcher and the wheel will be broken. He begins with this decline, but he ends with the most fundamental decline. Every man will die. “Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was: and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it.” What is the conclusion? “Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher; all is vanity.” He ends where he began. “Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher, vanity of vanities; all is vanity” (Eccl. 1:2). This is appropriate. If you argue logically from a presupposition, you will arrive right where you began. But you will have better arguments. There is progress in argumentation.

The Preacher has surveyed the way the world works. He has done so from two perspectives: the sovereignty of death and the sovereignty of God. He has devoted more space to the sovereignty of death.

At first, his commitment to cyclical history seemed to be an affirmation of life. “The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be; and that which is done is that which shall be done: and there is no new thing under the sun” (Eccl. 1:9). There is no permanent progress. But there is also no permanent decline.

1. Chapter 1.

B. Beginning With Nature

The problem here is that he begins with nature. Nature was never to be autonomous. It was meant to be under man’s authority, as the designated agent of God. To use nature as a model for man is to misunderstand both man and nature. God, through the dominion covenant, commanded Adam (Gen. 1:27–28)² and later Noah (Gen. 9:1–3)³ to subdue the earth. Adam was to make a perfect world better: to dress it. This mandates progress. It therefore implies linear history, but not just linear history: progressive history. In personal matters, we call this progressive sanctification. This is not limited to individuals. It is to apply to nature and to civilization. The kingdom of God is the civilization of God.

Nature is under the curse of Adam (Gen. 3:17–19).⁴ Adam is under the curse of death. So is nature. Had the redemption accomplished by Jesus Christ not delivered man from the second death (Rev. 20:14), nature would be doomed. Denying the redemption of Christ, modern science affirms the death of the universe. Because most scientists believe that the universe is a closed system, they see it as subject to the second law of thermodynamics. All energy is therefore moving from potential energy to kinetic energy, never to return again, never to work again, never to provide heat again. This final end is called the heat death of the universe.⁵ Modern autonomous man is even more committed to the philosophy of autonomy than ancient man was. He is therefore more aware of the linearity of nature: from life to death. This is the progress of the philosophy of autonomy. It is more consistent. It is better informed scientifically.

C. The Death of the City

The Preacher was aware of progress. Every society understands

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 4.

3. Ibid., ch. 18.

4. Ibid., ch. 12.

5. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>) progress. Men want things to get better. They forego the present use of resources for the sake of income in the future. This is why people save. They make tools. They use their minds to solve new problems.

The ancients did not believe that progress can be sustained.⁶ They saw the dust of death as covering the inheritance of every city. They had no long-term hope.

The Preacher uses the dying of the city to return to his theme of the sovereignty of death. Men die. Nature goes on as before, but everyone dies. Every city dies. Men come and go. Cities come and go. Nature stays the same. Nature is immune from death, but nothing that man builds is. The sovereignty of death extends its rule over man.

Modern physical science completes the investigation. It is not just cities that die; nature itself is dying. The process takes enormous quantities of time, but it is no less relentless, no less sovereign. Ashes to ashes, dust to dust: frozen dust. If anything will still move, it will be electrons. Electrons do not progress. They are not linear.

Conclusion

The Preacher offers no hope. How could he? The city of man dies. Men also die. What they build will not survive. Nothing of permanent value is transferred to the next generation. The stable cycles of life in nature are only background for the cycles of death for man and his works. Nature does not care that its cycles roll on meaninglessly. Man does care. Nature is without self-awareness. Man is. Nature imputes nothing to itself. Man imputes vanity to himself.

The Preacher has reached the end of the road. In terms of his own philosophy of autonomy, this road is a circle. There is no end to it. He arrives just where he began: with vanity. If he is better informed, this is a paradox. There has been progress in his understanding of the futility of progress. He has written it all down, but to what end? No end. "And further, by these, my son, be admonished: of making many books there is no end; and much study is a weariness of the flesh" (Eccl. 12:12).

6. Stanley Jaki, Science and Creation: From Eternal Cycles to an Oscillating Universe (Edinburgh: Scottish Academic Press, 1974), ch. 6.

THE ANSWER IS THEONOMY

Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil (Eccl. 12:13–14).

A. Transferring the Inheritance

The Preacher at long last returns to his father's deathbed instructions. As part of the covenantal transfer of the inheritance of kingship, David delivered to his son the same charge that Moses delivered to Joshua. "And he gave Joshua the son of Nun a charge, and said, Be strong and of a good courage: for thou shalt bring the children of Israel into the land which I swore unto them: and I will be with thee" (Deut. 31:23). It was the same charge that the elders of Israel delivered to Joshua.

Be strong and of a good courage: for unto this people shalt thou divide for an inheritance the land, which I swear unto their fathers to give them. Only be thou strong and very courageous, that thou mayest observe to do according to all the law, which Moses my servant commanded thee: turn not from it to the right hand or to the left, that thou mayest prosper whithersoever thou goest. This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein: for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success. Have not I commanded thee? Be strong and of a good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed: for the LORD thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest (Josh. 1:6–9).¹

1. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 1.

Here is the account of this covenantal transfer of inheritance.

Now the days of David drew nigh that he should die; and he charged Solomon his son, saying, I go the way of all the earth: be thou strong therefore, and shew thyself a man; And keep the charge of the LORD thy God, to walk in his ways, to keep his statutes, and his commandments, and his judgments, and his testimonies, as it is written in the law of Moses, that thou mayest prosper in all that thou doest, and whithersoever thou turnest thyself: That the LORD may continue his word which he spake concerning me, saying, If thy children take heed to their way, to walk before me in truth with all their heart and with all their soul, there shall not fail thee (said he) a man on the throne of Israel (1 Kings 2:1–4).

B. The Lesson Learned

The Preacher has devoted his book to a consideration of two worldviews: autonomous man and covenant man. Here, he reaches a conclusion: the resolution of this debate is a return to biblical law.

He does not explain the logic of this conclusion. Instead, he relies on what he has already presented. He has presented a case against autonomous man by showing the futility of life, according to the presuppositions of autonomous man. The Preacher says that he has personally lived the life of autonomous man, and he presents his conclusion: vanity, all is vanity.

The Preacher was probably Solomon. We know this because of the opening words, which identify the author as a son of David (1:1). It is unlikely that any other son of David experienced all that the Preacher experienced and then wrote it down. Having experienced all this, he returned to his father's original admonition.

We are told that Solomon was a wise king. "And God gave Solomon wisdom and understanding exceeding much, and largeness of heart, even as the sand that is on the sea shore. And Solomon's wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the east country, and all the wisdom of Egypt" (1 Kings 4:29–30). Yet we are told by the Preacher that he tasted all that he describes in this book. He discovered firsthand that all roads to and from autonomy lead to vanity. A wise man should have known this from the beginning. Yet the Preacher was unwilling to abide by his father's admonition, which his father had learned by violating God's law repeatedly. David had multiple wives, in opposition to biblical law. The Mosaic law restricted the king of Israel in this regard. "Neither shall he multiply wives to himself, that his heart turn not away: neither shall he greatly multiply to himself silver and gold” (Deut. 17:17). Solomon multiplied wives far beyond anything dreamed of by his father (I Kings 11:3). He also multiplied gold (I Kings 10:14–23). He lived the life he describes in this book. When it was over, he returned to his father’s admonition a wiser man.

C. Covenant Man Is Theonomic Man

The Preacher’s conclusion is straightforward. God will bring final judgment. Every secret thing will be examined in terms of God’s law, “whether it be good, or whether it be evil.” This is point four of the biblical covenant: sanctions.² Man therefore has a duty to obey God’s laws: point three.³ “Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man.” There is nothing complicated here.

This passage is one of the most powerful defenses of biblical law in the Bible. In two verses, the Preacher summarizes a lifetime of investigation—philosophical, ethical, and practical. These two verses affirm biblical law as the resolution of the debate between autonomous man and covenant man.

He does not invoke the law of nations. He does not mention natural law, which is supposedly in the possession of every rational person. He says that God’s law is the key to a life well lived. What could be plainer?

It is too plain. Expositors generally prefer not to mention the context, which was the law of Moses. The long-winded Matthew Henry did include this brief comment in a long, rambling exposition of the verse.

The rule of religion is the law of God revealed in the scriptures. Our fear towards God must be taught by his commandments (Isa 29:13), and those we must keep and carefully observe. Wherever the fear of God is uppermost in the heart, there will be a respect to all his commandments and care to keep them. In vain do we pretend to fear God if we do not make conscience of our duty to him.

When this is all that an expositor can derive from the Preacher’s consummation of the most detailed philosophical book in the Bible, he is not deeply interested in getting to the heart of the matter, as defined by the Preacher. But, compared to his contemporary, Baptist John Gill, the semicolon's friend, Henry's comments are both precise and incisive. Gill wrote:

2. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

3. Sutton, ch. 3; North, ch. 3.

fear God, and keep his commandments: "the fear of God" includes the whole of internal religion, or powerful godliness; all the graces of the Spirit, and the exercise of them; reverence of God, love to him, faith in him, and in his Son Jesus Christ; hope of eternal life from him; humility of soul, patience and submission to his will, with every other grace; so the Heathens call religion "metum Deorum" (q), the fear of God: and "keeping of the commandments", or obedience to the whole will of God, is the fruit, effect, and evidence of the former; and takes in all the commands of God, moral and positive, whether under the former or present dispensation; and an observance of them in faith, from a principle of love, and with a view to the glory of God; . . .

Writing a century later, Charles Bridges refused to admit even Gill's sliver of light regarding God's law.

The keeping of the commandments—at least in the case of the disciples of the Lord—primarily regards the great commandment—"to believe in the name of his Son Jesus Christ." ⁴The gospel, therefore, is not obscured, even when the terms of it are not completely given; so that—rightly understood, we fully identify the free grace and spiritual obedience of the gospel with the more legal exhortation to fear God, and keep his commandments.⁵

This is blindness, and it is self-conscious, because it is motivated by a hatred of biblical law. The Preacher was writing for Jews in the days of Israel's unified kingdom. The nation had covenanted with God at Sinai (Ex. 19).⁶ The terms of that covenant are found in the Mosaic law: the Ten Commandments (Ex. 20)⁷ and the Case laws (Ex. 21–23).⁸ The Preacher was not looking forward to the disciples. He was looking backward to Sinai. He was reaffirming what the nation had known from the beginning. He was warning the nation not to abandon God's

4. See 1 John, iii.23.

5. Charles Bridges, Ecclesiastes (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, [1860] 1961), p. 310.

6. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion, ch. 20.

7. Ibid., Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986).

8. Ibid., Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990).

covenant law in a vain search for meaning and hope in autonomy. He was reaffirming theonomy as the antidote to the counsel of despair offered by autonomy. That Bridges could so completely twist the meaning of the consummation passage of the book indicates the extent to which evangelicalism at the highest levels has been cursed by antinomianism for centuries.

Hengstenberg refused to elaborate on the details of the law or the role of biblical law in the covenant. “To fear God and keep his commandments is the duty of all men, because all bear His image, and can have no true life of growth except in connection with the primal source of their existence: they must also be punished with destruction if they criminally and violently break this connection.⁹ What does “the primal source of their existence,” meaning all men, have to do with the Preacher’s call to obey the law of God? All men are under Adam’s curse. It does not take a criminal and violent breaking of this connection—whatever this connection refers to—to bring people under God’s judgment. Original sin does that all by itself.

Eaton’s 1983 commentary recognized that the book is a debate between two worldviews. He did not label the first autonomy, possibly because he did not label the second theonomy.

The body of the book has simply placed two alternative views of life over against each other and the life of faith has been commended. Now in the epilogue, almost as an aside, it is pointed out that such a life will have implications. It must not be restricted to the Mosaic law. It refers to all that is known to be God’s will.¹⁰

Notice the sleight-of-hand operation here? “It must not be restricted to the Mosaic law.” This shifts the reader’s attention away from the Mosaic law. Yet what did Eaton think the Preacher was referring to, if not the Mosaic law? If the Preacher had something else in mind, he owed it to his readers to tell them what it was. These were Jews under covenant to God.

To escape the obvious—and it is obvious—Eaton broadened the context, as if broadening the context solves his exegetical problem. “The last phrase reads literally: ‘For this is the whole of the man.’ Elsewhere in Ecclesiastes, however, the ‘whole of the man’ is a Hebrew idiom for 'every man' (cf. 3:13; 5:19). The sense, therefore, is 'This applies to every man.'¹¹ He did not consider the implication of what he had just written, namely, that the Mosaic law applies to all men. By broadening the context, he implied but refuses to say explicitly, that we can discard the Mosaic law, which is the context of the entire book. The Preacher had something else in mind. What, Eaton did not say. The Preacher also did not say. But it is obvious to Eaton that he must have had something else in mind. Otherwise, the Preacher was calling for a universal extension of theonomy—and that is clearly unacceptable.

9. E. W. Hengstenberg, Commentary on Ecclesiastes, With Other Treatises (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1860), pp. 267–68.

10. Michael A. Eaton, Ecclesiastes: An Introduction & Commentary (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1983), p. 156.

Derek Kidner was the supreme master in this regard. He devoted not one word to explaining the phrase "the commandments."¹² He did not acknowledge their existence in his text. Here is the core of the book, its consummation, according to the Preacher, and Kidner had nothing to say.

H. C. Leupold, a Lutheran, did not identify those commandments which all men are supposed to keep. He ended by asking a rhetorical question, which I would ask of him and the other expositors. "How can anyone overlook so obvious a thing as this practical suggestion, seeing that it is the duty of all alike?"¹³ My answer: an unwillingness to accept the Preacher's announcement that theonomy is the biblical alternative to autonomy.

The commentators have little or nothing to say about the covenantal context of the Preacher's definition of "the commandments," because they have rejected the continuing authority of the Mosaic law. They wax eloquent and sometimes quite long explaining the book, up to the final two verses, which the Preacher said explained the book. At that point, without warning, they say nothing judicially coherent, and they say it succinctly. This is not random. This is also not because the text is unclear. This is because the text is inescapably clear.

Conclusion

The Preacher built a case against covenant-breaking autonomous man. He marched the reader down a series of dead ends, each of which was marked by futility because of death. Then he pointed to the solution to his dilemma. That solution is the judgment of God. This judgment establishes the duty of man. Man's duty is two-fold: "Fear God, and keep his commandments." It is consistent with what Solomon wrote. "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge: but fools despise wisdom and instruction" (Prov. 1:7).¹⁴ "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom: and the knowledge of the holy is understanding" (Prov. 9:10). This is also consistent with what David wrote in defense of God's law in Psalm 119.

11. Idem.

12. Derek Kidner, A Time to Mourn and a Time to Dance (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1976), p. 107.

13. H. C. Leupold, Exposition of Ecclesiastes (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, 1952), p. 300.

14. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 2.

CONCLUSION

The Book of Ecclesiastes is a puzzle for many readers—I suspect most readers. Some of it rings true to the God-fearing man, yet other parts—most of its parts—ring false. This is because most of it is false.

The reader is faced with a challenge: how to sort the wheat from the chaff. There is a lot of chaff. But it is brilliant chaff, chaff that registers in the hearts and minds of those who are approaching the end of their ropes. The Book of Ecclesiastes is the personal testimony of a man who had a great deal of rope and a lifetime to reach its end.

A. Autonomy vs. Theonomy

The book is best understood as a series of observations about the human condition. It is written from one viewpoint as a means of rejecting the other. But the author adopts a peculiar method to make his case. He presents most of his observations and conclusions in the name of the philosophy of life he opposes: human autonomy. He offers only token resistance until his final words. Then he publicly breaks with autonomy in the name of theonomy: the law of God.

The book presents a series of dead ends for autonomy. It blocks avenues of escape for autonomous man. Death is on every side, and death is absolutely sovereign. Autonomous man cannot legitimately have hope in the grave. He cannot have legitimate hope in his heirs. He will be forgotten. Vanity, all is vanity.

Why vanity? To make this judgment, a man needs a standard. What is the standard for autonomous man? Death. Death vetoes all hopes. Death consumes all productivity. Death ends all dreams. Death nullifies all fame. Death makes all of life vanity. That is because death is meaningless and without purpose. It makes life meaningless and without purpose. Vanity.

The book's conclusion is straightforward. For someone who wants escape from the sovereignty of death, he should begin by fearing God, the final Judge. He does so by obeying God's law. Simple. But this simplicity is lost on expositors with a bias against biblical law. They do not want to affirm theonomy. They also do not want to affirm autonomy. So, they do what they can to avoid commenting.

The Preacher affirms the doctrine of God's law: theonomy. He recommends living in conformity to God's law. "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man" (Eccl. 12:13). Why? "For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil" (Eccl. 12:14).¹ God will judge all men in terms of His law. This is the Preacher's conclusion. It structures his arguments throughout the book. He is trying to box in his readers. He gives them an analogous choice to the one that Elijah gave the people of the Northern Kingdom of Israel.

And Elijah came unto all the people, and said, How long halt ye between two opinions? if the LORD be God, follow him: but if Baal, then follow him. And the people answered him not a word (I Kings 18:21).

B. Autonomy and Economics

The Preacher begins by affirming cyclical history.² This is an implicit rejection of the idea of progress. Human progress comes and goes, signifying nothing. If progress is an illusion, then striving for progress is a delusion. It is a huge waste of time, money, and effort. The Preacher repeatedly asserts that this is the case.

Accumulation takes effort, but it is futile. It is vanity.³ Why is it vain? Because there is only a meaningless contest between cyclical purposeless nature and purposeless death. Death is universal. It does not discriminate. It judges nothing. It imputes nothing.⁴ Life is all that is worth having, yet it must end.⁵ Death swallows all. "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was: and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it. Vanity of vanities, saith the preacher; all is vanity" (Eccl. 12:7–8).⁶

The value of today's capital is dependent on the future value of this capital. That will be determined by others, who will impute value to the surviving capital. Will they have good judgment or bad judgment?

1. Chapter 44.

2. Chapter 1.

3. Chapter 2.

4. Chapter 3.

5. Chapter 33.

6. Chapter 44.

No one knows today. Their assessment of the value of capital will in turn be dependent on their assessment of the imputations of their heirs. There is no final value because there is no final judgment.

Who will inherit? A fool or a wise person? The accumulator does not know. This undermines his work.⁷ To sacrifice consumption in the present for wealth beyond mere consumption in the future is vanity. Consumption is a good thing, but accumulating treasure is not. What will happen to treasure? It will be inherited. By whom? No one can be sure. This is sure: it will do the accumulator no good.⁸ Even his own son may turn out to be as a stranger.⁹

Oppression is universal. "So I returned, and considered all the oppressions that are done under the sun: and behold the tears of such as were oppressed, and they had no comforter; and on the side of their oppressors there was power; but they had no comforter" (Eccl. 4:1). A man cannot trust the legal system. There is no predictability based on righteous laws.¹⁰ The practice of oppression corrupts the judges. It drives them mad.¹¹

He who is successful will be envied. This is vanity.¹²

Autonomous man can be trapped by the lust to accumulate wealth. It is an addiction. He is never satisfied. He may be productive, but his productivity does him no good.¹³ No one knows whether riches are worth anything or not. This is vanity.¹⁴

Conclusion: sorrow is better than laughter. Sorrow testifies to the ultimate sorrow: death.¹⁵

This outlook undermines autonomous man's commitment. He sees no ethical cause and effect in history. It is easier to pursue ethics moderately. The middle of the road is safest. It is also easier.¹⁶

Autonomous man despairs over his lack of knowledge. He does not have enough insight to understand timing.¹⁷ He thinks it all depends on him. He is wrong. Nothing depends on him. It all depends on God. The covenant-keeper understands this. It gives him confidence.

7. Chapter 4.

8. Chapter 13.

9. Chapter 21.

10. Chapter 9.

11. Chapter 24.

12. Chapter 10.

13. Chapter 19.

14. Chapter 22.

15. Chapter 23.

16. Chapter 27.

17. Chapter 29.

He can rely on ethics rather than foreknowledge. Autonomous man is obsessed with his lack of knowledge.¹⁸

Whatever death does not dominate, chance does. There is no predictability of outcomes.¹⁹ Wisdom counts for nothing. Money counts. A wise poor man will be forgotten.²⁰

Rulers are not predictable. Some of them have terrible judgment.²¹ The world is one gigantic booby trap. Every project has its deadly pitfalls.²² The curse overwhelms the blessing. This outlook leads to paralysis.

C. Theonomy and Economics

Our world is governed by God, and God is supremely ethical. He has laid down the law to men. Men should obey it.²³

Because God has laid down His law, He judges in terms of this law. He judges in history. He rewards those who obey His law. He penalizes those who disobey. "For God giveth to a man that is good in his sight wisdom, and knowledge, and joy: but to the sinner he giveth travail, to gather and to heap up, that he may give to him that is good before God" (Eccl. 2:26a).²⁴ Consumption is a gift from God.²⁵

There is purpose in history because everything that happens happens on time. Time is purposeful.²⁶ It has meaning. This meaning is imputed by the God whose decree governs time. This gives meaning to a man's work. It provides confidence regarding his efforts, despite his ignorance of the future. "Wherefore I perceive that there is nothing better, than that a man should rejoice in his own works; for that is his portion: for who shall bring him to see what shall be after him" (Eccl. 3:22)? There is legitimate joy in consuming.²⁷

There is economic cause and effect in history. The slothful man will live in poverty.²⁸ But anxiety over obtaining wealth is a mistake. People should be content with basic necessities accompanied by peace

18. Chapter 32.

19. Chapter 35.

20. Chapter 36.

21. Chapter 37.

22. Chapter 38.

23. Chapter 45.

24. Chapter 6.

25. Chapter 20.

26. Chapter 7.

27. Chapter 8.

28. Chapter 11.

and quiet in preference to wealth with anxiety.²⁹

The division of labor is a great benefit to mankind. It makes our work more productive. The covenant-breaker sees this. This insight began Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations (1776). But the phenomenon of the division of labor is grounded in the Trinity.³⁰

Wisdom is a benefit. Successful kings rule in terms of it. A man of low birth and even prison can become a king, if his wisdom is sufficient.³¹ Wisdom is not vanity. Wisdom with an inheritance is even better.³²

God is the enforcer. He enforces vows.³³ He sees the evil that men do, and rules over human courts.³⁴ We do not live in a world governed by either cycles or death. Nature is purposeful.³⁵ It therefore is not cyclical.

God-fearing people can have faith in progress. The end is better than the beginning. Patience is the proper attitude.³⁶

God has made man upright. The result is inventions of all kinds.³⁷ This is an important aspect of progress and economic growth.

There is ethical causation in this world. The normal pattern is blessings for the man who obeys God's law and cursings for the man who doesn't. Thus, when a good man receives his reward, he can enjoy it. He can eat, drink, and be merry.³⁸

This being the case, theonomic man should apply himself to his work with great devotion and energy. Anything worth doing is worth doing well.³⁹

The labor of the fool is wasted. He does not know how to market.⁴⁰ This gives the wise man an advantage. The slothful person is also a weak competitor. He lets things drift.⁴¹

Charity pays dividends.⁴² This indicates that this world is governed

29. Chapter 12.

30. Chapter 14.

31. Chapter 15.

32. Chapter 26.

33. Chapter 16.

34. Chapter 17.

35. Chapter 18.

36. Chapter 25.

37. Chapter 28.

38. Chapter 31.

39. Chapter 34.

40. Chapter 39.

41. Chapter 40.

42. Chapter 42.

by ethics. It is not totally random. A wise man pays attention to the signs.⁴³

Conclusion

When autonomous covenant-breakers live consistently with their own presuppositions about the nature of God, man, law, sanctions, and time, they cannot compete effectively with covenant-keepers who live consistently with their presuppositions about the nature of God, man, law, sanctions, and time. This has to do with sanctions in history, which produce covenantal victory.

But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace (Psalm 37:11).

Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth (Matt. 5:5).⁴⁴

The Book of Ecclesiastes offers rival views of the world and rival motivations. Autonomous man is on the defensive in a world that he perceives as meaningless because it is cyclical in the aggregate and fatal individually. Covenant-keeping man lives in a world governed by God, who judges in terms of His law. The world is coherent because God is coherent. History is linear because God brings His kingdom to victory. The first outlook, when followed, leads to economic stagnation. The second view, when followed, leads to compound economic growth.

43. Chapter 43.

44. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 4.

RESTORATION AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON THE PROPHETS

Other Books by Gary North

- An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)
 Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)
An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)
 Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)
 None Dare Call It Witchcraft (1976)
 Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)
 Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)
 Government by Emergency (1983)
 Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)
75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)
 Coined Freedom (1984)
 Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)
 Honest Money (1986)
 Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)
Dominion and Common Grace (1987)
 Inherit the Earth (1987)
 Liberating Planet Earth (1987)
 Healer of the Nations (1987)
 The Pirate Economy (1987)
Is the World Running Down? (1988)
 When Justice Is Aborted (1989)
 Political Polytheism (1989)
 Judeo-Christian Tradition (1990)
 The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)
 Victim's Rights (1990)
Millennialism and Social Theory (1990)
 Westminster's Confession (1991)
Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar
 The Coase Theorem (1992)
Salvation Through Inflation (1993)
 Rapture Fever (1993)
 Tithing and the Church (1994)
Baptized Patriarchalism (1995)
 Crossed Fingers (1996)
 The Covenantal Tithe (2011)
 Mises on Money (2012)

RESTORATION AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON THE PROPHETS

GARY NORTH

Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets

Copyright © Gary North, 2012
First Edition

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

| | |
|---|----|
| Preface | ix |
| Introduction | 1 |
| Introduction to Isaiah | |
| 1. The Remnant (Isa. 1:7) | |
| 2. Righteous Judgment (Isa. 1:16–17) | |
| 3. Debasement and Its Effects (Isa. 1:22) | |
| 4. Prosperity with Idols (Isa. 2:6–8) | |
| 5. Consequences of Oppression (Isa. 3:1) | |
| 6. Restoring the Jubilee (Isa. 5:4–6) | |
| 7. Judicial Causation (Isa. 10:1–3) | |
| 8. Messianic Justice (Isa. 11:1–4) | |
| 9. Without Pity or Price (Isa. 13:15–17) | |
| 10. Delayed Negative Sanctions (Isa. 33:1) | |
| 11. The Transformation of the Wilderness (Isa. 41:17–18) ... | |
| 12. Invoking the Mosaic Law (Isa. 42:23–25) | |
| 13. The Promise of Abundance (Isa. 55:1–2) | |
| 14. The Declaration of Covenantal Liberty (Isa. 61:1–2) | |
| 15. New Heavens and New Earth (Isa. 65:20–23) | |
| Introduction to Jeremiah | |
| 16. Non-Payment of Wages (Jer. 22:13–17) | |
| 17. Faith in the Future (Jer. 32:6–7) | |
| 18. The Release of Hebrew Bondservants (Jer. 34:8–9) | |
| Introduction to Ezekiel | |
| 19. Avoiding Oppression (Ezek. 18:7–9) | |
| 20. Riches as a Snare (Ezek. 28:5–7) | |
| 21. Free Food in Rival Kingdoms (Ezek. 34:21–24) | |
| 22. A Shared Inheritance (Ezek. 47:21–23) | |
| Introduction to Hosea | |
| 23. The Destruction of Wealth (Hosea 2:8–9) | |
| 24. Corrupt Riches (Hosea 7:7–8) | |
| Introduction to Micah | |
| 25. Captivity as Disinheritance (Micah 2:2–3) | |

26. Private Property: A Covenantal Blessing (Micah 4:4)

27. The Treasures of Wickedness (Micah 6:10–12)

Introduction to Amos

28. Forced Enslavement (Amos 2:6)

29. Unjust Judges (Amos 6:3–6)

30. Oppression through False Balances (Amos 8:4–6)

Introduction to Haggai

31. A Bag With Holes (Hag. 1:4–6)

Introduction to Zechariah

32. Peace and Prosperity (Zech. 8:10–12)

Introduction to Malachi

33. Stealing from God (Mal. 3:7–8)

Conclusion

PREFACE

And it shall come to pass, when all these things are come upon thee, the blessing and the curse, which I have set before thee, and thou shalt call them to mind among all the nations, whither the LORD thy God hath driven thee, And shalt return unto the LORD thy God, and shalt obey his voice according to all that I command thee this day, thou and thy children, with all thine heart, and with all thy soul; That then the LORD thy God will turn thy captivity, and have compassion upon thee, and will return and gather thee from all the nations, whither the LORD thy God hath scattered thee. If any of thine be driven out unto the outmost parts of heaven, from thence will the LORD thy God gather thee, and from thence will he fetch thee: And the LORD thy God will bring thee into the land which thy fathers possessed, and thou shalt possess it; and he will do thee good, and multiply thee above thy fathers. And the LORD thy God will circumcise thine heart, and the heart of thy seed, to love the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, that thou mayest live. And the LORD thy God will put all these curses upon thine enemies, and on them that hate thee, which persecuted thee. And thou shalt return and obey the voice of the LORD, and do all his commandments which I command thee this day (Deut. 30:1–8).

This passage was the judicial foundation of the message of the prophets before the dual exiles of Israel and Judah to Assyria and Babylon, respectively. The pre-exilic prophets brought covenant lawsuits against the northern and southern kingdoms. They warned of national exile to come. But they also promised geographical restoration, just as Moses had promised.

There would be no escape from captivity, Jeremiah told Judah. He told them that Nebuchadnezzar was God's servant (Jer. 27:6). All nations would serve him (v. 7). Any nation that resisted, God would punish (v. 8). There were no loopholes. There was no fallback position. God was serious about enforcing the ultimate negative corporate sanction that was associated with the Mosaic law: captivity.

Isaiah had brought a similar message over a century earlier.

“Therefore saith the Lord, the LORD of hosts, the mighty One of Israel, Ah, I will ease me of mine adversaries, and avenge me of mine enemies: And I will turn my hand upon thee, and purely purge away thy dross, and take away all thy tin: And I will restore thy judges as at the first, and thy counsellors as at the beginning: afterward thou shalt be called, The city of righteousness, the faithful city. Zion shall be redeemed with judgment, and her converts with righteousness. And the destruction of the transgressors and of the sinners shall be together, and they that forsake the LORD shall be consumed” (Isa. 1:24–28). First captivity, then restoration. Some might call it reconstruction.

A. Covenant Lawsuits

The prophets served as judicial agents of God under the Mosaic Covenant. They brought a series of covenant lawsuits against Israel and Judah. These lawsuits invoked specific Mosaic laws. The two nations had broken these laws. Then the prophets warned of God’s sanctions in history: positive and negative. The main passages in the Old Covenant that undergirded the sanctions associated with these covenant lawsuits were Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28.

Anyone who attempts to explain the message of any prophet, but who does not begin with the Mosaic statute invoked by the prophet, is likely to misinterpret his message. This is even more true of an assessment of the prophets taken as a whole. The message of the prophets was clear. The nations of Israel and Judah had a covenantal obligation to honor the Mosaic law’s statutes—in thought, word, and deed. The two nations had failed to do this. Judgment was coming, but geographical restoration would come after judgment’s negative sanctions.

This line of argumentation should seem revolutionary to no one. Yet in this, the second decade of the twenty-first century, Christians in the pews are unfamiliar with this perspective. The people in the pews have not been taught that the prophets’ warnings were carefully structured covenant lawsuits. They have never heard of a covenant lawsuit. Few of them have ever heard a sermon on what a covenant is, let alone a covenant lawsuit. This is not taught at seminary, either, except perhaps in an elective course on the prophets, which few students take.

The prophets’ message had to do with reform. Specifically, the message of the prophets was for a restoration of social justice through the action of the civil government. They demanded widespread repentance. This repentance involved restoring the institutional arrange- ments mandated by the Mosaic law. The looming negative sanctions were corporate; hence, the reformation demanded by the prophets was corporate. It would come after national captivity.

Above all, repentance required a reformation of the courts, both civil and ecclesiastical. The courts had violated three of four laws—three Mosaic laws and a fourth which had been announced by God to Moses just before the exodus from Egypt.

One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you (Ex. 12:49).¹

Thou shalt not wrest the judgment of thy poor in his cause (Ex. 23:6).

Neither shalt thou countenance a poor man in his cause (Ex. 23:3).²

Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty: but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour (Lev. 19:15).³

They had honored only Exodus 23:3. Any discussion of the prophets that does not include a discussion of these four laws is misleading. These four verses established the greatest gift of the Old Covenant to modern civilization: the ideal of the rule of law. The rule of law is summarized in this phrase, which appears repeatedly in both testaments: “no respect for persons.”

Ye shall not respect persons in judgment; but ye shall hear the small as well as the great; ye shall not be afraid of the face of man; for the judgment is God’s: and the cause that is too hard for you, bring it unto me, and I will hear it (Deut. 1:17).⁴

In modern American parlance, this phrase describes the fundamental violation of the rule of law: “Different strokes for different folks.” This principle of law leads to favoritism, injustice, and tyranny. Left unchecked, it produces social breakdown. Built into God’s social order are negative sanctions against injustice. Honesty really is the best

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 14.

2. Ibid., Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 50.

3. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 14.

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 4.

policy. Dishonesty produces poverty.⁵ If this built-in system of social causation is widely ignored, God will eventually intervene. The prophets warned Israel and Judah of God's looming intervention into history. To avoid this, the prophets said, the rebellious nations had to restore God's law: the same strokes for different folks.

B. Judicial Impartiality and Economic Inequality

When God's law is enforced impartially, the result is inequality in every area of life. This is because people with different talents, visions, commitments, and expectations will produce different results whenever God's law is enforced without respect to persons. In order to be able to promise the voters to produce anything like economic equality, a civil government could not enforce the law equally.⁶ It would have discriminate between economic classes. This is what Exodus 12:49 prohibits.

The Bible specifically teaches against equality of results. It teaches the reversal of social and economic positions. When the nation repents, those who were on top fall; those who were on the bottom rise. The finest biblical statement of this reversal is Mary's testimony, sometimes called the magnificat. The language of the King James Version has come down to English-speaking Protestants through the centuries.

And his mercy is on them that fear him from generation to generation. He hath shewed strength with his arm; he hath scattered the proud in the imagination of their hearts. He hath put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree. He hath filled the hungry with good things; and the rich he hath sent empty away (Luke 1:50–53).⁷

The Bible teaches economic inequality between covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers. Deuteronomy 28 is quite specific, both with respect to positive economic sanctions and negative economic sanctions.⁸

5. The greatest modern example of this is the Soviet Union, which visibly collapsed economically in the late 1980s and then collapsed politically on December 31, 1991. Its people had been poor from the beginning in 1917. They remained significantly poorer than citizens in the West until the very end.

6. In fact, no society in the last century of study has ever achieved anything like equality. The famous 20%-80% distribution revealed by Alfredo Pareto in 1897 reigns supreme. About 20% of a nation's inhabitants own about 80% of the wealth. No one knows why this 20-80 rule operates in the area of income distribution, let alone so many other areas of life, but it does.

7. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion; An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 1.

The LORD shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his season, and to bless all the work of thine hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow. And the LORD shall make thee the head, and not the tail; and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath; if that thou hearken unto the commandments of the LORD thy God, which I command thee this day, to observe and to do them (Deut. 28:12–13).

The stranger that is within thee shall get up above thee very high; and thou shalt come down very low. He shall lend to thee, and thou shalt not lend to him: he shall be the head, and thou shalt be the tail. Moreover all these curses shall come upon thee, and shall pursue thee, and overtake thee, till thou be destroyed; because thou hearkenest not unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to keep his commandments and his statutes which he commanded thee (Deut. 28:43–45).⁹

Economic equality? This doctrine is not taught in the Bible. There are always economic winners and losers in history. This outcome is built into biblical law, which involves judicial sanctions, and is also built into God's general sanctions as the cosmic judge. The prophets came to warn the people against God's looming sanctions: positive for the invaders, negative for the Israelites. Their listeners would either repent or be brought low. They did not repent. Therefore, they were brought low. For the defender of equality, the testimony of the prophets is an affront, a sacrilege. So, they select carefully from the prophetic lawsuits.

The Bible teaches this principle: equality before the law. F. A. Hayek, the legal theorist and Nobel Prize-winning economist, has summarized the economic implication of the principle of equality before the law: inequality of economic outcomes.

From the fact that people are very different it follows that, if we treat them equally, the result must be inequality in their actual position, and that the only way to place them in an equal position would be to treat them differently. Equality before the law and material equality are therefore not only different but are in conflict with each other; and we can achieve either one or the other, but not both at the same time. The equality before the law which freedom requires leads to material inequality.¹⁰

8. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 69.

9. Ibid., ch. 70.

C. The Social Gospel and Liberation Theology

There is a system of interpretation of the prophets that implicitly denies the principle of the rule of law. The promoters of this view ignore three of the four verses. They may quote Exodus 23:6, “Thou shalt not wrest the judgment of thy poor in his cause,” but they never quote Exodus 23:3: “Neither shalt thou countenance a poor man in his cause.”¹¹ These expositors are defenders of what is known as the Social Gospel. A more radical version of this message is known as Liberation Theology. Liberation theologians in the Roman Catholic Church, especially in Latin America, from the mid-1960s through the fall of the Soviet Union in 1991, insisted that the prophets brought a message consistent with Marxism. Their peers in Protestant American pulpits did not go this far. They claimed merely that the prophets were advocating a welfare state economy, probably close to that of Scandinavia.

The older form of the Social Gospel, which had become dominant in America’s mainline denominations by 1960, first appeared in the 1880s. It was promoted by theological liberals who denied the inerrancy of the original manuscripts of the Bible, the virgin birth, and the doctrine of hell. After 1960, mainline denominations began to shrink. Beginning in the late 1960s, the economic conclusions of the Social Gospel began to be imported into evangelical churches by young men who had been radicalized by their opposition to the Vietnam war (1963–75) and by their participation in the early phase of the civil rights movement (1956–70).¹² They still claimed to be evangelicals, but they came with the old Social Gospel’s agenda for reform. They attempted to mix biblical oil and welfare state water. They still do.¹³

Because they correctly perceive that the Mosaic law testifies against their economic views, they have adopted a self-conscious tactic of obfuscation. They appeal to the prophets rather than to the Mosaic law. This raises a major problem: the prophets never mentioned any re-

10. F. A. Hayek, The Constitution of Liberty (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960), p. 87.

11. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 50.

12. It was possible to oppose the Vietnam War and promote racial equality in the civil justice system without being radicalized. I am living proof. I read and approved of Martin Luther King’s book, Stride Toward Freedom (1958), in 1960.

13. Joel McDurmon, God versus Socialism: A Biblical Critique of the New Social Gospel (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2009), Part 2.

form that even remotely resembled the forced redistribution of wealth by the state. They called for individual restitution, as the Mosaic law required, case by case, for individuals' specific violations of the Mosaic law. But there was no hint in the message of the prophets that economic inequality could or should be remedied by government actions: by graduated income taxes, or the regulation prices, or food stamps (digits), or any other program associated with the modern welfare state. So, the economic reforms called for by liberation theologians and defenders of the Social Gospel are superimposed on the language of the prophets and said to be not only consistent with what the prophets taught but morally mandatory for any society that calls itself Christian. This is deception: either self-deception or self-conscious deception, but deception nonetheless.

These proponents of coercive wealth redistribution by the state call for the reform of oppressive social structures. So did the prophets. But the prophets called for a return to those structures that had been mandated by the Mosaic law. The promoters of the Social Gospel always insist that they have no such agenda. Instead, they say that they want merely to return to the true meaning—the hidden meaning—of the Mosaic law, not its specifics. There is a reason for their refusal to invoke the Mosaic law. The Mosaic law defended the private property social order. This defense began with a commandment: "Thou shalt not steal."¹⁴ Social Gospel advocates want to modify this commandment as follows: "Thou shalt not steal, except by majority vote."

D. Bait and Switch

In the United States, there is a marketing practice called bait and switch. A local company advertises that it has a low-cost item for sale. The shopper arrives at the store, ready to buy. He is then told by the salesman that the item is out of stock. Then the salesman uses his selling skills to sell the shopper a higher priced product. This practice is illegal in most jurisdictions. It is based on fraud. It steals people's time. It also steals their hopes.

Any theologian or social theorist who invokes the authority of the Old Testament prophets, but who then refuses also to affirm the continuing judicial authority of the Mosaic statutes that were invoked by the prophets, is using a bait-and-switch marketing technique. He is attempting to gain authority for his suggested economic reforms. He seeks such authority from the prophets. Then, having gained the listener's attention and even support, he switches. He affirms, in the name of the prophets, some half-baked theory of economic reform suggested by his socialistic professor of sociology two decades ago in college.

14. North, Authority and Dominion, Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 28.

The defenders of the Social Gospel constantly cite the prophets, but they do not cite them in search of specific Mosaic statutes. Instead, they invoke the prophetic tradition—undefined—as a justification for some Left-wing reform project. In all cases, they call for state coercion in the name of social justice. They conflate state and society, as if the state were not just one aspect of society, which includes families, churches, voluntary associations, businesses, and schools. When they say “society,” they really mean “state.” This is a serious misunderstanding of the biblical concept of society.

In this book, I exegete every passage in the prophets that refers to economics. As you will see, nothing that any prophet said had anything to do with central economic planning, state wealth-redistribution projects, or the expansion of government-funded industries. Except for Isaiah, they had little to say about economics. What little they said had to do with the enforcement of Mosaic statutes.

E. Economic Sins: Low Priority

What is striking is how little attention the prophets paid to economics. This calls into question the theological relevance of liberation theologians in mainline American denominations and their allies within the evangelical camp. They have rested much of their case in favor of socialism or the welfare state on the prophets. They have created an illusion that the prophets were concerned greatly about economic matters.

The prophets were concerned about ethical rebellion and religious apostasy. They did not ignore these issues as manifested in the economy, but economic transgressions were not high on their list of representative evils.

Their condemnations were invariably tied to case laws of the Mosaic law. They brought covenant lawsuits against Israel and Judah. They invoked the Mosaic law. The liberationists rarely cite the specific case laws, nor do they provide detailed exegesis of how these laws were to be applied, what the results were when enforced, and what God's negative sanctions were when they were not enforced. There is a reason for this silence. The liberationists know that the Mosaic law was overwhelmingly on the side of private property and hostile to what we call the welfare state. Samuel warned the Israelites against ordaining a king.

And he will take your fields, and your vineyards, and your oliveyards, even the best of them, and give them to his servants. And he will take the tenth of your seed, and of your vineyards, and give to his officers, and to his servants. And he will take your menservants, and your maidservants, and your goodliest young men, and your asses, and put them to his work. He will take the tenth of your sheep: and ye shall be his servants. And ye shall cry out in that day because of your king which ye shall have chosen you; and the LORD will not hear you in that day (I Sam 8:14–18).¹⁵

The modern state taxes at least four times higher than what the tyrannical king would tax. The liberationists condemn the modern state for not taxing and spending even more. So, they do not want their followers to go to the Mosaic law in search of the specifics of economic oppression. The Mosaic law identifies the main oppressors as rulers who misuse the authority of the courts to defraud residents.

Conclusion

The modern Christian world has been deceived by pastors and theologians who are wolves in sheep's clothing. Their self-appointed task is to move Christian opinion in the direction of the humanist political Left. They have done this by selectively quoting from the prophets and then interpreting them by means of the humanist Left's political agenda. They ask this: What Would Jesus Steal? In the name of love, they recommend the creation of a welfare state that extracts four times to six times more than the tithe. Samuel warned Israel against a king, for the king would extract 10% of their production. Modern liberation theologians and Social Gospel promoters would regard such a king as a Right-wing Judas, who would reduce taxes on the rich by at least 75%. They would dismiss such a king as a front man for the Right, a king who would oppress the poor by imposing a flat tax.

When you hear a call for "the economics of love," start looking for the hidden gun. Christian love in this context can only be achieved through armed agents of the state showing up at men's doors to demand a large portion of their income—all in the name of justice. Ask yourself these three questions:

15. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary of the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 14.

1. Where is the gun?
2. Who is holding the gun?
3. At whom is the gun pointed?

The commandment is this: "Thou shalt not steal." It is not this: "Thou shalt not steal, except by majority vote."

INTRODUCTION

Yea, they made their hearts as an adamant stone, lest they should hear the law, and the words which the LORD of hosts hath sent in his spirit by the former prophets: therefore came a great wrath from the LORD of hosts. Therefore it is come to pass, that as he cried, and they would not hear; so they cried, and I would not hear, saith the LORD of hosts: But I scattered them with a whirlwind among all the nations whom they knew not. Thus the land was desolate after them, that no man passed through nor returned: for they laid the pleasant land desolate (Zech. 7:12–14).

Here, Zechariah surveyed the history of what had happened to Israel and Judah. He was a prophet of the post-exilic period, which began after Cyrus, the Medo-Persian king, allowed the Israelites to return to the Promised Land. His decree was issued around 536 B.C.

A. Prophetic Theme

The pre-exilic prophets had warned the inhabitants of Israel and Judah of the captivity to come. Isaiah was so specific that, two centuries before Cyrus's decree, Isaiah mentioned him by name (Isa. 44:28–45:1). The captivity would be the culmination of a long series of negative corporate sanctions imposed by God because of the Israelites' disobedience. These sanctions were part of what theologians call a covenant lawsuit.

The heart of Old Covenant prophecy was the covenant lawsuit. Predictions were a subordinate aspect of the covenant lawsuit. Predictions came in two forms: first, an if . . . then ethically conditional prediction; second, a specific and unconditional prediction.

A covenant lawsuit was a warning made by a person who had been called by God to warn the nation. If the nation continued to rebel against God by breaking the statutes of the Mosaic law, God would bring corporate negative sanctions against the nation. Some lawsuits were brought against Judah, the southern kingdom. Some were brought against Israel, the northern kingdom. Some were brought against both. Some were brought against nations outside the Promised Land: Jonah's ministry.

The covenant lawsuit rested on the five points of the biblical covenant: (1) the transcendence/presence of God, (2) the hierarchical structure of covenantal institutions, (3) the law of God, (4) the oath to God, and (5) the inheritance of all things by covenant-keepers.¹ In terms of the covenant lawsuits, the prophets affirmed the following: (1) the sovereignty of God over history, (2) the subordination of Israel to God, (3) the Mosaic law, (4) God's positive and negative corporate sanctions in history, and (5) the restoration of Israel as a nation.

It is common to refer to two classifications of prophets: major prophets and minor prophets. This is a conceptual error. It leads to additional errors. One of the worst of these errors is to regard Zechariah as a minor prophet. We should instead classify the ministries of the prophets in terms of their relation to the two captivities: exile from the land.

B. The Exile

Israel's captivity began in 722 B.C. Israel fell to Assyria, which in turn fell to Babylon in 612 B.C. Judah's captivity began in 586 B.C. Judah fell to Babylon, which in turn fell to the Medo-Persians in 539 B.C. The Medo-Persian empire allowed the Israelites to return to Israel in 536 B.C. One group of prophets we can call pre-exilic. The other group we can call post-exilic.

Zechariah was a post-exilic prophet. He preached to those few Israelites who had decided to return from what had been the kingdoms of Assyria and Babylon, which had carried their parents into captivity. As a post-exilic prophet, he offered a message of hope. He did not come before the nation, as the pre-exilic prophets had, with a message of imminent or potentially imminent doom. He came with this message: if they obeyed God's law, as revealed by Moses, the land would prosper. He came with a message of repentance.

As he made clear, his predecessors had also come with that message. They had encountered stiff-necked resistance. "Yea, they made their hearts as an adamant stone, lest they should hear the law." The

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992). (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010).

Torah, revealed by God to Moses, and revealed by Moses to the exodus generation (Ex. 20–23) and then, four decades later, to the generation of the conquest (Deuteronomy), was binding. It had been clear on this point: a future generation would rebel against God by breaking His law. God would bring comprehensive negative sanctions against them (Deut. 28:15–66), culminating in their forced captivity abroad. Moses had prophesied this.

Even all nations shall say, Wherefore hath the LORD done thus unto this land? what meaneth the heat of this great anger? Then men shall say, Because they have forsaken the covenant of the LORD God of their fathers, which he made with them when he brought them forth out of the land of Egypt: For they went and served other gods, and worshipped them, gods whom they knew not, and whom he had not given unto them: And the anger of the LORD was kindled against this land, to bring upon it all the curses that are written in this book: And the LORD rooted them out of their land in anger, and in wrath, and in great indignation, and cast them into another land, as it is this day (Deut. 29:24–28).

The pre-exilic prophets came before Israel to call the nation to repentance. Repentance meant invoking God alone as their redeemer, and then obeying the Mosaic law as a sign of their covenantal subordination. The Israelites refused to do either. “Therefore came a great wrath from the LORD of hosts” (Zech. 7:12b).

The pre-exilic prophets brought a covenant lawsuit against Israel and Judah. They warned their listeners of the comprehensive negative sanctions to come. These sanctions had been described in the Torah. They had accompanied the statutes. Without sanctions, there is no law. Without law and sanctions, there is no covenant.

The post-exilic prophets were Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. They also brought a covenant lawsuit. But theirs was different. The negative corporate sanctions had already been applied by God. To escape them, and then to gain comprehensive positive sanctions, the people had to repent. During the ministries of Haggai and Zechariah, they did. The manifestation of their repentance was their completion of the temple, which had sat in ruins for a dozen years or more.

Any attempt to understand the prophets apart from the Mosaic law and its sanctions is doomed to failure. Any attempt to build an economic system in theory and practice in terms of the message of the prophets, without also adopting the Mosaic statutes and sanctions which they invoked, is equally doomed to failure.

Conclusion

The prophets called their listeners to repentance. This repentance would have corporate consequences: the extension of the kingdom of God in history. The fruits of repentance were not limited to hearts and souls. They were not limited to families and centers of worship. They were no more limited than sin's domain is limited, and no less limited.

As surely as sinning in Israel and Judah led to captivity—the visible contraction of the kingdom of God in history—so would repentance reverse this contraction and lead to dominion. This had been the message of the pre-exilic prophets, beginning with the greatest of the Old Covenant prophets, Moses.² This was also the message of the post-exilic prophets.

2. "And there arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses, whom the LORD knew face to face" (Deut. 34:10).

INTRODUCTION TO ISAIAH

The vision of Isaiah the son of Amoz, which he saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah (Isa. 1:1).

Isaiah identified the era in which he served as a prophet. This was a long period of service. King Uzziah's reign was a long one, over half a century. He died sometime around 740 B.C. Hezekiah's reign ended with his death in 687 B.C.

We are not sure when in Uzziah's reign Isaiah's prophetic ministry began. It must have been late. We do know that Isaiah lived until at least 15 years before Hezekiah's death. The prophet told him that God would give the king another 15 years of life. Isaiah 39 records this revelation. The remaining 27 chapters provide additional prophecies, so he lived for years after this meeting.

Isaiah included far more material related to economics than the other prophets did. I have identified 15 passages. The largest number in any other prophet's book is three. The book of Isaiah is long—the second longest book in the Bible after Psalms. So, as a percentage of the book, his comments on economics are minimal.

This is typical of the prophets. They did not pay much attention to economic sins.

1

THE REMNANT

Except the LORD of hosts had left unto us a very small remnant, we should have been as Sodom, and we should have been like unto Gomorrah (Isa. 1:7).

A. Continuing Prophetic Theme

The theocentric issue here is inheritance in history: point five of the biblical covenant.¹ The remnant of Israel would persevere through time. The remnant of Israel is a recurring theme in the writings of the prophets. This remnant is sometimes a remnant of righteous covenant-keepers within a society of covenant-breakers. In other cases, it refers to a small number as such, such as Isaiah's prophecy regarding the return of a relatively small number of Israelites to the land after the Babylonian captivity. "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the remnant of Israel, and such as are escaped of the house of Jacob, shall no more again stay upon him that smote them; but shall stay upon the LORD, the Holy One of Israel, in truth. The remnant shall return, even the remnant of Jacob, unto the mighty God. For though thy people Israel be as the sand of the sea, yet a remnant of them shall return: the consumption decreed shall overflow with righteousness" (Isa. 10:20–22).

At the beginning of his book, Isaiah referred to a saving remnant. It was not large enough to transform Israelite society, but it had a representative judicial function. Because of its presence in the land, God would not destroy the nation in the way that He had destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah. This remnant had the same judicial function as the hypothetical remnant in Sodom would have had as a result of Abraham's bargaining with the angelic representatives of God to spare the city for the sake of a remnant as few as 10 people (Gen. 18:23–32).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

Elijah had not known of the existence of this remnant when he fled from Ahab and Jezebel. God spoke to him while he was hiding in a cave in the wilderness. God asked him why he was there. Elijah lamented, “I have been very jealous for the LORD God of hosts: because the children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant, thrown down thine altars, and slain thy prophets with the sword; and I, even I only, am left; and they seek my life, to take it away” (I Kings 19:14). He saw himself as the last man standing. God informed him that he was incorrect. “Yet I have left me seven thousand in Israel, all the knees which have not bowed unto Baal, and every mouth which hath not kissed him” (I Kings 19:18). On account of them, God did not allow the nation to be carried off in Elijah’s era. But time eventually ran out for the nation.

B. For the Sake of the Few

The scriptural principle of the saving remnant applies to all of history. Covenant-keepers have usually been outnumbered. They may be sufficiently numerous to have influence in a particular society and era, or they may not. God recognizes that whenever His remnant is small, it therefore deserves protection. He deals with this remnant in a special way. This applied to Israel among the nations. Moses said:

For thou art an holy people unto the LORD thy God: the LORD thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth. The LORD did not set his love upon you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people; for ye were the fewest of all people: But because the LORD loved you, and because he would keep the oath which he had sworn unto your fathers, hath the LORD brought you out with a mighty hand, and redeemed you out of the house of bondmen, from the hand of Pharaoh king of Egypt (Deut. 7:6–8).

This special arrangement also applied to the covenantally faithful remnant within the nation, after the nation had apostatized.

Because the remnant is small, the members’ individual productivity does not account for very much most of the time. To remain productive, they require an extensive division of labor within the context of a much larger society. The skills and efforts of many people result in high output per capita. The remnant participates in a social order that benefits from voluntary exchange. They are richer as individuals because of the division of labor. This was Lot's situation until the angels led him out of Sodom just before the destruction of the city (Gen. 19).

The doctrine of common grace rests on the assumption that God gives grace—unmerited blessings—in history to covenant-breakers, so that they might provide the historical framework for the development of the rival covenants, God's and Satan's. This common grace heals, but it does not provide entrance into the kingdom of God in history and thereby in eternity.² The crucial verse in the Bible regarding common grace is this one: "For therefore we both labour and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, specially of those that believe" (I Tim. 4:10).³ Specially is the key word. God saves some people generally, in the sense of preservation; others He saves specially, in the sense of redemption.

C. Salt and Light

Jesus referred to covenant-keepers as salt and light. "Ye are the salt of the earth: but if the salt have lost his savour, wherewith shall it be salted? it is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out, and to be trodden under foot of men" (Matt. 5:13).⁴ The remnant serves as salt in the sense of a means of preservation. But salt also destroys.

And Abimelech, and the company that was with him, rushed forward, and stood in the entering of the gate of the city: and the two other companies ran upon all the people that were in the fields, and slew them. And Abimelech fought against the city all that day; and he took the city, and slew the people that was therein, and beat down the city, and sowed it with salt (Jdgs. 9:44–45).

The remnant possesses both of these attributes of salt. The remnant's presence brings God's preserving grace to the general society, yet His presence also condemns the society by comparison. Covenant-breakers perceive this threat. They reject the remnant's testimony. "For we are unto God a sweet savour of Christ, in them that are saved, and in them that perish: To the one we are the savour of death unto death; and to the other the savour of life unto life. And who is sufficient for these things?” (II Cor. 2:15–16).

2. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

3. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 6.

4. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 5.

God administers His transforming grace for the sake of the remnant and also through the remnant. All of history moves toward the final judgment, when the remnant inherits the accumulated capital of human history. Psalm 37 emphasizes this theme.

For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth. For yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be: yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall not be. But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace (Ps. 37:9–11).

Wait on the LORD, and keep his way, and he shall exalt thee to inherit the land: when the wicked are cut off, thou shalt see it. I have seen the wicked in great power, and spreading himself like a green bay tree. Yet he passed away, and, lo, he was not: yea, I sought him, but he could not be found. Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright: for the end of that man is peace. But the transgressors shall be destroyed together: the end of the wicked shall be cut off (Ps. 37:34–38).

Solomon put it succinctly. “A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children’s children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just” (Prov. 13:22).⁵ The remnant inherits in eternity. These texts are clear: the remnant also inherits in history. The sanctifying presence of the remnant leads to its inheritance in history.

D. The Remnant Becomes the Majority

The message of Isaiah was that the remnant will not remain the remnant permanently. There will come a time when it becomes the dominant force in society. He ended his book with a description of this triumph.

For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people: and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying. There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed. And they shall build houses, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them (Isa. 65:17–21).⁶

5. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 41.

The sinner will die young at age one hundred. The covenant-keeper will live far longer. This cannot possibly refer to eternity. It refers to history. This is the long-run vision of Isaiah. It offers hope to the remnant through the ages. The remnant's work is cumulative. It expands. The result will be comprehensive inheritance in history.

Conclusion

The remnant was the reason for God's preservation of Israel in the land. But this preservation was temporary. Captivity was coming.

Isaiah presented the sovereignty of God. This is made clear in Isaiah 44 and 45, where he prophesied regarding the restoration of Israel to the land, specifically naming King Cyrus the Medo-Persian, two centuries in advance. "That saith of Cyrus, He is my shepherd, and shall perform all my pleasure: even saying to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built; and to the temple, Thy foundation shall be laid" (Isa. 44:28). The context of this sovereignty provides the meaning of the remnant. Its work perseveres through history through covenantal succession. "Thy people also shall be all righteous: they shall inherit the land for ever, the branch of my planting, the work of my hands, that I may be glorified. A little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation: I the LORD will hasten it in his time" (Isa. 60:21–22).

Faith in linear history, faith in compound growth, and faith in the absolute sovereignty of God over both history and growth: these constitute the confession of the remnant.

These three concepts lead to a society that experiences long-term economic growth. Without the first two, people will not save at high rates. They do not trust the future. The third intensifies men's commitment to the future.

The West has been committed to the first belief ever since it became Christian. It has come to accept the second, beginning in the seventeenth century: Puritan and Presbyterian postmillennialism, a view of time that was secularized by the Enlightenment in the eighteenth century. The third belief has been limited to Augustinians and Calvinists, which have been minority positions in their respective ecclesiastical traditions.

6. Chapter 15.

2

RIGHTEOUS JUDGMENT

Wash you, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil; Learn to do well; seek judgment, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widow (Isa. 1:16–17).

A. National Repentance

The theocentric issue here is judgment: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ God, through Isaiah, listed these ethical requirements as part of a program of national repentance. God said that He would not tolerate their formal acts of sacrifice unless they reform their ways. He directed His commands first to the nation's rulers, who represented the nation. Immediately thereafter, He targeted the common people. No one was immune.

Hear the word of the LORD, ye rulers of Sodom; give ear unto the law of our God, ye people of Gomorrah. To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto me? saith the LORD: I am full of the burnt offerings of rams, and the fat of fed beasts; and I delight not in the blood of bullocks, or of lambs, or of he goats. When ye come to appear before me, who hath required this at your hand, to tread my courts? Bring no more vain oblations; incense is an abomination unto me; the new moons and sabbaths, the calling of assemblies, I cannot away with; it is iniquity, even the solemn meeting. Your new moons and your appointed feasts my soul hateth: they are a trouble unto me; I am weary to bear them. And when ye spread forth your hands, I will hide mine eyes from you: yea, when ye make many prayers, I will not hear: your hands are full of blood (vv. 10–15).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

Isaiah's contemporary, Micah, made a similar challenge to Judah.

Wherewith shall I come before the LORD, and bow myself before the high God? shall I come before him with burnt offerings, with calves of a year old? Will the LORD be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? shall I give my firstborn for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul? He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the LORD require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God (Micah 6:6–8).

B. Judicial Context

The focus of the passage is on the nature of righteousness. After warning his listeners that acts of formal sacrifice carry no independent weight with God, Isaiah invoked the language of cleanliness. "Wash you, make you clean." In the context of the Mosaic law, this refers to ritual washings. But God had already made it clear that He was not impressed with their ritual obedience. He was interested in their ethics. "Put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil. Learn to do well." But how? "Seek judgment, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widow." These are judicial matters.

This warning was aimed at the rulers of the two nations. Rulers are in charge of the judicial institutions of society. In the remainder of the chapter, Isaiah listed specific infractions of the rulers. They were corrupt to the core. The mark of this corruption was their oppression of the weak.

The Mosaic law identified this test of the law's correct enforcement: protection of widows, orphans, and strangers in the land. There must be honest judgment in the courts. Judgment must never be in terms of persons but always in terms of the application of the Mosaic law to specific cases. The weak are entitled to the same consideration as the rich. This is how God judges. The general rule is here:

Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty; but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour (Lev. 19:15).²

The references to the widow, the orphan, and the stranger are

2. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 14.

here:

For the LORD your God is God of gods, and Lord of lords, a great God, a mighty, and a terrible, which regardeth not persons, nor taketh reward: He doth execute the judgment of the fatherless and widow, and loveth the stranger, in giving him food and raiment (Deut. 10:17–18).

Thou shalt not pervert the judgment of the stranger, nor of the fatherless; nor take a widow's raiment to pledge (Deut. 24:17).

When thou cuttest down thine harvest in thy field, and hast forgot a sheaf in the field, thou shalt not go again to fetch it: it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow: that the LORD thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hands (Deut. 24:19).³

Cursed be he that perverteth the judgment of the stranger, fatherless, and widow. And all the people shall say, Amen (Deut. 27:19).

These rules applied to civil courts and Levitical courts. Each covenantal institution had its own courts. Each court system was bound by the general rule of law enforcement: no respect of persons.

Ye shall not respect persons in judgment; but ye shall hear the small as well as the great; ye shall not be afraid of the face of man; for the judgment is God's: and the cause that is too hard for you, bring it unto me, and I will hear it (Deut. 1:17).⁴

Judges and officers shalt thou make thee in all thy gates, which the LORD thy God giveth thee, throughout thy tribes: and they shall judge the people with just judgment. Thou shalt not wrest judgment; thou shalt not respect persons, neither take a gift: for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous. That which is altogether just shalt thou follow, that thou mayest live, and inherit the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee (Deut. 16:18–20).⁵

It is clear from Isaiah's accusation against the rulers that they had been violating this rule. "Thy princes are rebellious, and companions of thieves: every one loveth gifts, and followeth after rewards: they judge not the fatherless, neither doth the cause of the widow come unto them" (v. 23).

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 62.

4. Ibid., ch. 4.

5. Ibid., ch. 39.

C. Misinterpreting This Passage

There is a tradition of biblical interpretation that is associated with the Social Gospel movement of the twentieth century,⁶ which presents the prophets as advocates of wealth redistribution from the rich to the poor. Whenever the words appear regarding oppression, the Social Gospel expositors interpret this as oppression by the rich and powerful through the market economy.

To make this interpretation, they are forced to ignore the most fundamental principle of biblical civil justice: “Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty: but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour” (Lev. 19:15). The expositors do not merely ignore it; they implicitly deny it. Both socialism and welfare state economics rest on a violation of this law.⁷ Because their principle of interpretation is so clearly a violation of Leviticus 19:15, the expositors prefer to ignore the passage.

The judicial issue for Isaiah’s covenant lawsuit was corrupt judgment in favor of oppressors. The use of the courts to oppress people had angered God. The essence of oppression in the Old Testament was the misuse of the law enforcement system to favor one group against another. The law identified widows, orphans, and strangers as the most vulnerable of residents in the land. They were representatives of the oppressed. When these people were being oppressed, the court system had become corrupt and therefore subject to God’s corporate negative sanctions.

Socialism and the welfare state indulge in this same sin, but in the name of the oppressed. Leviticus 19:15 is clear: neither the poor nor the mighty are to be oppressed by the law enforcement system. In both cases, the state has become the oppressor.

Conclusion

The essence of oppression under the Mosaic law was the use of the courts to favor one person or pressure group over another. The context of the Mosaic law’s prohibition of oppression was the justice system.

When Isaiah came before the rulers and the people, he singled out the rulers as corrupt. He warned them that their repentance would require a turnaround from their misuse of the courts to oppress the weakest members of society.

6. Gregg Singer, The Unholy Alliance (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1975). (<http://bit.ly/SingerUA>)

7. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 14.

Repentance for the prophets was not primarily personal. It was corporate. The prophets did not come before individuals and tell them to stop doing evil things. They came before the entire society and told them all that they were corrupt. The supreme mark of their corruption was injustice in the courts.

The Social Gospel/liberation theology advocates are correct in their discussions of the prophets as reformers. The prophets were above all judicial reformers. But the reform they called for was a return to the Mosaic law. The Social Gospel/liberation theology advocates deny that this is legitimate in the New Testament era. So, in the name of judicial reform, they advocate either full socialism or the welfare state. They cannot find either system in the prophets or the Mosaic law. On the contrary, the Mosaic law affirms a private property social order that is the antithesis of both socialism and the welfare state. There was no central economic planning by the state possible in the decentralized social and legal order of the Mosaic law.

The prophets were neither defenders of pietism—souls-only redemption—nor the welfare state. They were defenders of God's specially revealed law: the Torah. They called for national repentance and national judicial reform. For pietists and liberationists to invoke the prophets in their respective programs of reform is illegitimate until they show exegetically how the prophets' call for a return to the specifics of the Mosaic law can be conformed to the agenda of either pietism or liberationism. The pietists reject the Social Gospel, and the liberationists reject pietism. They cannot both be correct. But they can both be wrong, and are.

3

DEBASEMENT AND ITS EFFECTS

Thy silver is become dross, thy wine mixed with water (Isa. 1:22).

A. A Conditional Prophecy

The theocentric issue here is obedience to God's law: point three of the biblical covenant.¹ But it is related to the law prohibiting false weights and measures, which was symbolic of honest judgment: point four.² The Book of Isaiah begins with a warning: Israel has rebelled against God. This is a prophecy against Israel. "The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib: but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider" (1:3). Yet Isaiah did not mention the northern kingdom. He referred to "the faithful city," which has to be Jerusalem, a city of Judah, the southern kingdom. So, the prophecy has to be regarded as one that encompasses both kingdoms, Israel and Judah.

Isaiah's prophecy was conditional. It has the characteristic feature of offering a way of escape from the negative corporate sanctions to come. "If ye be willing and obedient, ye shall eat the good of the land: But if ye refuse and rebel, ye shall be devoured with the sword: for the mouth of the LORD hath spoken it" (vv. 19–20).

He began with a brief summary of the origin of Jerusalem's plight. "How is the faithful city become an harlot! it was full of judgment; righteousness lodged in it; but now murderers" (v. 21). This points to judicial corruption. Isaiah described a process of debasement in history, with disastrous results. First, there was moral decline: an increase of harlotry. Over a century later, Jeremiah used harlotry as a metaphor for religious idolatry (Jer. 3). Isaiah did not make this connection. He spoke of harlotry as a sexual practice. Both Israel and Judah had gone from harlotry to injustice. The result of injustice was the corruption of the faithful city, where the Ark of the Covenant resided. The city was now full of murderers. There had been an increase in deadly crimes. The moral order had been corrupted by harlotry; then the judicial system was corrupted; then society faced rising crime. This corruption was, in modern terminology, a package deal.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

2. Sutton, ch. 4; North, ch. 4.

B. Comprehensive Debasement

This is the background of a very specific condemnation: “Thy silver is become dross, thy wine mixed with water” (1:22). What was dross? It was a base metal, meaning a low-cost metal. That which appeared to be genuine, a bar of silver, was in fact not genuine. It was corrupt. It looked valuable on the outside, but inside there was a low-cost metal.

1. Judicial Corruption

This image of debasement was used by the prophets as a metaphor of judicial corruption. This metaphor went back to a linked pair of Solomon’s proverbs. “Take away the dross from the silver, and there shall come forth a vessel for the finer. Take away the wicked from before the king, and his throne shall be established in righteousness” (Prov. 25:4–5). But most graphic of all was Ezekiel’s language, which looked back at the message of Isaiah, after the southern kingdom of Judah had been carried off into captivity by the Babylonians, the conquerors of Assyria, which had carried off several of the tribes of the northern kingdom in 740, about the time of Uzziah’s death. So, what Isaiah had prophesied as imminent for Israel had taken place a century and a half before the ministry of Ezekiel began. He described what had taken place to Judah in 686 B.C.

And the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, Son of man, the house of Israel is to me become dross: all they are brass, and tin, and iron, and lead, in the midst of the furnace; they are even the dross of silver. Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD; Because ye are all become dross, behold, therefore I will gather you into the midst of Jerusalem. As they gather silver, and brass, and iron, and lead, and tin, into the midst of the furnace, to blow the fire upon it, to melt it; so will I gather you in mine anger and in my fury, and I will leave you there, and melt you. Yea, I will gather you, and blow upon you in the fire of my wrath, and ye shall be melted in the midst thereof. As silver is melted in the midst of the furnace, so shall ye be melted in the midst thereof; and ye shall know that I the LORD have poured out my fury upon you (Ezek. 22:17–22).

Dross was for Ezekiel the metaphor of God's wrath. God had just done to Judah what the rulers of Judah and Israel had done to the system of civil justice. They had debased civil justice; so, God debased the nation's social order. Rich and poor, powerful and helpless, good and evil: all had been put into the furnace.

It was in the lifetime of Ezekiel that the invention of the coin took place in Lydia in Western Asia Minor. Small, round tokens of gold, silver, and a mixture of the two called electrum came into circulation in the second half of the seventh century. The date is commonly estimated as 660 B.C., a quarter century after the Babylonian conquest of Judah.

Verse 22 points to the "drossification" of silver. This could refer to silver in general, or it may have been limited to the monetary unit. In either case, the legal issue was fraud by deception. That which was debased was circulating as something valuable. This produced analogous results. The wine was mixed with water. The debasement of silver, the metal of honesty and trade, had led to the debasement of a representative consumer good. Why? Because monetary inflation is based on deception. This deception then becomes universal as prices rise. Producers cut corners. The illusion of high quality products is maintained, just as the illusion of high quality money is maintained. In the modern phrase, "what you see is what you get," no longer applied. What men saw was not what they got. They knew this, which was why Isaiah used the metaphor of dross. He knew they would recognize the connection.

In the passage immediately following this one, Isaiah extends his condemnation to the judicial system. "Thy princes are rebellious, and companions of thieves: every one loveth gifts, and followeth after rewards: they judge not the fatherless, neither doth the cause of the widow come unto them" (v. 23). There should be no doubt that the primary targets of his condemnation were the civil rulers. He is calling on them to repent: to turn around.

So, he begins with the judicial system in verse 21, moves to the monetary system in verse 22, and returns to the judicial system in verse 23. We should therefore interpret verse 22 as pertaining to civil justice. Yet to ignore the harlotry in verse 21 and the monetary practice in verse 22 would miss the point. Isaiah's condemnation would have made metaphorical sense to his listeners only if it was accurate historically. Harlotry really was widespread in Jerusalem. So was monetary debasement. So was product debasement.

2. Judgment as Fire

After summarizing the moral, judicial, social, monetary, and economic condition of the holy city, he offers a warning. This warning invoked the metaphor of the metal foundry's fire.

Therefore saith the Lord, the LORD of hosts, the mighty One of Israel, Ah, I will ease me of mine adversaries, and avenge me of mine enemies: And I will turn my hand upon thee, and purely purge away thy dross, and take away all thy tin: And I will restore thy judges as at the first, and thy counsellors as at the beginning: afterward thou shalt be called, The city of righteousness, the faithful city (vv. 24–26).

God's negative corporate sanctions in history are consistent with society's acts of rebellion. The extent of this debasement is universal, Isaiah said. Debasement encompasses sexual morality, judicial practice, criminal behavior, monetary policy, and economic production. But the sin went deeper: idolatry. "And it came to pass through the lightness of her whoredom, that she defiled the land, and committed adultery with stones and with sticks" (Jer. 3:9). With stones and sticks they had constructed idols. This was the ultimate debasement. Isaiah warned both nations that God's negative corporate sanction—captivity—will match this supreme debasement: idolatry. This sanction was imminent for the northern kingdom.

The southern kingdom did not learn from the experience of the northern kingdom. Jeremiah reminded them over a century later:

The LORD said also unto me in the days of Josiah the king, Hast thou seen that which backsliding Israel hath done? she is gone up upon every high mountain and under every green tree, and there hath played the harlot. And I said after she had done all these things, Turn thou unto me. But she returned not. And her treacherous sister Judah saw it. And I saw, when for all the causes whereby backsliding Israel committed adultery I had put her away, and given her a bill of divorce; yet her treacherous sister Judah feared not, but went and played the harlot also (Jer. 3:6–8).

C. Monetary Inflation as Debasement

“Thy silver is become dross, thy wine mixed with water.” This two-fold description of debasement could be interpreted as two separate, unrelated conditions. But Isaiah had just argued systematically for a causal relationship among harlotry, judicial corruption, and murder. Why would he switch at this point to identify two additional yet unrelated aspects of Israelite society? The closeness of the description in this verse indicates that it is a single process. But how? What has silver got to do with wine?

Debasement is a form of counterfeiting. The public expects the number of currency units to be limited in circulation. Only if there are exports of goods and services to foreign countries should there be an increase in the number of currency units in the domestic economy, unless someone has discovered a gold or silver mine. So, people bid for goods and services on the assumption of a relatively stable currency.

Then a counterfeiter finds a way to increase his purchase of goods by means of spending newly created money. It is cheaper for him to create these monetary units than it is for him to earn them by producing something of value. These new currency units look like all the others, but they are not the same. They are more plentiful because they contain base metals.

As they circulate, prices of goods and services begin to rise slightly. The counterfeiter buys at yesterday’s prices. But as more counterfeiters enter the markets with newly created money, prices rise more rapidly. People on fixed incomes are hurt. They must pay more for what they buy. Those who get early access to the new currency units buy cheaper than those who get access late. Wealth is transferred from some groups to other groups.

As the counterfeiting process continues, more and more people lose confidence in the value of domestic money. They search for ways to hedge against price inflation. They go into debt, so as to pay off loans with cheaper money. Lenders then seek to protect themselves by raising long-term interest rates.

As prices rise, sellers of goods seek to keep ahead of rising costs. But rising prices may meet resistance from buyers. So, sellers imitate the counterfeiters. They reduce the quality of their goods. They use cheaper inputs. They cut costs by cutting corners. Their goods look the same, just as the monetary units look the same. A debasement process spreads to the manufacturing sector.

This is what happened in Israel in Isaiah's time. Cheating through debasement had become a way of life. What looks like a high-quality item is in fact a lower-quality item. It is debasement through deception. On the surface, things appear to be the same. In reality, things are not the same.

D. Corrupt Rulers

Isaiah's focus was moral and judicial. He began with a consideration of harlotry. Then he moved to civil law. Then he moved to social chaos: murderers. Only then did he take up the issue of product debasement. Then he returned to civil law. "Thy princes are rebellious, and companions of thieves: every one loveth gifts, and followeth after rewards: they judge not the fatherless, neither doth the cause of the widow come unto them" (v. 23).

The decline was first manifested in sexual debauchery. Then it moved to politics. Then it moved to economics. What began as a personal sin spread to the rest of society. The acceptance of harlotry by the general public corrupted the rulers. The public turned a blind eye to sin within the gates. Then the rulers indulged themselves, for they were in a position to gain what they wanted because they possessed power.

Isaiah said that the princes are profiting from the corruption of civil law. They seek bribes. They are offered bribes. The text does not say that the government debased the silver. It does not identify the source of the debasing. What is clear from the passage is that the civil government did nothing to stop it. It allowed false weights and measures. This is the essence of judicial sin, as the Mosaic law stated.

Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, in meteyard, in weight, or in measure. Just balances, just weights, a just ephah, and a just hin, shall ye have: I am the LORD your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt (Lev. 19:35–36).³

Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, a great and a small. Thou shalt not have in thine house divers measures, a great and a small. But thou shalt have a perfect and just weight, a perfect and just measure shalt thou have: that thy days may be lengthened in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee. For all that do such things, and all that do unrighteously, are an abomination unto the LORD thy

3. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 19.

God (Deut. 25:13–16).⁴

Solomon returned to this theme. “Divers weights, and divers measures, both of them are alike abomination to the LORD” (Prov. 20:10).⁵ “Divers weights are an abomination unto the LORD; and a false balance is not good” (Prov. 20:23). The mark of righteous government is constancy in weights and measures.

A divine sentence is in the lips of the king: his mouth transgresseth not in judgment. A just weight and balance are the LORD’S: all the weights of the bag are his work. It is an abomination to kings to commit wickedness: for the throne is established by righteousness (Prov. 16:10–12).⁶

Isaiah came before the nation and pointed to the evidence of widespread corruption in society. This evidence was as close at hand as the money used in transactions. The monetary unit testified against the nation, but above all, the rulers. The rulers had consented to the debasement of weights and measures. As the law in Leviticus warned, unrighteousness in judgment would be reflected in false weights and measures.

In most societies, the state has insisted on a monopoly of money creation. This is justified in the name of honest money. Counterfeiting is illegal. The civil government is pictured as beyond temptation. Yet, with only the exception of the Byzantine empire (325–1453), all civil governments have corrupted the currency. They have sought to spend more money than they collect in taxes or borrow. All national currency units end up debased. Civil governments can no more resist the short-run benefits of monetary debasement than private counterfeiters can. No one can prosecute the civil government for fraud.

Civil governments should declare the legal standard—weight and fineness—for coins acceptable for the payment of taxes, including warehouse receipts to coins. Then the civil government should open the market to all producers of coins or issuers of warehouse receipts. The state should prosecute those producers of coins or bullion who debase the various private currency units. Producers would also have an incentive to monitor each other’s production, reporting to the civil authorities every known infraction by a rival. The cost of policing the monetary unit would be decentralized and overwhelmingly privatized.

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 65.

5. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 57.

6. Ibid., ch. 52.

This procedure would apply to all banks. No bank would be allowed to issue more warehouse receipts for deposited precious metal coins or bullion than it has in reserve. Banks would profit from storage fees and other services. They would not profit by lending warehouse receipts for precious metals that they did not have in storage. Second, no bank would be allowed to lend money for any period of time unless the depositor has surrendered in writing his legal right to withdraw his funds on demand during this loan period. This is 100% reserve banking—no counterfeiting.⁷ This is how the Bank of Amsterdam operated for 170 years, 1609–1780.⁸

Civil rulers want to be able to debase the nation's coinage so as to increase spending without raising visible taxes. They also want banks to buy government debt. So, they retain a monopoly over the coinage, so as to monopolize counterfeiting. Second, they legalize fractional reserve commercial banking. Third, they grant to a national central bank a monopoly over money creation by commercial banks. This agency promises commercial bankers to protect them from bank runs by depositors, and it promises the government to “make a market” for the government's debt, i.e., buy the debt with newly created fiat money. Banks are allowed to operate in terms of fractional reserves: issuing promises to pay gold coins on demand, when in fact all depositors cannot redeem these promises on the same day because there are insufficient reserves. The result is monetary inflation, then price inflation, and then the boom-bust business cycle.⁹

Conclusion

Isaiah was clear: Israel's civil government was corrupt. The rulers had followed a path to moral corruption personally. Then they compromised with criminals. By Isaiah's day, the corruption was universal.

7. Murray N. Rothbard, “The Case for a 100% Gold Dollar,” in Leland B. Yeager (ed.), In Search of a Monetary Constitution (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1962), pp. 94–136. (<http://mises.org/story/1829>)

8. Jesús Huerta de Soto, Money, Bank Credit, and Economic Cycles (Auburn, Alabama: Ludwig von Mises Institute, [2002] 2006), pp. 98–106. (<http://mises.org/books/desoto.pdf>)

9. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), chaps. 19, 20. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>) Murray N. Rothbard, What Has Government Done to Our Money? (Auburn, Alabama: Ludwig von Mises Institute, [1964] 2010). (<http://bit.ly/mrmoney>)

The rulers had even debased the money supply. By fostering debased money, judicial corruption had also fostered debased quality standards governing production. Quality was declining because prior quality standards were no longer being honored. Private producers had begun to cut corners. Israel was foreshadowing the economy of the Soviet Union, in which this slogan was familiar: “The government pretends to pay us, and we pretend to work.”

Isaiah warned that God would bring corporate negative sanctions in response to this corruption. The symbol of these sanctions was the metal worker’s furnace. “I will turn my hand upon thee, and purely purge away thy dross, and take away all thy tin.” The historical form would be captivity: the northern kingdom fell to Assyria; the southern kingdom fell to Babylon. This followed God’s warning, given through Moses. “Thou shalt beget sons and daughters, but thou shalt not enjoy them; for they shall go into captivity” (Deut. 28:41). After the return to the land by a small remnant, they would be ruled by foreign empires. That, too, had been promised by God.

The stranger that is within thee shall get up above thee very high; and thou shalt come down very low. He shall lend to thee, and thou shalt not lend to him: he shall be the head, and thou shalt be the tail. Moreover all these curses shall come upon thee, and shall pursue thee, and overtake thee, till thou be destroyed; because thou hearkenedst not unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to keep his commandments and his statutes which he commanded thee: And they shall be upon thee for a sign and for a wonder, and upon thy seed for ever (Deut. 28:43–46).¹⁰

10. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 70.

4

PROSPERITY WITH IDOLS

Therefore thou hast forsaken thy people the house of Jacob, because they be replenished from the east, and are soothsayers like the Philistines, and they please themselves in the children of strangers. Their land also is full of silver and gold, neither is there any end of their treasures; their land is also full of horses, neither is there any end of their chariots. Their land also is full of idols; they worship the work of their own hands, that which their own fingers have made. And the mean man boweth down, and the great man humbleth himself: therefore forgive them not (Isa. 2:6–8).

A. Covenant Lawsuit

The theocentric issue here was idolatry, a false hierarchy. Hierarchy is point two of the biblical covenant.¹ Isaiah here speaks to God in the presence of listeners. He acted as an intermediary: a representative of God. This description of the condition of the nation is an introduction to his lengthy condemnation of the nation. He gives them fair warning.

Enter into the rock, and hide thee in the dust, for fear of the LORD, and for the glory of his majesty. The lofty looks of man shall be humbled, and the haughtiness of men shall be bowed down, and the LORD alone shall be exalted in that day. For the day of the LORD of hosts shall be upon every one that is proud and lofty, and upon every one that is lifted up; and he shall be brought low (vv. 10–12).

Negative corporate sanctions are coming, he says. These sanctions will disabuse them of their trust in themselves and in their idols.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

And the loftiness of man shall be bowed down, and the haughtiness of men shall be made low: and the LORD alone shall be exalted in that day. And the idols he shall utterly abolish. And they shall go into the holes of the rocks, and into the caves of the earth, for fear of the LORD, and for the glory of his majesty, when he ariseth to shake terribly the earth. In that day a man shall cast his idols of silver, and his idols of gold, which they made each one for himself to worship, to the moles and to the bats; To go into the clefts of the rocks, and into the tops of the ragged rocks, for fear of the LORD, and for the glory of his majesty, when he ariseth to shake terribly the earth (vv. 17–21).

The nation was so rich that individuals could afford to make household idols out of precious metals. Although these idols were seen as gateways or mediators to supernatural forces, they declared the co-sovereignty of man, for it was men who made these idols. “They worship the work of their own hands, that which their own fingers have made.” So, Isaiah ends this prophecy with a phrase that has been cited for generations. “Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils: for wherein is he to be accounted of” (v. 22)?

B. Covenant-Breaking Prosperity

Isaiah makes clear the covenantal foundations of Israel’s prosperity: covenant-breaking. First, the land is filled with idols. These were not idols built by the governments of Israel, civil and ecclesiastical. Uzziah was generally a righteous king (II Kings 15:34). So was his son (II Chron. 26:4). So, these idols are household idols. These households had gold and silver to decorate the works of their hands.

Second, “their land is also full of horses, neither is there any end of their chariots.” Horses and chariots were prohibited to kings by the Mosaic law (Deut. 17:16).² These were offensive weapons. The kings were not to accumulate such weapons.

The text does not reveal whether Uzziah obeyed these restrictions, but it is likely that he did not. Solomon had disobeyed them with a vengeance. “And Solomon gathered together chariots and horsemen: and he had a thousand and four hundred chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen, whom he bestowed in the cities for chariots, and with the king at Jerusalem” (I Kings 10:26). Jehosaphat had gone to war against Syria alongside Ahab, who was mortally wounded in his chariot (I Kings 22:34).

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 42.

Josiah was the first king after Solomon who is said to have self-consciously obeyed the law in this regard. "And he took away the horses that the kings of Judah had given to the sun, at the entering in of the house of the LORD, by the chamber of Nathan-melech the chamberlain, which was in the suburbs, and burned the chariots of the sun with fire" (II Kings 23:11). His kingship was late. Judah fell to Babylon about 23 years after his death.

There were no restrictions in the Mosaic law regarding the private ownership of these weapons. Here, we see a unique aspect of the Mosaic law. Citizens, tribes, cities, and even strangers were allowed to possess weaponry that the king, as the nation's commander of God's holy army, was not allowed to own.³ This was another aspect of the decentralized political order under the Mosaic law.

In his prophecy regarding God's corporate negative sanctions, Isaiah did not say that the chariots will be abandoned by fearful covenant-breakers. Idols will be abandoned; chariots are not mentioned. It is clear from the text that privately owned horses and chariots will not protect the Israelites from captivity. Nothing will protect them. Isaiah cried out to God, "therefore forgive them not." God hearkened to Isaiah's prayer.

Horses and chariots were expensive. If individuals had bought them, then there was great wealth in the nation.

Conclusion

The text indicates that the two nations' wealth was dispersed widely. So were idols. This indicates that covenant-breaking does not lead to negative corporate sanctions overnight. It takes generations of economic growth to accumulate great per capita wealth. But the sanctions eventually come. Isaiah reminded his listeners of this fact immediately following his description of the wealth of the two nations. This wealth would be cut off by God. This came true for Israel within two decades of the beginning of Isaiah's ministry, meaning during his ministry. The northern kingdom went into captivity to Assyria in 722 B.C. This was not true of Judah. Isaiah's early years of ministry took place over a century and a half before Judah fell to Babylon in 586 B.C.

3. The Mosaic law was silent with respect to privately owned weapons. The general principle of the Mosaic law was analogous to the law in Eden: that which was not explicitly prohibited by law or a principle of the law was legal.

5

CONSEQUENCES OF OPPRESSION

For, behold, the Lord, the LORD of hosts, doth take away from Jerusalem and from Judah the stay and the staff, the whole stay of bread, and the whole stay of water (Isa. 3:1).

The threocentric issue here was God's judgment: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ This was a prophecy. The captivity of Jerusalem did not come until 586 B.C., well over a century after Isaiah spoke these words. But, in between Isaiah's day and the arrival of the Babylonians, the southern kingdom experienced a downward drift morally, as covenant-breaking became a way of life. Not even Josiah's three-decade righteous reign reversed this drift.

A. Inverted Judicial Hierarchy

The preliminary mark of God's corporate negative sanction of captivity was an inversion of the judicial hierarchy.² "And I will give children to be their princes, and babes shall rule over them" (v. 4). In the case of Josiah, who became king at age eight, this was a great advance. His reign had been prophesied over three centuries earlier by an unnamed prophet in the days of Jeroboam, the king who rebelled against Solomon's son Rehoboam. Jeroboam set up a rival altar in the northern kingdom. There would be negative consequences, the prophet warned.

And, behold, there came a man of God out of Judah by the word of the LORD unto Bethel: and Jeroboam stood by the altar to burn incense. And he cried against the altar in the word of the LORD, and said, O altar, altar, thus saith the LORD; Behold, a child shall be born unto the house of David, Josiah by name; and upon thee shall he offer the priests of the high places that burn incense upon thee, and men's bones shall be burnt upon thee. And he gave a sign the same day, saying, This is the sign which the LORD hath spoken; Behold, the altar shall be rent, and the ashes that are upon it shall be poured out (I Kings 13:1–3).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Sutton, ch. 2; North, ch. 2.

This prophecy was fulfilled literally almost 350 years later.

Josiah was eight years old when he began to reign, and he reigned in Jerusalem one and thirty years. And he did that which was right in the sight of the LORD, and walked in the ways of David his father, and declined neither to the right hand, nor to the left. For in the eighth year of his reign, while he was yet young, he began to seek after the God of David his father: and in the twelfth year he began to purge Judah and Jerusalem from the high places, and the groves, and the carved images, and the molten images. And they brake down the altars of Baalim in his presence; and the images, that were on high above them, he cut down; and the groves, and the carved images, and the molten images, he brake in pieces, and made dust of them, and strowed it upon the graves of them that had sacrificed unto them. And he burnt the bones of the priests upon their altars, and cleansed Judah and Jerusalem (II Chron. 34:1–5).

Prior to Josiah's reign, there would be a series of corrupt rulers. These rulers would reflect a social inversion which would be considered a curse. The social inversion would be a consequence of the moral inversion. "And the people shall be oppressed, every one by another, and every one by his neighbour: the child shall behave himself proudly against the ancient, and the base against the honourable" (Isa. 3:5).

B. Judicial Oppression

The text provides neither a judicial nor a moral definition of oppression. It also does not describe the specifics. Thus, we are left with only the Mosaic law as the source of our definition. This is not a liability. The Mosaic law was what the prophets invoked as the basis of their covenant lawsuits brought against Israel and Judah.

Oppression in the Mosaic law was marked by the misuse of the civil law. Corrupt rulers and corrupt citizens of the holy commonwealth used the civil government to gain unfair advantages over their neighbors. They refused to enforce the Mosaic law.

The negative model was Egypt. God told Moses, “Now therefore, behold, the cry of the children of Israel is come unto me: and I have also seen the oppression wherewith the Egyptians oppress them” (Ex. 3:9). God delivered the Israelites from Egypt. In the process, He killed Egypt’s firstborn sons, delivered their inheritance to the Israelites, and destroyed the Egyptian army in the Red Sea. When God revealed the details of the Mosaic law through Moses a few weeks later,³ he used Egypt as the negative model: “Thou shalt neither vex a stranger, nor oppress him: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt” (Ex. 22:21).⁴ The focus was exclusively judicial.

Thou shalt not wrest the judgment of thy poor in his cause. Keep thee far from a false matter; and the innocent and righteous slay thou not: for I will not justify the wicked. And thou shalt take no gift: for the gift blindeth the wise, and perverteth the words of the righteous. Also thou shalt not oppress a stranger: for ye know the heart of a stranger, seeing ye were strangers in the land of Egypt (Ex. 23:6–9).⁵

So, the essence of oppression in Mosaic Israel was the refusal of the judges to enforce the whole of the Mosaic law, including its specific negative sanctions. Thus, the prophets came before the people and their rulers in the name of the Mosaic law. They brought a series of covenant lawsuits against the two kingdoms. They warned of negative corporate sanctions which were inescapable unless the people repented.

C. Consequences

These negative sanctions manifested the predictable, consistent relationship between covenant-keeping and outward success, and covenant-breaking and outward failure (Lev. 26; Deut. 28). So, God told Isaiah to bring this message. “Say ye to the righteous, that it shall be well with him: for they shall eat the fruit of their doings. Woe unto the wicked! it shall be ill with him: for the reward of his hands shall be given him” (vv. 10–11).

The primary problem was the nation’s leadership. This leadership caused the people to sin. “As for my people, children are their oppressors, and women rule over them. O my people, they which lead thee cause thee to err, and destroy the way of thy paths" (v. 12). With greater power comes greater responsibility (Luke 12:47–48).⁶ Thus will come greater punishment.

3. A common opinion of commentators is that the giving of the law took place 50 days after Passover.

4. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 48.

5. Ibid., ch. 52.

The LORD standeth up to plead, and standeth to judge the people. The LORD will enter into judgment with the ancients of his people, and the princes thereof: for ye have eaten up the vineyard; the spoil of the poor is in your houses. What mean ye that ye beat my people to pieces, and grind the faces of the poor? saith the LORD GOD of hosts (vv. 13–15).

The princes—civil rulers—and the ancients, who were influential, are using their positions of authority to steal from the people, including the poor. God will not tolerate this indefinitely, Isaiah warns.

There is no question that the oppression was economic. The question is: How was this possible? The answer was simple: a failure to enforce the Mosaic law. But how had this taken place? Because of widespread sin in the broadest sense. "The shew of their countenance doth witness against them; and they declare their sin as Sodom, they hide it not. Woe unto their soul! for they have rewarded evil unto themselves" (v. 9).

Isaiah then identified the signs of the nation's sin: delicate, haughty women. He presented a list of practices that are an affront to God: sexual provocation, jewels, and high fashion. God will replace their beauty and finery with sickness (vv. 16–24). They will no longer be protected by their men. "Thy men shall fall by the sword, and thy mighty in the war" (v. 25). Jerusalem, spoken of as female, will suffer the consequences; "And her gates shall lament and mourn; and she being desolate shall sit upon the ground" (v. 26).

There was nothing new in Isaiah's message. Moses had presented the system of covenantal causation seven centuries earlier. It was highly specific.

The tender and delicate woman among you, which would not adventure to set the sole of her foot upon the ground for delicateness and tenderness, her eye shall be evil toward the husband of her bosom, and toward her son, and toward her daughter, And toward her young one that cometh out from between her feet, and toward her children which she shall bear: for she shall eat them for want of all things secretly in the siege and straitness, wherewith thine enemy shall distress thee in thy gates (Deut. 28:56–57).

6. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

D. Repentance

Isaiah does not bring a new message to his listeners. He announces that the negative sanctions revealed by Moses were still in operation. The same kinds of negative corporate sanctions that were listed in the Mosaic law would inevitably be applied to Israel and Judah if both the rulers and the people refused to repent. The fact that Isaiah invoked the same negative sanctions testifies to the fact that the required repentance involved a return to the Mosaic law. The civil rulers were required to change their judicial ways. They were required to apply the Mosaic law.

The central event of Josiah's reign was the discovery of the lost scroll of the Mosaic law, recorded in II Kings 22. The king, already a covenant-keeper, immediately recognized what was required by God: national repentance. The mark of this repentance was a restoration of the Mosaic law in the courts, both civil and ecclesiastical, Moses said.

And it came to pass, when the king had heard the words of the book of the law, that he rent his clothes. And the king commanded Hilkiah the priest, and Ahikam the son of Shaphan, and Achbor the son of Michaiah, and Shaphan the scribe, and Asahiah a servant of the king's, saying, Go ye, enquire of the LORD for me, and for the people, and for all Judah, concerning the words of this book that is found: for great is the wrath of the LORD that is kindled against us, because our fathers have not hearkened unto the words of this book, to do according unto all that which is written concerning us (II Kings 22:11–13).

Josiah's reward was that he did not live to see the consequences of a national refusal to repent, despite his leadership.

Because thine heart was tender, and thou hast humbled thyself before the LORD, when thou heardest what I spake against this place, and against the inhabitants thereof, that they should become a desolation and a curse, and hast rent thy clothes, and wept before me; I also have heard thee, saith the LORD. Behold therefore, I will gather thee unto thy fathers, and thou shalt be gathered into thy grave in peace; and thine eyes shall not see all the evil which I will bring upon this place. And they brought the king word again (II Kings 22:19–20).

He died in battle a little over two decades before Judah went into captivity in Babylon.

Conclusion

The context of Isaiah's warning against oppression was judicial. His definition of honest dealing was faithfulness in enforcing the terms of the national covenant: the Mosaic law. His definition of oppression was this: the refusal of the rulers to enforce the terms of the national covenant. Because the Mosaic law was not being enforced, it was every man for himself. "And the people shall be oppressed, every one by another, and every one by his neighbour" (v. 5a). Rebellion was universal. Repentance therefore had to be universal. It was not enough that the rulers repent. Everyone was required to repent. Otherwise, they would live in universal oppression until the corporate negative sanction came: captivity. This, too, had been part of the Mosaic law. "Thou shalt beget sons and daughters, but thou shalt not enjoy them; for they shall go into captivity" (Deut. 28:41). But this would not be captivity unto oblivion. It would be captivity unto restoration, Moses had prophesied.

And it shall come to pass, when all these things are come upon thee, the blessing and the curse, which I have set before thee, and thou shalt call them to mind among all the nations, whither the LORD thy God hath driven thee, And shalt return unto the LORD thy God, and shalt obey his voice according to all that I command thee this day, thou and thy children, with all thine heart, and with all thy soul; That then the LORD thy God will turn thy captivity, and have compassion upon thee, and will return and gather thee from all the nations, whither the LORD thy God hath scattered thee. If any of thine be driven out unto the outmost parts of heaven, from thence will the LORD thy God gather thee, and from thence will he fetch thee: And the LORD thy God will bring thee into the land which thy fathers possessed, and thou shalt possess it; and he will do thee good, and multiply thee above thy fathers (Deut. 30:1–5).⁷

7. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 72.

6

RESTORING THE JUBILEE

What could have been done more to my vineyard, that I have not done in it? wherefore, when I looked that it should bring forth grapes, brought it forth wild grapes? And now go to; I will tell you what I will do to my vineyard: I will take away the hedge thereof, and it shall be eaten up; and break down the wall thereof, and it shall be trodden down: And I will lay it waste: it shall not be pruned, nor digged; but there shall come up briers and thorns: I will also command the clouds that they rain no rain upon it (Isa. 5:4–6).

The theocentric issue here was God’s negative sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ Isaiah spoke in God’s name. He spoke as if he were God. The message here is clear: negative corporate sanctions are coming.

A. God’s Investments

God had loved Israel. Now He sang a song to the nation, which is elsewhere described as God’s son and heir.

Now will I sing to my wellbeloved a song of my beloved touching his vineyard. My wellbeloved hath a vineyard in a very fruitful hill: And he fenced it, and gathered out the stones thereof, and planted it with the choicest vine, and built a tower in the midst of it, and also made a winepress therein: and he looked that it should bring forth grapes, and it brought forth wild grapes (Isa. 5:1–2).

The language here is that of a husbandman who devotes himself to planting a vineyard. It takes time and capital to plant a vineyard. It takes work. The husbandman hopes for domesticated grapes with a specific flavor, color, and texture. In this case, his hopes were thwarted by the vines. He got wild grapes.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

As the faithful husbandman, God looked at the fruit of His labors. He found a bad crop. He asked the nation to judge the rightness of His cause. They had enough knowledge of God's law and His character to understand right from wrong.

And now, O inhabitants of Jerusalem, and men of Judah, judge, I pray you, betwixt me and my vineyard. What could have been done more to my vineyard, that I have not done in it? wherefore, when I looked that it should bring forth grapes, brought it forth wild grapes (vv. 3–4)?

This was the preliminary announcement of a covenant lawsuit. A covenant lawsuit always invokes the threat of negative sanctions.

And now go to; I will tell you what I will do to my vineyard: I will take away the hedge thereof, and it shall be eaten up; and break down the wall thereof, and it shall be trodden down: And I will lay it waste: it shall not be pruned, nor digged; but there shall come up briars and thorns: I will also command the clouds that they rain no rain upon it (vv. 5–6).

To maintain a vineyard's productivity, the owner must make constant investments: capital. God announced that He will no longer make these capital investments. The result will be capital depletion: wasted land. But this form of waste is better than the waste of reaping a harvest of wild grapes. This waste will at least conserve economic resources.

God had already done this in man's history. He cursed the ground with thistles and thorns (Gen. 3:17).² He ejected Adam and Eve from the garden, cutting them off from the tree of life (Gen. 3:23–24).³ He had placed them in the garden to care for it and to defend it (Gen. 2:15).⁴ They had refused to defend it against the serpent, so He chose to keep them from caring for it. Better to see the garden overrun by the wildness of cursed nature than to allow men to occupy it for evil purposes. Nothing is better than something whenever something is self-consciously wicked.

What was God's point? This: the existence of widespread coven-

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

3. Ibid., ch. 13.

4. Ibid., ch. 8.

antal rebellion. “For the vineyard of the LORD of hosts is the house of Israel, and the men of Judah his pleasant plant: and he looked for judgment, but behold oppression; for righteousness, but behold a cry” (v. 7). What form did this oppression take? Accumulating land. “Woe unto them that join house to house, that lay field to field, till there be no place, that they may be placed alone in the midst of the earth!” (v. 8).

God threatened to fill the vineyards with briers and thorns. He repeated this prophecy (Isa. 7:23–24). While God had placed man on earth to dress it, He was willing to let the land go back to wild nature rather than have it pruned by covenant-breaking Israelites. Better to have cattle keep the hills stripped of briers and thorns (Isa. 7:25) than to have ethically rebellious Israelites carefully prune the land.

B. Violating the Jubilee Land Law

The jubilee land law established a principle of inheritance governing rural land. Every 49 years, the heirs of those families that had faithfully committed genocide against the Canaanites would inherit the land that had been allocated by tribe and by lot: land that was not enclosed by the gates of Canaan’s cities (Lev. 25:8–10). The ownership of rural property in Mosaic Israel was based on genocide, and this principle of ownership was not to be violated.

So crucial was genocide to land ownership in Israel that two and a half tribes were not allowed to inherit land which the Israelites had conquered outside the boundaries of the Jordan River until they had fought side by side their brethren to kill everyone inside the boundaries of the Jordan. The Israelites had just annihilated several nations on the far side of the Jordan, but they had not originally done this for the sake of land. Those Canaanite tribes had unwisely initiated war with them, and the Israelites had destroyed them completely. Then the tribes of Reuben and Gad and half the tribe of Manasseh decided that they preferred the land outside the Jordan rather than inside. Moses told them this was fine, on one condition: more genocide.

And Moses said unto them, If the children of Gad and the children of Reuben will pass with you over Jordan, every man armed to battle, before the LORD, and the land shall be subdued before you; then ye shall give them the land of Gilead for a possession: But if they will not pass over with you armed, they shall have possessions among you in the land of Canaan. And the children of Gad and the children of Reuben answered, saying, As the LORD hath said unto thy servants, so will we do. We will pass over armed before the LORD into the land of Canaan, that the possession of our inheritance on this side Jordan may be ours. And Moses gave unto them, even to the children of Gad, and to the children of Reuben, and unto half the tribe of Manasseh the son of Joseph, the kingdom of Sihon king of the Amorites, and the kingdom of Og king of Bashan, the land, with the cities thereof in the coasts, even the cities of the country round about (Num. 32:29–33).

Land ownership in Mosaic Israel was grounded judicially in covenantal extermination. The exterminators' heirs were required by God's law to honor this covenantal foundation of property rights. The Israelite calendar was governed by the jubilee year. It re-set every 50 years. Year 49 was the jubilee year. "In the year of this jubile ye shall return every man unto his possession" (Lev. 25:13).⁵

The price of rural land was governed by this return of land to the families of the original owners. As the year of jubilee drew closer, the redemption price of land was reduced. Not to honor this pricing system was specifically designated by the Mosaic law as oppression.

And if thou sell ought unto thy neighbour, or buyest ought of thy neighbour's hand, ye shall not oppress one another: According to the number of years after the jubile thou shalt buy of thy neighbour, and according unto the number of years of the fruits he shall sell unto thee: According to the multitude of years thou shalt increase the price thereof, and according to the fewness of years thou shalt diminish the price of it: for according to the number of the years of the fruits doth he sell unto thee. Ye shall not therefore oppress one another; but thou shalt fear thy God: for I am the LORD your God. Wherefore ye shall do my statutes, and keep my judgments, and do them; and ye shall dwell in the land in safety. And the land shall yield her fruit, and he shall eat your fill, and dwell therein in safety (Lev. 25:14–19).⁶

This is the background of Isaiah's condemnation of the Israelites. "For the vineyard of the LORD of hosts is the house of Israel, and the men of Judah his pleasant plant: and he looked for judgment, but behold oppression; for righteousness, but behold a cry" (Isa. 5:7).⁷

5. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 24.

6. Ibid., ch. 25.

7. Chapter 6.

C. Grounded in Genocide

There is an old saying, "I'm not greedy. All I want to own is the land contiguous to mine." That, of course, means that he wants everything, one piece at a time. This was also the goal of successful farmers in Isaiah's day. They wanted to own their next-door neighbor's land. So, they accumulated land by purchase.

This may sound as though land accumulation is morally wrong. It is nowhere identified as morally wrong in this text. What was morally wrong was the nation's refusal to enforce the jubilee land law. It had become legally possible for high-efficiency farmers to buy the land of their less efficient neighbors. This was a form of oppression. Why? Because it substituted a principle of rural land ownership that was foreign to Mosaic Israel: ownership by efficiency rather than ownership by legacy. The legacy was specific: genocide. God had delivered their enemies into their hand. This was efficiency of military conquest.

This was God's testimony down through the generations. He is sovereign. He delegates land to those whom He chooses. He chose the Israelites. He hated the Canaanites, whose deeds were evil. He had instructed His people accordingly. "And thou shalt consume all the people which the LORD thy God shall deliver thee; thine eye shall have no pity upon them: neither shalt thou serve their gods; for that will be a snare unto thee" (Deut. 7:16).

Deuteronomy 7 records God's very specific instructions to His people regarding the Canaanites. Because sermons are rarely preached on Deuteronomy 7, it is appropriate to reproduce the passage verbatim, for it is unfamiliar to modern Christians. This passage was the judicial foundation of the jubilee's laws of inheritance.

When the LORD thy God shall bring thee into the land whither thou goest to possess it, and hath cast out many nations before thee, the Hittites, and the Girgashites, and the Amorites, and the Canaanites, and the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites, seven nations greater and mightier than thou; And when the LORD thy God shall deliver them before thee; thou shalt smite them, and utterly destroy them; thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor shew mercy unto them: Neither shalt thou make marriages with them; thy daughter thou shalt not give unto his son, nor his daughter shalt thou take unto thy son. For they will turn away thy son from following me, that they may serve other gods: so will the anger of the LORD be kindled against you, and destroy thee suddenly. But thus shall ye deal with them; ye shall destroy their altars, and break down their images, and cut down their groves, and burn their graven images with fire. For thou art an holy people unto the LORD thy God: the LORD thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth.

The LORD did not set his love upon you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people; for ye were the fewest of all people: But because the LORD loved you, and because he would keep the oath which he had sworn unto your fathers, hath the LORD brought you out with a mighty hand, and redeemed you out of the house of bondmen, from the hand of Pharaoh king of Egypt.

Know therefore that the LORD thy God, he is God, the faithful God, which keepeth covenant and mercy with them that love him and keep his commandments to a thousand generations; And repayeth them that hate him to their face, to destroy them: he will not be slack to him that hateth him, he will repay him to his face. Thou shalt therefore keep the commandments, and the statutes, and the judgments, which I command thee this day, to do them (Deut. 7:1–11).

As Otto Scott once wrote, God is no buttercup.

The Israelites in Isaiah's day had refused to honor the terms of God's national covenant. The leaders had allowed successful farmers accumulate land based on their efficient production: money to buy out their neighbors. Isaiah correctly designated this policy as oppression.

Once again, I must remind readers that oppression in Mosaic Israel was a judicial concept. It was the policy of refusing to enforce the Mosaic law. The Mosaic law regarding rural land was clear. The heirs of each plot were to inherit their share of the land in year 49. It did not matter how economically inefficient they were. It did not matter how little money they possessed. If they were heirs of the conquest generation, they were to receive their share of the land.

This meant that no family could lawfully accumulate land as an inheritance beyond the jubilee year. To do so, the family had to gain the cooperation of the civil rulers, who would agree not to enforce the jubilee land law. This was heart of the oppression identified by Isaiah. Rural land ownership in Mosaic Israel was grounded covenantally in blood: genocide. No other principle of rural land ownership could lawfully be substituted by the rulers.

This is not how other Bible commentators have discussed the jubilee land laws. The underlying principle of the jubilee laws—genocide—is unacceptable to the commentators. So, they search for other reasons for the existence of the laws. They refuse to go to Deuteronomy 7, which embarrasses them.

D. The Annulment of the Jubilee Laws

The reason why the jubilee law no longer applies is because Jesus annulled it in Luke 4. He read from Isaiah 61.

And there was delivered unto him the book of the prophet Esaias. And when he had opened the book, he found the place where it was written, The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, To preach the acceptable year of the Lord. And he closed the book, and he gave it again to the minister, and sat down. And the eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened on him. And he began to say unto them, This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears (Luke 4:17–21).⁸

With the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70, the Mosaic land laws disappeared forever. Nothing of the old land laws extends into the New Covenant. Why not? Because they were grounded in God's mandatory genocide of the Canaanites. There is no mandatory genocide in the New Covenant. So, anyone who suggests that there is some continuing role for the so-called "economic principle of the jubilee year" is necessarily also calling for a return to the genocidal foundation of both rural property ownership and permanent slavery (Lev. 25:44–46).⁹ Of course, he would deny any such motivation. He can deny the motivation all he wants, but if he refuses to cease calling for the enforcement of some version of state-mandated redistribution of wealth in the name of the jubilee, he is in effect baptizing New Testament genocide and slavery. He cannot legitimately have it both ways. He must either abandon the so-called economics of the jubilee year or else abandon a world that no longer recognizes the legitimacy of the inheritance of slaves as part of a slave-owning family's legacy to its children.

Conclusion

Isaiah warned his listeners against the sin of refusing to enforce the Mosaic law-order. Such a refusal constituted oppression. He went on to identify the violation of a specific case law: the jubilee land law governing rural property. The rulers had not enforced it. Thus, some families had amassed rural property. “Woe unto them that join house to house, that lay field to field, till there be no place, that they may be placed alone in the midst of the earth (Isa. 5:8)!” Woe also to the rulers who collaborated with these land grabbers.

8. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

9. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 31.

Without repentance, Isaiah warned, the vineyard known as Israel will lose God’s protection. It will be trodden down. It will be invaded. “Therefore my people are gone into captivity, because they have no knowledge: and their honourable men are famished, and their multitude dried up with thirst” (Isa. 5:13). This took place in the northern kingdom in 722 B.C. It took place in the southern kingdom in 586 B.C. It took place inside the land when it fell to Alexander the Great, and then Rome. Finally, it took place with the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Israel did not learn the covenantal lesson, namely, that there are predictable corporate sanctions in history, both positive and negative.

JUDICIAL CAUSATION

Woe unto them that decree unrighteous decrees, and that write grievousness which they have prescribed; To turn aside the needy from judgment, and to take away the right from the poor of my people, that widows may be their prey, and that they may rob the fatherless! And what will ye do in the day of visitation, and in the desolation which shall come from far? to whom will ye flee for help? and where will ye leave your glory? (Isa. 10:1–3).

The theocentric issue here was God’s judgment: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ The Hebrew is not clear in verse 1. The word translated as “write” is the same as the word translated as “prescribed.” The New American Standard version translates the phrase as “record unjust decisions.” The New English Bible reads “publish burdensome decrees.” The sense of the verse is that of a court which declares unjust laws and then publishes them by writing them down, thereby sending a message to future disputants. The message is that injustice reigns in the court. The righteous know in advance that they are expected to submit to unjust rulers and unjust citizens whose causes are favored by unjust rulers.

Isaiah warned such rulers of the consequences: “And what will ye do in the day of visitation, and in the desolation which shall come from far? to whom will ye flee for help? and where will ye leave your glory?” There is an underlying judicial principle being invoked here, one which was clearly stated by Jesus. “For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged: and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again” (Matt. 7:2).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

A. Judicial Cause and Effect

The Mosaic law established a system of negative judicial sanctions: an eye for an eye, also called the lex talionis. “And if a man cause a blemish in his neighbour; as he hath done, so shall it be done to him; Breach for breach, eye for eye, tooth for tooth: as he hath caused a blemish in a man, so shall it be done to him again” (Lev. 24:19–20). In modern terminology, the punishment should fit the crime.

When the civil government of any society refuses to honor this principle, God intervenes to enforce that which the civil government has refused to enforce. He imposes negative sanctions on the entire society. On what judicial basis? This: the people are responsible for the judicial sins of their rulers. This principle was set forth in Leviticus 4. The people had to offer atoning sacrifices for the sins of their civil and ecclesiastical rulers.²

Modern theology, jurisprudence, ethical theory, and political theory stand forthright against this principle of judicial cause and effect. All deny that God in the New Testament era brings predictable corporate sanctions, positive or negative, in history. They affirm that corporate sanctions in history are endogenous: self-generated. Corporate sanctions are said to have their origin in either nature or society. If sanctions originate in nature, they are not seen as sanctions. They are seen as impersonal and purposeless. If they originate in society, then mankind is seen as autonomous. David described this mindset.

The wicked, through the pride of his countenance, will not seek after God: God is not in all his thoughts. His ways are always grievous; thy judgments are far above out of his sight: as for all his enemies, he puffeth at them. He hath said in his heart, I shall not be moved: for I shall never be in adversity. His mouth is full of cursing and deceit and fraud: under his tongue is mischief and vanity. He sitteth in the lurking places of the villages: in the secret places doth he murder the innocent: his eyes are privily set against the poor. He lieth in wait secretly as a lion in his den: he lieth in wait to catch the poor: he doth catch the poor, when he draweth him into his net. He croucheth, and humbleth himself, that the poor may fall by his strong ones. He hath said in his heart, God hath forgotten: he hideth his face; he will never see it (Ps. 10:4–11).

David had a response to those who believed this.

2. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 4.

Arise, O LORD; O God, lift up thine hand: forget not the humble. Wherefore doth the wicked contemn [provoke] God? he hath said in his heart, Thou wilt not require it. Thou hast seen it; for thou beholdest mischief and spite, to requite it with thy hand: the poor committeth himself unto thee; thou art the helper of the fatherless. Break thou the arm of the wicked and the evil man: seek out his wickedness till thou find none (Ps. 10:12–15).

Isaiah here affirmed the reality of the Mosaic law's system of judicial causation. This affirmation rested on David's concept of God's judicial intervention in history. This was true of all of the prophets, including those who brought covenant lawsuits against covenant-breaking nations. Without the universality of this system of judicial causation, no prophet could have brought a valid covenant lawsuit to a foreign nation. Jonah's ministry would have made no sense.

Most Christian expositors have asserted or assumed that the system of judicial causation that undergirded the Mosaic Covenant does not operate in the New Covenant era. Yet we also find that contemporary expositors and especially politically liberal Christian political activists invoke the prophets' language regarding judicial causation. They then substitute politically liberal humanist causes for the statutes of the Mosaic law. They insist that Christians have a moral obligation to lobby for this or that political program in the name of Jesus. They cite the language of the prophets, yet they deny the system of judicial causation invoked by the prophets, the specific negative corporate sanctions promised by them, and the specific Mosaic statutes and penalties that undergirded the prophets' covenant lawsuits.³

Conclusion

Isaiah warned his listeners about what they could expect. Their rulers had acted unjustly with respect to the poor, to widows, and to orphans. These were the helpless members of society. He told them that God would bring desolation to the nation. There would be no es-

3. The most flagrant example of this sort of exegesis that I have ever read appeared in The Alabama Law Review (Fall 2002): Susan Pace Hamill, "An Argument for Tax Reform Based on Judeo-Christian Ethics," pp. 1–112. Hamill was Professor of Law at the University of Alabama. This article became the basis of a tax reform proposal pushed by the newly elected Republican governor of Alabama, Bob Riley, in 2003. He was a vocal Christian. "Alabama governor calls tax hike Christian duty," USA Today (July 30, 2003). The proposal failed when the voters rejected it, two-to-one, in a referendum in September, 2003. "Alabama Voters Crush Tax Plan Sought by Governor," New York Times (Sept. 10, 2003).

cape.

Predictable sanctions are basic to God's system of eternal judicial causation: heaven or hell (Luke 16), followed the New Heavens and New Earth of the resurrection or the lake of fire of the resurrection (Rev. 20:14–15). Covenant-keepers affirm this today. The prophets were unaware of this final judgment. There is an analogous system of temporal judicial causation. Most covenant-keepers deny this. The prophets affirmed this.

Christian social theory should incorporate the personal sanctions of eternity and the corporate sanctions of history. So should Christian economic theory. The fact that this still has not happened helps to explain why Christian social theory and Christian economic theory are not Christian. They are unstable hybrid mixtures of humanism and Christianity. "And what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel?" (II Cor. 6:15).

8

MESSIANIC JUSTICE

And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a Branch shall grow out of his roots: And the spirit of the LORD shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the LORD; And shall make him of quick understanding in the fear of the LORD: and he shall not judge after the sight of his eyes, neither reprove after the hearing of his ears: But with righteousness shall he judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth: and he shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked (Isa. 11:1–4).

A. A Messianic Prophecy

The theocentric issue here was judgment: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ This is a messianic prophecy. Later in the chapter, we read this: “And in that day there shall be a root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people; to it shall the Gentiles seek: and his rest shall be glorious” (v. 10). Paul cited this verse as having been fulfilled by Jesus Christ. “And again, Esaias saith, There shall be a root of Jesse, and he that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles; in him shall the Gentiles trust” (Rom. 15:12). So, we know this was a messianic prophecy.

Isaiah says here that the Messiah’s concern will be the treatment of the poor by the courts. “He shall not judge after the sight of his eyes, neither reprove after the hearing of his ears: But with righteousness shall he judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth.” The Hebrew word translated as “reprove” means “to judge.” It usually has the connotation of a negative pronouncement, often within the context of a court. The Messiah will judge as a king judges. He is the heir of Jesse, meaning a son of David.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

The text does not say that the Messiah will defend the poor and meek. Rather, He will judge them. But He will not judge them by what He hears about them or sees: their weakness. He will judge solely in terms of God's standard of righteousness. This is in stark contrast with the rulers of Isaiah's day. "Thy princes are rebellious, and companions of thieves: every one loveth gifts, and followeth after rewards: they judge not the fatherless, neither doth the cause of the widow come unto them" (Isa. 1:23). The messiah will be on the side of justice.

B. Unfulfilled Prophecies

The following has not been fulfilled in history: "But with righteousness shall he judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth: and he shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked." When will this be fulfilled? This question divides the major eschatological positions.

Amillennialists must interpret this prophecy as having to do with the final judgment. From the perspective of amillennialism, this reign of justice cannot ever be fulfilled in history. Christ did not fulfill it. He did not leave Palestine during His earthly ministry. He has not literally reigned over the gentiles. He reigns only spiritually, amillennialists believe. Surely, they argue, the church has never extended earthly justice on this worldwide scale. None of the three major branches of Jesse's branch—Eastern Orthodoxy, Roman Catholicism, and Protestantism—has ever ruled society in such a way that the other two have acknowledged either its legitimacy or its ethical coherence. So, this passage is a problem passage for amillennialism, which denies the eschatological possibility of a comprehensive institutional incorporation of the messianic kingdom in history.

Premillennialists look forward an earthly messianic kingdom which will last a thousand years before the final judgment. Yet we find no premillennial treatises on the details of the judicial system that will be imposed and enforced by Christ and His international civil court system.

Historic premillennialists—mostly Calvinists—do not believe that this messianic kingdom will be in any way related to the Mosaic law's mandated civil order. So, the legal order represents a major discontinuity separating the Old and New Covenants. They do see judicial continuity between the New Testament church and the future messianic kingdom. But they remain discreetly silent with respect to the judicial principles that will be enforced by civil government in the future kingdom. The medieval church used Roman Stoicism's natural law theory to construct its system of casuistry. So did a handful of Puritan and Anglican pastors in the seventeenth century, most notably Richard Baxter and Jeremy Taylor. Their detailed ethical systems were never widely accepted, let alone enforced, in Protestant churches. So, historic premillennialists are silent on the nature of civil justice in the future kingdom.

In contrast to historic premillennialists, dispensational premillennialist theologians believe that the messianic kingdom will be marked by a restoration of the Mosaic civil law. The discontinuity between the Mosaic Covenant and the New Covenant is emphasized by dispensationalists.² I can summarize the position's assessment of judicial theory. "The messianic kingdom will restore much of this lost continuity with the Mosaic era. Just as there was a major discontinuity between the Mosaic Covenant and the Church Age, so will there be a major discontinuity between the Church Age and the messianic kingdom. This discontinuity is so great that it would be a waste of time today to develop the details of the future kingdom. These details have no authoritative, Bible-mandated application in the Church Age. Christians alive at the end of the Church Age will be removed from history by the Rapture, so none of them will be in positions of authority during the messianic kingdom. The world therefore can and should wait for Jesus to implement His preferred legal system in person when He returns to rule the nations. There is no good reason to struggle to develop these details now, as through a glass, darkly, prior to the Rapture." So, there is no dispensational treatise on the broad outlines of the legal system of the messianic kingdom.

There is also no dispensational treatise on Christian social ethics for the Church Age. This is understandable. Because the categories and content of the Mosaic law do not extend into the Church Age, which the major dispensational theologians have insisted is the case, there is no theological basis in the Church Age for identifying one legal order as more legitimate than another, biblically speaking, because the New Testament is silent on such matters. Thus, we have yet to see a single published dispensational book on social ethics. Yet the movement began in 1830.

2. This is less true of the "progressive dispensationalists," who have yet to produce a systematic theology presenting their position. The position was developed in the 1980s. It has not been widely adopted in local churches.

Historic Presbyterian postmillennialism is tied to the Westminster Confession and the two catechisms (1647), as accepted by Scottish Presbyterianism in 1648. The key passage is the answer to Question 191 in the Larger Catechism: the conversion of the Jews. But the Westminster Confession and the catechisms do not reveal a detailed concern with civil government. What little there was did not survive the American revision of the Confession in 1787, which paralleled the writing of the U.S. Constitution in 1787. The Constitutional Convention began the week following the close of the Presbyterian Synod. Both assemblies were held in Philadelphia. Both documents were ratified by representative regional assemblies in 1787–88. Both documents reflected the natural law doctrines of the Scottish Enlightenment by way of John Witherspoon, who was the spiritual father of both documents, having been Madison's professor at the College of New Jersey (Princeton).³ The social views of historic postmillennialists were closely tied to nineteenth-century classical liberalism, which was an extension of the eighteenth-century Scottish Enlightenment. Their social views were not self-consciously Christian, nor were they grounded in texts from the Bible.

This leaves theonomic postmillennialism as the obvious source of such treatises. And so it has been: the New England Puritans during the first generation (1630–60) and Christian Reconstructionists today.

Conclusion

The prophecy was messianic. It pointed to Jesus Christ, who will serve as judge. This text did not refer to the final judgment. It referred to a restoration of the holy commonwealth after the captivity. "And there shall be an highway for the remnant of his people, which shall be left, from Assyria; like as it was to Israel in the day that he came up out of the land of Egypt" (Isa. 11:16). This was never fulfilled. So, its fulfillment must still be in the future.

The context of the prophecy was civil justice. This means the content was the Mosaic law. To argue otherwise is to argue that the prophets called on Israel and Judah to adopt a new law-order. For this, there is no evidence anywhere in the Bible. So, the prophets believed that justice will eventually be enforced in history by the Messiah. Their concept of justice was Mosaic—not Greek, Roman, medieval, Renaissance, or Enlightenment.

3. On the links between the revised Confession and the Constitution, see Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>) cf. Gary North, Conspiracy in Philadelphia (Draper, Virginia: NiceneCouncil.com, [2004] 2011), ch. 1.

The question is: When? Another question is: How? In person? Or representatively by His covenanted people? To what extent will the principles of civil law that governed the prophets also govern during the Messiah's reign? How do the principles of continuity and discontinuity apply? When do they apply? Throughout the entire New Testament era or only in a special future segment of this era: the messianic kingdom? These questions are rarely raised individually. They are almost never raised together. This is because the broad Christian tradition offers no answers to them. Men rarely ask questions that have not been answered for two millennia. They also do not ask questions whose answers will require them to serve as prophet-like men in an era of agnostic skepticism and Christian pietism. This is because responsibility is always a difficult thing to market. Jesus' account of the prophets was clear on this point.

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! because ye build the tombs of the prophets, and garnish the sepulchres of the righteous, And say, If we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets. Wherefore ye be witnesses unto yourselves, that ye are the children of them which killed the prophets. Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers. Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell? Wherefore, behold, I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes: and some of them ye shall kill and crucify; and some of them shall ye scourge in your synagogues, and persecute them from city to city: That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel unto the blood of Zacharias son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar. Verily I say unto you, All these things shall come upon this generation (Matt. 23:29–36).

It is not this bad for Christians in our day in most nations, although it is in some Islamic societies. But the typical response of covenant-breakers to the Mosaic law is one of disdain or contempt, as is the response of most covenant-keepers. Modern man dismisses God's Bible-revealed laws and then accepts the modern messianic state's laws. He therefore finds himself in bondage.

9

WITHOUT PITY OR PRICE

Every one that is found shall be thrust through; and every one that is joined unto them shall fall by the sword. Their children also shall be dashed to pieces before their eyes; their houses shall be spoiled, and their wives ravished. Behold, I will stir up the Medes against them, which shall not regard silver; and as for gold, they shall not delight in it (Isa. 13:15–17).

The theocentric issue here was judgment: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ Here, Isaiah prophesied against Babylon. This is a passage that appalls theological liberals. First, it is a prophecy regarding events that were two centuries away. The Babylonian empire will fall to the Medo-Persian empire, Isaiah said. The Medo-Persian empire did not exist at the time of this prophecy. Second, God identified Himself as the source of these corporate negative sanctions, which include the destruction of children.

A. The Ruthlessness of God

War is a period in which normal activities cease to be normative. Because war authorizes violence, the moral standards that prevail in peacetime are suspended by the rulers with regard to the treatment of the enemy. Ruthless acts that would be regarded as pathological in peacetime win medals for their perpetrators during wartime. That which the Bible identifies as immoral becomes commonplace on the battlefield.

That God would bring such negative sanctions against any nation seems inconceivable to liberals and pietists. Yet He did this during the conquest of Canaan.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

And when the LORD thy God shall deliver them before thee; thou shalt smite them, and utterly destroy them; thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor shew mercy unto them (Deut. 7:2)

And thou shalt consume all the people which the LORD thy God shall deliver thee; thine eye shall have no pity upon them: neither shalt thou serve their gods; for that will be a snare unto thee (Deut. 7:16).

But the LORD thy God shall deliver them unto thee, and shall destroy them with a mighty destruction, until they be destroyed (Deut. 7:23).

This destruction was to be total: annihilation. This was genocide. This destruction was not to be mitigated for the sake of personal gain. Achan discovered this after he hid some of the treasure which he had found in Jericho. The punishment for this was the annihilation of his household: adults, children, and animals.

And Joshua, and all Israel with him, took Achan the son of Zerah, and the silver, and the garment, and the wedge of gold, and his sons, and his daughters, and his oxen, and his asses, and his sheep, and his tent, and all that he had: and they brought them unto the valley of Achor. And Joshua said, Why hast thou troubled us? the LORD shall trouble thee this day. And all Israel stoned him with stones, and burned them with fire, after they had stoned them with stones. And they raised over him a great heap of stones unto this day. So the LORD turned from the fierceness of his anger. Wherefore the name of that place was called, The valley of Achor, unto this day (Josh. 7:24–26).²

So total was this destruction that the pile of stones became a memorial. The very name of the region testified to a time when God spared none of His enemies. The mandate was clear: total destruction.

This is not normal, nor is it normative for peacetime. But there is no doubt that God is sometimes utterly ruthless. In fact, God is utterly ruthless for all eternity, which is the message of the existence of hell and the lake of fire. He is to be greatly feared by both friend and foe. “The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom: and the knowledge of the holy is understanding” (Prov. 9:10).

2. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), Appendix A: “Sacrilege and Sanctions.”

B. The Impotence of Gold

Gold will not protect you when the Medes invade Babylon, Isaiah warns those who would be alive two centuries later. Zephaniah warned the residents of Judah a century later: “Neither their silver nor their gold shall be able to deliver them in the day of the LORD’S wrath; but the whole land shall be devoured by the fire of his jealousy: for he shall make even a speedy riddance of all them that dwell in the land” (Zeph. 1:18). The Medes will be committed to destruction. Their commitment will be single-minded. The invaders will not be dissuaded from their errand of destruction by offers of silver or gold.

Under normal circumstances, the offer to exchange silver or gold is taken seriously by the recipient of the offer. He evaluates the benefits available to him by becoming the owner of this silver or gold. He compares these benefits with the costs of surrendering ownership of whatever the offerer seeks. Negotiation begins.

In the invasion, prophesied Isaiah, a Babylonian will ask for his life. His life will be of little value to an invader unless the invader is harvesting a crop of slaves. So, the problem facing the future Babylonian will be that the Medes will not be interested in personal economic gains. Their goal will be the destruction of their enemies. By sparing a person’s life, the Mede would be compromising the military’s commitment to destroy the enemy. So committed to destruction will the Medes be, Isaiah implied, that the offer of gold or silver will be rejected. The individual benefit of exterminating one more Babylonian will exceed the value of the silver or gold.

A warrior is not a businessman. He is not motivated by commercial goals.³ A warrior has a different ethic. A businessman’s ethic includes such standards as adherence to contracts, a commitment to cutting costs, the legitimacy of profit—“buy low, sell high”—the legitimacy of “high bid wins,” a service mentality, a commitment to rationality, and self-interest. The warrior’s ethic includes courage, honor, comradeship, group loyalty, obedience to orders, controlled destruction, and steadfastness under fire. Without these, an army cannot win. A warrior is not supposed to surrender to the temptation of personal gain at the expense of his military unit.

There are exceptions. Every army has its unofficial experts in commerce, who do possess the skills of the businessman. They are unlikely to possess the businessman's ethic, only his skills of negotiation and entrepreneurship. These specialists operate for the benefit of senior officers in their own units. They benefit those close to them or those over them. An army would disintegrate immediately if all of its members were committed to these skills. But it would become very inefficient if none of them was. An inefficient army loses battles.

3. Booty is not commerce. He gets booty through victory, not as a bribe.

There is a common saying, "Every person has his price." This is universally true, as Jesus' parable of the pearl of great price indicates (Matt. 13:45–46).⁴ But this universal principle is applied differently in different circumstances by different people. The asking price of the invading Medes is honor in battle. The offer of silver or gold is the offer of a lower-value good to the warrior seeking honor in battle. He has a price, but the price must be paid by the victim's death. The more committed the warrior is to the warrior ethic, the less likely he will be tempted by an offer of gold or silver. In the view of the warrior, the victim has nothing of value to offer other than his own death. This does the victim no good.

In times of crisis, gold and silver may not help their owners: a terminal disease, a terminal military invasion, a terminal revolution. In normal times, precious metals have granted their owners opportunities to evade the effects of threats.

Conclusion

Isaiah told his listeners that Babylonians will someday face a crisis so intense that its silver and gold will not buy them out of danger. The Medes will be in no mood to truck and barter. Future Babylonians will find that they have put their trust in false deliverers: gold and silver.

This message reminds the listeners that God is sovereign. He is men's only reliable hope. Isaiah identifies God as being against Babylon. Its gold will not save it.

4. "Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchant man, seeking goodly pearls: Who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had, and bought it" (Matt. 13:45–46).

10

DELAYED NEGATIVE SANCTIONS

Woe to thee that spoilest, and thou wast not spoiled; and dealest treacherously, and they dealt not treacherously with thee! when thou shalt cease to spoil, thou shalt be spoiled; and when thou shalt make an end to deal treacherously, they shall deal treacherously with thee (Isa. 33:1).

The theocentric issue here was judgment: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ Isaiah here affirms the existence of a system of moral cause and effect in history. He brings a covenant lawsuit against the spoilers. They deal unjustly with people. They will not get away with it.

He speaks of the spoiler. The Hebrew word can be translated as “destroyer.” It can also mean “robber.” “The tabernacles of robbers prosper, and they that provoke God are secure; into whose hand God bringeth abundantly” (Job 12:6). It can mean “oppressor.” The psalmist sought deliverance “from the wicked that oppress me, from my deadly enemies, who compass me about” (Ps. 17:9). It is a negative term.

This person once defrauded victims. Nothing happened to him. He did it again. There were no negative consequences. There will be. At some point in the future, someone else will do to him as he did to others. The same thing is characteristic of the person who deals deceitfully. He is pictured as a transgressor. “The eyes of the LORD preserve knowledge, and he overthroweth the words of the transgressor” (Prov. 22:12). Isaiah said, “When thou shalt make an end to deal treacherously, they shall deal treacherously with thee.”

There is a temporal delay, almost as an echo is delayed. This delay persuades the covenant-breaker that there are no negative consequences in history. He gets away with whatever he is doing. This serves as confirmation of his assumption that God does not see his evil. "He hath said in his heart, God hath forgotten: he hideth his face; he will never see it" (Ps. 10:11). Because he regards God as blind, he also regards Him as impotent. God is supposedly not in a position to impose negative sanctions on evil-doers.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

The delay can serve either as a period for repentance or as a period of repeated corruption. Isaiah implies that this is a period of corruption. But, at some point, the sinner ceases to practice his evil. Those around him are no longer his victims. He lowers his guard. He deals honestly with others. Then, without warning, he finds that he has become the victim of someone just like he had been. The negative sanctions are imposed by someone as corrupt as he had been.

There is a saying, "what goes around, comes around." This is another way of saying evildoers reap what they sow. "Even as I have seen, they that plow iniquity, and sow wickedness, reap the same" (Job 4:8). "Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap" (Gal. 6:7).² The delay confirms them in an error: "There is no predictable cause and effect system in history." They become forgetful. They are not alert to those as deceitful or as oppressive as themselves. When they cease from their evil deeds, though not out of a change of heart, they find that their environment is not neutral. It is vindictive.

Isaiah affirms a system of moral causation in history. Ours is not a world governed by cosmic impersonalism. It is governed by cosmic personalism.³ The events of history may appear to be random, but they are not.

Covenant-keepers are therefore not to despair. They are to wait on God's judgments in history. "O LORD, be gracious unto us; we have waited for thee: be thou [our]⁴ arm every morning, our salvation also in the time of trouble" (Isa. 33:2).

This gives hope to the righteous person, Isaiah affirms. "He that walketh righteously, and speaketh uprightly; he that despiseth the gain of oppressions, that shaketh his hands from holding of bribes, that stoppeth his ears from hearing of blood, and shutteth his eyes from seeing evil; He shall dwell on high: his place of defence shall be the munitions of rocks: bread shall be given him; his waters shall be sure" (Isa. 33:15–16). The person who shakes his hands so that no bribe money passes into them understands the moral necessity of honest judgment. Bribery indicates that the context is judicial. This person is a judge. He turns away from evil. He does not listen to evil schemes. He does not let his eyes look upon situations in which he would be tempted to issue a corrupt judgment.

2. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 13.

3. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1.

4. American Standard Version, English Standard Version.

Conclusion

The oppressor will be oppressed. The deceiver will be deceived. The world is covenantal. It is governed in terms of an ethical code, and this code has sanctions. If individuals are not self-governed, then they will be governed by civil governments that impose negative sanctions. If civil governments are corrupt, then other agents will impose negative sanctions: evil-doers who find people to exploit who were once just like them.

There is no escape from the ethical standards that undergirded the Mosaic law. There is no escape from negative sanctions that are imposed by God when covenant-breakers do not repent, change their ways, and make restitution.

11

THE TRANSFORMATION OF THE WILDERNESS

When the poor and needy seek water, and there is none, and their tongue faileth for thirst, I the LORD will hear them, I the God of Israel will not forsake them. I will open rivers in high places, and fountains in the midst of the valleys: I will make the wilderness a pool of water, and the dry land springs of water (Isa. 41:17–18).

A. Theonomy and Society

The theocentric issue here was sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ These promises appear in the context of a series of promises to Israel. “Fear not, thou worm Jacob, and ye men of Israel; I will help thee, saith the LORD, and thy redeemer, the Holy One of Israel” (v. 14). The language indicates a complete transformation of the environment. “I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, the shittah tree, and the myrtle, and the oil tree; I will set in the desert the fir tree, and the pine, and the box tree together” (v. 19). This transformation had as its goal the widespread acknowledgment of God as sovereign over history. “That they may see, and know, and consider, and understand together, that the hand of the LORD hath done this, and the Holy One of Israel hath created it” (v. 20).

Is this to be taken literally? No. Why should God plant trees when the people who own the land can plant them? Are there fir trees in the desert? Pine trees? No. But myrtle wood comes from Palestine. There are olive trees inside the modern nation of Israel. They were not planted by God. They were planted by men.

Then what was the meaning of the passage? It asserts that God is behind the flowering of a wilderness. How? By means of His law. When men make peace, when their civil courts enforce the Mosaic laws governing property, and when men fulfill their contractual promises, society will be blessed. Productivity will increase. Wealth will increase. Out of the desert will spring trees. This promise has been fulfilled in the modern State of Israel. Irrigation systems, modern agricultural technology, and capital have made it possible for those living inside the borders of the nation to export agricultural produce to Europe.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

Then how does God get the credit? The same way that He did under the Mosaic law: through a widespread realization that God's Bible-revealed laws are the basis of the good society.

Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it. Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day? (Deut. 4:5–8).²

But what happens when men's faith in God is replaced by faith in the autonomous free market order? Or when they see civil law as the product of men's minds? Or when civil law is seen either in terms of universal logical categories of autonomous man, or else in terms of the political compromises of voting blocs? At that point, men move from the worship of God to the worship of man. Men cease to give credit to God.

This is nothing new, as Isaiah said in the remainder of the chapter. Bring your case before me, God tells Israel (v. 21). Give us your historical background (v. 22). Then tell us what will come next. "Let them bring them forth, and shew us what shall happen: let them shew the former things, what they be, that we may consider them, and know the latter end of them; or declare us things for to come" (v. 23). Israel cannot safely do this. God then renders judgment. "Behold, ye are of nothing, and your work of nought: an abomination is he that chooseth you"

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 8.

(v. 24). “Behold, they are all vanity; their works are nothing: their molten images are wind and confusion” (v. 29).

B. Miracles Are Not Required

Isaiah spoke of God as the source of blessings. God will provide water to those who are thirsty. This is a messianic prophecy. It may not seem like it, but it is. It speaks of one who comes to judge kings in God’s name. “I have raised up one from the north, and he shall come: from the rising of the sun shall he call upon my name: and he shall come upon princes as upon mortar, and as the potter treadeth clay” (v. 25). This person could be seen as Cyrus, but Cyrus did not come in God’s name. The next chapter speaks of this person in detail. “Behold my servant, whom I uphold; mine elect, in whom my soul delighteth; I have put my spirit upon him: he shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles” (Isa. 42:1). “I the LORD have called thee in righteousness, and will hold thine hand, and will keep thee, and give thee for a covenant of the people, for a light of the Gentiles; To open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the prison, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison house” (vv. 6–7). Jesus declared at the beginning of His ministry: “The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised” (Luke 4:18).³ He also told the woman at the well, “Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again: But whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life” (John 4:13–14).

Isaiah paints a verbal picture of God watering the wilderness. The land will bloom. This is not a prophecy of God literally planting pine trees in the desert. It is a prophecy of the transformation of the earth through the work of the Messiah. The Messiah will deliver prisoners from bondage. He will bring sight to the blind. He will call men to a great harvest. “Then saith he unto his disciples, The harvest truly is plenteous, but the labourers are few” (Matt. 9:37).

The poor need deliverance. This is the deliverance from sin and bondage. When this is accomplished through God’s grace, men can then begin the transformation of the wilderness. This will be seen in a literal blooming of deserts. This blooming is to serve as a visible verification of God's system of corporate covenantal sanctions. It is to reinforce the covenant. "And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth. But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day" (Deut. 8:17–18).⁴ This is why any assertion of man's autonomy threatens to restore the wilderness. Isaiah repeatedly offered images of the return of wilderness as an image of God's negative sanctions.

3. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

Yet the defenced city shall be desolate, and the habitation forsaken, and left like a wilderness: there shall the calf feed, and there shall he lie down, and consume the branches thereof. When the boughs thereof are withered, they shall be broken off: the women come, and set them on fire: for it is a people of no understanding; therefore he that made them will not have mercy on them, and he that formed them will shew them no favour (Isa. 27:10–11).

Thy holy cities are a wilderness, Zion is a wilderness, Jerusalem a desolation (Isa. 64:10).

Isaiah brings a message of judgment unto desolation, yet also judgment unto restoration. First will come the wilderness, then the restoration.

Upon the land of my people shall come up thorns and briers; yea, upon all the houses of joy in the joyous city: Because the palaces shall be forsaken; the multitude of the city shall be left; the forts and towers shall be for dens for ever, a joy of wild asses, a pasture of flocks; Until the spirit be poured upon us from on high, and the wilderness be a fruitful field, and the fruitful field be counted for a forest. Then judgment shall dwell in the wilderness, and righteousness remain in the fruitful field (Isa. 32:13–16).

Conclusion

Isaiah presented his message of restoration in terms of the miraculous intervention of God. God will provide flowing water in the wilderness. He will plant trees in the wilderness. Isaiah was not prophesying the advent of God as a kind of Johnny Appleseed,⁵ planting apple trees across the land. He is prophesying the coming of the Messiah, who will make men fruitful through God's grace and their own repentance. They will in turn go into the fields to reap a harvest. The imagery is that of miraculous intervention in a wilderness. The meaning is this: the redemption of entire societies. The fruitfulness of the gospel, when applied, will bring productivity to a thirsty world.

4. North, Inheritance and Dominion, chaps. 21, 22.

Jesus promised this to the woman at the well. Then she recognized how to begin: by bringing the message of His presence to people in her community. She was the new fruit. She was evidence of the transformation of the wilderness.

The woman then left her waterpot, and went her way into the city, and saith to the men, Come, see a man, which told me all things that ever I did: is not this the Christ? Then they went out of the city, and came unto him (John 4:28–30).

So when the Samaritans were come unto him, they besought him that he would tarry with them: and he abode there two days. And many more believed because of his own word; And said unto the woman, Now we believe, not because of thy saying: for we have heard him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world (John 4:40–42).

5. The model for the legendary character was John Chapman (1774–1845), who established orchards in the states of Ohio and Indiana.

12

INVOKING THE MOSAIC LAW

Who among you will give ear to this? who will hearken and hear for the time to come? Who gave Jacob for a spoil, and Israel to the robbers? did not the LORD, he against whom we have sinned? for they would not walk in his ways, neither were they obedient unto his law. Therefore he hath poured upon him the fury of his anger, and the strength of battle: and it hath set him on fire round about, yet he knew not; and it burned him, yet he laid it not to heart (Isa. 42:23–25).

A. Covenants Lawsuits

The theocentric issue here was sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ The prophets came before Israel and Judah to present a series of covenant lawsuits. God directed them to bring these lawsuits on His behalf. These lawsuits had a specific form: a list of national sins, a warning of coming negative corporate sanctions, a call to repentance, and a promise of restoration after a time of suffering, which would include national captivity.

These lawsuits warned of specific negative corporate sanctions. These sanctions were grounded judicially in the original covenant between God and national Israel. Every covenant has sanctions: positive and negative. The Mosaic Covenant's list of positive sanctions was much shorter than the list of negative corporate sanctions. The lists can be found in two places: Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28.

Here, Isaiah speaks of negative sanctions as already operating in the life of the nation. "Who gave Jacob for a spoil, and Israel to the robbers? did not the LORD, he against whom we have sinned?" The sins have been going on for some time. Preliminary negative sanctions had already been applied by God. The implication is that God had waited to send Isaiah to bring a covenant lawsuit until a preliminary manifestation of the negative sanctions was visible to all.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

There could be no legitimate doubt regarding the source of these negative sanctions: God. These sanctions were not random. They were effects grounded judicially in God's covenantal law-order. They were also not the exclusive result of conventional military or economic causes. They had come because of the actions of the people. "They would not walk in his ways, neither were they obedient unto his law."

To discuss the prophets apart from a detailed consideration of the Ten Commandments and their applications in the case laws of Exodus 21–23 is to avoid discussing the central issue of the ministry of all of the prophets: bringing a covenant lawsuit. Every covenant has stipulations. This means that it has laws that are based on an ethical system. Without stipulations and sanctions, there is no covenant.

God's covenant with Israel had stipulations. We call these laws the Mosaic law. They were the laws associated with national Israel from Moses to the captivity. There were changes in the law after the return of Israelites to the land. For one thing, the laws governing the inheritance of rural land changed. The gentiles who had been moved by Assyria and Babylon into the land were not to be dispossessed by the returning Israelites. Ezekiel announced this.

And it shall come to pass, that ye shall divide it by lot for an inheritance unto you, and to the strangers that sojourn among you, which shall beget children among you: and they shall be unto you as born in the country among the children of Israel; they shall have inheritance with you among the tribes of Israel. And it shall come to pass, that in what tribe the stranger sojourneth, there shall ye give him his inheritance, saith the Lord GOD (Ezek. 47:22–23).²

So, there were modifications. By the time of Jesus, Israelites lawfully celebrated the Passover apart from their families. Jesus' Upper Room discourse was delivered only to men (John 13–17).

The prophets brought their covenant lawsuits in the name of the Mosaic Covenant. "They would not walk in his ways, neither were they obedient unto his law." This rebellion had already brought on God's negative sanctions. "Therefore he hath poured upon him the fury of his anger, and the strength of battle." But Israel had not perceived the covenantal consistency of these sanctions with the Mosaic law itself.

2. Chapter 22.

“It hath set him on fire round about, yet he knew not; and it burned him, yet he laid it not to heart.” Israel was so far advanced in its covenant-breaking that the people had forgotten that the law itself had warned of negative sanctions. The Israelites were less covenantally self-conscious as the Philistines had been in the days of Samuel. The Philistines had experienced an outbreak of boils, city by city, as the captured Ark of the Covenant passed from city to city. Their priests said to send it back to Israel by a unique method.

Now therefore make a new cart, and take two milch kine, on which there hath come no yoke, and tie the kine to the cart, and bring their calves home from them: And take the ark of the LORD, and lay it upon the cart; and put the jewels of gold, which ye return him for a trespass offering, in a coffer by the side thereof; and send it away, that it may go. And see, if it goeth up by the way of his own coast to Beth-shemesh, then he hath done us this great evil: but if not, then we shall know that it is not his hand that smote us; it was a chance that happened to us (1 Sam. 6:7–9).

When the cattle turned toward Israel, the Philistines knew that their afflictions had not been due to a random plague.³ The people of Israel in Isaiah’s day did not understand covenantal cause and effect equally well.

The prophets came before the people to remind them of the Mosaic law: its statutes and its sanctions. God is the source of Israel’s afflictions, Isaiah warns them. This was not a new message. It was built into the original texts of the law. This law was supposed to be read to the assembled nation every seventh year, the sabbatical year.

And Moses commanded them, saying, At the end of every seven years, in the solemnity of the year of release, in the feast of tabernacles, When all Israel is come to appear before the LORD thy God in the place which he shall choose, thou shalt read this law before all Israel in their hearing. Gather the people together, men, and women, and children, and thy stranger that is within thy gates, that they may hear, and that they may learn, and fear the LORD your God, and observe to do all the words of this law: And that their children, which have not known any thing, may hear, and learn to fear the LORD your God, as long as ye live in the land whither ye go over Jordan to possess it (Deut. 31:10–13).⁴

3. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 13.

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deutero-

If this law was still being obeyed, which seems unlikely, the Israelites did not take seriously the sanctions promised by God for disobedience. The prophets came before the people to remind them that what they had heard was not mere theory. It was a standing threat to their very survival individually. When God brings negative sanctions against the nation, they warned, many would suffer terrible deaths.

The nation ignored them. They were not taken seriously. The counsellors of the kings prophesied good times. The people wanted it this way. God told Isaiah,

Now go, write it before them in a table, and note it in a book, that it may be for the time to come for ever and ever: That this is a rebellious people, lying children, children that will not hear the law of the LORD: Which say to the seers, See not; and to the prophets, Prophecy not unto us right things, speak unto us smooth things, prophecy deceits (Isa. 30:8–10).

Conclusion

Isaiah warned his listeners that God had placed the nation under visible judgment. He told them that they had not recognized the source of their troubles. But why not? Because they had violated God's law with impunity. This was not natural law or the supposed law of nations. This was the Mosaic code.

They should have known from the beginning that God's negative corporate sanctions were coming. The law had spelled them out in detail. But they had paid no more attention to the sanctions than they had to the stipulations. In this, they were like contemporary Christians, who also pay no attention to the law's stipulations. They also do not worry about the sanctions.

13

THE PROMISE OF ABUNDANCE

Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money; come ye, buy, and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price. Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread? and your labour for that which satisfieth not? hearken diligently unto me, and eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness (Isa. 55:1–2).

A. Come and Buy

The theocentric issue here was sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ Isaiah tells the thirsty person to come and drink. He tells the person with no money to come and buy. Buy with what? With nothing. “Buy wine and milk without money and without price.” This cannot be taken literally. If you buy something, you give up the use of something else. If you buy something, you pay a price. This is what it means to buy. So, the verse was not meant to be taken literally.

He then asks a pair of questions: “Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread? and your labour for that which satisfieth not?” The implication here is that they were wasting their money. Bread sustains life. These people were spending their money on that which does not sustain life. They were not even getting satisfaction for their money. They were therefore wasting their lives.

He then calls them to change their ways. “Hearken diligently unto me, and eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness.” He begins the passage with a call to buy milk and wine without money. He cannot have been talking about milk and wine. He is talking about things that are more valuable than milk and wine, yet free.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

Jesus told the same thing to the woman at the well. “Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again: But whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life” (John 4:13–14). This was not a new message in Jesus’ day. It was the fulfillment of an old message.

B. A New Covenant

Isaiah then introduced the context of this offer of free food. “Incline your ear, and come unto me: hear, and your soul shall live; and I will make an everlasting covenant with you, even the sure mercies of David” (v. 3). This new covenant will be brought by a new leader. “Behold, I have given him for a witness to the people, a leader and commander to the people” (v. 4). The gentile nations will respond to this new covenant. “Behold, thou shalt call a nation that thou knowest not, and nations that knew not thee shall run unto thee because of the LORD thy God, and for the Holy One of Israel; for he hath glorified thee” (v. 5). There should be no doubt: these are messianic promises.

The issue here is ethics. “Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts: and let him return unto the LORD, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon” (v. 7). Here is true abundance: the abundance of God’s mercy.

Isaiah compares the transforming message of redemption with agricultural productivity.

For as the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater: So shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth: it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it (vv. 10–11).

The fulfillment of all this began with the ministry of Jesus. He twice fed thousands of people with bread (Matt. 14; 15). This was free food for the asking. Yet the bread He offered them was the bread of life.

Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Moses gave you not that bread from heaven; but my Father giveth you the true bread from heaven. For the bread of God is he which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world. Then said they unto him, Lord, evermore give us this bread. And Jesus said unto them, I am the bread of life: he that cometh to me shall never hunger; and he that believeth on me shall never thirst (John 6:32–35).

Jesus fulfilled the promise of Isaiah regarding bread. He brought the same message: redemption from sin. The people did not grasp this, any more than their predecessors had grasped Isaiah's message. "Jesus answered them and said, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Ye seek me, not because ye saw the miracles, but because ye did eat of the loaves, and were filled" (John 6:29) He warned them, as Isaiah had warned his listeners: "Labour not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life, which the Son of man shall give unto you: for him hath God the Father sealed" (John 6:27). They responded appropriately: "Then said they unto him, What shall we do, that we might work the works of God? Jesus answered and said unto them, This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent" (John 6:28–29).

Jesus later announced a new meal, which we call the Lord's Supper, in terms of bread and wine. "And as they were eating, Jesus took bread, and blessed it, and brake it, and gave it to the disciples, and said, Take, eat; this is my body. And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it" (Matt. 26:26–27).

C. Redemption

Isaiah again returns to the theme of thorns and briers. "Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree: and it shall be to the LORD for a name, for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off" (v. 13). The curse which he prophesied in Isaiah 5:4–6² will be removed, just as he said in Isaiah 32:13.³ Thorns and briers will no longer characterize the deserted land of Israel and Judah.

The language of agricultural productivity is used with respect to redemption. The hearts of the people will be changed by God through the message of His Messiah. This message of redemption will produce agricultural transformation. There is a relationship between covenant-keeping and outward prosperity (Deut. 28:1–14).⁴ The prophets reaffirmed this system of covenantal confirmation.

2. Chapter 6.

3. Chapter 11.

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

The modern world has rejected the relevance of this connection. Covenants are seen as primarily political. The covenants of church and family are relegated to the private sphere, as is the individual covenant with God. Moderns do not accept as operational the system of covenantal causation described in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. This includes most modern Christians. They assume that the laws of economics, if any, are separate from theological confession.

Conclusion

Isaiah here told people who lack money or assets that God had not abandoned them. God offered water for the thirsty and food for the hungry. But his language indicated that this offer related to spiritual matters. It relates to a messianic promise of covenantal restoration. "Let your soul delight itself in fatness."

Jesus fulfilled these prophecies. He gave water to the thirsty woman and food to hungry crowds. He did this as visible testimonies that confirmed His office as messiah. He did literally what Isaiah had declared figuratively. Then he moved His listeners back from literalism to ethics, which Isaiah had intended all along.

14

THE DECLARATION OF COVENANTAL LIBERTY

The Spirit of the Lord GOD is upon me; because the LORD hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me to bind up the brokenhearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound; To proclaim the acceptable year of the LORD, and the day of vengeance of our God; to comfort all that mourn (Isa. 61:1–2).

A. The Kinsman Redeemer

The theocentric issue here was sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ This passage is based on the jubilee laws of Leviticus 25. In the jubilee year, all leased rural land was to be returned to the heirs of the conquest generation (vv. 14–17,² 23–24³). The heirs of the conquest generation were also to be freed from debt bondservice (vv. 39–43).⁴ If an heir had been sold into debt servitude to a stranger, he could be liberated at any time by his nearest of kin, the kinsman-redeemer, through the payment of a prorated redemption price (vv. 47–55).⁵

This is a messianic prophecy. We know this because Jesus cited it in the first public presentation of His ministry.

And he came to Nazareth, where he had been brought up: and, as his custom was, he went into the synagogue on the sabbath day, and

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 26.

3. Ibid., ch. 28.

4. Ibid., ch. 30.

5. Ibid., ch. 32.

stood up for to read. And there was delivered unto him the book of the prophet Esaias. And when he had opened the book, he found the place where it was written, The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, To preach the acceptable year of the Lord. And he closed the book, and he gave it again to the minister, and sat down. And the eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened on him. And he began to say unto them, This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears (Luke 4:16–21).⁶

Jesus accomplished this by acting as the Kinsman-Redeemer. At the cross, He paid the price to redeem those in bondage. What was the task of a kinsman-redeemer? This:

And if a sojourner or stranger wax rich by thee, and thy brother that dwelleth by him wax poor, and sell himself unto the stranger or sojourner by thee, or to the stock of the stranger's family: After that he is sold he may be redeemed again; one of his brethren may redeem him: Either his uncle, or his uncle's son, may redeem him, or any that is nigh of kin unto him of his family may redeem him; or if he be able, he may redeem himself. And he shall reckon with him that bought him from the year that he was sold to him unto the year of jubile: and the price of his sale shall be according unto the number of years, according to the time of an hired servant shall it be with him. If there be yet many years behind, according unto them he shall give again the price of his redemption out of the money that he was bought for. And if there remain but few years unto the year of jubile, then he shall count with him, and according unto his years shall he give him again the price of his redemption (Lev. 25:47–52).⁷

This was the judicial basis of liberation under the Mosaic law. Someone had to pay the price if the bondsman could not afford to redeem himself. This is the case with all mankind. “For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?” (Matt. 16:26).⁸ Man has nothing of value to offer God. “But we are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags; and we all do fade as a

6. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

7. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 32.

8. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 35.

leaf; and our iniquities, like the wind, have taken us away” (Isa. 64:6).

B. Comprehensive Restoration

Isaiah made it plain to his listeners that he was talking about restoration. He used the symbolism of desolate people. “To appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness; that they might be called trees of righteousness, the planting of the LORD, that he might be glorified” (v. 3). A tree of righteousness is an ethically restored tree. He then shifted the imagery of desolation to geography. “And they shall build the old wastes, they shall raise up the former desolations, and they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations” (v. 4).

The supreme threat offered by the prophets was captivity. But this will not be permanent captivity. There will be restoration of covenantal social hierarchy: the righteous will be on top. “And strangers shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vinedressers” (v. 5). There will be a great reversal. “But ye shall be named the Priests of the LORD: men shall call you the Ministers of our God: ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles, and in their glory shall ye boast yourselves” (v. 6).

Such a reversal was announced by Mary when she learned of the meaning of her pregnancy.

And his mercy is on them that fear him from generation to generation. He hath shewed strength with his arm; he hath scattered the proud in the imagination of their hearts. He hath put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree. He hath filled the hungry with good things; and the rich he hath sent empty away. He hath holpen his servant Israel, in remembrance of his mercy; As he spake to our fathers, to Abraham, and to his seed for ever (Luke 1:50–55).⁹

These passages testify against the ideal of economic equality. The ideal of economic equality is the devil's own lie. It rests on the lie of a world that is not governed by predictable covenantal sanctions. It assumes that corporate obedience to God's Bible-revealed laws does not bring economic benefits, a denial of Deuteronomy 28:1–14.¹⁰ It denies that corporate disobedience to God's Bible revealed laws does not bring economic loss (Deut. 28:15–68). Every attempt to pursue the politics of economic equality is a defiant rejection of the Mosaic law, the prophets, and the New Testament doctrine of heaven and hell. Even in heaven, there will be inequality (I Cor. 3:10–15).¹¹ Even in hell there will be inequality (Luke 12:47–48).¹²

9. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 1.

10. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

The crucial issue for Israel was righteousness. “For as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth; so the Lord GOD will cause righteousness and praise to spring forth before all the nations” (v. 11).

Conclusion

The jubilee year began on the day of atonement. “Then shalt thou cause the trumpet of the jubile to sound on the tenth day of the seventh month, in the day of atonement shall ye make the trumpet sound throughout all your land” (Lev. 25:9). This was the announcement of God's covering of the sins of the nation. Only then could the year of deliverance begin.

Men's deliverance from sin is the essence of this release from bondage. When covenant-keepers grow like trees of righteousness, we can expect the great reversal of the social order. The foundations of this reversal were laid by Christ as the Kinsman-Redeemer.

11. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 3.

12. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 28.

15

NEW HEAVENS AND NEW EARTH

There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed. And they shall build houses, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them. They shall not build, and another inhabit; they shall not plant, and another eat: for as the days of a tree are the days of my people, and mine elect shall long enjoy the work of their hands. They shall not labour in vain, nor bring forth for trouble; for they are the seed of the blessed of the LORD, and their offspring with them (Isa. 65:20–23).

A. The Context Was Healing

The context of this prophecy was Isaiah's announcement of God's creation of the New Heavens and New Earth. "For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind" (v. 17). The theocentric issue was inheritance in history: point five of the biblical covenant.¹

Amillennialists argue that this is figurative language that refers to the post-resurrection world. The problem with such an interpretation is the fact that sinners will still be present. "The sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed." Saints and sinners will not intermingle in the world beyond death. Jesus, in His parable of the rich man and Lazarus, put these words in Abraham's mouth: "And beside all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed: so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us, that would come from thence" (Luke 16:26). So, the amillennialist prefers to avoid mentioning this Isaiah passage. It is the number-one passage in the Bible that refutes amillennialism. In his book, A New Heaven and a New Earth (1958), amillennialist Archibald Hughes took the novel approach of refusing to comment on this passage, despite the title of his book, and despite the fact that the phrase appears in the Bible only five times.² This was not an oversight. This was an admission of defeat. Other amillennial commentators spiritualize away the language. They deny what the text clearly says. They strip it of all reference to history.³

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

The passage refers to history. No covenant-keeping Hebrew would have argued otherwise in Isaiah's day. The prophets dealt with the present in terms of the historical future. They did not come before their listeners to warn them of judgment outside of history and beyond the grave. They warned them of historical consequences for covenant-keeping and covenant-breaking. Moses had done the same (Lev. 26; Deut. 28).

B. Long Life and Dominion

The standard greeting to a king in the ancient world was this: "O, king, live forever."⁴ No one meant it literally, nor did kings assume that anyone did. History imposes boundaries on men, and the chief boundary is time. Time is not unlimited, either for individuals or nations.

Long life in good health is a universally recognized blessing. This is why health care expenditures are a large percentage of an economically wealthy nation's expenditures. People can afford to pay for better health, and they do. This prophecy says that at some point in the future, long life will be widespread. Dying at age one hundred will be considered abnormal. "The child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed." This means that the years of productivity will be vastly extended. People will be able to master their crafts, or have time to launch and perfect new careers. Knowledge will not suffer the discontinuity associated with old age and death. The skills achieved by someone over long years of work will accumulate.

2. I commented on this fact in my book, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), p. 97. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

3. An example of this is Anthony Hoekema, The Bible and the Future (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979), p. 202. I show the weakness of his argument in Millennialism and Social Theory, pp. 98–106.

4. Deut. 6:10; 1 Kings 1:31; Neh. 2:3; Dan. 2:4; 3:9.

The downside of this is that the skills of covenant-breakers will also accumulate. The shortening of life spans from Noah to Caleb placed covenant-breakers at a disadvantage. Their societies are cut short. Covenant-keeping societies are not. “Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them: for I the LORD thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me; And shewing mercy unto thousands of them that love me, and keep my commandments” (Ex. 20:5–6).⁵ “Know therefore that the LORD thy God, he is God, the faithful God, which keepeth covenant and mercy with them that love him and keep his commandments to a thousand generations; And repayeth them that hate him to their face, to destroy them: he will not be slack to him that hateth him, he will repay him to his face” (Deut. 7:9–10). Continuity is an advantage to a covenant-keeping society. The church extends across generations and borders. Rival forms of religious organization do not. Where this is not the case, as with Islam, the conflict continues.

This prophecy refers to an era in which God restores long life spans because covenant-breakers are not dominant. Covenant-keepers are not threatened by this extension. This prophecy has to refer to an era in which saving faith has been extended to a broad majority of people.

C. The Fruits of One’s Labor

There will be consistency between reaping and sowing. “And they shall build houses, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them. They shall not build, and another inhabit; they shall not plant, and another eat: for as the days of a tree are the days of my people, and mine elect shall long enjoy the work of their hands.” This was seen in Isaiah’s day as a great blessing. I can think of no society in which it would not be seen by laborers as a blessing.

The great motivation for labor the hope is that it will produce valuable results. The person who works wants to enjoy the benefits produced by the final products. It is a curse when he who plants does not reap. It was a curse on the Canaanites when the Israelites invaded. God delivered their handiwork into the hands of His people, “to give thee great and goodly cities, which thou buildedst not, And houses full of all good things, which thou filledst not, and wells digged, which thou diggedst not, vineyards and olive trees, which thou plantedst not; when thou shalt have eaten and be full” (Deut. 6:10b–11).

5. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: A Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 22.

The fact that men will live in a world where the curse of Canaan no longer operates indicates the coming of an era of widespread covenant-keeping. Such a world is not an option for covenant-breakers, nor is it an option for covenant-keepers who are committing evil acts inconsistent with their profession of faith. Moses warned Israel,

And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God (Deut. 8:19–20).⁶

In an era of widespread covenant-keeping, property rights will be secure. Men will be able to invest time and money in developing their farms and businesses because the civil courts will defend their rights—immunity from seizure—as owners of titles to property.

This development will increase everyone’s sense of personal responsibility. The consequences of the actions of owners will be borne by the owners. This will make them more attentive to their actions than would be the case in a world in which others bear these consequences, whether positive or negative. The word “mine,” when enforced by courts and custom, leads institutionally to the phrase, “my responsibility.” This is consistent with the biblical concept of judgment. “The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers: every man shall be put to death for his own sin” (Deut. 24:16).

D. Guaranteed Productivity

It will not only be that covenant-keepers in the coming era will retain the fruits of their labor. They will also avoid wasting time and money on fruitless labor. “They shall not labour in vain, nor bring forth for trouble.” There is a reason for this. “For they are the seed of the blessed of the LORD, and their offspring with them.” This indicates that in a world marked by covenant-keeping, covenantal inheritance will reveal in history what it will reveal in eternity.

6. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 23.

This prophecy also indicated that in the long era in which covenant-keeping is not widespread, there is less consistency between labor and emptiness, between labor and trouble. Isaiah lived in such an era. “Then I said, I have laboured in vain, I have spent my strength for nought, and in vain: yet surely my judgment is with the LORD, and my work with my God” (Isa. 49:4). He had already prophesied that covenant-breaking nations would eventually be characterized by emptiness. “It shall even be as when an hungry man dreameth, and, behold, he eateth; but he awaketh, and his soul is empty: or as when a thirsty man dreameth, and, behold, he drinketh; but he awaketh, and, behold, he is faint, and his soul hath appetite: so shall the multitude of all the nations be, that fight against mount Zion” (Isa. 29:8).

Conclusion

Isaiah testified throughout his ministry to the system of covenantal sanctions presented by God through Moses in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. Covenant-keeping brings positive corporate sanctions in history, while covenant-breaking brings negative corporate sanctions. So, over time, covenant-keeping societies replace covenant-breaking societies. This is basic to the biblical concept of inheritance. The culmination of this historical process is presented in this passage.

Isaiah prophesied here regarding a better world to come in time and on earth. It will be characterized by long life in general, much longer life for covenant-keepers, private property, covenantal inheritance, and fruitful labor. This world is still in the future, but with respect to the increase of life expectancy, the extension of private property, and the increase in productivity, the West since about 1750 is far closer to literal fulfillment than anything that came before. The primary cause was the extension of the private property legal order, which was the result of centuries of Christian preaching against adultery, theft, envy, and covetousness. It is also the fulfillment of the fifth commandment: “Honour thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee” (Ex. 20:12).⁷

7. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 25.

INTRODUCTION TO JEREMIAH

Jeremiah's ministry was aimed at Judah and the holy city, Jerusalem. He preached in the era immediately preceding the Babylonian captivity. His book of Lamentations was written after the captivity began in 586 B.C.

Jeremiah is identified as a major prophet. Among the prophets, his book is second in length only to Isaiah's. We might expect to find considerable material relating to economics, but there is almost nothing. In Chapter 22, he criticized those who do not pay wages. In Chapter 32, he recorded his purchase of a field from a relative. In Chapter 34, he commanded the people to release their Hebrew slaves. That is the extent of his concern with economics. There is nothing at all in Lamentations.

Economic sins did not loom large in his ministry. Neither did God's threat of negative corporate economic sanctions.

16

NON-PAYMENT OF WAGES

Woe unto him that buildeth his house by unrighteousness, and his chambers by wrong; that useth his neighbour's service without wages, and giveth him not for his work; That saith, I will build me a wide house and large chambers, and putteth him out windows; and it is cieled with cedar, and painted with vermilion. Shalt thou reign, because thou closest thyself in cedar? did not thy father eat and drink, and do judgment and justice, and then it was well with him? He judged the cause of the poor and needy; then it was well with him: was not this to know me? saith the LORD. But thine eyes and thine heart are not but for thy covetousness, and for to shed innocent blood, and for oppression, and for violence, to do it (Jer. 22:13–17).

The theocentric issue here was sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ The economic crime mentioned here involved the non-payment of wages. “Woe unto him that buildeth his house by unrighteousness, and his chambers by wrong; that useth his neighbour’s service without wages, and giveth him not for his work.” This was a crime under the Mosaic law. “Thou shalt not defraud thy neighbour, neither rob him: the wages of him that is hired shall not abide with thee all night until the morning” (Lev. 19:13).²

How could an individual avoid paying his neighbors for their labor services? It might be possible to do this a few times. But word would eventually get out: this person does not pay wages. This sort of information spreads rapidly. The would-be employer would soon find that there was no one willing to sell his labor services to him. There would be a shortage of supply at the price paid: zero. The non-payment of wages was therefore not a free market phenomenon. Voluntarism would have made this practice uneconomical. So, what we have here is a system of compulsory labor. The house builder was using violence or the threat of violence against workers. This would have been possible only through the corruption of the civil courts.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 13.

Jeremiah asked a rhetorical question: "Did not thy father eat and drink, and do judgment and justice, and then it was well with him?" What was his point? Israel had become economically productive over time by means of justice. This meant civil justice. The forefathers had not been equally corrupt. They dispensed greater justice in the courts than this generation. "He judged the cause of the poor and needy; then it was well with him: was not this to know me? saith the LORD." This reign of justice had led to God's blessing in the form of economic growth.

In contrast, Jeremiah warned, the present generation saw itself only in terms of economic blessing, not its cause. "Shalt thou reign, because thou closest thyself in cedar?" They had causation backwards. They regarded the stepping stone to rulership as paved with the trappings of wealth. This wealth was the product of oppression, Jeremiah says.

Conclusion

This is the first economic crime mentioned by Jeremiah in his covenant lawsuit against Judah. This comes over one-third of the way into the written record of his ministry. This should make it clear that economic issues were not front and center in his list of accusations against Judah.

This accusation was a crime: non-payment of wages. It is theft. If a delay of one night constituted a crime under the Mosaic law, then refusal to pay was a far greater crime. This crime was part of a mindset, he said. People believed that the accumulation of the trappings of wealth would bring them positions of leadership. He asked rhetorically, "Shalt thou reign, because thou closest thyself in cedar?" The answer was no, they would not reign. They would be carried into captivity.

His ministry was straightforward. He warned his listeners that God's negative corporate sanctions were about to be applied by God on the entire nation. Why? Because these people had rebelled against God. They worshipped idols. They did not pursue justice in the courts.

These were indicators of imminent punishment by God. “And I will utter my judgments against them touching all their wickedness, who have forsaken me, and have burned incense unto other gods, and worshipped the works of their own hands” (Jer. 1:16).

This national evil had begun with the leaders. They had refused to enforce God’s law. “The priests said not, Where is the LORD? and they that handle the law knew me not: the pastors also transgressed against me, and the prophets prophesied by Baal, and walked after things that do not profit” (Jer. 2:8). This was comprehensive rebellion. Its cure would be comprehensive negative sanctions.

FAITH IN THE FUTURE

And Jeremiah said, The word of the LORD came unto me, saying, Behold, Hanameel the son of Shallum thine uncle shall come unto thee, saying, Buy thee my field that is in Anathoth: for the right of redemption is thine to buy it (Jer. 32:6–7).

A. The Right of Redemption

This is a difficult text to interpret. What is the meaning of “the right of redemption”? It is central to the text, yet it is unclear.

The theocentric issue here was inheritance: point five of the biblical covenant.¹ Under the law of the jubilee, an individual who was an heir of the conquest generation had the right of inheritance of rural land.

In the year of this jubile ye shall return every man unto his possession. And if thou sell ought unto thy neighbour, or buyest ought of thy neighbour's hand, ye shall not oppress one another: According to the number of years after the jubile thou shalt buy of thy neighbour, and according unto the number of years of the fruits he shall sell unto thee: According to the multitude of years thou shalt increase the price thereof, and according to the fewness of years thou shalt diminish the price of it: for according to the number of the years of the fruits doth he sell unto thee (Lev. 25:13–16).²

The general law of the jubilee was that it would occur in the year of the seventh sabbatical year. This was year 49, or the 50th year, in the same way that a person who just turned 49 is said to be in his 50th year.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

2. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 26.

And thou shalt number seven sabbaths of years unto thee, seven times seven years; and the space of the seven sabbaths of years shall be unto thee forty and nine years. Then shalt thou cause the trumpet of the jubile to sound on the tenth day of the seventh month, in the day of atonement shall ye make the trumpet sound throughout all your land. And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof: it shall be a jubile unto you; and ye shall return every man unto his possession, and ye shall return every man unto his family (Lev. 25:8–10).

This law was clear. A piece of land could be leased out, but there was a time limit on the lease: 49 years. In the jubilee year, family members of the conquest generation inherited their share of the property. But there is no mention of the right of redemption in this passage. The reference comes later in the chapter. “The land shall not be sold for ever: for the land is mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with me. And in all the land of your possession ye shall grant a redemption for the land” (Lev. 25:23–24).³

What was this right of redemption? It applied to the terms of the lease. The owner of the property or his relative had the right to buy back the land at any time. The price was fixed by statute: a pro-rated price based on the original lease price and the number of years until the jubilee year.

If thy brother be waxen poor, and hath sold away some of his possession, and if any of his kin come to redeem it, then shall he redeem that which his brother sold. And if the man have none to redeem it, and himself be able to redeem it; Then let him count the years of the sale thereof, and restore the overplus unto the man to whom he sold it; that he may return unto his possession. But if he be not able to restore it to him, then that which is sold shall remain in the hand of him that hath bought it until the year of jubile: and in the jubile it shall go out, and he shall return unto his possession (Lev. 25:25–28).

The right of redemption referred to the right of a close family member (the kinsman-redeemer) to redeem the property from the person who had paid the owner a flat price in order to take control of the land. With this in mind, we must now examine the nature of the offer made by Hanameel to his cousin Jeremiah.

3. Ibid., ch. 28.

B. The Offer

Hanameel came to Jeremiah and offered to sell him a piece of land. He said that Jeremiah possessed the right of redemption.

So Hanameel mine uncle's son came to me in the court of the prison according to the word of the LORD, and said unto me, Buy my field, I pray thee, that is in Anathoth, which is in the country of Benjamin: for the right of inheritance is thine, and the redemption is thine; buy it for thyself. Then I knew that this was the word of the LORD. And I bought the field of Hanameel my uncle's son, that was in Anathoth, and weighed him the money, even seventeen shekels of silver (Jer. 32:8–9).

This is inconsistent with the law of the jubilee year except on the following supposition: Jeremiah had leased the land to Hanameel. Hanameel had paid Jeremiah a flat price for the land. Now he wanted his money back. He would have been entitled to the pro-rated price based on the time remaining until the next jubilee year.

It is possible that this had been the arrangement, but it is not probable. The jubilee year occurred in the year of the seventh sabbatical year after the previous jubilee. Yet there is internal evidence in the book of Jeremiah that the sabbatical year had not been observed in Judah. The first piece of evidence is Jeremiah's condemnation of the owners of Hebrew debt servants that they had not released their servants, as required by Deuteronomy 15:1–6 (Jer. 34:8–9).⁴ The second piece of evidence is Jeremiah's assertion that the captivity to come was God's punishment on both Israel and Judah for their having failed to rest the land, as required by the same Deuteronomic law. Their time in Babylon would therefore be limited. "To fulfil the word of the LORD by the mouth of Jeremiah, until the land had enjoyed her sabbaths: for as long as she lay desolate she kept sabbath, to fulfil threescore and ten years" (II Chr. 36:21). Jeremiah would subsequently tell his listeners: "Their Redeemer is strong; the LORD of hosts is his name: he shall thoroughly plead their cause, that he may give rest to the land, and disquiet the inhabitants of Babylon" (Jer. 50:34). The indication is that Judah had not honored the sabbatical year of rest for almost half a millennium. Seventy years of captivity were equal to 490 (70 x 7) years of land without rest. If Judah had not honored the laws of the sabbatical year, it is unlikely that the nation had honored the laws of the jubilee, which was the seventh sabbatical year. Ten jubilees had passed without observance.

4. Chapter 18.

If this was the case, then Hanameel must have assumed that the sale of his land would be permanent. There was a 490-year tradition to this effect in Judah. So, he spoke to Jeremiah of Jeremiah's right of redemption, as if this right was Jeremiah's right as his nearest of kin. Jeremiah did not contradict him. He arranged for the sale in full public view. Yet there was no such right under the Mosaic law.

C. The Motivation

To understand Hanameel's motivation, as well as Jeremiah's, we must understand the setting. Jeremiah was in prison. He had been thrown in prison by King Zedekiah in his tenth year of reigning over Judah. He reigned under the auspices of Nebuchadnezzar, who had put him on the throne. After 11 years, he rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar (II Kings 24:17–20).

This was the eighteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign. He had led his army to besiege Jerusalem. Jeremiah had prophesied publicly that the city would fall to the Chaldeans. The king would not escape, he had announced, but would be taken captive and placed before Nebuchadnezzar. Then Nebuchadnezzar would bring Zedekiah to Babylon (Jer. 32:1–5).

It was in prison that Jeremiah completed the transaction with his cousin. Hanameel must have believed Jeremiah's message. He came to his cousin in search of liquid capital: silver. What good was land to Hanameel if he was about to be taken captive? But silver might prove to be very useful. He might be able to buy his way out of bondage, or bribe a guard, or buy goods that would offer a better life to a slave.

In contrast, what good was land to Jeremiah? He would go into captivity with his people. He would not be able to collect rent from someone occupying the land, assuming anyone did. The land would be given its rest. He knew that their return would be decades in the future. He might not live that long. Yet Jeremiah agreed to the transaction. Why?

The details of the exchange are important for our correct understanding of the issues involved.

And I subscribed the evidence, and sealed it, and took witnesses, and weighed him the money in the balances. So I took the evidence of the purchase, both that which was sealed according to the law and custom, and that which was open: And I gave the evidence of the purchase unto Baruch the son of Neriah, the son of Maaseiah, in the sight of Hanameel mine uncle's son, and in the presence of the witnesses that subscribed the book of the purchase, before all the Jews that sat in the court of the prison. And I charged Baruch before them, saying, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Take these evidences, this evidence of the purchase, both which is sealed, and this evidence which is open; and put them in an earthen vessel, that they may continue many days (Jer. 32:10–14).

“Many days,” the text says. He fully understood just how long he would be outside the holy land. Here was visible testimony to those at the prison that he believed his own message.

This message was not just a message of captivity. It was also message of hope. “For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Houses and fields and vineyards shall be possessed again in this land” (Jer. 32:15). Then he recounted the history of God’s deliverance of Israel out of Egypt. He reviewed God’s covenant lawsuit against the nation.

And they came in, and possessed it; but they obeyed not thy voice, neither walked in thy law; they have done nothing of all that thou commandedst them to do: therefore thou hast caused all this evil to come upon them: Behold the mounts, they are come unto the city to take it; and the city is given into the hand of the Chaldeans, that fight against it, because of the sword, and of the famine, and of the pestilence: and what thou hast spoken is come to pass; and, behold, thou seest it. And thou hast said unto me, O Lord GOD, Buy thee the field for money, and take witnesses; for the city is given into the hand of the Chaldeans (Jer. 32:23–25).

God had told him to buy the field precisely because the city was about to fall to the Chaldeans. That which had led Hanameel to sell his birthright had led Jeremiah to purchase it. Here was God’s promise of deliverance.

Behold, I will gather them out of all countries, whither I have driven them in mine anger, and in my fury, and in great wrath; and I will bring them again unto this place, and I will cause them to dwell safely: And they shall be my people, and I will be their God: And I will give them one heart, and one way, that they may fear me for ever, for the good of them, and of their children after them: And I will make an everlasting covenant with them, that I will not turn away from them, to do them good; but I will put my fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from me. Yea, I will rejoice over them to do them good, and I will plant them in this land assuredly with my whole heart and with my whole soul. For thus saith the LORD; Like as I have brought all this great evil upon this people, so will I bring upon them all the good that I have promised them. And fields shall be bought in this land, whereof ye say, It is desolate without man or beast; it is given into the hand of the Chaldeans.

Men shall buy fields for money, and subscribe evidences, and seal them, and take witnesses in the land of Benjamin, and in the places about Jerusalem, and in the cities of Judah, and in the cities of the mountains, and in the cities of the valley, and in the cities of the south: for I will cause their captivity to return, saith the LORD (Jer. 32:37–44).

Jeremiah bought a field with money. He did this in front of witnesses. This was his public affirmation of faith in God's promise: "I will cause their captivity to return." As we say in the United States, he put his money where his mouth was. As we also say, action speaks louder than words.

Conclusion

Jeremiah bought an illiquid asset in exchange for a liquid asset. He bought an asset that he could not personally put to productive use. He bought it in exchange for an asset that could be put to productive use. He did so for a reason: God had told him to. Why had God told him to do this? To affirm his confidence in God's promise to bring the remnant of Israel back into the land.

This was a visible display of Jeremiah's faith in the future. This was not necessarily faith in his future in the land. If anything, it was a testimony of his lack of faith in his future in the land. He would in all likelihood die outside the land. He had already announced God's time frame.

And this whole land shall be a desolation, and an astonishment; and these nations shall serve the king of Babylon seventy years. And it shall come to pass, when seventy years are accomplished, that I will punish the king of Babylon, and that nation, saith the LORD, for their iniquity, and the land of the Chaldeans, and will make it perpetual desolations (Jer. 25:11–12).

THE RELEASE OF HEBREW BONDSERVANTS

This is the word that came unto Jeremiah from the LORD, after that the king Zedekiah had made a covenant with all the people which were at Jerusalem, to proclaim liberty unto them; That every man should let his manservant, and every man his maidservant, being an Hebrew or an Hebrewess, go free; that none should serve himself of them, to wit, of a Jew his brother (Jer. 34:8–9).

The theocentric issue here was inheritance: point five of the biblical covenant.¹ This is evidence that the laws governing the sabbatical year were not being honored in Jeremiah's era. This was a violation of the laws governing the seventh or sabbatical year in Israel. It was part of a law governing morally compulsory zero-interest charity loans.

At the end of every seven years thou shalt make a release. And this is the manner of the release: Every creditor that lendeth ought unto his neighbour shall release it; he shall not exact it of his neighbour, or of his brother; because it is called the LORD'S release (Deut. 15:1–2).²

This year of release from a zero-interest charitable loan also applied to everyone who had been placed in household captivity because he had defaulted on a charitable loan. Because the debt was annulled, the term of service was also annulled.

And if thy brother, an Hebrew man, or an Hebrew woman, be sold unto thee, and serve thee six years; then in the seventh year thou shalt let him go free from thee. And when thou sendest him out free

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 35.

from thee, thou shalt not let him go away empty: Thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock, and out of thy floor, and out of thy winepress: of that wherewith the LORD thy God hath blessed thee thou shalt give unto him. And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt, and the LORD thy God redeemed thee: therefore I command thee this thing to day (Deut. 15:12–15).³

When the people heard Jeremiah's warning, they released their Hebrew servants (Jer. 34:10). But they soon changed their minds. They subjected them again to servitude (v. 11). This indicates that they used violence. The civil government acquiesced to this re-subjugation. It may even have abetted it.

God's word then came to Jeremiah. God had established a covenant with Israel (v. 13). This covenant had a stipulation. "At the end of seven years let ye go every man his brother an Hebrew, which hath been sold unto thee; and when he hath served thee six years, thou shalt let him go free from thee: but your fathers hearkened not unto me, neither inclined their ear" (Jer. 34:14).

There was a specific sanction associated with the sabbatical year of release: the threat of national defeat, which captivity surely was. In the midst of the law governing the sabbath year, God told them that if they obeyed, they would lend to foreign nations. This had to do with reigning.

Only if thou carefully hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to observe to do all these commandments which I command thee this day. For the LORD thy God blesseth thee, as he promised thee: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow; and thou shalt reign over many nations, but they shall not reign over thee (Deut. 15:5–6).⁴

In contrast, captivity would follow disobedience. Captivity is mentioned in the same passage as borrowing from foreigners—again, an issue of reigning.

Thou shalt beget sons and daughters, but thou shalt not enjoy them; for they shall go into captivity. All thy trees and fruit of thy land shall the locust consume. The stranger that is within thee shall get up above thee very high; and thou shalt come down very low. He shall lend to thee, and thou shalt not lend to him: he shall be the head, and

3. Ibid., ch. 36:C:2.

4. Ibid., ch. 37.

thou shalt be the tail (Deut. 28:41–44).⁵

Jeremiah came before the nation with a warning: national captivity is imminent. He got right to the point: release your Hebrew servants. They complied, then reneged. That sealed their doom. “Therefore thus saith the LORD; Ye have not hearkened unto me, in proclaiming liberty, every one to his brother, and every man to his neighbour: behold, I proclaim a liberty for you, saith the LORD, to the sword, to the pestilence, and to the famine; and I will make you to be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth” (v. 17). The punishment would soon fit the crime. They had placed their previously released servants in bondage. God would therefore bring the Babylonians to place them in bondage. This was the lex talionis in action: eye for eye, tooth for tooth.

Conclusion

This is the second economic crime announced by Jeremiah. The first was their refusal to pay wages. Like the first crime, this was a specific violation of a Mosaic statute. They had kept poor brethren in bondage beyond the sabbatical year of release. They had made themselves doubly liable by re-subjecting them after they had released them. The punishment would be comparable: bondage abroad.

5. Ibid., ch. 70.

INTRODUCTION TO EZEKIEL

The book of Ezekiel is the third longest of the prophetic books, behind Isaiah and Jeremiah. Ezekiel had no more to say about economics than Jeremiah did. There are only three themes, although one of them is repeated. The first relates to oppression. It appears three times.

And hath not oppressed any, but hath restored to the debtor his pledge, hath spoiled none by violence, hath given his bread to the hungry, and hath covered the naked with a garment; He that hath not given forth upon usury, neither hath taken any increase, that hath withdrawn his hand from iniquity, hath executed true judgment between man and man, Hath walked in my statutes, and hath kept my judgments, to deal truly; he is just, he shall surely live, saith the Lord GOD (Ezek. 18:7–9; cf. vv. 16–17; 22:7, 12–13).

The second relates to the success of pagan kingdoms.

The word of the LORD came again unto me, saying, Son of man, say unto the prince of Tyrus, Thus saith the Lord GOD; Because thine heart is lifted up, and thou hast said, I am a God, I sit in the seat of God, in the midst of the seas; yet thou art a man, and not God, though thou set thine heart as the heart of God: Behold, thou art wiser than Daniel; there is no secret that they can hide from thee: With thy wisdom and with thine understanding thou hast gotten thee riches, and hast gotten gold and silver into thy treasures: By thy great wisdom and by thy traffick hast thou increased thy riches, and thine heart is lifted up because of thy riches: Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD; Because thou hast set thine heart as the heart of God; Behold, therefore I will bring strangers upon thee, the terrible of the nations: and they shall draw their swords against the beauty of thy wisdom, and they shall defile thy brightness (Ezek. 28:1–7).

The third relates to the inheritance of rural land after the Israelites' return from captivity.

So shall ye divide this land unto you according to the tribes of Israel. And it shall come to pass, that ye shall divide it by lot for an inheritance unto you, and to the strangers that sojourn among you, which shall beget children among you: and they shall be unto you as born in the country among the children of Israel; they shall have inheritance with you among the tribes of Israel (Ezek. 47:21–22).

In short, there is not much on economics in Ezekiel. In this respect, he was typical of all the prophets except Isaiah.

19

AVOIDING OPPRESSION

And hath not oppressed any, but hath restored to the debtor his pledge, hath spoiled none by violence, hath given his bread to the hungry, and hath covered the naked with a garment; He that hath not given forth upon usury, neither hath taken any increase, that hath withdrawn his hand from iniquity, hath executed true judgment between man and man, Hath walked in my statutes, and hath kept my judgments, to deal truly; he is just, he shall surely live, saith the Lord GOD (Ezek. 18:7–9).

A. Oppression Is Judicial

The theocentric issue here was judgment: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ A righteous person avoids oppression. As I have argued in this commentary and in my previous commentaries on the five books of Moses (Pentateuch), the Old Testament's context of oppression was almost always judicial. Oppression generally involved the misuse of the civil court system in order to gain some advantage over judicially innocent people. This judicial context is clear in Ezekiel's condemnation of the rulers: the princes of Israel.

Behold, the princes of Israel, every one were in thee to their power to shed blood. In thee have they set light by father and mother: in the midst of thee have they dealt by oppression with the stranger: in thee have they vexed the fatherless and the widow (Ezek. 22:6–7).

In thee have they taken gifts to shed blood; thou hast taken usury and increase, and thou hast greedily gained of thy neighbours by extortion, and hast forgotten me, saith the Lord GOD. Behold, therefore I have smitten mine hand at thy dishonest gain which thou hast made, and at thy blood which hath been in the midst of thee (Ezek. 22:12–13).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

Ezekiel here presents characteristics of a righteous person by describing what a righteous person does and then contrasting his actions with what an unrighteous person does. The list relies heavily on the Mosaic law. He provided a shorter list in verses 16 and 17.

Neither hath oppressed any, hath not withholden the pledge, neither hath spoiled by violence, but hath given his bread to the hungry, and hath covered the naked with a garment, That hath taken off his hand from the poor, that hath not received usury nor increase, hath executed my judgments, hath walked in my statutes; he shall not die for the iniquity of his father, he shall surely live.

To understand what he was getting at, we need to compare his list with the Mosaic law's statutes governing economics.

B. Debt

The righteous person restores the pledge to the debtor. This refers to the law's requirement that a debtor pledges an asset as collateral. If he refuses to repay or is unable to, the lender gets ownership of the asset. But, until such time as the debtor defaults, he has access to the item if it is basic to his comfort or his work. One example is a garment for keeping warm.

If thou at all take thy neighbour's raiment to pledge, thou shalt deliver it unto him by that the sun goeth down: For that is his covering only, it is his raiment for his skin: wherein shall he sleep? and it shall come to pass, when he crieth unto me, that I will hear; for I am gracious (Ex. 22:26–27).

Of what use is such collateral? The lender cannot use it. The debtor gets to use it. Yet it still has an important function. It limits the borrower's debt. He cannot pledge the asset against multiple loans. Because he surrenders it to the lender every day, he cannot indebt himself any further.²

There was a related law of pledges. "No man shall take the nether or the upper millstone to pledge: for he taketh a man's life to pledge" (Deut. 24:6). This prohibited the removal of a debtor's tool of production. This tool will enable him to pay off the debt.³

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 49:J.

One goal of the Mosaic law was to keep covenant-keepers out of debt. Covenant-keepers are supposed to be lenders, not debtors. “The LORD shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his season, and to bless all the work of thine hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow” (Deut. 28:12). It is a curse to be in debt to covenant-breakers. “He shall lend to thee, and thou shalt not lend to him: he shall be the head, and thou shalt be the tail” (Deut. 28:44).

C. Peace

The righteous man “hath spoiled none by violence.” He has not used the threat of violence to achieve his ends.

The Mosaic law placed restrictions on violence. When two men fought, and one of them was injured, the other one had to pay for the injured man’s forfeited time in recovering (Ex. 21:18–19).⁴ A master who injured his slave so severely that the slave lost a tooth or an eye had to set the slave free (Ex. 21:26–27).⁵ All personal vengeance was prohibited. “To me belongeth vengeance, and recompence; their foot shall slide in due time: for the day of their calamity is at hand, and the things that shall come upon them make haste” (Deut. 32:35). The nearest of kin, in his office as blood avenger, was authorized to pursue and execute someone suspected of manslaughter, but this right was limited (Deut. 19:4–6). Cities of refuge served as sanctuaries for suspected criminals (Num. 35:9–13). The goal of the laws of the blood avenger was to eliminate family blood feuds.⁶ The blood-avenger was the kinsman-redeemer.

To use violence as a means of gaining one’s goals was anathema under the Mosaic economy. This was the mark of the covenant-breaker. The author of Proverbs warned his son:

My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not. If they say, Come with us, let us lay wait for blood, let us lurk privily for the innocent without cause: Let us swallow them up alive as the grave; and whole, as those that go down into the pit: We shall find all precious sub-

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 60.

4. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 35.

5. Ibid., ch. 39.

6. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 21.

stance, we shall fill our houses with spoil: Cast in thy lot among us; let us all have one purse: My son, walk not thou in the way with them; refrain thy foot from their path: For their feet run to evil, and make haste to shed blood (Prov. 1:10–16).⁷

The civil government was supposed to bring negative sanctions against convicted perpetrators of violence. When rulers refused to enforce the law by means of the mandated civil sanctions, God threatened to bring judgment. Again, “To me belongeth vengeance, and recompence; their foot shall slide in due time: for the day of their calamity is at hand, and the things that shall come upon them make haste” (Deut. 32:35).

The question arises: What about civil governments that use the threat of violence to benefit one group of judicially innocent people at the expense of another group? This is the fundamental judicial issue of the welfare state. The welfare state rests on this judicial principle: “Thou shalt not steal, except by majority vote.”

Because the Mosaic law opposed the use of violence as a means of attaining individual gain, by extension the law also opposed the use of violence by the state to attain one’s own gain. The familiar phrase, “robbing Peter to pay Paul,” expresses the essence of wealth redistribution by violence.

D. Charity

A mark of the righteous person is that he “hath given his bread to the hungry, and hath covered the naked with a garment.” This is an almost universal view of righteousness in every religion and every society.

This has nothing to say about the righteousness of civil government. Civil government uses compulsion to extract wealth from those under its jurisdiction. Civil government does not govern by voluntarism.

Compulsion is a denial of charity. When voters A and B decide that voter C should turn over half of his income to the government, and voter A will administer the transfer of funds to voter B at a fee of 50% of the money extracted from voter C, there is no charity. “Thou shalt not steal, except by majority vote” is based on a specific definition of democracy. “Democracy is the system of civil government whereby two wolves and a sheep vote on what to have for dinner.”

7. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 3.

Liberation theology and its less revolutionary Protestant versions of the Social Gospel proclaim that civil government should be an agency of charity. They proclaim that modern civil government lacks righteousness because it does not extract a large enough percentage of income from the rich to distribute to the poor.

They also deny the principle that governs the tithe: a flat percentage of income. They call for “progressive” taxation, which is graduated taxation, which is a clear violation of Exodus 12:49: the rule of law. “One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you.”⁸ It also violates Leviticus 19:15. “Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty: but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour.”⁹ They do not refer to these verses when presenting their plans for the state to redistribute income by force. They assume that their readers will not make the connection, which is generally an accurate assumption.

E. Usury

Another defining characteristic of a righteousness person is this: “He that hath not given forth upon usury, neither hath taken any increase.”

What is usury, as defined by the Mosaic law? It is (1) any interest payment (2) taken from a poor person who has asked for (3) a charitable loan, and (4) who has pledged himself as collateral, should he fail to repay the loan. All four elements must be present in order for an interest payment to be classified as usury.

I have gone over this material in several places for several decades. Because most readers are not familiar with this background material, I review it here.

1. Any Interest Payment

Usury does not mean a large interest payment. It means any interest payment at all, in money or goods. The texts in the Mosaic law are clear on this point. A search of the Hebrew word translated in this passage and in Ezekiel 22:12¹⁰ as “usury” produces the following examples.

8. North, Authority and Dominion, Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 14.

9. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 14.

If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as an usurer, neither shalt thou lay upon him usury (Ex. 22:25).¹¹

Take thou no usury of him, or increase: but fear thy God; that thy brother may live with thee. Thou shalt not give him thy money upon usury, nor lend him thy victuals for increase (Lev. 25:36–37).¹²

Thou shalt not lend upon usury to thy brother; usury of money, usury of victuals, usury of any thing that is lent upon usury: Unto a stranger thou mayest lend upon usury; but unto thy brother thou shalt not lend upon usury: that the LORD thy God may bless thee in all that thou settest thine hand to in the land whither thou goest to possess it (Deut. 23:19–20).¹³

There is not a word about “excessive interest” or anything similar. The concept of usury as excessive interest was an interpretation of medieval theologians, a view which was taken up by Protestants.

2. Poor People

Again, the text in Exodus is clear. “If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as an usurer, neither shalt thou lay upon him usury” (Ex. 22:25).

In Deuteronomy 15, the law of the year of debt release appears in the first six verses.

At the end of every seven years thou shalt make a release. And this is the manner of the release: Every creditor that lendeth ought unto his neighbour shall release it; he shall not exact it of his neighbour, or of his brother; because it is called the LORD’S release. Of a foreigner thou mayest exact it again: but that which is thine with thy brother thine hand shall release; Save when there shall be no poor among you; for the LORD shall greatly bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance to possess it: Only if

10. “In thee have they taken gifts to shed blood; thou hast taken usury and increase, and thou hast greedily gained of thy neighbours by extortion, and hast forgotten me, saith the Lord GOD” (Ezek. 22:12).

11. North, Authority and Dominion, Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 49.

12. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 29.

13. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 56.

thou carefully hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to observe to do all these commandments which I command thee this day. For the LORD thy God blesseth thee, as he promised thee: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow; and thou shalt reign over many nations, but they shall not reign over thee.¹⁴

So, this law had to do with the poor. The law will remain in force until such time as “there shall be no poor among you.”

The national blessing associated with this law is the transformation of covenant-keepers into lenders to covenant-breakers. “Thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow; and thou shalt reign over many nations, but they shall not reign over thee.” So, usury is a good thing when extracted from covenant-breakers.¹⁵

Additional evidence that this law applied only to poor people appears in the next section of Deuteronomy 15.

If there be among you a poor man of one of thy brethren within any of thy gates in thy land which the LORD thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not harden thine heart, nor shut thine hand from thy poor brother: But thou shalt open thine hand wide unto him, and shalt surely lend him sufficient for his need, in that which he wanteth. Beware that there be not a thought in thy wicked heart, saying, The seventh year, the year of release, is at hand; and thine eye be evil against thy poor brother, and thou givest him nought; and he cry unto the LORD against thee, and it be sin unto thee. Thou shalt surely give him, and thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him: because that for this thing the LORD thy God shall bless thee in all thy works, and in all that thou puttest thine hand unto. For the poor shall never cease out of the land: therefore I command thee, saying, Thou shalt open thine hand wide unto thy brother, to thy poor, and to thy needy, in thy land (vv. 7–11).

This moral injunction to lend—it was not a civil law—applies only to “a poor man of one of thy brethren.”

3. A Charitable Loan

The loan bore no interest. This constituted a gift to the recipient. A business loan could impose an interest payment. The mark of a business loan was the fact that it did impose interest. It also had a stiffer penalty for failure to repay: he could be sold into slavery until the next

14. Ibid., ch. 36.

15. Ibid., ch. 37.

jubilee year, which could be almost half a century in the future. In the same chapter that prohibits usury to a poor brother in the covenant (Lev. 25:36–37), this appears.

And if a sojourner or stranger wax rich by thee, and thy brother that dwelleth by him wax poor, and sell himself unto the stranger or sojourner by thee, or to the stock of the stranger's family: After that he is sold he may be redeemed again; one of his brethren may redeem him: Either his uncle, or his uncle's son, may redeem him, or any that is nigh of kin unto him of his family may redeem him; or if he be able, he may redeem himself. And he shall reckon with him that bought him from the year that he was sold to him unto the year of jubile: and the price of his sale shall be according unto the number of years, according to the time of an hired servant shall it be with him. If there be yet many years behind, according unto them he shall give again the price of his redemption out of the money that he was bought for. And if there remain but few years unto the year of jubile, then he shall count with him, and according unto his years shall he give him again the price of his redemption. And as a yearly hired servant shall he be with him: and the other shall not rule with rigour over him in thy sight. And if he be not redeemed in these years, then he shall go out in the year of jubile, both he, and his children with him (Lev. 25:47–54).¹⁶

We know this has to refer to a non-charitable debt because the Hebrew in bondage because of failure to repay a zero-interest charitable loan had to be released in the sabbatical year.

And if thy brother, an Hebrew man, or an Hebrew woman, be sold unto thee, and serve thee six years; then in the seventh year thou shalt let him go free from thee. And when thou sendest him out free from thee, thou shalt not let him go away empty: Thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock, and out of thy floor, and out of thy winepress: of that wherewith the LORD thy God hath blessed thee thou shalt give unto him (Deut. 15:12–14).

4. A Pledge of Servitude

Deuteronomy 15:12–14 indicates that there was a temporal limit to debt servitude: the seventh year. When the debt was legally cancelled in the seventh year, so was the requirement to repay through servitude. The cancellation of the debt brought the term of servitude to a close.

16. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 32.

Why was there a term of servitude? There can be only one logical answer: the debtor's failure to repay the debt. Which kind of debt? A charitable loan. What was its characteristic feature? No interest payment.

F. Iniquity

The next mark of a righteous person is this: he “hath withdrawn his hand from iniquity, hath executed true judgment between man and man.” The term “iniquity” is a wide-ranging classification. The Hebrew word is used in more than 50 passages in the Old Testament. It is used in the Pentateuch only in the context of court judgments. Ezekiel is bringing a covenant lawsuit against Judah. This means that he is referring back to the Mosaic law, which had established the terms of the national covenant. So, he narrows the application of “iniquity” to the judicial sphere: “executed true judgment between man and man.” There are the references to iniquity in the Mosaic law—the only times the word is used in the Pentateuch.

Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty: but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour (Lev. 19:15).¹⁷

Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, in meteyard, in weight, or in measure (Lev. 19:35).¹⁸

He is the Rock, his work is perfect: for all his ways are judgment: a God of truth and without iniquity, just and right is he (Deut. 32:4).

The seeming exception is not an exception: “For all that do such things, and all that do unrighteously, are an abomination unto the LORD thy God” (Deut. 25:16). Its context is just weights. “But thou shalt have a perfect and just weight, a perfect and just measure shalt thou have: that thy days may be lengthened in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee” (v. 15). Honest weights and measures in the Mosaic law was a reference to honest judgment in a court.

The righteous person “hath walked in my statutes, and hath kept my judgments, to deal truly.” This is self-government under God, which means self-government under God's Bible-revealed laws.

17. Ibid., ch. 14.

18. Ibid., ch. 19.

Conclusion

As with all of the prophets, Ezekiel is best understood as bringing a covenant lawsuit against the nation.

When he listed the economic sins of the people, he relied exclusively on the Mosaic law. The Mosaic law established the terms of the national covenant. The covenant has been broken by the people, including the rulers. So, he identified the economic sins of the people by showing how the people have broken certain Mosaic laws governing economics.

Ezekiel did not come before the nation to call them to establish a welfare state. He did not call them to establish by civil law some scheme for compulsory wealth redistribution through new forms of taxation. In the rare cases when he mentioned economics, he called them to obey the Mosaic laws governing economics. To imply otherwise is to mislead the public.

20

RICHERS AS A SNARE

By thy great wisdom and by thy traffick hast thou increased thy riches, and thine heart is lifted up because of thy riches: Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD; Because thou hast set thine heart as the heart of God; Behold, therefore I will bring strangers upon thee, the terrible of the nations: and they shall draw their swords against the beauty of thy wisdom, and they shall defile thy brightness (Ezek. 28:5–7).

A. A Warning to Tyre

The theocentric issue here was sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ Ezekiel addresses this to the pagan king of Tyre. Ezekiel first condemns Tyre for its arrogance against Jerusalem.

Son of man, because that Tyrus hath said against Jerusalem, Aha, she is broken that was the gates of the people: she is turned unto me: I shall be replenished, now she is laid waste: Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD; Behold, I am against thee, O Tyrus, and will cause many nations to come up against thee, as the sea causeth his waves to come up. And they shall destroy the walls of Tyrus, and break down her towers: I will also scrape her dust from her, and make her like the top of a rock (Ezek. 26:2–4).

The island city is doomed. Babylon will capture it, just as it would soon capture Jerusalem.

For thus saith the Lord GOD; Behold, I will bring upon Tyrus Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, a king of kings, from the north, with horses, and with chariots, and with horsemen, and companies, and much people. He shall slay with the sword thy daughters in the field: and he shall make a fort against thee, and cast a mount against thee, and lift up the buckler against thee (Ezek. 26:7–8).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

With this as background, God brings this warning against the king.

Son of man, say unto the prince of Tyrus, Thus saith the Lord GOD; Because thine heart is lifted up, and thou hast said, I am a God, I sit in the seat of God, in the midst of the seas; yet thou art a man, and not God, though thou set thine heart as the heart of God: Behold, thou art wiser than Daniel; there is no secret that they can hide from thee (Ezek. 28:2–3).

At this point, Ezekiel presents his warning in terms of Tyre's wealth. He affirms the wisdom of Tyre. This wisdom has created a maritime trade economy: traffic. This prosperity has led the king to regard himself as an autonomous sovereign. "Thou hast set thine heart as the heart of God." This is the ancient sin of man that leads to destruction: to seek to be as God (Gen. 3:5).

B. Autonomous Wealth

The sin of the Tyre's ruler was the sin of autonomy: the belief, as Moses put it, "My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth" (Deut. 8:17).² This sin was also the sin of the king of Babylon. "For thou hast said in thine heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God: I will sit also upon the mount of the congregation, in the sides of the north: I will ascend above the heights of the clouds; I will be like the most High" (Isa. 14:13–14). Daniel told Nebuchadnezzar that he would succumb to this same temptation.

It is thou, O king, that art grown and become strong: for thy greatness is grown, and reacheth unto heaven, and thy dominion to the end of the earth. And whereas the king saw a watcher and an holy one coming down from heaven, and saying, Hew the tree down, and destroy it; yet leave the stump of the roots thereof in the earth, even with a band of iron and brass, in the tender grass of the field; and let it be wet with the dew of heaven, and let his portion be with the beasts of the field, till seven times pass over him (Dan. 4:22–23).

That they shall drive thee from men, and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field, and they shall make thee to eat grass as oxen, and they shall wet thee with the dew of heaven, and seven times shall pass over thee, till thou know that the most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will. And whereas they commanded to leave the stump of the tree roots; thy kingdom shall be sure unto thee, after that thou shalt have known that the heavens do rule. Wherefore, O king, let my counsel be acceptable unto thee, and break off thy sins by righteousness, and thine iniquities by shewing mercy to the poor; if it may be a lengthening of thy tranquility (Dan. 4:25–27).

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 21.

This was fulfilled, as Nebuchadnezzar admitted in his confession of faith. “Now I Nebuchadnezzar praise and extol and honour the King of heaven, all whose works are truth, and his ways judgment: and those that walk in pride he is able to abase” (Dan. 4:37).

Through the common grace of cultural wisdom and geography, a nation can attain great wealth for a time. The system of economic cause and effect assures societies that if they abide by the principles governing biblical law, they can reap the economic blessings. The problem they face is the lure of autonomy. They will come to believe that they have prospered as a result of the might of their hands or a wisdom unique to them. Isaiah had prophesied over a century before Ezekiel’s ministry regarding Tyre.

Who hath taken this counsel against Tyre, the crowning city, whose merchants are princes, whose traffickers are the honourable of the earth? The LORD of hosts hath purposed it, to stain the pride of all glory, and to bring into contempt all the honourable of the earth. Pass through thy land as a river, O daughter of Tarshish: there is no more strength. He stretched out his hand over the sea, he shook the kingdoms: the LORD hath given a commandment against the merchant city, to destroy the strong holds thereof (Isa. 23:8–11).

The Bible’s system of economic causation leads from obedience to prosperity. Prosperity is supposed to reinforce men’s confidence in the reliability of covenant law. It is supposed to confirm the covenant. “But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:18).³ But prosperity can lead also to the sin of autonomy. This, Ezekiel announced to the king of Tyre, results in destruction. This, too, confirmed the covenant.

3. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 22.

It confirmed it by way of the negative corporate sanctions (Deut. 28:15–66).

Conclusion

Ezekiel told the king that he and his nation are under God's authority. Tyre has prospered, but this prosperity will end soon. Tyre will fall to Babylon as surely as Israel fell.

Ezekiel's message to covenant-breaking societies was simple: all are under God's law. The general principles of economics within the borders of Israel apply outside. Other nations can achieve prosperity, but they cannot retain it when they attribute their success to their wisdom, their power, or their local gods. They cannot retain it if they attribute their wealth to their autonomous wisdom.

21

FREE FOOD IN RIVAL KINGDOMS

Because ye have thrust with side and with shoulder, and pushed all the diseased with your horns, till ye have scattered them abroad; Therefore will I save my flock, and they shall no more be a prey; and I will judge between cattle and cattle. And I will set up one shepherd over them, and he shall feed them, even my servant David; he shall feed them, and he shall be their shepherd. And I the LORD will be their God, and my servant David a prince among them; I the LORD have spoken it (Ezek. 34:21–24).

A. A Message of Hope

The theocentric issue here was judgment: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ Ezekiel was a prophet of the exile era. Judah was in captivity when his ministry began (Ezek. 1:1–2). So, he was not warning the nation of negative sanctions to come. They had already come. Instead, he was warning them that their deliverance was assured. They should accept God's punishment gracefully, for they would not be captives forever. Here is God's promise, he announces.

As a shepherd seeketh out his flock in the day that he is among his sheep that are scattered; so will I seek out my sheep, and will deliver them out of all places where they have been scattered in the cloudy and dark day. And I will bring them out from the people, and gather them from the countries, and will bring them to their own land, and feed them upon the mountains of Israel by the rivers, and in all the inhabited places of the country (Ezek. 34:12–13).

This was a message of hope. Ezekiel reminds God's people of His power: the power to deliver out of captivity. "And as for you, O my flock, thus saith the Lord GOD; Behold, I judge between cattle and cattle, between the rams and the he goats" (v. 17). Therefore, his message was also a warning to the Babylonians. God's promise to deliver His people from captivity is a promise of negative sanctions against anyone who would oppress His people in the interim. "Seemeth it a small thing unto you to have eaten up the good pasture, but ye must tread down with your feet the residue of your pastures? and to have drunk of the deep waters, but ye must foul the residue with your feet?" (v. 18).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

This is the background for the passage under consideration here. Someone had been acting as an oppressor. There was a victim. Ezekiel speaks of both groups. "Because ye have thrust with side and with shoulder, and pushed all the diseased with your horns, till ye have scattered them abroad; Therefore will I save my flock, and they shall no more be a prey; and I will judge between cattle and cattle" (v. 21). So, God's message of deliverance is also a threat of negative sanctions against oppressors.

This threat was fulfilled in 539 B.C., when the Medo-Persians conquered Babylon in one night. The immediate cause was Belshazzar's feast, in which the guests ate off of the golden plates that had been taken from the temple. Daniel told the king in front of his nobles: "And this is the writing that was written, MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UP-HARSIN. This is the interpretation of the thing: MENE; God hath numbered thy kingdom, and finished it. TEKEL; Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting. PERES; Thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians" (Dan. 5:25–28).

Having directed a warning to the Babylonians, Ezekiel proclaims the restoration of David's kingship. "And I will set up one shepherd over them, and he shall feed them, even my servant David; he shall feed them, and he shall be their shepherd. And I the LORD will be their God, and my servant David a prince among them; I the LORD have spoken it" (vv. 23–24).

B. A Future David

Obviously, this did not refer to a resurrected David. It referred to a future son of David, who would serve as a shepherd. From this time on, however, Israel never again had a king from the ranks of the nation. Always, Israel would be under the rule of an empire: Medo-Persian, Alexandrian, and Roman. So, who was this prophesied king? Jesus. He was a son of David in both genealogies (Matt. 1:6, Luke 3:31). He was King of kings, and Lord of lords (I Tim. 6:15; Rev. 17:14; 19:16).

Would He sit on a throne in Roman Israel? No. So, the prophecy never came true in a literal sense. It was not a literal prophecy. Yet the text says that this future king will feed the nation. This, He did, literally, on two occasions: the feeding of the crowds.

And they did all eat, and were filled: and they took up of the fragments that remained twelve baskets full. And they that had eaten were about five thousand men, beside women and children (Matt. 14:20–21).

And Jesus saith unto them, How many loaves have ye? And they said, Seven, and a few little fishes. And he commanded the multitude to sit down on the ground. And he took the seven loaves and the fishes, and gave thanks, and brake them, and gave to his disciples, and the disciples to the multitude. And they did all eat, and were filled: and they took up of the broken meat that was left seven baskets full. And they that did eat were four thousand men, beside women and children (Matt. 15:34–38).

This feeding of the masses was evidence of His status as Messiah. But He immediately departed from the crowds both times.

Then those men, when they had seen the miracle that Jesus did, said, This is of a truth that prophet that should come into the world. When Jesus therefore perceived that they would come and take him by force, to make him a king, he departed again into a mountain himself alone (John 6:14–15).

Still, the crowds sought Him out. He warned them against their misinterpretation of His miracles: belief in deliverance through a political kingdom.

Jesus answered them and said, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Ye seek me, not because ye saw the miracles, but because ye did eat of the loaves, and were filled. Labour not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life, which the Son of man shall give unto you: for him hath God the Father sealed. Then said they unto him, What shall we do, that we might work the works of God? Jesus answered and said unto them, This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent (John 6:26–29).

Jesus understood the lure of free bread. Rome was a society built on free bread and circuses. Any political order that promises to deliver free bread to the masses will find followers. Jesus warned His listeners against any such faith in any such promise. Such a promise has nothing to do with the kingdom of God. On the contrary, it is an extension of Satan's temptation of Jesus in the wilderness. "And when the tempter came to him, he said, If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread. But he answered and said, It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God" (Matt. 4:3–4).²

Then what was Ezekiel's promise of a king all about? This king would be a shepherd and feed his sheep (v. 23). Previously, Ezekiel had prophesied this. "As a shepherd seeketh out his flock in the day that he is among his sheep that are scattered; so will I seek out my sheep, and will deliver them out of all places where they have been scattered in the cloudy and dark day" (v. 12). Jesus was clearly referring to this passage when He announced:

Verily, verily, I say unto you, I am the door of the sheep. All that ever came before me are thieves and robbers: but the sheep did not hear them. I am the door: by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out, and find pasture. The thief cometh not, but for to steal, and to kill, and to destroy: I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly. I am the good shepherd: the good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep (John 10:7–11).

The Shepherd had sheep. This was the background of Jesus' assignment to Peter.

So when they had dined, Jesus saith to Simon Peter, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these? He saith unto him, Yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee. He saith unto him, Feed my lambs. He saith to him again the second time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me? He saith unto him, Yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee. He saith unto him, Feed my sheep. He saith unto him the third time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me? Peter was grieved because he said unto him the third time, Lovest thou me? And he said unto him, Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee. Jesus saith unto him, Feed my sheep (John 21:15–17).

So far, we know the following. First, Jesus was the son of David, the lawful king of Israel. Second, He rejected the idea that He should be a king over Israel based on His ability to distribute free bread. Third, He was the Good Shepherd. Fourth, He fed His sheep. Fifth, He delegated this responsibility to Peter as a representative figure of all pastors.

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 1.

This had to do with spiritual feeding.³ The frame of reference was not literal food provided by a king to the poor, meaning the civil government.

C. Misreading the Text

It should be obvious that Ezekiel's prophecy had nothing to do with a civil government's program of providing food stamps or other forms of taxpayer-subsidized food to poor people. But this was not obvious to Stephen Mott and Ronald J. Sider. Citing this passage in Ezekiel, they wrote:

This ideal ruler will take responsibility for the needs of the people as a shepherd: "He will feed them and be their shepherd" (Ezek. 34:23). Ezekiel 34:4 denounces the failure of the shepherds (i.e., the rulers) of Israel to "feed" the people. . . . This teaching on the role of government applies not just to Israel but to government everywhere.⁴

Those who cannot care for themselves should receive from their community a liberal sufficiency of the necessities of life provided in ways that preserve dignity, encourage responsibility and strengthen the family.⁵

Notice the identification of two separate concepts: society (voluntarism) and civil government (coercion). "Governmental action to empower the poor is one way we implement the truth that economic justice is a family affair."⁶ The state is like a family, they insisted. This mixing of covenantal categories is basic to the Social Gospel's call for a tax-funded welfare state in the name of social justice.

Mott and Sider fell into the same error as the people did who saw Jesus' feeding of the crowds. These people wanted more free food. They were willing to subordinate themselves to any king who would rule over them on this basis. Mott and Sider regarded political legitimacy in the same way. They called on Christians to set up a welfare state that will provide free food and much more to the masses.

3. Chapter 13.

4. Stephen Mott and Ronald J. Sider, "Economic Justice: A Biblical Paradigm," in David P. Gushee (ed), Toward a Just and Caring Society: Christian Responses to Poverty in America (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Books, 1999), p. 44.

5. Ibid., p. 45.

6. Ibid., p. 43.

Conclusion

Ezekiel in this passage warned the Babylonians not to become oppressors of the Israelites. He also promised the Israelites of deliverance to come. They would be delivered out of the hands of their Babylonian oppressors.

They would also have a king in the line of David. But, as we know, this prophecy was never fulfilled by a literal heir of David seated on a literal throne in Israel. This was a prophecy of Christ's messianic rule in history. It was not a prophecy of the construction of an international welfare state in the name of Jesus.

A SHARED INHERITANCE

So shall ye divide this land unto you according to the tribes of Israel. And it shall come to pass, that ye shall divide it by lot for an inheritance unto you, and to the strangers that sojourn among you, which shall beget children among you: and they shall be unto you as born in the country among the children of Israel; they shall have inheritance with you among the tribes of Israel. And it shall come to pass, that in what tribe the stranger sojourneth, there shall ye give him his inheritance, saith the Lord GOD (Ezek. 47:21–23).

A. Altering the Jubilee Land Inheritance Law

The theocentric issue here was inheritance: point five of the biblical covenant.¹ This prophecy announced a fundamental break in the Mosaic economy. The laws that had governed rural land ownership, announced in Leviticus 25, would be superseded when Israel returned to the land after the Babylonian captivity. Prior to the captivity, the jubilee was supposed to mark the origin of rural land ownership: Israel's conquest of Canaan. God had destroyed the Canaanites through the conquest. "I am the LORD your God, which brought you forth out of the land of Egypt, to give you the land of Canaan, and to be your God" (Lev. 25:38). This marked God as the owner of the land.

In Leviticus 26, God prophesied what would happen to Israel. The nation would rebel. The people would not honor the law of the sabbatical year, when the land was not to be planted. "Six years thou shalt sow thy field, and six years thou shalt prune thy vineyard, and gather in the fruit thereof; But in the seventh year shall be a sabbath of rest unto the land, a sabbath for the LORD: thou shalt neither sow thy field, nor prune thy vineyard” (Lev. 25:3–4). Because of the leaders’ refusal to enforce this law, the nation would be carried into captivity in order that the land be given its rest.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

And I will bring the land into desolation: and your enemies which dwell therein shall be astonished at it. And I will scatter you among the heathen, and will draw out a sword after you: and your land shall be desolate, and your cities waste. Then shall the land enjoy her sabbaths, as long as it lieth desolate, and ye be in your enemies’ land; even then shall the land rest, and enjoy her sabbaths. As long as it lieth desolate it shall rest; because it did not rest in your sabbaths, when ye dwelt upon it. And upon them that are left alive of you I will send a faintness into their hearts in the lands of their enemies; and the sound of a shaken leaf shall chase them; and they shall flee, as fleeing from a sword; and they shall fall when none pursueth. And they shall fall one upon another, as it were before a sword, when none pursueth: and ye shall have no power to stand before your enemies. And ye shall perish among the heathen, and the land of your enemies shall eat you up. And they that are left of you shall pine away in their iniquity in your enemies’ lands; and also in the iniquities of their fathers shall they pine away with them (Lev. 26:32–39).

Jeremiah had told the people of Judah that this prophecy was about to be fulfilled. Ezekiel was on the far side of its fulfillment. But Moses’ prophecy had not ended with captivity. There would be restoration.

Then will I remember my covenant with Jacob, and also my covenant with Isaac, and also my covenant with Abraham will I remember; and I will remember the land. The land also shall be left of them, and shall enjoy her sabbaths, while she lieth desolate without them: and they shall accept of the punishment of their iniquity: because, even because they despised my judgments, and because their soul abhorred my statutes. And yet for all that, when they be in the land of their enemies, I will not cast them away, neither will I abhor them, to destroy them utterly, and to break my covenant with them: for I am the LORD their God. But I will for their sakes remember the covenant of their ancestors, whom I brought forth out of the land of Egypt in the sight of the heathen, that I might be their God: I am the LORD (Lev. 26:42–45).

B. Strangers in the Land

During the time of the captivity, only a few very poor Israelites were allowed to remain in the land. “But Nebuzaradan the captain of the guard left of the poor of the people, which had nothing, in the land of Judah, and gave them vineyards and fields at the same time” (Jer. 39:10). They became the stewards of land which they had not enjoyed, never having been owners. The land inheritance law of the jubilee had not been honored by the authorities. The land had not been returned to the heirs of the conquest generation in year 49. Now the poorest members of the old order were allowed to become administrators of rural land.

The Assyrians had brought in foreigners to live in the northern kingdom. The Babylonians did the same with land in the southern kingdom. Jeremiah lamented: “Our inheritance is turned to strangers, our houses to aliens” (Lam. 5:2). These strangers remained in the land after a remnant of Israel returned under the Persians’ rule. They became the Samaritans, who adopted a form of religion similar to the Israelites’ religion.

Ezekiel made it clear that these people were not to be evicted from the land at the return of the Israelites. The tribes would again divide the land, but resident aliens were not to be dispossessed. This implied a new form of landed inheritance. It would be by possession, not confession. The strangers had not been covenant-keepers when they were brought in. Still, they were able to occupy the land. They did not honor the jubilee law. There was no need. The land would receive its rest in this sense: not being worked by a nation covenanted to God, which then defied His law regarding the sabbatical year. Outsiders who were under the authority of a pagan nation were brought in to care for the land. Fewer people would occupy the land. The intensity of agriculture would diminish. There would still be no year of rest for the land. These strangers would establish their legal claim to the land by occupying it and caring for it. This would not be ownership by confession and circumcision.

A new order would arrive when Israel returned. Never again would the nation fall into the sin of animism or polytheism. The sins of Israel would be the rival systems of legalism and Hellenism. These were ethical and philosophical departures from the Mosaic Covenant, not sacramental departures. Israel’s imported replacements in the land had not been associated with the sacramental practices of the Canaanites, which were tied to local gods. Baal worship would no longer be a problem for Israel.

Far fewer Israelites returned than were carried off. “The whole congregation together was forty and two thousand three hundred and threescore, Beside their servants and their maids, of whom there were seven thousand three hundred thirty and seven: and there were among them two hundred singing men and singing women" (Ezra 2:64–65). These figures were closely corroborated in Nehemiah 7:66–67. By comparison, there were a little over 600,000 fighting men who conquered the land under Joshua (Num. 26:51). There was plenty of land per family for the returning Israelites. There was no need for the resident aliens to be dispossessed.

Conclusion

The new system of rural land ownership was still tied to the tribal system of the Mosaic Covenant. The separation of the tribes was still to be maintained until the fulfillment of Jacob's messianic prophecy: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be" (Gen. 49:10). But the Samaritans would be land-owning resident aliens from that time forth. They were not to be adopted into the tribes apart from confession and ritual practice, but they were not to be treated as non-heirs in the jubilee year. The basis of rural land ownership went from heirship of the conquest (genocide) to residency while Israel was in captivity. The older judicial foundation of rural land ownership—genocide—changed forever.

There is no biblical evidence or known extra-biblical evidence that the empires that ruled Israel after the exile honored the pre-exilic distribution of family-owned plots of land. There is also no evidence that the jubilee land laws were ever enforced.

INTRODUCTION TO HOSEA

Hosea's ministry was contemporary with Isaiah's. He served from Uzziah to Hezekiah (1:1). These were the same kings listed in Isaiah 1:1.

The book begins with an economic issue: prostitution. The Mosaic law said of prostitution, "Do not prostitute thy daughter, to cause her to be a whore; lest the land fall to whoredom, and the land become full of wickedness" (Lev. 19:29). Yet God commanded Hosea to marry a prostitute (Hosea 1:2). This was an act of grace on God's part. Normally, such a woman would not be eligible for marriage.

God told him to name their children with names that indicated God's covenant lawsuit against Israel (vv. 5, 6, 9). Yet the negative sanctions will not be permanent, God said.

Yet the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured nor numbered; and it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, there it shall be said unto them, Ye are the sons of the living God. Then shall the children of Judah and the children of Israel be gathered together, and appoint themselves one head, and they shall come up out of the land: for great shall be the day of Jezreel" (vv. 10–11).

Hosea contains only two sections dealing with economics. Hosea 2:8–9 presents a prophecy of God's removal of the covenantal blessings. "For she did not know that I gave her corn, and wine, and oil, and multiplied her silver and gold, which they prepared for Baal. Therefore will I return, and take away my corn in the time thereof, and my wine in the season thereof, and will recover my wool and my flax given to cover her nakedness." Hosea 12:7–8 describes a corrupt merchant. "He is a merchant, the balances of deceit are in his hand: he loveth to oppress. And Ephraim said, Yet I am become rich, I have found me out substance: in all my labours they shall find none iniquity in me that were sin." As with all of the prophets except for Isaiah, Hosea did not have much to say about economics.

This should serve as an indicator: economics was not a major concern of the prophets. Compared to modern men, the prophets barely bothered about the issue. Economics was important only insofar as visible blessings and cursings are covenantal. Modern man denies that economics is covenantal, yet he is obsessed with economic growth. He believed that societies are judged, above all, in terms of their experience of economic growth.

23

THE DESTRUCTION OF WEALTH

For she did not know that I gave her corn, and wine, and oil, and multiplied her silver and gold, which they prepared for Baal. Therefore will I return, and take away my corn in the time thereof, and my wine in the season thereof, and will recover my wool and my flax given to cover her nakedness (Hosea 2:8–9).

A. The Source of Blessings and Cursings

The theocentric issue here was judgment: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ Job's response was correct: "The LORD gave, and the LORD hath taken away; blessed be the name of the LORD" (Job 1:21b). This was not the response of Israel and Judah.

God is the source of all good things. "Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning" (James 1:17).² Israel and Judah had attributed to false gods the benefits they had received from the true God. This was a violation of the Mosaic law. This violation had specific negative consequences.

But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day. And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God (Deut. 8:18–20).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 34.

This negative corporate sanction was a form of disinheritance.³ God told Hosea to speak to Israel and Judah as if they were not children of the covenant. God referred to both nations by the opposite names that He had given to the children of Hosea, Lo-ammi and Lo-ruhamah. The Hebrew “lo” is a negative. “Say ye unto your brethren, Ammi; and to your sisters, Ru-hamah. Plead with your mother, plead: for she is not my wife, neither am I her husband: let her therefore put away her whoredoms out of her sight, and her adulteries from between her breasts” (Hosea 2:1–2). The two nations thought of themselves as being God’s people (ammi) and pitied (ruhamah). Covenantally, they had rebelled. They had become negatives: not God’s people and not pitied. They were children of harlotry. They were not heirs of the promise.

Of course, they were still heirs of the promise. That was because they were still under the covenant’s sanctions. But they would be treated for a time by God as if they had been disinherited. Then, He would restore them.

Yet the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured nor numbered; and it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, there it shall be said unto them, Ye are the sons of the living God. Then shall the children of Judah and the children of Israel be gathered together, and appoint themselves one head, and they shall come up out of the land: for great shall be the day of Jezreel” (Hosea 1:10–11).

B. Comprehensive Losses

The visible blessings of God involved economic prosperity. This was part of the Mosaic law (Deut 28:1–14).⁴

Blessed shall be thy basket and thy store (Deut. 28:5).

The LORD shall command the blessing upon thee in thy storehouses, and in all that thou settest thine hand unto; and he shall bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee (Deut. 28:8).

And the LORD shall make thee plenteous in goods, in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy ground, in the land which the LORD sware unto thy fathers to give thee. The LORD shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his season, and to bless all the work of thine hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow (Deut. 28:11–12).

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 23.

4. Ibid., ch. 69.

Israel and Judah had prospered. This could have been interpreted as the covenantal blessing of God. But it was not. They imitated the Israelites in the wilderness, who built a golden calf. “And all the people brake off the golden earrings which were in their ears, and brought them unto Aaron. And he received them at their hand, and fashioned it with a graving tool, after he had made it a molten calf: and they said, These be thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt” (Ex. 32:3–4). Israel had literally done this.

Thy calf, O Samaria, hath cast thee off; mine anger is kindled against them: how long will it be ere they attain to innocency? For from Israel was it also: the workman made it; therefore it is not God: but the calf of Samaria shall be broken in pieces. For they have sown the wind, and they shall reap the whirlwind: it hath no stalk: the bud shall yield no meal: if so be it yield, the strangers shall swallow it up. Israel is swallowed up: now shall they be among the Gentiles as a vessel wherein is no pleasure. For they are gone up to Assyria, a wild ass alone by himself: Ephraim hath hired lovers (Hosea 8:5–9).

They attributed to the calf the blessings they had received from God. So did their descendants. “For she did not know that I gave her corn, and wine, and oil, and multiplied her silver and gold, which they prepared for Baal” (2:8).

Hosea brought a covenant lawsuit against them for this act of idolatry. The promised punishment will be what the Mosaic law had promised the negative sanction would be. “Therefore will I return, and take away my corn in the time thereof, and my wine in the season thereof, and will recover my wool and my flax given to cover her nakedness” (v. 9). Moses had warned their forefathers: “Cursed shall be thy basket and thy store” (Deut. 28:17). The form of the judgment would be exile, Moses had warned.

Thou shalt betroth a wife, and another man shall lie with her: thou shalt build an house, and thou shalt not dwell therein: thou shalt plant a vineyard, and shalt not gather the grapes thereof. Thine ox shall be slain before thine eyes, and thou shalt not eat thereof: thine ass shall be violently taken away from before thy face, and shall not be restored to thee: thy sheep shall be given unto thine enemies, and thou shalt have none to rescue them. Thy sons and thy daughters shall be given unto another people, and thine eyes shall look, and fail with longing for them all the day long; and there shall be no might in thine hand. The fruit of thy land, and all thy labours, shall a nation which thou knowest not eat up; and thou shalt be only oppressed and crushed away (Deut. 28:30–33).

Thou shalt plant vineyards, and dress them, but shalt neither drink of the wine, nor gather the grapes; for the worms shall eat them. Thou shalt have olive trees throughout all thy coasts, but thou shalt not anoint thyself with the oil; for thine olive shall cast his fruit (Deut. 28:39–40).

The prophets came with a covenant lawsuit. They told their listeners that the promised sanctions would come. There would be captivity. Others would inherit their land. Their punishment was consistent with their crime. They deserved captivity. They had worshipped false gods inside the land. The punishment was to serve men who served false gods outside the land. This was the specified Mosaic sanction.

I call heaven and earth to witness against you this day, that ye shall soon utterly perish from off the land whereunto ye go over Jordan to possess it; ye shall not prolong your days upon it, but shall utterly be destroyed. And the LORD shall scatter you among the nations, and ye shall be left few in number among the heathen, whither the LORD shall lead you. And there ye shall serve gods, the work of men's hands, wood and stone, which neither see, nor hear, nor eat, nor smell (Deut. 4:26–28).

Conclusion

Hosea charged the people with having offered sacrifices to Baal. To do this, they used the fruits of their labors. These fruits had been given to them by God. So, God promised, He would remove these fruits. They would become poor.

This was a covenant lawsuit. It referred back to the Mosaic law and its sanctions. This was not a new message. It was a recapitulation of an old message. As was true of the other prophets, Hosea's message rested on specific judicial revelation.

24

CORRUPT RICHES

He is a merchant, the balances of deceit are in his hand: he loveth to oppress. And Ephraim said, Yet I am become rich, I have found me out substance: in all my labours they shall find none iniquity in me that were sin (Hosea 7:7–8).

The theocentric issue here was judgment: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ Ephraim was one of the tribes of Israel. Here, God singled out this tribe for condemnation. But Ephraim was not alone.

Ephraim feedeth on wind, and followeth after the east wind: he daily increaseth lies and desolation; and they do make a covenant with the Assyrians, and oil is carried into Egypt. The LORD hath also a controversy with Judah, and will punish Jacob according to his ways; according to his doings will he recompense him (Hosea 12:1–2).

Hosea was bringing a covenant lawsuit in the name of God. There had to be a specific infraction: a violation of some Mosaic statute. Ephraim's specific crime was oppression. "He is a merchant, the balances of deceit are in his hand: he loveth to oppress." A false balance was a specific infraction of the Mosaic law that was representative of civil corruption. It was the essence of oppression, which was a judicial matter under the Mosaic law.

Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, in meteyard, in weight, or in measure. Just balances, just weights, a just ephah, and a just hin, shall ye have: I am the LORD your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt. Therefore shall ye observe all my statutes, and all my judgments, and do them: I am the LORD (Lev. 19:35–37).²

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus,

Hosea accuses the tribe of judicial oppression. As a merchant tribe, it used false weights and measures. This was theft by fraud. The tribe had prospered as a result of this deception.

As a merchant tribe, Ephraim collectively prospered. “And Ephraim said, Yet I am become rich, I have found me out substance: in all my labours they shall find none iniquity in me that were sin.” The usage of the Hebrew word for “found” was the same as it is in English. It meant “to discover.” “If one be found slain in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee to possess it, lying in the field, and it be not known who hath slain him” (Deut. 21:1). So, Ephraim corporately believed that the tribe had prospered as a result of its righteousness. This, at least, was its public self-testimony.

The text does not indicate whether the tribe actually believed this or not. The assertion may have been a matter of self-deception. Or it may have been a false front for public consumption. If it was self-deception, then the tribe’s use of tools of deception had led to covenantal self-deception. This in turn was leading to God’s comprehensive negative sanctions.

There was nothing suspect about its merchant status. There is no condemnation of this trade in the Mosaic law. It is rarely mentioned. But the word translated as “merchant” is the same as “Canaan.” It almost always appears in that context. So, the implication is that the Canaanites were merchants. They had prospered for a time. Then God brought negative corporate sanctions. The same sanction threatened national Israel.

And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God (Deut. 8:19–20).³

Hosea does not accuse Ephraim of worshipping false gods. He accuses the tribe of using deception to defraud the innocent.

The tribe had become rich. This was additional evidence that covenant-breaking can produce wealth for a season. Wealth can lead to greater covenant-breaking. This had disturbed the Psalmist.

2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 19.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 23.

For I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked. For there are no bands in their death: but their strength is firm. They are not in trouble as other men; neither are they plagued like other men. Therefore pride compasseth them about as a chain; violence covereth them as a garment. Their eyes stand out with fatness: they have more than heart could wish. They are corrupt, and speak wickedly concerning oppression: they speak loftily. They set their mouth against the heavens, and their tongue walketh through the earth. Therefore his people return hither: and waters of a full cup are wrung out to them. And they say, How doth God know? and is there knowledge in the most High? Behold, these are the ungodly, who prosper in the world; they increase in riches (Ps. 73:3–12).⁴

Wealth can and does confirm covenant-breaking in the minds of covenant-breakers as surely it can and does confirm covenant-keeping in the minds of covenant-keepers. “But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:18).⁵ The wealth of covenant-keepers compounds. The wealth of covenant-breakers is cut short. “For, lo, they that are far from thee shall perish: thou hast destroyed all them that go a whoring from thee” (Ps. 73:27).

Conclusion

To interpret this covenant lawsuit as a comprehensive condemnation of trade as a career would be to mistake fraud for profit. Hosea was specific in his accusation. Ephraim had violated a specific Mosaic statute. This statute was representative of civil injustice as a whole. It necessarily involved the civil government, whose magistrates refused to enforce the law against false weights. This was government-sanctioned fraud. The practice was therefore biblical oppression.

4. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 17.

5. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 22.

INTRODUCTION TO MICAH

Micah is a short book. It is a good summary of God's covenant lawsuit against Judah and Samaria, i.e., Israel. It contains the themes of the so-called major prophets. It was written sometime in the eighth century, B.C.

Micah said almost nothing about economic sins. His lawsuit accused the leaders of condoning theft. What was being stolen? Rural land. How was this being stolen? By a refusal to enforce the jubilee law of rural land inheritance. By undercutting rural land inheritance, the rulers were undermining the political and economic decentralization that accompanies land ownership.

CAPTIVITY AS DISINHERITANCE

And they covet fields, and take them by violence; and houses, and take them away: so they oppress a man and his house, even a man and his heritage. Therefore thus saith the LORD; Behold, against this family do I devise an evil, from which ye shall not remove your necks; neither shall ye go haughtily: for this time is evil (Micah 2:2–3).

The theocentric issue here was judgment: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ Micah presents a covenant lawsuit against Judah and Samaria, meaning Israel (1:1). He referred to the sin of covetousness, a reference to the tenth commandment: “Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour’s house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbour’s wife, nor his manservant, nor his maidservant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor any thing that is thy neighbour’s” (Ex. 20:17). This law referred to specific pieces of property, not categories of property. This was not a prohibition against keeping up with the Joneses. It was a command against lusting after anything that Jones was unwilling to sell or which was illegal to sell, such as his wife. It had to do with an obsession to own another person’s property.²

Micah says that this lust has resulted in specific illegal actions, namely, violence and oppression. The target of this lust is rural land and homes. Under the Mosaic law, rural land was under a specific lease arrangement with God. It could not be sold on a permanent basis. It could be leased for no more than 49 years. In the jubilee year, all rural land that was not in the possession of a priest (Lev. 27:19–20)³

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 30.

3. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, had to be returned to the heirs of the original conquest generation (Lev. 25:13).⁴

The thieves are oppressors: "They oppress a man and his house, even a man and his heritage." Oppression in the Mosaic law was a judicial category having to do with the misuse of civil law.⁵ These thieves had gained the cooperation of the civil government, which had not brought negative sanctions against them for either their violence or their violation of the jubilee law regarding rural property.

The goal of these thieves was the transfer of another family's property to their family's inheritance. Land in Mosaic Israel was a uniquely inheritable form of capital due to the jubilee land law. Families could not legally transfer ownership of land to non-family members. The only exception was a transfer to a priest as the result of a broken vow. So, anyone who sought to obtain another family's property was accumulating land for his family. Micah warns that this theft will result in God's negative sanctions against the thief's family. "Therefore thus saith the LORD; Behold, against this family do I devise an evil, from which ye shall not remove your necks; neither shall ye go haughtily: for this time is evil." A family-based sin produces a family-borne punishment.

This sin was the sin of Ahab, who had coveted Naboth's field. His wife Jezebel had false witnesses accuse Naboth of blasphemy, which was a capital crime (Lev. 24:10–13). After Naboth was executed, the king illegally confiscated his land. God sent Elijah to him while the king was in Naboth's vineyard. God told Elijah what to say. "And thou shalt speak unto him, saying, Thus saith the LORD, Hast thou killed, and also taken possession? And thou shalt speak unto him, saying, Thus saith the LORD, In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth shall dogs lick thy blood, even thine" (I Kings 21:19). He made the same prophecy against Jezebel. This was a covenant lawsuit. The prophesied sanction was applied to the king (I Kings 22:37–38) and his wife (II Kings 9:36–37).

Micah warns Israel that the sanction against theft will be applied by God: eye for eye, tooth for tooth. "In that day shall one take up a parable against you, and lament with a doleful lamentation, and say, We be utterly spoiled: he hath changed the portion of my people: how hath he removed it from me! turning away he hath divided our fields” (Micah 2:4). They had stolen others’ fields; their fields will be stolen. They had sought to transfer others’ inheritances to their families. God will transfer their inheritances to foreign families. This transfer will be permanent, Ezekiel announced after the captivity. “So shall ye divide this land unto you according to the tribes of Israel. And it shall come to pass, that ye shall divide it by lot for an inheritance unto you, and to the strangers that sojourn among you, which shall beget children among you: and they shall be unto you as born in the country among the children of Israel; they shall have inheritance with you among the tribes of Israel” (Ezek. 47:21–22).⁶

2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 37:C, E.

4. Ibid., ch. 25.

5. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 48.

Micah leaves no doubt as to the sin involved: it was Ahab’s. “For the statutes of Omri are kept, and all the works of the house of Ahab, and ye walk in their counsels; that I should make thee a desolation, and the inhabitants thereof an hissing; therefore ye shall bear the reproach of my people” (Micah 6:16).

Conclusion

Micah offered a critique of an economic sin, covetousness, that had become an economic crime: land-grabbing. Covetousness is at root a sin of disinheritance: the desire to disinherit another’s inheritance in order to increase one’s own. God’s threatened negative sanction was captivity. “And the remnant of Jacob shall be in the midst of many people as a dew from the LORD, as the showers upon the grass, that tarrieth not for man, nor waiteth for the sons of men. And the remnant of Jacob shall be among the Gentiles in the midst of many people as a lion among the beasts of the forest, as a young lion among the flocks of sheep: who, if he go through, both treadeth down, and teareth in pieces, and none can deliver” (Micah 5:7–8). Those who had sought to appropriate their neighbors’ fields were removed from their own fields. Others inherited these fields.

6. Chapter 22.

26

PRIVATE PROPERTY: A COVENANTAL BLESSING

But they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree; and none shall make them afraid: for the mouth of the LORD of hosts hath spoken it (Micah 4:4).

The theocentric issue here was judgment: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ The prophets brought a series of covenant lawsuits against Israel and Judah. These lawsuits predicted that negative corporate sanctions would be applied by God for covenant-breaking. But the covenant is also enforced by positive sanctions. The prophets did not prophesy judgment unto oblivion. They prophesied judgment unto restoration. There was always a positive sanction for Israel. This had been assured by Moses, the original prophet to Israel.

And it shall come to pass, when all these things are come upon thee, the blessing and the curse, which I have set before thee, and thou shalt call them to mind among all the nations, whither the LORD thy God hath driven thee, And shalt return unto the LORD thy God, and shalt obey his voice according to all that I command thee this day, thou and thy children, with all thine heart, and with all thy soul; That then the LORD thy God will turn thy captivity, and have compassion upon thee, and will return and gather thee from all the nations, whither the LORD thy God hath scattered thee. If any of thine be driven out unto the outmost parts of heaven, from thence will the LORD thy God gather thee, and from thence will he fetch thee: And the LORD thy God will bring thee into the land which thy fathers possessed, and thou shalt possess it; and he will do thee good, and multiply thee above thy fathers (Deut. 30:1–5).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

A. Peace and Property

Micah tells his listeners that a day will come when the people of Israel will once again own property. This will not be collective ownership. The concept of collective ownership was foreign to the Mosaic law. Micah appeals to the desire of his listeners to own their own piece of ground. They wanted to call a place “home.” God will bring this to pass, Micah told them.

They had lived in fear for a long time. This fear was well-founded. First, the rich and powerful coveted their land. The civil government was corrupt. The civil rulers were in league with the oppressors. They refused to enforce the jubilee land laws, which required that rural land be returned to the heirs of the conquest generation (Lev. 25:13).² Second, distrust was universal. “Trust ye not in a friend, put ye not confidence in a guide: keep the doors of thy mouth from her that lieth in thy bosom. For the son dishonoureth the father, the daughter riseth up against her mother, the daughter in law against her mother in law; a man’s enemies are the men of his own house” (Micah 7:5–6). In such an environment, voluntary cooperation was hopeless. Therefore, so was economic growth. Zechariah, a post-exilic prophet, described this environment retroactively.

For before these days there was no hire for man, nor any hire for beast; neither was there any peace to him that went out or came in because of the affliction: for I set all men every one against his neighbour. But now I will not be unto the residue of this people as in the former days, saith the LORD of hosts. For the seed shall be prosperous; the vine shall give her fruit, and the ground shall give her increase, and the heavens shall give their dew; and I will cause the remnant of this people to possess all these things (Zech. 8:10–12).³

Micah tells them that their heart’s desire will come true. At some point, covenant-keepers will sit under their fig trees, enjoying the leisure that comes to those with sufficient capital to support them. “None shall make them afraid.” This is the promise of peace. Peace is a requirement for productivity.⁴ Productivity is a tool of dominion.

2. Ibid., ch. 25.

3. Chapter 32.

4. Idem.

B. No Social Gospel

Proponents of the Social Gospel and liberation theology have misrepresented the message of the prophets. The Mosaic law mandated the legal order in which capitalism flourishes: a legal order based on private property. The Social Gospel and the post-Marxist versions of liberation theology proclaim the civil government as an agent of wealth redistribution. The state is supposedly authorized to use the power of the gun to take property from the rich and transfer it to the poor. Liberation theologians invariably ignore the enormous costs of administration by the state. They also ignore or dismiss the cost to society of reduced production.

They refuse to discuss the fact that incumbent politicians have passed election campaign laws that protect incumbents. This has made it difficult for voters to remove them. The liberationists also ignore the effects of legislation passed in the late nineteenth century that have insulated government bureaucrats at the national level from interference by politicians. In the name of bureaucratic expertise and efficiency, American politicians in the late nineteenth century passed Civil Service laws that reduced the power of politicians to appoint government officials. Jobs are gained through competitive examination. Bureaucrats are rarely fired. This legislation has undermined local political machines, which had gained their power through the jobs that they could promise to constituents. This undermined the spoils system, i.e., operational democracy. This transferred political power to wealthy individuals and to large corporations, which have the money to fund specific politicians. It made the politicians dependent on the moneyed elite rather than on local political machines that mobilize local voters.

The prophets knew better than to trust the state to reform itself. They recognized that the state had become corrupt, that the rulers could not be trusted to uphold the Mosaic law. They recognized that the people lived in constant fear. They told the people what the source of this fear was: their own covetousness.

The Social Gospel and liberation theology both rest on a theology of the state which proclaims the civil government as morally reliable, in contrast to the private property order, which tends toward corruption. In the view of the liberationists, the restoration of institutional righteousness in society can come only when the voters entrust to the politicians and bureaucrats the authority to redistribute wealth by threat of violence. They do not acknowledge what should be obvious, namely, that this was precisely the judicial order of pre-exilic Israel and Judah.

Conclusion

Micah brought a message of long-run hope. There will come a day when God-fearing men will enjoy the fruits of their labor and their capital. They will sit in their vineyards in leisure, enjoying the blessings of prosperity. They will not live in fear. They will not live at the mercy of corrupt civil rulers.

THE TREASURES OF WICKEDNESS

Are there yet the treasures of wickedness in the house of the wicked, and the scant measure that is abominable? Shall I count them pure with the wicked balances, and with the bag of deceitful weights? For the rich men thereof are full of violence, and the inhabitants thereof have spoken lies, and their tongue is deceitful in their mouth (Micah 6:10–12).

A. The Elite and the State

The theocentric issue here was judgment: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ Micah reminds his listeners of what they already knew: the rich were rich because of their alliance with the civil rulers. The government did not prosecute the Mosaic laws against false weights and measures.

Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, in meteyard, in weight, or in measure. Just balances, just weights, a just ephah, and a just hin, shall ye have: I am the LORD your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt (Lev. 19:35–36).²

Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, a great and a small. Thou shalt not have in thine house divers measures, a great and a small. But thou shalt have a perfect and just weight, a perfect and just measure shalt thou have: that thy days may be lengthened in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee. For all that do such things, and all that do unrighteously, are an abomination unto the LORD thy God (Deut. 25:13–16).³

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 19.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deutero-

The rich were corrupt. They were oppressors, meaning that they used the state to gain their wealth. They used the state's near-monopoly of violence to steal from the innocent.

Micah warns them of judgment to come. This judgment will be applied to the entire nation. "Therefore also will I make thee sick in smiting thee, in making thee desolate because of thy sins" (v. 13). The corruption of the rich and the civil rulers was a reflection of the corruption of the people. The people were responsible for the corruption of their rulers. This was not a new message. It was the moral foundation of Leviticus 4, which specified that the sins of the rulers had to be atoned for by sacrifices offered by the people.⁴

B. Productivity Without Consumption

Micah describes what was about to come.

Thou shalt eat, but not be satisfied; and thy casting down shall be in the midst of thee; and thou shalt take hold, but shalt not deliver; and that which thou deliverest will I give up to the sword. Thou shalt sow, but thou shalt not reap; thou shalt tread the olives, but thou shalt not anoint thee with oil; and sweet wine, but shalt not drink wine (vv. 14–15).

This was not a new message. It was basic to the story of Israel's conquest of Canaan. Moses had told them prior to the conquest:

And it shall be, when the LORD thy God shall have brought thee into the land which he swore unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give thee great and goodly cities, which thou buildedst not, And houses full of all good things, which thou filledst not, and wells digged, which thou diggedst not, vineyards and olive trees, which thou plantedst not; when thou shalt have eaten and be full (Deut. 6:10–11).

Immediately after these words, Moses warned them of what they would be tempted to think and do. "Then beware lest thou forget the LORD, which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage. Thou shalt fear the LORD thy God, and serve him, and shalt swear by his name. Ye shall not go after other gods, of the gods of the people which are round about you" (Deut. 6:12–14). If they did this, they would suffer the consequences. What God had done on onomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 65.

4. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 4.

their behalf to the Canaanites, He would do on His behalf to them.

And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth. But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day. And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God (Deut. 8:17–20).⁵

Micah came before the people to remind them that they were still under the terms of the Mosaic Covenant. They had done exactly what Moses had warned against. They had forgotten God. They had worshipped idols.

C. Success for a Season

There were rich people in Israel and Judah. They had gained their wealth through corruption. They had used fraudulent weights. They had used violence. They had relied on corrupt civil rulers to advance their economic agenda at the expense of their victims. Micah says all this in full public view.

His covenant lawsuit acknowledges that corruption, fraud, violence, and oppression can prosper for long periods of time. The prophets did not come to the nation with a message of recent corruption. They came with a message of long-term moral corruption, from bottom to top. This corruption had made evil men wealthy. Nothing seemed to stand in their way.

The prophets told the nation that God stood in their way. He was about to close the pathway to moral destruction. He would bring invaders who would carry the people into a foreign land.

This was a message of hope. First, oppression by fellow Israelites would cease. Foreigners would become their oppressors. This was preferable to having brothers oppress brothers. Second, they would be carried into captivity. This had not been the fate of most of the Canaanites. They had been eradicated, though not completely. God had not told the Israelites to make them slaves. That was the Israelites' error, in the case of the Gibeonites (Josh. 9), and Israel's compromise, in the case of other Canaanites. “And they drave not out the Canaanites that dwelt in Gezer: but the Canaanites dwell among the Ephraimites unto this day, and serve under tribute” (Josh. 16:10). “Yet it came to pass, when the children of Israel were waxen strong, that they put the Canaanites to tribute; but did not utterly drive them out” (Josh. 17:13). There would be a remnant of Israel that would return to the land. The Hebrew oppressors in the meantime would lose their ability to oppress.

5. North, Inheritance and Dominion, chaps. 21–23.

Conclusion

Micah did not doubt that corruption can prosper for a season. For this to happen, corrupt people must gain control over the rulers. The Mosaic law would then not be enforced. Micah and the other prophets always invoked the Mosaic statutes when bringing their covenant lawsuits against the nation. They called the people to repent. This meant a widespread return to the Mosaic law.

Corruption can prosper, but not indefinitely. If the people will not call it to a halt then God will. God intervenes in history to uphold his overall covenant: the dominion covenant.⁶ He also intervenes to uphold His covenants with His people: individual, ecclesiastical, familial, and civil. He does this by imposing His covenantal sanctions, both negative and positive, both individual and corporate.

6. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 4.

INTRODUCTION TO AMOS

Amos was a former shepherd (Amos 7:14). He was a contemporary of Isaiah. King Uzziah reigned (Amos 1:1). This was in the mid-eighth century, B.C.

His primary economic concern was slavery. He was critical of slave buyers who paid little for their slaves. His concern was not slavery as such. The Mosaic law authorized slavery of foreigners (Lev. 25:44–46).¹ Amos was narrowly focused: the purchase and re-sale of Hebrew servants by Hebrew masters for very little money. It was illegal to re-sell Hebrew slaves (Lev. 25:42).² The mark of oppression was the fact that such sales went on at all. The mark of wanton oppression was the fact that this was being done at bargain basement prices.

He also brought a lawsuit against businessmen who used false weights and measures to defraud the public. This practice was a violation of a specific Mosaic law, which appears in Leviticus and Deuteronomy.

Apart from these two practices, Amos had nothing to say about economic oppression. As was true of the prophets, economics was not at the forefront of his covenant lawsuit.

The promoters of the evangelical version of the Social Gospel cite Amos repeatedly. There is a reason for this. Amos had so little to say about economic sins that it is difficult to draw any economic conclusions based on the texts. So, it is easy to read into the texts the collectivist welfare state program of the Social Gospel. They seek to harness Amos' rhetoric to their own political agenda.

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 31.

2. Ibid., ch. 30.

FORCED ENSLAVEMENT

Thus saith the LORD; For three transgressions of Israel, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof; because they sold the righteous for silver, and the poor for a pair of shoes (Amos 2:6).

A. Re-Selling Hebrew Slaves

The theocentric issue here was judgment: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ What was the nature of this transgression? This was not the sale of a criminal in order to raise money to make restitution to his victims. Such a forced sale was legal under the Mosaic law.

If a thief be found breaking up, and be smitten that he die, there shall no blood be shed for him. If the sun be risen upon him, there shall be blood shed for him; for he should make full restitution; if he have nothing, then he shall be sold for his theft. If the theft be certainly found in his hand alive, whether it be ox, or ass, or sheep; he shall restore double (Ex. 22:2–4).²

Because Amos identifies those who had been sold as victims, not thieves, this passage cannot be the legal context.

It was legal to sell a man into servitude if he had defaulted on a commercial debt. The creditor was entitled to be repaid. There was a law governing such a sale.

And if thy brother that dwelleth by thee be waxen poor, and be sold unto thee; thou shalt not compel him to serve as a bondservant: But as an hired servant, and as a sojourner, he shall be with thee, and

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 43.

shall serve thee unto the year of jubile: And then shall he depart from thee, both he and his children with him, and shall return unto his own family, and unto the possession of his fathers shall he return (Lev. 25:39–41).³

So, a man sold under the terms of this law was not a victim of oppression.

Then was this kidnapping? The penalty for kidnapping was execution. “And he that stealeth a man, and selleth him, or if he be found in his hand, he shall surely be put to death” (Ex. 21:16).⁴ Amos does not mention the kidnapping of those sold into slavery.

So, the nature of the infraction is not straightforward.

There is a passage relating to female Hebrew slaves that might apply.

And if a man sell his daughter to be a maidservant, she shall not go out as the menservants do. If she please not her master, who hath betrothed her to himself, then shall he let her be redeemed: to sell her unto a strange nation he shall have no power, seeing he hath dealt deceitfully with her (Ex. 21:7–8).

A woman sold on this basis—the promise of marriage—was legally adopted into the bridegroom’s family. He could not decide later to sell her.⁵

There was a similar passage, already cited, applying to those sold to raise money to pay off a debt (Lev. 25:39–41). To this law was appended this restriction: “For they are my servants, which I brought forth out of the land of Egypt: they shall not be sold as bondmen” (Lev. 25:42).

By the process of elimination, we come to this conclusion: it is likely that the infraction identified by Amos had to do with the re-sale of temporary Hebrew bondservants. A Hebrew lawfully had become a servant in a household, but was then sold by that household to someone in a foreign nation or to a resident alien. Additionally, the jubilee law of release that governed Hebrew servants was not enforced; so, the victims were permanently enslaved. They could not buy their way out, nor could a close family member purchase their freedom prior to the jubilee year.

3. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 30.

4. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 34.

5. Ibid., ch. 31:B.

B. Pricing the Slaves

Amos said that “they sold the righteous for silver, and the poor for a pair of shoes.” The Hebrew word indicates that the shoes in this case were sandals. Silver was worth having, but a pair of sandals were surely not worth what a human being was worth. Why would anyone who owned a Hebrew servant sell him for a pair of sandals? This makes no sense economically.

The next verse throws additional light on the practice. “That pant after the dust of the earth on the head of the poor, and turn aside the way of the meek” (Amos 2:7a). The Hebrew word translated here as “pant” is elsewhere translated as “swallow.” “Whose harvest the hungry eateth up, and taketh it even out of the thorns, and the robber swalloweth up their substance” (Job 5:5). It is also translated as “devour.” “I have long time holden my peace; I have been still, and refrained myself: now will I cry like a travailing woman; I will destroy and devour at once” (Isa. 42:14). The sellers were driven by perversity: the enjoyment of destruction. They wanted to destroy poor people, heaping dust on their heads of the poor. So, they sold them cheap, out of spite. Later in the book, Amos announces:

Hear this, O ye that swallow up the needy, even to make the poor of the land to fail, Saying, When will the new moon be gone, that we may sell corn? and the sabbath, that we may set forth wheat, making the ephah small, and the shekel great, and falsifying the balances by deceit? That we may buy the poor for silver, and the needy for a pair of shoes; yea, and sell the refuse of the wheat? (Amos 8:4-6).

In Amos 2:7, he criticizes the sellers of the poor. In the later passage, he criticized the buyers. This is economically consistent. For every sale, there must be a purchase. The question is: Why sell a poor man for a pair of sandals when someone else will pay silver? Why sell low when you can sell high? The rule of the free market is “high bid wins.” The motivation of the sandal-sellers is clear: a low price for a slave. What about the motivation of the slave-sellers?

Economists do not believe that an “unexploited opportunity” can last for long. If an entrepreneur learns that he can buy someone for a pair of sandals in one market and then re-sell him for silver in another market, soon the price of cheap slaves will rise, and the price of expensive slaves will fall. This process is called arbitrage [AWR-bi-trawzh]. There will not be multiple prices for essentially the same item. Except for transaction costs and transportation costs, the prices in two markets will be the same in a free market society.

So, if this two-price condemnation was literal, why wasn't there an active market for Hebrew slaves: buying low and selling high? In a free market society, the economic situation of slaves-for-shoes and slaves-for-silver would not have lasted long. Yet Amos implied that this practice had been a common condition for a considerable time—long enough to infuriate God. “The Lord GOD hath sworn by his holiness, that, lo, the days shall come upon you, that he will take you away with hooks, and your posterity with fishhooks” (Amos 4:2). Again, this assumes that we take his condemnation literally rather than poetically, i.e., a widespread disregard for human freedom and the Mosaic law.

This much is true: Israelites were selling other Israelites into slavery. The sellers were oppressors. They were violating the Mosaic law. The civil magistrates were allowing this. Amos refers to injustice in the gates. The term “gates” was used in the Old Testament to identify the place of civil judgment in a community. “Her husband is known in the gates, when he sitteth among the elders of the land” (Prov. 31:23). Amos says: “For I know your manifold transgressions and your mighty sins: they afflict the just, they take a bribe, and they turn aside the poor in the gate from their right” (Amos 5:12). This was oppression by the civil government: the quest for bribes. So widespread was the corruption of the courts that prudent men said nothing. “Therefore the prudent shall keep silence in that time; for it is an evil time” (Amos 5:13).

So corrupt had men become that they did not care what price they received. They sold their victims because they enjoyed demonstrating their ability to oppress others visibly. To oppress those who were poor and meek had become a source of social status for people with wealth and political influence. We say that “price is no consideration.” We mean that a high price is not a major barrier to a purchase. Amos is saying that human freedom was held in such low esteem by the sellers that any price was acceptable. They were walking away from money. They could get silver, but some of them sold their brethren for sandals. This was what the leftist American economist Thorstein Veblen called conspicuous consumption.⁶ As in imperial Rome, when rich men—and Cleopatra—would publicly drop a ground-up pearl into a cup of wine and then drink the wine, so were the Israelite oppressors. This must have been very profitable for those entrepreneurs who were engaged in the domestic slave trade: buying for sandals and selling for silver, rather like pearl sellers in Rome. But these sales could not have been easily predictable by slave traders. The sales must have been random. Two organized markets cannot have significant price differences for essentially the same product if free trade is allowed by the civil magistrates.

6. Thorstein Veblen, The Theory of the Leisure Class: An Economic Study of Institutions (New York: Macmillan, [1899] 1902), ch. 4.

If we take Amos' words literally, the sale of Hebrew slaves in Israel and Judah was not a quest for financial profit, but a quest for status: conspicuous consumption. It was status through oppression. This indicated the extent of the moral decline and judicial corruption.

Conclusion

Amos brought a covenant lawsuit against Israel and Judah on the basis of widespread corruption. This included judicial oppression. The courts allowed rich Hebrews to sell their poor brethren into servitude, something prohibited by the Mosaic law.

By identifying multiple selling prices for these slaves—silver and sandals—Amos identified a moral teaching: the low value placed on liberty in Israel and Judah. They had both become slave societies. The quest for social status had overcome rational economic calculation. Men sold other men for sandals when they could have sold them for silver. These people were not in the slave trade for money but rather for status.

Note: In the United States today, some rich women pay a thousand dollars or more for a pair of high-fashion sandals.⁷ This is conspicuous consumption to the point of absurdity, but it is not based on a self-conscious commitment to the destruction of the poor. Rather, it is a commitment to frivolous self-amusement by empty-headed women—a pastime mentioned by Isaiah (Isa. 3:16–24).

7. Hillary de Vries, "Those Aren't Just Sandals, Darling, They're Destiny," New York Times (Sept. 25, 2005). This meant a little lower than an ounce of gold.

UNJUST JUDGES

Ye that put far away the evil day, and cause the seat of violence to come near; That lie upon beds of ivory, and stretch themselves upon their couches, and eat the lambs out of the flock, and the calves out of the midst of the stall; That chant to the sound of the viol, and invent to themselves instruments of musick, like David; That drink wine in bowls, and anoint themselves with the chief ointments: but they are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph (Amos 6:3–6).

The theocentric issue here was judgment: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

Amos directs this criticism to a specific group: men of high position. “Woe to them that are at ease in Zion, and trust in the mountain of Samaria, which are named chief of the nations, to whom the house of Israel came!” (v. 1). They possessed leisure, as befits rulers who are the chief men of the nation. They were the people to whom the masses of Israel came. There should be no confusion here: these were civil officers. They occupied the seat of violence (v. 3). The Hebrew word is sometimes translated as injustice. “Not for any injustice in mine hands: also my prayer is pure” (Job 16:17). It can refer to something false, as in false witness. “False witnesses did rise up; they laid to my charge things that I knew not” (Ps. 35:11). But, usually, it is translated as violence. “For they know not to do right, saith the LORD, who store up violence and robbery in their palaces” (Amos 3:10). This is poetic language. No one actually stores up a basement full of violence and a pantry full of robbery.

Their crime was injustice. It was violence. These were not businessmen who had become rich through economic oppression. These were corrupt civil rulers who had become rich through injustice.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

They were indolent and rich. They lived sumptuously. They drank too much. They ate too much expensive food. They were not saddened by the debased spiritual condition of their brethren. So, Amos prophesies, they would maintain their positions of leadership in a unique way. “Therefore now shall they go captive with the first that go captive, and the banquet of them that stretched themselves shall be removed” (v. 7). They would be at the head of the line when the Babylonians departed for home.

It would be a mistake to view their primary crime as economic. They had not grown rich through free market transactions. They had grown rich through judicial corruption. Isaiah had delivered the same message.

Thy princes are rebellious, and companions of thieves: every one loveth gifts, and followeth after rewards: they judge not the fatherless, neither doth the cause of the widow come unto them. Therefore saith the Lord, the LORD of hosts, the mighty One of Israel, Ah, I will ease me of mine adversaries, and avenge me of mine enemies: And I will turn my hand upon thee, and purely purge away thy dross, and take away all thy tin (Isa. 1:23–25).²

The leisure and wealth they enjoyed came from their misuse of their high offices. To see the prophet as singling them out because of their wealth is to fail to ask the question: How did they obtain their wealth? Wealth was not their problem. Judicial corruption was.

Conclusion

Amos brought his covenant lawsuit against corrupt judges who had misused their high offices to enrich themselves. They had sold justice to the highest bidders. They had engaged in oppression.

This is not a condemnation of riches as such. It is a condemnation of the source of riches. Interpreters who present this passage as proof of oppression as inequality have not understood Moses on the blessings of inequality.

The LORD shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his season, and to bless all the work of thine hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow. And the LORD shall make thee the head, and not the tail; and

2. Chapter 3.

thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath; if that thou hearken unto the commandments of the LORD thy God, which I command thee this day, to observe and to do them (Deut. 28:12–13).³

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 70.

30

OPPRESSION THROUGH FALSE BALANCES

Hear this, O ye that swallow up the needy, even to make the poor of the land to fail, Saying, When will the new moon be gone, that we may sell corn? and the sabbath, that we may set forth wheat, making the ephah small, and the shekel great, and falsifying the balances by deceit? That we may buy the poor for silver, and the needy for a pair of shoes; yea, and sell the refuse of the wheat? (Amos 8:4–6).

The theocentric issue here was judgment: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ This indictment of the businessmen of the nation is simple to understand. They had two sets of balances, one for selling goods and the other for buying goods. The balances were used to deceive buyers. Buyers believed they were being sold one weight's worth of goods, but in fact they were being sold less. This was a form of theft. The Mosaic law specified this practice as a moral evil.

Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, in meteyard, in weight, or in measure. Just balances, just weights, a just ephah, and a just hin, shall ye have: I am the LORD your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt (Lev. 19:35–36).²

Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, a great and a small. Thou shalt not have in thine house divers measures, a great and a small. But thou shalt have a perfect and just weight, a perfect and just measure shalt thou have: that thy days may be lengthened in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee. For all that do such things, and all that do unrighteously, are an abomination unto the LORD thy

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 19.

God (Deut. 25:13–16).³

Amos, as a prophet, brings a covenant lawsuit against the nation. He linked this practice with the oppression of buying and selling Hebrew slaves. The people had a dream: “that we may buy the poor for silver, and the needy for a pair of shoes.” He had already brought this charge against them (Amos 2:6).⁴

They were not sabbath-breakers, but they chafed under the restriction on selling which the law of the sabbath imposed. They grumbled, “When will the new moon be gone, that we may sell corn? and the sabbath, that we may set forth wheat?” They wanted no rest, nor did they intend to provide it. They wanted income, and they were willing to violate the statutes of the Mosaic law to achieve this goal.

These people were oppressors. The innocent were taken advantage of by the people who possess influence. To do this, the oppressors had gained the cooperation of the judges, both ecclesiastical and civil. This joint winking of the eye constituted the sin of Israel. Amos and the other prophets warned that God’s corporation national judgment was coming if the rulers did not repent.

Conclusion

There was nothing new about this accusation. The business community had indulged in theft through deception. These people had ignored God’s law by tampering with the scales. This crime was the representative crime of injustice in the Mosaic law. “Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, in meteyard, in weight, or in measure” (Lev. 19:35).⁵ Solomon reinforced this connection.

A divine sentence is in the lips of the king: his mouth transgresseth not in judgment. A just weight and balance are the LORD’S: all the weights of the bag are his work. It is an abomination to kings to commit wickedness: for the throne is established by righteousness (Prov. 16:10–12).⁶

Amos made no call for general wealth redistribution by the state. It was a call for restitution. The crime was specific: fraud.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 65.

4. Chapter 28.

5. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 19.

6. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 51.

INTRODUCTION TO HAGGAI

In the second year of Darius the king, in the sixth month, in the first day of the month, came the word of the LORD by Haggai the prophet unto Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, governor of Judah, and to Joshua the son of Josedech, the high priest, saying, Thus speaketh the LORD of hosts, saying, This people say, The time is not come, the time that the LORD'S house should be built (Hag. 1:1–2).

Haggai was a prophet in the immediate post-exilic era. His contemporary was Zechariah. “Then the prophets, Haggai the prophet, and Zechariah the son of Iddo, prophesied unto the Jews that were in Judah and Jerusalem in the name of the God of Israel, even unto them” (Ezra 5:1). God raised up both of them to deal with the same issue: the refusal of the Israelites to complete the temple.

By the time Haggai’s ministry began, the people had been in the land for 16 years. They had returned in 536 B.C. They began to build the temple in the second year after their return (Ezra 3:8). Immediately, the leaders of the Samaritan residents of the land protested in writing to the king, asking him to order work to cease (Ezra 4:1–23). “Then ceased the work of the house of God which is at Jerusalem. So it ceased unto the second year of the reign of Darius king of Persia” (Ezra 4:24).

Darius of Persia came to the throne in 521 B.C. Haggai’s ministry began “in the second year of Darius the king, in the sixth month, in the first day of the month” (Hag. 1:1a). He chided them about their failure to complete God’s temple. His message persuaded them.

And the LORD stirred up the spirit of Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, governor of Judah, and the spirit of Joshua the son of Josedech, the high priest, and the spirit of all the remnant of the people; and they came and did work in the house of the LORD of hosts, their God, In the four and twentieth day of the sixth month, in the second year of Darius the king (Hag. 1:14–15).

And the elders of the Jews builded, and they prospered through the prophesying of Haggai the prophet and Zechariah the son of Iddo. And they builded, and finished it, according to the commandment of the God of Israel, and according to the commandment of Cyrus, and Darius, and Artaxerxes king of Persia. And this house was finished on the third day of the month Adar, which was in the sixth year of the reign of Darius the king (Ezra 6:14–15).

It took about four years for them to finish this work. They had waited for 14 years after they ceased working on the temple two years after their return. It is clear that, had they persisted, they could have completed the temple within a few years after their return.

As a post-exilic prophet, Haggai did not have to deal with widespread idolatry. That national temptation ended forever during the exile. The Israelites learned first-hand what it was like to live under the rule of false gods. This was a Mosaic negative sanction.

And the LORD shall scatter thee among all people, from the one end of the earth even unto the other; and there thou shalt serve other gods, which neither thou nor thy fathers have known, even wood and stone. And among these nations shalt thou find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest: but the LORD shall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind (Deut. 28:64–65).

The Israelites' leaders had taken a stand against all such worship. The people accepted this. They maintained their separate existence as strangers in a strange land by invoking the name of God and Him alone. Most of them remained behind when it came time to return to the land. Those who did return were not again tempted to worship idols.

So, the task of the three post-exilic prophets—Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi—was not to call them to abandon idols. Rather, their task was to call the people to act positively in terms of the Mosaic Covenant. The primary sins of the nation were not sins of commission, but rather sins of omission. So, the covenant lawsuits of the post-exilic prophets did not include a warning of corporate negative sanctions to come. Rather, they pointed to the absence of positive sanctions as evidence that God was displeased with them. They did not warn of negative sanctions to come if the people failed to repent. They warned of positive sanctions to come if the people did repent.

31

A BAG WITH HOLES

Is it time for you, O ye, to dwell in your cieled [paneled] houses, and this house lie waste? Now therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts; Consider your ways. Ye have sown much, and bring in little; ye eat, but ye have not enough; ye drink, but ye are not filled with drink; ye clothe you, but there is none warm; and he that earneth wages earneth wages to put it into a bag with holes (Hag. 1:4–6).

A. Under a Curse

The theocentric issue here was sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ The Israelites were under a curse. The curse was specific: a low rate of return on all of their investments. No matter what project they tried, it failed to prosper.

In the United States, there is a saying: “Don’t pour money down a rathole.” A rathole absorbs whatever is of value that you pour into it. You will not make a profit. A project described as a rathole is perceived as a losing proposition. Haggai described a series of five ratholes. They were all losing propositions. He used five metaphors: planting, eating, drinking, dressing, and wage-earning. He described all as acts of futility. The results will disappoint the one who pursues any of them.

Haggai’s phrase, “a bag with holes,” has come down through the centuries as a description of expensive futility. Haggai tells them that as surely as it is useless to replenish lost coins in a bag with holes, so is it useless to continue to follow the same old routine.

What is the routine? Individuals who were suffering these losses continued to put themselves and their desires at the top of their individual lists of priorities. The construction of the temple was not on the list.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

He begins with an introduction: a rhetorical question. "Is it time for you, O ye, to dwell in your cieled houses, and this house lie waste? Now therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts; Consider your ways" (Hag. 1:3b–5). Haggai used this introduction to prepare them for his explanation of the negative sanction of a consistent failure: their lack of success in all of their various projects, symbolized by their failures in five areas of planning.

B. Covenantal Causality

The pre-exilic prophets came before Israel and Judah and warned of terrible negative sanctions to come if they refused to repent. They said: "Do not look at your prosperity and conclude that God is favorable to you and your works. He hates your works. He will prove this by removing your wealth." Their covenant lawsuits identified specific economic practices that were violations of specific Mosaic statutes. They invoked the Mosaic law. They warned of negative corporate sanctions that were found in the Mosaic law. There were no exceptions to the structure of their lawsuits. The Israelites' economic transgressions were found in the Mosaic law, and so were the negative sanctions. A prophet merely recapitulated what the Mosaic law said: stipulations and negative sanctions. His message was clear: the prophesied negative sanctions would be imposed by God through foreign invaders. What God had told Moses repeatedly that He would do, He would surely do. Then He did.

The post-exilic prophets preached in the era following the comprehensive manifestation of the predictability of the Mosaic law's corporate negative sanctions. These sanctions were such that Israel never again turned to idols. God had finally gotten their attention. But they were still slow learners. They did not yet trust what the Mosaic law said regarding the positive sanctions.

Haggai brings a message. He tells them that they lacked visible success because they had placed their personal and family priorities above God's. They had built houses for themselves but no house for God.

He does not invoke a Mosaic statute, because there was no Mosaic statute regarding the construction of a temple. There were detailed requirements regarding the Ark of the Covenant and its immediate environment: a series of concentric areas of holiness. But there is no evidence that the Ark was still in existence after the captivity. There were rules for the tabernacle, but not for the temple. There were individual negative sanctions associated with violating the tabernacle's zones of holiness, but there were no corporate negative sanctions associated with not building the temple.

Haggai does not invoke a Mosaic statute. He does invoke the optimism of Deuteronomy 28:1–14. This was the section devoted to positive sanctions for obedience to the Mosaic law. He tells his listeners that they did not prosper because they had not built the temple. The system of covenantal sanctions still operated.

Ye looked for much, and, lo, it came to little; and when ye brought it home, I did blow upon it. Why? saith the LORD of hosts. Because of mine house that is waste, and ye run every man unto his own house. Therefore the heaven over you is stayed from dew, and the earth is stayed from her fruit. And I called for a drought upon the land, and upon the mountains, and upon the corn, and upon the new wine, and upon the oil, and upon that which the ground bringeth forth, and upon men, and upon cattle, and upon all the labour of the hands (Hag. 1:9–11).

The negative sanctions had already been imposed. There had been no prophet who warned them 14 years earlier what the penalties would be if they ceased work on the temple. Why not? Because God expected them to understand the system of covenantal causality. There are visible positive sanctions for obedience to the Mosaic law, just as there are visible negative sanctions for disobeying it. Israelites should have learned this in the captivity. With respect to idolatry, they did. With respect to the temple, they didn't.

Haggai came to tell them to consider cause and effect. Their projects failed because they had put themselves first. Haggai called them to obey. "Go up to the mountain, and bring wood, and build the house; and I will take pleasure in it, and I will be glorified, saith the LORD" (Hag. 1:8). But what were they asked to obey? Not a statute from the Mosaic law. They were asked to obey their consciences. Their covenantal understanding should by now have been greater than had been true before the captivity. They should have been able to add covenantal two plus two and get four. So far, they had not done this.

Haggai's prophetic message implied that there should be spiritual maturity over time, both individually and corporately. While there was no Mosaic statute compelling them to build a temple, God expected them to build it. While there were no statutes specifying God's negative sanctions in response to such neglect, God expected the people to understand that Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28 were still in force. He expected them to recognize covenantal causality in their lack of success. They did not recognize this, so He sent Haggai to remind them.

The people had matured. The leaders immediately responded to his message. Then the people did, too.

Then Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, and Joshua the son of Josedech, the high priest, with all the remnant of the people, obeyed the voice of the LORD their God, and the words of Haggai the prophet, as the LORD their God had sent him, and the people did fear before the LORD. Then spake Haggai the LORD'S messenger in the LORD'S message unto the people, saying, I am with you, saith the LORD. And the LORD stirred up the spirit of Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, governor of Judah, and the spirit of Joshua the son of Josedech, the high priest, and the spirit of all the remnant of the people; and they came and did work in the house of the LORD of hosts, their God (Hag. 1:12–14).

Conclusion

Haggai set forth the fundamental principle of biblical covenantal economics when he announced, "The silver is mine, and the gold is mine, saith the LORD of hosts" (2:8). The nation had forgotten this, just as nations generally do. His ministry was consistent with this principle of ownership. First things first. God's things come first.

He did not warn the nation of bad things to come despite contemporary prosperity, as the pre-exilic prophets had done. He reminded them of good things to come despite contemporary failure. "The glory of this latter house shall be greater than of the former, saith the LORD of hosts: and in this place will I give peace, saith the LORD of hosts" (2:9). Before the exile, Israelites had been the beneficiaries of wealth, but they had attributed this to other gods. After the exile, they had experienced comprehensive failure, but they had attributed this to nothing in particular. Haggai reminded them that God is the God of both negative sanctions and positive sanctions. Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28 had asserted this, but the post-exilic generation was almost as blind to this as the pre-exilic generation had been. Almost, but not quite. God, through Haggai, opened their eyes.

INTRODUCTION TO ZECHARIAH

Then the angel of the LORD answered and said, O LORD of hosts, how long wilt thou not have mercy on Jerusalem and on the cities of Judah, against which thou hast had indignation these threescore and ten years? And the LORD answered the angel that talked with me with good words and comfortable words. So the angel that communed with me said unto me, Cry thou, saying, Thus saith the LORD of hosts; I am jealous for Jerusalem and for Zion with a great jealousy (Zech. 1:12–14).

As a post-exilic prophet, Zechariah did not bring a message of imminent destruction. He brought a message of hope. Of all the prophets, he was the messenger of comprehensive hope.

His message matched that of his contemporary, Haggai. His message was simple: finish the temple. “Therefore thus saith the LORD; I am returned to Jerusalem with mercies: my house shall be built in it, saith the LORD of hosts, and a line shall be stretched forth upon Jerusalem” (Zech. 1:16). There would soon be positive sanctions. “Cry yet, saying, Thus saith the LORD of hosts; My cities through prosperity shall yet be spread abroad; and the LORD shall yet comfort Zion, and shall yet choose Jerusalem” (Zech. 1:17). Negative sanctions were coming, but not to Israel.

For thus saith the LORD of hosts; After the glory hath he sent me unto the nations which spoiled you: for he that toucheth you toucheth the apple of his eye. For, behold, I will shake mine hand upon them, and they shall be a spoil to their servants: and ye shall know that the LORD of hosts hath sent me. Sing and rejoice, O daughter of Zion: for, lo, I come, and I will dwell in the midst of thee, saith the LORD. And many nations shall be joined to the LORD in that day, and shall be my people: and I will dwell in the midst of thee, and thou shalt know that the LORD of hosts hath sent me unto thee (Zech. 2:8–11).

Of all the books in the Bible that bring the message of the comprehensive victory of covenant-keepers, in time and on earth, Zechariah is the most detailed.

PEACE AND PROSPERITY

For before these days there was no hire for man, nor any hire for beast; neither was there any peace to him that went out or came in because of the affliction: for I set all men every one against his neighbour. But now I will not be unto the residue of this people as in the former days, saith the LORD of hosts. For the seed shall be prosperous; the vine shall give her fruit, and the ground shall give her increase, and the heavens shall give their dew; and I will cause the remnant of this people to possess all these things (Zech. 8:10–12).

A. The Division of Labor

The theocentric issue here was sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ Zechariah describes what it was like to live inside the land during the days of exile for the Israelites. The Samaritans and the few Israelites who had not been carried off lived in a society in which there was no trust, “for I set all men every one against his neighbour.” The division of labor had collapsed because there was no cooperation. Hence, there were no wages.

What was also missing was peace. “Neither was there any peace to him that went out or came in because of the affliction.” The Hebrew word translated “affliction” is usually translated “enemy” or “adversary.” This was not competition, where one man competed with another for a job. There were no jobs. It was more in the nature of warfare.

This meant that output must have collapsed. Economic cooperation allows the division of labor to increase production due to specialization. Each person concentrates on what he does best. The result is greater output per unit of resource input.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

This was about to change. "But now I will not be unto the residue of this people as in the former days, saith the LORD of hosts." The Hebrew word translated as "residue" is usually translated as "remnant." Example: "And I will cause the remnant of this people to possess all these things." The remnant in this context was the relative handful of Israelites who had returned from the Babylonian captivity. "Thus saith the LORD of hosts; Behold, I will save my people from the east country, and from the west country; And I will bring them, and they shall dwell in the midst of Jerusalem: and they shall be my people, and I will be their God, in truth and in righteousness" (Zech. 8:7–8).

B. A Healed Environment

Zechariah proclaims that the environment would change. "For the seed shall be prosperous; the vine shall give her fruit, and the ground shall give her increase, and the heavens shall give their dew; and I will cause the remnant of this people to possess all these things." The phrase, "the heavens shall give their dew," indicates that the environment had been under a curse.

The land had been given comparative rest. God had promised this centuries before.

And I will scatter you among the heathen, and will draw out a sword after you: and your land shall be desolate, and your cities waste. Then shall the land enjoy her sabbaths, as long as it lieth desolate, and ye be in your enemies' land; even then shall the land rest, and enjoy her sabbaths. As long as it lieth desolate it shall rest; because it did not rest in your sabbaths, when ye dwelt upon it (Lev. 26:33–35).

The desolation of the land was also its healing. Because the rains slowed, the land was not overworked by the new inhabitants. What had functioned as a curse for Israelites functioned as a healing process for the land.

Jeremiah had foreseen what would happen in his lifetime.

And them that had escaped from the sword carried he away to Babylon; where they were servants to him and his sons until the reign of the kingdom of Persia: To fulfil the word of the LORD by the mouth of Jeremiah, until the land had enjoyed her sabbaths: for as long as she lay desolate she kept sabbath, to fulfil threescore and ten years (II Chron. 36:20–21).

The period of rest for the land had come to an end. Now its productivity would flourish under the care of the restored remnant. The restoration of the people to the land had also been predicted by God. Moses had told them:

Then will I remember my covenant with Jacob, and also my covenant with Isaac, and also my covenant with Abraham will I remember; and I will remember the land. The land also shall be left of them, and shall enjoy her sabbaths, while she lieth desolate without them: and they shall accept of the punishment of their iniquity: because, even because they despised my judgments, and because their soul abhorred my statutes. And yet for all that, when they be in the land of their enemies, I will not cast them away, neither will I abhor them, to destroy them utterly, and to break my covenant with them: for I am the LORD their God. But I will for their sakes remember the covenant of their ancestors, whom I brought forth out of the land of Egypt in the sight of the heathen, that I might be their God: I am the LORD (Lev. 26:42–45).

C. The Restoration of Production

Zechariah announces God's revelation regarding the new situation. "But now I will not be unto the residue of this people as in the former days, saith the LORD of hosts." There would not be the universal fear and distrust that had governed society during the exile. There would be peace. So, there would be prosperity. "For the seed shall be prosperous; the vine shall give her fruit, and the ground shall give her increase."

Cooperation is the basis of prosperity. Peace is the basis of cooperation. Members of a peaceful society do not spend extensive time and money to defend themselves. They can live their lives without worrying about violence. They can, in the familiar phase, go about their business. Business expands.

As the division of labor expands, output per unit of input rises. Seeds grow. Vines produce fruit. The ground gives its increase. The division of labor does not affect rainfall, but it makes rainfall more productive. Whatever the land was capable of producing, peace would make such production more likely.

Peace was part of a liturgical blessing.

And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto Aaron and unto his sons, saying, On this wise [in this way] ye shall bless the children of Israel, saying unto them, The LORD bless thee, and keep thee: The LORD make his face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee: The LORD lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace (Num. 6:22–26).

A curse would become evident whenever peace and prosperity were removed.

And it come to pass, when he heareth the words of this curse, that he bless himself in his heart, saying, I shall have peace, though I walk in the imagination of mine heart, to add drunkenness to thirst: The LORD will not spare him, but then the anger of the LORD and his jealousy shall smoke against that man, and all the curses that are written in this book shall lie upon him, and the LORD shall blot out his name from under heaven (Deut. 29:19–20).

D. War and Poverty

Modern textbooks speak of war expenditures as productive economically. The Bible does not teach this. It teaches that peace produces prosperity. Then what does war produce? Poverty. Speaking of the Amorites and Moabites, Moses said: “Nevertheless the LORD thy God would not hearken unto Balaam; but the LORD thy God turned the curse into a blessing unto thee, because the LORD thy God loved thee. Thou shalt not seek their peace nor their prosperity all thy days for ever” (Deut. 23:5–6).

Mercantilists and Keynesians agree: war can be profitable. For a minority of individuals, yes. For society as a whole, no. The capital used to produce a weapon could have been used to produce a consumer good. The taxes necessary for military production could have been left in the hands of taxpayers, to spend or invest. The debt used to finance a war could have financed factories and research. The fractional reserve banking system’s fiat money, which is used to buy the government’s debt, lowers the value of the currency unit. This impoverishes those on fixed monetary incomes. Only when armaments do not lead to war, or when they are used to repel invaders, do they make society richer, for they protect the peace or a social order based on peace.

Conclusion

Peace and prosperity are covenantally linked. They are closely related positive corporate sanctions. The close connection between peace and prosperity extends across the boundaries of time and geography. So does the connection between war and poverty.

There had been a time in Israel when individuals had little peace, little cooperation, and little prosperity. Those days were over, Zechariah announced. A new day had dawned. If the nation conformed to the Mosaic law-order, it would prosper. The prophet called them to repentance, just as pre-exilic prophets had done. The people had not listened before the captivity. Zechariah offered their descendants an opportunity to gain the positive corporate sanctions offered by the Mosaic Covenant.

INTRODUCTION TO MALACHI

Malachi means “my messenger.” His ministry is believed to have begun after the remnant’s return from Persia in 536 B.C. The common estimate is mid-fifth century. There is no solid evidence for this. It is sometimes argued that he used the Persian word for governor in Malachi 1:8, but the same word is used in I Kings 10:15 and 20:24. He referred to the temple in Malachi 3:1, but the context of this reference is a future messenger. This does not prove that the second temple had been built yet. The strongest evidence is the text’s shared commitment with themes in Nehemiah: marriages with foreign women (Mal. 2:11–15; Neh. 13:23–27), failure to pay the tithe (Mal. 3:8–10; Neh. 13:10–14), and priestly corruption (Mal. 1:7–14; Neh. 13:7–9). Nehemiah’s return from Persia is commonly believed to have taken place in 444 B.C.

The book of Malachi is the last book in the Old Testament. This is appropriate, for Malachi was the last prophet to leave a written record that became canonical. He prophesied regarding the coming of a greater prophet. “Behold, I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me: and the Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple, even the messenger of the covenant, whom ye delight in: behold, he shall come, saith the LORD of hosts” (Mal. 3:1). Jesus identified this prophet: John the Baptist.

And as they departed, Jesus began to say unto the multitudes concerning John, What went ye out into the wilderness to see? A reed shaken with the wind? But what went ye out for to see? A man clothed in soft raiment? behold, they that wear soft clothing are in kings’ houses. But what went ye out for to see? A prophet? yea, I say unto you, and more than a prophet. For this is he, of whom it is written, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee. Verily I say unto you, Among them that are born of women there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist: notwithstanding he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he. And from the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force. For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John. And if ye will receive it, this is Elias [Elijah], which was for to come (Matt. 11:7–14).

In between Malachi and John the Baptist, we have no written record of any prophet who brought a covenant lawsuit against Israel.

Malachi's covenant lawsuit was direct and comprehensive. He blamed the priests for the post-exilic era of corruption. "For the priest's lips should keep knowledge, and they should seek the law at his mouth: for he is the messenger of the LORD of hosts. But ye are departed out of the way; ye have caused many to stumble at the law; ye have corrupted the covenant of Levi, saith the LORD of hosts" (Mal. 3:7–8). The ecclesiastical leadership was corrupt. "Ye have wearied the LORD with your words. Yet ye say, Wherein have we wearied him? When ye say, Every one that doeth evil is good in the sight of the LORD, and he delighteth in them; or, Where is the God of judgment?" (Mal. 2:17). This was the same accusation that Isaiah had brought against Judah three centuries earlier. He had prophesied that this willful perversity of judgment would eventually end. "The vile person shall be no more called liberal, nor the churl said to be bountiful" (Isa. 32:5). Malachi warned them: it had not ended yet.

It had not ended in John the Baptist's day, either. The religious leaders were still corrupt. "But when he saw many of the Pharisees and Sadducees come to his baptism, he said unto them, O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?" (Matt. 3:7).

It would be a mistake to interpret Malachi as anything but remotely concerned with economic reform. His concern with economic matters was limited. He had two complaints. First, the sons of Levi were oppressors and connivers with oppressors. God therefore threatened judgment. "And I will come near to you to judgment; and I will be a swift witness against the sorcerers, and against the adulterers, and against false swearers, and against those that oppress the hireling in his wages, the widow, and the fatherless, and that turn aside the stranger from his right, and fear not me, saith the LORD of hosts" (Mal. 3:5). Second, the nation refused to pay the tithe (Mal. 3:8–9). This passage is widely quoted and even more widely disobeyed today. The Israelites in Malachi's day did not take the warning seriously. Neither do Christians today.

The final word in the book, meaning the final word in the Old Testament, is curse. "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the LORD: And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse” (Mal. 4:5–6). It was a warning of destruction by God. It was also a call to repentance.

33

STEALING FROM GOD

Will a man rob God? Yet ye have robbed me. But ye say, Wherein have we robbed thee? In tithes and offerings. Ye are cursed with a curse: for ye have robbed me, even this whole nation (Mal. 3:7–8).

The theocentric issue here was sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ The fundamental principle of Christian economics is this: God owns everything. Christian economics begins with this principle. It therefore also ends with it. Christian economics is circular, as is true of every consistent system of human thought. That which is presupposed logically leads to a conclusion: the affirmation of that which is presupposed. In the same sense that God is both creator and final judge, so does the conclusion affirm the presupposition, not just in Christian thought but in Western thought generally.

The economic mark of God's ownership is the tithe. All men owe God a specified percentage of their income. Covenant-breakers are required to affirm this and then conform themselves to it. From other passages, we learn that a tithe was 10% of a rural land owner's net agricultural income. Under the Mosaic law, this was owed to the Levites (Lev. 27:32; Num. 18:21). Prior to the Mosaic law, Abram paid a tenth of his spoils to Melchizedek, the priest-king of Salem (Heb. 7:1–3).²

A. Theft = Not Paying

Here, Malachi introduces a fundamental judicial concept: refusing to give what is required by God constitutes theft. This is a broad judicial concept. It applies to everything covenantal. It establishes the judicial concept of property rights to a stream of income. There is no difference between stealing legal title to a judicially mandatory stream of income vs. refusing to supply this stream of income.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 29.

This principle of covenantal law establishes a principle of economics: there is no economic autonomy. It is therefore illegitimate to begin economic theory on the assumption that an individual, other than God, is sovereign over his property. He is subordinate to God, and God has mandated that other covenantal institutions have legitimate legal claims to a portion of his income.

These claims may not be legally enforceable in a civil court. This does not negate the claims. God's prophets warned Israel that He would enforce the legal claims of the Levites in His court. He had already intervened in history to impose negative sanctions. Haggai had told them: "Ye have sown much, and bring in little; ye eat, but ye have not enough; ye drink, but ye are not filled with drink; ye clothe you, but there is none warm; and he that earneth wages earneth wages to put it into a bag with holes" (Hag. 1:6).³ God now offered Israel another opportunity to test the reliability of His covenantal sanctions in history. He offered positive sanctions.

Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in mine house, and prove me now herewith, saith the LORD of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it. And I will rebuke the devourer for your sakes, and he shall not destroy the fruits of your ground; neither shall your vine cast her fruit before the time in the field, saith the LORD of hosts. And all nations shall call you blessed: for ye shall be a delightsome land, saith the LORD of hosts (Mal. 3:10–12).

This offer had to do with visible blessings. Other nations would see God's sovereignty at work. But, if the Israelites refused to change their collective ways, the visible losses would continue.

B. Hierarchy and Tithing

Every oath-bound covenant has a hierarchy.⁴ In the family covenant, the husband represents the wife before God, and the parents represent the children. The husband works to support his family. The flow of funds is downward. But, in their old age, parents are entitled to support by children. The flow of funds is upward when the children have wealth and their parents do not.⁵

3. Chapter 31.

4. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 2; North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 2.

In the other two covenantal governments—ecclesiastical and civil—administration is supported from the bottom up. The flow of funds is upward. The institutional church is entitled to a tithe from its members. The civil government is entitled to taxes of residents. Both church and state are under restraint. The church is entitled to no more than 10%. The state is entitled to less than 10%. Anything more than this constitutes civil tyranny, as Samuel warned Israel (I Sam. 8:14, 17).⁶

The judicial issue here is covenantal representation. All those who are represented by the leaders in a covenantal institution must pay for this privilege in some way. There are no free lunches and no free representation.

The tithe is an aspect of the priesthood. This was true in the Old Testament era before Moses. Abram paid a tithe to Melchizedek, for Melchizedek was the priest of Salem. In his own household, Abram was a priest and not under priestly authority. He paid no tithe. In Salem, he was under priestly authority, and therefore he paid a tithe for the privilege of being represented by the high priest (Gen. 14:18–21).⁷

In Moses' day, rural Israelites paid tithes to the Levites, who owned no rural land, and the Levites paid tithes to the family priests who officiated at the temple. The Levites were the tribe of Levi. The families were Merari, Gershon, and Kohath. Kohath supplied the priests, for it was the family of Aaron. The temple priests did not pay a tithe. They were the top of the ecclesiastical hierarchy. No one represented them ecclesiastically.

The tithe has to do with priestly representation. It had to do with the Mosaic sacrificial system only for as long as that representational system was mandatory. The tithe is a matter of the priesthood: Melchizedek's and Levi's.

5. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 25.

6. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 14.

7. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 21.

C. A Single Storehouse

“Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in mine house, and prove me now herewith, saith the LORD of hosts” (Mal. 3:10a). The language is clear. First, there is a single storehouse. Second, it belongs to God. Third, God calls it His house.

Which tithe was Malachi talking about? The tithe of tithes, which went to the temple priests. This had always been required in Mosaic Israel. The Mosaic law was clear. The tithes of rural people went to the local Levites. They in turn tithed to the Aaronic priests, who oversaw the sacrifices at the tabernacle-temple (Num. 18:26–27). This was a bottom-up flow of wealth.

Note: the temple priests did not tithe. There was no one to tithe to. They were at the top of the ecclesiastical hierarchy. Israel was a hierarchy of priests. God had told Moses, just before the giving of the Mosaic law, “And ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation. These are the words which thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel” (Ex. 19:6).⁸

The captivity had removed the people from the land. Very few Levites returned: 341 (Ezra 2:40–54). In contrast, 4,289 priests returned (Ezra 2:36–39). The priests were Levites, as members of the tribe of Levi, so they were supported by their share of the tithe. But the temple priests were paid extra to officiate at the temple. The Levites and priests submitted themselves to the Mosaic law on this point: a tenth of the tithe went to the temple priests. The people also understood this. They corporately confessed their faith in an act of covenant renewal. “They clave to their brethren, their nobles, and entered into a curse, and into an oath, to walk in God’s law, which was given by Moses the servant of God, and to observe and do all the commandments of the LORD our Lord, and his judgments and his statutes” (Neh. 10:29). They understood their responsibilities. They paid the Levites locally, but the tenth of a tenth was sent to the temple. This was the common storehouse.

... that we should bring the firstfruits of our dough, and our offerings, and the fruit of all manner of trees, of wine and of oil, unto the priests, to the chambers of the house of our God; and the tithes of our ground unto the Levites, that the same Levites might have the tithes in all the cities of our tillage. And the priest the son of Aaron shall be with the Levites, when the Levites take tithes: and the Levites shall bring up the tithe of the tithes unto the house of our God, to the chambers, into the treasure house (Neh. 10:37–38).

8. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 20.

Why the temple? Because it was the earthly residence of God. It was where the holy of holies was, which had once housed the Ark of the Covenant, which had contained the covenantal implements that had been placed inside the tabernacle at the exodus: the golden censer, the tablets of the law, a jar of manna, and Aaron's rod (Heb. 9:4). The tabernacle-temple had always been referred to as the house of the Lord. "The first of the firstfruits of thy land thou shalt bring unto the house of the LORD thy God" (Ex. 34:26a). "Thou shalt not bring the hire of a whore, or the price of a dog, into the house of the LORD thy God for any vow: for even both these are abomination unto the LORD thy God" (Deut. 23:18).

So, the house of the Lord was the storehouse for the tithe of the tithes. Building the temple was the focus of concern in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah. This was Malachi's concern, too. Thus, he reminds the nation of the national collection point for the tithe. He had to be speaking of the priestly tithe, not the Levitical tithe, which is why the Levitical tithe was collected locally, as we have seen (Neh. 10:37).

The temple tithe was judicially representative, just as the sacrifices were judicially representative. The tithe went to the priestly tribe, which had no inheritance in rural land. It was collected locally, but a representative 10% was sent to the priests at Jerusalem. This was the common storehouse. It was common because it was judicially representative.

D. The New Testament

There are only three references to Levites in the New Testament.⁹ These references do not describe the Levites' specific functions. Levites were part of the religious leadership. "And this is the record of John, when the Jews sent priests and Levites from Jerusalem to ask him, Who art thou?" (John 1:19). The Sadducees were closely associated with the temple. They served as the priests.¹⁰ The Pharisees were rivals of the Sadducees.¹¹ The Pharisees and scribes were interpreters of the law. The New Testament does not explicitly indicate how they

9. Luke 10:32; John 1:19; Acts 4:36.

10. "Sadducees," The Jewish Encyclopedia (New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1901–6), pp. 630–33. (<http://bit.ly/SadduceesJE>)

11. "Pharisees," ibid., pp. 661–66. (<http://bit.ly/PhariseesJE>) were paid.

The scribes and Pharisees were not the officiating priests of the temple. The Sadducees were. So, the Pharisees and scribes owed tithes either to the Levites, or if they were themselves Levites, to the temple priests. Christ condemned the scribes and Pharisees for not being sufficiently faithful to the Mosaic law. They did tithe, He said, and this was proper. But it was not enough. “Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithe of mint and anise and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith: these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone” (Matt. 23:23).¹² Jesus’ warning makes it clear that tithing is still required. We are not to let “the other”—tithing—undone. When I say clear, I mean “clear to anyone not trying to escape his requirement to tithe.”

Theologians who deny the legitimacy of the tithe in the New Testament era try to escape the plain teaching of Christ. They deny that Matthew 23:23 applies to Christians or the church. Some say that He was preaching only to the scribes and Pharisees, who were still under the Mosaic order. This is an odd way to argue, since Christ Himself was under that order, as He said: “Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled” (Matt. 5:17–18).¹³ We are asked to believe that He was speaking only to those two groups, not anyone else in Israel, and surely not speaking to us.¹⁴ Others argue that the New Testament era is exclusively post-70 A.D., when the Mosaic sacrificial system ended with the Roman legions’ destruction of Jerusalem and the temple. Therefore, every rule announced by Christ was authoritative only for the Jews of His era, for He lived under the Mosaic sacrificial system. We do not. This line of reasoning is inherently antinomian. It leaves Christians with no uniquely biblical source of law, including the Ten Commandments. Dispensational pastor Donald Gray Barnhouse is representative of this line of reasoning. He wrote: “It was a tragic hour when the Reforma-

12. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 46.

13. Greg L. Bahnsen, Theonomy in Christian Ethics, 3rd ed. (Nacogdoches, Texas: Covenant Media Press, 2002).

14. Andreas J. Köstenberger and David A. Croteau, “Will a Man Rob God?” (Malachi 3:8): A Study of Tithing in the Old and New Testaments,” (2006), p. 19. (<http://bit.ly/RobGod>)

tion wrote the Ten Commandments into their creeds.”¹⁵

I have said that the tithe is an aspect of the priesthood. Jesus is the high priest. This is the message of the epistle to the Hebrews.

Whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus, made an high priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec. For this Melchisedec, king of Salem, priest of the most high God, who met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings, and blessed him; To whom also Abraham gave a tenth part of all; first being by interpretation King of righteousness, and after that also King of Salem, which is, King of peace (Heb. 6:20–7:2).¹⁶

This is the supreme priesthood. We know this because Melchizedek represented Abram before God, serving him bread and wine (Gen. 14:18).¹⁷ Abram, not yet Abraham, had no son. Yet Abram represented Isaac, who represented Jacob, who represented Levi. Therefore, Hebrews insists, “Levi also, who receiveth tithes, payed tithes in Abraham. For he was yet in the loins of his father, when Melchisedec met him” (Heb. 7:9–10). Paying tithes “in Abraham” is covenantal language. It has to do with legal representation. Melchizedek had represented the unborn patriarchs in Salem. The argument of Hebrews is that he also represents us, as followers of the God of Abram. Jesus, as the heir of Melchizedek’s office of high priest, represents us.

The author of Hebrews said that Jesus has forever replaced Levi as the high priest. Thus, there has been a change in the law. “For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law” (Heb. 7:12). We know that the church, like Israel, is a nation of priests. “But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should shew forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light” (I Peter 2:9). Just as rural members of the nation of priests under Moses were required by biblical law to pay tithes to the Levites, and just as the Levites were required by biblical law to pay tithes to the temple priests, so are Christians, a royal priesthood, required by biblical law to pay

15. Cited by S. Lewis Johnson, “The Paralysis of Legalism,” Bibliotheca Sacra, Vol. 120 (April/June 1963), p. 109. Bibliotheca Sacra in 1963 was published by Dallas Theological Seminary, then the world’s leading dispensational institution of higher education.

16. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 29.

17. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 21.

tithes to the institutional church.¹⁸ If they refuse, there will be negative corporate sanctions on the church. If they obey, there will be positive corporate sanctions.

E. Land and Tithe in Post-Exilic Israel

There is no evidence, biblical or extra-biblical, that the empires that controlled Israel after the exile enforced the pre-exilic land distribution of the families. They did not enforce the jubilee laws governing the return of land to the heirs of the conquest generation.

This created a problem for the law governing the Levitical tithe. The Levites were entitled to the tithe of the increase from the land. This was their inheritance. They did not receive rural land, as the other tribes did. They could own property in the 48 Levitical cities. They could own land in walled cities, as anyone could. But they could not inherit rural land. This allowed them to live in all of the tribal regions.

The Mosaic civil government enforced the Levitical tithe because this was a matter of a property right. It was to be as secure as rural land. I have argued that only the increase from rural land was subject to the tithe because this was the Levites' alternative to land ownership. Those living in walled cities and Levitical cities did not owe the tithe because, in those jurisdictions, the Levites were not discriminated against in terms of property ownership.

After the exile, all this changed. Anyone could own land, as far as the evidence indicates. There is no indication in the New Testament that Levites were exclusively urban property owners. So, if the Levites suffered no disadvantage, on what basis were they eligible for a tithe? Because the civil government no longer had a lawful role in enforcing the Levitical tithe, the hierarchy shifted from the civil government to the church. The tithe became an obligation for all those who were part of the ecclesiastical community. The pre-exilic structure of the tithe still existed in the post-exilic era: a tenth of the Levites' tenth went to the temple priests (Neh. 10:38). What had changed was the enforcement agency. The tithe was now owed by all covenant-keepers, not just owners of rural land. But the basis of this obligation was now ecclesiastical service, not tribal inheritance. The requirement to tithe became geographically universal. This is why Jesus told the Pharisees that they owed the tithe (Matt. 23:23).

18. Gary North, Tithing and the Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994). (<http://bit.ly/gntithing>)

Conclusion

Malachi made it clear that he came in the name of God. He accused the nation of cheating God by not tithing. He called this theft. He offered corporate positive sanctions for repentance: the open window of heaven and the rebuke of the devourer. Haggai had already told them that they were under negative sanctions: a money bag with holes in it.

Because the tithe he spoke of was to be placed in a common storehouse—specifically, God’s house: the temple—he had to be speaking of the Levites’ tithe to the temple priests. This was a representative tithe of the Levites’ right of inheritance. We know this from both the Mosaic law of the priestly tithe and from the account in Nehemiah regarding the collection of the priestly tithe.

The tithe in question was the two-fold Mosaic tithe: Levitical and priestly. It went to the priests of the temple. It was a temple tithe because it was a priestly tithe. If the Levites had to tithe to the temple priests, as the Mosaic law required, then surely the nation had to tithe to the Levites. If they obeyed, they would be blessed with positive corporate sanctions. That was Malachi’s message to post-exilic Israel. If they disobeyed, there would be negative corporate sanctions. That was Haggai’s message to post-exilic Israel.

CONCLUSION

Yet the LORD testified against Israel, and against Judah, by all the prophets, and by all the seers, saying, Turn ye from your evil ways, and keep my commandments and my statutes, according to all the law which I commanded your fathers, and which I sent to you by my servants the prophets. Notwithstanding they would not hear, but hardened their necks, like to the neck of their fathers, that did not believe in the LORD their God. And they rejected his statutes, and his covenant that he made with their fathers, and his testimonies which he testified against them; and they followed vanity, and became vain, and went after the heathen that were round about them, concerning whom the LORD had charged them, that they should not do like them (II Kings 17:13–15).

A. Covenant Lawsuits

The prophets brought a series of covenant lawsuits against Israel and Judah. They prophesied corporate negative sanctions, culmination in national captivity. These lawsuits were ignored by the people and their leaders. The corporate negative sanctions came, as prophesied, culminating in the final round of sanctions: the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.¹ Furthermore, the prophets invoked the Mosaic law as the legal foundation of their covenant lawsuits against the nation. The Mosaic law was authoritative because it specified institutional sanctions: familial, civil, and ecclesiastical. Without these sanctions, the Mosaic law would have been merely a catalogue of moral suggestions. The prophets would have been moral philosophers, comparable perhaps to Socrates and Plato, but no more authoritative.

For modern Christian critics of the prevailing economic order to invoke the prophets as witnesses against the prevailing economic order is disingenuous if they do not also affirm the existence of God's predictable, visible, corporate covenantal sanctions in history. The prophets possessed lawful authority to speak on God's behalf. They lawfully invoked God's negative historical sanctions. They warned Israel of negative corporate sanctions to come if the nation ignored their warnings and did not repent.

1. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, [1987] 2007). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>) David Chilton, The Great Tribulation (Tyler, Texas: Dominion Press, [1987] 1997). (<http://bit.ly/dctrib>)

B. The Authority of Biblical Law Today

What relevance do the prophets' warnings have for Christians who live in the New Testament era? Here, most Protestant theologians do whatever they can to avoid answering. If they say the prophets' message has judicial relevance, then corporate covenantal sanctions must still be in force. This conclusion is much too controversial, for it raises the judicial issue of theonomy and the political issue of Christian Reconstruction. But if they say "no judicial relevance," this makes them sound like antinomians, which they are, hermeneutically speaking. So, they write paragraphs such as the following, in order to avoid dealing straightforwardly with the judicial and moral problem.

An important consideration in connection with this pericope [Mal 3] is whether the demands and the promises are also applicable in the NT dispensation, as they were under the OT dispensation. Our answer must be "Yes" and "No." Yes, because there is continuity in connection with both our obligation to fulfill our stewardship and the promises of God's blessing in our lives. This cannot be denied. At the same time our answer must be "No," because we also have a discontinuity pertaining to the specific relationship between the OT and the NT and the relative dispensations. The discontinuity consists especially in the outward scheme of things, regarding both the obligations and the promises.²

This is theological doubletalk. Prophecy in the Old Testament was covenantal. It had to do with covenant lawsuits, to which were attached covenantal corporate sanctions. So, in order to invoke the authority of the prophets, a New Testament era critic of society must also invoke the authority of biblical law: its oaths, its institutional hierarchies, its stipulations, and its sanctions.

2. Pieter A. Verhoef, The Books of Haggai and Malachi (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1987), p. 311. Cited by Andreas J. Köstenberger and David A. Croteau, "Reconstructing a Biblical Model for Giving: A Discussion of Relevant Systematic Issues and New Testament Principles" (2006), p. 8. (<http://bit.ly/GivingModel>). I have offered an extended critique of Croteau's position on tithing in Perspectives on Tithing: 4 Views, ed. David A. Croteau (Nashville, Tennessee: B&H Academic, 2011), ch. 9.

The social critics rarely do this. Apart from the theonomists and British Israelites, the economic critics reject the Mosaic law, as well as any New Testament social order based on extensions into the New Testament era of its stipulations and sanctions. They do not offer a hermeneutic that provides guidance as to which Mosaic laws extend into the New Testament era and which do not. They reject the theonomists' hermeneutic: still binding unless annulled by New Testament revelation, i.e., "innocent until proven guilty."³

C. Rewriting the Prophets

Within the evangelical community in the Anglo-American world are church members who are committed to the welfare state. They not only accept the tenets of the welfare state's political order, they actively promote it within their circles.

In their search for justification of their political commitment, they return again and again to the prophets. They also cite a handful of texts in the Mosaic law, most notably the jubilee laws (Lev. 25),⁴ which were all annulled with the ministry of Christ (Luke 4:16–21).⁵ If the jubilee was not annulled by the New Testament, then the law authorizing intergenerational slavery would still validate the practice (Lev. 25:44–46).⁶ Liberation theologians never mention this aspect of the jubilee. They also categorically refuse to accept the judicial authority of the vast bulk of the Mosaic law's economic passages. Above all, they refuse to go to this verse:

Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty: but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour (Lev. 19:15).⁷

When men invoke the prophets as moral guides for modern times, it is utterly illegitimate for them to deny the law-order that the prophets invoked as justifying their covenant lawsuits. Yet the liberation theologians, some of whom were Marxists before the embarrassing collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, do exactly this. They invoke the

3. Greg L. Bahnsen, By This Standard: The Authority of God's Law Today (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1985), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/gbbts>)

4. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), chaps. 25–32.

5. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

6. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 31.

7. Ibid., ch. 14.

prophets, yet they dismiss the Mosaic law as no longer judicially binding. This is not an oversight. It is self-conscious deception by supposed experts in the Scriptures. They come in the name of God as would-be prophets, bringing their would-be covenant lawsuits against society in general and Christians in particular. Their listeners are told that they are accomplices of economic oppressors. The accusation is true, for they are partial supporters of the welfare state, which is a system based on oppression on a massive scale. The welfare state rests on this commandment: “Thou shalt not steal, except by majority vote.”

The liberation theologians’ criticism is that the modern American state has not gone far enough, since it extracts only about 40% of the nation’s output through taxes and regulation. This 40% is twice the tax rate imposed by the Pharaoh under Joseph. “And Joseph made it a law over the land of Egypt unto this day, that Pharaoh should have the fifth part; except the land of the priests only, which became not Pharaoh’s” (Gen. 47:26). This was God’s judgment on Egypt, which worshipped a supposedly divine god-king.⁸ The modern world would have to cut taxes by half in order to get back to the most bureaucratic social order of the pre-Mosaic world. Our would-be prophets never mention this, for obvious reasons. In the name of Jesus, they cry out for even greater taxation than twice the taxation of Pharaonic Egypt.⁹

Within American Protestant evangelicalism, their movement is tiny and is generally limited to people who majored in the liberal arts in college. They are not popular within the broader evangelical, Lutheran, and fundamentalist community. But, because they gain the support of Left-wing humanists in the media, they receive a lot of publicity. This makes their movement seem larger than it is.

D. The Economics of the Prophets

I have systematically exegeted the Mosaic economic laws, verse by verse, beginning in 1973. I have completed the exegesis. This has been a long, arduous task. I find that the critics who publicly invoke the

8. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 32:C.

9. For critiques of this position, see David Chilton, Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators: A Biblical Response to Ronald J. Sider, 3rd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1981] 1996). (<http://bit.ly/dcsider>). See also Questions for Jim Wallis, at www.GaryNorth.com. See also my responses in Robert G. Clouse (ed.), Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views of Economics (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1984). (<http://bit.ly/ClouseWAP>) prophets' economic criticisms of Israel rarely refer to the Mosaic statutes invoked by the prophets. They also never refer to any of my economic commentaries on the Mosaic law, which total 14 volumes: Exodus 20 to Deuteronomy 31.

Thus, a reader would be wise to examine carefully the alleged connections between the prophets and the social critics' recommended economic reforms, which are too often calls for coercive intervention into the economy by the state. The reader should ask these questions.

Did the prophets call on the civil government to intervene in the Old Testament passages cited by the critics?

Did the relevant Mosaic statutes call on the state to intervene?

Does the critic identify the Mosaic statute in each passage from the prophets?

Does the critic explain the context of the Mosaic statute?

Does the critic's proposed economic reform violate any Mosaic statute?

Does the critic argue that the Mosaic law offers us an authoritative blueprint for economics?

Does the critic in fact deny that the Mosaic law offers a blueprint for economics?

Does the critic invoke the New Testament as offering a blueprint for economics?

Does the critic refer to a comprehensive study of the New Testament which identifies the structure and details of this alleged blueprint?

Be alert to the possibility that the critic is systematically misusing the prophets in order to promote some version of liberation theology—not the dead Marxist version of the 1970s and 1980s, but rather a softened version of socialism or Keynesian interventionism aimed at Protestant audiences.

E. Principles of Interpretation

The prophets came before Israel and Judah with covenant lawsuits. They invoked the Mosaic law. They therefore warned of negative corporate sanctions to come, but also offered hope: positive corporate sanctions to come. They called on their listeners to repent. This repentance would have corporate implications. It would also require corporate reforms.

In their catalogue of transgressions, individual and corporate, were economic sins. With the exception of Isaiah, the prophets listed very few economic transgressions. As a percentage of the size of the book of Isaiah, the list of economic sins constituted very little.

This should serve as a warning to contemporary readers. First, the prophets invoked the Mosaic law. Second, they invoked corporate sanctions in terms of specific Mosaic statutes. Third, the context of their predictions of specific things to come was the Mosaic law: statutes and sanctions. Fourth, they called on their listeners to repent.

The fifth point relates to the specific economic transgressions listed by the prophets. There were few of them, and they all referred back to the Mosaic law. Therefore, all contemporary Christian critics of contemporary economic institutions and practices who invoke the Old Testament prophets, but who then refuse to turn to the Mosaic law as the judicial basis of their criticisms are practicing deception, beginning with self-deception. They implore their readers to take seriously the moral issues raised by the prophets, yet they themselves do not take seriously the judicial context of the prophets' criticisms of the social order and economic practices of their contemporaries. The judicial context was the nation's abandonment of the Mosaic law.

I have never argued that all of the statutes of the Mosaic law carry over into the New Covenant. The bulk of them do not. I have argued that there is a Bible-based hermeneutic that lets us filter out the annulled laws. This hermeneutic distinguishes among four categories.

1. Land laws
2. Seed laws
3. Priestly laws
4. Cross-boundary laws¹⁰

Only laws in the fourth category of Mosaic laws carry over into the New Covenant. Many of these cross-boundary laws were economic laws. Among the civil laws that did not carry over were the laws associated with the Jubilee, which included chattel slavery (Lev. 25:44–46), the laws mandating the civil enforcement of the tithe for the Levites, laws governing real estate ownership in walled cities, laws governing land inherited by daughters, gleaning laws, and the laws of levirate marriage. Civil laws that did carry over are laws prohibiting false balances, laws enforcing restitution for theft, laws prohibiting the withholding of wages, laws discriminating against non-citizens, laws favoring one group against another, and laws against fraud.

10. North, Boundaries and Dominion, Conclusion.

In contrast are the contemporary critics of modern free market capitalism who call for an extension of the welfare state's policies of coercive redistribution of private wealth. The two most prominent organizations in the United States that promote this view are Sojourners and Evangelicals for Social Action, by which they mean state action. Not one of their representatives has written so much a single volume of exegesis of the Mosaic economic laws. Not one of them has offered a book on the hermeneutic principles governing the application of Mosaic statutes in the New Covenant era. Not one of them has offered a systematic book on Christian economic casuistry: the application of biblical moral principles to specific economic practices. We have waited for over 40 years. So, until one of them does, and until a dozen of his fellow collectivists hail his breakthrough as authoritative, and then write their critiques of contemporary economic practice in terms of his methodology, I suggest that you impose your own "prophetic" judgment: "Case not proven."

Conclusion

The title of this book is Restoration and Dominion. Restoration is the outcome of repentance. What has repentance got to do with dominion? We can see this most clearly in the message of the prophets, but especially Zechariah.

The prophets brought a series of covenant lawsuits against Israel and Judah. They were essentially the same lawsuit. The two nations had abandoned the Mosaic law. Unless they repented, God would impose the negative sanctions of the law listed in the longer, later sections of Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. On the other hand, if they did repent, God would withdraw the negative sanctions and bring the positive sanctions, as promised in the shorter introductory sections of these two passages.

In investing, there is a saying: "Cut your losses, and let your profits run." If an investor can eliminate his losses, the gains will compound. The secret of investment success is this: do not lose money. This assumes that growth is inherent in capitalism. But economic growth is not inherent. It is the outcome of a combination of factors: private property, the enforcement of contracts, stable money, future-orientation, entrepreneurship, and the rule of law. Where these exist, there will be economic growth if negative sanctions are avoided: war, plague, and famine. These negative sanctions are restricted by God in response to a society's obedience to His Bible-revealed law.

The prophets offered dominion, but only on God's covenantal terms. Israel rejected these terms. Their inheritance was removed in 70 A.D. It was transferred to the church. The same covenantal terms apply. The same interrelated system of law and sanctions applies. The same offer applies: repentance and dominion.

PRIORITIES AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON MATTHEW

Other Books by Gary North

- An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)
 Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)
An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)
 Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)
 None Dare Call It Witchcraft (1976)
 Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)
 Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)
 Government by Emergency (1983)
 Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)
75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)
 Coined Freedom (1984)
 Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)
 Honest Money (1986)
 Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)
Dominion and Common Grace (1987)
 Inherit the Earth (1987)
 Liberating Planet Earth (1987)
 Healer of the Nations (1987)
 The Pirate Economy (1987)
Is the World Running Down? (1988)
 When Justice Is Aborted (1989)
 Political Polytheism (1989)
 Judeo-Christian Tradition (1990)
 The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)
 Victim's Rights (1990)
Millennialism and Social Theory (1990)
 Westminster's Confession (1991)
Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar
 The Coase Theorem (1992)
Salvation Through Inflation (1993)
 Rapture Fever (1993)
 Tithing and the Church (1994)
Baptized Patriarchalism (1995)
 Crossed Fingers (1996)
 The Covenantal Tithe (2011)
 Mises on Money (2012)

PRIORITIES AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON MATTHEW

GARY NORTH

Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew

Copyright © Gary North, 2012
Second Edition

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

This book is dedicated to

John Schaub

a businessman who has his priorities straight

TABLE OF CONTENTS

| | |
|--|-----|
| Introduction | 1 |
| 1. Stones Into Bread: Power Religion (Matt. 4:1–4) | 9 |
| 2. Risk-Free Living: Power Religion (Matt. 4:5–7) | 18 |
| 3. The Kingdoms of Man: Power Religion (Matt. 4:8–10) ... | 26 |
| 4. Meekness and Inheritance (Matt. 5:5) | 32 |
| 5. The Salt of the Earth (Matt. 5:13) | 39 |
| 6. The City on a Hill (Matt. 5:14–16) | 49 |
| 7. Reconciliation Before Formal Sacrifice (Matt. 5:22–24) .. | 59 |
| 8. Early Confession (Matt. 5:25–26) | 62 |
| 9. Bribing Tyrants (Matt. 5:38–42) | 67 |
| 10. Common Grace, Special Peace (Matt. 5:43–47) | 76 |
| 11. Charity Given in Secret (Matt. 6:1–4) | 84 |
| 12. The Lord’s Prayer (Matt. 6:9–13) | 89 |
| 13. Incorrupt Treasure (Matt. 6:19–21) | 100 |
| 14. Rival Masters, Rival Kingdoms (Matt. 6:24–25) | 107 |
| 15. All These Things (Matt. 6:31–34) | 116 |
| 16. Golden Rule and Golden Opportunities (Matt. 7:7–12) ... | 129 |
| 17. The Two Gates (Matt. 7:7–12) | 136 |
| 18. By Their Fruits You Shall Know Them (Matt. 7:15–20) .. | 145 |
| 19. First Things First (Matt. 8:19–22) | 157 |
| 20. The Lure of Business (Matt. 8:28–34) | 162 |
| 21. Occupation (Matt. 9:9) | 166 |
| 22. No Visible Reserves (Matt. 10:6–10) | 176 |
| 23. Confident Fear (Matt. 10:29–31) | 183 |
| 24. Life: Lost and Found (Matt. 10:39) | 191 |
| 25. Lightly Yoked (Matt. 11:28–30) | 196 |
| 26. Open Fields at Harvest Time (Matt. 12:1–2) | 202 |
| 27. The Rich Get Richer; So Do The Poor (Matt. 13:10–13) .. | 224 |
| 28. The Deceitfulness of Riches (Matt. 13:18–23) | 240 |
| 29. Continuity and Civilization (Matt. 13:24–30) | 251 |
| 30. Hope and Commitment (Matt. 13:31–33) | 262 |
| 31. Hidden Treasure (Matt. 13:44–46) | 267 |

| | |
|---|-----|
| 32. Tradition and Innovation (Matt. 13:52) | 275 |
| 33. Budgets Reveal Priorities (Matt. 15:3–6) | 282 |
| 34. The Crumbs of Life (Matt. 15:21–28) | 286 |
| 35. To Gain The Whole World (Matt. 16:24–26) | 291 |
| 36. Tribute Money (Matt. 17:24–27) | 296 |
| 37. Hierarchy of Indebtedness (Matt. 18:23–30) | 303 |
| 38. The Rich Young Ruler (Matt. 19:16–26) | 316 |
| 39. Hundredfold Growth (Matt. 19:27–30) | 327 |
| 40. The Rights of Ownership (Matt. 20:1–16) | 337 |
| 41. The Principle of Service (Matt. 20:25–28) | 348 |
| 42. Monopoly Pricing (Matt. 21:12–13) | 357 |
| 43. Confiscation in the Name of the People (Matt. 21:33–39) . | 365 |
| 44. Rendering Unto Caesar and God (Matt. 22:15–22) | 376 |
| 45. Cooperation and Competition (Matt. 22:37–40) | 384 |
| 46. The Mandatory Tithe (Matt. 23:23–24) | 394 |
| 47. Profit and Interest (Matt. 25:14–30) | 399 |
| 48. Discipling the Nations (Matt. 28:18–20) | 411 |
| Conclusion | 415 |

INTRODUCTION

But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you (Matt. 6:33).

A. The Centrality of God's Kingdom

Jesus made it clear that seeking God's kingdom is priority number one for the individual. Most people today and in the past have not acknowledged this fact, not even to themselves. They suppress the truth that their own nature and the creation reveal about God (Rom. 1:18–25).¹ This does not mean that Jesus was wrong about mankind's top priority. It means only that most men are in rebellion against God.

Evangelical Christians too often believe that God's top priority is the salvation of men. This is a man-centered viewpoint, a kind of baptized humanism for Christians. It makes them think that they are the center of God's concern. They are not. God is the center of God's concern. The universe is theocentric.

If the salvation of men were God's primary concern, then He is surely suffering a massive program failure, for comparatively few people so far have been saved. The glory of God, which includes hell (Luke 16:23) and the post-final judgment lake of fire (Rev. 20:15), is God's chief priority. The salvation of men is God's means of extending His kingdom in history, but the way in which it is built, which includes the eternal destruction of those who oppose His kingdom, is part of God's decree. As Paul wrote, "For the scripture saith unto Pharaoh, Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might shew my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth" (Rom. 9:17–18). The destruction of His enemies glorifies God.

Jesus defined a person's personal salvation in terms of entering into the kingdom of God. This kingdom is spiritual because men enter it through the Holy Spirit. “Jesus answered, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God” (John 3:5). It is also eternal (Rev. 21; 22). It is also historical. As the parable of Lazarus and the rich man indicates, men enter God’s kingdom only in history (Luke 16:19–31).² There is continuity between the historical and eternal aspects of God’s kingdom. This continuity will be revealed for all to see at the Second Coming/general resurrection (I Cor. 15:40–50) and the final judgment which immediately follows: the corporate spiritual inheritance of the saints (I Cor. 15:51–57).³ There is also continuity personally: heavenly eternal rewards will be handed out in terms of a person’s earthly productivity in building God’s historical kingdom.

1. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press. [2000] 2012), ch. 3.

For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ. Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; Every man’s work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man’s work of what sort it is. If any man’s work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man’s work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire (I Cor. 3:11–15).⁴

Finding and then building the kingdom of God in history is the central theme of the New Testament, culminating in the fulfillment of the New Heavens and New Earth (Rev. 21; 22). This theme is an extension to the gentile world of a commandment and promise of the Old Testament: the building of God’s city, Zion. This theme is ultimately a recapitulation of the pre-Fall dominion covenant: “And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them. And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth” (Gen. 1:26–28).⁵ Adam, as God’s agent, was assigned this task representatively for all mankind. Through their adoption by God, God’s people are commanded to extend His kingdom.

2. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 40.

3. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 3.

4. Ibid., ch. 3.

God’s kingdom is not limited to the church or the Christian family. It is all-encompassing. God is the creator. Everything that He created is part of His kingdom. To deny this is necessarily to affirm that Satan, through Adam’s rebellion, possesses a legal claim to part of the creation. He does not have such a legally valid claim. Adam was merely God’s steward, not the original owner. Adam could not forfeit to Satan what he did not own. God’s kingdom is therefore co-extensive with the earth: every realm in which men work out their salvation with fear and trembling (Phil. 2:12). Wherever there is sin, there is an area fit for reconquest.

B. All These Things

Man’s top priority is seeking, finding, entering, and building the kingdom of God, but a legitimate secondary priority is the accumulation of wealth, in history and eternity. “All these things” is a comprehensive promise. This is the reward to God’s people for kingdom-building. As redeemed men build it, step by step, they are provided with additional capital by God. The same system of positive economic feedback that Moses announced to the Israelites also applies to the New Covenant: “But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:18).⁶

“All these things” summarize the ultimate success indicators for the church in history: the spoils of a spiritual war and the fruits of the church’s labors. The accumulation of wealth is a positive sanction of God’s covenant. Rewards are designed to increase covenant-keeping men’s faith in God’s covenant. The compounding of wealth, including population, is a sign of God’s covenantal presence, whenever this wealth is accompanied by faith in God. But compound growth becomes a snare and a delusion when it is stripped of its kingdom-building context. When men move from the kingdom of God to the kingdom of man, marked by a shift from theonomy to autonomy, their wealth testifies against them, and compound growth accumulates negative sanctions in history and eternity. The greatest Old Covenant model of this covenant-breaking autonomy is Egypt. The disinheritance of Egypt at the exodus involved a restitution payment for the enslavement of the Israelites.

5. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

6. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 22.

C. The Kingdom of God

The Gospel of Matthew,⁷ written by a former tax collector, is dedicated to the theme of God's kingdom in history. The other Gospels touch on the same theme, but this Gospel makes it central. The movement from the kingdom of man to the kingdom of God was illustrated by Matthew's visible transfer of allegiance from Caesar to Christ. A symbol of this transfer of allegiance was Matthew's decision to leave the money table and join the disciples.⁸

The kingdom of God is central to history, Matthew teaches. This means that the kingdom is in history, and it shapes history. It overcomes resistance in history. "And I say also unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it" (Matt. 16:18). Gates are defensive. Hell has gates. Satan's kingdom is on the defensive today. The gates of hell are historical, part of the historical conflict between good and evil. The conflict is now. The church will not batter down hell's gates in the nether world. There is no point of contact between heaven and hell beyond the grave; a great gulf separates them (Luke 16:26). So, the points of conflict are historical. The gates of hell must refer to the kingdom of Satan in history.

The church is never said to have gates, but because of their pessimistic eschatologies, millions of Christians have a mental image of a besieged church, whose gates cannot be battered down completely by Satan's agents. This outlook reverses the imagery in the text. The church is on the offensive in New Covenant history; Satan's forces are on the defensive. The gates of hell will not prevail against the church in history. This points inescapably to postmillennialism.

More than the other Gospels, Matthew's is explicitly postmillennial. That is because its theme is the kingdom of God. The kingdom par-

7. I capitalize Gospel when I am speaking of a book of the Bible, in contrast to the general good news (gospel) of Christ.

8. Chapter 21.

ables of Matthew 13 assert historical continuity, meaning that there will be no Rapture into the clouds prior to the general resurrection and final judgment. The imagery of the mustard seed and the leaven (Matt. 13⁹) indicates the growth of the kingdom: from a tiny seed to a tree, or the leavening of the world's dough. Both images are distinctly postmillennial: a world steadily transformed by a process of continuous growth. As the world is transformed by the gospel, the gates of hell are rolled back.

D. The Dominion Covenant: Discipling the Nations

Matthew's Gospel is the only Gospel in which the Great Commission is announced (Matt. 28:18–20). This call to discipling the nations is comprehensive.¹⁰ It is the New Covenant's application of the dominion covenant.

I have called Genesis 1:26–28 a covenant. Why? Man here takes no covenantal oath to God. No negative sanctions are listed. This is because the covenant here begins with God. Man was not yet created. The members of the Godhead—the language is plural—agreed to make man in their image. There was hierarchy: man under God and the creation under man. There was a law involved: to multiply and subdue the earth. The sanctions were announced only after Adam was created: possession over everything except the forbidden tree, but death for the violation of this sacred boundary. There was an inheritance implied through multiplication: the whole earth subdued by Adam's heirs.

This pre-Adamic covenant defines man and his relation to the creation. The other four covenants require some sort of self-maledictory oath between man and God. Man calls down God's negative sanctions, should he break the oath's terms. This was not true of the dominion covenant. It did not require an oath-bound ratification on man's part. God enumerated the sanctions on man's behalf: inherit the earth or lose your life. God spoke on behalf of Himself and man, thereby ratifying the covenant representatively. Mankind through Adam could break the specific terms of the Edenic covenant, and did, but there is no way that he can ever escape the general dominion covenant in history. Only in hell can covenant-breaking man escape it: the negative

9. Chapter 30.

10. Kenneth L. Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/GentryGGC>) sanction of impotence.

Through Adam's breaking of this covenant in Eden, mankind now faces death. The gospel of Jesus Christ comes with the offer of life. Men are to choose life. This requires each person's ratification of a new covenant: oath-bound subordination to God through His only-begotten son. This new covenant does not annul the original dominion impulse of the broken covenant. It reaffirms it in the Great Commission. The subduing of the earth must proceed corporately: the disciplining of the nations. Nations must be formally brought under the terms of the New Covenant. This is achieved by the four oath-bound covenants: personal, ecclesiastical, familial, and civil.

E. Christian Social Theory

This emphasis on the socially transforming effects of the gospel makes the Gospel of Matthew an important document in presenting the legal basis of an explicitly Christian social theory. The author was a Jew. More important, he was a Levite. His name in the other Gospels is identified as Levi (Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27). He was probably a member of the priestly tribe. This is why the Gospel of Matthew is the most Hebraic of the four Gospels. It is more concerned than the others with the kingdom promises given to Israel that the church has now inherited (Matt. 21:43).

This emphasis on the kingdom is why the book has such a strong emphasis on the continuity of God's Old Testament law. Jesus said, "Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled" (Matt. 5:17–18). Matthew is the first book in the New Covenant. This is as it should be: its theme of judicial continuity between the two covenants is strongly emphasized. The book was written on the assumption that its readers would be familiar with the Old Covenant.

The development of Christian social theory begins with the assumption of judicial continuity between the two covenants. Without the continuing judicial authority of the Old Covenant, it would not be possible to develop an explicitly Christian social theory or an explicitly Christian economics. The New Covenant does not abandon Old Covenant social law. On the contrary, it assumes that those sections of the law that were not uniquely tied to Mosaic Israel's seed laws and land laws are still in force. This is why a detailed understanding of Matthew is so important for the development of Christian economics. The Gospel of Matthew moves from the Old Covenant to the New Covenant by way of the transfer of the kingdom from national Israel to the church (Matt. 21:43).

F. Three Questions

There are three questions that every decision-maker should ask himself before establishing a plan of action:

What do I want to achieve?
How soon do I want to achieve it?
How much am I willing to pay?

The first question is the issue of priorities. The Gospel of Matthew raises the issue of priorities again and again. There are individual priorities, but there are also corporate priorities. Covenants are made by individuals, but only one covenant is between God and man alone: the covenant of salvation. The three others are corporate: church, family, and state. Taken as a unit, these four comprise one covenant: the dominion covenant. They define covenant-keeping man.

If men as individuals do not get their priorities into conformity with God's priorities for them, then their efforts will produce inferior results. This is true of societies, too. Covenant-breaking men seek to build a kingdom on behalf of other gods. All other kingdoms must fail. "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever. Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it brake in pieces the iron, the brass, the clay, the silver, and the gold; the great God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter: and the dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure" (Dan. 2:44–45). God has established that His people shall inherit the earth.¹¹ To build on behalf of another god is to build as the Canaanites built: so that God's people might inherit the work of other men's hands (Deut. 6:10–11). This is why "all these things" shall be added unto His people—not just in eternity but progressively in history.

11. Gary North, Inherit the Earth: Biblical Blueprints for Economics (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gninherit>)

Conclusion

This Gospel is most obviously the transitional document between the Old Covenant and the New: the transfer of Israel's inheritance to the church. "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43). As such, this Gospel is crucial for our understanding of covenantal cause and effect in history. Christian economic theory must begin with the assumption of judicial continuity—sovereignty, authority, law, sanctions, and inheritance—between the two covenants. Without this continuity, Christian economics would be some baptized version of autonomy. It would be no more permanent than the minds of autonomous men. Matthew's Gospel provides considerable information on the nature of covenantal continuity.

I see the dominion covenant as undergirding all four oath-bound covenants. In the Old Covenant, it was more obviously familistic and tribal. In the New Covenant, it is more openly ecclesiastical. This is because the church is the new family of God. The Gospel breaks apart the unanimous confession of the Mosaic family covenant (Matt. 10). But, ultimately, the dominion covenant defines man as God's agent in history who must subdue the earth representatively on God's behalf. The dominion covenant was sworn representatively by the persons of the Godhead on behalf of mankind: "Let us make man in our image." This was the original covenant—prior to church, family, or state. Men may seek to substitute other gods, but in the final analysis, there are only two: God and Mammon.

1

STONES INTO BREAD: POWER RELIGION

Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil. And when he had fasted forty days and forty nights, he was afterward an hungred. And when the tempter came to him, he said, If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread. But he answered and said, It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God (Matt. 4:1–4).

The theocentric principle of this law is the centrality of the law of God in man's life. This is point three of the biblical covenant: law.¹

A. The Wilderness Experience

The story of the wilderness temptation appears in two of the four Gospels: Matthew and Luke. This event was a recapitulation of the temptation in the garden. But there were differences. First, Jesus was not in the midst of plenty. Second, He was suffering from hunger. Adam had labored under neither of these burdens. There was a third important difference: there was no intermediary tempter. This time, Satan did not use a serpent as his covenantal agent, nor was there a woman involved. He approached Jesus directly. In short, Jesus was tempted under especially difficult circumstances.

The issues were these: Whose word should man use to help him set his priorities? Was the priority of immediate gratification worth the act of transforming stones into bread? Or was there a higher priority? What is the main source of man's satisfaction: earthly assets or the word of God? Here Jesus gave us the answer: God's word. Our desires in life must be met by relying on God's word, not by relying on whatever we own or whatever we can obtain on our own authority. The ultimate source of treasure in life is God's word.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

In this first temptation, the devil did not ask Jesus to do anything inherently wrong. Jesus subsequently used His supernatural power to turn a few loaves of bread and a few fishes into a meal that fed thousands (Matt. 14:21). Then He did it again (Matt. 15:38). Why did the devil use this temptation to begin the series? It was a matter of historical context. The question before Jesus was the question of causation. Which is more fundamental, power or obedience? Jesus made it plain: obedience. The word of God is superior to autonomous power. It is also superior to a man's temporary desires. By appealing to the Bible, Jesus made it plain that He would not sacrifice law to expedient power.

The context of Jesus' scriptural citation was the wilderness experience of the Israelites. Moses recounted to the conquest generation the miracles of God in sustaining the people in the wilderness for four decades. "And he humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know; that he might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the LORD doth man live" (Deut. 8:3).² That is, God had granted them a miracle—manna—which they made into bread. The manna had demonstrated God's power over nature and history. It also demonstrated His grace to His people.³ They could trust Him to sustain them. In the future, they would need bread, but they had needed it in the wilderness, too, and God had supplied it supernaturally.

God had made it plain to them: He is sovereign over history. He had given them His law at Sinai.⁴ His law is sovereign over history. To gain the blessings of God in history, men must obey His law (Deut. 28:1–14).⁵ What sustains man in history is God's specially revealed word, which includes His specially revealed law.

The heart of the wilderness experience was not the manna or the clothes that did not wear out. The heart of that experience was the

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 18.

3. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 18.

4. Ibid., Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986).

5. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 69.

self-discipline of having faith in God. The transfer of authority from the exodus generation to the conquest generation came through the latter's experience of a daily miracle: manna. They had grown up in the context of miracles. But, upon entering the Promised Land, submitting to circumcision, and eating Passover, the Israelites were immediately cut off from the miracle of manna (Josh. 5:12). They would henceforth eat the fruit of the land. To remain in the land, they were required to obey God's revealed law (Deut. 8:19–20).⁶

Jesus reminded the devil of the requirement for maintaining the kingdom grant: obedience.⁷ Prosperity is not a matter of power; it is a matter of covenantal obedience. His power over the stones was unquestioned. The devil did not suggest otherwise. In fact, the temptation rested on the presupposition that Jesus possessed such power. The nature of this temptation was an appeal to power. This was one more example of the power religion vs. the dominion religion.⁸ Jesus refused to invoke power rather than ethics.

B. Miracles as Welfare⁹

The exodus from Egypt to Canaan is a model of the move from slavery to freedom. The model for a free society is not found in Israel's miraculous wilderness experience, where God gave them manna and removed many burdens of entropy.¹⁰ The predictable miracles of the wilderness era were designed to humble the people before God: subordination. The wilderness experience was not marked by economic growth but by economic stagnation and men's total dependence on God. They were not allowed to save extra portions of manna, which rotted (Ex. 16:20). On the move continually, they could not dig wells, plant crops, or build houses. At best, they may have been able to increase their herds, as nomads do (Num. 3:45; 20:4; 32:1). The wilderness experience was a means of teaching them that God acts in history to sustain His people. The wilderness economy with its regular miracles was not to become an ideal toward which covenant-keepers should strive. Israel longed for escape from the wilderness. It was

6. Ibid., ch. 23.

7. Ibid., ch. 17:C.

8. North, Authority and Dominion, Part 1, Representation and Dominion, pp. 1–3.

9. This section appeared originally in North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 21:B.

10. On entropy, an aspect of the second law of thermodynamics, see Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988). (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

God's curse on the exodus generation that they would die in the wilderness with full stomachs and like-new clothes.

The wilderness economy was a welfare economy. The Israelites were supplied with basic necessities even though the people did not work. But they lacked variety. People without the ability to feed themselves were fed by God: same old diet. People without the ability to clothe themselves were clothed by God: same old fashions. Israel wandered aimlessly because the nation had refused to march into war against Canaan (Num. 14). They were not fit to lead; so, they had to follow. They were welfare clients; they had no authority over the conditions of their existence. They took what was handed out to them. As is so often the case with welfare clients in general, they constantly complained that their lifestyle just wasn't good enough (Num. 11). They had been unwilling to pay the price of freedom: conquest. God therefore cursed them to endure four decades of welfare economics. The only good thing about the wilderness welfare program was that it did not use the state as the agency of positive blessings. No one was coerced into paying for anyone else's lifestyle. God used a continuous series of miracles to sustain them all. There was no coercive program of wealth redistribution. Israel in the wilderness was a welfare society, not a welfare state.

The lure of the welfare state remains with responsibility-avoiding men in every era. It was this lure which attracted the crowds to Jesus. "Jesus answered them and said, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Ye seek me, not because ye saw the miracles, but because ye did eat of the loaves, and were filled" (John 6:26). They wanted a king who would feed them. They viewed Jesus as a potential candidate for king because He could multiply bread. They associated free food with political authority, which was the same presumption that the urban proletariat in Rome was making. If accommodated, this outlook would end in political tyranny and national bankruptcy. Jesus knew this, so He departed from them (John 6:11–15).

Men in their rebellion against God want to believe in a state that can heal them. They believe in salvation by law—civil law. They prefer to live under the authority of a messianic state, meaning a healer state, rather than under freedom. They want to escape the burdens of personal and family responsibility in this world of cursed scarcity. They want to live as children live, as recipients of bounty without a price tag. They are willing to sacrifice their liberty and the liberty of others in order to attain this goal.

One mark of spiritual immaturity is the quest for economic miracles: stones into bread. The price of this alchemical wealth is always the same: acceptance of magic. Modern welfare economics teaches that the state can provide such miracles through positive economic policy, i.e., by taking wealth from some and transferring it to others, either directly or through monetary inflation. This belief is the presupposition of the Keynesian revolution, which dominated twentieth-century economic thought after 1950. The self-taught economist (B.A. in mathematics) John Maynard Keynes actually described credit expansion—the heart of his economic system—as the “miracle . . . of turning a stone into bread.”¹¹

When Israel crossed into the Promised Land, the identifying marks of their wilderness subordination were removed by God: the manna and their permanent clothing. This annulment of the welfare economy was necessary for their spiritual maturation and their liberation. The marks of their subordination to God would henceforth be primarily confessional and ethical, beginning with circumcision (Josh. 5:8). The only food miracle that would remain in Israel would be a triple crop two years prior to a jubilee (Lev. 25:21). God promised to substitute a new means of Israel’s preservation: economic growth. No longer would they be confined to manna and the same old clothing. Now they would be able to multiply their wealth. The zero-growth world of the welfare society would be replaced by the pro-growth world of covenantal remembrance.

C. Something for Nothing

The devil offered Jesus a familiar temptation: something for nothing. Jesus could easily have taken something common and without economic value and converted it into something valuable. A stone was a common item in the wilderness. It commanded no price. There were more stones available at zero price than there was demand for them. Not so with bread. Bread commanded a price. For a hungry man with money to spend, bread commands a high price if there is only one seller. In the wilderness, Jesus was hungry. He presumably would have paid for bread, but either there was no nearby seller or He had no money. How would He relieve His hunger?

11. Keynes (anonymous), Paper of the British Experts (April 8, 1943), cited in Ludwig von Mises, “Stones into Bread, the Keynesian Miracle,” Plain Talk (1948), reprinted in Henry Hazlitt (ed.), The Critics of Keynesian Economics (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1960), p. 306. (<http://bit.ly/HazlittCKE>)

The answer was obvious to the supreme master of the power religion: convert stones into bread. Say the word, and it would be done, Satan told Jesus. Just say the word. Invoke power. But under these circumstances, this would not be power from above; it would be power from below.¹² Why? Because of the context of the temptation. This was a recapitulation of the setting of the Fall of man. Adam had the power to eat the forbidden fruit, but he lacked the lawful authority to do so. Jesus had the power to turn stones into bread; like Adam, He also lacked the lawful authority to do so. Why? Was He not God? Yes, but He was also man. He was under authority. This authority was judicial. He was under the word of God, the authority over man.

Satan was suggesting a shortcut to satisfaction: no work, no payment of money, no delayed gratification. All it would cost was . . . what? A return to the welfare society of the wilderness. The Israelites had been sustained miraculously, but they had no other way to survive. The wilderness could not sustain them. Miracles could. To gain wealth in the Promised Land, they were required to work (Deut. 8:10). The miracle of the manna had ceased. The mature way to wealth is through sacrifice of present consumption for the sake of future income: thrift. The devil was offering Jesus miracles in the wilderness as a way of life. This meant leaving the devil in control of society through his disciples: the power religion. There would be no righteous conquest through covenant-keeping. All Jesus had to do was formalize the power religion to satisfy his hunger. He refused.

What is the basis of life? God's grace. It is an unmerited gift.¹³ Grace precedes law. But law always follows grace. Man maintains his grant from God through obedience to God.¹⁴ This ability to obey is also a form of grace. The basis of the church's extension of God's kingdom in history is the grace of God through the predictability of His sanctions. Obedience to the word of God is the basis of wealth. Anything that detracts from this social cause-and-effect relationship should not be trusted.

God's grace is unearned by its recipients. They gain something for nothing. Jesus paid something; men receive it for nothing. Because all life rests on grace, the concept of something for nothing is inherent in 12. R. J. Rushdoony, "Power from Below," Journal of Christian Reconstruction, I (Summer, 1975).

13. The gift is unmerited by fallen man. It is merited by the perfect life of Jesus Christ in history.

14. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 17:C.

creation. The sun, moon, and stars were made for man (Gen. 1:14–17). But, ever since the Fall of man, there has always been a price required by God for every benefit enjoyed by any creature: the death of an acceptable sacrifice. God has a doctrine of something for nothing: grace grounded in a substitutionary atonement. The devil was asking Jesus to substitute his version of something for nothing in place of God's version. Yet Satan's offer was and is an illusion: a price must be paid for whatever men receive from him. Satan is no less a recipient of God's common grace than man. He does not deserve life, power, or time, but God grants these gifts to him. He owns nothing on his own; God supplies him with everything.¹⁵ So, the person who believes in Satan's version of something for nothing—the invocation of supernatural power to achieve man's autonomous ends—has become his servant. His servants will pay the price in eternity.

D. Living by God's Word

The devil asked Jesus to substitute power religion for dominion religion. Just say the word, he suggested. But the word that counts most is God's word, not man's word, Jesus replied. As a creature who is dependent on the creation, man lives by bread, but not by bread alone. He lives by God's word. This is a denial of the twin doctrines of common grace and natural law as stand-alone principles of social order. Man lives by every word that proceeds out of the mouth of God.

Modern man wants to find laws that operate autonomously from God's word. Modern economics is a self-conscious attempt to reason about social cause and effect without any appeal to morality or the supernatural. But such an attempt is an illusion; it always imports values through the back door. Specifically, in order to justify public policies by means of an appeal to economic science, economists pretend that political representatives can make scientifically valid interpersonal comparisons of other individuals' subjective utility, as if there were a common value scale across independent, autonomous people. But no such value scale exists.¹⁶

Similarly, in political theory, some men still appeal to Stoic principles of natural law and natural morality. The state is supposedly not to invoke God's word as the basis of legislation and judicial decision-making. The natural law theorist insists that man can live apart from every word that proceeds from God's special revelation. Not only can man do so, he must do so. Any appeal to the Bible as a standard above the common reason of all mankind is said to be an illegitimate appeal.¹⁷

15. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gndcgr>)

16. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 5; North, Authority and Dominion, Appendix H.

To invoke a hypothetical common moral reasoning process, let alone agreed-upon logical conclusions, of covenant-breaking man, is comparable to commanding stones into bread. Modern man believes in stones into bread on this basis: a world not under God's Bible-revealed law. He wants his daily bread only on these terms. Jesus announced that man does not live by bread alone. This means that man cannot live by his own word. Any appeal to man and man's wisdom as the source of bread is an illegitimate appeal. Eventually, such an appeal will produce hunger in history and terror in eternity.

Conclusion

Jesus here denied the validity of power religion in its supernatural form: magic. But, by appealing to the word of God, He also denied power religion in its natural form: autonomy. Man lives by bread, but also by every word that God has uttered. God's word is the supreme form of wealth. It is intangible wealth. It is more fundamental than tangible wealth, even bread in the life of a hungry person. When man forgets this, he eventually suffers the consequences in history and eternity.

This passage does not dismiss bread as irrelevant. On the contrary, bread is said to be a source of life. Jesus referred to Himself as the bread of life (John 6:35, 48). But the word of God is superior to bread as a source of life. It was not bread that had sustained Jesus in the wilderness; it was God's word, which He proved by using it against Satan. This passage places bread in subordination to word. It therefore places tangible wealth in subordination to the intangible wealth of God's verbal revelation.

17. Wrote Norman Geisler, a premillennial follower of Thomas Aquinas: "The cry to return to our Christian roots is seriously misguided if it means that government should favor Christian teachings. . . . First, to establish such a Bible-based civil government would be a violation of the First Amendment. Even mandating the Ten Commandments would favor certain religions. . . . Furthermore, the reinstitution of the Old Testament legal system is contrary to New Testament teaching. Paul says clearly that Christians 'are not under the law, but under grace' (Rom. 6:14). . . . The Bible may be informative, but it is not normative for civil law." Norman L. Geisler, "Should We Legislate Morality?" Fundamentalist Journal (July/Aug. 1988), p. 17. He continued: "What kind of laws should be used to accomplish this: Christian laws or Humanistic laws? Neither. Rather, they should simply be just laws. Laws should not be either Christian or anti-Christian; they should be merely fair ones." Ibid., p. 64. For my response, see North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 66:I.

Jesus invoked God's word to defeat Satan, who suggested a way to eat bread without a recipe (planning), grain, or labor: something for nothing. Jesus rejected this religion of magic. He proclaimed a religion of faith and ethics, word and deed. To live biblically means to obey God. This is the basis of true wealth in its broadest meaning.

The top priority here is the substitution of covenantal faithfulness for power. Obedience is primary; positive sanctions in history are secondary. The lawful means of gaining what we need and want is our reliance on God's word. In economic theory, this means the rejection of all explanations of national wealth that are based on an appeal to the productivity of autonomous, God-ignoring schemes or philosophies. This outlook rejects the humanist ideal of the state as a healer, and also the libertarian ideal of the state as a morally neutral night watchman.

2

RISK-FREE LIVING: POWER RELIGION

Then the devil taketh him up into the holy city, and setteth him on a pinnacle of the temple, And saith unto him, If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down: for it is written, He shall give his angels charge concerning thee: and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone. Jesus said unto him, It is written again, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God (Matt. 4:5–7).

The theocentric principle of this law is God as the deliverer: point two of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Tempting God

This is the second wilderness temptation in Matthew. It is the third in Luke's Gospel. I think the chronological sequence in Matthew is more likely. The temptation began with tempting Christ's to resort to magic: stones into bread. The second was God's to invoke deliverance of Him by way of angels. The third was open worship of Satan: the heart of the matter.

The offer here was risk-free living. This is a long-desired goal for man. It cannot be attained in this life, but risk-reduction is a universal practice. The modern science of statistics was initially developed by men who were seeking to lower their risk.² Risk-reduction does not come at zero price. The question is: How high a price? What was Satan asking Jesus to exchange in order to demonstrate His legal claim to

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. Peter Bernstein, Against the Gods: The Remarkable Story of Risk (New York: Wiley, 1996).

this promise? What was this demonstration worth to Jesus? Did Jesus even possess such a legal claim to this promise? If He did, why did He surrender it here?

Jesus answered the devil in the first temptation by an appeal to the Bible, i.e., the word of God. Having allowed the text of the Bible to establish this principle of authority, He cited the Bible again: “Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God.” The full text of the verse throws light on the context. “Ye shall not tempt the LORD your God, as ye tempted him in Massah” (Deut. 6:16). The context of the Israelites’ infraction was their cry for water in the wilderness, and their accusation that God had to prove Himself by the provision of water.

And all the congregation of the children of Israel journeyed from the wilderness of Sin, after their journeys, according to the commandment of the LORD, and pitched in Rephidim: and there was no water for the people to drink. Wherefore the people did chide with Moses, and said, Give us water that we may drink. And Moses said unto them, Why chide ye with me? wherefore do ye tempt the LORD? And the people thirsted there for water; and the people murmured against Moses, and said, Wherefore is this that thou hast brought us up out of Egypt, to kill us and our children and our cattle with thirst? And Moses cried unto the LORD, saying, What shall I do unto this people? they be almost ready to stone me. And the LORD said unto Moses, Go on before the people, and take with thee of the elders of Israel; and thy rod, wherewith thou smotest the river, take in thine hand, and go. Behold, I will stand before thee there upon the rock in Horeb; and thou shalt smite the rock, and there shall come water out of it, that the people may drink. And Moses did so in the sight of the elders of Israel. And he called the name of the place Massah, and Meribah, because of the chiding of the children of Israel, and because they tempted the LORD, saying, Is the LORD among us, or not? (Ex. 17:1–7).

God provided them with water. Moses struck the rock, and water flowed out of it. This was a demonstration of God’s power. But it was a demonstration that condemned them to second-class citizenship. They became psychologically dependent on repeated supernatural displays of God’s power over nature. They did not learn to trust His covenant law. They learned to complain again and again, whining for their desires. “And he gave them their request; but sent leanness into their soul” (Ps. 106:16). They never grew up. Even Moses was later snared by their commitment to magic as a way of life. He struck the other rock twice to draw water out of it, despite the fact that God had told him to speak to the rock, not strike it (Num. 20:10–12). He used ritual instead of relying on God’s word—the essence of magic.³

B. To Protect the Messiah

The devil cited a portion of Psalm 91.⁴ This is sometimes regarded as a messianic psalm. It refers to long life for the person spoken of. But long life was what was not granted to the Messiah in his role as redeemer. Jesus died young. How could this passage have applied to Him? “There shall no evil befall thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling. For he shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways. They shall bear thee up in their hands, lest thou dash thy foot against a stone. Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder: the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under feet. Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him: I will set him on high, because he hath known my name. He shall call upon me, and I will answer him: I will be with him in trouble; I will deliver him, and honour him. With long life will I satisfy him, and shew him my salvation” (Ps. 91:10–16).

1. A Suffering Messiah

Satan cited a verse which, if applied literally to Jesus, would have meant that He could not serve as the Passover’s sacrificial lamb, a young sacrifice. The Mosaic Covenant’s sacrificial animals were young.⁵ If this passage applied literally to Jesus in His pre-resurrection phase, then it meant that the world would not have a savior. He would survive the fall from the temple, but mankind would not survive a Messiah blessed with longevity. Israel might gain a long-lived king; it would not gain a savior.

The difficulty in interpreting this prophecy as messianic is the opposite message in a crucial messianic prophecy, a prophecy of substitutionary atonement.

Who hath believed our report? and to whom is the arm of the LORD revealed? For he shall grow up before him as a tender plant, and as a

3. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 11.

4. Luke’s citation is from the Septuagint, Psalm 90:11, 12. See William Hendriksen, New Testament Commentary: An Exposition of the Gospel According to Luke (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, 1978), p. 238.

5. Leviticus 1:14; Numbers 28:19; Numbers 29:13; Luke 2:24.

root out of a dry ground: he hath no form nor comeliness; and when we shall see him, there is no beauty that we should desire him. He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief: and we hid as it were our faces from him; he was despised, and we esteemed him not. Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows: yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted. But he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed. All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the LORD hath laid on him the iniquity of us all. He was oppressed, and he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth: he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth. He was taken from prison and from judgment: and who shall declare his generation? for he was cut off out of the land of the living: for the transgression of my people was he stricken. And he made his grave with the wicked, and with the rich in his death; because he had done no violence, neither was any deceit in his mouth. Yet it pleased the LORD to bruise him; he hath put him to grief: when thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin, he shall see his seed, he shall prolong his days, and the pleasure of the LORD shall prosper in his hand. He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied: by his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many; for he shall bear their iniquities. Therefore will I divide him a portion with the great, and he shall divide the spoil with the strong; because he hath poured out his soul unto death: and he was numbered with the transgressors; and he bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors (Isa. 53:1–12).

If this applied to Jesus, then the prophecy in Psalm 91 either did not apply to Jesus in His office as Messiah, or else it applied as an inheritance that He abandoned. The question is, if the passage in Psalm 91 did not apply to Jesus, to whom did it apply? No one in Old Covenant history claimed it as his own. If not Jesus, then who? I conclude that this psalm offered this set of unique conditions to Jesus, but He refused to claim the inheritance as His. He refused it here, and in response, God the Father refused to honor it on Calvary. On the cross, Jesus called out to God: “Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani? that is to say, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?” (Matt. 27:46b). God remained silent. Yet the passage affirms: “He shall call upon me, and I will answer him: I will be with him in trouble; I will deliver him, and honour him. With long life will I satisfy him, and shew him my salvation” (Ps. 91:14–16). This promise was no longer in force. Why not?

Because Jesus forfeited any claim to it by fulfilling the role of the suffering Messiah. So, the psalm was not messianic.

2. A Leap of Faith

Satan proposed a test. If Jesus failed it, there would be no substitutionary sacrifice, no execution. There would only be a dead body on the ground. On the other hand, if Jesus survived, then He was a premature heir to this promise, and therefore He could not be the prophesied lamb led to the slaughter. It was a lose-lose situation for Jesus, and a win-win offer for Satan. Jesus declined to accept the challenge.

Jesus cited the law against tempting God. Yet Gideon had doubted and had proposed a pair of tests involving a fleece (Jud. 6:37–40). What is wrong with such demonstrations of God's intentions? Nothing, just so long as the information desired has not been revealed authoritatively in the Bible. Gideon had no way to be sure that he was speaking to a representative of God. There was no written revelation that applied to his situation. Not so with Jesus. He knew that the verse cited was applicable to Him, but only as a statement of the protection available to Him, not as a prophecy the actual details of His life. He was not going to prove its applicability in a way that might produce His immediate death or validate His non-messianic long life. Neither result was appropriate for His work on earth.

The reason why this leap of faith would have constituted the tempting of God was because such a life-or-death test was imposed by man on his own authority. The Israelites had made this mistake: "Is God with us?" they had asked. "Let him prove it by offering us life-sustaining water." But God had already done so: at the Red Sea. The life-sustaining water for Israel was the death-inducing water for Egypt. They had seen this miracle, but it no longer made any impression on them. They required another test. And another. There would be no end to the required tests if the Israelites of the exodus had anything to say about it.

Their addiction to miracles was very great. It was part of their slave's mentality. The slave relies on someone else to sustain him with capital. He is not ready to become an independent person. The exodus generation had not been willing to accept the responsibility of war against Canaan (Num. 14). They had to wander for a generation until they died off.

Jesus was not addicted to miracles for His own sake. He provided them for Israel's sake. He used them to establish a covenant lawsuit against Israel. "And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell: for if the mighty works, which have been done in thee, had been done in Sodom, it would have remained until this day. But I say unto you, That it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment, than for thee" (Matt. 11:23–24). That generation would die in its sins as surely as the exodus generation had.⁶

C. Life Has Risks

Life has risks. We dash our feet against stones. We slip and fall. Because of sin, we suffer the negative sanctions of pain and failure. We suffer death. In this sense, we live a high-risk existence.

Satan was offering Jesus risk-free living. For the Messiah, such risk-free living would mean the death of man. The Messiah was to experience separation from God on behalf of man—the ultimate risk. For Him, there was no escape, so that for His people there is an escape. There was no way that Jesus could live risk-free and still perform His work as redeemer.

Men want to lower their risks. This is legitimate, in the same sense that seeking to lower any of our costs is legitimate. But to seek risk-free living is to seek slavery and death. It is comparable to seeking cost-free living. Such a quest is demonic in history: the overcoming of sin's curse without overcoming sin.

The most successful technical means of reducing risk is economic growth. We gain more wealth, which can be used to shield us from unpleasant events. Then there is the discovery of the laws of mathematical probability.⁷ This has greatly reduced risk. But no means of risk reduction should be elevated above God's offer of protection: not insurance, not wealth, not power. Any rival source of risk reduction will eventually be worshiped by man. It will then demand sacrifice.

In the second half of the twentieth century, a vast bureaucracy was created by law that seeks to reduce risks for all people under the jurisdiction of the state. But risks must be borne by someone. The cost of paying for unforeseen negative events must be borne by someone. Increasingly, the state insists that it will pay for the errors of men. The state imposes taxes on the successful in order to compensate those who have failed. This is not an insurance transaction in which men contract with each other through a third party to insure against statistically predictable losses. It is not a transaction based on a cost-benefit estimation of those who are asked to pay. The costs are imposed by coercion on those who do not possess effective political influence.

6. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

7. Bernstein, Against the Gods.

This coercive wealth redistribution policy raises costs. Employers bear a heavy load of responsibility in the government's many systems of risk reduction. So, employers seek out employees who are less likely to be injured, fail, or in other ways cost the employer extra money. Those who are required to pay seek ways of excluding from the arrangement those who are statistically more likely to be paid.

The modern administrative law order has extended the definition of social risk and has extended its net to haul in more people to bear such risk. Men seek to be protected by the state's many economic safety nets, yet they also seek to escape the nets tossed out to entrap those with capital. The end of such a game of hide and seek is sure: the increase in the number of those who are promised safety and the loss of freedom for those who are required to pay. At some point, the safety net will break, breaking men's faith in the state, and breaking the state's nets of entrapment. When this happens, all those who are dependent on the broken safety nets will find themselves weak and defenseless against social change. The very collapse of the nets will accelerate social change, increasing risks for all.

Conclusion

The Messiah had to bear risks. The messianic state must also bear risks. The Messiah did not attempt to test the existence of a safety net from God. He bore His own risks and ours as well.

The messianic state seeks to transfer risks to taxpayers and others with capital. The result will be an unprecedented disaster. Hundreds of millions of people have been lured into one or another of the state's safety nets. When these nets break, those caught inside them will have a great fall.

The top priority of this passage is to live by God's word, but not by expectations of abnormal supernatural intervention. A religion of risk-defying acts in defiance of God's law is a religion of magic. Biblical religion is not magical. It does not rely on man-invoked supernatural miracles to enable man to achieve the good life. It also does not invoke the state as a provider of safety nets against the economic results of either risk-avoiding failure⁸ or needlessly risky foolishness.

8. The parable of the talents: the man who buried his (Matt. 25:18). See Chapter 47.

3

THE KINGDOMS OF MAN: POWER RELIGION

Again, the devil taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain, and sheweth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them; And saith unto him, All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me. Then saith Jesus unto him, Get thee hence, Satan: for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve (Matt. 4:8–10).

The theocentric principle of this law is the absolute sovereignty of God: point one of the biblical covenant.¹ He is not to be trifled with for man's purposes. He is not to be called to account by man—the message of the book of Job.²

The choice here was obvious: the kingdom of God vs. the kingdoms of man. The test involved an assessment of costs and benefits. A present-oriented power-seeker would have picked the kingdoms of man. Jesus did not choose this. We can infer several reasons for this refusal.

A. Who Owns the Earth?

This is the third wilderness temptation in Matthew. It is the second in Luke's Gospel. I believe the account in Matthew is chronologically more likely. It ends with Satan's offer of all of man's kingdoms. This seems to be the culminating offer available to Satan.

It is obvious that this vision of the kingdoms of man was no earthly

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

2. Gary North, Predictability and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Job (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 6.

vision. The earth is a globe. There is no earthly mountain that allows you to view all of man's kingdoms at one time. This was a representative mountain, the pinnacle of man. It was what the Tower of Babel was meant to be: "And they said, Go to, let us build us a city and a tower, whose top may reach unto heaven; and let us make us a name, lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth" (Gen. 11:4).

This was a place where man would imitate God, viewing his kingdoms.

On what legal basis did Satan make this offer? None. It was a lie. He did not possess either the power or the authority to reward Jesus for worshipping him. He did not possess such power, for he is a creature under God. He did not possess such authority, because he is in rebellion.

Then why is Satan described as the prince of this world (John 12:31; Eph. 2:2)? Because mankind transferred covenantal allegiance to him through Adam. Adam surrendered allegiance to God and substituted allegiance to his own judgment. But in doing so, he merely substituted the worship of Satan for the worship of God. Adam was in a position to choose whose word he would accept: God's or the serpent's. He was never in a position to establish himself as lord of creation. God alone has this authority. To imagine that man possesses it is to substitute foolishness for wisdom. It is to worship power rather than lawful authority. But Satan possesses more power than man. Man will lose this contest. Power religion is Satan's religion. Man cannot come out on top in this religion.

Because God delegated authority to man, Adam possessed the ability to switch his allegiance. In doing so, he came under the dominion of sin. Sin now rules man. Satan and his fallen cohorts exercise power from time to time, but man's sin is their avenue to power in history. This is why Paul wrote: "Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof. Neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin: but yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God. For sin shall not have dominion over you: for ye are not under the law, but under grace" (Rom. 6:12–14). This describes a spiritual war. It is a spiritual war fought on the battleground of ethics. "For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places" (Eph. 6:12).

So, when Satan offered the kingdoms of man to Jesus, he was offering to give to the last Adam (I Cor. 15:45) what the first Adam had surrendered to him. If Jesus had accepted the offer, He would have recapitulated the Fall. This offer was a variation of the serpent's original offer: to render unto Satan what belongs to God. The worship of Satan was implicit in man's acceptance of the truth of the offer, both in the garden and on the mountain. In the name of man's sovereignty, Satan lured Adam into subordination to him. He tried this again with Jesus.

B. No Other God

Jesus' answer was clear: only God may be lawfully worshipped. The kingdoms of man must be formally restored to their previous legal condition: a unified kingdom of God. There is one God, one faith, one baptism (Eph. 4:5). There is therefore only one legitimate kingdom in history. Any man who seeks to exercise sovereignty over all the kingdoms of man is calling for unification of these kingdoms under himself. He has fallen for the old lure, "ye shall be as gods" (Gen. 3:5).

Jesus had come to restore covenantal unity to the kingdoms of man: a unity of confession. He was God's agent in this restoration. His was the kingdom prophesied by Daniel. "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever" (Dan. 2:44). Any man who would challenge the establishment of God's kingdom in history would be wise to heed Daniel's warning to Nebuchadnezzar: "That they shall drive thee from men, and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field, and they shall make thee to eat grass as oxen, and they shall wet thee with the dew of heaven, and seven times shall pass over thee, till thou know that the most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will" (Dan. 4:25).

There is no other God. There is no other permanent kingdom. But there are pretender gods. There are pretender kingdoms. Satan was a pretender god offering Jesus pretender kingdoms. Jesus did not accept the offer, for He knew the truth: there is no other God but God. Satan could not deliver on his promise.

C. The Lure of a Kingdom

In a frequently quoted but rarely believed passage, Jesus warned,

“For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?” (Mark 8:36). Men build sand castles and call them kingdoms. These may be large sand castles or more modest ones. But their fate is the same: to be washed away (Matt. 7:25–27).

This warning was not given only to that handful of men in history who believe they are in a position to build a kingdom. It was given to every man who believes that he can construct walls around his life that cannot be penetrated by his enemies. “The rich man’s wealth is his strong city, and as an high wall in his own conceit” (Prov. 18:11). The only possessions that are guaranteed to stand the test of time are stored outside of time. “But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal: For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also” (Matt. 6:20–21).³

Satan’s offer of all the kingdoms of this world was a last, desperate attempt to retain his power. This was his third appeal to a man who had previously refused to invoke magic to feed himself, and had also refused to invoke the Bible to gain risk-free living. What else was left? The lure of a universal kingdom: the desire to make a name for oneself. If this temptation failed, Satan would be out of relevant temptations. It failed.

This temptation has been used again and again in history to lure men to destruction. In the twentieth century, Hitler, Stalin, and Mao all sought to build permanent kingdoms, and all failed.⁴ The kingdoms of man all suffer the same fate: to be swallowed up by time.

Satan’s lure is a powerful one. Arrogant men build political kingdoms in confidence. Fearful men build economic kingdoms because they know no other way. The effort in both cases is futile. Economic kingdom-builders are afflicted by a kind of madness. “A man to whom God hath given riches, wealth, and honour, so that he wanteth nothing for his soul of all that he desireth, yet God giveth him not power to eat thereof, but a stranger eateth it: this is vanity, and it is an evil disease” (Eccl. 6:2). The rich man builds up an inheritance for others. He cannot control what his heirs will do with this accumulated wealth.

3. Chapter 13.

4. Hitler’s promised thousand-year reich lasted from 1933 to 1945. Stalin’s kingdom lasted from his access to power 1928 to its collapse under Gorbachev in 1991. Mao’s still exists in name and as a military force, but his successor, Deng, allowed the peasants of Red China to adopt capitalist ownership in 1979. Private ownership of the means of production spread rapidly through the Chinese economy. So did an economic boom. So has the Christian church.

D. Wealth, Safety, and Power

The first temptation had to do with the creation of wealth. If man can take stones and turn them into bread, he escapes the curse of nature. He returns to the garden of Eden on his own authority, on his own terms. The second temptation offered life without the risk of pain. Man escapes another curse of nature. If he then rules over all of men's kingdoms, he replaces God. He imposes curses and blessings as a sovereign.

The first temptation offered pure autonomy to Jesus: on His own authority, to turn stones into bread. The second asked Him to acknowledge His physical subordination to God and the angels, but not His ethical subordination: forfeiting His messianic redemptive assignment. The third got to the covenantal point: His worship of Satan. The previous temptations had sought to lure Him away indirectly from the worship of God. This one called Him to break covenant with God openly.

The first temptation involved the sin of magic. The second was ethical: tempting God. The third was political. The first two offered to place Jesus outside of nature's constraints. The third offered to place Him outside of history's constraints. All three offered Him below-market costs of living. Food, safety, and power could be His for the asking. But there is never something for nothing outside of God's grace. There was an implied exchange: the surrender of Jesus' soul. This exchange is always a bad bargain. The hidden costs are eternal.

Why did Satan believe that Jesus might fall for one of these temptations? Did he believe that Jesus' perfection was vulnerable? He must have. He understood that Jesus was a representative of the race of man. He believed that he had an opportunity to lure Jesus into a recapitulation of the Fall of man: the acceptance of power religion. Satan has great faith in power. These were the lures that tempted him. "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning! how art thou cut down to the ground, which didst weaken the nations! For thou hast said in thine heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God: I will sit also upon the mount of the congregation, in the sides of the north: I will ascend above the heights of the clouds; I will be like the most High" (Isa. 14:12–14). This was Isaiah's warning to Babylon (Isa. 13:19). But to warn Babylon, he invoked the imagery of the archetype of all political kingdom-building: Satan's rebellion. I conclude that Satan must view God's exercise of power as power for power's sake, not as extensions of God's character. He is himself blinded ethically by the lure of power. Satan's religion is the power religion.

Conclusion

Jesus did not substitute allegiance to Satan for allegiance to God. He understood the fundamental principle of biblical religion: man's covenantal subordination to God. Man is under God (Gen. 1:26–28). He is required to honor God by worshipping Him as the sovereign Creator. Jesus refused to break covenant with God by adopting either magic or empire-building politics, which are forms of the power religion. He recognized the hidden costs of the power religion: the loss of one's soul. Power religion publicly offers something for nothing. In fact, it demands something supremely valuable (eternal soul) for something far less valuable (temporary power). Power religion is ultimately a religion of nothing for something. "For whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance: but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath" (Matt. 13:12).⁵

Our priority as covenant-keepers is to affirm the kingdom of God by shunning the kingdoms of man. We must seek to transform man's kingdoms through evangelism. This is not a call to pietistic withdrawal from social involvement. On the contrary, it is a call to worldwide dominion in history—a dominion guaranteed by Christ for His people.⁶

5. Chapter 27.

6. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1992] 1997). (<http://bit.ly/klghshd>)

4

MEEKNESS AND INHERITANCE

Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth (Matt. 5:5).

The theocentric focus of this passage cannot be meekness as such, for God is not meek. What, then? It has to be meekness before God. Humanist theologian John C. Raines has written of Calvin: “Calvin understood the Christian life not as ‘a vessel filled with God’ but as an active ‘tool and instrument’ of the Divine initiative. But this is precisely our point. Active toward the world, the Christian knows himself as utterly passive and obedient toward God, whose Will it is his sole task to discover and obey.”¹ This is the heart of the matter: subordination under God and His law: hierarchy.² Dominion is by covenant. The result is inheritance: point five.³

Inheritance is a blessing. Inheriting the earth is a very large blessing. It has to be corporate. It has to be ecclesiastical. It is the people of God, members of the church, who inherit. The issue here is historical. Is this inheritance historical? Or is it confined to the post-resurrection world, after Satan and his angels have been consigned to the lake of fire? Subordination is surely historical. What about inheritance?

A. Subordination to Unrighteous Men

The passage that we call Jesus’ Sermon on the Mount was delivered to an assembly of Jews who were living under Roman rule. Jews

1. John C. Raines, “From Passive to Active Man: Reflections on the Revolution in Consciousness in Modern Man,” in Raines and Thomas Dean (eds.), Marxism and Radical Religion: Essays Toward a Revolutionary Humanism (Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1970), p. 114.

2. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

3. Sutton, ch. 5. North, ch. 5.

had not lived under their own kings for over half a millennium. What they knew was political weakness. They had learned how to survive as subordinates to foreign rulers.

Jesus' Sermon on the Mount was filled with the imagery of pain and weakness. The beatitudes—"blessed are the . . ."—were a series of contrasts between the pain of the present and hope for the future. This future was earthly as well as heavenly. The phrase, "the kingdom of heaven," in Matthew was used as a synonym for the kingdom of God, which was not confined to the realm of departed spirits or the post-resurrection world. The promise of earthly inheritance had been placed by God before Israel for fourteen centuries. It was a kingdom promise. They would not have imagined that the following referred exclusively to the post-resurrection world: "Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted. Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth. Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled. Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy. Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God. Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God. Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad: for great is your reward in heaven: for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you" (Matt. 5:3–12).

The contrast here was between life under unjust men and life under God's rule. Injustice must be borne patiently, but life on earth need not be forever unjust. The promise of a world to inherit made it clear that there is hope for the Christian in his work. The contrast between the present and eternity appears only in the final verse, which deals with persecution by Jews. The persecution of the prophets had been a continual problem in the Promised Land, which was one reason why Israel was living under Roman rule. God had applied sanctions to the nation for this transgression of His law: the law of false witness. Israel had killed the true prophets and had honored the court prophets.

Matthew 5:5 is not confined exclusively to Israel. Its offer of earthly hope is valid in every age in which Christians suffer because of their faith. The kingdom of heaven is not an exclusively Jewish phenomenon.⁴ But the focus of the passage is on the contrast between times of suffering and a future era of victory. Compared to the promised future blessings, the suffering of God's people is a minor affair. It is also temporary.

B. Under God, Over the Creation

Matthew 5:5 is an extension of the dominion covenant: "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them. And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth" (Gen. 1:26–28).⁵ Man was created by God to extend His kingdom on earth. Man is God's agent in history. He is under God and over the creation.

Matthew 5:5 should not be interpreted in terms of a personality trait. It is not a statement that identifies a group of people who share this trait as those best equipped to run the world. Biblical meekness is a matter of law. The people who will inherit the earth are those who acknowledge themselves as subordinates to God and His law, and who use their knowledge of His law to subdue the earth to God's glory. Biblical meekness is correctly understood in relation to Jesus Christ: "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls" (Matt. 11:29).⁶ Just as Christ acknowledged His subordination to God the Father, so are we to take Christ's yoke and imitate Him. Our position as covenantal subordinates to a sovereign God is supposed to create in us an appropriate sense of inner peace: "But let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price" (I Pet. 3:4).

4. Traditional dispensationalism drew a sharp contrast between the kingdom of heaven in Matthew and the kingdom of God in the other gospels. The kingdom of heaven supposedly referred only to Israel before Jerusalem fell in A.D. 70 and to a future millennial era after Jesus returns in person to set up an earthly kingdom. This contrast has faded in the writings of dispensationalists ever since the publication of the New Scofield Reference Bible (New York: Oxford University Press, 1967).

5. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

6. Chapter 25.

Jesus was not meek when He twice used a whip to drive the moneychangers out of the temple area, at the beginning of His ministry (John 2:15) and at the end (Matt. 21:12).⁷ There was nothing meek about His use of pejorative language against His opponents: hypocrites (Matt. 15:7), whited sepulchres (Matt. 23:27), serpents, generation of vipers (Matt. 23:33), thieves (Mark 11:17), sons of the devil (John 8:44). Jesus' rhetoric was inflammatory. He did not hold back verbally in His rejection of the rabbis' authority over Him. On what basis could He have lawfully used such language against the religious rulers of Israel? Only on the basis of His office as the judge of Israel. He was in authority over them because He obeyed His Father perfectly. When they tried to silence Him, He spoke out in public. When they told Him to speak, He remained silent (Matt. 27:12). He was not meek before them; He was a thorn in their flesh, challenging their ethics and their willingness to teach the truth about the Bible.

C. Under the Creation, Over God

The covenant-breaker worships idols. Schlossberg calls these idols of nature and idols of history.⁸ Ancient man believed in local spirits that exercised rule over him. Modern man believes instead in impersonal forces that exercise rule over him: meaningless, purposeless forces. Or he may trust in impersonal chance or impersonal fate, just as classical man did.⁹ He fears the state, just as classical man did,¹⁰ for it is the most powerful institution that man lives under. In all of these cases, he does not worship a God who created everything out of nothing by the power of His word. The god of covenant-breaking man always shares power with the creation. To the extent that mankind can gain power over the creation, man becomes co-regent with this god.

Man seeks to worship a god with enough power to assist him in his quest to gain power. But this god is not to be so powerful that he lays down the law to man. Some law, yes, but not comprehensive law. Man

7. Chapter 42.

8. Herbert Schlossberg, Idols for Destruction: Christian Faith and Its Confrontation with American Society (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, [1983] 1993), p. 11.

9. Charles Norris Cochrane, Christianity and Classical Culture: A Study of Thought and Action from Augustus to Augustine (New York: Oxford University Press, [1944] 1957), p. 159. (<http://bit.ly/CNCCACC>)

10. R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy, 2nd ed. (Vallecito, California [1971] 2007), chaps. 2, 3. (<http://bit.ly/rjroam>) is therefore willing to subordinate himself to nature in order to escape complete subordination to God. He invents gods of nature in order to escape the God who created nature. Paul wrote:

For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness; Because that which may be known of God is manifest in them; for God hath shewed it unto them. For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse: Because that, when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, And changed the glory of the uncorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and fourfooted beasts, and creeping things (Rom. 1:18–23).¹¹

One of the themes of modern evolutionary humanism is that man is a destroyer of nature. He is a polluter who seeks his own ends at the expense of nature, which deserves respect as an equal, if not a superior. The ecology movement is a reaction to society's perceived exploitation of nature. The "deep ecology" movement, while tiny, is dedicated to the proposition that modern society is evil because it refuses to become subordinate to the forces of nature. Man is not supposed to use science to extract from nature the resources necessary to sustain a middle-class lifestyle for large numbers of people. The deep ecologists correctly observe that man in his self-proclaimed autonomy is a destroyer. But their answer is not to recommend placing man and society under God through the four oath-bound covenants—personal, ecclesiastical, familial, and civil—but to place mankind under an implicit covenant with nature. In some cases, nature is seen as alive, having a hidden agenda. "Mother nature" is seen as more than a phrase; it is seen as a personal force. This borders on nature worship and animism—a very ancient religion. Sometimes it crosses the border.

When men subordinate themselves to any aspect of the creation, they become idolatrous. They seek both power and meaning apart from the God who created nature. They ignore the Bible as the source of law. They reject God's demand that man exercise dominion over nature. They reject the suggestion that man alone is made in God's image, and that he possesses lawful authority over nature on this basis. In short, they place God in the dock and seek to bring a covenant lawsuit against God by bringing one against His people and His Bible.

11. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 3.

D. Inheritance and Meekness

Inheritance is point five of the biblical covenant model. Deuteronomy is the book of the inheritance in the Pentateuch, and it is the fifth book in the Pentateuch.¹² It is also the book of God's law. "Judges and officers shalt thou make thee in all thy gates, which the LORD thy God giveth thee, throughout thy tribes: and they shall judge the people with just judgment. Thou shalt not wrest judgment; thou shalt not respect persons, neither take a gift: for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous. That which is altogether just shalt thou follow, that thou mayest live, and inherit the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee" (Deut. 16:18–20).¹³ The Psalms repeat this theme.¹⁴

His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth (Ps. 25:13).

For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth (Ps. 37:9).

But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace (Ps. 37:11).

For such as be blessed of him shall inherit the earth; and they that be cursed of him shall be cut off (Ps. 37:22).

Conclusion

Jesus here set forth a principle of Godly rule: meekness before God produces authority over creation. The hierarchy of authority from God to man to nature implies that man must be meek before God and confident before nature. Covenant-keeping men are to be confident in their prosecution of covenant lawsuits against God's enemies. They are not to be meek before the shepherds of the goats of this world. They are to be meek before the Shepherd whose voice they recognize (John

12. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012).

13. Ibid., ch. 39.

14. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 2.

10).

The promised reward for such behavior is the inheritance of the whole world, which is the judicial basis for the church's progressive working out of the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:27–28).¹⁵ This will finally be accomplished after the final judgment, but there is a down payment in history: the New Heavens and New Earth.

For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people: and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying. There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed. And they shall build houses, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them. They shall not build, and another inhabit; they shall not plant, and another eat: for as the days of a tree are the days of my people, and mine elect shall long enjoy the work of their hands (Isa. 65:17–22).¹⁶

15. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 4.

16. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 15; cf. North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

5

THE SALT OF THE EARTH

Ye are the salt of the earth: but if the salt have lost his savour, wherewith shall it be salted? it is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out, and to be trodden under foot of men (Matt. 5:13).

The theocentric focus of this passage is God's sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ "And every oblation of thy meat offering shalt thou season with salt; neither shalt thou suffer the salt of the covenant of thy God to be lacking from thy meat offering: with all thine offerings thou shalt offer salt" (Lev. 2:13). This is point two of the biblical covenant.

A. Salt and Sanctions

Salt is an aspect of covenant sanctions. Salt is a two-fold sanction: positive (flavor) and negative (permanent destruction). The parallel passage in Mark is even more terrifyingly explicit: "And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out: it is better for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into hell fire: Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. For every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt. Salt is good: but if the salt have lost his saltness, wherewith will ye season it? Have salt in yourselves, and have peace one with another" (Mark 9:47–50).

Jesus here referred back to the offerings of the temple (Lev. 2:13). Salt confirmed the Old Covenant: "All the heave offerings of the holy things, which the children of Israel offer unto the LORD, have I given thee, and thy sons and thy daughters with thee, by a statute for ever: it is a covenant of salt for ever before the LORD unto thee and to thy seed with thee" (Num. 18:19). How did salt confirm the Old Covenant? By being present in the burnt offerings, which were negative sanctions applied to dead animals rather than dead men. The salt provided savor; God then consumed these sacrifices. The imagery is that of a God who delights in the burning flesh of the damned. This is harsh imagery, which modern man rejects. Jesus did not reject it. To it He added the worm that refuses to die.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

There is no question that salt in the Old Covenant was a testimony to God's covenant. It testified to the negative sanctions and the positive sanctions. The sanctions were positive for covenant-keepers, negative for covenant-breakers.

Jesus contrasted savory salt with tasteless salt. Tasteless salt is good for nothing but to be trodden down by men. It once was a source of savor; it becomes a means of destruction, just as it was in the ancient world. Salt was used to destroy the land's productivity: "And Abimelech fought against the city all that day; and he took the city, and slew the people that was therein, and beat down the city, and sowed it with salt" (Jud. 9:45). In this sense, salt was a negative sanction of a covenant.

B. A Nation at Risk

Savorless salt: this is Jesus' description of covenant-keepers who cease doing God's work. They are fit for destruction as agents of destruction. They are cast out and walked over, driving them into the earth to destroy the earth's productivity. They become signs of God's wrath against hypocrisy. He uses them as a victorious ancient army used salt: to seal the cutting off of the enemy's future.

The context of Jesus' remarks was the nation of Israel. Israel was under negative sanctions: Roman rule. It had been under foreign rule since the captivity. Jesus was speaking to residents of a defeated nation. Israel was the salt that had lost its savor. It was fit for grinding underfoot. This grinding had already begun. In A.D. 70, the process was completed, judicially speaking,² although it took until the failure of Bar Kochba's two-year rebellion for the Romans to disperse the nation completely in A.D. 135. Jesus was warning the nation that the day of judgment was coming. It was time to repent. The Sermon on the

2. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

Mount was a call to repentance, to a new way of life. Those who were trodden down would rise up. Those who were being treated badly would see God: victory. There was hope available, but to claim it, men would have to become salt. They would have to add flavor to others' food. They would have to become a benefit to others.

Jesus was telling Jews that Israel was doomed. Their righteousness would have to exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees. "For I say unto you, That except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 5:20). Unless they became positive sanctions among men, they would become negative sanctions among men. They would be trodden down as examples. This, the Romans did a generation after Jesus spoke these words.

C. Good Works in the Salt Shaker

The heart of the matter was righteousness. The metaphor was savor.

1. Salt Is Good

Salt is good, Jesus said, but it must be salty. It must add flavor. When it ceases to be marked by flavor, it ceases to be useful as a positive force. It is then useful only as a negative force. Jesus went on to use another analogy: the candle under a bushel. "Ye are the light of the world. A city that is set on an hill cannot be hid. Neither do men light a candle, and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick; and it giveth light unto all that are in the house. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven" (Matt. 5:14–16).³ Salt without savor is analogous to a hidden light: useless.

The issue here is good works. Good works are the saltiness of holy salt, the brightness of light. Without these positive characteristics, salt and light are good for nothing, i.e., destructive. Good works performed by God's judicial representatives testify to His goodness. Bad works testify falsely to the true character of God. False witness is to be avoided. The negative sanction against false witness is the punishment that would have been applied to the victim. "One witness shall not rise up against a man for any iniquity, or for any sin, in any sin that he sin-

3. Chapter 6.

neth: at the mouth of two witnesses, or at the mouth of three witnesses, shall the matter be established. If a false witness rise up against any man to testify against him that which is wrong; Then both the men, between whom the controversy is, shall stand before the LORD, before the priests and the judges, which shall be in those days; And the judges shall make diligent inquisition: and, behold, if the witness be a false witness, and hath testified falsely against his brother; Then shall ye do unto him, as he had thought to have done unto his brother: so shalt thou put the evil away from among you. And those which remain shall hear, and fear, and shall henceforth commit no more any such evil among you. And thine eye shall not pity; but life shall go for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot" (Deut. 19:15–21).⁴ Therefore, the penalty for false witness against God is death, as Adam learned.⁵

2. Good Works Reflect God

Good works reflect God, who is the source of every good gift. "Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning" (James 1:17). Evil does not come out of good. Jesus said this repeatedly. "And now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees: therefore every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire" (Matt. 3:10). "Even so every good tree bringeth forth good fruit; but a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit. A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit. Every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire" (Matt. 7:17–19).⁶ "Either make the tree good, and his fruit good; or else make the tree corrupt, and his fruit corrupt: for the tree is known by his fruit" (Matt. 12:33). Christian commentators identify the corrupt tree as Israel, but Israel itself was an example of a more inclusive phenomenon: God's destruction of the unrighteous.

3. Covenant-Keepers

The person who identifies himself as a covenant-keeper must keep

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 45.

5. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1987] 2012), Appendix E.

6. Chapter 18.

the laws of God (Matt. 5:17–18).⁷ Israel's problem was not sin in general. That problem was what the gentile nations represented. Israel's problem was the visible discrepancy between its covenant standards and its behavior. That is, Israel's problem was visible unrighteousness in the name of righteousness, evil works in the name of good works. Israel as a nation was like the unclean man who drew near to the temple: the closer he came, the more dangerous was his unclean legal status. Eventually, he had to be stopped from drawing closer, or else God would destroy him. "And the children of Israel spake unto Moses, saying, Behold, we die, we perish, we all perish. Whosoever cometh any thing near unto the tabernacle of the LORD shall die: shall we be consumed with dying?" (Num. 17:12–13). If many unclean people were allowed to draw near, God would depart from the temple. This was what took place a generation later, in A.D. 70.⁸

This is as true under the New Covenant as it was under the Mosaic Covenant. God brings negative sanctions against those who do evil in His name. But these verses indicate that more is required than merely avoiding evil. It is not sufficient to do no evil in God's name. Covenant-keepers must do good works. They must bring positive sanctions in history. To fail to do this is the judicial equivalent of doing evil. There is no neutrality. There are no neutral acts. This is the message of Matthew 25, which describes the final judgment.

Then shall he say also unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels: For I was an hungred, and ye gave me no meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me no drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me not in: naked, and ye clothed me not: sick, and in prison, and ye visited me not. Then shall they also answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee an hungred, or athirst, or a stranger, or naked, or sick, or in prison, and did not minister unto thee? Then shall he answer them, saying, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me. And these shall go away into everlasting punishment: but the righteous into life eternal (Matt. 25:41–46).

4. Good Works and Salvation

Then do good works save men? Absolutely. Without good works,

7. Greg L. Bahnsen, By This Standard: The Authority of God's Law Today (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1985). (<http://bit.ly/gbbts>)

8. David Chilton, The Great Tribulation (Tyler, Texas: Dominion Press, [1987] 1997). (<http://bit.ly/dctrib>)

men cannot enter heaven. Then is salvation by good works? Absolutely. James was explicit in this regard. “Yea, a man may say, Thou hast faith, and I have works: shew me thy faith without thy works, and I will shew thee my faith by my works. Thou believest that there is one God; thou doest well: the devils also believe, and tremble. But wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead? Was not Abraham our father justified by works, when he had offered Isaac his son upon the altar? Seest thou how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect? And the scripture was fulfilled which saith, Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness: and he was called the Friend of God. Ye see then how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only” (James 2:18–24).

The theological question is this: What is the source of these good works? The New Testament’s answer is clear: the perfect humanity of Jesus Christ, who fulfilled the Mosaic law perfectly. God imputes—declares judicially—Christ’s comprehensive and representative good works to covenant-keepers at the moment of their conversion. As surely as Adam’s sin is imputed judicially by God to all men who are devoid of saving grace,⁹ so is Christ’s righteousness imputed to covenant-keepers. The doctrine of imputation holds for both groups: covenant-breakers and covenant-keepers.¹⁰ For covenant-keepers, this is the doctrine of definitive sanctification. Covenant-keepers are told to work out their salvation with fear and trembling (Phil. 2:12). This is the doctrine of progressive sanctification. The Sermon on the Mount is a guide to working out this salvation.

Saving faith in Christ is faith in the saving works of Christ. This is why theological liberalism cannot save. The liberal asserts his faith in Jesus, called the Christ, but this Christ is said to be an imperfect man who did not serve as man’s judicial representative before God. He was a great moral teacher, we are told, but He was not fundamentally different from what we are. He was not perfect, just as we are not perfect. He was evolving, just as we are. Liberal faith is judicial nonsense. Faith in a Christ who was not a perfect sacrifice on God’s altar does not save man from God’s eternal wrath. Faith in a blemished sacrifice does not save anyone. It is faith without works—Christ’s perfect works. Christ is the vine; His people are the branches (John 15). The perfection of the vine is the source of the branches' fruit. There is consistency between vine and fruit. The goodness of the fruit testifies publicly to the perfection of the vine. Bad fruit testifies to an imperfect vine, which is false testimony. This is why God the Father brings negative sanctions in history and eternity against those who testify falsely about the moral character of His Son.

9. John Murray, The Imputation of Adam’s Sin (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, [1959] 1992).

10. John Murray, Redemption Accomplished and Applied (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1955), pp. 124–25.

D. Good Words, Good Works

“Let your speech be alway with grace, seasoned with salt, that ye may know how ye ought to answer every man” (Col. 4:6). The imagery of salt as something positive is retained in this passage. There must be consistency between word and deed. Good words must not be refuted by bad works. The issue of consistency is basic to the Sermon on the Mount. This is not logical consistency; it is ethical consistency. Verbal testimony is confirmed by visible testimony. This is why salt must not lose its savor, and candles must not be hidden under baskets.

The works of Jesus confirmed His words. Consider the miracles of feeding and healing. He brought positive sanctions into the lives of those who could not buy them. Some of these sanctions were not available at any price. The magnitude of His words were confirmed by the magnitude of His works.

And, behold, they brought to him a man sick of the palsy, lying on a bed: and Jesus seeing their faith said unto the sick of the palsy; Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee. And, behold, certain of the scribes said within themselves, This man blasphemeth. And Jesus knowing their thoughts said, Wherefore think ye evil in your hearts? For whether is easier, to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Arise, and walk? But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins, (then saith he to the sick of the palsy,) Arise, take up thy bed, and go unto thine house. And he arose, and departed to his house. But when the multitudes saw it, they marvelled, and glorified God, which had given such power unto men (Matt. 9:2–8).

Covenant-keepers are to imitate Christ. While only rarely can they perform miracles of healing, they can offer acts of healing at no price to the recipients. Like Jesus, they can bring healing to those who cannot afford to pay. Again, Matthew 25 is the model:

And he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left. Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: For I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me in: Naked, and ye clothed me: I was sick, and ye visited me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me. Then shall the righteous answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee an hungred, and fed thee? or thirsty, and gave thee drink? When saw we thee a stranger, and took thee in? or naked, and clothed thee? Or when saw we thee sick, or in prison, and came unto thee? And the King shall answer and say unto them, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me" (Matt. 25:33–40).

Jesus' works confirmed His words. His words alone could have condemned all mankind, but He offered saving words, and these required saving works. The covenant has sanctions. These sanctions are historical. Jesus brought positive sanctions and occasional negative sanctions to confirm His words. The negative sanction against the fig tree was representative of what would come upon Israel in a generation.

And he left them, and went out of the city into Bethany; and he lodged there. Now in the morning as he returned into the city, he hungered. And when he saw a fig tree in the way, he came to it, and found nothing thereon, but leaves only, and said unto it, Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward for ever. And presently the fig tree withered away. And when the disciples saw it, they marvelled, saying, How soon is the fig tree withered away! Jesus answered and said unto them, Verily I say unto you, If ye have faith, and doubt not, ye shall not only do this which is done to the fig tree, but also if ye shall say unto this mountain, Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea; it shall be done. And all things, whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive (Matt. 21:17–22).

There is a tendency among Protestants to separate good works from good words. This is partially the result of a deep and abiding antinomianism: Christianity as a covenant with neither law nor sanctions. It is partially the result of a doctrine of Christ's salvation that ignores the imputation of His perfect works to covenant-keepers. The result of such a truncated doctrine of the covenant is salt without savor, i.e., positive confession without positive sanctions. God brings comprehensive negative sanctions against hypocritical faith. "But wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead?" (James 2:20). Dead faith is publicly buried by a living God.

E. Good Works in Charity and Business

Charity is a good work. When men give away their time or wealth in the name of Christ, they testify to their faith in God. They proclaim their confidence that “there’s more where that came from.” As covenant-keepers, they affirm the cause-and-effect nature of wealth in history: wealth as a public affirmation of the covenant. “But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:18).¹¹ He testifies to his faith in the linearity of growth: wealth, obedience, greater wealth, greater obedience.

Charitable giving lowers men’s resistance to the gospel. It opens doors. Men begin to ask themselves why the person is showing such charity. His acts of charity impress them. They know that selfless giving is a good thing. They want to know why the individual is confident that his giving will not reduce him to poverty.

There is another factor: imitation. Men may begin to imitate the giver. They perceive that the world is better off because of charity. They may test the proposition with respect to their own lives. This is positive for them and for society.

In business, charitable dealing is also beneficial. There is a phrase known to those who do repeat business: “Leave something on the table for the other guy.” Business success is usually dependent on repeat business. The cost of generating a new customer is high. The cost of generating a repeat sale is much lower, but only if the buyer is happy with the first exchange. So, the wise businessman is careful to deliver more than he agreed to in the original contract. He adds an extra benefit. This impresses the buyer, who gets more than he paid for. He can afford to do business with this seller. His risks are reduced, meaning that his costs is reduced. When a seller decreases the buyer’s price of doing business, he gains more business.

Jesus spoke of going the extra mile with the tyrant. The same principle applies to business. The buyer perceives that he can trust the seller. He is willing to send more business his way. In business, there is a procedure for reducing risk called tit for tat: repayment in kind. If a seller drives a hard bargain this time, the buyer will drive a hard bargain next time. The best way for both parties to secure a stream of benefits from each other is to give more in exchange.

11. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 22.

Conclusion

The top priority here is to become flavorful salt. This requires extra effort on the part of covenant-keepers. Later in this sermon, we read: “Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal: For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also” (Matt. 6:19–21).¹² Jesus laid the groundwork for this conclusion in the earlier passages. This is one of those passages.

The issue here is salt as a positive or negative sanction in history. Salt can supply flavor or it can destroy growth. God wants it to supply flavor. His people are to allocate their assets of money and time to those kingdom-building works that have personal consequences in eternity because such works have social consequences in history. The salt of the earth must not become salt in the earth. God’s people are to make the world a better place than it was before they arrived on the scene. This mandates progress in history.

God’s covenant is a covenant of salt. Salt flavors and it also destroys its enemies. It brings both positive and negative sanctions. As it extends through society, it satisfies the good and destroys the evil. God uses savorless salt to cut off rival kingdoms, but this is no comfort to the savorless salt.

12. Chapter 13.

6

THE CITY ON A HILL

Ye are the light of the world. A city that is set on an hill cannot be hid. Neither do men light a candle, and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick; and it giveth light unto all that are in the house. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven (Matt. 5:14–16).

The theocentric focus of this passage is an aspect of God: light. “This then is the message which we have heard of him, and declare unto you, that God is light, and in him is no darkness at all. If we say that we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth: But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin” (I John 1:5–7). Men are to represent God: point two of the biblical covenant.¹

A. The Imagery of Light

The first image is that of a world-illuminating light. The second is a city on a hill. The third is a candle in the darkness. The entire passage clearly rests on the imagery of light, including the image of the city. The imagery of the city implies a city at night, a place surrounded by darkness. Men light candles for their homes, and these lights testify at a distance to the existence of a city. At night, men cannot see the buildings of the hilltop city, but they see its lights. A candle is singular and testifies only to its owner. A city full of shining candles testifies to the existence of the city. Similarly, an individual does good works, testifying to his own righteousness, but taken together, those who do good works jointly testify to something larger than any one individual: the city of God.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

Jesus called each of His listeners to a life of good works.² He reminded each of them regarding the power of a candle in a dark house. It gives light to everyone in the house. That is, one person's good works improve life for those around him. The righteous individual positively affects others. But in calling many men to good works, Jesus reminded them of the corporate effect of their good works: to illuminate the city on a hill. Those who do good are not alone. They are part of a larger entity. Good works are cumulative and reinforcing.

A candle's light is a positive thing in a dark place. In the brightness of the day, men do not light candles. Flames on candles can barely be seen in the daylight. But at night, one candle can keep many people from stumbling. The darker the surroundings, the greater the positive sanction of light. To a community in great darkness, a candle makes life easier. Men will be less likely to stumble, to grope slowly in confusion, and to be rendered nearly powerless. The positive sanction of one candle becomes a benefit to many. This is what Christ's analogy of the single candle was intended to convey.

There is a famous saying: "It is better to light a candle than to curse the darkness." But for some, darkness is a blessing. It hides their evil deeds. "For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world; but that the world through him might be saved. He that believeth on him is not condemned: but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God. And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil. For every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reprov'd. But he that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God" (John 3:17–21). For evil-doers, light is a negative sanction. This is another good reason to light a candle.

The candle imagery emphasizes the benefits to many from the righteousness of one. But there is more to the corporate aspect of the sanction of light than what is provided by the solitary candle. In a city, many people light candles. The light of one candle has positive effects beyond the room of the house. Windows allow a light to shine outside the house. The distant traveller can see many household lights on the hill. He knows the location of his destination. He is not yet at the gates of the city, but he can see it.

2. Good works are predestinated by God: "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them" (Eph. 2:10).

One candle benefits many in the house. Many candles in the same city benefit those at a distance, if that city is on a hill. Jesus was conveying to His listeners the idea that they would not be alone in their righteousness. The good deeds of one person would have a greater effect because of the good deeds of another. How much light is sufficient to be seen at a distance? Not much. Consider military strategy. It was the policy of the Germans and the Allies in World War II to bomb cities from the air, despite the presence of civilians. Saturation bombing was a standard tactic of both sides in Europe. Bombers that flew at night were harder to shoot down than those that flew by day, but their bombing was less accurate. It was difficult for them to identify their targets. A light in a window identified a potential urban target. A cluster of lights made the area a target. This is why European cities had blackouts. No one was allowed to light a light in his home unless the home's windows were sealed by black curtains or black paper. If a light could be seen from the street, it was illegal, for it could be seen from the sky.

B. The Free Rider Problem

The person who lights a candle benefits himself. He makes his own way clearer. But there are “free riders” in his house: beneficiaries who do not pay. They, too, are able to see more clearly. Because of their status as family members or guests, the man with the burning candle is content to let them enjoy the light as a gift. But there may also be beneficiaries outside his house. Those on the street outside have a little more light because it shines through his window. Also, while one candle may not be seen at a great distance, many candles can be seen. Men in a city on a hill who light their individual candles thereby produce an unintended consequence: those travelling to their city can locate it. This is a free benefit to the travellers and to those who rent out lodging in the city.

1. The Free Rider

The free market economist struggles with the theoretical problem of the free rider. He believes with all his heart, mind, and soul that there is no such thing as a free lunch or a free light. Someone must pay. If some people benefit from another person's expenditure without paying for it, they will tend not to provide that service for themselves. Thus, less of it will be produced than people are willing and able to buy. The economist sees this free service as an inefficient solution to society's problem of allocating scarce resources.

His conclusion is theoretically unjustified because he cannot measure interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. No such collective scale exists. No unit of measurement exists even for the individual. An individual is unable to measure exactly how much more he values A over B. Therefore, the economist has no way to speak scientifically of a society's benefits or losses. He has no way to measure aggregates of subjective utilities.³ Yet, with few exceptions, economists offer politicians suggestions for economic policy whenever asked, and even when they are not asked. To put it bluntly, the economist is faking it, but he gets away with this deception because all of his peers are faking it, too. They pretend that their individualistic epistemology can lead to state-imposed solutions for collective problems.⁴ This is not to say that the real-world problem of the free rider does not exist. It does exist, but humanistic economic science is unable to solve it and also remain consistent with its presuppositions.

If someone can benefit from another person's actions, should he be compelled by the state to compensate the other person? In most cases, says the free market economist, the answer is no. But, he asks, what about those cases where the capital owner will not perform the service unless he is paid? If all of the beneficiaries of his action are not compelled to pay, why should any of them pay? But if none of them pays, the service will not be provided. Society—a conceptual aggregate—obtains less of the service than its members would be willing to pay for if all of them were compelled to pay. The classic example is national defense. If money spent by citizens A through M to defend their city also protects citizens N through Z, why shouldn't citizens N through Z be compelled to repay citizens A through M for N through Z's share of the costs of the defense project? If they refuse to pay, citizens A through M may not pay. The city will then be defended less effectively.

The economic problem here is the identification of ownership.

3. Murray N. Rothbard, "Toward a Reconstruction of Utility and Welfare Economics" (1956), in Rothbard, Economic Controversies (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, 2011), ch. 17.

4. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 5.

Citizens A through M do not own all of the property that the enemy's bombers may target. If citizens A through M cannot protect their portion of the city from bombing without also protecting the lives and property citizens N through Z, shouldn't the latter be asked to pay their share of the anti-aircraft equipment and operations? Citizens A through M cannot establish ownership of the territory owned by citizens N through Z. They also cannot effectively protect just one part of the city. But without the funding by citizens N through Z, the anti-aircraft system is too expensive for citizens A through M to build, i.e., they are unwilling to fund it. Everyone is less safe because members of the second group refuse to pay. If anyone in the city can easily escape the economic burden, few people will voluntarily contribute.

2. Negative Civil Sanctions

To solve the dilemma of who should pay under which conditions, we must invoke biblical covenant theology. We begin with this presupposition: the state does not have the authority to bring positive sanctions. Its God-given task is to impose negative sanctions on convicted evil-doers. In this light, the invading military force is an evil to be destroyed, i.e., placed under negative sanctions. An anti-aircraft system is a negative sanction against enemy bombers. It is the civil government's function to protect everyone under its jurisdiction from foreign governments that would otherwise impose negative sanctions against the legitimate state and the residents it protects. Defense expenditures buy the implements of negative covenantal sanctions, i.e., the means for the suppression of evil. The expenditure-reducing effects of the free rider must be reduced. The free rider must be compelled to contribute his share of the defense against evil.

This is not an argument against the legitimacy of the free rider in the area of positive sanctions. If I want to paint my home, thereby improving the value of other real estate in my neighborhood, this is not a legitimate reason for me to threaten civil sanctions against those neighbors who do not choose to pay me to paint my home. It is also not a legitimate reason for me to seek government intervention to force every neighbor to improve his home, so that my expenditure will not be wasted. There is no covenantally legitimate reason that would justify the state's coercion in this matter. The free riders should be allowed to enjoy the ride.

When those living in a city on a hill light candles to light their homes, travellers at a distance become free riders. The men who light those candles have no legal claim on the income of those being guided by their lights. Besides, how could any traveller know how much to pay any particular candle owner? The government could collect a “candle tax” at the gates of the city, distributing a prorated share to all candle lighters. This would create a bureaucratic nightmare, with candle-lighters adding unneeded candles if the subsidy is made on the basis of candles actually lit. Also, there would have to be a candle police unit to search the town for cheaters who collected the light-a-candle subsidy without actually lighting all of their candles.

Because of the private property system, a free rider lawfully enjoys access to a positive sanction paid for by someone else. As long as this sanction is positive and no fraud or violence is being imposed by the beneficiaries on the provider of the benefit, the civil government has no legitimate role in allocating access to or payment for the benefit. But when the sanction is negative against outsiders, such as invaders, the state sometimes has a legitimate role in imposing defense costs on free riders.

3. The Positive Sanction of Grace

This text imposes an obligation on the recipients of God’s grace. They must light candles. They light them for themselves, but they must rest content that others may freely benefit from the light. In this way, the city on a hill will remain a beacon to the lost.

The entire world is a free rider on God’s grace.⁵ The fact that God did not immediately kill Adam and Eve testifies to their status as free riders in history. Common grace is the doctrinal basis of free rider economics. God grants life, power, knowledge, and time to covenant-breakers and covenant-keepers alike. He then calls on His people to do the same. Good works to others are visible signs that God’s people acknowledge their status as free riders. “Heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out devils: freely ye have received, freely give” (Matt. 10:8).⁶

C. Cumulative Good Works

The more candles burning, the less the darkness. Each person’s individual candle removes some darkness. The farther away from the source of light, the dimmer the surroundings. For someone to get through the town without stumbling, every household must light a candle close to a window. The more burning candles, the safer the wanderer. There will be fewer lost people and fewer crimes committed by the haters of light.⁷

5. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

6. Chapter 22.

The spread of the gospel is to be accompanied by the spread of good works. These good works add up. They make life in the community of saints more pleasant. Even those who do not share the confession of faith are benefitted. They see the good works of the faithful, and they glorify God (v. 16). This is what God wants.

Darkness is driven out by light. Darkness is not the equal of light. It cannot withstand light. The power of light is positive; darkness is a negative factor. Darkness exists only where there is no light. God dispelled darkness on the first day of creation (Gen. 1:3). It took a positive act to accomplish this, but this positive act was triumphant.

There is a problem with light, however. As more candles are lit, each one provides a reduced percentage of the total light. The law of diminishing returns sets in. In the initial phase of the candle-lighting process, each candle reinforced the growth of light, driving away shadows that the first candles produced. But as more and more are lit, they may even bother the guest. All he can see is a sea of candles. There comes a point when it does not pay to light another candle, other things being equal. But, down the road, things are still dark. There, the brightness has not penetrated. Men are to take their candles to dark areas where there is no light. The extent of the darkness is so great that any extra candles always have a role to play, though not in the local area. We are to export light by exporting our candles.

Jesus was calling for world evangelism. It was not merely that His listeners were to light their candles. They could carry their candles, nicely lit, to help others light their candles. Like a torch used to light other torches, so is the gospel. The light of candles can also light a candle-producing factory throughout the night. Two or three shifts of candle-makers can be employed in winter months, when the nights are long.

The law of diminishing returns is even a factor in the production of righteousness. It leads to a kind of apathy about doing more good works. As the environment in which we live gets less threatening, we become complacent. But there is so much darkness in this world, so much work to be done, that there is always a place for another candle. It just may not be in the house or city where candles are common.

7. There may be more fires.

As good works multiply, society is transformed. Just as candles placed in the windows of every home will throw light onto the streets, thereby reducing crime, so are good works. They have a spillover effect. As each person follows God's lead, those around him are benefitted. There is no way that Christianity can transform souls only. Souls-only evangelism is an impossibility. The cumulative effect of good works is to reform society.

D. A Model for Other Cities

A well-lit city on a hill will attract visitors. This will decrease income for residents of dark cities in the valleys. Those who see the benefits of living in a city on a hill will move to one. Others will try to imitate it. The competition for righteousness grows because of the positive effects of righteousness. Good works have good consequences.

Actions that produce positive sanctions are worth imitating. This is why light is superior to darkness. The forces of darkness have an advantage only because men are born sinners. But this advantage is offset by the negative effects of sin. The consequences of sin are such that people seek to avoid them. More and more, they seek the fruits of righteousness without the ethical roots. Bank robbers like to drive on safe streets, even if they drive too fast immediately after their bank robberies. Criminals want access to physicians whenever they get sick or are shot. No one wants to live in darkness all of the time.

The city on a hill stands out. It becomes a working model for other cities. So does righteousness. That was Jesus' point. It was not that righteousness brings persecution every time. On the contrary, those who persecute the righteous will eventually fail. In a world of liars, truth-tellers have an advantage. In a world of slothful people, industrious people have an advantage. In a world of sloppy work, the careful producer has an advantage. That anyone should put a candle under a basket is foolish: the only way that any light will be generated is if the basket catches on fire. What good is a candle under a basket? Similarly, what good is salvation without good works? Salvation without good works is as foolish as a burning candle under a basket. It takes an act of stupidity to place a burning candle under a basket. It defeats the purpose of lighting the candle, and it also threatens the basket. Similarly, it takes an act of stupidity to hide one's salvation by refusing to do good works. It is not merely that personal salvation will always produce good works, i.e., positive sanctions; it is that it takes a self-conscious act of stupidity to restrict salvation-generated good works. Such an act is contrary to the essence of salvation. Jesus told His opponents: "If a son shall ask bread of any of you that is a father, will he give him a stone? or if he ask a fish, will he for a fish give him a serpent? Or if he shall ask an egg, will he offer him a scorpion? If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children: how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him?" (Luke 11:11–13).⁸ The city on a hill is supposed to reveal God's grace in action. Good works are attractive to fallen men. Good works are a form of evangelism, just as God's law is (Deut. 4:4–8).⁹ Rare is the man so judicially blind that he does not appreciate good deeds—if not shown to him, then at least to his children. Members of other nations, other religions, and other ways of life are to see the good works of Christians, and say: "This is a better way." Light is better than darkness.

Conclusion

The imagery of light applies to the city as well as the candle. It is corporate as well as individual. Individual salvation is supposed to produce social salvation (healing). The difference between Christianity and its rivals should be as clear as the difference between light and darkness. The city on a hill is worth imitating. The burning candle is worth removing from under the basket. Christians are supposed to let their lights shine, despite the free rider problem. Those around Christians are supposed to be the recipients of common grace: the crumbs that fall from the tables owned by Christians. If others are blessed because of the righteousness of covenant-keepers, God is pleased. What the economists call externalities—unowned overflow—should increase in the presence of covenant-keepers. These should be positive externalities. Negative externalities we call pollution. The civil government should act to reduce negative physical externalities—at some price.¹⁰

8. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 22.

9. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 8.

10. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Appendix H.

This passage's top priority for Christians is to produce light, not to get others to pay for it. This light is both spiritual and visible. "Even so every good tree bringeth forth good fruit; but a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit" (Matt. 7:17).¹¹ The goal is an increase in the production of good fruit. "Every branch in me that beareth not fruit he taketh away: and every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit" (John 15:2). Put another way, the goal of the passage is the increase of positive externalities. In a godly city, these become cumulative. The wealth of all is increased by the willingness of covenant-keepers to allow free riders to share the blessings of righteousness. The darkness surrounding covenant-breakers is reduced at no extra charge. It is more important for the covenant-keeper to increase light than to collect a fee from all who benefit.

11. Chapter 18.

RECONCILIATION BEFORE FORMAL SACRIFICE

Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not kill; and whosoever shall kill shall be in danger of the judgment: But I say unto you, That whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment: and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council: but whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire. Therefore if thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath ought against thee; Leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift (Matt. 5:22–24).

The theocentric basis of this law is peace with God. This is an aspect of the peace treaty: God's covenant. The doctrine of the covenant is point two of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Brotherly Peace

If a man's brother is not at peace with him, then he cannot be at peace with God. His brother has a complaint against him—a cause. This has disrupted the bond between them. It has therefore disrupted the bond between the man offering the gift and God. In this sense, his brother represents God to him. If he cannot get things settled with his brother, he cannot please God with the gift. The gift is in this sense profane: a violation of a sacred boundary. The sacred boundary is the altar: the place of God's unique judicial presence. Judicial peace should prevail in this holy place. But there is no judicial peace between the covenant-keeper and his brother. The gift is therefore unholy. It is in this sense unclean. To offer it on the altar is to profane the altar. It must be left in front of the altar, but not burned or otherwise used by the priest or ecclesiastical representative.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

This gift is in addition to the tithe. It is something special, comparable to one of the first three Mosaic offerings (Lev. 3).² The tithe is owed to God by all covenant-keepers. It is not given to win favor with God. It is given because it belongs to God by way of the local church.³

The text says to leave the gift before the altar. That is, the person is not to bring the gift, remember the brother's cause, and then decide not to offer it. He is to leave the gift before the altar, i.e., leave it behind. He is then to get matters straightened out with the brother. Then he is to return to offer the gift. The gift is no longer in his possession once he brings it to the altar. It is held by the ecclesiastical leader in charge of the altar. This gives an economic incentive to the man to get the matter settled. Until he does, he is neither to offer his gift nor take it back. It is doing him no good, either as a capital asset or as a gift to God.

It is not the responsibility of the priestly representative of God to enquire regarding the spiritual life of every covenant-keeper who comes to make an offering. The priest is not expected to know the details of every gift-offerer's life. Those making gifts are presumed innocent. But if the priest knows of a unsettled dispute between the gift-offerer and his brother, he is not to accept the gift. He is to encourage the giver to get the matter settled. But he is also to remind him to leave the gift with the church, as he had originally intended to do.

God is not in need of our gifts. This means that the ecclesiastical representative must discipline himself to do without profane gifts. He must not act as though he is dependent on profane gifts, for that would testify to the church's dependence on men rather than God. The more he is in need of the gift, the greater is his incentive to intervene to help settle the dispute. This means that the church is the institution with the greatest economic incentive to restore peace among its members and their relatives or fellow believers.

The gift-giver cannot lawfully reclaim his gift. The priest wants the gift. God will be pleased with the gift if it is not profane. The giver is

2. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), chaps. 1–3.

3. Gary North, Tithing and the Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994). (<http://bit.ly/gntithing>) now trapped. He must settle the matter with his brother. The question is: How?

B. Who Is at Fault?

The dispute is a matter of law, once the gift is brought into God's presence. The dispute must be settled lawfully. The gift-giver knows there is a dispute. Can he get it settled? Must he capitulate to the brother, just because the brother has something against him? No. But they can bring it before the church courts if they can't settle it.

The brother may be wrong. He may be at fault himself. The gift-giver is not presumed guilty by God. He is merely considered to be out of fellowship with his brother and therefore not fit to offer the gift.

The settling of disputes is a judicial matter, but it need not be settled by a court. It may have to be, however. The matter must be laid to rest if the gift is to be acceptable.

If a church court announces the terms of the settlement, and the gift-giver conforms, he is now free to offer the gift. If his brother still resents him, the gift is nevertheless valid. Some men cannot be reconciled to their brothers. They will not forgive. The gift-giver is not to be made a permanent victim, unable to offer his gift, just because his brother is stubborn. The church is not to be penalized because of an unforgiving brother. The court's declaration heals the matter judicially. This is sufficient to transform the status of the gift from profane to acceptable.

Conclusion

The top priority of this law is reconciliation of brothers. The healing of disputes within the community of the faithful is sufficiently important that the church may not knowingly accept a gift from a participant in such a dispute. Peace is more important to God than gifts. It should be more important to the church, too.

8

EARLY CONFESSION

Agree with thine adversary quickly, whiles thou art in the way with him; lest at any time the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison. Verily I say unto thee, Thou shalt by no means come out thence, till thou hast paid the uttermost farthing (Matt. 5:25–26).

The theocentric principle of this law is the authority of God to bring eternal punishment against His enemies: sanctions. This is point four of the biblical covenant.¹ God is the adversary who brings a covenant lawsuit in history against those who have broken His covenant. Covenant-breakers are warned to settle with God before the day of judgment, when they will be delivered over to the judge, sentenced, and cast into prison. In prison, a man cannot earn enough to buy his freedom.

Though it is not clear from this passage, prison here is analogous to hell. Jesus' parable of the unjust steward makes this clear: "And his lord was wroth, and delivered him to the tormentors, till he should pay all that was due unto him. So likewise shall my heavenly Father do also unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother their trespasses" (Matt. 18:34–35).

The presumption of this passage is that the listener is guilty. His adversary is God. Man does not come before God in a guiltless legal condition. Jesus warned every guilty man against refusing to make restitution to this innocent victim before the case comes before the judge.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

A. Discount for Early Confession

In the Mosaic law, there was a lower penalty for admitting guilt before the trial. The thief had been accused by the victim, but he had avoided a trial because he had sworn falsely to his neighbor that he was innocent. “Then shall an oath of the LORD be between them both, that he hath not put his hand unto his neighbour’s goods; and the owner of it shall accept thereof, and he shall not make it good” (Ex. 22:11).² The thief was required to repay whatever he had stolen, plus 20%. “Then it shall be, because he hath sinned, and is guilty, that he shall restore that which he took violently away, or the thing which he hath deceitfully gotten, or that which was delivered him to keep, or the lost thing which he found, Or all that about which he hath sworn falsely; he shall even restore it in the principal, and shall add the fifth part more thereto, and give it unto him to whom it appertaineth, in the day of his trespass offering” (Lev. 6:4–5).³

The presumption here is that the thief had already sworn falsely. His adversary comes to him and demands payment. Does he have new evidence? Can he now prove that the thief had in fact stolen his goods? If so, the thief faces a greater penalty if convicted: double restitution (Ex. 22:4),⁴ plus a trespass offering—a slain ram (Lev. 6:6)—to the church in payment for the false oath.

The Mosaic law offered a discount for timely confession: before the false oath, no trespass offering was required, though restitution was. After the false oath to the neighbor, a 20% penalty was required and a trespass offering. After the trial, double restitution and a trespass offering were required. This system reduced the expense to the victim or the civil court for gaining a conviction. It lowered the price of civil justice.

B. New Evidence

The guilty man in this case thinks that he can avoid making restitution to his victim. His adversary confronts him, but still he persists in his deception. His adversary suspects that he has committed the crime. Nevertheless, the guilty party refuses to admit this and pay the victim.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 46.

3. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 6.

4. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 43.

The key question for the guilty party is this: Can the victim prove his case in a court? Has he additional evidence that will lead to his conviction? The assumption of Jesus' warning here is that the victim possesses additional evidence. Perhaps he has witnesses. Whatever he has, the victim is offering the criminal one more opportunity to "come clean." He is being given another opportunity to confess his guilt and escape from the court by means of a reduced payment. Jesus warned His listeners: accept the offer. Do not risk suffering a far harsher penalty when the judge hands down his decision.

The guilty party may think to himself, "I have successfully avoided conviction previously. I think I will avoid it this time, too. Yes, there is some risk, but I would rather bear this risk than make a settlement with my victim now." This is unwise, Jesus said. Confess now. Make restitution now.

The assumption of this passage is that the victim has new evidence—compelling evidence—and will gain a conviction. Theologically speaking, the criminal is dealing with an omniscient God who is his judge. In His court, no guilty party will ever escape conviction. The force of the passage comes from the presumption that the adversary possesses evidence that will hold up in court.

C. The Merciful Victim

The biblical principle of justice is victim's rights.⁵ The victim has approached the guilty party and has graciously offered him one more opportunity to clear up the matter. He is under no obligation to do this. He has already confronted the criminal, and he has sworn that he was innocent. This oath may have been taken in private, or it may have been taken in public. God heard it.

The victim understands this law court. It will impose the penalty of prison. In this court, the risk is permanent incarceration. Such a penalty offers no hope for the convict, other than restitution made on his behalf by a free man. This was not a Mosaic penalty. The Mosaic penalties were flogging, restitution, and execution.⁶ Jesus was speaking

5. Gary North, Victim's Rights: The Biblical View of Civil Justice (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnvictim>)

6. There was a unique penalty imposed on a wife who grabbed the genitals of her husband's opponent when he and her husband were fighting (Deut. 25:11–12). The King James translators translated the penalty as cutting off her hand. James Jordan says it meant deeply cutting her hand through the palm. The word in Deuteronomy to an audience in the Roman Empire. Rome used prisons as the means of punishment. The Mosaic law aimed at restoration through restitution to the victim. Execution was the means of delivering a convicted man into God's court. There was no prison system, precisely because prison is God's monopoly. Hell is God's prison. Everyone sentenced to this prison receives an eternal life sentence. There is no way to buy your way out. There is no mercy shown.

This is why the victim in this passage is merciful. He has the evidence that will convict the man. Nevertheless, he approaches him one more time to persuade him to admit his guilt and pay what he owes. If the case comes to trial, the guilty party will have no hope. The language Jesus invoked here is a sentence without mercy: payment to the last farthing—to the last penny, in other words.

What kind of person, knowing his guilt, would reject the offer? Only someone who assumes that the victim does not have the evidence. In other words, he underestimates his victim. He trusts in his own cleverness in covering up the crime. He also underestimates the severity of the court. After all, he has previously escaped a permanent penalty. Why not again?

Ultimately, Jesus was calling men to recognize Him as the victim who has the evidence necessary to convict them. The heavenly judge will recognize the legitimacy of this evidence and will convict. The criminal will surely suffer the penalty. What He was saying was that every man is guilty before God. But there is a way of escape. The guilty person can declare his guilt to the victim and make restitution to him privately. The dispute will not go to court. The case can be settled in advance of a trial.

Payment in advance assumes that the criminal is economically capable of making restitution. If he isn't, then he needs to find someone who will pay the victim on his behalf, while the opportunity for making a substitute payment is still available. After the court declares his guilt, this opportunity will be lost. The man will be cast into prison and forced to pay. But in prison, he cannot gain access to the money necessary to make this restitution payment. Hence, his punishment will be permanent. He will never get out. The language of the passage implies life imprisonment. The theology of the passage implies eternal life imprisonment. It implies that God is content with extracting payment through tormenting rebels forever.

25:12 is kaph or kaf, which Strong's Concordance defines as "the hollow hand or palm (so of the paw of an animal, of the sole, and even of the bowl of a dish or sling, the handle of a bolt, the leaves of a palm-tree); fig. power:-branch, + foot, hand ([-ful], -dle, [-led]), hollow, middle, palm, paw, power, sole, spoon." To cut a palm is different from cutting off a hand.

Conclusion

One goal of biblical law is the early confession of guilt. A reduced penalty payment is offered to those who admit their guilt before the trial begins. Jesus warned His listeners that they should settle with their adversary early. This presumed that they were guilty.

The top priority here is gaining the admission of guilt prior to trial. The cost of obtaining justice is less when guilty men admit their guilt early. This is a benefit for the victims of crime. It is a benefit for society, which gains justice at a lower cost. He who is guilty is required by God to admit this fact early. The system of eternal judgment rests on the validity of this principle.

9

BRIBING TYRANTS

Ye have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth: But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil: but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloke also. And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain. Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away (Matt. 5:38–42).

The theocentric issue here is the judgment of God on a rebellious nation: sanctions. This is point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. The Purpose of Tyrants

God brings tyrants to power in order to use them as rods of iron in history. Tyranny, especially through invasion and defeat, is God's response to injustice in a covenanted nation. Isaiah warned:

Woe unto them that decree unrighteous decrees, and that write grievousness which they have prescribed; To turn aside the needy from judgment, and to take away the right from the poor of my people, that widows may be their prey, and that they may rob the fatherless! And what will ye do in the day of visitation, and in the desolation which shall come from far? to whom will ye flee for help? and where will ye leave your glory? Without me they shall bow down under the prisoners, and they shall fall under the slain. For all this his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still. O Assyrian, the rod of mine anger, and the staff in their hand is mine indignation. I will send him against an hypocritical nation, and against the people of my wrath will I give him a charge, to take the spoil, and to take the prey, and to tread them down like the mire of the streets (Isa. 10:1–6).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

These laws require the covenant-keeper to subordinate himself meekly to covenant-breakers. The proper response to injustice, Jesus said here, is acceptance. The victim of injustice must not only accept it, he must open himself for greater injustice. He must bear the cost of injustice and then offer an additional payment. He must submit to tyranny.

Tyranny must be seen in its covenantal and historical context. Jesus was speaking to a captive people. Jews in the northern kingdom had been carried away into Assyria. Jews in the southern kingdom had been carried into Babylon. Those few who returned under Medo-Persia lived under foreign rule. Their heirs lived under the heirs of the Macedonian Empire, which fell to Rome. Israel had been under foreign rule for over six centuries. They had known nothing but captivity and foreign domination. They had learned to live under foreign law as a captive nation.

B. An Open Conspiracy²

Jesus did not call His listeners to revolt. He called them to obedience. He did not teach revolution through power. He taught revolution through moral example. His concern was the kingdom of God. In its historical manifestation, this kingdom is one of justice and righteousness. The program to defeat tyranny is a return to personal justice and righteousness. The answer to bad civil laws begins with good personal rules. This is not the final answer, however. It is only the first step.

Tyranny is systematic. It is part of a corporate system. It becomes a way of life. Corruption spreads. This corruption eventually undermines it. What will replace it? A new tyranny? If men die in revolutionary violence or conspiracy, only to lay the foundation for a new tyranny, where is the gain? What the French Revolution launched and the Communist revolutions completed was a social experiment: violence for the sake of cleansing, and power for the sake of power.

Violence breeds violence. Conspiracy breeds more conspiracy. The kingdom of God is to be proclaimed openly. “Jesus answered him, I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort; and in secret have I said nothing” (John 18:20). He spoke in parables, but He spoke openly. He did not create a secret society that was bound by a self-maledictory blood oath. He created a church that was bound by a self-maledictory public sign: baptism.

2. The phrase is from H. G. Wells, The Open Conspiracy: Blue Prints for a World Revolution (New York: Doubleday, Doran, 1928).

The church is an open conspiracy. Members conspire: breathe together. They do so openly. Preaching is public. The sacraments are taken in public. Only when tyrannies place negative sanctions against these otherwise public activities are Christians called by God to go into the shadows.

What is visible is righteousness. What is visible are good works. This theme appears throughout the Sermon on the Mount. Jesus called on His listeners to go the extra mile. Why? Because doing so would buy peace. Peace makes it easier for the open conspiracy to enlist new adherents. Paul wrote: “I exhort therefore, that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men; For kings, and for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour; Who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth” (I Tim. 2:1–4).³

C. Turning the Cheek

“Ye have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth: But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil: but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also” (vv. 38–39). This seems to be a rejection of the lex talionis: eye for eye (Ex. 21:24;⁴ Lev. 24:20;⁵ Deut. 19:21⁶). Eye for eye means that the punishment should fit the crime. This principle of justice undergirds civil sanctions in the Mosaic Covenant. Was Jesus rejecting the Mosaic Covenant? Hardly: “Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say

3. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 2.

4. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 37.

5. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 23.

6. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 45.

unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled. Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven: but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 5:17–19). Then why did He preface his command to turn the other cheek with "ye have heard it said"? This phrase usually appears as His preface to a rejection of a traditional Jewish law which was not supported by the Mosaic law.

The context was civil power. A person who would strike one of Jesus' listeners was a man in authority or who had the support of the civil authority. There was nothing the victim could do to repay, eye for eye, without resorting to private justice. But God had placed His covenant people under foreign rule for many centuries. This subordination was no temporary affliction. It was a way of life. Their fathers had sinned against God's law for so long that He never again allowed Israel to run its own political affairs.

Jesus warned "that ye resist not evil." Yet we read elsewhere: "Submit yourselves therefore to God. Resist the devil, and he will flee from you" (James 4:7). The devil is the very incarnation of evil. Why, then, did Jesus say to resist not evil? Because evil in this context was the evil of tyranny. It was God's judgment on His people that they had been forced to live under a series of legal systems not based on biblical law. Such a civil condition is a mark of God's negative sanctions against a nation. Jesus told them to put up with tyranny for the time being. He told them to go the extra mile.

D. Something Extra

"And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloke also" (v. 40). The context is civil authority. The man was not a common thief. He had the force of law behind him. He had proven this. He had won the case. He had won the coat. What was the proper response. Offer him more.

Why? Because a free man can usually earn another cloak. A man in prison cannot. If the victorious plaintiff decided to sue again, the victim would probably lose. The strategy here is to give the litigious man something extra. Let him sue somebody else. The man may enjoy going to court. For most people, going to court is a traumatic, expensive experience. When you have lost to a man who is allied with the authorities, it is wise to stay out of court. The strategy here is to buy him off, the same way Jacob bought off Esau when he sought to return to Canaan through Esau's land: give him gifts he did not deserve (Gen. 32).⁷

“And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain” (v. 41). The same principle applies in this example. The victim is operating under compulsion. He is not a free man. Go the extra mile. Heap eternal coals of fire on his head (Rom. 12:20). This is a generally safe tactic to use against the enemy. But it has short-run costs. You pay extra now to avoid trouble in the future. You reduce future costs by incurring present costs.

“Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away” (v. 42). Here is another example of giving something extra. Normally, this verse would lead to bankruptcy. If a person who has capital gives away money to everyone who would like to borrow, he will soon have no capital. The offer of free money will be accepted by most people. Why would Jesus recommend stripping His people of their capital? Is this a permanent requirement?

This requirement must be seen within the context of tyranny. A man with political connections comes to a successful victim and asks for a loan. In all likelihood, he does not intend to repay it. He understands how the legal system works. It is on his side. This loan will be difficult to collect. The man with capital is to assess the power of the would-be borrower. Is this man in a position to create problems? Can he use his authority illegitimately? If so, avoid trouble: give him what he wants.

E. Implicit Bribes

When a person gives something extra to a poor person, the gift is not a bribe. It is a gift. It is an extension of mercy. But when a person gives a gift to someone with power over him, we generally call the gift a bribe.

What is the Bible's view of bribery? That depends on whether you are a victim of tyranny or a ruler. The mark of an unrighteous ruler is his acceptance of bribes. “Judges and officers shalt thou make thee in all thy gates, which the LORD thy God giveth thee, throughout thy tribes: and they shall judge the people with just judgment. Thou shalt not wrest judgment; thou shalt not respect persons, neither take a gift: for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous" (Deut. 16:18–19).⁸ But for the righteous man trapped in a corrupt legal system, offering a bribe is one way to gain justice. "A gift is as a precious stone in the eyes of him that hath it: whithersoever it turneth, it prospereth" (Prov. 17:8). "A man's gift maketh room for him, and bringeth him before great men" (Prov. 18:16). "A gift in secret pacifieth anger: and a reward in the bosom strong wrath" (Prov. 21:14).⁹

7. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 26.

This passage provides guidance for righteous people who are trapped in a corrupt legal order. Instead of fighting back, Jesus said, make peace. Instead of seeking vengeance, seek peace. When you are confronted with a man who has the power to take what he wants from you, offer it in advance. Honor this power by offering something extra: more than he deserves. This is the way to peace. It appears to be a costly way to peace, but in fact it is the less expensive way. It requires an extra payment in the present, but it lowers the cost of righteous living over the long run. To gain peace is a way to gain time. Time is what righteous men need to begin to construct an alternative to tyranny. It gives them time to learn the ways of righteousness and productivity. This is especially true when tyranny is increasing in both evil and power.

F. Accelerating Evil

Economics tells us that we discount the future. This discount is the origin of interest.¹⁰ The investor must be given a promise of more goods in exchange for the use of his present goods. Why did Jesus tell men to hand over present goods to evil-doers with power? Because evil in this context was getting worse. The evil-doer will demand more in the future—lots more. He will demand so much more that it is wiser to gain his cooperation now. This is what happened in A.D. 66–70. The Jewish Zealots became more tyrannical. Rome reciprocated, and then some. Old Covenant Israel was coming to an end in Jesus' day. Jesus was warning His listeners not to participate in revolutionary movements against the oppressors. Better to cooperate now and avoid de-

8. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 40.

9. Gary North, "In Defense of Biblical Bribery," in R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 837–48.

10. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. 19. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

struction later.

Christians went through a year of persecution under Nero in A.D. 64. The horrifying stories of this persecution have come down to us for almost two millennia. Christians were singled out as judicially separate from the Jews, who were under special legal protection. But this legal separation by persecution was the church's deliverance. In A.D. 66, Israel revolted against Rome. The church, no longer seen by Rome as being part of Israel or Judaism, escaped destruction.¹¹ Now the prophesied days of vengeance on Israel had arrived.¹²

Submission can be seen as weakness or strength. If the one who submits is seen as cowardly, he invites more persecution. But if his submission is seen as a pattern of behavior based on helping the weak as well as the strong, then submission is seen as a product of a higher ethic, or a higher calling. If the man lends a hand to rich and poor, strong and weak, then he is seen as not being servile but superior. The Sermon on the Mount is Jesus' most comprehensive statement of non-servile subordination. Submission to authority is not a mark of cowardice if it is part of a program of personal ethical transformation based on extending grace—unearned gifts—to all men. This extension of grace is exactly what the Sermon on the Mount teaches.

G. Revolution Through Cooperation

"If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink: For thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head, and the LORD shall reward thee" (Prov. 25:21–22). This program of victory over one's enemies was articulated in the days of Solomon's rule, the period of Israel's greatest power. It is therefore a strategy for all seasons. Jesus merely articulated a variant of it. Paul placed it within the context of civil government:

Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord. Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good. Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever therefore resisteth

11. Carsten Peter Thiede and Matthew D'Ancona, Eyewitness to Jesus (New York: Doubleday, 1996), pp. 48–51.

12. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

the power, resisteth the ordinance of God: and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation (Rom. 12:19–13:2).

The individual is not to seek personal vengeance against his enemy. Surely, he is not to seek vengeance against a civil magistrate. Yet the context of Jesus' Sermon on the Mount was a nation under foreign domination. Israel was a nation in bondage. This was why the Jews' response to His message was ludicrous: "Then said Jesus to those Jews which believed on him, If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed; And ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free. They answered him, We be Abraham's seed, and were never in bondage to any man: how sayest thou, Ye shall be made free?" (John 8:31–33). Later, the chief priests (Sadducees) were more honest: "When Pilate therefore heard that saying, he brought Jesus forth, and sat down in the judgment seat in a place that is called the Pavement, but in the Hebrew, Gabbatha. And it was the preparation of the passover, and about the sixth hour: and he saith unto the Jews, Behold your King! But they cried out, Away with him, away with him, crucify him. Pilate saith unto them, Shall I crucify your King? The chief priests answered, We have no king but Caesar" (John 19:13–15).

Then how can the man in bondage, or a nation in bondage, gain freedom? By faithfully obeying God's laws. By building up the habits of obedience to God and His revealed word. There is an old political slogan: "You can't beat something with nothing." What works best as a program of national liberation is a program of liberation from sin. Again, consider the context of Jesus' words to His followers: "They answered him, We be Abraham's seed, and were never in bondage to any man: how sayest thou, Ye shall be made free? Jesus answered them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin" (John 8:33–34). To escape from bondage, He said, avoid sin. There can be no escape from bondage without an escape from sin. Sin is the ultimate form of bondage in history. But God's judgment against sin in eternity is the ultimate form of bondage. There is no escape from hell and the lake of fire.

Jesus' program of systematic cooperation is a program of heaping coals of fire on tyrannical heads. Yet it is also a program of evangelism. Men who repay evil with good do catch the attention of many people, including tyrants. There is something special about such a response to evil. Men ask: "Why?"

Good undermines evil. Evil is not self-sustaining. It is parasitical. It undermines productivity. This produces weakness. Tyranny does not persist indefinitely. It recedes in the face of goodness, or it collapses in a display of weakness. The collapse of the Soviet Union, 1989–1991, is the most remarkable collapse of tyranny in the history of empires. It collapsed without a fight. It was a nearly bloodless abdication of what had been unprecedented power.

Conclusion

The top priority of this passage is outward subordination to tyrannical authority. It is not anti-revolutionary as such; it is anti-vengeance. It is a revolutionary strategy designed to replace tyranny with liberty, which rests on God's Bible-revealed law. The revolutionary aspects of this program are moral. The passage must be seen in the context of Israel's political subordination to Rome. It must also be seen in the context of God's program of grace. His people are to extend grace to others, just as God extended grace to them. Their outward subordination to authority—extending more to tyrants than they deserve—is part of a general program of grace.

This passage is not a guide for the exercise of political power. Civil authority is based upon justice: eye for eye. Victims may extend grace to criminals; the state may not.¹³ The passage deals with individuals in political bondage to a state that refuses to extend justice to all. Jesus was here laying down a program of resistance to tyranny, a program based on nonviolent replacement of power. The Sermon on the Mount was a unit. This section deals with powerlessness: a way to gain victory over evil. Heap coals of fire on evil men's heads.

13. Gary North, Victim's Rights: The Biblical View of Civil Justice (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnvictim>)

10

COMMON GRACE, SPECIAL PEACE

Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you; That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same? And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the publicans so? (Matt. 5:43–47).

The theocentric focus of this passage is found in the middle of the passage: “for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust” (v. 45). God is sovereign: point one of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Non-Discriminatory Blessings

God is sovereign over nature. He sends rain and sunshine in due season on all men, good and bad. He offers all men access to nature’s means of production. If God shows mercy to His enemies, then His people should show mercy to their enemies.

What this says is that God does not discriminate. His gifts are widely distributed. Such gifts from God are unearned by the recipients. An unearned gift is called grace in the Bible. God showers and shines His grace on all men. In history, this common grace is to the benefit of covenant-breakers. In eternity, it works against them retroactively. “Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head” (Rom. 12:20). “And that servant, which knew his lord’s will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more” (Luke 12:47–48).²

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

This passage is important in establishing the truth of the doctrine of common grace.³ Common grace in history is given freely to all men. For the just, it is a sign of God’s favor toward them. For the unjust, it is the means of God’s eternal wrath against them. In both cases, the grace is not earned by the recipient.

Grace is a word for salvation. God grants salvation to all men, but especially to the covenant-keeper. “For therefore we both labour and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, specially of those that believe” (I Tim. 4:10).⁴ The covenant-keeper is the recipient of special grace and common grace, but the covenant-breaker is the recipient of only common grace.

Does this doctrine imply universal salvation in eternity? No; it implies the opposite: greater wrath for covenant-breakers in eternity. The salvation referred to by Paul in I Timothy 4:10 is God’s healing grace in history. It is salvation as salve: healing ointment. It allows the just and the unjust to work out their respective eternal conditions. Paul also wrote: “Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling” (Phil. 2:12).⁵ But as the unjust man works out his salvation in history, he condemns himself eternally. He forgets that God is the source of His life, knowledge, authority, and income. He says in his heart, “My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth” (Deut. 8:17b).⁶ This condemns him.

2. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

3. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

4. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [201] 2012), ch. 6.

5. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 20.

6. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deutero-

But what about an entire society that says this? Common grace condemns that society. “And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God” (Deut. 8:19–20).⁷ The lure of autonomy from the God of the Bible is great; it leads individuals and societies to destruction.

B. Nature as a Sanctioning Agent

Jesus’ announcement meant that the New Covenant has broken with the Mosaic Covenant’s system of special favor for Israel. In the Mosaic Covenant, God had promised special blessings for national Israel that included nature itself. Nature in Israel had been unnatural. It had been a means used by God to bring His covenantal sanctions. Nature had been a sanctioning agent.

If ye walk in my statutes, and keep my commandments, and do them; Then I will give you rain in due season, and the land shall yield her increase, and the trees of the field shall yield their fruit (Lev. 26:3–4).⁸

And it shall come to pass, if ye shall hearken diligently unto my commandments which I command you this day, to love the LORD your God, and to serve him with all your heart and with all your soul, That I will give you the rain of your land in his due season, the first rain and the latter rain, that thou mayest gather in thy corn, and thy wine, and thine oil. And I will send grass in thy fields for thy cattle, that thou mayest eat and be full. Take heed to yourselves, that your heart be not deceived, and ye turn aside, and serve other gods, and worship them; And then the LORD’S wrath be kindled against you, and he shut up the heaven, that there be no rain, and that the land yield not her fruit; and lest ye perish quickly from off the good land which the LORD giveth you (Deut. 11:13–17).⁹

When heaven is shut up, and there is no rain, because they have sinned against thee; if they pray toward this place, and confess thy name, and turn from their sin, when thou afflictest them: Then hear thou in heaven, and forgive the sin of thy servants, and of thy people nomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 21.

7. Ibid., ch. 23.

8. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 33.

9. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 28.

Israel, that thou teach them the good way wherein they should walk, and give rain upon thy land, which thou hast given to thy people for an inheritance (I Kings 8:35–36).

And Elijah the Tishbite, who was of the inhabitants of Gilead, said unto Ahab, As the LORD God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word (I Kings 17:1).

Jesus announced the end of nature as a sanctioning agent. No longer would nature serve as a means of God's special cursings and special blessing to covenanted nations. God's special presence inside Israel was about to cease. The temple and the sacrifices had only one generation to go, although Jesus did not announce a specific time limit on the Mosaic sacrifices. God would no longer dwell specially in Old Covenant Israel; nature would no longer be the means of God's corporate sanctions on Israel.

C. Love Your Enemies

The New Covenant reaffirms an Old Covenant requirement: to love our enemies. This love is judicial: showing mercy and justice. God's common grace toward all men is to be revealed by covenant-keepers' general love for all men. God sends sunshine and rain in due season to all men. This is merciful. Covenant-keepers are to pray for all men. God does good to all men through nature. He proposes to do good to all men through His people. In the same way that nature no longer plays favorites in the New Covenant, so covenant-keepers are not to play favorites. They must do good to all men.

This does not mean that covenant-keepers are required to subsidize evil. They are to visit prisoners; they are not to smuggle in tools for their escape. They are to help specific poor people; they are not to give wealth away indiscriminately to every poor man, irrespective of how he became poor. They are not to give alms to drunkards who will use the money to buy more alcohol. They are to give alms to rescue missions that feed and preach to street people who are alcoholics.

The love shown to our enemies is the same kind of love that God shows to us. God provides everyone with sunshine and rain in due season. The enemy here is not a criminal. He is merely an adversary of the individual Christian. He is not a destroyer who uses his skills to prey upon the weak. He is an opponent. God shows mercy in history to His opponents; His people should do the same for their opponents.

When God's people do this, they extend God's common grace. God uses them in a way analogous to how He uses nature: as a means of revealing God's grace in history. By this grace, God brings some to repentance and others to everlasting destruction. Good works heap coals of fire on some heads and soul-transforming blessings on other heads. We cannot know in advance which effect our love and good works will have. Even if we did know, we should obey God's law anyway. He knows which people will respond to His common grace by repenting and which will worship other gods, including man. Yet He still sends rain and sunshine in due season.

By showing love to all men, covenant-keepers set themselves apart from other men. Their universal love makes them seem different. Lost men ask: "Why?" Peter wrote:

But and if ye suffer for righteousness' sake, happy are ye: and be not afraid of their terror, neither be troubled; But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts: and be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you with meekness and fear: Having a good conscience; that, whereas they speak evil of you, as of evildoers, they may be ashamed that falsely accuse your good conversation in Christ. For it is better, if the will of God be so, that ye suffer for well doing, than for evil doing. For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit: By which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison (I Pet. 3:14–19).

One of the most effective yet little known ministries in the United States is the Kairos prison ministry.¹⁰ Twice a year, a team of Christians goes into a prison, usually a maximum security prison, for a three-day weekend. They bring in food baked by Christians. Forty-two prisoners assemble for the weekend to eat cookies, lasagna, hamburgers, fresh salads, and ice cream—food that is rarely available in prison. The number of cookies consumed in that weekend is staggering: up to 60,000. Cookies are given to the prisoners and the guards. One of the exercises is for prisoners at the end of the second day to take a bag of one dozen cookies to their worst enemy. The prisoners hear very simple applied gospel messages for three days. They are shown love by the outside team. They sing. They pray simple prayers. And by the end of the weekend, as many as half of them make professions of faith.

10. <http://www.kairosprisonministry.org>

Why does this program work? Because people from the free world with nothing visible to gain treat criminals with friendship. For prisoners, this makes no sense. They keep asking themselves: “Why?” They keep thinking: “What is in it for them? What are they after?” And for a few—sometimes many—the answer dawns: “Because Jesus loves me.” These prisoners are brought into God’s kingdom. Even those who are not brought in speak well of Kairos from then on. Word spreads. Then, when team members come back once a month to visit with the prisoners, word really spreads. For prisoners, Kairos makes no sense. That is its strength.

D. Program for a Captive People

The context of the Sermon on the Mount is important: Roman domination. Covenant-breakers were in control. For most societies, this has been the case throughout history. The ethical principles in the Sermon on the Mount are universal, but they are most appropriate for those in judicial bondage. Loving one’s enemies is not a widely shared ethical principle among captive peoples. Conquerors cannot readily understand it; neither can revolutionaries.

Jesus was telling His listeners that they were captives of sin. This is the universal form of captivity among men. “Jesus answered them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin” (John 8:34). The Greek word for “servant” can also be translated “slave,” and in this passage, it should be. The way out of slavery is grace. It begins with God’s common grace to all men. Without this, life would be impossible. Then He shows special grace. “But God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us” (Rom. 5:8). His people are a means of common grace. They are also a means of special grace. “So then faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God” (Rom. 10:17).

Common grace is shown to all men by God through nature. Covenant-breakers take God’s common grace for granted. They see it as only what they deserve. But common grace shown by enemies, they do not take for granted. They are moved to ask: “Why?” This question can serve as a first step to a correct answer. There are two possible correct answers: (1) “God loves me and has a wonderful plan for my life”; (2) “God hates me and has a horrible plan for my life.” Nebuchadnezzar discovered the first answer (Dan. 4). Judas discovered the second answer. “And truly the Son of man goeth, as it was determined: but woe unto that man by whom he is betrayed!” (Luke 22:22).

E. Justice and the Free Market

Legal predictability is a foundation of the free market social order. So is equality before the law. Every person’s property is protected by law from thieves and predators and government officials. The expectation of justice allows men to reduce their expenditures on defending their property or hiding it. Social cooperation becomes less expensive.

The Bible requires the rule of law: one law for all. “One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you” (Ex. 12:49).¹¹ This was not Roman jurisprudence. Jesus told His followers to treat all men justly, irrespective of the prevailing civil law. If obeyed, this law makes it more likely that Christians will gain cooperation from other people. Because of their law-abiding practices, Christians should gain access to a larger market than their competitors: production markets and retail markets. By lowering the risks of doing business with them, Christians can lower their own costs of production.

Enemies can still do business with each other. This is a benefit. Doing business leads to greater peace. Becoming dependent on another’s production raises the cost of breaking off the business relationship. By treating all men justly, Christians would gain the reputation as being low-risk associates. This would increase the number of opportunities offered to them.

In contrast is the practice of Christians’ unwillingness to perform as promised on the basis of their demand for mercy, which is supposedly owed to the Christian on account of his unique legal position before God. The Christian who expects others to grant him mercy for poor performance is a man who is violating the rule of law. He is demanding a subsidy for his substandard performance. He is pressuring others to treat him as outside the rule of law. Word will get out that this man is a high-risk associate. His opportunities to extend the kingdom of God will therefore shrink.

Conclusion

The top priority in this passage is for God’s people to pray for and treat justly all men, including their enemies. This is what sets God's people apart from other people. "For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same? And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the publicans so?" God extends mercy and grace to all men in history; so should God's people. This mercy and grace brings some to repentance and others to destruction. It is up to God to determine which outcome results from His common grace. It is not up to men.

11. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 14.

11

CHARITY GIVEN IN SECRET

Take heed that ye do not your alms before men, to be seen of them: otherwise ye have no reward of your Father which is in heaven. Therefore when thou doest thine alms, do not sound a trumpet before thee, as the hypocrites do in the synagogues and in the streets, that they may have glory of men. Verily I say unto you, They have their reward. But when thou doest alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth: That thine alms may be in secret: and thy Father which seeth in secret himself shall reward thee openly (Matt. 6:1–4).

The theocentric focus of this law is the fact that God gives rewards openly to those who give alms secretly for His sake: sanctions. This is point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Public Displays of Generosity

There is no doubt that there are rewards for giving charity. The question is: Who is the targeted source of the rewards? Is it men or God? Do alms-givers seek the praises of men or of God? There are rewards in history and eternity. The question is: Who gives these rewards? The answer that men give is revealed by their actions. If they give alms in public, then their reward is the praise of men. If they give alms in secret, then their reward is God's praise, possibly in history, but surely after the resurrection.

The message is clear: donors should not go to any expense in publicizing their personal charitable activities. This does not mean that they may not announce the existence of their activities. If an institution exists to do charitable work, how will potential recipients learn of its existence if it remains entirely secret? How, for example, is a public foundation to give away its money if it cannot lawfully announce its existence? Only if it gives to “insiders,” i.e., individuals or groups that are selectively informed by the informal information grapevine that money is available. The broader the organization’s vision for giving, the more important it is for potential recipients of the money to present their needs to the organization. How can this be done in secret?

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

In the United States, a public foundation must report its activities and expenditures to the Internal Revenue Service. If it refuses, it loses its legal status as a tax-deductible organization. Those donating money to it will no longer be able to deduct this money from their taxable gross income. They will be taxed on it even though they gave it away. The tax authorities legally monitor the use of the money. The organization’s funds must be used to support the charitable activities that it was set up to support.

What Jesus was condemning was a publicity campaign by the givers for the sake of the givers. To announce that a foundation gives away funds to certain causes is a legitimate reason to have a publicity campaign, although these costs should be minimized. The campaign may be used to gain both donations and outlets for the donated funds. It should be designed to attract more deserving recipients for the funds. It should not be designed to publicize the donors.

This is a reason why family names should not be placed on charitable organizations. When they give away money, this should not bring fame or good reputation to the families that set up these foundations. The Carnegie Foundation, the Rockefeller Foundation, the Ford Foundation, the Pew Charitable Trust, and all the other family-created foundations with family names on them violated this basic principle. Even William Volker, known posthumously as Mr. Anonymous,² violated this principle when he set up the Volker Charities in the early decades of the twentieth century.

There is another reason: well-funded non-profit organizations have almost always been taken over by people who hold opposite views from their founders, unless the founders were political liberals. The more conservative the donor and the larger the size of his foundation’s capital base, the faster it has been taken over by liberals. When Henry Ford II resigned from the liberal Ford Foundation in disgust in the mid-1970s, he admitted what had happened. Conservatives do not capture liberal foundations; liberals capture conservative foundations. Why? Because the educational institutions that produce the managers that run large bureaucracies are liberal. Another reason: liberals use long-term planning to infiltrate and capture rich or influential conservative organizations.³

2. Herbert C. Cornuelle, Mr. Anonymous: The Story of William Volker (Caldwell, Idaho: Caxton, 1951).

B. Rewards as Positive Sanctions

This passage does not condemn the giving of charity for the sake of rewards. On the contrary, it identifies personal rewards as the primary goal of charity. Nothing here is said of the needs of the poor. The issue here is the source of the rewards: God or men. When the donor's goal is to gain the praises of men, he may very well receive this reward, but this is the only reward he will receive. Jesus condemns His opponents: "They have their reward." All they have is the praise of men. In eternity, this counts for nothing. It condemns rather than upholds.

The system of covenantal cause and effect in history and eternity is based on a system of rewards, i.e., sanctions. Point four of the biblical covenant model has to do with sanctions.⁴ Without God's covenantal sanctions, men would be trapped in a universe where either impersonal chaos and chance or impersonal determinism would rule the affairs of man. In either case, meaning would have to be imputed by men to their environment, an environment beyond man's control. Either the environment would be too chaotic to control or too deterministic for man to be anything but a cog in a great machine.

Charity is a good thing because rewards are a good thing. The question is: How good are the rewards? Rewards from men's praise are a good thing, but not at the expense of rewards from God. Jesus made it plain here that the reward-seeker must choose between rewards. He must not seek both. By seeking God's reward, he may receive the praise of men as an unintended consequence. By seeking men's praise, the giver can be sure that he will not receive God's reward. The system of covenantal sanctions is clearly weighted on the side of seeking God's reward. The system, in the peculiar language of economists, is asymmetric. But, then again, God's creation is asymmetric. Even though it often appears as if it were asymmetric on the side of covenant-break-

3. Gary North, Crossed Fingers: How the Liberals Captured the Presbyterian Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1996). (<http://bit.ly/ncrossed>)

4. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 4; North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 4.

ers, it isn't. It is on the side of covenant-keepers.⁵

There is no doubt that it is unwise to choose the praise of men when such praise negates the praise of God. To do so is to make a catastrophic choice, which is part of a more comprehensive system of choices: "For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" (Matt. 16:26).⁶

Seeking the praises of men is a variant of mammon worship.⁷ Instead of seeking wealth, the donor seeks praise. Instead of serving the buyers in order to amass riches, he serves the objects of his charity. His goal is the same: personal rewards in history. He uses his talents in order to build up his supply of rewards in history. This is false worship. True worship has as its goal eternal rewards through service to God. Earthly rewards come as a consequence of service to men as surrogates for God (Matt. 25:34–40).

C. Uncoordinated Giving

"But when thou doest alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth" (v. 3). This is an odd saying. It sounds as though the proper approach to giving is some sort of indiscriminate handing out of funds. Is this what the passage means?

What Jesus is condemning is a system of giving which is calculated to gain the praise of men. The giver chooses his charities carefully in terms of a plan. This plan is designed to benefit the giver by enhancing his reputation as a charitable person. Everything the giver does is calculated to win him the praise of men. His giving is designed to buy him the praise of men.

Then is it wrong to design charitable giving plans in order to buy rewards? No, for Jesus says that a reward from God is a legitimate goal of charity. The question is: Who is the source of the rewards? It is a question of sovereignty. Who is the true God? Whose standards governing charity are sovereign? God is hidden from sight; men are in plain view. Should the giver seek his rewards from the invisible God or the visible gods? Jesus' answer is clear.

The command not to let the right hand know what the left hand is doing is a command for two-handed charity. Men should give away alms with both hands. What Jesus was saying is that there should be no coordinated plan of giving—two-handed giving—if it involves making calculations regarding the praises of men.

5. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

6. Chapter 35.

7. Chapter 14.

God sets forth standards for covenantally faithful giving. First, giving should be structured to please God and thereby gain His rewards. “Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal” (Matt. 6:19–20).⁸ Second, it should be two-handed: generous, not to a fault, but to a benefit. Third, it should be for the sake of the recipients. If giving to a recipient who needs help but will not bring the praises of men, ignore the praises of men.

Conclusion

To give alms wisely requires a plan. Giving is not to be uncoordinated. The question is: Whose plan? The top priority of this passage is to identify the sovereign source of rewards for alms. That source is God, who sees in secret now and rewards in public: sometimes in history but always in eternity. The presumption is that God’s rewards do not come immediately. Those who seek the praise of men already have their reward. God will publicly reward only faithful givers. This is future tense.

This forces men to act in faith: faith either in the near-term praise of men or the long-term praise of God. People give now, but they hope for praise. There is a time factor in making one’s choice: immediate vs. indeterminate. There is also a source factor: men or God. Choose well which time frame and which God to serve, this passage warns us.

8. Chapter 13.

12

THE LORD'S PRAYER

After this manner therefore pray ye: Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil: For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever. Amen (Matt. 6:9–13).

The theocentric focus of this passage is God, who answers prayer. It identifies God as the father of His people. He is personal. He is present with His people: point one of the biblical covenant.¹ As a father, He loves His children. They can come to Him in prayer without fear of reproach.

A. Corporate Prayer

This is a corporate prayer. Those marked by God's covenant sign of baptism are told to raise their voices to heaven. They publicly identify God as the one who dwells in heaven. He is above the earth. This implies that He is sovereign over the creation. The second identification is His name. It is hallowed, i.e., holy or set apart. Those who have been set apart by God are told to announce the set-apart status of God.

Then comes the first request: that God's kingdom will come. But it is already here. Jesus said: "But if I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you" (Matt 12:28).² Then why must we pray that it come? Because that which is definitively here

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

2. The parallel in Luke is unexpected: "But if I with the finger of God cast out devils, no doubt the kingdom of God is come upon you" (Luke 11:20).

already is also progressively arriving. At some point, it will be here finally: at the last judgment. "For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death" (I Cor. 15:25–26).³ By praying for the kingdom's advent, Christians extend the kingdom of God in history. They are praying for time to end, when heaven and earth will be equated morally.

This leads to the second request. "Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven." God's will is for men to be ethically perfect. "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect" (Matt. 5:48). The ethical perfection of heaven is to be progressively manifested in history: first, through individuals; second, through the institutions they influence. Men's obedience is one of the means by which God's kingdom comes. Obedience is the basis of dominion.⁴

Only when we have affirmed God's glory and holiness and have called for His kingdom's advent in history do we come to our requests for our own benefits.

B. Daily Bread

Before the advent of capitalism, hunger was a universal threat. "Give us this day our daily bread" was no idle refrain. The experience of hunger was familiar to all but a tiny handful of rulers and those who served them. Famine was always a possibility: too much rain, too little rain, locusts, etc. Famine was one of God's three primary corporate judgments. "When they fast, I will not hear their cry; and when they offer burnt offering and an oblation, I will not accept them: but I will consume them by the sword, and by the famine, and by the pestilence" (Jer. 14:12).

Bread is the symbol of the food which sustains life. Jesus contrasted God's word with bread as the staff of life. "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God" (Matt. 4:4b).⁵ This was an Old Testament doctrine (Deut. 8:3). Nevertheless, bread deserves its due. We are creatures. We must eat to live. Bread is a universally recognized food.

When covenant-keepers pray for bread, they are praying for life. They are asking God to enable them to survive another day. The token of God's favor is daily bread, just as the manna was in the wilderness.

3. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 16.

4. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 3.

5. Chapter 1.

To pray for daily bread is not selfish. It acknowledges that God is the source of life, and that men are dependent on Him for their lives.

The modern capitalist order has produced bread in such abundance that this request has become more of a ritual than a serious request. Because God has provided the grace of the free market, a social institution that produces unprecedented wealth, He has already answered this prayer in the West. He has created the legal and social arrangements by which bread is supplied in abundance by third parties. The problem is, men no longer recognize the historical and cultural uniqueness of bread in abundance. They do not sense that they are in the presence of a miracle: an unplanned economic system by which most men will not starve in peacetime unless they are the targets of political oppression. Men fall into the trap of pretended autonomy which is described in the same chapter of Deuteronomy in which the warning against ignoring God's word in favor of bread appears. "And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth. But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day" (Deut. 8:17–18).⁶

The prayer for daily bread appears after the prayer takes men through the doctrine of God: His fatherhood, sovereignty, holiness, and righteousness. Those who affirm mentally what they have prayed for openly have both confessed and believed that this God is the source of bread. This is what God insists on. It is illegitimate to ascribe to man what has its source in God. This is a great evil of humanism, including modern free market theory. Economists ascribe to impersonal market forces and social arrangements that which God provides in His grace.

One of the most important teachings of modern economics is that the value of each additional unit of any scarce resource is less to the individual than the previous unit. This is the doctrine of declining marginal utility.⁷ An application of this law is men's declining thankfulness about bread. Men become less thankful for food as they become full. The enormous output of food in the modern world has left bread as a

6. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 22.

7. The assumption here is that tastes do not change. If tastes do change, this law is not always applicable. Certain addictive substances may be marked by increasing marginal utility for a time, as the addiction takes hold. Cigarettes are a good example.

nearly ignored substance. It takes active mental discipline to pray this prayer meaningfully. Men must learn to thank God for the means of such massive production of bread, including the social order.

If bread were removed for a time, men would learn to pray this prayer enthusiastically. But that would be a time of judgment. The difficulty is to maintain the attitude of reverential subordination to the God who provides bread, the symbol of life. Men tend to forget God when they get rich. Wealth, which is a blessing of God for covenantal faithfulness (Deut. 28:1–14),⁸ becomes a snare. Solomon said it best: “. . . give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me: Lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the LORD? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain” (Prov. 30:8b–9). This is a prayer worth repeating. The lust for more food, like the lust for more money, is a mark of addiction. Solomon knew this, too. “When thou sittest to eat with a ruler, consider diligently what is before thee: And put a knife to thy throat, if thou be a man given to appetite. Be not desirous of his dainties: for they are deceitful meat. Labour not to be rich: cease from thine own wisdom” (Prov. 23:1–4). He had tasted many dainties. This had produced only vanity.

C. Forgiven Debts

The next request acknowledges that men are debtors. They are debtors above all to God, who sustains them, but they are also debtors to other men.

1. Broken Contracts

The familiar liturgical version of this prayer, “forgive us our trespasses,” does not appear in this text or a parallel. The verses immediately following do mention trespasses: “For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you: But if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses” (Matt. 6:14–15). The two words have similar applications, but “debts” is the more judicial language. The word conveys the idea of a contract. The one who prays the prayer is the guilty party. He has broken the contract. But others have broken debt contracts with him. When covenant-keeping men forgive others, they are themselves forgiven by God. The debts to God are cancelled. Whatever amount was owed to the man in debt to God counts as a representative payment—a token payment—to God.

8. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 69.

In some corporate sense, men can say, “we owe the debt to ourselves.” But to say this, there must be a way to settle up the accounts, cancel all debts, and send everyone home a debt-free person. Only God can do this. Only He can settle all of the accounts. He alone can do this because of the magnitude of the debts owed to Him by all men. Whatever men owe to others is dwarfed by what they owe to God. They owe God everything, for His grace is the source of everything they own. He is therefore in a position to cancel any man’s debts. This prayer asks God to cancel a person’s debt to Him. God then asks him who prays to do the same, but on a much smaller scale.

What kind of debts are in view here? The context of the prayer is the sovereignty of a holy God. The context is ethics. Every person is in debt to God ethically. The debt is the equivalent of a trespass. We have broken God’s laws. Others have broken His laws by injuring us. When we come to God asking for forgiveness for an ethical trespass, He asks us to do the same for others. But God does not ask us to forgive every trespass and every trespasser. He asks us to forgive those who ask for forgiveness, even as we ask God for forgiveness. Even as we may be asked to make a restitution payment to God, so they may be asked to make a restitution payment to us. And just as there are times when we cannot or will not make our restitution payment to God, yet still ask for His forgiveness, so sometimes are we to forgive those who make no restitution payment to us, yet still ask for our forgiveness.

2. A Token Payment

Restitution is basic to settling ethical debts, i.e., transgressions.⁹ When a man calls on God to forgive him, he must be ready to make restitution. But He cannot pay God all of what he owes to God. His restitution payment is a token. When a transgressor calls on his victims to forgive him, he must be ready to make restitution. This restitution can involve lifetime servitude if he is a criminal. If he is a less flagrant debtor, he may owe money, service, or goods. But what if he owes more than he can restore? Then he is in the same predicament that we are in with respect to God. This prayer reminds us that we can repay God by not demanding all of the restitution payment that is owed to us by some debtor. We accept a token payment from him, just as God accepts a token payment from us.

9. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 43.

The token payment is important, however. It is a mark of humility, an admission that a larger debt is owed. It allows the debtor to admit his debt. He must ask for an act of grace on our part—an undeserved gift. After all, this is what God does for us. To ask God for forgiveness without offering any restitution payment is not to take seriously either the debt or the debt relationship.

The ultimate restitution payment was made by Jesus Christ on the cross. But this does not negate the necessity of a token payment. If we have sinned against another person, and we cry out to God for forgiveness, we must make restitution to our victim. If we have sinned against God, we can and should suffer some token loss. Under the Mosaic Covenant, this would have been an animal sacrifice (Lev. 6:6).¹⁰ Under the New Covenant, it is a dedicated life: “I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service. And be not conformed to this world: but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God” (Rom. 12:1–2).¹¹ A life of full-time service is our token payment.

When we have given God everything, how can we give Him anything extra? How can we make a token payment if we have nothing to spare? By distinguishing between faithful service in general and faithful service in particular. We serve God when we make a profit. We also serve Him by giving things away. But the two forms of service are not equal. Giving things away is blessed spiritually. Jesus said: “It is more blessed to give than to receive” (Acts 20:35b).¹² It takes spiritual discipline of a high order to internalize this fact and make it a way of life. So, when a man owes a debt to God, a good way to pay his token is to give something away to someone who can make good use of it. It is good for the recipient, and it is good practice for spiritual growth. The giver is the judge of what constitutes a meaningful token. It must not be too great, for man should never imagine that he can buy God’s favor.¹³ It

10. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 7.

11. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 9.

12. Gary North, Sacrifice and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Acts, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 9.

13. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 56; North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch.

must not be too small, persuading the believer that a trespass is a trifle. The token payment, like the punishment, should fit the trespass. The token mentioned here is our forgiveness of what others owe to us. We forgive a little to others; God forgives much to us.

3. A Web of Debt

Economic debt is a secondary application of this verse. Debt is here seen as a liability, something to be avoided, and if this is not possible, then forgiven. The modern world is now engulfed in an ocean of debt. Promises have been made that cannot be kept. In civil government and fractional reserve banking, these promises have made an entire civilization dependent on the continual expansion of debt in order to pay off past obligations, both political and economic. If either debt or economic growth should falter, the entire debt system will collapse in a wave of broken promises: bankruptcy. At this late date, the public's confidence in the social order is based on faith in an escalating supply of promises that cannot be kept.

The enormous wealth produced by the capitalist system has made the prayer for daily bread a formality. But the prayer for debt forgiveness has grown more relevant under capitalism, as the world's assets have been monetized through the banking system. People eat better than ever, but they are in debt for most of their lives. Debt has become a way of life. The burden of debt is not seen as much of a burden. But when economic depressions come, men feel the pressures of debt. This is why governments prefer to inflate. There are more debtors who vote for short-run debt relief through inflation than lenders who vote for monetary policies that offer long-term restrictions on money creation.

There is so much debt today that no one can calculate it or trace its effects. We live in a gigantic web of debt. The connections are subtle. Most capital assets for which there are organized markets have debts on them or on the institutions that own them. In the investment world, the threads of debt encompass every nook and cranny of the capital markets. No one has designed this system. It has evolved through the borrowing and lending decisions of individuals. It is an example of what Adam Ferguson two centuries ago described as the product of human action but not of human design.¹⁴ Should the credit

1.

14. Adam Ferguson, An Essay on the History of Civil Society (1767), p. 187; cited by F. A. Hayek, "The Results of Human Action but not of Human Design" (1967), in Hayek, Studies in Philosophy, Politics and Economics (Chicago: University of Chicago system break down, due to a banking crisis, this will pull every institution down with it. Debt forgiveness—repudiation—will be accomplished through universal bankruptcy.

Our bread is produced by means of a debt-encumbered system of production. A breakdown in the credit markets would call into question the ability of all producers to get their products into the hands of customers. This applies to farmers above all. In the United States, about two percent of the population lives on farms. These people feed the rest of the nation and much of the world. Agriculture has always been heavily dependent on debt. But today's debt system extends beyond the farms into every aspect of the food chain. When men one day cry out in desperation, "forgive us our debts," God will grant them their request. But on the next day, they will be praying for their daily bread. The web of debt will be shred to pieces by the breakdown of the credit system, which means the breakdown of fractional reserve banking. The breakdown of the bank payments system will contract the division of labor: the interdependent system which puts bread on our tables, the economists insist. There will be less bread on our tables when all of our debts are forgiven in a massive wave of bankruptcies.

D. Deliverance

"And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil." This is a call for guidance. To minimize the opportunities for sinning, men are to call upon God to keep them out of temptation. This is a call for a subsidy. Men should desire to smooth the crooked paths of life, to walk neither to the right nor to the left. "Only be thou strong and very courageous, that thou mayest observe to do according to all the law, which Moses my servant commanded thee: turn not from it to the right hand or to the left, that thou mayest prosper whithersoever thou goest. This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein: for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success" (Josh. 1:7–8).

Deliverance from evil implies that we are already trapped in the vice of sin or the devices of evil-doers. We got into the mess; now we want out. We call out for God to pull us out of the mire.

We seek a subsidy in both cases. We admit that we cannot achieve these goals in our own strength. The sinner acknowledges that he is a sinner. He does this so that he will be enabled to sin less. This is the kind of subsidy that God wants to provide. It is a subsidy to righteousness. Such a subsidy is a necessity in a world under the effects of original sin. Were it not for this subsidy, men would be totally depraved. Society would be like the pre-Flood civilization: fit for destruction. It could not continue. But God subsidizes righteousness for His glory's sake. This enables His people to extend His kingdom in history.

E. Kingdom, Power, and Glory

These are three marks of a king. God is here acknowledged to be the great king under whose authority all other kings operate. The Lord's prayer moves from God in heaven to God in history. Men are to pray their prayers of request as a means of achieving this extension of the kingdom from heaven to earth. We pray to the God of heaven for our daily bread, debt annulment, reduced temptations, and deliverance from evil so that we might better extend God's kingdom, power, and glory in history.

Our prayers for ourselves are sandwiched in between God's kingdom in heaven and His kingdom on earth. That which was definitive when Christ cast out demons becomes progressive through the prayers of His people.

The suggestion that God's kingdom has no institutional manifestation in civil government, yet does in church government and family government, is to restrict the reign of the king. Kingdom, power, and glory are thereby confined to the spheres of the voluntary. When magistrates bring civil sanctions, however, they are supposedly not allowed to see themselves as oath-bound covenantal agents of the God of the Bible. The kingdom of God is said to lack visible incorporation in the civil realm. There is neither formal power or public glory for God in the civil realm, according to modern political theory.

Forever is more than a long time. God's kingdom, power, and glory extend from history into eternity. This points to progressive sanctification in history, which will culminate in the defeat of death and the end of time (I Cor. 15:26). The prayers of Christians are to extend God's kingdom, glory, and power in history.

This implies a goal of victory in history: the replacement of Satan's kingdom by God's. This is social sanctification. This is not exclusively a trans-historical sanctification; it must also be historical. The request to have God's will done on earth as well as in heaven testifies to the historical frame of reference.¹⁵

There is continuity between today's kingdom, power, and glory and tomorrow's. This continuity is manifested by the prayers of God's people—above all, the Lord's prayer. As surely as His people pray today for daily bread and their deliverance from evil, so have other sons prayed in the past and will pray in the future. The continuity provided by this prayer points to the continuity of God's kingdom, power, and glory in history. If men expect their prayers for bread and deliverance to be answered, then they must expect progressive personal sanctification. Similarly, when they pray the closing words, they must expect to see God's kingdom, power, and glory to persevere in history. But if there is no expansion, then what kind of a kingdom is it? What kind of power will He exercise? What kind of glory will be His? He exercises power representatively, through mankind. To pray this prayer is to pray for the regeneration of mankind. This may take millennia, but it will not take forever.

Conclusion

The Lord's prayer moves from heaven to earth and from the present into eternity: forever. It proclaims a comprehensive kingdom of God in history, which extends into eternity. It calls for an ethical subsidy to covenant-keepers, which is a subsidy to the progressive establishment of God's kingdom. Such a subsidy is necessary to offset, let alone overcome, original sin.

God offers us bread for the asking. He offers forgiveness of our debts. We, in turn, are to forgive the debts of others. Our forgiveness is a token payment to God for what we owe him. The debts here are moral debts: violations of God's law. To a lesser extent, they are economic debts. The message is clear: don't build up debts to others, either moral or economic.

The top priority of this passage is the power of corporate prayer in transforming history, to bring history into conformity to eternity's standards. The kingdom of God is at the beginning and end of this prayer. The kingdom of God provides the context of our daily bread and our mercy: received and extended.

15. Are we to imagine that God requires the church to pray corporately ("Our Father," not "My Father") for something that can never come to pass? Yet this is the teaching of amillennialism.

13

INCORRUPT TREASURE

Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal: For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also (Matt. 6:19–21).

The theocentric principle here is God as the rewarder of those who diligently serve Him: sanctions, which is point four of the biblical covenant.¹ “But without faith it is impossible to please him: for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him” (Heb. 11:6).

A. The Goals of Treasure-Builders

This passage proclaims the superiority of eternity over time. That which we lay up for ourselves on earth is subject to risk. That which we do for the cause of God will surely last. Time is not a reliable vault for treasure. Things can change overnight that destroy the best-laid plans of men. Where should men put their faith? Not in things temporal.

The passage forbids laying up treasures on earth for ourselves. Two things are involved here: self-aggrandizement and time. The person who amasses wealth on earth is too short-sighted. He is also too risk-oriented. He is building up capital that may be lost and will surely be useless to the capitalist after his death. The post-funeral question, “How must did he leave behind?” has a universal answer: “All of it.”

The passage does not condemn treasure left behind for one’s heirs or one's favorite causes. Inheritance is too prominent a theme in the Bible for any such conclusion. "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov. 13:22). The inter-generational transfer of wealth is basic to fulfilling the dominion covenant. The long-term growth of capital in the hands of covenant-keepers is one aspect of the extension of the kingdom of God in history.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

What is condemned is the amassing of wealth for oneself. It reveals a false religion: faith in man and faith in time. "The rich man's wealth is his strong city, and as an high wall in his own conceit" (Prov. 18:11). The wealth that men accumulate on earth is a temptation to other men. Thieves break in. Rust corrupts. The erosion of value, like the erosion of life, threatens all forms of wealth except perhaps gold, which does not rust. But gold is a favorite target of thieves. And it can be lost.

Why do men build treasures? No single answer exists. The quest for safety from the unknown, the desire for recognition—a name—the delight in the challenge of wealth accumulation as a game: all of these have motivated men. But death comes to every man. If all that matters is what other men impute to you and your works—recognition, fame, respect, net asset value—then your work is dependent on the wisdom of other men. Those who impute value to your works are mortal. Death is the great leveller. The Preacher wrote:

Then I beheld all the work of God, that a man cannot find out the work that is done under the sun: because though a man labour to seek it out, yet he shall not find it; yea further; though a wise man think to know it, yet shall he not be able to find it. For all this I considered in my heart even to declare all this, that the righteous, and the wise, and their works, are in the hand of God: no man knoweth either love or hatred by all that is before them. All things come alike to all: there is one event to the righteous, and to the wicked; to the good and to the clean, and to the unclean; to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not: as is the good, so is the sinner; and he that sweareth, as he that feareth an oath. This is an evil among all things that are done under the sun, that there is one event unto all: yea, also the heart of the sons of men is full of evil, and madness is in their heart while they live, and after that they go to the dead. For to him that is joined to all the living there is hope: for a living dog is better than a dead lion. For the living know that they shall die: but the dead know not any thing, neither have they any more a reward; for the memory of them is forgotten. Also their love, and their hatred, and their envy, is now perished; neither have they any more a portion for ever in any thing that is done under the sun (Eccl. 8:17–9:6).

If death makes all things the same, then mortality threatens all meaning, all differentiation. The good and the bad in history end the same way. If there is no immortal agent who imputes meaning to that which is temporal and therefore mortal, then there is no permanent meaning. Everything is vanity.

What truly matters, Jesus warned, is not exclusively material. He who rests his faith on that which can be accumulated on earth has placed his trust in a weak god.

B. Treasures of the Heart

“For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also.” This is a profound insight. What a man values most captures his heart. He dreams of it, plans his life in terms of it, and sacrifices for it. Treasure captures men. Men dream of buried treasure, yet treasures bury men. Men whose dreams are in things have been captured by these things, metaphorically speaking. Their desires restructure their lives. The focus of their desires is temporal. This cuts them off from treasures in eternity.

To dream, plan your life, and sacrifice for the sake of treasures in heaven are marks of one’s subordination to God and one’s future-orientation. Those who accumulate treasures in heaven by forfeiting consumption in history are radically future-oriented and therefore radically upper class.² It takes faith to do this. It requires trust in Jesus’ doctrine of the world of heaven and the post-resurrection new heaven and new earth (Rev. 21). Jesus made it clear that a man’s heart is captured by his treasure. It is as if treasures had cords attached to them that stretch out and ensnare a man’s heart. Men are either pinned to the earth or pulled into heaven by these cords. Their treasures define where their dreams are. The implication is that as we build ever-larger treasures, these cords become more binding. “Then said Jesus unto his disciples, Verily I say unto you, That a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven. And again I say unto you, It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God” (Matt. 19:23–24).³

2. Edward Banfield, The Unheavenly City (Boston: Little, Brown, 1970), pp. 48–50. On the middle class, see pp. 50–53. On the lower class, see pp. 53–59.

3. Chapter 38.

Nothing in this passage implies that it is wrong for men to store up treasures for themselves. What Jesus warned against was earthly treasures. To pursue righteousness for the sake of an eternal reward is wise. Paul wrote: “Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended: but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus” (Phil. 3:13–14). Sacrifice in the present for the sake of a future reward reveals where our hearts are.

Jesus also said: “A good man out of the good treasure of the heart bringeth forth good things: and an evil man out of the evil treasure bringeth forth evil things” (Matt. 12:35). Here we see another variation of the same theme. There are distinctions between treasures. There are incorrupt treasures as well as corrupt treasures. A good treasure of the heart brings forth good things. It leads men toward greater righteousness.

Where is your heart? Where your treasure is. Jesus made it clear that treasures on earth are a snare and delusion. “For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?” (Mark 8:36).

C. Capital Accumulation

Then what of tools? Are not tools a means of extending man’s dominion over the earth? Tools are capital: the product of labor and land over time.⁴ Tools require reduced consumption in the present in order to construct them. There is nothing in Jesus’ words to suggest that men should not strive to gain greater mastery over the creation by means of thrift, which is required to build tools. Then how can we ethically sort out treasure from tools?

Treasure implies a final reward. It is the end of one’s production —“end” in terms of one’s goal and also in terms of one’s chronology. It is a final consumer good: the cessation of production. The vision of the miser, surrounded by boxes of gold coins, is accurate. Even better would be the miser buried with his gold—an unlikely event, as all the pharaohs’ graves save one indicate.⁵ It is the story of King Midas, whose touch transformed his daughter into gold: the touch of death.

4. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State: A Treatise on Economic Principles, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), ch. 7:4–5.

5. King Tut was a minor pharaoh whose tomb was so insignificant that the grave robbers lost track of it.

Treasure in heaven implies an end to one's earthly striving, an end to one's earthly production. It implies the individual's completion of his term of service in history. To sacrifice in history for the sake of consumption in eternity is not the touch of death. It is the opposite. Men are to strive to build up capital, not treasure. They are to build up an inventory of tools for dominion.

The great threat of capital accumulation is that it can become earthly treasure in men's hearts. The misery of Scrooge, in Dickens' story, "The Christmas Carol," is the outcome of capital transformed into treasure. Scrooge and Marley were good businessmen, but their accumulation of capital ensnared them. The chains on Marley's ghost were the product of the cords that had bound him to earthly treasure. Dickens' story is a secularized account of a man's regeneration. Scrooge is initially given two supernatural visions: what he had been and what he is. He has become bound ever-more tightly by the cords of the great god More. Then, in the third vision, he sees the result: a sparsely attended funeral and a home stripped of its few valuable treasures by thieves. But what if his funeral had been attended by kings and his home transformed into a world-famous museum? He would have been just as dead. What a corrupt man imputes in his autonomy is death: the dead burying the dead (Matt. 8:22).

The movie Citizen Kane is sometimes heralded as the greatest movie ever made. This is not my assessment, but its considerable power is derived from this same theme: the vanity of treasure. The real-life model of Kane, William Randolph Hearst, did accumulate a vast art collection—so much that he lost track of what he had. His collection was piled up in boxes. He had his agents search for one piece of art for years, and they discovered that it resided in his boxed collection. The movie's power was in its brilliant ending. His verbalized treasure in the last moments of his life, seen at the beginning of the movie, was something or someone called Rosebud. No one ever learned what it was. The next to last scene shows workers tossing piles of junk into a furnace, and one item was a child's winter sled: "Rosebud." The final scene is a column of smoke ascending from the chimney. "Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is" (I Cor. 3:12–13).⁶

6. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 3.

D. How Literal Is This Warning?

Was Jesus using hyperbole, or was He establishing guidelines? Was He really against the amassing of valuables that serve as consumption items rather than tools? Was He calling on those, like Hearst, who build their own personal treasure hoards to open them to the public? I think He was. The best Christian example of this in the United States is the art collection assembled by Bob Jones, Sr., for Bob Jones University: the finest collection of late medieval and early modern religious paintings anywhere in the United States and possibly on earth. He assembled this collection immediately after World War II, when prices were low because of the poverty of the victims. The collection is now worth more than the physical grounds of the university. Yet it can be toured for free. But very few people know of its existence. Visitors are few.

What of the woman who buys a few lovely items to enjoy and to leave to her daughters? What of the lover of antiques? The answer depends on the heart of the collector—the extent of his love. Is the collection his passion? Is it his consuming fire? Then it is his treasure. He should sell it or give it to some institution open to the public. Its cords are too binding. “Jesus said unto him, If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come and follow me. But when the young man heard that saying, he went away sorrowful: for he had great possessions. Then said Jesus unto his disciples, Verily I say unto you, That a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven” (Matt. 19:21–23).⁷

Conclusion

In the final analysis, treasure is whatever one’s god bestows on his servant for a lifetime of faithful service. He who strives for earthly treasure serves a finite god. This god may be other men, or a cause, or a demon, or oneself. But a god that can bestow only earthly treasure is not the God of the Bible.

The top priority here is the accumulation of treasure in heaven: the reward bestowed by God on His faithful servants when their work is finished. “For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ. Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; Every man’s work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire" (I Cor. 3:11–15).

7. Chapter 38.

There is an allocation problem here. Wealth spent to build one's personal earthly treasure cannot simultaneously be used in kingdom service that builds a heavenly treasure. This is why the Christian walk involves the exercise of judgment. Capital can become treasure. Tools can become an end. Anything that ends in history can become a treasure that binds its accumulator with heavy cords.

14

RIVAL MASTERS, RIVAL KINGDOMS

No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon. Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment? (Matt. 6:24–25).

The theocentric focus of this passage is service to God: hierarchy, which is point two of the biblical covenant.¹ A person must serve either God or mammon. He has no third option. There is no neutrality. The legitimate goal is service to God.

A. What Is Mammon?

Mammon is man's greed. The Greek word can also be translated "confidence." Of all false gods in history, mammon is by far the most common. Men trust in the things that they accumulate. They place their confidence in things. That is to say, they worship aspects of the creation that they seek to place under their authority. What do I mean by worship? Above all, I mean sacrifice. That to which you give your life—your time, your dreams, your reputation—is your god. You invest your emotions and efforts in this god. You also expect something in return. It might be happiness, pleasure, fame, power, respect, or any of mankind's long list of personal goals. Men sacrifice to their gods for the sake of rewards—positive sanctions. A god that offers no rewards is not taken seriously. Men ask themselves, "What's in it for me?" Then they decide which god to worship.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

The worship of any god involves making estimates. Which rewards are worth sacrificing for? Which are actually available? What is the likelihood of non-payment by the god? What is the past performance of the god in question? How much is expected of me? What happens if I promise to pay, but fail to deliver?

Then there is the question of loyalty. Is there a bond other than legal between man and his god? Is there a personal relationship? Is there grace? Does a god extend mercy to his worshippers?

But there can be no question of service. A god that has no servants is not a god. To gain what man wants from his god, he must serve. He may receive something for nothing from a gracious god, but not everything for nothing. No god extends all of his blessings gratuitously. Jesus made this plain in this passage: choose wisely which god to serve.

B. Jealous Gods

The Mosaic Covenant repeatedly warned men that the God of the Bible is a jealous God. “Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them: for I the LORD thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me” (Ex. 20:5).² “For thou shalt worship no other god: for the LORD, whose name is Jealous, is a jealous God” (Ex. 34:14). “For the LORD thy God is a consuming fire, even a jealous God” (Deut. 4:24). “God is jealous, and the LORD revengeth; the LORD revengeth, and is furious; the LORD will take vengeance on his adversaries, and he reserveth wrath for his enemies” (Nahum 1:2). He tolerates the worship of no rival gods.

Jesus made it plain in this passage that the gods in question need not be idols or demons or the fantasies of men. All rival gods boil down to one: mammon. They may be supernatural gods, or gods of the marketplace, but they must offer men rewards for service. Men pursue their own goals through service to something that can reward them. The God of the Bible can reward men. On their own authority, rival gods promise to reward men. This promise is a lie. These other gods are nothing apart from the one true God. They are all creatures. They possess no autonomous authority. They have only the scraps of power which God grants to them for His own purposes.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 22.

God and mammon are mutually exclusive, Jesus warned. Neither god tolerates the claims of the other. Each comes before man with a claim: "Worship only me, and I will reward you." The God of the Bible makes His claim exclusive. Mammon excludes only God, because God excludes mammon. God and mammon do not tolerate each other's claims. God's exclusivism is intolerable for mammon. Mammon's polytheism is intolerable for God. Mammon may publicly invite men to worship both him and God, but the invitation is spurious. Mammon treats God as if God were one among many. God rejects all such challenges to His exclusive authority.

So, men face a decision. In which god will they put their trust? Which will they serve faithfully in their quest for rewards? Which god's name will be on their tongues and in their hearts? They cannot serve both. If they attempt to serve both, they will alienate both.

C. Worship as Freedom from Worry

Jesus said: "Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment?" (v. 25). This is odd language. One goal of worship is to gain rewards. Here is Jesus, telling His listeners that they should take no thought about what they shall possess, from life itself to food, drink, and clothing. Did He mean that such things are not important? On the contrary, they are very important. Life is surely important, and life is sustained by food, drink, and clothing. What is not important, He said, is worrying about such matters. It does no good to worry, for neither man nor mammon has any ability to gain them on his own authority or by his own efforts.

Behold the fowls of the air: for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they? Which of you by taking thought can add one cubit unto his stature? And why take ye thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin: And yet I say unto you, That even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to day is, and to morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith? Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? (For after all these things do the Gentiles seek:) for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things (Matt. 6:26–32).

Our Father in heaven knows our needs. Is this not enough? When He calls us into His service, He will provide the tools of this service. The tools of service are the very rewards that men seek. Conclusion: seek to serve; stop seeking the tools of service. “But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you. Take therefore no thought for the morrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof” (Matt. 6:33–34).³ This passage lays it on the line. Our first priority should be the kingdom of God. This is what we are supposed to seek. All the other things that are presented before us as objects worth seeking are afterthoughts, or better put, tools of more effective service. They come as part of God’s program of worldwide dominion. Because God demands complete servitude, He provides us with the implements of comprehensive service. All of these things shall be added unto us as rewards for faithful service. But everything that we receive from God adds to our responsibility. “For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more” (Luke 12:48b).⁴ We receive more in order that we can achieve more. The kingdom of God thereby extends its influence across the earth.

An expanding kingdom implies growth and development in history. As the kingdom of God grows, it extends the division of labor. More hands and minds are brought into His kingdom. More servants mean greater wealth for every servant, for population growth allows greater output per unit of resource input. This is the blessing of the division of labor. As dedicated servants of God are added to the kingdom, day by day, the kingdom gains knowledge and wealth, as the newcomers bring their skills and capital in with them. The wealth of the kingdom increases. This means that there is less and less to worry about. The safety net of God’s kingdom is there to catch any covenant-keeper if he falls.

Worrying about a lack of food and raiment is like worrying about one’s lack of height. “Which of you by taking thought can add one cubit unto his stature?” It does no good to worry about such matters.

3. Chapter 15.

4. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

God is the source of all of these blessings. "Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning" (James 1:17).

"Take therefore no thought for the morrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." These are among the most difficult words in the Bible to accept emotionally. When we find someone who lives in terms of them, we generally refer to the person as a saint. Yet Jesus spoke these words to a crowd, not to an intimate circle of initiates. He made it clear that all of His followers are to cease worrying about their economic condition. The greater their faith, the less their worry. The mark of an immature faith is worry about economic matters, or even life-and-death sickness, "o ye of little faith." It is all in God's hands. God is sovereign; man is not. God is sovereign; mammon is not.

D. The Religion of More For Me

Mammon has a kingdom. This religion is the religion of never-ending more for me in history. He who worships at the shrine of more for me in history can never be satisfied. He is addicted to more as a heroin addict is addicted to heroin. C. S. Lewis once wrote that it would be a terrible curse to eat food that makes us hungry. Yet mammon's food is precisely this kind of hunger-producing food.

In the 1970s, there was a television commercial for a brand of potato chip in which Burt Lahr, the actor who became famous as the cowardly lion in The Wizard of Oz, was dressed in a devil's suit. He holds a bag of the potato chips. He reaches in and takes one out. "Bet you can't eat just one," he says to the viewer. The imagery implied evil—forbidden fruit. Yet it was a light-hearted ad; it used a lovable comedian as the devil. It implied that it was perfectly all right to eat more than one. How much more, the ad did not say. But if you are in business to sell potato chips, you surely want to get people to eat more than one chip per sitting. The advertising jingle for Schaeffer's beer had a similar message: "Schaeffer's . . . is the . . . one beer to have . . . when you're having more than one!"

God has a kingdom. It grows over time. God's religion is the religion of temporally bounded more. God wants his kingdom to expand to the ends of the earth. Sin reigns nowhere that is not God's target for escalating victory. God seeks the redemption of sinners. As part of this goal, he provides His people with tools. They can use more tools. The spread of the gospel is not achieved free of charge. We live in a world of scarcity.

Then in what way is mammon's religion of more different from God's religion of more? In many ways. First, God's offer of more is trans-historical. He offers communion with Him in eternity, a world beyond time. This goal is extremely future-oriented. Second, God's goal has a time limit: the final judgment (Rev. 20:14–15). Technically, so does mammon's: the heat death of the universe, i.e., absolute zero. But this theoretical event is so far into the future that it might as well be endless temporal succession. Third, God's goal is His own glory. To achieve this, He grants grace to men: something for nothing. Mammon's deceptive goal is the glory of man, either collectively or individually. In fact, greed destroys men. It is Satan's seductive tool. Satan grants something for something and sometimes nothing for something, if he can get away with it. But he never grants something for nothing except as bait to lure men to destruction.

The ultimate reward is eternal life. Compared to this, gaining the whole world for oneself is less than nothing. "For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" (Mark 8:36). So, the biblical pursuit of more has limits. We are warned that even if more meant everything in history, it would not be enough to compensate us for the loss of communion with Him in eternity. This puts the goal of "more" into proper perspective. If everything is insufficient, more for man has temporal limits. Life is not unbounded.

It is sometimes said that men's desires are unbounded—infinite. Better put, given the limits on each man's life, his unfulfilled desires are beyond his means. At a lower price, he will buy more. But his greatest desire—more time—is surely bounded. He who forgets this fact in making daily decisions is a fool.

And he spake a parable unto them, saying, The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully: And he thought within himself, saying, What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits? And he said, This will I do: I will pull down my barns, and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods. And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry. But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then whose shall those things be, which thou hast provided? So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God (Luke

12:16–21).⁵

The desires of men are not limitless; they are merely beyond men's means. Everything finite is bounded. Creation is finite. It is beyond our ability to measure, but God measures it. So, mammon's religion of more is ultimately a religion of man's deification. It is a religion of "more for me in history." It is an assertion of each man's divinity.

E. Rival Economic Orders

The man who worships God legitimately seeks rewards for himself, but this must be in the context of better service to God. Service to God through the creation is the mark of his salvation. "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: Not of works, lest any man should boast. For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them" (Eph. 2:8–10).

Free market economic theory relies on an analogous insight. A man gains what he wants by selling to others. He must offer something they want in exchange for something he wants. Each party gains from the transaction. Most free market transactions are not zero-sum transactions.⁶ They are not examples of "I win; therefore, you lose." A representative of one spiritual kingdom can lawfully do business with a representative of the other kingdom. Both parties benefit. Both parties expand their wealth. Each party extends his god's kingdom. God can afford to let Satan extend his kingdom in this way because of the eschatological structure of inheritance. "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov. 13:22). God's people ultimately inherit the earth.⁷

Satan cannot be equally magnanimous to God. Eschatology is against him. He is running out of time. Satan operates with stolen goods. He is a squatter in history. He lured Adam into a transfer of allegiance and therefore a transfer of assets, but Adam owned nothing of his own. He was merely a designated steward of God's assets. So, mammonism is inherently a religion of theft: stealing from God to benefit man. It is self-centered greed. Its ultimate goal is "more for me and

5. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 25.

6. An exception is a commodity futures transaction, where one investor gains at the expense of the other, and the broker gains from both.

7. Gary North, Inherit the Earth: Biblical Blueprints for Economics (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gninherit>) less for you.” One man grows in stature by exceeding his fellows. While he may pursue “more for me and more for you, too” in the short run through voluntary exchange, he ultimately seeks to convert these gains into capital for covenant-breaking conquest. The religion of autonomy seeks to enslave others or kill them. This is what autonomy means: “The world serves me at its expense.”

Conclusion

Serving God means learning to be content with whatever God supplies today. The faithful man thinks, “there is more where this came from.” God will supply the tools that His people require for service to Him. These tools include such things as life, food, drink, and clothing. This outlook was the basis of Paul’s warning:

For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out. And having food and raiment let us be therewith content. But they that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all evil: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows. But thou, O man of God, flee these things; and follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness (I Tim. 6:7–11).⁸

What do covenant-keepers need? Whatever God gives them. No more than this? No more. Later, they may receive more, for the kingdom’s sake and the covenant’s confirmation. “But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:18).⁹

What do men want? Usually, they want more than God has given to them. In the modern world, where the worship of economic growth is the most widely practiced religion, men want far more than what God has given to them. They are trapped on mammon’s treadmill to oblivion. Their religion is expressed on a humorous tee-shirt: “He who dies with the most toys, wins.” Substitute any aspect of the creation for “toys,” and the meaning is the same. It is a false religion. “For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?"

8. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 10.

9. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 22.

The top priority in this passage is service to God, which is also its theocentric principle. The mark of this priority in our lives is contentment with whatever wealth God has provided. What must be avoided at all costs is service to mammon: the god of "more for me." This god of man's self-confidence and accumulation is a false god—the false god. It is the worship of man's would-be autonomy and therefore his would-be divinity. Men place confidence in the things they can accumulate. They sacrifice their lives to the accumulation of things. Yet the things that were supposed to serve man become his slave-drivers. Like Pharaoh's task-masters, these dumb idols cry out: "More! More! We demand more!" Most of all, they demand more of men's time, the irreplaceable resource.

15

ALL THESE THINGS

Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? (For after all these things do the Gentiles seek:) for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you. Take therefore no thought for the morrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof (Matt. 6:31–34).

The theocentric focus of this passage is the rewards: sanctions, which is point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Faith as a Method of Risk-Reduction

How do we seek God's kingdom? How do we seek God's righteousness? This passage does not say. Jesus had already outlined the answer to these two questions in the Sermon on the Mount.

In the context of this passage, covenant-keepers are said to be able legitimately to expect to receive something that they would not have received, had they not had faith. The context is food, drink, and clothing. The person who trusts in God is supposed to trust that he will not fall into any form of adversity that cannot be overcome through God's intervention.

The language of this text makes it plain: do not resist when all these things are added unto you. The desire to gain all these things—the basics of life—is legitimate. But the means are not widely understood: seeking first the kingdom of God. The ethical imperative is to seek the kingdom. The result of this quest is the ownership of those assets that preserve peace of mind. To begin with the search for the things that provide safety is to miss the nature of economic cause and effect.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

Men save money or make personal contacts so that they can call upon these reserves in times of adversity. This is a form of thrift. Men rely on these things in order to overcome the unforeseen events of life that upset their plans unpleasantly. They do not mind having their plans upset by good news. It is bad news that scares them. They cannot see the future, so they accumulate savings to protect them.

This passage indicates that a program of capital accumulation to deal with unforeseen adversity is not nearly so important as extending the kingdom of God in history. Capital that might otherwise have been invested in an insurance program or retirement program can be used to fund missionaries or some other kingdom-building venture. The kingdom grows at the expense of the forfeited investment.

The text does not say that either capital or insurance is not worthwhile. It says that all these things shall be added unto the investment in kingdom expansion. What things? Food, drink, and clothing—things we really need. But what about things we want? That depends. Why do we want them? Because they make our lives more pleasant? Because they make us more productive? Because they will enable us to do more for God's kingdom? Our wants must be as kingdom-driven as our needs—in fact, even more so. Our needs do not readily identify us uniquely as covenant-keepers or covenant-breakers. Our wants do.

When the price of anything is reduced, more of it is demanded. By reducing worry about the future, this promise enables kingdom-builders to bear more risk with whatever capital they possess. They can afford to pass up an investment opportunity because there is always another that will come along. Covenant-keepers have access to supernaturally supplied reserves. They can therefore afford to commit more resources to their efforts in kingdom-building than they otherwise would have committed. This faith in God is supposed to release assets for kingdom-building that would otherwise have been reserved for risk-reduction or capital accumulation.

This raises an important issue. There is no doubt that enormous amounts of capital are invested in pension funds today. Pension funds in modern America are huge pools of capital. This capital is used to fund economic growth. Capital provides present employment for the sake of future income for the investors. What if men reduced their commitment to thrift for the sake of charitable, kingdom giving?

Would this reduce economic growth?

If other things remained equal, it would. But other things are not equal. God is ready to defend covenant-keeping individuals and societies. For example, individuals and societies will make fewer errors if men adhere to faith in God and the discipline of the tithe. I can think of no statistical way to prove this, but the presumption of the text is that worry regarding the economic future is forbidden to the covenant-keeper who prays, tithes, and does his work well. If he seeks protection from unforeseen adversity, he must begin with faith in God's providential decree, not capital accumulation. In this decree, "all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose" (Rom. 8:28b).²

There is an old secret of gaining wealth: don't make mistakes. The investments need not produce a high rate of return if the investor makes no mistakes. Any rate of growth, if unbroken, eventually produces a base that approaches infinity as a limit. This is the exponential curve in action.³ The secret of wealth, generation after generation, is the strategy outlined by the Christian real estate investor, John Schaub: making it big on little deals. The difficult part is avoiding bad investments.

Kingdom projects are not always profit-seeking enterprises. Their success cannot be judged by a profit-and-loss statement. Yet, considered as a unit, they do produce a positive rate of return. They make society better. Money invested in them produces a positive eternal return for the investor, whether they succeed or fail in history. They constitute a kind of insurance policy for society. They reduce social risk. The differences between a kingdom project and an insurance policy are these: there is no legally binding contract with kingdom giving; there is no verifiable law of large numbers operating that will insure a fixed rate of return or reduction of risk; there is no identifiable pool of capital reserves to draw on in case of project failures. But there is promise made by God, the Creator. There is a pool of capital assured by the Owner of the universe. There is no legally fixed rate of return, but there is a positive rate of return. The text guarantees this.

It is a question of trust. Should we trust bank statements or God's

2. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 7.

3. Gary North, "The Theology of the Exponential Curve," The Freeman (May 1970), reprinted in Gary North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 8. (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>) promise? Should we trust digital wealth or God's promises? We are back to the issue of God or mammon. Men place their faith in would-be autonomous institutions at their peril. Ultimately, the things of this world cannot completely insure us against the disasters that this world brings. We must begin with faith in God. Then all these things, including insurance and pensions funds, will be added.

John Wesley's Sermon 50, The Use of Money (1744), on Luke 16:9⁴, is divided into three imperatives: gain all you can, save all you can, give all you can. Men are to allocate their funds wisely. Wesley was a great believer in thrift, as were the English Methodists generally in the eighteenth century. But this imperative to save money through the reduction of frivolous expenses was to be tempered by the command to give. Men are not to pursue the god of More.

B. Outside, Looking In; Inside, Looking Out

To whom was Jesus speaking? Were His words aimed at all of His listeners? Or were they aimed at a different group?

1. The Jews

Jesus' visible audience for this sermon was the Jews. They should have been vaguely familiar with the doctrine of the kingdom of God. But this doctrine is not prominent in the Old Covenant. The Old Covenant kingdom was Israel. It was not thought to extend beyond Israel's borders. David did speak of God as ruler of a kingdom. God's kingdom was what entitled David to his kingdom. "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever: the sceptre of thy kingdom is a right sceptre. Thou lovest righteousness, and hatest wickedness: therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows" (Ps. 45:6–7). But the only reference to the kingdom of God on earth was prophetic: "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever" (Dan. 2:44). Jesus was announcing that the time had arrived. The fulfillment of Daniel's prophecy was at hand.

The Jews were about to become outsiders, looking in. "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof” (Matt. 21:43). He was warning them here to seek first God’s kingdom. But where was it to be found? In Jesus’ ministry. “But if I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you” (Matt. 12:28). Paul later wrote: “For the kingdom of God is not meat and drink; but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost” (Rom. 14:17).

4. "And I say unto you, Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations" (Luke 16:9).

Seeking the kingdom meant seeking God’s righteousness. Men can become progressively righteous because God is perfectly righteous. “For I am the LORD that bringeth you up out of the land of Egypt, to be your God: ye shall therefore be holy, for I am holy” (Lev. 11:45). “Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect” (Matt. 5:48). This was Jesus’ message about the kingdom to those outside the kingdom.

2. The Disciples

For those inside the kingdom—His disciples—He spoke in greater detail. Matthew 13 is the great chapter regarding the kingdom. The emphasis in this chapter is on the kingdom’s expansion in history. “And he spake many things unto them in parables, saying, Behold, a sower went forth to sow; And when he sowed, some seeds fell by the way side, and the fowls came and devoured them up: Some fell upon stony places, where they had not much earth: and forthwith they sprung up, because they had no deepness of earth: And when the sun was up, they were scorched; and because they had no root, they withered away. And some fell among thorns; and the thorns sprung up, and choked them: But other fell into good ground, and brought forth fruit, some an hundredfold, some sixtyfold, some thirtyfold” (Matt. 13:3–8).⁵ In good soil, the seed would flourish.

“Another parable spake he unto them; The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took, and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened” (Matt. 13:33).⁶ The kingdom would expand like yeast, filling the loaf.

Jesus was speaking to insiders. This was why He spoke in parables. This was a fulfillment of prophecy.

And the disciples came, and said unto him, Why speakest thou unto them in parables? He answered and said unto them, Because it is given unto you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to

5. Chapter 27.

6. Chapter 30.

them it is not given. For whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance: but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath. Therefore speak I to them in parables: because they seeing see not; and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand. And in them is fulfilled the prophecy of Esaias, which saith, By hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and shall not perceive: For this people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed; lest at any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and should understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them. But blessed are your eyes, for they see: and your ears, for they hear. For verily I say unto you, That many prophets and righteous men have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seen them; and to hear those things which ye hear, and have not heard them (Matt. 13:10–17).⁷

The disciples were being prepared to direct a program of world-wide conquest. They were looking outward toward the world: the kingdom of mammon. This enormous task would require capital. This would not be a major problem: “all these things shall be added unto you.”

There would first be a preliminary trial run inside Israel. “And he called unto him the 12, and began to send them forth by two and two; and gave them power over unclean spirits; And commanded them that they should take nothing for their journey, save a staff only; no scrip, no bread, no money in their purse: But be shod with sandals; and not put on two coats. And he said unto them, In what place soever ye enter into an house, there abide till ye depart from that place. And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear you, when ye depart thence, shake off the dust under your feet for a testimony against them. Verily I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for that city. And they went out, and preached that men should repent. And they cast out many devils, and anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them” (Mark 6:7–13). Then, just before His crucifixion, He gave them to a new assignment: the worldwide extension of the kingdom. It had different rules. “And he said unto them, When I sent you without purse, and scrip, and shoes, lacked ye any thing? And they said, Nothing. Then said he unto them, But now, he that hath a purse, let him take it, and likewise his scrip: and he that hath no sword, let him sell his garment, and buy one” (Luke 22:35–36). This time, they would require capital. They had capital in one form; he told them to convert it into a new form suitable for traveling.

7. Chapter 27.

The first stage of conquest required no physical capital. This was analogous Israel's dependence on the manna in the wilderness. The second stage would require capital. This was comparable to the conquest of Canaan. Manna had proved to Israel that God was with them. So did the first stage of evangelism. But, once proven, there was need of capital. They had some already; they would have more, as needed. All these things would be added unto them.

C. Tools of Dominion

The ultimate tools of dominion are God's laws.⁸ But we need food and clothing to do our work. Of course, this food and clothing may be minimal. "And the same John had his raiment of camel's hair, and a leathern girdle about his loins; and his meat was locusts and wild honey" (Matt. 3:4). What about a roof over our heads? What about bricks and mortar? Nice, but not required, at least not in the early stages of a campaign. "And Jesus saith unto him, The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head" (Matt. 8:20).⁹

What the disciples had learned in three years of wandering is that they could do without their own homes. They ate. They did not freeze to death. They lived off the generosity of others. They got by. They had the tools they needed to do their work.

This is the context of the promise that all these things would be added unto them. Jesus told the crowd this, but He taught it first-hand to the disciples. The crowd did not wish to follow Him. They were interested in hearing a lecture. They were not ready to sell everything and follow Him. They were still outside, looking in.

The governing presumption of this passage is that men should seek the kingdom of God and His righteousness. In this search, they will be given the capital they require to continue their search. But they probably have the capital already, just as the disciples had. Jesus had to tell them not to take a purse on stage one. This presumes that they had purses and money. They had to leave their tools behind. They had to learn how to live off the land, i.e., live off of the equivalent of manna.

8. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990).

9. Chapter 19.

God would provide them with whatever they needed. The same was true of His listeners. They were burdened with too much capital. It was an impediment to their search. “The young man saith unto him, All these things have I kept from my youth up: what lack I yet? Jesus said unto him, If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come and follow me. But when the young man heard that saying, he went away sorrowful: for he had great possessions” (Matt. 19:20–22). What the young man lacked was poverty. Jesus was trying to teach the young man that all that he needed to follow Jesus would be added. First, he had to cease trusting in his own wealth. But the young man was not yet ready to go into the wilderness and become dependent on the charity of others. He chose to remain an outsider, looking in.¹⁰

Once men experience the inner workings of the kingdom, they become insiders, looking out. Then they are allowed to carry their purses, and a sword, too. They have already learned the lesson of dependence on God. Having learned this, they are to carry purses, which God fills as required. Required by what? By the work of the kingdom.

The point is not that God promises to provide all the things we want. He promises to provide all the things we need to carry out our portion of His kingdom plan. We are to be content with whatever he provides that enables us to do His kingdom work. Anything more than this is ours to keep, but is not guaranteed. We are allowed to enjoy more than what we need to carry out His work. The tithe shows us just how much more than this we are allowed to keep.

D. The Tithe

God initially funds His own kingdom. He provides the initial capital, just as He did for Adam. Under men’s administration, the kingdom begins to grow. It throws off additional capital. Men are allowed to keep 90% of this. The tithe is man’s reinvestment—a minimal commitment. Special people, such as missionaries, invest more. They are kept in the field by the tithes of others. The missionaries invest time, the irreplaceable resource. This is the greatest commitment open to men, with martyrdom at the top: the forfeiture of time.

God does not under-fund His kingdom. His people may, however. They choose not to tithe. They refuse to give offerings above the tithe. They waste the assets entrusted to them. They lose their original vision. But the kingdom expands nevertheless. God finds new people with a better sense of purpose to continue His work. The others become outsiders, looking in.

10. Chapter 38.

The tools will be provided by God. What is in short supply is good men, not money. What holds back a ministry is not the lack of money but the lack of vision or common sense. It is extremely difficult to teach Christian volunteers this principle, even as it is difficult to teach them to tithe.

The tithe teaches people that they are not autonomous, that they cannot achieve their goals through money alone. They take a token 10% and give it to the local church.¹¹ This token payment symbolizes their complete dependence on God. The tithe also supports the institutional church. It provides the tools needed to extend the work.

The principle of compound growth tells us that any base figure, no matter how low the rate of growth, eventually becomes exponential and approaches infinity as a limit. This is a fundamental principle of the kingdom. It eventually fills the earth. “And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever” (Dan. 2:44).

As the kingdom grows, the division of labor inside its boundaries increases. Its tasks increase in complexity. It throws off more wealth as output increases. As God’s people faithfully work out their salvations with fear and trembling (Phil. 2:12), they experience the effect of compound growth. They have more capital to work with.

At this point, two things can happen. First, men can reinvest more, and the rate of economic growth increases. Second, they can consume more, and their lifestyle gets softer and more pleasant. Their tastes change. They find things to buy and dream about buying that their forebears would not have imagined possible, let alone impossible to live without. We would imagine that as residents in God’s kingdom get richer, they would give a larger percentage to God’s work. Modern economics teaches that as we receive more income, we allocate the marginal income to less valuable items on our scale of values. But this insight applies perfectly only in a hypothetical world in which there is no time, and tastes do not change. But tastes do change as income changes. The problem is addiction. Men begin to worship at the shrine of the great god More. They become mammonites. The more they get, the more they want. The more their neighbors get, the more they want. The kingdom of God slips lower on their list of priorities. God no longer receives 10% “off the top.” He receives whatever is left over after the more important expenditures are made.

11. Gary North, Tithing and the Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994). (<http://bit.ly/gntithing>)

Thus, men lose their vision or their forefathers’ vision. Society grows wealthier, and so do its residents. But this new wealth alters their tastes. It alters their priorities. The array of prices changes. Things that had never seemed possible to buy now become affordable, if tithe money can be allocated to buy them. It should be easier for men to tithe in an expanding economy, because the additional income is used to purchase goods and services that are ever-lower on men’s scale of values. But their scale of values changes as their income rises. They find it more difficult to tithe. They also find it more difficult to save. Present-orientation increases. The rate of capital formation decreases. The rate of economic growth therefore decreases.

E. Breaking the Addiction

What is promised here is that God’s people will be supplied with all that they need to promote the work of God’s kingdom. Jesus did not say that they will receive all that they want. Mammon’s kingdom makes that promise, and then reneges by raising men’s wants ever higher: “The more you get, the more you want.” This addiction threatens men’s work in the kingdom. The tithe is God’s primary counter-measure to mammon’s addiction.

What is primary is the kingdom of God: searching for it and, having found it, working to extend it. There is no guarantee implied in this passage that good men will receive all that they want. In fact, they may lose much of what they have. If they are addicted to more, they must break the habit. If they refuse, then they will move into the kingdom of mammon. As God’s kingdom expands and produces more wealth, covenant-keepers must be ever-more alert to this addiction. If they succumb to it, God will either take the kingdom away from them or else impose a setback that will break the addiction. This is the message of Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28.

When hard times arrive, men’s tastes change. When they are hungry, they do not worry about the latest fashions. When they face eviction from their homes, they do not worry about new carpeting. They hunker down. They do not buy new items just because they are new. They make do with what they own. They grow more appreciative about what they still have when they have lost much of what they had.¹² Or they may lose hope. If they had worshipped too long at mammon's shrine, they are more likely to lose hope. The worst of the addicts may even become cannibals:

And thou shalt eat the fruit of thine own body, the flesh of thy sons and of thy daughters, which the LORD thy God hath given thee, in the siege, and in the straitness, wherewith thine enemies shall distress thee: So that the man that is tender among you, and very delicate, his eye shall be evil toward his brother, and toward the wife of his bosom, and toward the remnant of his children which he shall leave: So that he will not give to any of them of the flesh of his children whom he shall eat: because he hath nothing left him in the siege, and in the straitness, wherewith thine enemies shall distress thee in all thy gates. The tender and delicate woman among you, which would not adventure to set the sole of her foot upon the ground for delicateness and tenderness, her eye shall be evil toward the husband of her bosom, and toward her son, and toward her daughter, And toward her young one that cometh out from between her feet, and toward her children which she shall bear: for she shall eat them for want of all things secretly in the siege and straitness, wherewith thine enemy shall distress thee in thy gates (Deut. 28:53–57).

F. Anti-Procrastination

“Take therefore no thought for the morrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof” (v. 34). This sounds as though Jesus was promoting a radical present-orientation. This was not the case. What he was warning against was worry. The evils of tomorrow are too many to worry about effectively. Concern yourself with today's immediate problems.

Does this mean that we are not to think about the possible negative effects tomorrow of what we do today? No, but it does mean that we must be aware of the reality of time. We are responsible today for what we do today. We are not omniscient. We cannot see equally clearly what will happen tomorrow. “For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known” (I Cor. 13:12). The further we peer into the future, the less we can forecast accurately. So, we are not to worry about all the bad things that might happen. We should deal with today's evils. These are the evils that we must do something about.

12. ‘We Had Everything But Money’ (Greendale, Wisconsin: Country Books, 1992). This is a book of reminiscences about the Great Depression of the 1930s in the United States.

But this still does not answer the question: Are we not to think about the possible effects of today on tomorrow? Are we to focus only on today? How can we make plans? A military commander who does not think about tomorrow will not prepare today for tomorrow. What we do today depends heavily on what we think will happen tomorrow. This is especially true of upper-class people, who are future-oriented. Is the New Testament present-oriented? No.

What is here forbidden are worry and anxiety. The same Greek word translated as thought in this verse is translated elsewhere translated as careful. "Be careful for nothing; but in every thing by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4:6–7). It means full of care, not cautious.

Worrying about the future is counter-productive. It paralyzes people. Worrying about the near future is short-lived. Jesus said to deal with today's worries today, and stop worrying about tomorrow. He was warning against procrastination. Sufficient unto the day are the evils thereof. Concentrate your concern on today's problems. Tomorrow's may not arrive.

We have only limited resources, including emotional resources. We must allocate them carefully, i.e., cautiously. We must not waste them. Work on today's problems today. Identify tomorrow's problems only for the purpose of dealing with their preliminary aspects today. If they cannot be dealt with today, ignore them. Focus on what you can do something about. Then get a good night's sleep. You have done all you can. God does not you accountable for doing more than you can.

Conclusion

The first things we are to seek are God's kingdom and His righteousness. The thing we need in order to find the kingdom is trust in God rather than in ourselves. Then, after we are in the kingdom, we will receive whatever we need to continue our work. "Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment?” (Matt. 6:25).¹³ “Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed?” (Matt. 6:31).

The top priority here is exercising faith and seeking the kingdom of God and His righteousness. This may even involve giving up the wealth that enables us to deal with lower priorities. That was the case with the rich young ruler. He had too many other, higher priorities. Had he already found the kingdom, he might have put his wealth to better uses than before, but Jesus knew that his wealth was what was keeping him from the search. Because covenant-keepers are supposed to know that their kingdom work is important to God and will be funded, they can stop worrying about the future. Because they are extremely future-oriented—heaven and eternity—they are not supposed to worry about the near-term future, i.e., tomorrow or the day after tomorrow. Instead, they are to do all they can today in dealing with those problems that can be dealt with today.

13. Chapter 14.

16

THE GOLDEN RULE AND GOLDEN OPPORTUNITIES

Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you: For every one that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened. Or what man is there of you, whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone? Or if he ask a fish, will he give him a serpent? If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him? Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: for this is the law and the prophets (Matt. 7:7–12).

The theocentric focus of this law is God as the heavenly Father who gives whatever His children ask: sanctions, which is point four of the biblical covenant.¹ On this principle rests what has come to be called the golden rule: “Do unto others what you would have others to do unto you.” This phrase never actually appears in this form in the Bible. It says, “Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them.” And it adds, “for this is the law and the prophets.”

A. A Program of Cost-Effective Seeking

This passage includes one of the greatest promises in the Bible: “Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you.” It is comparable to this promise: “If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place; and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you” (Matt. 17:20b). What are we to make of all this?

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

1. The Faith to Seek

First, seeking is the outworking of faith. We have already seen that faith is a means of risk-reduction.² But this passage goes further: active seeking is a means of wealth accumulation. The good things of life are available for the seeking—not just for the asking, but the seeking. Seeking is a program that combines faith, identification of the items desired, planning to gain these items, and a unique means of securing the completion of the plan. This final stage is generally referred to as the golden rule. All elements must be present for the program to work as outlined here.

The first step listed here is asking, but it is not the first step in the seeking process. The seeker must already have identified whatever it is that he wants. This takes great spiritual maturity. This is the most difficult aspect of the entire procedure. He must identify his own scale of values. Put another way, he must identify his priorities and the reasons for them. He must seek conformity of his priorities to God’s written revelation. The Gospel of Matthew makes it plain that the supreme priority is the kingdom of God. This is the covenant-keeper’s method of fulfilling the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:26-28).³

The second step is the planning stage: “seeking.” Once he knows what it is he is after, he must think about how he can attain this goal. He must develop a plan of action. He must get from here to there. I have argued elsewhere that this plan consists of two parts, once the goal is identified: (1) estimating the price; (2) estimating the time frame. The shorter the time frame, the more it will cost to complete the plan. We do not get something—above all, time—for nothing.

The third step—knocking—is Jesus’ way to describe prayer. His definition underlies another passage on prayer, the parable of the woman and the unjust judge. “. . . There was in a city a judge, which feared not God, neither regarded man: And there was a widow in that city; and she came unto him, saying, Avenge me of mine adversary. And he would not for a while: but afterward he said within himself, Though I fear not God, nor regard man; Yet because this widow

2. Chapter 15.

3. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

troubleth me, I will avenge her, lest by her continual coming she weary me. And the Lord said, Hear what the unjust judge saith" (Luke 18:2–6). This is the model for persevering prayer. We are to pray to God as if He were an unjust judge.⁴

We see this in another passage on prayer—indeed, the passage on prayer. Immediately after presenting what we call the Lord's Prayer, Jesus presented an analogy. As we shall see, this passage includes the same words as this chapter's text.

And he said unto them, Which of you shall have a friend, and shall go unto him at midnight, and say unto him, Friend, lend me three loaves; For a friend of mine in his journey is come to me, and I have nothing to set before him? And he from within shall answer and say, Trouble me not: the door is now shut, and my children are with me in bed; I cannot rise and give thee. I say unto you, Though he will not rise and give him, because he is his friend, yet because of his importunity he will rise and give him as many as he needeth. And I say unto you, Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you. For every one that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened. If a son shall ask bread of any of you that is a father, will he give him a stone? or if he ask a fish, will he for a fish give him a serpent? Or if he shall ask an egg, will he offer him a scorpion? If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children: how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him? (Luke 11:5–13).⁵

2. Repetition

He who prays must be stubborn. If a prayer is worth praying, it is worth praying again. But what if God's answer is a clear-cut "no"? Then we should stop praying. Paul wrote: "And lest I should be exalted above measure through the abundance of the revelations, there was given to me a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet me, lest I should be exalted above measure. For this thing I besought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from me. And he said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee: for my strength is made perfect in weakness. Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me. Therefore I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses

4. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 42.

5. Ibid., ch. 22.

for Christ's sake: for when I am weak, then am I strong" (II Cor. 12:7–10). Paul had to learn to live with his thorn in the flesh. But most men cannot be sure that a prayer will not be answered until death removes the opportunity—either the death of the person who prays or the one being prayed for.

The frustration of unanswered prayer is always a threat to the faith of the godly person who prays in faith. Unwavering faith is basic to getting prayers answered. "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him. But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering. For he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed. For let not that man think that he shall receive any thing of the Lord. A double minded man is unstable in all his ways" (James 1:5–8). It takes courage to pray this way: the courage to expect God to answer the prayer. Unanswered prayer is a temptation to disbelieve the promise and therefore the One who made the promise.

Moses told Joshua to exercise courage. "And Moses called unto Joshua, and said unto him in the sight of all Israel, Be strong and of a good courage: for thou must go with this people unto the land which the LORD hath sworn unto their fathers to give them; and thou shalt cause them to inherit it. And the LORD, he it is that doth go before thee; he will be with thee, he will not fail thee, neither forsake thee: fear not, neither be dismayed" (Deut. 31:7–8).⁶ The same kind of courage must underlie successful prayer. This degree of courage is not given to every Christian, or even most Christians, in most periods of history.

B. Good Things for the Asking

"How much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him?" The child asks for bread. The father does not give him a stone. The child asks for fish. The father does not give him a scorpion. The first request is minimal: bread. The second is for something extra: fish. Giving a stone is an evil response to a child's request for bread. Giving a scorpion for the request for fish would be even worse. What was Jesus' point? That men, being evil, do good things to those whom they love. How much more does God do good things for those whom He loves.

6. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 74.

But what if the child had asked for a stone to cast at an enemy? Would a wise father grant him his request? No. How much more would a wise father not grant a child's request for a scorpion? Of what good use is a scorpion to a child? What Jesus maintained here was that a legitimate request from a child should be answered by his father. So is God's open hand in relation to His children.

What seems legitimate in our eyes may be the equivalent of a scorpion in our lives: a deadly gift. We lack insight into our own hearts. "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked: who can know it? I the LORD search the heart, I try the reins, even to give every man according to his ways, and according to the fruit of his doings" (Jer. 17:9–10). We are not always good judges of character, especially our own.

The father's gift to a child in response to a legitimate request should be our model for understanding God's responses to our prayers. If we do not get our prayers answered, then the fault may be in our assessment of our needs or perhaps our assessment of the times. The father gives his son bread, but not every time the son may ask throughout the day. Similarly, God gives us what we need when we need it. What defines our need? God's calling and timing. We must see our needs in terms of God's kingdom. The theme of God's kingdom is found throughout Matthew. The kingdom is central; we are not.

Job asked God for death. "Oh that I might have my request; and that God would grant me the thing that I long for! Even that it would please God to destroy me; that he would let loose his hand, and cut me off! Then should I yet have comfort; yea, I would harden myself in sorrow: let him not spare; for I have not concealed the words of the Holy One. What is my strength, that I should hope? and what is mine end, that I should prolong my life?" (Job 6:8–11). God had other plans for Job: blessing (Job. 42). He did not grant this request.

What is good for man? Whatever is good for God. The criterion of good is theocentric. Through the power of prayer, men are enabled to participate in the extension of God's kingdom. They see their prayers come to pass in history. But these answered prayers extend God's kingdom in history. Prayers are answered in history; the kingdom is extended through answered prayers in history.

C. What We Do Unto Others

The passage ends with the reminder that when we make requests to God, we should heed requests by men. Doing unto others what we would have others do unto us is, above all, a description of our relation to God. We are His agents. We represent God to others. They see us. When He tells us to do to others what we would have them do to us, He is calling us to exercise justice. This is not a law for the governing of relationships among drug addicts, for example. We must judge what is good for us in terms of God's kingdom. Then we are to extend grace to others in terms of God's kingdom. This is what we expect from others, beginning with God. We go to Him to plead our cases. Others come to us to do the same. We expect God to grant us our requests. Others expect us to do the same. The fundamental issue here is justice tempered with mercy.

We do good unto others. We thereby represent God to them. We want good done to us by others. We must therefore serve as good models for them, as God's covenantal representatives. We must treat others well; otherwise, we should not expect them to treat us well. When we treat others well, God honors this by granting us our legitimate requests. This, too, is a testimony to others. They see our prayers being answered, and they learn something about covenantal cause and effect in history. But if we treat others poorly, then we testify falsely to them about God. We hinder the extension of His kingdom. We risk having our prayers go unanswered. This, too, testifies to covenantal cause and effect in history.

We should give good gifts to our enemies. "Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away. Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which spitefully use you, and persecute you" (Matt. 5:42–44).⁷ We wear them down with kindness. We show them God's love in history. This either is a means of grace or a means of cursing. "Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head" (Rom. 12:20).

Doing good to others means that others will learn to trust us. Our positive, predictable behavior lowers their risk of dealing with us. A basic law of economics is this: when prices fall, more is demanded. In this case, we are talking about more opportunities for mutual exchange. When we take advantage of these opportunities by not taking advantage of people, this increases our wealth.

7. Chapter 10.

God will not grant every frivolous request that catches our fancy. Neither are we to grant requests to everyone who asks us for something frivolous. The key issue is how our requests of God, like their requests of us, fit into God's overall kingdom work.

Conclusion

There are priorities for prayer. They must reflect a reconstructed scale of values: kingdom first. Men are to ask in faith, praying diligently for good things. These good things are good from the kingdom's point of view, and therefore from covenant-keeping man's point of view. The kingdom of God is the top priority. Our prayers are to enable us to fit our plans into God's plans for the kingdom. Answered prayers enable us to see God's plans coming to fruition. So do unanswered prayers. The positive sanctions and the negative sanctions are to train us in the discipline of kingdom-building.

Prayer is a discipline that takes a lifetime to develop. Men call upon God, and in His own good time, He answers prayers that extend His kingdom. To the extent that men prayer kingdom-building prayers, they will see their prayers answered. The secret of getting one's prayers answered is to conform oneself to God and be alert to one's role in this kingdom. We must become like the children of Issachar. "And of the children of Issachar, which were men that had understanding of the times, to know what Israel ought to do; the heads of them were two hundred; and all their brethren were at their commandment" (I Chron. 12:32).

Treating others as well as we expect to be treated increases the likelihood that others will want to cooperate with us. We become lower-risk trading partners. We will be presented with more opportunities to extend our range of choices—our wealth—because others know that they will be treated fairly in ventures with us.

17

THE TWO GATES

Enter ye in at the strait gate: for wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat: Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it (Matt. 7:13–14).

The theocentric focus of this law is God as the gatekeeper. He built the gate to eternal life. He established its boundaries, i.e., the pathway's ethical boundaries. This is point three of the biblical covenant.¹ God told Joshua: "Only be thou strong and very courageous, that thou mayest observe to do according to all the law, which Moses my servant commanded thee: turn not from it to the right hand or to the left, that thou mayest prosper whithersoever thou goest. This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein: for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success" (Josh. 1:7–8).

A. Choose Life

Every man has a choice before him: life or death. Moses warned Israel at the end of his life:

See, I have set before thee this day life and good, and death and evil; In that I command thee this day to love the LORD thy God, to walk in his ways, and to keep his commandments and his statutes and his judgments, that thou mayest live and multiply: and the LORD thy God shall bless thee in the land whither thou goest to possess it. But if thine heart turn away, so that thou wilt not hear, but shalt be drawn away, and worship other gods, and serve them; I denounce unto you this day, that ye shall surely perish, and that ye shall not prolong your days upon the land, whither thou passest over Jordan to go to possess it. I call heaven and earth to record this day against you, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing: therefore choose life, that both thou and thy seed may live: That thou mayest love the LORD thy God, and that thou mayest obey his voice, and that thou mayest cleave unto him: for he is thy life, and the length of thy days: that thou mayest dwell in the land which the LORD sware unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give them (Deut. 30:15–20).²

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

The basis of life is clearly stated: “To love the LORD thy God, to walk in his ways, and to keep his commandments and his statutes and his judgments.” But no man can keep the law perfectly. So, the law testifies that every man needs grace. But this grace is not cheap grace. It is granted by God on only one judicial basis: Jesus Christ’s perfect fulfilling of the law, with God’s curse placed on Him nonetheless (Gal. 3:13).

The gate to life is narrow. Does this mean that the way is too difficult for most people? Or does it mean that the way is hidden from most people? If the way is too difficult for most people, then this must mean that it is not too difficult for some people. This means that the way to life is the way of the law, of good works. Paul preached the contrary view in the synagogue at Antioch: “Be it known unto you therefore, men and brethren, that through this man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins: And by him all that believe are justified from all things, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses” (Acts 13:38–39).

If, on the other hand, the narrow gate is hidden to most people, then some do get through the gate on the basis of their having found it. Evidence for this interpretation is found in Jesus’ discussion of His ministry. He did not come to show the truth to everyone. He showed in only to a few. “At that time Jesus answered and said, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes” (Matt. 11:25).

And the disciples came, and said unto him, Why speakest thou unto them in parables? He answered and said unto them, Because it is given unto you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given. For whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance: but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath. Therefore speak I to them in parables: because they seeing see not; and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand. And in them is fulfilled the prophecy of Esaias, which saith, By hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and shall not perceive: For this people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed; lest at any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and should understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them. But blessed are your eyes, for they see: and your ears, for they hear. For verily I say unto you, That many prophets and righteous men have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seen them; and to hear those things which ye hear, and have not heard them" (Matt. 13:10–17).³

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 73.

This was a fulfillment of Isaiah: "And he said, Go, and tell this people, Hear ye indeed, but understand not; and see ye indeed, but perceive not. Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and shut their eyes; lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and convert, and be healed" (Isa. 6:9–10). This selective revelation is God the Father's work. "He saith unto them, But whom say ye that I am? And Simon Peter answered and said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. And Jesus answered and said unto him, Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven" (Matt. 16:15–17).

These passages prove that the narrow gate is not closed to most people on the basis of their sin. It is closed to all people on the basis of their sin. Then how can it be open to anyone? Only on the basis of Christ's perfection, which is imputed to them by God. "Therefore by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight: for by the law is the knowledge of sin. But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets; Even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe: for there is no difference: For all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God; Being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus: Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God; To declare, I say, at this time his righteousness: that he might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus" (Rom. 3:20–26). "But to him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness. Even as David also describeth the blessedness of the man, unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works, Saying, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin" (Rom. 4:5–8).

3. Chapter 27.

B. Many Called, Few Chosen

Narrow is the way, Jesus said. The question is: Is it closed to most men forever? Or was Jesus speaking only of His own era, the waning days of Old Covenant Israel?

1. Harvest of Souls

His words indicate that He was speaking of conditions in His own era, not necessarily about the future. More than this: things would soon change. That which Jesus had taught to His followers would soon be heard by many people. Did this mean many men in general or many Jews? The context indicates: many Jews. "In the mean time, when there were gathered together an innumerable multitude of people, in-somuch that they trode one upon another, he began to say unto his disciples first of all, Beware ye of the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy. For there is nothing covered, that shall not be revealed; neither hid, that shall not be known. Therefore whatsoever ye have spoken in darkness shall be heard in the light; and that which ye have spoken in the ear in closets shall be proclaimed upon the housetops" (Luke 12:1–3). He told the disciples: "Say not ye, There are yet four months, and then cometh harvest? behold, I say unto you, Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields; for they are white already to harvest. And he that reapeth receiveth wages, and gathereth fruit unto life eternal: that both he that soweth and he that reapeth may rejoice together" (John 4:35–36). "And Jesus went about all the cities and villages, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing every sickness and every disease among the people. But when he saw the multitudes, he was moved with compassion on them, because they fainted, and were scattered abroad, as sheep having no shepherd. Then saith he unto his disciples, The harvest truly is plenteous, but the labourers are few; Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth labourers into his harvest” (Matt. 9:35–38).

2. The Wedding Feast

Christ’s parable of the king’s wedding feast for his son seems to indicate that on the final day, there will be more people left outside the feast than the number of those inside. “And when the king came in to see the guests, he saw there a man which had not on a wedding garment: And he saith unto him, Friend, how camest thou in hither not having a wedding garment? And he was speechless. Then said the king to the servants, Bind him hand and foot, and take him away, and cast him into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. For many are called, but few are chosen” (Matt. 22:11–14).

This passage is one of those commonly used against postmillennialism. Critics ask: How can postmillennialists believe in a great outpouring of faith? After all, many are called, but few are chosen. But the critics neglect the context of this parable. This is the parable of the wedding feast. The king is God; His Son is Jesus Christ. Jesus presented this parable in the context of opposition from the Pharisees. “And when the chief priests and Pharisees had heard his parables, they perceived that he spake of them. But when they sought to lay hands on him, they feared the multitude, because they took him for a prophet. And Jesus answered and spake unto them again by parables, and said, The kingdom of heaven is like unto a certain king, which made a marriage for his son, And sent forth his servants to call them that were bidden to the wedding: and they would not come” (Matt. 21:45–22:3). It was clear to the Pharisees that they were the targets of this parable, for immediately after He gave it, “Then went the Pharisees, and took counsel how they might entangle him in his talk” (Matt. 22:15).

The prophetic context of this passage was Jesus’ warning to the Pharisees: “Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof” (Matt. 21:43). This was a warning that the way of life was about to be opened to the gentiles. More than this: the way of life would soon be closed to Israel on any basis other than membership in the universal church. This meant that Jews would be outnumbered by gentiles. Jews would not gain access to the kingdom of God based on their Jewishness: their claim of descent from the patriarchs, their adherence to what later were called Talmudic traditions, or any other exclusively Jewish possession.

The parable of the wedding feast is about socially acceptable people, who demanded entrance on their own terms, dressed in their own garments, in relation to the undesirables, who were content to allow the king to clothe them. The parable says that the best people initially slew the agents of the king (Matt. 22:6). This was a clear reference to the practice of the Jews: slaying the prophets in the past and slaying Christ's disciples in the near future. The king was fed up with this rejection. He then opened the feast to the least desirable elements. "Then saith he to his servants, The wedding is ready, but they which were bidden were not worthy. Go ye therefore into the highways, and as many as ye shall find, bid to the marriage. So those servants went out into the highways, and gathered together all as many as they found, both bad and good: and the wedding was furnished with guests" (Matt. 22:8–10). On the highways of Israel were gentiles, as the parable of the Good Samaritan indicates. The servants invited both Jews (good) and gentiles (bad) without distinction. The wedding feast was now open to anyone brought in by the servants. But it was not open to those who came on their own, dressed in their own garments. The Pharisees knew exactly what Jesus was saying. They immediately took counsel against Him.

"Many are called, but few are chosen." This referred to the Jews of Jesus' day. The narrow confines of the Old Covenant were about to be shattered by the New Covenant. The Jews would not accept this. They would not accept entrance into the kingdom of Christ on these terms: open entry by the gentiles without their circumcision.

3. Jews vs. Gentiles

This is even clearer in a similar account in Luke. The contrast is between those who claim to be the descendants of Abraham and the patriarchs vs. those who arrive from all directions: gentiles. The former will not gain access to eternal life, and the latter will.

And he went through the cities and villages, teaching, and journeying toward Jerusalem. Then said one unto him, Lord, are there few that be saved? And he said unto them, Strive to enter in at the strait gate: for many, I say unto you, will seek to enter in, and shall not be able. When once the master of the house is risen up, and hath shut to the door, and ye begin to stand without, and to knock at the door, saying,

Lord, Lord, open unto us; and he shall answer and say unto you, I know you not whence ye are: Then shall ye begin to say, We have eaten and drunk in thy presence, and thou hast taught in our streets. But he shall say, I tell you, I know you not whence ye are; depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity. There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when ye shall see Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets, in the kingdom of God, and you yourselves thrust out. And they shall come from the east, and from the west, and from the north, and from the south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God. And, behold, there are last which shall be first, and there are first which shall be last (Luke 13:22–30).⁴

Immediately following the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus told the faithful centurion: “And I say unto you, That many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven. But the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth” (Matt. 8:11–12). The same imagery appears: gentiles coming from afar, sitting in the presence of the patriarchs, with Jews outside, under the curse, gnashing their teeth.

The Pharisees were greatly offended. That is because they fully understood what Jesus was saying about them and their nation. They wanted Him to stop preaching such things. They wanted Him to leave town. “The same day there came certain of the Pharisees, saying unto him, Get thee out, and depart hence: for Herod will kill thee” (Luke 13:31). What the Pharisees clearly understood has not been understood by Christian expositors, who interpret Christ’s words apart from their context: the imminent transfer of the kingdom of God from Old Covenant Israel to the New Covenant church.

Many were called: many Jews in His day. Few were chosen. The contrast in these passages is not between the number of lost people in history vs. the number saved. It is between the number of Jews saved in Jesus’ day vs. the number of Jews not saved. He was saying that the Jews of His day were not God’s chosen people. They were the “called but rarely chosen” people.

C. Heeding the Call

The call is for repentance and acceptance of a judicial substitute before God. The call is not for the listener’s works righteousness, but for Jesus Christ's works righteousness. "And be renewed in the spirit of your mind; And that ye put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness" (Eph. 4:23–24).

4. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 32.

Jesus called men to obedience. He did not say that the path is too difficult for most men. On the contrary, He said it is easier than what men in sin must face. "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light" (Matt. 11:28–30).⁵ To interpret the metaphor of the narrow gate as if it were a call to ascetic moral discipline is to miss the point entirely. That was what the Jews thought the gate was: fenced in with innumerable laws that only Jews and a few of their proselytes could obey.

The broad gate that leads to destruction is not merely the path of easy virtue; it is equally the path of ascetic self-discipline. All robes but the wedding garments provided by the king are unacceptable, Jesus warned. All righteousness other than Christ's imputed perfection is substandard. The Jews wanted to work their way through the narrow gate. The gentiles wanted much the same, if not ethically, then at least ritually. Hardened sinners wanted to avoid thinking of such matters. But all were headed toward the broad gate that leads to destruction. What they all needed was what men in every era need: a judicial substitute that is acceptable to God. They needed an acceptable sacrifice. "By the which will we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all. And every priest standeth daily ministering and offering oftentimes the same sacrifices, which can never take away sins: But this man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down on the right hand of God; From henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool. For by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified" (Heb. 10:10–14).

Jesus is the acceptable sacrifice. He offered Himself, once. Then He "sat down on the right hand of God; From henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool." This footstool metaphor is found throughout the Bible. Psalm 110 is the premier passage. The author of Hebrews used the metaphor a second time. "But to which of the angels said he at any times, Sit on my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool?" (Heb. 1:13). Jesus will remain seated at God's right hand until all of His enemies are conquered, for they are His footstool.

5. Chapter 25.

The text is clear about this. He will not return to earth to reign on a throne in Jerusalem or anywhere else. The last enemy is death. “For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death” (I Cor. 15:25–26).⁶ When death is conquered, Jesus will return to judge the world. The two events are the same event: resurrection to eternal life and resurrection to the second death (Rev. 20:11–15). At that time, it will be visible to all just which of the two gates each man passed through on his journey from history to eternity.

Conclusion

Man’s top priority in this passage is to walk through the narrow gate. This gate is not narrow in the sense of being difficult to pass through. It is narrow in the sense of being inaccessible except through God’s special grace. Otherwise, it is a closed gate. The gate leading to destruction is wide open. Anyone can pass through: the ascetic, the hedonist, the ritualist, the libertine. Lawyers are especially welcome. “And he said, Woe unto you also, ye lawyers! for ye lade men with burdens grievous to be borne, and ye yourselves touch not the burdens with one of your fingers” (Luke 11:46).

6. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 16.

18

BY THEIR FRUITS YE SHALL KNOW THEM

Beware of false prophets, which come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves. Ye shall know them by their fruits. Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles? Even so every good tree bringeth forth good fruit; but a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit. A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit. Every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire. Wherefore by their fruits ye shall know them (Matt. 7:15–20).

The theocentric focus of this passage is God as the owner of the orchard, who cuts down any tree that does not bear good fruit. As the creator, He has standards of productivity. He evaluates men's output in this life. Their output in history indicates what their output will be in eternity. Some He will spare, and some He will burn. This relates to sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. To Judge a Prophet

This passage is important for laying down a principle of judgment: what a man does in history testifies to his eternal condition. What he says may be judged by what he does and what his followers do.

1. The False Prophet

The context of these remarks is the false prophet. The false prophet may sound plausible initially. The listener may have trouble determining whether the prophet's message is true or false. Jesus said to watch carefully for the results of the prophet's ministry. There is continuity between what a man says and what the results are.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

Under the Mosaic Covenant, the prophet possessed lawful authority over both priests and magistrates. He had special revelation from God. The judicial marks of his prophetic office were two-fold: His call to worship the God of Israel and the fulfillment of his predictions.

If there arise among you a prophet, or a dreamer of dreams, and giveth thee a sign or a wonder, And the sign or the wonder come to pass, whereof he spake unto thee, saying, Let us go after other gods, which thou hast not known, and let us serve them; Thou shalt not hearken unto the words of that prophet, or that dreamer of dreams: for the LORD your God proveth you, to know whether ye love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul. Ye shall walk after the LORD your God, and fear him, and keep his commandments, and obey his voice, and ye shall serve him, and cleave unto him. And that prophet, or that dreamer of dreams, shall be put to death; because he hath spoken to turn you away from the LORD your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt, and redeemed you out of the house of bondage, to thrust thee out of the way which the LORD thy God commanded thee to walk in. So shalt thou put the evil away from the midst of thee (Deut. 13:1–5).

But the prophet, which shall presume to speak a word in my name, which I have not commanded him to speak, or that shall speak in the name of other gods, even that prophet shall die. And if thou say in thine heart, How shall we know the word which the LORD hath not spoken? When a prophet speaketh in the name of the LORD, if the thing follow not, nor come to pass, that is the thing which the LORD hath not spoken, but the prophet hath spoken it presumptuously: thou shalt not be afraid of him (Deut. 18:20–22).

The Old Covenant was still in force in Jesus' day. Prophets still existed. John the Baptist was a prophet (Luke 7:28). He condemned religious leaders in harsh terms, calling them vipers (Matt. 3:7). He condemned a king, although this cost him his life. It was not easy for men to know for certain whether they were hearing a true prophet or a false one. If his words sounded plausible, what else could men use to judge the legitimacy of his office? Jesus said: by the fruits of this office. The ministry of a true prophet will be productive of righteousness. The ministry of a false prophet will not.

2. Hierarchical Responsibility

This means that the actions of a man's followers will testify to the legitimacy of his claim. He is responsible for their actions. He is their representative, their spokesman. He cannot disassociate himself from them. If he will not impose negative sanctions against them, then he must be assumed to be in agreement with them. By their fruits we will know him.

Gamaliel understood this principle in discussing the ministry of the apostles. "Then stood there up one in the council, a Pharisee, named Gamaliel, a doctor of the law, had in reputation among all the people, and commanded to put the apostles forth a little space; And said unto them, Ye men of Israel, take heed to yourselves what ye intend to do as touching these men. For before these days rose up Theudas, boasting himself to be somebody; to whom a number of men, about four hundred, joined themselves: who was slain; and all, as many as obeyed him, were scattered, and brought to nought. After this man rose up Judas of Galilee in the days of the taxing, and drew away much people after him: he also perished; and all, even as many as obeyed him, were dispersed. And now I say unto you, Refrain from these men, and let them alone: for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to nought: But if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it; lest haply [it happen] ye be found even to fight against God" (Acts 5:34–39). The ministries of previous prophets had come to nothing. The religious authorities should wait and see, he advised. They took his advice.

Under the Mosaic Covenant, prophetic ministries bore their respective fruit rapidly. There was time to wait and see. Korah and Dathan rebelled against Moses, but their rebellion did not last long. Negative sanctions came rapidly.

And Moses said, Hereby ye shall know that the LORD hath sent me to do all these works; for I have not done them of mine own mind. If these men die the common death of all men, or if they be visited after the visitation of all men; then the LORD hath not sent me. But if the LORD make a new thing, and the earth open her mouth, and swallow them up, with all that appertain unto them, and they go down quick into the pit; then ye shall understand that these men have provoked the LORD. And it came to pass, as he had made an end of speaking all these words, that the ground clave asunder that was under them: And the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up, and their houses, and all the men that appertained unto Korah, and all their goods. They, and all that appertained to them, went down alive into the pit, and the earth closed upon them: and they perished from among the congregation (Num. 16:28–33).

Under the Mosaic Covenant, the judgments of God in history were down payments on His judgments in eternity. Men could make accurate judgments on the basis of God's visible judgments. But would they? Or would they take their stand with the false prophets and the kings who hired them? Time after time, the Israelites sided with the false prophets. They did not rebel when their leaders imprisoned and killed the true prophets. For this, they eventually paid the price: captivity. Their sin had gone on for generations. As had been true of the Egyptians and Amalekites before them, the multi-generational bills eventually came due.

Evil men had rebelled against good fruit. That was their great sin. Jesus repeated this accusation: the forefathers had persecuted the prophets. They had brought negative sanctions against the true prophets. This accusation had judicial merit because of the visible relationship between a prophet's words and their outcome. Covenant-keepers would have recognized the difference. That Israel had not recognized the difference, generation after generation, had condemned the nation. The fact that still they had not changed would soon condemn the nation forever. Jesus, as the final prophet, brought His covenant lawsuit against them in the name of the former prophets.

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are like unto whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones, and of all uncleanness. Even so ye also outwardly appear righteous unto men, but within ye are full of hypocrisy and iniquity. Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! because ye build the tombs of the prophets, and garnish the sepulchres of the righteous, And say, If we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets. Wherefore ye be witnesses unto yourselves, that ye are the children of them which killed the prophets. Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers. Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell? Wherefore, behold, I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes: and some of them ye shall kill and crucify; and some of them shall ye scourge in your synagogues, and persecute them from city to city: That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel unto the blood of Zacharias son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar. Verily I say unto you, All these things shall come upon this generation (Matt. 23:27– 36).

B. Christ's Three Covenantal Offices

The New Covenant has none of the Mosaic Covenant's offices: prophet, priest, or king. There is no covenantal prophet today. No one is granted the authority to speak God's word authoritatively, commanding civil and religious leaders to do what he says on pain of God's immediate sanctions.² No one's voice of authority exceeds the Bible's. There is no covenantal priest today, mediating sacrifices between God and man. There is no covenantal king, anointed by a priest or a prophet in God's name. Jesus alone retains the three-fold title. He referred to Himself as a prophet: "Nevertheless I must walk to day, and to morrow, and the day following: for it cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem" (Luke 13:33). Hebrews calls Him high priest: "Wherefore, holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling, consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus" (Heb. 3:1). Revelation calls him king of kings. "And he hath on his vesture and on his thigh a name written, KING OF KINGS, AND LORD OF LORDS" (Rev. 19:16). These offices have ceased; Christ holds them as monopolies.

This has changed the application of Jesus' law governing false prophecy. The office of true prophet has been annulled in history. One mark of the true prophet was his ability to invoke immediate sanctions. "And Elijah answered and said to the captain of fifty, If I be a man of God, then let fire come down from heaven, and consume thee and thy fifty. And there came down fire from heaven, and consumed him and his fifty. Again also he sent unto him another captain of fifty with his fifty. And he answered and said unto him, O man of God, thus hath the king said, Come down quickly. And Elijah answered and said unto them, If I be a man of God, let fire come down from heaven, and consume thee and thy fifty. And the fire of God came down from heaven, and consumed him and his fifty. And he sent again a captain of the third fifty with his fifty. And the third captain of fifty went up, and came and fell on his knees before Elijah, and besought him, and said unto him, O man of God, I pray thee, let my life, and the life of these fifty thy servants, be precious in thy sight" (II Kings 1:10–13). This time constraint no longer operates in the New Covenant. God's historical sanctions are predictable, but only in the broad sense: if men continue in their sins, then they will suffer corporate judgment. As to when, we do not know.

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch.43:D.

C. Ethical Cause and Effect

The delay of sanctions makes it more difficult to judge correctly about the quality of a movement's fruits. The question is: Does this cause-and-effect relationship still exist? Some, if not most, theologians assume that such predictable historical sanctions no longer exist. They agree with Meredith G. Kline, who writes that ethical cause and effect in history are, humanly speaking, essentially random. Kline is speaking of what he called the common grace order, which is not a familiar concept to most Christians, but they would agree with his view of historical sanctions (except when their nation is at war). "And meanwhile it [the common grace order] must run its course within the uncertainties of the mutually conditioning principles of common grace and common curse, prosperity and adversity being experienced in a manner largely unpredictable because of the inscrutable sovereignty of the divine will that dispenses them in mysterious ways." But if this is correct, then we are faced with an enormous burden: judging a movement by its fruits. If there is no cause and effect relationship between bad theology and bad ethics, or bad ideology and the visible outcome, then making accurate judgments becomes far more difficult than it was under the Mosaic Covenant. It is difficult enough already: longer time frames for roots to produce visible fruits. But if there is no predictable relationship whatsoever, then we must judge strictly on theological content—a task that few Christians are well-equipped to perform.

What of fruits other than prosperity? "Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these; Adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, Idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, Envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings, and such like: of the which I tell you before, as I have also told you in time past, that they which do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God. But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, Meekness, temperance: against such there is no law. And they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts" (Gal. 5:19–24). Here we can surely make judgments. These are individual fruits.

What are the economic effects of these rival lists of fruits? Does evil consistently produce wealth? Does righteousness consistently produce poverty? Or are the outcomes random, as Kline says? If they are random, then no expressly biblical economic theory is possible. If the outcomes are perverse, then we must search for institutional means of converting evil personal motives into positive effects. This is what most versions of free market theory have sought to do, from Bernard Mandeville's Fable of the Bees (1714) until the present.³

The profit motive, when coupled with private ownership, produces incentives for serving others. Men's greed becomes their motivation to meet the demands of other men. Free market economic theory has this great advantage over socialist theory: it recognizes original sin. It does not assume, as socialism assumes, that concentrated political power—legalized force—makes those who wield it either wiser or kinder. On the contrary, free market theory assumes the opposite: power tends to corrupt, and absolute power corrupts absolutely.⁴

Economists are self-consciously agnostic with regard to God. They never mention God, except as a belief that produces predictable responses. If we accept either the covenantal randomness of corporate effects of common confessions, or the covenantal perversity of individual results, we cannot construct biblical economic theory. We must then appeal to this or that humanistic theory. But if righteous roots produce positive fruits in history, and unrighteous roots produce undesirable fruits, then biblical social theory becomes possible.

D. Individual and Corporate Fruitfulness

The passage refers to false prophets: individuals. Yet in another context, the parable of the fig tree, Jesus was referring to Old Covenant Israel (Luke 13:6–9). So, the concept of fruit as a manifestation of spiritual roots applies to both individuals and corporate entities.

Applying this principle to societies, we conclude that there are

3. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), Appendix C.

4. Lord Acton, letter to Bishop Creighton (April 5, 1887). Selected Writings of Lord Acton, vol. II, Essays in the Study and Writing of History (Indianapolis, Indiana: LibertyClassics, 1986), p. 383. Acton's aphorism is immediately followed by another aphorism, also famous: "Great men are almost always bad men. . . ." The context was an attack on the medieval Inquisition, the responsibility for which Creighton had shifted away from the Papacy: History of the Papacy during the Period of the Reformation, vols. 3, 4 (1887), which Acton had reviewed.

standards of productivity that we can apply to assess the rightness or wrongness of that society. There also has to be human discernment of these standards and their proper application in history. “Even so every good tree bringeth forth good fruit; but a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit. A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit.” This statement is an extension to individuals of the corporate principles of Leviticus 26⁵ and Deuteronomy 28.⁶ The theologian who argues that Jesus substituted individual predictability for corporate predictability has to assume that the covenant’s continuity applies only to individuals. But then what of families? What of churches? Does this principle apply only to individuals? Doesn’t it also apply to movements based on the teachings of individuals?

Pietism denies this principle’s applicability to the world outside a Trinitarian covenant, and then seeks to deny the legitimacy of this covenant to civil government. Christian self-government under biblical law, yes. Christian family government under biblical law, yes. Christian church government under biblical law, yes. But not Christian civil government. “There can be no such thing as Christian civil government. What existed in Mosaic Israel before the captivity has been annulled in principle.” A problem with pietism is that it openly surrenders to covenant-breakers the authority to establish their civil covenant over covenant keepers. Somehow, we are expected to believe that a Christian civil covenant will not produce the positive fruit that a non-Christian civil covenant will produce. For the pietist, the realm of the civil covenant is governed by a reverse covenantal system of sanctions: biblical law produces tyranny, while “neutral” civil law produces good.⁷

Jesus’ words here create an enormous exegetical problem for pietism, one which the pietists for over three centuries have dealt with by ignoring it. Jesus’ words, if they were ever dealt with exegetically by pietistic social theorists, would force them to declare the existence of a realm of government in which a false confession produces good fruit, and where a true confession—faith in the Trinity—produces bad fruit. What is not true for the other three oath-bound covenants—individu-

5. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), chaps. 33–35.

6. North, Inheritance and Dominion, chaps. 69, 70.

7. Except, dispensationalists say, in the State of Israel. There, we are told, the state may lawfully and profitably impose Talmudic law, which sometimes is applied Mosaic law, on recalcitrant Arabs and Christians, as well as on recalcitrant secular Jews.

al, ecclesiastical, and familistic—is somehow true for the civil covenant. This was surely not taught by the Old Covenant. The opposite was taught. It is not formally taught by the New Covenant. A covenantal system of cause and effect applies to individuals and to their movements, such as Phariseeism, Jesus taught. What He taught was consistent with the Mosaic system of corporate sanctions. But the pietist claims to have discovered a principle in natural law theory or democratic theory which supersedes both the Mosaic law and Jesus' teaching on roots and fruits. This principle, discovered in the mid-seventeenth century by Rhode Island's Roger Williams, and elaborated in the eighteenth century by deists and atheists, teaches the reverse of what Jesus taught here, yet it has to be true, pietists assure us. It has to be true because modern democratic theory teaches it. To oppose it would be theocratic, and we all know how bad theocracy is, meaning Trinitarian theocracy. A humanistic theocracy—the reign of democratic man—is supposedly what we need. This is supposedly what God wants. Why, we are not told.

E. Free Market Theory

If Jesus' words are true, then modern free market theory labors under an enormous burden: Mandeville's curse. Free market economic theory promotes a view of society that says that supernatural ethics is irrelevant. Evil men, if they live under a private property system, will produce good things. Compared to what evil men produce under socialism, this statement has been proven true in both theory and practice, i.e., fruits and roots. But the ultimate test of free market theory is not its success over socialism. It is its success over God's corporate sanctions in history.

The free market is not autonomous, for man is not autonomous. The free market can produce, and has produced, wealth untold for hundreds of millions of people. But it has also placed urban men in great peril. The division of labor has been extended to such a degree that men are cut off from the soil. They cannot feed themselves. They live in highly interdependent environments that can sustain life only through extensive exchange—an exchange system that rests on fractional reserve banking and computerization. Everything that sustains life for most urban people is in some way dependent on public utility systems, banks, trains, and traffic control systems, which are operated by or regulated by the civil government.

This is only one example of the risks facing modern man. Modern biological warfare is another. So is the proliferation of small-scale nuclear weapons. Our cities are vulnerable. The free market has made possible the creation of vast interdependent production systems that have sustained a huge growth of population. The free market has done this irrespective of men's confessions of faith. This professedly neutral system of universal blessings has allowed the evolution of a society that is vulnerable to any number of universal curses. Yet men do not repent. They do not see how vulnerable they are. They do not see the looming sanctions of God. "And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth. But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day. And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God" (Deut. 8:17–20).⁸

We speak of the market as an impersonal mechanism. We think of mechanisms as tools. Then we insist that tools are neutral. By this, we mean that they can be used for good or evil. But tools are not morally neutral. Nothing is morally neutral. Tools are the products of social systems, and social systems are not morally neutral. Tools extend the systems that furthered their production. Tools make us dependent on these systems. If we rely on our tools, we thereby rely on the social system that created them. But what if that social system is founded on a false oath? Has it not become the corporate equivalent of a false prophet? Was it not built in terms of false prophecies, such as the promise of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, to quote a well-known document written mainly by a well-known unitarian?

Common grace is a great blessing, but it cannot be maintained apart from special grace.⁹ A society built on some version of common grace theology—the common confession of man—rests on a fragile foundation. If God withdraws His special grace, leaving only the economic fruits of abandoned confessional roots, the tree will eventually cease bearing fruit. Surely Europe is now in such a spiritual condition.

8. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 23.

9. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly.gndcg>)

Asia has never even had the roots. Asians imported the free market and its computers in the hope of escaping poverty. For a while, Asia did begin to escape poverty. But the Asians are trapped by their tools, copied from the West and mass produced, and also by the international banking system.

Social systems are package deals because they are based on worldviews. Worldviews are package deals.¹⁰ The dependence of free market ideas and practices on a specifically Western, biblical-covenantal view of the world, the free market economist is loathe to admit. Such an admission undercuts his claims of autonomy and universality: of economics as a science, of capitalism as a social system, and of man as a product of impersonal evolution. I am not saying that demand curves do not slope downward and to the right in Asia, as they do in the West. I am saying that there is no such thing as a demand curve outside of the economist's conceptual toolkit. Demand curves are abstractions based on assumptions that can never be true in the real world, and which are then taught as truths to gullible undergraduates by far more gullible professors.¹¹ I am not saying that people do not respond predictably to incentives. I am saying that humanistic capitalism's incentives are being sold to millions of people at low prices that do not reflect the true risk of subsequent transactions. Godless capitalism is being sold almost as an addictive drug is sold. "There's no risk. Try it. You'll like it." No doubt they will. They will also become addicted to the division of labor that comes with it—a division of labor based on a confession: "My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth."

Conclusion

There is a predictable connection between confession and visible results, between invisible roots and visible fruits. This connection takes longer to manifest itself in the New Covenant, for prophetic sanctions have been transferred to Christ. Jesus warned His followers to examine the fruits when they are not sure of the roots. While the in-

10. Greg L. Bahnsen, Van Til's Apologetics: Readings and Analysis (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: P&R, 1998), pp. 102–103.

11. These impossible assumptions include: (1) men respond to price changes that are infinitesimal, i.e., unobservable; (2) a curve exists at one instant in time, yet men's decisions are made over time; (3) other things remain equal in a world in which we cannot change just one thing; (4) men's tastes do not change when prices change. There are no doubt lots of others, but my expected cost of recalling them is higher than my expected gain.

troductory verses indicate that He was discussing the office of prophet, the general principle is universal: a good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit; neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit.

The priority here is developing wise judgment. Wise judgment begins with a confession of faith in the God of the Bible. It matures through a careful study of God's law (Ps. 119) and obedience, i.e., applying the written law to our decisions. As we develop wise judgment, we can better assess the claims of those who come to us in God's name, as Old Covenant prophets used to come. We can hear their confessions and see the results of these confessions. On the basis of what we see, we can assess the truth of what we hear.

19

FIRST THINGS FIRST

And a certain scribe came, and said unto him, Master, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest. And Jesus saith unto him, The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head. And another of his disciples said unto him, Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father. But Jesus said unto him, Follow me; and let the dead bury their dead (Matt. 8:19–22).

The theocentric principle here is that God expects permanent commitment: hierarchy, point two of the biblical covenant.¹ There is a hierarchy of values.

A. The Uprooted

In these two incidents, Jesus was approached by men who said they wanted to follow Him. He did not send the first man away. Rather, He gave him a reason not to commit. The second man was willing to commit, but only after burying his father. Jesus warned this man to ignore his dead father's funeral. These seem to be opposite cases. The first man wanted to come; Jesus discouraged him. The second wanted to bury his father first; Jesus discouraged him. In both cases, Jesus was motivated by the same principle: first things first. This is the principle of priorities. It is the governing principle of the Gospel of Matthew: priorities within the kingdom of God.

The scribe wanted to follow Jesus. This was surely not a normal request. Scribes constantly confronted Jesus publicly, trying to undermine His authority through questioning. Perhaps this man was serious; perhaps he was an informer. In either case, Jesus challenged him to pay a high price. Jesus had no home, no place to call home, no permanent pillow. He was in a condition like Jacob's in his flight from Esau. "And he lighted upon a certain place, and tarried there all night, because the sun was set; and he took of the stones of that place, and put them for his pillows, and lay down in that place to sleep" (Gen. 28:11). Jacob had become a wanderer, a man without a home.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

This is not a normal condition. Wandering is usually a curse. The Israelites wandered in the wilderness; this was surely a curse on the exodus generation. They wanted to rest. They wanted a place to rest. They did not receive their wish. One of the basic ideas of rest is to have a place of one's own to call home. A place of rest serves as headquarters for our dominion. We work; then we return home to rest. The Promised Land was Israel's place of rest.

Jesus' ministry required that He wander. Those who followed Him also wandered. They gave up their places of rest. They also gave up predictable sources of income. Their seemingly patternless wandering broke their familiar pattern of work outside the home, return to home, and rest. Wandering had also broken the exodus generation's prior pattern of limited dominion: servitude in Egypt.

In the wilderness, the Israelites had been sustained by the manna. We are not told how Jesus and His disciples were sustained. It may have been charity. Perhaps they took odd jobs. Somehow, they had money. Judas kept the bag (John 12:6). But the scribe, hearing that Jesus had no place of rest, must have understood that he also would have to forfeit more than a place of rest. He would forfeit the normal pattern of dominion. He could no longer rely on a steady stream of income.

Jesus was telling the scribe that he faced risk. How would he deal with this risk? By relying on others? By relying on Jesus' persuasion of others? By relying on odd jobs, or money shared by the other disciples who might find odd jobs? The pattern of dominion was broken by Jesus' way of life. He refused to stay in His own region, where He was not taken seriously. "And when he was come into his own country, he taught them in their synagogue, insomuch that they were astonished, and said, Whence hath this man this wisdom, and these mighty works? Is not this the carpenter's son? is not his mother called Mary? and his brethren, James, and Joses, and Simon, and Judas? And his sisters, are they not all with us? Whence then hath this man all these things? And they were offended in him. But Jesus said unto them, A prophet is not without honour, save in his own country, and in his own house. And he did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief" (Matt. 13:54–58). Familiarity had bred contempt. So, He walked unfamiliar pathways to do His work.

Jesus was nearing the end of His time on earth. He was at the beginning of the next stage of His ministry: covenantal representation by His church. To prepare His followers, He first broke the patterns of their lives. He reshaped their lives by reshaping their dominion patterns. He took away their pillows. He substituted rocks instead.

God did the same with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. He took away their places of rest. He uprooted them. He drove Jacob and his sons into Egypt. He drove Moses out of Egypt, and then out of his home in Midian. He did it to David in his time with the Philistines (I Sam. 27:7) and during Absalom's rebellion (II Sam. 16). He did it to the church in Jerusalem (Acts 8:1). He did it to Paul. The uprooting process is part of the next phase of the expansion of the kingdom.

Jesus' parents were uprooted when they took Him into Egypt (Matt. 2:14). His public ministry began with His uprooting out of Galilee. The familiar environment that had sustained Him was removed. His hope for rest could not be placed in geography. It had to come from above. God the Father would sustain Him. Jesus would do His work of building the kingdom without the capital asset that most men rely on: a predictable place of rest.

Missionary activity is always based on an uprooting. Irish monks in the sixth century spread across northern Europe, building monasteries.² In the United States, the Baptists and Methodists captured what was then the Western part of the nation by adopting circuit-riding. These men had no permanent homes. John Wesley was the model, who spent most of his adult life on horseback. While ministers in the traditional Calvinistic denominations stayed at home east of the Allegheny Mountains, the Baptists and Methodists worked for little pay and no place of rest in the West. There were 750 Congregational churches in 1780, and about 500 Presbyterian congregations and 450 Baptist congregations. The Methodists were barely visible. By 1900, there were almost 50,000 Baptist congregations, almost 54,000 Methodist congregations, 15,452 Presbyterian, 5,604 Congregational (liberal), 6,264 Episcopal (liberal). There were over 10,298 Disciples congregations: two-thirds of the number of Presbyterians.³ Episcopalians and Congregationalists were hardly visible in the West.

2. Thomas Cahill, How the Irish Saved Civilization: The Untold Story of Ireland's Heroic Role from the Fall of the Roman Empire to the Rise of Medieval Europe (New York: Talese-Doubleday, 1995). This is a popularly written book, not a scholarly history.

Jesus was telling the scribe that to follow Him, he would have to become one of the uprooted. He did not tell him he could not join the disciples, but He warned him of the high price.

B. Let the Dead Bury the Dead

The second inquirer was already a disciple, but not one of the permanent wanderers. He was ready to join the wanderers, almost. But first he had to go and bury his father. Jesus dismissed the ritual as trivial. “Let the dead bury the dead.” This statement was an epitaph on the grave of Old Covenant Israel.

Filial piety is basic to almost every civilization. It was the heart of classical religion. It was also important in Israel. Isaac and Ishmael came together to bury Abraham (Gen. 25:9). Jacob and Esau buried Isaac (Gen. 35:29). Yet Jesus told the prospective disciple to break with tradition and immediately join the band of wanderers. In a sense, Jesus’ inner circle wandered in circles. They were no longer part of the normal pattern of family life in Israel.

The would-be wanderer had to assess the importance of becoming one of the inner circle, being present at the creation of a new world order. Was it worth defying convention? To defy this convention would be to move outside of polite society. He would become an outcast. If he did not bury his father, his son might not bury him. This, in fact, was quite likely. Jesus later warned them: “Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter in law against her mother in law. And a man’s foes shall be they of his own household. He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me: and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me. And he that taketh not his cross, and followeth after me, is not worthy of me” (Matt. 10:34–38).

But it was more than this. The man would have to participate in the burial of Israel. It was not just that his father was dead; it was that his nation was dead. The old order was dead. The new Israel of God was being born.⁴ This new Israel would not attend the burial of the old Israel. In fact, the new Israel was warned to flee from the old Israel when the signs of the imminent burial appeared (Luke 21:20–22). When Rome's legions arrived, the church was to have departed, which church tradition subsequently said they did, fleeing to the non-Judaic town of Pella.

3. Edwin Scott Gaustad, Historical Atlas of Religion in America (New York: Harper & Row, 1962), p. 44, Figure 33.

Conclusion

Jesus warned both men to put first things first: to set their top priority. Joining the wanderers would mean giving up home, bed, and pillow. Jesus had done this; His followers would, too. Was the scribe ready to pay this price? Joining the wanderers would also mean giving up traditions. Burying one's father was a very old tradition in Israel. That tradition was about to go. The new Israel would soon be at war with the old Israel. The household would be divided. The would-be wanderer was told it was time to choose: covenantal life or covenantal death. Jesus told him to choose life.

He was telling them both that the New Covenant would supersede the Old. To join Him would be to take a new covenant oath. They could no longer live halfway between the Old World Order and the New World Order. For a brief time, it might have looked as though that was possible, but it was not. The dead would have to bury the dead. The living would have to wander. Within one generation, they would have to flee. "And when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh. Then let them which are in Judaea flee to the mountains; and let them which are in the midst of it depart out; and let not them that are in the countries enter thereinto. For these be the days of vengeance, that all things which are written may be fulfilled" (Luke 21:20–22).

4. The church is called the Israel of God. "And as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God" (Gal. 6:16). This has always been a problem text for dispensationalists.

THE LURE OF BUSINESS

And when he was come to the other side into the country of the Gergesenes, there met him two possessed with devils, coming out of the tombs, exceeding fierce, so that no man might pass by that way. And, behold, they cried out, saying, What have we to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God? art thou come hither to torment us before the time? And there was a good way off from them an herd of many swine feeding. So the devils besought him, saying, If thou cast us out, suffer us to go away into the herd of swine. And he said unto them, Go. And when they were come out, they went into the herd of swine: and, behold, the whole herd of swine ran violently down a steep place into the sea, and perished in the waters. And they that kept them fled, and went their ways into the city, and told every thing, and what was befallen to the possessed of the devils. And, behold, the whole city came out to meet Jesus: and when they saw him, they besought him that he would depart out of their coasts (Matt. 8:28–34).

The theocentric focus of this passage is God's ability to deliver men from demon possession.¹ God is more powerful than devils. The message of the passage is that men do not want to pay the price of such deliverance.

Jesus delivered the possessed man by exorcising the devils. The devils asked to be allowed to dwell in a nearby herd of swine. As soon as Jesus allowed the demons to enter the swine, the pigs ran into the sea and drowned.

The parallel passage in Mark throws additional light on these events: "And they that fed the swine fled, and told it in the city, and in the country. And they went out to see what it was that was done. And they come to Jesus, and see him that was possessed with the devil, and had the legion, sitting, and clothed, and in his right mind: and they were afraid. And they that saw it told them how it befell to him that was possessed with the devil, and also concerning the swine. And they began to pray him to depart out of their coasts" (Mark 5:14–17).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch.24.

One of the two had remained behind with Jesus.² "And when he was come into the ship, he that had been possessed with the devil prayed him that he might be with him. Howbeit Jesus suffered him not, but saith unto him, Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee, and hath had compassion on thee. And he departed, and began to publish in Decapolis how great things Jesus had done for him: and all men did marvel" (Mark 5:18–20).

Why did the demons request to be allowed to reside in the bodies of swine, only to direct their new hosts into a suicidal run into the sea? If the demons needed places to live, why did they destroy their new places of residence?

The demons did not want a place to live in the sense of a dwelling. They wanted a place to live in the sense of a region. They operated in a region in which herds of pigs were kept. This indicates that pork had a local market. The Mosaic dietary laws were not being honored by residents in the region. Was this a region filled with gentiles? The text does not say so, nor does any other text in the New Testament. What it says is that the townspeople were afraid and asked Jesus to leave.

What were they afraid of? Being delivered from demons? This seems unlikely. Demonic possession was a curse to be avoided. The fact that someone locally had been delivered caught their attention. They came out to see for themselves what had happened.

What had happened? Two men had been delivered. One remained behind to testify of his deliverance. But his deliverance had involved the destruction of a herd of swine. This was surely bad for the herd's owner. The swineherders had already told the townspeople the story of the drowned herd. In fact, the passage indicates that the news about the swine preceded the news about the delivered men. As soon as the townspeople received confirmation of the story from the formerly possessed victim, they asked Jesus to leave the region. He complied.

This left the demons behind, without Jesus to bother them until the time of His resurrection and ascension. The demons had asked Him, "art thou come hither to torment us before the time?" They knew the timetable for their demise.

2. The accounts in Mark and Luke mention only one man.

Why would the townspeople not want to have Jesus living nearby, ready to cast out demons? The answer seems to be His mode of casting them out. He allowed them to enter into a herd of pigs that perished shortly thereafter. Jesus was seen as a kind of polluter. He allowed the overflow—in this case, demons—to destroy private property. The fact that Jews were prohibited from eating pigs and therefore from bidding up their market price made no difference to the townspeople. They were far more fearful about the economic effects of Jesus' action than they were about the threat of demonic possession. They preferred to share their environment with demons, who inhabited men, rather than risk another outbreak of "mad pig disease."

Swine were regarded as an economic asset in that region. If two men could house an entire legion of demons, this seemed a small price to pay for leaving pigs to roam the land and eventually grace the tables of many local residents. That two men would suffer the horrors of possession was, in the eyes of the townspeople, a small price to pay, since the townspeople were not paying it. There was risk of future possession, but they regarded this risk as less of a burden than the threat of the loss of herds of swine.

The demons had recognized the perversity of the local residents. They had planned their spiritual counter-attack well. They would let the townspeople be their spokesmen with Jesus. All it might take was a fast entrance into a herd of swine, and a mad dash down a hill into the water.

Luke added this important information regarding the event. "Then the whole multitude of the country of the Gadarenes round about besought him to depart from them; for they were taken with great fear: and he went up into the ship, and returned back again. Now the man out of whom the devils were departed besought him that he might be with him: but Jesus sent him away, saying, Return to thine own house, and shew how great things God hath done unto thee. And he went his way, and published throughout the whole city how great things Jesus had done unto him. And it came to pass, that, when Jesus was returned, the people gladly received him: for they were all waiting for him" (Luke 8:37–40).

Jesus usually instructed those whom He had healed to say nothing publicly. This was a major exception. The personal testimony of the healed man was so convincing that the townspeople subsequently reversed their opinion of Jesus and His ministry. But it took personal testimony of a local resident to accomplish this. Their initial reaction was negative.

Conclusion

When men disobey God's law, they find it difficult to keep their priorities in conformity to God's priorities for them. They move from one violation to another. They substitute their priorities for God's. This is why it is important for men to keep the whole of the law. Law-breaking is a slippery slope to destruction (Ps. 73:18;³ Jer. 23:12).

The men in this region ignored the dietary law against pork. From this seemingly minor infraction came a perverse set of priorities. They valued the preservation of the local swine market more than they valued men's deliverance from spiritual oppression. They feared the risk to pigs more than they feared the risk of demonic forces. For them, men's lives were worth less than pigs' lives.

The townspeople were sensitive to business values. Private property had to be protected. Jesus was threatening business. This was an offense worse than demonic possession. They asked Him to leave. He left. Only the subsequent personal testimony of the healed man persuaded them to reverse their opinion of Jesus.

3. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 17.

21

CALLING VS. OCCUPATION

And as Jesus passed forth from thence, he saw a man, named Matthew, sitting at the receipt of custom: and he saith unto him, Follow me. And he arose, and followed him (Matt 9:9).

The theocentric principle here is obedience to God's call. God possesses the lawful authority to call us into His service, point two of the biblical covenant.¹ We are required to heed this call. But to heed the call, we must trust the person who issues it.

A. Publicans

Matthew was a publican: a tax collector. Tax collectors were hated more in the ancient world than they are today. Today's tax collector is the agent of an elected government. This provides a degree of legitimacy to the tax system that Rome did not possess in the eyes of tribute-paying foreigners. The government immediately sold to companies the right to collect taxes. These companies bid for this privilege. The government collected its revenue in advance from the bidders, who in turn sent agents out to collect the taxes from the people. This system is known in retrospect as tax farming.

Tax farming had prevailed under the Roman Republic. Investors in a tax farming company expected to reap more than they sowed. If the group's bid won the privilege of collecting taxes from a particular region, the investors expected to collect more money than they had paid to Rome. Tax farmers were allowed considerable discretion in establishing the amount of taxes owed by any individual. They estimated how much they could collect before they placed their bids.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

The Roman government had stood behind these tax farmers. A revolt against the tax man, then as now, was a revolt against civil government authority. But publicans were businessmen. They represented a profit-seeking business as well as the government. Their job was to extract as much money as they could from taxpayers. There was no government tax code. They were not bureaucratic agents of the state. The taxpayers were at a great disadvantage in dealing with them.

Under such a system, tax collectors had an incentive to overcharge taxpayers, and taxpayers had an incentive to lie. Many taxpayers would have known about the nature of the tax farming system. It was to the taxpayers' advantage to pay as little as possible. If tax revenues dropped, the bids at the next tax farming auction might be lower. What was it to them if some profit-seeking Roman monopoly made less profit than its investors had hoped? If Rome collected less as a result, the tributaries would shed no tears.

The tax farming system was abolished under Augustus in Christ's day. He substituted tax collecting by local governments, which then paid the central government. This system was less arbitrary than the tax farming system had been.² But there was still a possibility that local tax collectors might overcharge taxpayers, just as their predecessors had done under the tax farming system. John the Baptist recognized this temptation and dealt with it openly: "Then came also publicans to be baptized, and said unto him, Master, what shall we do? And he said unto them, Exact no more than that which is appointed you" (Luke 3:12–13).³ The tax collector in the Roman world was assumed to be dishonest. John's comment went to the heart of this distrust. But he did not tell them that they were immoral for being tax collectors. He told them only they were immoral if they raised taxes on their own authority and then kept the difference. At every level, he implied, the rule of law should be honored. Tax collectors should know in advance what they are expected to collect. This means that taxpayers should know in advance what they are required to pay. The predictability of law is to apply to taxation. The tax farming system was inherently corrupt because it made possible theft on a massive scale. The system imposed the monopolistic force of law without the rule of law.

2. James Macdonald, A Free Nation Deep in Debt: The Financial Roots of Democracy (New York: Farrar, Strauss and Giroux, 2003), p. 54.

3. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 2.

B. Occupation

There is a familiar saying in English that is equally true in every other language: “Nothing is certain except death and taxes.” Every civil government must collect taxes in some form. Taxpayers prefer to keep more of their wealth than less, so they resist the imposition of taxes. Although they know that some taxation is necessary for their protection, they prefer to have other taxpayers pay. They resent taxes, and they resent tax collectors.

A Jew who served as a tax collector would have been especially resented in Israel. Most of all, a member of the tribe of Levi would have been resented. Levi was the priestly tribe. The parallel accounts say that Matthew was also named Levi (Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27).⁴

1. Walking Away

Matthew was sitting at a table, collecting taxes. As soon as he heard Jesus’ call, he walked away from his job. But he did more than this, according to Luke’s account. He left the money behind. Then he invited in fellow publicans to hear Jesus. In doing so, He gave Jesus another opportunity to confront the religious leaders of the nation. “And after these things he went forth, and saw a publican, named Levi, sitting at the receipt of custom: and he said unto him, Follow me. And he left all, rose up, and followed him. And Levi made him a great feast in his own house: and there was a great company of publicans and of others that sat down with them. But their scribes and Pharisees murmured against his disciples, saying, Why do ye eat and drink with publicans and sinners? And Jesus answering said unto them, They that are whole need not a physician; but they that are sick. I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance” (Luke 5:27–32). Levi left it all behind. Then he had a party.⁵

Matthew-Levi recognized that Jesus was offering him a higher calling. He was making money at his job. He probably was making a lot of money. He left the money behind. He owed most of it to his superiors unless he was extremely crooked: skimming off receipts. By walking away from it, he became liable to make up the difference out of his own capital. He must have had capital. He could also afford to enter-

4. Matthew was one of three brothers who became apostles. He was the son of Althaeus (Matt. 10:13; Mark 2:14). James was the son of Althaeus (Luke 6:15). Judas (not Iscariot) was the son of Althaeus (v. 16).

5. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 7.

tain guests at a feast. He invited other tax collectors, and they came. He was probably not a low-level official. He had money to spend on entertaining and gaining influence among his peers.

Why did he walk away from his money? That was an odd thing to do. He could have turned it in. Instead, he left it sitting there. Perhaps he thought that no one would steal it. But that took considerable faith on his part. Fear of Roman soldiers might have restrained men from reaching into the box⁶ to grab a handful of coins, but such theft would be difficult to prove unless soldiers were present next to Levi, which no text indicates. He must have counted the cost of losing the money that he had collected so far.

Leaving the money behind was a symbolic act. To pick up a box of money would not have required much effort. He did not pick it up. He walked away from it. He soon joined the disciples (Luke 6:15). He became an apostle (Acts 1:13). Visibly, he switched sides: from Rome to Jesus. He did so in a way that could not have failed to gain attention. Word about a Levite publican who had walked away from a box of money would have spread very fast.

Jesus had called him. He heeded the call immediately. He did not hesitate. Others did. "And he said unto another, Follow me. But he said, Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father. Jesus said unto him, Let the dead bury their dead: but go thou and preach the kingdom of God. And another also said, Lord, I will follow thee; but let me first go bid them farewell, which are at home at my house. And Jesus said unto him, No man, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God" (Luke 9:59–62).⁷

Levi's occupation was tax collecting. He left it for a calling: to be a disciple of Jesus. There was a conflict between the two. He would have found it difficult to remain a tax collector and become a disciple. Surely, he could not have been part of Jesus' closest associates, for Jesus was constantly on the move. He could not have become an apostle. But Matthew did not know anything about the apostolate. All he knew was that Jesus had called him.

2. Bad Company

When he invited other publicans to come to a party, they came.

6. I assume that he had a box or other container for the money. This is not a major assumption.

7. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 20.

Word must have spread to them, too. One of their colleagues had walked off the job, leaving the money behind. Why? Then he invited them to come to dinner and meet the man who had called him. Here was an opportunity to get answers to their question.

Tax collectors had a bad reputation. The scribes and Pharisees linked publicans with sinners. Jesus did not deny this link. Instead, He turned their criticism against them. He was a physician who healed the sick. The guests were on the list of the sick. His critics were not on the guest list. They did not regard themselves as sick men; thus, they believed that they had no need of a physician. They were critical of the Great Physician's methods of healing, including sharing a meal with tax collectors. Jesus was condemning them. They were as sick as the guests. They were in need of healing.

Matthew had humbled himself before Jesus by walking off the job. As a man protected by Roman troops, he possessed great authority. He would soon possess greater authority as an apostle. But the road to this authority was a walk into unemployment. He possessed wealth. He would soon possess a share of God's kingdom. But that kingdom was barely visible. He had a choice of two masters: God or mammon. He chose God. There is no clearer New Testament example of a man who made the correct choice in the face of such an explicit set of circumstances. He was the opposite of the rich young ruler, who made the incorrect choice.

C. Calling

Jesus had important tasks for Matthew-Levi. The most important, presumably, was writing the first Gospel.⁸ But Jesus did not call to him with this offer: "Leave the money behind, and you'll be able to write the first book in the New Testament, a book that will re-shape the world. Your name will be known by millions of people down through the ages." He just called him to follow. Matthew heeded the call.

1. Profitability

What was the most profitable thing Matthew could have done: collect taxes or write the first Gospel? In retrospect, most people would probably say "write the book." Men want to be remembered favorably. Fame is a powerful lure; so is a good reputation. Combine the two, and you have a powerful offer. Jesus did not verbally offer the first. The second—a good reputation—was part of the deal, but only by comparison to the universally bad reputation of tax collectors. He would go from being despised by nearly everyone to being misunderstood by many and hated by a few.

8. Because the Matthew account alone refers to the tax collector as Matthew rather than Levi, Bible scholars have assumed that he was the author of the book.

To gain this long-term profit—fame and a good name—he would have to pay. What he paid was the income that he would otherwise have received. This payment was symbolized by the box of money he left behind. That abandoned box of money was an earnest—a down payment—on all the other money that he would not receive.

He entered a world of far greater uncertainty. He had been a tax collector. This was one of the more certain occupations in Rome.⁹ Income was assured: a form of rent. In contrast, it was not clear to him where the income would come from as Jesus' disciple, wandering the roads of Judaea. Matthew became an entrepreneur. He chose uncertainty over rent. He ceased being a Roman bureaucrat.

There was no question that he was not going to have the same level of money income as a follower of Jesus. He knew that. He demonstrated this understanding by walking away from the money box. He was abandoning his occupation. Why? Because he had been called to something more profitable. He had received a higher calling.

His calling was in opposition to his occupation. What do I mean by his calling? I mean that way of life and that work which Jesus would assign to him. This was the most important work he could do. He could make more money on the old job, but this work was not very important compared to Jesus' work. Money income was higher as a tax collector, but money income was less profitable to him than Jesus' work. He was faced with a choice: occupation or calling. He chose the calling.

I define that calling as follows: *the most important work a person can do in which he would be most difficult to replace.*¹⁰ The account of Matthew's calling is illustrative of this definition. Jesus had a new career for him. His old career was profitable financially, but he could be replaced. There is no doubt that the tax collecting agency hired a replacement. We do not know his name. He is no longer important. He

9. Two centuries later, it was equally certain but one of the most burdensome occupations. Tax collectors had to pay the state, despite their future revenue, which fell as Rome became impoverished. It became an inherited office which could not be abandoned. It became a form of slavery.

10. Gary North, "The Calling," Christian Reconstruction (March/April 1981), (<http://bit.ly/gncalling>) was important to himself, his employers, and the taxpayers, but he is no longer important. He left no visible legacy. Matthew did.

The Gospel of Matthew cannot be replaced. The other three Gospels supplement it, but they did not replace it. It is only in Matthew's account that we are told of the virgin birth of Christ, although one passage in Luke presupposes the virgin birth: "And Jesus himself began to be about thirty years of age, being (as was supposed) the son of Joseph, which was the son of Heli" (Luke 3:23). It is only in Matthew that we read the account of the Great Commission: "And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen" (Matt. 28:18–20).¹¹ Can you imagine the history of the church without these two passages?

2. Non-Monetary Bidding

Matthew's choice was not based on monetary income. The organization that employed him paid more money than Jesus offered. Jesus offered nothing in the way of monetary compensation. This is typical for most people. Their place of highest-value service is rarely their place of greatest monetary income.

A bidding war was in progress. The organization that employed him had bid up his income to keep him in a job that suffered from a major social liability. Jesus offered him nothing except discipleship. He had a choice: remain a social pariah or become a social eccentric. Go with the money or go with . . . what? God and mammon were bidding against each other. The high bid wins, but the individual must decide in terms of his own scale of values what the high bid is. Rarely is the high monetary bid the high bid from God's point of view. "And again I say unto you, It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God" (Matt. 19:24).¹²

Callings are only occasionally salary-producing occupations, such as minister of the gospel or teacher. Because so few men are ever directly confronted with a choice between calling and occupation, they do not think much about their callings. They may think more about this when they reach their mid-40s, when they see their mortality more clearly. But the kind of life-changing decision that Matthew made is rare. Few men ever hear the call of God so plainly.

11. Chapter 48. See also Kenneth L. Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/GentryGGC>)

12. Chapter 38.

D. The Division of Labor

The division of labor has increased dramatically in the modern world ever since the late eighteenth century. Occupations have become more specialized. Low-level or entry-level jobs have become plentiful. It does not take seven years of apprenticeship training to teach a person to be a clerk in a fast food restaurant. It takes just a few days. But it takes far more training to become a physician than it did in medieval times. The assembly line of the modern factory has made average men productive, but factory jobs tend to move to less developed nations or regions. It takes more education and training to become a knowledge worker than an assembly-line worker.

As specialization increases, people find more opportunities to exercise their talents. They achieve greater productivity because their creativity progressively matches customer demand. They find their niche in the labor market. This benefits customers, who gain a wider selection of products and services to choose from, and more highly skilled producers working to serve them.

Were it not for the decrease in the cost of information, it would be increasingly difficult to replace workers in the capital-intensive job market. Information costs have dropped, however, offsetting the fact that the closer a person's skills match the requirements of the production process, the more difficult it is to find his replacement. To retain him in the production process, his employer must pay him enough to keep him from seeking employment elsewhere. Because of more accurate and more widely available information about rates of pay, people can bargain to their advantage with employers. Meanwhile, employers can locate replacements. The zones of ignorance have narrowed, meaning that workers are paid closer to what their services are worth to the customer by way of the employer. Only a few people in the organization provide such unique services that the organization's decision-makers cannot replace them readily.

Job-switching is common today. Men seek out better-paying jobs. They are not locked into one job for life. When a person asks: "What is my most productive area of service?" he means for a few years. Men change their occupations and their specialties within organizations.

The bidding war for jobs goes on, day by day. The results can be seen in the price of labor. But nothing comparable exists for the bidding system for callings. There is no visible indicator comparable to the money wage. There is no numerical value that men can place on the calling. While there has been an increase in information regarding callings, there is nothing comparable to the wage system.

With the increase in the division of labor, callings have become more specialized. But without a unique numerical success indicator, the participants and would-be participants in the market for highest service are still as blind, comparatively, as Matthew was. When God calls us into service, He does not present us with an employment contract enforceable in a court of law, with fringe benefits listed. He just says, "Hey, you! Come." There is great uncertainty. Why some men respond while others do not remains a mystery. They do not base this decision on quantitative measures. There is some unexplained factor that is at work in God's issuing of a call. "The secret things belong unto the LORD our God" (Deut. 29:29a).

Because we cannot know the future exhaustively, an element of faith exists in every decision. What distinguishes market decisions is the degree of specificity possible in assessing the future. There are prices. Prices are the result of men's decisions regarding the present value of expected future supply and demand. Men bid for resources in terms of these assessments. The result of this bidding process is an array of prices. So, there is less faith required to make a market decision than a decision regarding the calling. Accepting a calling is more like taking a wife than hiring a housekeeper. The potential is greater, a mistake is more permanent, and the terms of employment are less specific.

Conclusion

Matthew had to make a decision. He had to assess the call of Christ and compare its potential with that of his occupation. No decision would still have been a decision: to stay right where he was. He made his decision in an instant. We are not told what factors motivated him. Maybe it was only that Christ had called him, despite his position as a social outcast. Maybe he had been looking for a way out the tax collection field. Or maybe it was something beyond his own power to explain. He wrote the account, yet he did not explain his motivation.

Jesus' call persuaded him to act in terms of his priorities. Because he had not sought out Jesus, I assume that the call initiated a major shift in these priorities. The visible indicator of this shift was the money box. The more radical the shift, the less likely that he would take the box with him. Would he trust money or Christ, mammon or God? He trusted Christ.

NO VISIBLE RESERVES

But go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. And as ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand. Heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out devils: freely ye have received, freely give. Provide neither gold, nor silver, nor brass in your purses, Nor scrip for your journey, neither two coats, neither shoes, nor yet staves: for the workman is worthy of his meat (Matt. 10:6–10).

The theocentric focus of this passage is God as the paymaster: sanctions.¹ He sustains His workers. The worthy workman will receive his meat.

A. Bringing Israel Under Judgment

The context of this passage is the condemnation of Israel. The means of this condemnation was evangelism. “These twelve Jesus sent forth, and commanded them, saying, Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not: But go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. And as ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand. Heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out devils: freely ye have received, freely give” (Matt. 10:5–8). It sounds as though Jesus was offering positive sanctions only through His disciples. But the negative sanctions were also present. “And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear your words, when ye depart out of that house or city, shake off the dust of your feet. Verily I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for that city. Behold, I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves: be ye therefore wise as serpents, and harmless as doves. But beware of men: for they will deliver you up to the councils, and they will scourge you in their synagogues” (Matt. 10:14–17). Jesus knew that the disciples would not be received with open arms. He also knew that God’s judgment against Israel would come (Matt. 24; Luke 21).²

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

This was not an ordinary strategy of evangelism. The fact that Jesus forbade them from going to gentile cities, or even Samaritan cities, is indicative of the special nature of this assignment. He was sending them to the covenant people in order to gain a few converts and condemn the nation.

This was, in effect, preliminary to another exodus. Just as Moses had confronted Pharaoh inside the boundaries of Egypt, so would they confront opponents. Like Pharaoh, these opponents would bring negative sanctions against them. Like Moses, they would receive supernatural aid that would enable them to deal with their opponents. “But when they deliver you up, take no thought how or what ye shall speak: for it shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak. For it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you” (Matt. 10:19–20). The first phase of the exodus took place immediately after the stoning of Steven. “And Saul was consenting unto his death. And at that time there was a great persecution against the church which was at Jerusalem; and they were all scattered abroad throughout the regions of Judaea and Samaria, except the apostles” (Acts 8:1). The second phase took place sometime prior to the Roman army’s final surrounding of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. (According to ancient church tradition, the Jerusalem church fled to the gentile city of Pella.)³

Jesus was commanding them to bring a covenant lawsuit against Israel. By announcing the advent of a new kingdom, they were announcing the end of the Old Covenant order. This was done in the power of the Holy Spirit. Jesus wanted them to learn that the Spirit was with them. He sent them among wolves in order to break their fear of the established order.

B. Money and Uncertainty

“The rich man’s wealth is his strong city, and as an high wall in his own conceit” (Prov. 18:11).⁴ The rich man trusts in his money. He expects it to shield him from catastrophes, just as a wall shielded an ancient city. The disciples were ordered not to carry money with them. Then what would serve as their high wall? God.

2. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/cddov>) Chilton, The Great Tribulation (Tyler, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dctrib>)

3. Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, Isaac Boyle, trans. (Grand Rapids: Baker, [325?] 1955), III:V, p. 86.

Money is the most marketable commodity. Put differently, it is the most liquid asset. This means that money can be sold (exchanged for assets) rapidly and without transaction costs. Men hold money because they cannot accurately foresee the future. They do not know what opportunities will arise. They want to be able to take advantage of these opportunities. They do not know what kind of calamities will arise. They want to be able to buy their way out of these calamities. Money is their means of taking action. Because of money’s liquidity, its holders have a wide range of options available to them. They reduce their costs of information by accumulating money.

Jesus sent them into an uncertain environment without money. He told them in general what would happen to them. Some people would welcome them. Others would persecute them. Through all of their experiences, the Holy Spirit would guide them and protect them. The Spirit was above circumstances. They could rely on Him to be their high wall.

Money is a tool. Men own this tool. They grow confident in the use of this tool. They grow confident in themselves as tool masters. Jesus was telling the disciples that their own efforts would not be the source of their success or protection. They could not manipulate the Holy Spirit in the way that they could manipulate money. They would be in the Spirit’s hands; He would not be in their hands. He would put the proper words in their mouths. He would not echo their words.

The dominion hierarchy is God > man > nature (Gen. 1:27–28).⁵ Jesus was warning them against having faith in autonomous man’s hierarchy: man > money > other men. The task He was giving them was beyond anything that money would buy.

He was giving them a preliminary assignment, just as God gave Moses. This assignment was designed to increase trust in God’s sovereignty over history. They faced considerable uncertainty. The future is never uncertain to God. Jesus was teaching them that the most effective way to deal with uncertainty is to trust in God. To trust in the most

4. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 54.

5. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 4.

marketable commodity is legitimate, though exclusive trust is idolatry. Proverbs refers to it as conceit. The same Hebrew word is used for an idol.⁶

C. Spiritual Reserves

If they were not to trust in the most marketable commodity, then what about a fall-back position? What about spare clothing? Jesus forbade that, too. Nothing that they could carry in their purses or on their backs would suffice. Only the Spirit of God would suffice.

They would have reserves: God's Spirit. This is always sufficient. Yet in His grace, God does not ask us to avoid other reserves. This assignment was unique. It was a training mission. Just before His crucifixion, He reminded them: "When I sent you without purse, and scrip, and shoes, lacked ye any thing? And they said, Nothing. Then said he unto them, But now, he that hath a purse, let him take it, and likewise his scrip: and he that hath no sword, let him sell his garment, and buy one" (Luke 22:35b–36). What had been appropriate for a training mission would not be appropriate in the future. This did not mean that they would no longer have to rely on the Spirit. The Spirit would come in full force only after Christ's ascension (John 14:26; 16:7; Acts 1:8). From that point on, the disciples would be fully equipped: Spirit, purse, and sword.

The training mission was a means of strengthening their faith. This meant that they had to learn to trust in invisible reserves. Men find it very difficult to do this. They must be trained to do this. Moses was not ready for his assignment at the time that he first met God at the burning bush. Men trust in what they can see and what they have learned through successful experiences. Jesus removed their visible reserves in order that they might gain successful experiences. He reminded them of their success just before His crucifixion. They still did not believe Him. They still had not learned. It took the crowing of the cock for Peter to learn. In the passage immediately preceding His reminder of their successes without a purse, Jesus prophesied Peter's public denial of Him. It was that event, rather than the triumph of the empty purse, that finally persuaded him. It was his prophesied failure, not his previous success, that enabled him to put his trust where it belonged. Yet both events were essentially of the same character. Both stripped Peter of autonomous reserves. The first left him without money; the second left him without honor.

6. "Ye shall make you no idols nor graven image, neither rear you up a standing image, neither shall ye set up any image of stone in your land, to bow down unto it: for I am the LORD your God" (Lev. 26:1).

D. Predictable Payment

Jesus sent them among wolves. He sent them out in what appeared to be a defenseless condition. It was important for them to learn not to trust in their own strength. Their own strength was too puny. Their own reserves were too minimal. They had to trust in God's reserves. They could do this because of God's adherence to His own principle of payment: "The workman is worthy of his meat." The parallel passage in Luke puts it this way: ". . . the labourer is worthy of his hire. Go not from house to house" (Luke 10:7b). God does not expect His people to work for free.

At the same time, He expects His workers to serve others. "Freely ye have received, freely give." Just as He supplies His workers with whatever they need to do their work, so are they to serve those who have not yet entered the kingdom. Jesus said that they would be sustained miraculously. Similarly, they would perform miracles. For this, they would earn the hostility of the wolves.

God's principle of payment means that even though His servants do not now possess visible reserves, they can expect them. "I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread" (Ps. 37:25). The servant of God receives; he is therefore to lend freely. "He is ever merciful, and lendeth; and his seed is blessed" (Ps. 37:26).⁷ The servant can become a visible blessing to others because he knows, in the familiar phrase, "there's more where that came from." Furthermore, this stream of predictable income extends to his children.

Uncertainty is reduced by a stream of income. The greater the predictability of this income, the less the uncertainty. The economist calls a stream of income rental income. An asset generates income. Men who seek asset-generated income are called rent-seekers. They seek to gain reduced uncertainty by buying a stream of income.

In contrast is the entrepreneur. He thrives on uncertainty. He knows that it is through the conversion of uncertainty into certainty that he can gain a profit. When he converts an uncertain future into a more predictable future, he gains a stream of income. He can then sell this stream of income for money. He capitalizes it. Rent-seekers will pay to buy it. He profits because he perceived a stream of future income where his competitors did not. They did not offer what the stream of income was worth. The entrepreneur places his capital at risk by buying the otherwise unpredicted income stream and converting it into a predictable stream. For this service he gains a one-time entrepreneurial profit—an above-average return on his invested capital.⁸

7. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 6.

God's people are supposed to become bearers of uncertainty. They are to gain kingdom profits, the parable of the talents tells us (Matt. 25:14–30).⁹ But uncertainty has its downside. Sometimes men forecast incorrectly. They lose their capital. What they thought would be a stream of income turns out to be a sink-hole for their capital.

The parable used the language of commerce to explain kingdom expansion. What Jesus told the disciples before sending them on their mission was that God would supply them with whatever they required. What appeared to them initially as a highly uncertain project without visible means of support would be well-supplied. If they did their work faithfully, they would receive what they needed to continue.

Their faith, coupled with a supernaturally guaranteed supply of income, would enable them to do effective kingdom work. What appeared to be uncertain was in fact certain. They needed faith to begin. They needed visible confirmation to continue.

Uncertainty is the major barrier to entry. It is what keeps out competitors who would bid up the price of the resources and tools needed to produce the stream of income. This is what enables people with very little capital to become rich. They see an opportunity—or sense it—where others do not perceive it. They enter the market with whatever reserves they possess and commit it to developing the stream of income. Like gold prospectors with a newly discovered tattered map or inventors with a dream, they rush in where competitors fear to tread.

Jesus told them that God's payment was predictable. They could

8. The profit occurs once, for after the rise in the capitalized price of the asset, the owner reaps only an average rate of return. If it is worth an ounce of gold when he buys it and 10 ounces after his efforts, he can sell it for 10 ounces. The buyer will earn an average rate of return on his investment of 10 ounces. But what is true of the buyer is also true of the entrepreneur if he decides not to sell the asset. The income stream he receives is an average rate of return on the new value of the asset.

9. Chapter 47.

trust God. They could therefore safely rush in where others feared to tread. And so they did. This tiny band of men without visible capital began a ministry that has transformed the world.

Conclusion

This was a special assignment. It became a standard that should remind men of what God can do, just as the miracles in Egypt and the crossing of the Red Sea were to remind Israel of what God can do. Such miracles were not supposed to become familiar events. The manna ceased when Israel crossed the Jordan by another miracle of divided waters (Josh. 5:12). After that, they were to plant and build. Similarly, Jesus told the disciples immediately prior to His crucifixion to get a purse and a sword. They were not to forget what God had done for them. He specifically reminded them of what God had done for them. But He told them to use conventional reserves—capital—to pursue their callings.

They were to establish priorities in their valuation of capital: God first, then money and a weapon. They were to trust the Spirit first; then they were to trust in visible reserves. No asset is to be spared in the extension of God's kingdom. It is not that we are to work without assets. It is that we are to subordinate our visible reserves to God's invisible reserves.

Perhaps the greatest example of invisible reserves is found in Elisha's lesson to his servant. "And when the servant of the man of God was risen early, and gone forth, behold, an host compassed the city both with horses and chariots. And his servant said unto him, Alas, my master! how shall we do? And he answered, Fear not: for they that be with us are more than they that be with them. And Elisha prayed, and said, LORD, I pray thee, open his eyes, that he may see. And the LORD opened the eyes of the young man; and he saw: and, behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha" (II Kings 6:15–17). Seeing is believing. But not every servant of God is enabled to see in this way. He must accept on faith the testimony of the Bible that his covenantal predecessors have seen such things. What they saw strengthened them. What we read should strengthen us.

23

CONFIDENT FEAR

Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father. But the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Fear ye not therefore, ye are of more value than many sparrows (Matt. 10:29–31).

The underlying theocentric principle here is God's omniscience. He sees everything. He is sovereign: point one of the biblical covenant¹ The practical application of this principle is this: God's people, being worth more than an inexpensive bird, should have confidence in His support.

A. Omniscience and Entrepreneurship

Omniscience is one of the incommunicable attributes of God. God knows everything. This is one aspect of His infinity. Not being omniscient, man cannot comprehend infinity. Jesus therefore discussed God's infinity in terms that men can understand, such as knowing the number of hairs on a man's head. No man can count them because he will lose track of which hairs he has already counted. Meanwhile, some hairs will fall out. We know only that the number of hairs is many.

The philosophical implications of God's omniscience are many, but this much is sure: nothing surprises God. Nothing sneaks up on Him. Therefore, His people should not allow their surprise to paralyze them. They are in His sight and His care. Men are vulnerable to the unexpected. This vulnerability is an aspect of man's lack of omniscience. But if a man is part of God's remnant, this vulnerability is temporary. To the extent that he is acting as a dominion agent, he can overcome the challenge of the unknown. He does so by means of his own efforts, but also by the joint efforts of church members. He is not alone. God is with him, and the church is with Him.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

Another implication is that cause and effect are not random. There is no zone of indeterminacy for God. He knows both the location and speed of the electron and the galaxy. Man is not trapped in a world governed by chance.

A third implication is that life is not a discovery process for God. He never discovers anything that He did not know before.

Man sees the future as through a glass, darkly. He can be surprised. Lots of things sneak up on him. For him, cause and effect often seem random. Life is a discovery process for man. Because of these limitations on man's knowledge, man is necessarily an entrepreneur.

The entrepreneur confronts uncertainty. He must deal with it. He looks into the future and makes decisions in the present. He takes action in the present. He exchanges one set of circumstances for another in the present. He does not do this with complete confidence unless he is a fool. He does not know the outcome of his actions because he does not know everything that contributes to cause and effect in history. The complexity of life is too much for man to deal with. He deals with creation representatively: by models and laws. The question is: Which models and which laws?

Reality is complex. It is interdependent. Anything can affect anything else, or so some people think. Perhaps everything else affects anything, or at least could affect anything under certain circumstances. We do not know, for we are not omniscient. We cannot make sense of infinity. Biblically speaking, there are degrees of infinity. It comes in varying sizes. The infinitude of the creation is less than the infinitude of God, in a way analogous to the infinitude of eternity, which it is less for resurrected men than for God, who got here first.

Men could not act rationally if they had to know everything exhaustively before they could know anything truly.² They would be paralyzed. Men make decisions based on information that constitutes a nearly infinitesimal amount of data. Yet they make progress. They learn. For them, life is a discovery process.

The entrepreneur tries to discover coherence in the present so that he can improve his situation in the uncertain future. A successful entrepreneur learns from his successes and his errors. He improves his decision-making ability. Out of the mists of uncertainty comes information in the form of feedback. The feedback that he receives from reality enables him to deal more successfully with reality the next time.

2. Cornelius Van Til made this point repeatedly.

Men are supposed to pray for wisdom (James 1:5–8). This wisdom is from above, but it is also from this world. Men are to ask for a clearer understanding of their restricted area of responsibility, i.e., their zone of dominion. They should expect to receive this information from the God who is larger than infinity and above it. But covenantal wisdom is more than knowing; it is also obeying. “Therefore to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin” (James 4:17). We learn by doing.

B. Reducing Our Fear of the Future

God is aware when a sparrow falls. How important is a sparrow? Less important than a man. We cannot measure how much less important, but we know that it is less important.

Jesus used this contrast to persuade His followers that their concerns are known to God. God is not some distant monarch who does not know what is happening. He is omniscient. He can see the sparrow fall; He can see us fall. He is present with the sparrow when it falls; He is present with us when we fall.

For the covenant-keeper, this information is intended to reduce his fear of the future. “Fear ye not therefore, ye are of more value than many sparrows.” The future should be terrifyingly fearful for covenant-breakers, but not for covenant-keepers. The reason why it should not be fearful for covenant-keepers is because God is omnipotent. He brings His eternal decree to pass in history. This is the message of the last four chapters of Job. There is no uncertainty for God.

Job was not afraid of the future. He was confused by the past. He despaired because of the covenantal unpredictability of the future—the lack of correspondence between his faithfulness and the visible results. It was not that he was cut down; it was that he was cut down for no apparent covenantal reason. There seemed to be a discrepancy between covenantal predictability—blessings for obedience—and his sacramental past and unpleasant present. As a forecaster, he had failed to foresee these events. He was unable to make sense of cause and effect. His past gave him no useful information about his expected future. As an entrepreneur, he had previously been successful in dealing with uncertainty. He had obeyed God, and He had prospered. But cause and effect had become worse than random; it had become perverse. This baffled him. God's answer was clear: "I'm God; you're not. I get to do what I want."

The reason why the Book of Job is so difficult to explain is that this answer seems to deny covenantal cause and effect. But this is not the book's message. On the contrary: "So the LORD blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning: for he had fourteen thousand sheep, and six thousand camels, and a thousand yoke of oxen, and a thousand she asses" (Job 42:12). But in the interim, God did what He pleased. When dealing with fallen man, God's law is all grace, and so is covenantal cause and effect. Man has no legal claim on God, for man is in rebellion. It is grace alone that brings positive sanctions and restricts negative ones.

We are not to fear the future, because God is in control of the future, and we are His adopted children. He cares for us. Whatever happens to us is not a mistake on God's part. Our temporal and temporary afflictions are not the result of God's absent-mindedness. They are part of our lifelong discovery process. What we are supposed to discover is that God loves His people and has a wonderful plan for their lives (Mal. 1:2; Rom. 9:13a).

Fear thwarts this discovery process. "There is no fear in love; but perfect love casteth out fear: because fear hath torment. He that feareth is not made perfect in love" (I John 4:18). God's love is perfect. It casts out fear. Our love is imperfect. The proof of this imperfection is our fear. We are tormented by fear. This thwarts our progressive sanctification.

Yet we also know that fear is an attribute of faith. "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom: a good understanding have all they that do his commandments: his praise endureth for ever" (Ps. 111:10). So, the deciding factor is not fear but the object of our fear. Do we fear God or the creation? Jesus had already made it plain to the disciples what we are to fear. "And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell" (Matt. 10:28). This leads us to another conclusion: God hates His enemies and has a horrible plan for their lives (Mal. 1:3; Rom. 9:13b).

C. Fear of God and Confidence in the Future

Men are told to fear God. He is over the creation. By fearing God, men subordinate themselves to Him as the King of kings and Lord of lords.

Men are told not to fear those who can kill them. This means that no aspect of the creation should make men afraid, as long as they are doing God's work. The creation is a threat to those who are in rebellion against God. It testifies against them.

So, men are to fear God and remain confident regarding the future. If they are legitimately confident about their eternal future, then they should remain confident about the temporal future. Covenant-breakers are threatened far more by hell than by death. They are threatened far more by God than by any aspect of the creation. The limit of the creation's negative sanctions is death. In a world of sin, this fact should reinforce the hierarchical aspect of the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:27–28).³ The covenant-keeper is subordinate to God; therefore, he is the delegated king of creation in his legitimate area of responsibility.

Uncertainty should therefore be less of a barrier to entry for the covenant-keeper than for the covenant-breaker. Covenant-keepers should be willing to take big chances for the sake of extending God's kingdom in history. Covenant-keepers' fear of the future thwarts their work in extending the kingdom. It is proof of their lack of love toward God. They must fear God above all and love God above all.

Confidence in the future of the kingdom encourages a man to take risks for the sake of God's kingdom, even though he may fail. The entrepreneur knows that many projects fail for every great one that is achieved. What is true in the experience of one entrepreneur is also true for the kingdom. Many men's work may come to naught as far as they and others can see, but in the corporate realm of God's kingdom, they play a part. There is a pattern in life that was first discovered by the late-nineteenth century sociologist-economist, Vilfredo Pareto. It is called the 80-20 rule. About 80% of a system's productivity comes from 20% of its resources. Conversely, 80% of its problems comes from 20% of its operations. This means that the productivity of the 20% rests on the other 80%, which contributes the seemingly unproductive support elements in the system. Something like this rule seems to operate in God's kingdom. A tiny minority of successful churches get most of the publicity, but the multitude of little ones that get no recognition meet the spiritual needs of the vast majority of Christians. For over two centuries, the average Protestant congregation in the United States has been about 75 to 100 adult members.⁴ There have been a few large, influential congregations in every era, but the little ones do the unspectacular maintenance work of the kingdom.

3. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 4.

Similarly, there are failures. Some men work to plant churches that never take root. Some foreign missions programs fail to impact local communities, or seem to. Christians send money to non-profit organizations that never seem to prosper. Pioneering efforts often do little more than clear a rough path through a large forest. Civilization later follows some of these rough paths, but not all of them. Of those paths followed, most will eventually be abandoned, to be grown over with trees, leaving little trace. This is the risk of becoming a pioneer. Civilization may not follow your path. But without pioneers, there would be no paths. The price of civilization includes the paths that failed. Some pioneers fail. God does not fail. His work goes forward. If a man works for the sake of the kingdom, he can be confident about the success of his efforts. They may not produce the crop he hopes for, but they are part of God's comprehensive plan. The pioneer is doing his work faithfully. He will receive his reward, either in history or in eternity. Paul wrote:

I have planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase. So then neither is he that planteth any thing, neither he that watereth; but God that giveth the increase. Now he that planteth and he that watereth are one: and every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labour. For we are labourers together with God: ye are God's husbandry, ye are God's building. According to the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise masterbuilder, I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon. For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ. Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work

4. It was about 75 members in 1776. Roger Finke and Rodney Stark, The Churching of America, 1776–1990: Winners and Losers in Our Religious Economy (New Brunswick, New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, [1992] 1994), pp. 24, 26. In 1998, average church attendance at Protestant churches was 91. It had been 100 in 1997, 102 in 1992, and 98 in 1987. Barna Research Group, "Profile of American Churches Shows Them to be Conservative, Evangelical, Seeker-Sensitive—and Losing Ground" (Sept. 8, 1998).

shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire (I Cor. 3:6–15).⁵

The confidence that a covenant-keeping man has in God should motivate him to sacrifice for the sake of the kingdom. God will bless his efforts. Other men who do not have this confidence will tend to turn back, but the man of faith moves forward. The kingdom of God moves forward towards the conquest of the world because covenant-keepers remain faithful in their tasks. The slow, steady, plodding work of millions of faithful people is what produces long-term victory. Their confidence in this fact encourages them to stick to their tasks, come hell or high water.

Conclusion

The fear of God is the beginning of wisdom. The fear of the creation is therefore the beginning of foolishness. If men fear the creation—circumstances—more than they fear God, they will have a hard time taking risks. They will hold onto what they have and sit tight. This does not lead to world conquest. But if they fear neither God nor man, they are fools. They will take big risks on their own behalf. They will probably lose, for most new ventures fail, but even if they succeed, they will lose. “For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?” (Mark 8:36).

God cares about His people. He may lead them into disasters, just as He led the remnant of Israel into captivity along with the sinful majority, but He brings His good work to pass in history. The captivity of the remnant had a purpose. It made their faith stronger, as we see in the case of the three young men in Nebuchadnezzar’s court. They feared God more than fire. “Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, answered and said to the king, O Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful to answer thee in this matter. If it be so, our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, and he will deliver us out of thine hand, O king. But if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up” (Dan. 3:16–18). Their testimony in the face of death led to the king’s profession of faith (Dan. 4). We remember this story, but what we can be sure of is the fact that there were other faithful Israelites in the land whose prayers and simple obedience made possible the survival of Israel in a foreign land. The three men were spectacular representatives of God who demonstrated publicly what God can do. But the day-to-day preservation of the faithful is God's conventional means of extending His kingdom. We are to honor the memory of the three young men because we need evidence of God's faithfulness to us. We are to honor the memory of Christ's bodily resurrection for the same reason. Death, the great enemy, will be progressively overcome in history (Isa. 65:17–20). "For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death" (I Cor. 15:25–26).

5. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 3.

Jesus' resurrection is at one end of the spectrum of God's protection in history. God's care for the sparrows is at the other end. We are somewhere in between, but closer to Jesus, our covenantal representative, than to the sparrows.

When we believe this, it should be easier for us to set our priorities. We are to decide what to do, not in terms of fear of the future but in terms of what benefits God's kingdom. The fear of negative sanctions from the creation is not to restrain us when we count the cost (Luke 14:28–34).⁶ Fear of man or the creation is not to be factored into these cost projections. We are not to deny the existence of risk. Risk we will always have with us. But we are to set our priorities in terms of what is best for the kingdom of God, not what is safest for us. The Book of Jonah is the premier testimony to this truth. Avoid whales.

6. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 35.

24

LIFE: LOST AND FOUND

He that findeth his life shall lose it: and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it (Matt. 10:39).

The theocentric principle here is that Jesus Christ is the Lord of life. This implies that He is also the Lord of death. The Bible tells us this specifically. “I am he that liveth, and was dead; and, behold, I am alive for evermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell and of death” (Rev. 1:18). Life and death are in Jesus Christ’s hands. This is an aspect of God’s sovereignty: point one of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Life Is the Crucial Capital Asset

Without life, we can accomplish nothing. This is why the author of Ecclesiastes wrote, “For to him that is joined to all the living there is hope: for a living dog is better than a dead lion” (Eccl. 9:4). David wrote: “What profit is there in my blood, when I go down to the pit? Shall the dust praise thee? shall it declare thy truth?” (Ps. 30:9).

Jesus announced that the man who finds his life will lose it. This is a peculiar saying. What was He getting at? To find out, we must consider the second half: “He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it.” The distinguishing feature here is the phrase, “for my sake.” The man who loses his life shall find it if he loses it for Christ’s sake. The positive sanction—gaining life—comes as a result of losing one’s life for Christ’s sake.

This implies that the discovery of life in the first half of the statement has something to do with false worship. A man thinks he has found his life on some basis other than Jesus Christ’s sovereignty. He has found life for something else's sake. Because he has worked to find life for something other than Christ's sake, he is faced with ultimate loss. He will lose his life. "For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" (Mark 8:36).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

Eternal life is also the supreme form of grace. It is God's unearned gift to man. Temporal life is analogous to eternal life, though not equally valuable in God's eyes. It is a gift of God. As with any gift in a fallen world, it can be misused. Some covenant-breaking men view temporal life as supreme. Others view life lived for the sake of a false god as supreme. This passage makes it clear that temporal life lived for Christ's sake is supreme. This implies that temporal life lived for Christ's sake is an aspect of eternal life.

In this passage, life is representative of capital. Eternal life is the supreme form of capital in history. Temporal life is next. Gold, silver, and other forms of wealth are secondary to life. This is why men will sometimes pay large sums to hospitals and physicians in the hope of extending their lives. Other things being equal, the marginal value of longer life is greater than the marginal value of assets that can be enjoyed only in life. Other things may have more value to an individual than temporal life: personal honor, personal reputation, children's inheritance. But without life, no one can enjoy the income generated by capital.

Finding life is desirable. If life is worth more than capital, then securing capital is secondary to finding life. This puts capital in its proper perspective. It is a tool of life. The individual uses capital. He seeks to attain his goals by means of capital. But if his quest for capital undermines the goal of life, meaning life lived for Christ's sake, meaning eternal life, then it is a foolish quest. Covenant-breaking men too often forget this principle. Riches usually testify against the wise judgment of those who possess great capital. "And again I say unto you, It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God" (Matt. 19:24).² There can be exceptions (v. 26), but these are rare.

By using life as the goal of the quest, Jesus invoked most men's supreme goal. So, if a man's quest for life and his seeming attainment of life lead to the loss of his life, then surely the same is true of all other goals: money, power, fame, etc. What is true of a primary quest must also be true of secondary quests.

2. Chapter 38.

B. Temporal Applications

Jesus taught clearly that eternal life and death are attained temporally. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him" (John 3:36). Life lived for Christ's sake is eternal life. Life lived for anything else's sake is eternal death, i.e., the loss of eternal life. The concern here is eternal life.

Does this have implications for temporal life? Yes. In this passage, finding life and losing life are accomplished in the present. One person believes he has found life in history. The other knows that he has lost his life in history. In other words, he has died covenantally in history. Paul wrote: "I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me" (Gal. 2:20). We are buried with Christ covenantally; therefore, we shall live with Him eternally. "Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death? Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection: Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin. For he that is dead is freed from sin. Now if we be dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with him: Knowing that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him" (Rom. 6:3–9). "Buried with him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him through the faith of the operation of God, who hath raised him from the dead" (Col. 2:12).

Our new life today is secured by Christ's definitive work in the past. Our new life is sealed by our baptism: judicial death and resurrection. We must die judicially in order to live eternally. This is what it means to lose our lives for Christ's sake. Conversely, to live by anything other than Christ's definitive work in the past is to secure eternal death. It is to affirm the sovereignty of something other than Jesus Christ. It is to hope in eternal deliverance from the torments of hell and the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14–15) on some basis other than Christ's perfect judicial work.

What was accomplished judicially in history by Christ serves as the basis of the extension of His kingdom in history. “And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen” (Matt. 28:18–20).³ This is the Great Commission. What Jesus accomplished representatively and definitively in history, His people are to manifest progressively in history. This is the meaning of the Great Commission.⁴

C. Baptism and Life

The Great Commission is given to individuals and corporate bodies, beginning with the institutional church, which alone can lawfully baptize. Covenant-keepers place themselves under its jurisdiction through baptism. Life lived for Christ is lived judicially through baptism, as Paul taught. Baptism publicly incorporates us into Christ’s life though the church.

The old dogma, “there is no salvation outside the church,” is true. The church is the incorporated body of Christ. While a redeemed person can be outside of membership in a church, this judicial status is abnormal for the believer. The sacraments are available only in and through the institutional church. Life is found only in the church. The public death of the old sinful man through baptism is the mark of the new life. We lose our lives in baptism and thereby find life. The life we find is an earnest—a down payment—on eternal life. “In whom also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will: That we should be to the praise of his glory, who first trusted in Christ. In whom ye also trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation: in whom also after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of promise, Which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of his glory” (Eph. 1:11–14).

The church is the model for other corporate endeavors. It is not based on biology, as the family is. It is based on confession. Membership is open to all confessing people, unlike the family, which is a closed institution.⁵ The unity of purpose that a shared confession establishes enhances men's efforts to achieve both their personal goals and corporate goals. Paul used the metaphor of the body to describe the interdependent life of the church (Rom. 12;⁶ I Cor. 12⁷) seventeen centuries before Adam Smith described the capital-intensive division of labor of the pin-making factory. Corporate efforts are more effective than isolated individual efforts. Without corporate structures to serve as vessels of vision, the individual's efforts are tightly circumscribed: capital constraints, insufficient skills, insufficient information, and short life expectancy. We extend God's kingdom in history through our cooperative efforts. To imagine that isolated individual efforts in spiritual affairs are equal in their effects to participation in the church is to imagine that the isolated inventor can achieve success without factory production.

3. Chapter 48.

4. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/GentryGGC>)

Conclusion

Man's top priority is service to God, not eternal life. Service to God is theocentric. Life is theocentric. Through service to God, a man demonstrates his possession of eternal life, meaning life lived for Christ's sake. By placing anything other than life lived for Christ as his top priority, a man becomes anthropocentric.

The public manifestation of the attainment of eternal life is participation in the sacraments. These are corporate marks of individual conditions. Incorporation is vital to the life of the believer. It is also vital to the extension of God's kingdom.

What is said here of life applies far more forcefully to lesser goals. He who finds his riches solely in history has lost riches in eternity. He who finds his riches in a promise of eternal inheritance gains riches in history. "But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you" (Matt. 6:33).⁸

5. Adoption is possible, but not legally mandatory.

6. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd electronic edition (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 10.

7. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 15.

8. Chapter 15.

25

LIGHTLY YOKED

Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light (Matt. 11:28–30).

The theocentric principle here is that Jesus Christ is the one who can give rest to men. The promise of rest is sabbatical. The sabbath is an aspect of point four of the biblical covenant.¹ Christ is Lord of the sabbath (Matt. 12:8).²

A. Yoke: An Inescapable Concept

The yoke is an aspect of work—specifically, for beasts of burden. The Lord of the sabbath is also Lord of work. The implication here is that Christ is Lord of the week. The lightness of His yoke is manifested by the sabbath. He who honors the weekly day of rest testifies to the lightness of the yoke in his life.

Men must work. They grow weary. They seek rest. Christ offers rest to weary men. He then calls them to bear a yoke. Christ's yoke is a means of lightening their load, of giving them rest.

How can more be less? How can adding a burden lighten a man's load? The implication here is that men are already burdened down. Specifically, they are burdened with sin. Sin exacts a heavy toll. It interferes with man's dominion. So do the results of original sin: weeds

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Pont Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 24. Cf. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Chapter 26.

and thorns (Gen. 3:17–19).³ Men labor under a curse.

This passage says that Christ's yoke is light. This is comparative. It is lighter than something else. What might that be? Another, heavier yoke. The implication is that it is not a question of yoke vs. no yoke. It is a question of whose yoke. Men cannot escape some yoke.

Masters place yokes on their work animals. Men labor under one of two masters: God or mammon (Matt. 6:24).⁴ Whose yoke is preferable? Christ's. With His yoke, men can get rest. With mammon's yoke, there is no permanent rest. The traditional phrase, "there is no rest for the wicked," reflects this biblical truth.

A yoke has several purposes. First, it trains an animal to be subservient. It reminds the animal that it is under authority. Second, it directs the animal's steps. It causes it to go where the master wants it to go. Third, it is attached to a plow or other tool. It is designed for pulling. All of these purposes are the master's.

A yoke restrains an animal. An animal finds it difficult to escape its environment. This is a benefit or a liability, depending on the treatment it receives from the master and the safety it is afforded in its environment. Whether this feature is a blessing or a curse depends on the master. The yoke makes the animal more productive. If the master does not share this increase with the animal, the animal is a loser: too much pulling, not enough food. The Mosaic law required the owner to share the wealth with his work animal. "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn" (Deut. 25:4).⁵

Christ said that His yoke is light. It is less of a burden than any rival yoke. This implies that His treatment of those under his yoke will be good. They will share in their own productivity. There is an element of restraint in wearing His yoke, but this is part of an overall process in which he benefits.

The implication is that the rival yoke—mammon's—will not provide equal benefits. The master is self-serving. He extracts more from those under his authority than Christ demands from those under His authority. Mammon is man's greed.⁶ Its yoke is burdensome.

Some people may think they are autonomous. If so, they will see Christ's yoke as an extra burden, one which they can avoid. But their

3. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

4. Chapter 14.

5. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 62.

6. Chapter 14.

assumption of autonomy is incorrect. They are under authority. They wear a yoke. They may be used to its weight. They may not perceive that it is extracting a heavy toll on them. They are operating under an illusion. They are not autonomous. Adam placed all mankind under another yoke. It can be removed only by the substitution of a lighter yoke.

A wise man recognizes the weight of his yoke. But if he has nothing to compare it with, he must make a decision based on faith. Not all men believe Christ's words, which must be taken on faith. His yoke is light. He was saying that a man's present yoke is heavy. A man can exchange a heavy yoke for a light one. But to see the advantage, he must feel the weight of his existing yoke.

Christ announced this regarding Himself: "I am meek and lowly in heart." His incarnation is proof of this statement. "Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus: Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God: But made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross" (Phil. 2:5–8).⁷ "For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich" (II Cor. 8:9). The psychological basis of Jesus Christ's victory was His humility. He subordinated Himself to God the Father and then to evil men. In doing this, He established the judicial basis of the victory of His people. As a perfect man, He achieved total victory. "Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name: That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth" (Phil. 2:9–10). We achieve an analogous moral victory in history, both definitively⁸ and progressively, and then finally at the resurrection.

B. Rest vs. Autonomy

The weary man feels the burden. He seeks rest. Christ offers rest. He tells the laborer that there is rest available on request. He tells the emotionally weary person that there is rest for the soul (v. 29). But to obtain this rest, a man must admit to himself that he really is weary. He must acknowledge that he is having trouble bearing his existing work load. For the person who is still confident that he can bear his own load, this offer has little appeal. The self-proclaimed autonomous man does not want to admit that his tasks are getting beyond his ability to deal with them. To admit this would be to admit that he is not autonomous. He is dependent. But the idea of dependence alienates some men. Even if they are willing to admit that they need some help, they are unwilling to admit that they cannot complete their work without surrendering to someone who offers rest—a complete cessation of work. Christ says, in effect, “I’ll take over from here.” But that means surrendering to someone who denies all autonomy to others.

7. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 20.

8. God imputes Christ's moral perfection to His people. See North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 2:D:2.

Christ promises rest. But this had also been promised to Israel. This is one of the themes in the Epistle to the Hebrews. “Let us therefore fear, lest, a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of you should seem to come short of it. For unto us was the gospel preached, as well as unto them: but the word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it. For we which have believed do enter into rest, as he said, As I have sworn in my wrath, if they shall enter into my rest: although the works were finished from the foundation of the world” (Heb. 4:1–3). “There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God. For he that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works, as God did from his. Let us labour therefore to enter into that rest, lest any man fall after the same example of unbelief” (vv. 9–11).

This idea is crucial: “For he that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works, as God did from his.” The man who has ceased from his own works has surrendered any claim to autonomy. A man at rest is subordinate either to God or the creation. He becomes an extension of God’s covenant or the creation. When he surrenders to his environment, he becomes passive. He goes into retirement. He is now at the mercy of others like himself, or else he is trapped by the impersonal forces of nature or society.

He who achieves rest in history has had to subordinate himself to another: God or nature. Either he has acknowledged God as the source of his rest and his success, or else he has acknowledged nature as the source of his rest and therefore his victory. Men who surrender to God can extend His dominion over the creation. Men who surrender to the creation—their environment—must end any hope of making society or nature conform to their ends. They become an extension of the creation. To this extent, they become depersonalized.

C. Dominion Through Rest

Rest in the biblical sense is not passivity. In the same epistle in which we read of rest, we also read, “Wherefore seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, Looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith; who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God” (Heb. 12:1–2). It is the ascended Christ who offers rest to His people. Subordinate to the author of rest, they can work without the heavy burden of fear of failure. This takes considerable faith—the same faith that announces that Christ’s yoke is light. Jesus is the author and finisher of our faith. He can make both promises: rest and a light yoke.

Rest is an attitude based on a confession of faith: “I am empowered by a sovereign God to do my work. I can count on Him to bring it to fruition.” Put another way, “I have planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase. So then neither is he that planteth any thing, neither he that watereth; but God that giveth the increase” (I Cor. 3:6–7). It is the great sin of autonomy to deny the validity of this confession. “Religion is a crutch,” we are told. But a crutch is a wonderful tool for a one-legged man. He who refuses to admit his condition as a man with one leg must do without a crutch. In a world of two-legged men, he appears foolish. In a world of one-legged men who hop hither and yon, he appears normal. Sinners are one-legged people.

The mental attitude of rest requires either foolishness or else faith and self-discipline. One of the marks of the covenant-keeper with this attitude of rest is sabbath-keeping. A man who believes in Christ’s promise of rest knows he can afford to rest one day in seven. God is fully in control. God has told man to rest one day in seven, so man can safely do this. He will not lose anything of value by resting. A sovereign God who is the source of every blessing⁹ will not let His followers suffer a loss because they exercise their prerogative and rest. They testify to their faith in the ultimate rest beyond history by resting one day in seven.

9. “Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning” (James 1:17).

This cessation of Christians' dominion efforts one day in seven does not set back the kingdom of God. On the contrary, sabbatical rest extends it. Men are strengthened by resting. So are domesticated work animals. They can achieve more.

Conclusion

The top priority here is to accept Christ's victory in history as our own. This is our starting point for dominion, both personal and corporate. His victory in history is behind us: the resurrection. So is His victory over history: the ascension. His ascension has empowered His church. He told the apostles just before His ascension: "But ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you: and ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judaea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth" (Acts 1:8).

We can have confidence in our work because Christ's victory was definitive: complete and finished. We can extend His kingdom in history because He achieved complete victory in the past. We can rest emotionally because He is sovereign over history. We can safely rest one day in seven because He has commanded it. This sabbatical rest is a mark of the lightness of Christ's yoke. We are to acknowledge the lightness of this yoke by turning over to God our cares about the outcome of our labors. Sabbath rest is visible evidence of this confidence.

OPEN FIELDS AT HARVEST TIME

At that time Jesus went on the sabbath day through the corn; and his disciples were an hungred, and began to pluck the ears of corn, and to eat. But when the Pharisees saw it, they said unto him, Behold, thy disciples do that which is not lawful to do upon the sabbath day (Matt. 12:1–2).

The theocentric principle of this passage is stated clearly a few verses later: “For the Son of man is Lord even of the sabbath day” (Matt. 12:8). It is God and God’s work that govern the sabbath and its judicial applications. The sabbath is an aspect of point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Common Property

The Pharisees did not criticize the disciples for stealing. The Mosaic law exempted this activity from the laws of theft. “When thou comest into thy neighbour’s vineyard, then thou mayest eat grapes thy fill at thine own pleasure; but thou shalt not put any in thy vessel. When thou comest into the standing corn of thy neighbour, then thou mayest pluck the ears with thine hand; but thou shalt not move a sickle unto thy neighbour’s standing corn” (Deut. 23:24–25).

Because of the importance of this passage for a correct understanding of the Bible’s view of private property, I am reprinting Chapter 58 of my commentary on Deuteronomy. Some readers may not have access to that book. I have reprinted the entire chapter.

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 24. Cf. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

The theocentric principle undergirding this law is that God, as the owner of the creation, has the exclusive right to specify the terms of the leases which He offers to his stewards. His rural leasehold's contract announced to the land owner: "You do not possess absolute sovereignty over this land. Your neighbor has the right to pick a handful of grain or grapes from this field. Your right to exclude others by law or force is limited." In this sense, God delegated to a farmer's neighbors the right to enforce God's claim of exclusive control over a symbolic portion of every field. The land owner could not lawfully exclude God's delegated representatives from access to his crops. The fact that he could not lawfully exclude them testified to his lack of absolute sovereignty over his property.

In the garden of Eden, God placed a judicial boundary around one tree. This boundary was there to remind Adam that he could not legitimately assert control over the entire garden. Over most of it, Adam did exercise full authority. But over one small part, he did not. It was off-limits to him. Adam's acceptance of this limitation on his authority was basic to his continued residence in the garden. More than this: it was basic to his life. God interacted with man on a face-to-face basis in the garden. He no longer deals with man in this way. Instead, God has established a system of representative authority that substitutes for a verbal "no trespassing" sign around a designated tree. The neighbor is God's agent who comes into another man's field and announces, in effect: "This does not belong exclusively to you. As the original owner, God has a valid legal claim on it. So do I, as God's agent."

In this text, God forbade land owners from excluding visitors from their fields. A visitor had the right to pick something to eat during the harvest season. He lawfully reaped the fruits of another person's land, labor, and capital. The legal boundaries that delineated the ownership of a field did not restrict access by the visitor. The visitor had a legal claim on a small portion of the harvest. He had to appear in person to collect this portion. Put a different way, outsiders were co-owners of a portion of every field's pickable crop.

One question that I deal with later in this chapter is whether this law was a cross-boundary law rather than a seed law or land law.² If it was a cross-boundary law, then God was making this law universal in its jurisdiction. He was announcing this system of land tenure in His capacity as the owner of the whole earth, not just as the owner of the Promised Land.

2. On the difference, see Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), Conclusion:C.

B. Exclusion by Conquest

The Israelites were about to inherit the Promised Land through military conquest. Their forthcoming inheritance would be based on the disinheritance of the Canaanites. The specified means of this transfer of ownership was to be genocide. It was not merely that the Canaanites were to be excluded from the land; they were to be excluded from history. More to the point, theologically speaking, their gods were to be excluded from history (Josh. 23:5–7).

The Israelites would soon enjoy a military victory after a generation of miraculous wandering in the wilderness (Deut. 8:4). There could be no legitimate doubt in the future that God had arranged this transfer of the inheritance. He was therefore the land's original owner. They would henceforth hold their land as sharecroppers: 10% of the net increase in the crop was to go to God through the Levitical priesthood. This was Levi's inheritance, which the tribe held in lieu of rural land (Num. 18:21).³

Before the conquest began, God placed certain restrictions on the use of His holy land: the formal terms of the lease. As the owner of both the land and the people who occupied it, God's restrictions were designed to protect the long-term productivity of His assets. Yet He imposed these laws for their sakes, too. Land-owning Israelites had to rest the land every seventh year (Lev. 25:4).⁴ They had to allow poverty-stricken gleaners to come onto their land and pick up the leftovers of the crops (Lev. 19:9–10;⁵ 23:22;⁶ Deut. 24:21⁷). This passage further erased the legal boundary between the land's owners and non-owners. Whatever a neighbor could pick and hold in his hands was his to take prior to the harvest. He had legal title to this share of his neighbor's crop. It did not belong to the land owner. Ownership of land, seeds,

3. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 10.

4. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 24.

5. Ibid., ch. 11.

6. Ibid., ch. 22.

7. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 62.

and prior labor did not entitle him to that portion of the crop which a neighbor could pick and hold in his hands. That is, his prior investment was not the legal basis of his ownership. The conquest of Canaan was the legal basis of Israel's rural land ownership.

Legal title in Israel had nothing to do with some hypothetical original owner who had gained legal title because he had mixed his labor with unowned land—John Locke's theory of original ownership.⁸ There had once been Canaanites in the land, whose legal title was visibly overturned by the conquest. The Canaanites were to be disinherited, Moses announced. They would not be allowed to inherit, because they could not lawfully be neighbors. The conquest's dispossession of the gods of Canaan definitively overturned any theory of private ownership that rested on a story of man's original ownership based on his own labor. The kingdom grant preceded any man's work. The promise preceded the inheritance. In short, grace precedes law.

The neighbor in Mosaic Israel was a legal participant in the kingdom grant. He lived under the authority of God. His presence in the land helped to extend the kingdom in history. The land was being subdued by men who were willing to work under God's law. The exclusion of the Canaanites had been followed by the inclusion of the Israelites and even resident aliens. Canaan was more than Canaanites. It was also the land. The conquest of Canaan was more than a one-time military victory; it was a process. The fruits of the land belonged to all residents in the land. The bulk of these fruits belonged to land owners, but not all of the fruits.

In this sense, the resident alien who owned no land but who had legal access to the land was analogous to the beast that was employed to plow the land. "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn" (Deut. 25:4).⁹ Although the neighbor was not employed by the land owner, he was part of the overall dominion process inside Israel. The fact that God had included him inside Canaan made it more difficult for those who served other gods to occupy the land. A man's access to the courts and to the fruits of the field gave him a stake in the land, something worth defending. Israel was no pluralistic democracy. It was a theocracy. No law but God's could lawfully be enforced by the state. Only God's name could be lawfully invoked publicly inside Israel's boundaries (Ex. 23:13; Deut. 18:20). By remaining inside the land, a resident alien was publicly acknowledging his allegiance to Israel's God rather than to another god. He was acknowledging God's legal claim on him. God in turn gave him a legal claim on a small portion of the output of the land.

8. John Locke, On Civil Government: Second Treatise (1690), section 27.

9. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 62.

C. Jesus and the Corn (Grain)

Verse 25 is the partial background for one of Jesus' more perplexing confrontations with the Pharisees.

And it came to pass on the second sabbath after the first, that he went through the corn fields; and his disciples plucked the ears of corn, and did eat, rubbing them in their hands. And certain of the Pharisees said unto them, Why do ye that which is not lawful to do on the sabbath days? And Jesus answering them said, Have ye not read so much as this, what David did, when himself was an hungred, and they which were with him; How he went into the house of God, and did take and eat the shewbread, and gave also to them that were with him; which it is not lawful to eat but for the priests alone? And he said unto them, That the Son of man is Lord also of the sabbath (Luke 6:1–5).

The Pharisees did not accuse the disciples of theft; rather, they accused the disciples of not keeping the sabbath. Had the disciples been guilty of theft, their critics would have taken advantage of this opportunity to embarrass Jesus through His disciples' actions, which the disciples had done right in front of Him. The reason why they did not accuse the disciples of theft was that in terms of the Mosaic law, the disciples had not committed theft. Their infraction, according to the Pharisees, was picking grain on the sabbath. Picking grain was a form of work.

Jesus' response was to cite an obscure Old Testament incident: David's confiscation of the showbread. The circumstances surrounding that incident are even more perplexing to the commentators than Jesus' walk through the field. David was fleeing from Saul. To gain five loaves of bread—surely not a life-and-death supply for a band of men¹⁰—David lied to a priest and confiscated the showbread, which was always to be on the table of the Lord (Ex. 25:30).

Then came David to Nob to Ahimelech the priest: and Ahimelech

10. There was not enough bread to save their lives from starvation. These loaves were not, in and of themselves, crucial for David's survival. But as one meal among many, the bread was part of a program of survival. These loaves might not be the last ones confiscated by David.

was afraid at the meeting of David, and said unto him, Why art thou alone, and no man with thee? And David said unto Ahimelech the priest, The king hath commanded me a business, and hath said unto me, Let no man know any thing of the business whereabout I send thee, and what I have commanded thee: and I have appointed my servants to such and such a place. Now therefore what is under thine hand? give me five loaves of bread in mine hand, or what there is present. And the priest answered David, and said, There is no common bread under mine hand, but there is hallowed bread; if the young men have kept themselves at least from women. And David answered the priest, and said unto him, Of a truth women have been kept from us about these three days, since I came out, and the vessels of the young men are holy, and the bread is in a manner common, yea, though it were sanctified this day in the vessel. So the priest gave him hallowed bread: for there was no bread there but the shewbread, that was taken from before the LORD, to put hot bread in the day when it was taken away (I Sam. 21:1–6).

Jesus was implying that David had not done anything wrong in this incident, either by lying to a priest about his mission or by taking what belonged to God. David invoked the status of his men as holy warriors on the king's official business, which was why the priest raised the issue of their contact with women. David's answer—they had had no contact with women for three days—pointed back to the three days of abstinence prior to the giving of the law at Sinai (Ex. 19:15). David, as God's anointed heir of the throne of Israel (I Sam. 16), possessed kingly authority. Jonathan, Saul's formally lawful heir, had just re-confirmed his inheritance-transferring oath with David (I Sam. 20:42).¹¹ Because of this oath, David had the authority to lie to a priest and to take the showbread for himself and his men, even though Saul was still on the throne. To preserve his life, and therefore his God-designated inheritance, David acted lawfully. David acted as Jacob had acted when he tricked Isaac into giving him the blessing which was lawfully his by revelation and voluntary transfer by Esau (Gen. 27).¹²

The priest told David that there was no common bread available. This indicates that this was a sabbath day: no cooking. There was no fresh bread or hot bread, which was why the showbread was still there: it had not been replaced by hot bread. So, David asked for holy bread on a sabbath. There was no question about it: he was asking for holy

11. The original covenant had been marked by Jonathan's gift of his robe to David, symbolizing the robe of authority, as well as his sword (I Sam. 18:3–4).

12. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 28.

bread on a holy day in the name of the king. The priest gave it to him. On what legal basis? The text does not say, but David's invoking of Saul's authority indicates that a man on a king's mission possessed lawful authority to receive bread set aside for God if there was no other bread available. God had said, "thou shalt set upon the table shewbread before me alway" (Ex. 25:30). But this situation was an exception which the priest acknowledged as valid. The desire of the king's men superseded this ritual requirement. There was no Mosaic law authorizing this legal principle, yet the priest accepted David's explanation, and so did Jesus. So did His critics, who did not reply. David, as the anointed future king, fed himself and his men on holy bread, based on their need to escape the wrath of the present corrupt king over Israel. Jesus, as the lawful king of Israel, allowed his men to feed themselves on the sabbath, despite the hostility of the present religious rulers, who were allied to a pagan king, Caesar. "But they cried out, Away with him, away with him, crucify him. Pilate saith unto them, Shall I crucify your King? The chief priests answered, We have no king but Caesar" (John 19:15). Because of this, within a generation, there would be neither showbread nor temple.

Unlike Calvinist commentators,¹³ the Pharisees did not criticize David's actions. Jesus cited this incident in defense of His own actions. He was thereby declaring His own kingly authority. As surely as David's anointing by Samuel on God's behalf had authorized him to deceive a priest and take the showbread on the sabbath, so had the Holy Spirit's anointing of Jesus authorized Him to have His disciples pick grain on the sabbath. As surely as the king's men were authorized to eat the showbread on the sabbath, so were Christ's disciples author-

13. Puritan commentator Matthew Poole called David's lie to the priest a "plain lie." A Commentary on the Holy Bible, 3 vols. (London: Banner of Truth Trust, [1683] 1962), I, p. 565. John Gill, a Calvinistic Baptist and master of rabbinic literature, referred to David's lie as a "downright lie, and was aggravated by its being told only for the sake of getting a little food; and especially to a high priest, and at the tabernacle of God. . . . This shows the weakness of the best men, when left to themselves. . . ." John Gill, An Exposition of the Old Testament, 4 vols. (London: William Hill Collingridge, [1764] 1853), II, pp. 196–97. Neither commentator criticized David for taking the showbread on the sabbath, which was the judicial heart of the matter. Christ sanctioned this action retroactively, which puts Christian commentators in a bind. So, they focus instead on David's lie, just as commentators focus on Rahab's lie, while refusing to raise their voices in protest against the significant ethical issue: her treason. This is a common blindness among pietistic commentators: straining at ethical gnats and swallowing what appear to be ethical camels. Cf. Gary North, "In Defense of Biblical Bribery," in R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), especially pp. 838–42.

ized to eat newly picked grain on the sabbath. Jesus then took the matter a step further: He announced that He was Lord of the Mosaic sabbath. This meant that He was announcing more than kingly authority. He was declaring His messianic heirship at this point: the son of man, Lord of the Mosaic sabbath. If David, as the prophetically anointed but not-yet publicly sanctioned king of Israel, had possessed temporary authority over a priest for the sake of his lawful inheritance of the throne, far more did Jesus Christ, as messianic heir of the kingdom of God, possess authority over the sabbath in Israel.

One thing is certain: the judicial issue was not grain-stealing.

D. A Foretaste of Bread and Wine

The visitor eats grapes in the vineyard, but he cannot lawfully carry them off his neighbor's property. He cannot make wine with what he eats. Neither can two hands full of grain make bread. This case law does not open a neighbor's field to all those who seek a finished meal. A free sample of the raw materials of such a meal is offered to visitors, but not the feast itself. This is not a harvest in preparation for a feast; it is merely a symbol of a feast to come. To prepare a feast, productive and successful people must bring to the kitchen sufficient fruits of the field. The full blessings of God are displayed at a feast. This case law does not offer a feast to the visitor. It offers a full stomach to a person walking in a field, but not a feast in a home or communion hall. It offers sufficient food to a hungry man to quiet the rumblings of his stomach, but it does not provide the means of celebration. It offers a token of a future feast. It is symbolic of blessings to come, a down payment or earnest of a future feast.

Grapes and grain point to the sacramental nature of the coming feast: a communion meal. The two crops singled out in this law are corn (grain) and grapes. The fact that these two crops are the raw materials for bread and wine is not some random aspect of this case law. This law pointed forward to the communion feast of the New Covenant. The Mosaic Covenant was, in effect, the grain and grapes that pointed forward to the New Covenant's bread and wine. The New Covenant's bread and wine in turn point forward to the marriage supper of the lamb (Rev. 19:9). The communion table of God brings together people of a common confession and a common community who look forward to the eschatological consummation of the kingdom of God in history at the end of time. So it was also in Mosaic Israel. The eschatological aspect of the Book of Deuteronomy, as the Pentateuch's book of the inheritance, provides a framework for interpreting this case law.

God gives to every man in history a foretaste of a holy meal to come: common grace. Not every man accepts God's invitation. Not every man is given access to God's table, either in history or eternity. The fellowship of God is closed to outsiders by means of a common confession that restricts strangers from lawful access to the table. But a free foretaste of the bounty of God's table at the consummate marriage supper of the Lamb is given to all those who walk in the open field and pick a handful of grain. A handful of this bounty is the common blessing of all mankind. This is the doctrine of common grace.¹⁴

The visitor is not allowed to bring a vessel to gather up the bounty of his neighbor's field. Neither is the covenant-breaker allowed access to the Lord's Supper. The visitor is allowed access to the makings of bread and wine. Similarly, the covenant-breaker is allowed into the church to hear the message of redemption. He may gain great benefits from his presence in the congregation, or he may leave spiritually unfed. So it is with the visitor in the field. "I take no man's charity," says one visitor to a field. "Religion is a crutch," says a visitor to a church.¹⁵ Such a willful rejection of either blessing indicates a spirit of autonomy, a lack of community spirit, and a lack of a shared environment.

E. Neighborhood and Neighborliness

Grapes and grain remain ripe enough to eat in the field only for relatively short periods of time. Either they are not yet ripe or they have just been harvested. The neighbor in Israel was not allowed to bring a vessel to carry away the produce. The presumption was that the neighbor was visiting, became hungry, and ate his fill right there in the field. This is what Jesus' disciples did. The neighbor, unless very hungry, did not walk over to the neighbor's house three times a day to get a quick meal. He had his own crop to harvest. If he was landless, he might come into a field and eat. He could even bring his family. The landless person would have gained access to free food, but only briefly, during the harvest season.

The two crops explicitly eligible for picking were above-ground

14. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

15. A good reason for not passing a collection plate in church is that visitors may believe that a token payment will pay for "services rendered." So, for that matter, may non-tithing members.

crops. This law did not authorize someone to dig a root crop out of the ground. The eligible food was there, as we say in English, “for the picking.” Were these two crops symbolic for all picked crops, or did the law authorize only grapes and grain? I think the two crops were symbols of every crop that might appear on the table of a feast. This would have included fruit trees, vine-grown berries, but almost no bread grains. This meant that the hungry neighbor had a limited range of crops at his disposal.

If he was also a local farmer, then his own crop was similarly exposed. His concerted effort to harm a neighbor by a misuse of this law would have exposed him to a tit-for-tat response. If he used this law as a weapon, it could be used against him as a weapon.

Who was the neighbor? The Hebrew word, rayah, is most commonly used to describe a close friend or someone in the neighborhood. “Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour’s house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbour’s wife, nor his manservant, nor his maidservant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor any thing that is thy neighbour’s” (Ex. 20:17).¹⁶ It can be translated as “friend.” “If thy brother, the son of thy mother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend, which is as thine own soul, entice thee secretly, saying, Let us go and serve other gods, which thou hast not known, thou, nor thy fathers” (Deut. 13:6). It was a next-door neighbor: “Thou shalt not remove thy neighbour’s landmark, which they of old time have set in thine inheritance, which thou shalt inherit in the land that the LORD thy God giveth thee to possess it” (Deut. 19:14).¹⁷

But did it always mean this? In Jesus’ answer to this question by the clever lawyer, He used the story of the Samaritan on a journey through Israel who helped a beaten man, in contrast to the priest and the Levite who ignored him (Luke 10).¹⁸ Jesus was arguing that ethics, not friendship, confession, or place of residence, defines the true neighbor. The Samaritan was the injured man’s true neighbor because he helped him in his time of need. The lawyer did not disagree with Jesus’ assessment. He understood that this interpretation was consistent with the intent of the Mosaic law. This means that a law-abiding man on the road in Mosaic Israel was a neighbor. The crop owner had to treat a man on a journey as if he were a local resident. This included 16. Gary North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 30.

17. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 43.

18. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 22.

even a foreigner.

The Greek word used to translate rayah in the Septuagint Greek translation of the Old Testament is pleision, which means “near, close by.”¹⁹ This indicates that the Jewish translators regarded the neighbor as a local resident. The neighbor was statistically most likely to be a fellow member of the tribe. Rural land could not be sold permanently. It could not be alienated: sold to an alien. The jubilee law regulated the inheritance of rural land (Lev. 25).²⁰ This means that the neighbor in Mosaic Israel was statistically likely a permanent resident of the community.

Nevertheless, this law opened the fields to people on a journey, just as the Samaritan was on a journey. As surely as the Samaritan was the injured man’s neighbor, so was the land owner the hungry traveler’s neighbor. This law was a reminder to the Israelites that God had been neighborly to them in their time of need. After the exile, such permanent geographical boundaries were maintained only if the occupying foreign army so decided. Jesus walked through the field under Rome’s civil authority, not Israel’s.

Why would God have designated these two above-ground crops as open to neighborly picking? This law made neighbors co-owners of the fruits of a man’s land, labor, and capital. The land owner was legally unable to protect his wealth from the grasping hands of non-owners. He was left without legal recourse. Why? What judicial principle undergirded this case law? What benefit to the community did this law bring which offset the negative effects of a limitation of the protection of private property? To answer this accurately, we must first determine whether this case law was a temporary law governing only Mosaic Israel or a permanent legal statute.

F. Seed Laws and Land Laws

Seed laws and land laws were temporary statutes that applied only to Mosaic Israel. I have argued previously that the seed laws of the Mosaic Covenant were tied to Jacob’s messianic prophecy regarding Judah: “The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be” (Gen. 49:10). Seed laws and land laws served as

19. Walter Bauer, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, trans. William F. Arndt and F. Wilbur Gingrich (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1957), p. 678.

20. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 24.

means of separating the tribes, thereby maintaining the continuity of each tribe until the fulfillment of Jacob's prophecy, which rested on tribal separation.²¹ The jubilee inheritance laws were land laws that were designed by God to accomplish this task.

One aspect of tribal separation was the creation of a sense of unity and participation in a larger family unit. Members of each tribe were linked together as descendants of one of the patriarchs. There was an aspect of brotherliness within a tribe that was not shared across the tribe's boundaries. There is a social distinction between brotherhood and otherhood. Boundaries mark this distinction. The main boundary for Israel was circumcision, but tribal boundaries also had their separating and unifying effects.

By allowing the neighbor to pick mature fruit, the Mosaic law encouraged a sense of mutual solidarity. The local resident was entitled to reap the rewards of land and labor. The land belonged ultimately to God. It was a holy land, set apart by God for his historical purposes. To dwell in the land involved benefits and costs. One of the benefits was open access to free food, however temporary. The staff of life in effect was free. In harvest season, men in Israel would not die of starvation. But their source of sustenance was local: their neighbor's field. Would this have created animosity? Sometimes. Everything in a fallen world is capable of creating animosity. But what about the owner's sense of justice? It was his land, his effort, and his seeds that had made this wealth possible. Why should another man have lawful access to the fruits of his labor?

One possible answer ties this law to the Promised Land. Israel was a holy land that had been set aside by God through a program of partial genocide. (God had specified total genocide,²² but the Israelites had failed.) The land was exclusively God's. It was His dwelling place. He fed His people on His land. God, not their own efforts, was the source of their wealth (Deut. 8:17).²³ Israel's holy status was still true in Jesus' day because of the temple and its sacrifices. But there is a problem with this explanation: strangers in Jesus' day dwelled in the land, and in fact ruled over the land. Furthermore, Jesus identified the Good Samaritan as a neighbor. The Samaritan therefore would have qualified as a man with lawful access to an Israelite's field. The Promised Land fails as the basis of this case law.

21. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 11, Conclusion; ch. 17:C; ch. 33:A; Conclusion:C:1.

22. "And when the LORD thy God shall deliver them before thee; thou shalt smite them, and utterly destroy them; thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor shew mercy unto them" (Deut. 7:2).

23. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 21.

A second possible explanation is this: the tribes existed in order to complete God's plan for Israel. Local solidarity was important for maintaining the continuity of the tribes. Problem: this law was still in force in Jesus' day, yet the tribes no longer occupied the land as separate tribal units. The seed laws in this instance seem to have nothing to do with this case law.

Third, it could be argued that Israel was a holy army. An army does not operate in terms of the free market's principle of "high bid wins." In every military conflict in which a city is besieged, martial law replaces market contracts as the basis of feeding the population. The free market's principle of high bid wins is replaced by food rationing. Solidarity during wartime must not be undermined by a loss of morale. A nation's defenders are not all rich. The closer we get to the priestly function of ensuring life, the less applicable market pricing becomes. Problem: Israel was not a holy army after the exile. It was an occupied nation. Yet this case law was still in force. There was no discontinuity in this case between the Mosaic Covenant and the post-exile covenant.

G. The Farmer and the Grocer

The Mosaic law authorized a neighbor to pick grapes or grain from another man's field. It did not authorize a man to pick up a free piece of fruit from a grocer's table. What is the difference? What underlying moral or organizational principle enables us to distinguish between the two acts? In both cases, the "picker" wanted to eat a piece of fruit for free. He was not allowed to do this in the second case.

Let us consider the economic aspects of this law. Both the farmer and the grocer sought a positive return on their investments. The farmer planted seeds in the ground, nurtured the seedlings, and sold the crop to someone, possibly the grocer or his economic agent. The grocer made his money by purchasing a crop in bulk from the farmer or his economic agent, transporting it to a central location, and displaying it in a way pleasing to buyers. What was the differentiating factor? Time? Soil? Location? Money?

The difference seems to have been this: control over rural land. The farmer in Mosaic Israel worked the land. He cared for it directly. The grocer did not. The farmer profited directly from the output of this land. The grocer profited indirectly. The farmer had a unique stake in the land itself. The grocer did so only indirectly, insofar as food that was imported from abroad was much more expensive for him to buy, except in Mediterranean coastal areas and regions close to the borders of the nation. The distinction between grocers and land owners may also have had something to do with the jubilee land laws.²⁴ Rural land was governed by the jubilee law. Urban real estate was not. Unlike urban land, prior to the exile, rural land was the exclusive property of the heirs of the conquest, though not after the return (Ezek. 47:22–23).²⁵

Those who lived on the land and profited from it as farmers were required to share a portion of the land's productivity with others, as we have seen. To this extent, the fruit of the land was the inheritance of those who dwelled close by or who wandered by on a journey when the crop was ripe.²⁶ In this case, those farmers whose land was located close to highways would have had lower transportation costs but higher sharing costs. It is not hard to imagine that highway properties would have been ideal locations for general stores. Their agricultural produce was not subject to picking. For farmers whose inheritance bordered on highways, setting up a general store would have made good sense. During the feast of firstfruits, they at least could have sold other items, such as wine, to accompany a free handful of grain. They could also have planted only root crops, which were not eligible for picking.

This law would have strengthened the sense of community in a society that was bound by a national covenant that was tied to land. Travel would have been less costly in harvest time. Also, the local poor would have had something to eat in the harvest—a sense of participation in the blessings of God. A brief safety net was in place. To gain access to a full safety net—a lawful bag in which to put the picked produce—the poor had to work as gleaners.²⁷ While the state was not authorized to send crop collectors into the fields to collect food to redis-

24. As I shall argue below, I do not think this was covenantally relevant: "Has This Law Been Annulled?"

25. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 23.

26. Passover was a pre-harvest feast. Booths (Ingathering/Tabernacles) was post-harvest. So, free produce would rarely have been on the vine or stalk when these two great marches took place. Pentecost was the time of firstfruits (Ex. 23:16). Any farmer who had not yet harvested his crop would have had to share it with travellers to the firstfruits festival.

27. North, Boundaries and Dominion, chaps. 11, 22.

tribute to the poor, the Mosaic civil law did not enforce sanctions against those who came into a field to eat a handful of food. It was not legal for land owners to enforce physical sanctions against those who took advantage of this law. The civil law did not compel wealth redistribution in Mosaic Israel, but it defined the land owner's property rights in such a way that the state was prohibited from bringing negative sanctions against those people who picked a handful of the crop.

H. A Shared Environment

Let us consider a difficult application of this case law. Did this law open every man's fields to wandering hordes during a famine? Times of famine have been times of great disruption of the social order. Wandering bands of hungry people fan out across the countryside. Whole populations move from region to region in search of food.²⁸ This happened repeatedly in Europe from the late medieval era until the late seventeenth century, and well into the twentieth century in Russia.²⁹ Similar famines have occurred in China in modern times.³⁰ Before the advent of modern capitalism, famine was a regular occurrence. Even within capitalist society, Ireland suffered a nearly decade-long famine in the 1840s. The absentee landlords in England did not foresee the threat to the potato crop posed by the blight at its first appearance in 1841. Over the next decade, these landlords paid for their lack of foresight with huge capital losses; a million Irish paid with their lives.

Are wandering strangers in search of food the judicial equivalent of a neighbor? Is a desperate family on the road in search of food entitled fill their stomachs with a farmer's corn or apples? If enough of these people were to show up at harvest time, their economic effect would be comparable to a swarm of locusts. Locusts in the Bible are seen as the judgment of God (Ex. 10:4–6; Deut. 28:38). The land owner planted a crop and cared for it in the expectation that his family would eat for another season. Was he now required to sit idly by and watch strangers consume his family's future? Was the state prohibited by this case law from defending his interests? If so, then what would be his incentive to go to the expense of planting and nurturing his next crop? Would he even survive to plant again? Was Israel's society benefitted

28. For historical examples, see Pitirim A. Sorokin, Man and Society in Calamity (New York: Dutton, 1942), pp. 107–109.

29. For a list of dozens of these famines, see ibid., p. 132.

30. Pearl S. Buck's novel, The Good Earth (1931), tells this story.

by opening the fields to all comers in every economic situation? Was the nation's future agricultural output threatened by a definition of "neighbor" that includes an open-ended number of strangers in search of free food?

The goal of this law was the preservation of community. Its context was a local neighborhood in which families share the same environment. A crop failure for one family was probably accompanied by a crop failure for all. They were all in the same boat. Mutual aid and comfort in times of adversity were likely in a community in which every person had a symbolic stake in the community's success. These people shared a common destiny. This law was an aspect of that common destiny.

As for the Samaritan in the parable, he was not on the road for the purpose of stripping fields along the way. The Samaritan assisted the beaten man; he did not eat the last grape on the man's vine. The Samaritan found an injured man on the road. They had both been on a journey. They shared a similar environment. They were both subject to the risks of travel. The threat of robbery threatened all men walking down that road. What had befallen the victim might have befallen the Samaritan. It might yet befall him. Perhaps the same band of robbers was still in the "neighborhood": the road to Jericho.

Men who share a common environment share common risks. When men who share common risks are voluntarily bound by a shared ethical system to help each other in bad times, a kind of social insurance policy goes into effect. Risks are pooled. The costs that would otherwise befall a victim are reduced by men's willingness to defray part of each other's burdens. But, unlike an insurance policy, there is no formal agreement, nor does the victim have any legal claim on the non-victim. The beaten man had no legal claim on the Samaritan, the Levite, or the priest. Two of the three went their way. They broke no civil law, but their act of deliberately passing by on the other side of the road revealed their lack of commitment to the principle of community: shared burdens and blessings.

The ethics of neighborliness is mutual sharing when the resources are available. The ethics of neighborliness did not mandate that the state remain inactive when hordes of men whose only goal is obtaining food sweep down on a rural community. The harvest was shared locally because men have struggled with the same obstacles to produce it. This law assumed a context of mutual obligations, not the asymmetric conditions in a famine, when the producers face an invasion from outside the community by those who did not share in the productive effort.

I. Community and Economy

One of the favorite contrasts of sociologists is community vs. economy. The most famous example of this in sociological literature is Ferdinand Tönnies' Gemeinschaft und Gesellschaft (1887), which he wrote at age 32. In this pioneering work, the author contrasted the small, medieval-type village with the modern city. He argued that the demise of the personal relationships of village life has led to the impersonal rationalism and calculation of the modern city.³¹ He used the now-familiar metaphors of organic life and mechanical structure to describe these two forms of human association.³² He viewed the family as the model or ideal type of Gemeinschaft.³³ The business firm, which is a voluntary association established for a limited, rational purpose (profit), would seem to serve well as a model for Gesellschaft.

In American history, there have been few defenders of Gemeinschaft. Thomas Jefferson heralded the independent yeoman farmer, but Jefferson was no advocate of village life. A group of intellectuals and poets known as the Nashville agrarians in 1930 wrote a brief defense of southern agrarian life in contrast to modern urbanism, but they have had no influence and have long been regarded at best as regional utopians, even in the South.³⁴ Karl Marx and Frederick Engels were contemptuous of "the idiocy of rural life,"³⁵ and most social commentators have agreed with them. Most social commentators have been urban.

The movement of vast populations from the farms to cities has been a continuing phenomenon worldwide, beginning no later than the Industrial Revolution in the late eighteenth century. The advanced division of labor, which was made possible by close contact in urban

31. He did not argue, as Marx and other sociologists and economists have argued, that it was the rise of capitalism that undermined the village life. Robert A. Nisbet, The Sociological Tradition (New York: Basic Books, 1966), p. 78.

32. Ferdinand Tönnies, Community & Society (Gemeinschaft und Gesellschaft) (New York: Harper Torchbooks, [1887] 1957), pp. 33–37.

33. Nisbet, Sociological Tradition, p. 75.

34. I'll Take My Stand: The South and the Agrarian Tradition (Baton Rouge: University of Louisiana Press, [1930] 1977). Cf. Alexander Karanikas, Tillers of a Myth: Southern Agrarians as Social and Literary Critics (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1966).

35. Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Manifesto of the Communist Party (1848), in Collected Works (New York: International Publishers, 1976), 6, p. 488.

areas, the transportation revolution, the mechanization of agriculture, the revolution in electrical power, and government-funded road systems and water systems have combined to concentrate populations in vast urban complexes. The modern world is unquestionably an urban civilization.

The Bible promotes both cultures. The farms of Israel were held together as a civilization by the Ark of the Covenant, which was housed in a city. The New Heaven and New Earth is described as a city in which the tree of life grows (Rev. 22:2). In the Old Covenant, the city was supported by the farms. In the New Covenant's imagery of the final state, the image is different: the city contains the tree. The tree feeds the inhabitants. The symbolism seems to be from farm to city. This was also the thrust of the jubilee legislation: ever-smaller farms for an ever-growing population.³⁶ Yet, covenantally, an heir of the conquest always had his historical roots in the land. The land was his inheritance. His name was associated with the land.

This judicial link to the soil ended with the New Covenant. The land ceased to be a holy place after the fall of Jerusalem. But the imagery of the tree of life, like the imagery of bread and wine, ties members of the New Covenant community to the soil. The preference of suburban Americans for carefully mowed lawns, of Englishmen and Japanese for gardens, of the Swiss and Austrians for flowers growing in window gardens and for vegetable gardens all testify to man's desire to retain his links to the soil from which he came.

There is a story told about the German free market economist Wilhelm Röpke. He was living in Geneva at the time. He invited another free market economist (said by some to be Ludwig von Mises) to his home near Geneva. He kept a vegetable garden plot near his home. The visitor remarked that this was an inefficient way to produce food. He countered that it was an efficient way to produce happiness.³⁷

The division of labor is a powerful social arrangement. Specialization increases our economic output as individuals. We can earn more money per hour by specializing than by performing low division of labor tasks. But we also increase our dependence on the social institutions that have promoted the division of labor. Above all, we increase 36. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 24:G.

37. Russell Kirk says that Röpke said it was Mises. In 1975, I heard the same story from another economist, Röpke's translator, Patrick Boarman. I do not recall that Mises was the target of the remark, but he may have been. See Kirk's 1992 Foreword to Wilhelm Röpke, The Social Crisis of Our Time (New Brunswick, New Jersey: Transaction, [1942] 1992), p. ix.

our reliance on banks, transportation systems, and other arrangements run by computers. We have delivered our lives into the hands and minds of computer programmers. The payments system is governed by fractional reserve banking. This is risky. There is an economic case for investing in a lower division of labor lifestyle with a portion of our assets and our time.

There is more to community than efficiency. Community is more than property rights. Community in Mosaic Israel was based on a series of covenants. The right of private property was defended by the commandment not to steal, but the definition of theft did not include eating from a neighbor's unharvested, above-ground crop. This exception was unique to rural land. It applied to a form of property that was not part of the free market system of buying and selling. God was uniquely the owner of the land in Mosaic Israel. He set different requirements for ownership of rural land. These rules were designed to provide a brief safety net in an area of the economy in which it was illegal to alienate family property.

In the final analysis, this law was far more symbolic than economic, for the harvest time would not have lasted very long. The sense of community had to be preserved in a system that restricted buying and selling. Those who did not own the best land or even any land at all had a stake in the success of local land owners, despite the law's restrictions of the permanent sale of inherited property. This symbol of participation in the fruits of the land was important for a society whose members celebrated the fulfillment of God's prophecy regarding the inheritance of a Promised Land (Gen. 15:16).³⁸

J. Has This Law Been Annulled?

Is there any Mosaic covenantal principle whose annulment also annulled this law? We know that a similar law is still in force. Paul cited the law prohibiting the muzzling of the working ox, applying it to the payment of ministers. "Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour, especially they who labour in the word and doctrine. For the scripture saith, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn. And, The labourer is worthy of his reward" (I Tim. 5:17–18).³⁹ But this case law applies more generally to the Christian walk: "For it is written in the law of Moses, Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn. Doth God take care for oxen? Or saith he it altogether for our sakes? For our sakes, no doubt, this is written: that he that ploweth should plow in hope; and that he that thresheth in hope should be partaker of his hope" (I Cor. 9:9–10).⁴⁰ There is a down payment in history—an earnest—of the covenant-keeper's kingdom victory in eternity. This down payment is an aspect of the inheritance.

38. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 23.

39. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 8.

That in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth; even in him: In whom also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will: That we should be to the praise of his glory, who first trusted in Christ. In whom ye also trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation: in whom also after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of promise, Which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of his glory (Eph. 1:10–14).

The tribal system was annulled in A.D. 70. Was this law exclusively tribal? The same kinds of psychological benefits seem to apply outside the tribal context: commitment to the community, a sense of participation in the blessings of this community, a willingness to defend it against invaders. What is missing today is Mosaic Israel's public exclusion of the names of other gods. A man's presence in the land does not, in and of itself, testify publicly to his willingness to serve under the law of God. The mobility of rival gods is like the mobility of the God of the Bible in the Old Covenant. The universality of their claims makes them different from the gods of the ancient Near East in Moses' day. To this extent, the situation has changed. But religions that claimed allegiance to universal gods appeared in the Near East and Far East at about the time of the Babylonian exile. Nevertheless, people in Israel in Jesus' day were still allowed to pick grain in their neighbors' fields.

This law seems to be a cross-boundary law. The neighbor, defined biblically, has a legal claim to a handful of any crop that he can pick, though not dig up. The biblical hermeneutical principle is that any Old Covenant law not annulled explicitly or implicitly by a New Covenant law is still valid.⁴¹ There seems to be no principle of judicial discontinuity that would annul this law. Because I see no judicial discontinuity between the covenants regarding this law, I conclude that the distinction between the grocer and the farmer was not based on the jubilee law, which has been annulled.

40. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 11.

This law applies to rural land during the harvest season but before the harvest takes place. The goal of this law is to increase the sense of community. All of its members are supposed to know that they have a small stake—a symbolic stake—in the prosperity of the land. There seems to be no discontinuity between the two covenants with regard to this law. It was a theocratic law, but whenever a nation covenants with the Trinitarian God of the Bible, this law is still in force.

The modern world is politically polytheistic.⁴² It denies legitimacy to the principle of civil theocracy. It also passes legislation that excludes neighbors from any man's field. It then extends the principle of exclusion to the nation itself. It creates "no trespassing" boundaries around the nation. Access to a man's field is analogous to access to the nation; the modern state is consistent in this regard. Immigration legislation excludes outsiders because they may become a threat to a national covenant that is not confessional. Immigrants may gain the vote and use the state to redistribute wealth. The same kind of exclusivism operates in laws legalizing abortion, which is another barrier to entry into the land.

This law testifies against geographical exclusivism because it is part of a system of covenantal order that is confessionally exclusivist. Open borders are the rule for biblical theocracy: access to the visible kingdom of God in history. Here is the logic of "open borders openly arrived at." You may freely walk into a local church; therefore, you may also freely walk into the nation in which that church operates. Any Christian who promotes closed national borders is saying, in effect, "Until some church sends a missionary to your nation, or until your entire population has access to the Internet, you must content yourself with going to hell. Sorry about that."

The message of this law is clear: access to God's promised land is to be accompanied by access to the fields of the promised land at harvest time. This gives non-owners and non-citizens a stake in the maintenance of a biblically theocratic society. This law makes it clear that private property is not an absolute value in human society. Private property is an absolute right for God, as the boundary placed around the forbidden tree in Eden reveals; it is not, however, an absolute right for man. Nothing is an absolute right for man, for man is not absolute. This case law breaches the boundaries of rural land. Owners are not allowed to use force to exclude a neighbor from picking a handful of the crop to eat in the field. The state may not defend owners' legal title to this token portion of the crop. This means that they have no legal title to all of it. This is clearly a violation of libertarian definitions of private ownership. The Bible is not a libertarian document, any more than it is socialistic. It is a covenantal document. The neighbor has lawful access to what he can pick, but the state may not lawfully come in with vessels to pick crops in the name of the people (minus 50% for administration).

41. Greg L. Bahnsen, By This Standard: The Authority of God's Law Today (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1985), chaps. 15, 16. (<http://bit.ly/gbbts>)

42. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/polpol>)

* * * * *

Conclusion

Jesus' answer to the Pharisees pointed to the sabbath principle as a means of liberating men. The disciples were hungry. Food was nearby. They could lawfully pick grain, but they did not cook it. They had to do some minimal work, but any food preparation activity is work. They were not violating the sabbath. They were walking and talking with the Lord of the sabbath. This was the top priority of the disciples.

The sabbath is not to be used as a means of interfering with recreation that leads to better knowledge of God's work. A stroll on the day of rest is legitimate. So is discussion of spiritual matters. So is food preparation that does not disrupt the day's pattern of rest. Man is not to become enmeshed in a formidable array of rules governing the day of rest. Men are to be liberated by the day of rest. They are not to be placed in such bondage that they cannot enjoy the day. The sabbath is liberation from work and liberation from fear. It is not to be turned a means of subjugation by means of a handbook of man-made restrictions.⁴³

43. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 24.

THE RICH GET RICHER; SO DO THE POOR

And the disciples came, and said unto him, Why speakest thou unto them in parables? He answered and said unto them, Because it is given unto you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given. For whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance: but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath. Therefore speak I to them in parables: because they seeing see not; and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand (Matt. 13:10–13).

The theocentric principle of this passage is God's absolute sovereignty in granting the gift of salvation to those whom He favors, and to remove everything from everyone else. Sovereignty is point one of the biblical covenant.¹ This is not something that covenant-breaking man wants to hear. In fact, it is not something that most covenant-keeping men want to hear. It implies that God is absolutely sovereign in His distribution of the gift of salvation. He sends His people out to preach the gospel, but He clogs the ears of all those listeners whom He eternally opposes.

A. The Kingdom of God

The issue in Matthew is the gospel of the kingdom. Who would receive it? Not those whom God opposed, Jesus said. Who might that have been? The context made it clear: the Jews. Then who was favored by God? Years later, Paul answered: the gentiles. The word of the Lord has come to them, Paul wrote, and they have responded in faith. Not so with Israel. Israel heard, yet she did not hear—exactly as Jesus said. Paul wrote:

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

For the scripture saith, Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed. For there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek: for the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon him. For whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved. How then shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? and how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher? And how shall they preach, except they be sent? as it is written, How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the gospel of peace, and bring glad tidings of good things! But they have not all obeyed the gospel. For Esaias saith, Lord, who hath believed our report? So then faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God. But I say, Have they not heard? Yes verily, their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world. But I say, Did not Israel know? First Moses saith, I will provoke you to jealousy by them that are no people, and by a foolish nation I will anger you. But Esaias is very bold, and saith, I was found of them that sought me not; I was made manifest unto them that asked not after me. But to Israel he saith, All day long I have stretched forth my hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people (Rom. 10:11–21).

Paul here cited Isaiah: “Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and shut their eyes; lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and convert, and be healed” (Isa. 6:10). So did Jesus in this passage: “And in them is fulfilled the prophecy of Esaias, which saith, By hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and shall not perceive: For this people’s heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed; lest at any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and should understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them. But blessed are your eyes, for they see: and your ears, for they hear” (Matt. 13:14–16).

Israel desperately needed salvation. Their ears had grown dull; their heart had waxed gross. Nevertheless, Jesus spoke in parables so that the majority of His listeners would not understand His offer of salvation. He did not seek to sharpen the hearing of all who listened to Him. His words in this passage are inescapably clear: His offer of the gospel was presented in such a way that Israel would not hear and respond in faith. Calvinists understand this passage and accept it. Anti-Calvinists prefer not to discuss it, and when commenting on it, they have great difficulties. They have the same difficulties with Paul's similar words in the Book of Acts:

And when they [the Jews] had appointed him a day, there came many to him into his lodging; to whom he expounded and testified the kingdom of God, persuading them concerning Jesus, both out of the law of Moses, and out of the prophets, from morning till evening. And some believed the things which were spoken, and some believed not. And when they agreed not among themselves, they departed, after that Paul had spoken one word, Well spake the Holy Ghost by Esaias the prophet unto our fathers, Saying, Go unto this people, and say, Hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and not perceive: For the heart of this people is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes have they closed; lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them. Be it known therefore unto you, that the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and that they will hear it (Acts 28:23–28).

B. He Who Has, Gets

The Jews had the law and the prophets. This was something of great value. The gentiles did not. Yet the Jews were about to be passed over by God. The gentiles weren't. This seems to imply that he who has, loses; he who has nothing, gets. "He that findeth his life shall lose it: and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it" (Matt. 10:39).² Yet this passage states the reverse: "For whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance: but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that [which] he hath." How should we understand this?

Consider Jesus' interaction with the Pharisees regarding social outcasts. "And when the Pharisees saw it, they said unto his disciples, Why eateth your Master with publicans and sinners? But when Jesus heard that, he said unto them, They that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick. But go ye and learn what that meaneth, I will have mercy, and not sacrifice: for I am not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance" (Matt. 9:11–13). The implication here is that all men are sick unto death. Some men recognize this; others do not. Those who acknowledge that they are sick will seek the services of a physician. Those who do not, won't.

2. Chapter 24.

What did Israel possess? Not good spiritual health, surely. What she possessed was the means of diagnosis: the law and the prophets, which testified to the spiritual sickness of mankind. Jeremiah warned: "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked: who can know it?" (Jer. 17:9). Isaiah warned: "But we are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags; and we all do fade as a leaf; and our iniquities, like the wind, have taken us away. And there is none that calleth upon thy name, that stirreth up himself to take hold of thee: for thou hast hid thy face from us, and hast consumed us, because of our iniquities" (Isa. 64:6–7). The Pharisees knew these ancient warnings, but they did not perceive that the warnings applied to them. Israel had the kingdom of God, but it was about to be taken away from them: "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43).

What was the deciding factor in maintaining the kingdom grant? Good fruit. Jesus earlier had said: "Either make the tree good, and his fruit good; or else make the tree corrupt, and his fruit corrupt: for the tree is known by his fruit. O generation of vipers, how can ye, being evil, speak good things? for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. A good man out of the good treasure of the heart bringeth forth good things: and an evil man out of the evil treasure bringeth forth evil things. But I say unto you, That every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment. For by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned" (Matt. 12:33–37). He had called for ethical consistency. He had called men to live out their confessions of faith. He wanted them to see exactly what they are from God's point of view. He called for ethical self-consciousness.

It is not the mere possession of God's law that can secure salvation. Men must obey it. But they do not obey it. Thus, they are in need of a savior, a kinsman-redeemer. The gentiles recognized this need; the Jews did not. The Jews had known of the coming savior (Isa. 53), but this did them no good. The gentiles had not known, but they would soon recognize Him when His disciples brought word of His redemptive work on their behalf.

What was it that the gentiles possessed? The knowledge of their own covenantally bankrupt status before God. This knowledge would soon bring them the kingdom grant: incorporation into the church. What did the Jews lack? This same knowledge. They would soon be disinherited: excluded from this incorporation. He who had nothing, gained; he who had something, lost.

This passage deals prophetically with men's respective positions after the inheritance had been transferred. The kingdom of God would go to the gentiles, Jesus later warned the Pharisees. Then the traditional covenantal system of rewards and curses would prevail: those who have will receive. Those who have nothing will lose even that which they had possessed.

If I have nothing, how can I lose it? This initially makes no sense. But it makes sense within the context of Old Covenant Israel. The Jews had something valuable: the Mosaic law. Paul wrote: "Wherefore the law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good. Was then that which is good made death unto me? God forbid. But sin, that it might appear sin, working death in me by that which is good; that sin by the commandment might become exceeding sinful. For we know that the law is spiritual: but I am carnal, sold under sin" (Rom. 7:12–14). To ignore the law's testimony is to risk losing everything, Paul warned. The Mosaic law tells us that we have nothing of value to bring before God. Conclusion: "For all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3:23). James agreed: "For whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all" (James 2:10). This was the fate of Old Covenant Israel: possessing something valuable, the law of God, Israel had nothing except the law's condemnation. Having nothing, i.e., a having a false hope in salvation by law, Israel soon had the kingdom taken away. The gentiles, not having received the Mosaic law, having only the work of the law written on every person's heart (Rom. 2:15),³ accepted the gospel's message of redemption. The gentiles received something: redemption.

From this point on, the covenantal system of historical sanctions goes into operation: he who has, gets. God's grace pours down visibly on those who have already received the grace of redemption. "But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day" (Deut. 8:18).⁴ The covenant's blessings reinforce men's faith in the covenant. As a result, they exercise greater faith. The process of linear economic growth begins.

3. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 4.

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 22.

C. A Thing of Value

We learn in this passage that he who has nothing nevertheless will eventually receive great gain. How can this be? We find the same seeming anomaly in Proverbs. “There is that maketh himself rich, yet hath nothing: there is that maketh himself poor, yet hath great riches” (Prov. 13:7).⁵ The man who attains great tangible wealth, but nothing else, possesses nothing of value in God’s eyes. The man who makes himself poor in the world’s things for God’s sake thereby gains something of great value in God’s eyes. He who gives up the pursuit of the world’s treasure for the sake of God’s eternal treasure has made a wise exchange. He who fills his life with things that deflect him from service to God has made an unwise exchange. “For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?” (Matt. 16:26).⁶

The “nothing” that the rich man possesses is the thing that he shall lose: treasure. His tangible wealth has no exchange value in the marketplace of souls. If he loses his soul, he loses his tangible wealth, too. This is how a man with nothing can lose that which he has. He has nothing of value in God’s eyes: no marketable capital. God then condemns him to hell because he possesses nothing of eternal value. Eternal life is obtained in this life or not at all. “He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him” (John 3:36).

But what of the man to whom something of eternal value has been given by God? On the basis of this gift, he will eventually possess greater abundance. More than this: the tangible wealth of the one who has nothing of eternal value is transferred to the man who has received something of eternal value. This wealth transfer is also taught in Proverbs. “A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children’s children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just” (Prov. 13:22).⁷ The man who seeks great tangible wealth at the cost of God’s kingdom may achieve it, but over time, his accumulated wealth will flow to covenant-keepers. The process of spiritual gains and losses is eventually reflected in the realm of economics.

This passage indicates that God’s people will inherit the earth in history. The tangible wealth of covenant-breakers will eventually be transferred to covenant-keepers. This may be by the conversion of covenant-breakers: God's dispossession of Satan in history.

5. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 40.

6. Chapter 35.

7. North, Wisdom and Dominion, ch. 41.

D. Regression to the Mean

There is an old saying, "The rich get richer, and the poor get poorer." As it applies to things of the spirit, this is an accurate summary. It corresponds to what Jesus taught in this passage. But does it also apply to economics? If it does, then this process somehow overcomes the statistical phenomenon known as regression toward the mean.

Free market economic theory teaches that if an entrepreneur discovers a new way to generate an above-market rate of return, other entrepreneurs will seek to discover his secret. Profitable information is bought and sold and stolen. Over time, new profit-producing techniques spread across the economy. As they do, their rate of return decreases, as more producers adopt the once-secret technique. This is why above-market rates of return tend to disappear. The economist calls this the unhampered free market's tendency toward equilibrium. Few concepts are more important than this one in modern economics.

There is an anomaly, however—one that is almost never discussed: the highly unequal distribution of income. My failure to recognize this in Chapter 67 of Inheritance and Dominion (1999) was an error. I wrote: "There is a bell-shaped distribution of wealth within a society because of the predictable outcomes of increased temptations that occur on the far ends of capital's spectrum." But there is no bell-shaped curve for either income or wealth. I had not recognized the continuing relevance of Vilfredo Pareto's discovery. This is why in the 2003 revision, I removed this section from the book. I discuss Pareto's law in the revised Chapter 69.⁸

1. Pareto's 20-80 Rule

The Bible's recommended goal is middle-class wealth. Jesus said, "For the poor always ye have with you; but me ye have not always" (John 12:8). This statement appears in three of the Gospels (Matt. 26:11; Mark 14:7), but not Luke's. If we will always have the poor with us, then we will always have the rich. The question is: What percentage of rich people will we have? Even more important, how much tangible wealth will the rich control? The answer is, most of it.

8. This following subsection and the one that follows ("Moral Capital") are reprinted from Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), Introduction.

The shape of either a nation's wealth distribution curve or its income distribution curve does not resemble the shape of its population curve. The population curve bulges with the middle class. Both the income distribution curve and the wealth distribution curve bulge with the rich, generation after generation. This does not mean that the same families stay rich. It does mean that the richest 20% of the population own most of the wealth and gain most of the income at any given time. The shape of the income distribution curve resists alteration, generation after generation.

Italian sociologist-economist Vilfredo Pareto in the late nineteenth century made detailed investigations of the distribution of income in Europe. He discovered an amazing fact: the slope of the income curve, from the richest to the poorest members of society, was similar in every nation that he studied. The richest members gained most of the nation's income. This statistical relationship, first published in 1897,⁹ has not changed over the last century, irrespective of the economic policies of individual industrial nations. Later studies by other economic historians indicated that in 1835–40, 1883, and 1919 in Great Britain, the top 10% earned 50% of the nation's income.¹⁰ This statistical relationship has come to be known as the Pareto Law or the Pareto Rule, although Pareto did not ascribe a law's degree of predictability to it, at least not in his later work. A 20-80 distribution has been found to apply in social institution after institution, as well as in their diverse operations.¹¹ No one seems to know why. An economist wrote in 1965: "For a very long time, the Pareto law has lumbered the economic scene like an erratic block on the landscape; an empirical law which nobody can explain."¹²

A 1998 study by the Centre for the Study of Living Standards in Ottawa, Canada, reveals that the 20-80 rule still applies quite well in the United States. The top 20% of the population owned 81% of house-

9. Vilfredo Pareto, Cours d' Economie Politique, vol. 2 (1897), pp. 370–72. The book has still not been translated into English, although it remains famous.

10. D. H. Macgregor, "Pareto's Law," Economic Journal (March 1936), pp. 81, 86. Reprinted in Mark Blaug (ed.), Vilfredo Pareto (1848–1923) (Brookfield, Vermont: Edward Elgar, 1992), pp. 21, 26.

11. Richard Koch, The 80-20 Principle: How to Achieve More With Less (Garden City, New York: Bantam Doubleday Dell, 1998).

12. Josef Steindl, Random Processes and the Growth of Firms: A Study of the Pareto Law (London: Charles Griffin, 1965), p. 18. Cited in ibid., p. 3.

hold wealth in 1962, 81.3% in 1983, 83.5% in 1989, 83.7% in 1995, and 84.3% in 1997. For the top 1%, the figures are as follows: 1962: 33.4%; 1983: 33.8%; 1989: 37.4%; 1995: 37.6%; 1997: 39.1%.¹³ The changes have been in the direction of greater concentration of tangible wealth in the United States.

This seems impossible. Don't middle-class people own their homes? No; they reside in them, but they borrow to buy them. They pay mortgages. The rich are the holders of these mortgages. Title is passed to the home owner, but the asset has a debt against it. Most middle-class people own very little debt-free marketable wealth. They use debt to buy depreciating assets: consumer goods. They do not save. The rich use their money to buy appreciating assets and income-producing assets. They save a much higher percentage of their wealth. When the rich in one nation cease to save at high rates, the rich in another nation will replace them. "The stranger that is within thee shall get up above thee very high; and thou shalt come down very low. He shall lend to thee, and thou shalt not lend to him: he shall be the head, and thou shalt be the tail" (Deut. 28:43–44).¹⁴

There is no known way for any industrial society to alter significantly the share of tangible wealth owned by the rich. When political force has been applied in the form of tax policy, the percentages have stayed pretty much the same. It is not even clear that there will be different wealth holders after the new taxation policies are in force, unless the existing wealth owners are deliberately expropriated or executed, as they were in Communist nations. Finally, there is no legitimate biblical justification for using the monopolistic force of civil government to redistribute private wealth in order to achieve greater equality.

The key economic issue regarding wealth distribution is this: the lawful means for gaining control over tangible capital. How do producers gain their share of national wealth in a particular nation? By power, by bribery, by political skills, or by satisfying customer demand? To benefit the largest number of people in society, civil governments should establish legal guarantees to all owners of property. This will encourage the self-interested rich to continue to use their wealth for customer-satisfying purposes. The rich should continue to save, invest, and provide tools for their employees. The legal protection of all people's right to own and use property will also encourage the bottom 80% to do the same. Through competition to satisfy customers, members in lower-income groups will replace those in the higher-income groups. The percentage of tangible capital in each quintile will not change very much, but the amount of wealth produced by this capital will increase dramatically over time, as the compound growth process takes over.

13. John Schmitt, Lawrence Mishel, and Jared Bernstein, paper prepared for a panel on "Economic Well-being in North America," Canadian Economic Association Meetings, May 31, 1998, Table 7.

14. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 69.

Capital accumulation by the rich is the most important measurable source of a capitalist society's increasing tangible wealth. The rich provide the money that buys the tools that raise the wealth of the other classes. But tools are not enough to make a society rich among nations. A society's other classes must possess moral capital, such as the willingness to work hard, future-orientation, honesty, and a good reputation. Moral capital is intangible, but it is nonetheless real. It produces income for its owners.

Pareto's anomaly is a real one. If 10% of the population receives half of the national income, or if 20% of the population receives 70 or 80%, and this continues generation after generation in nation after nation, where is the evidence of equilibrium? Why shouldn't the distribution curves of both income and wealth be more continuous? Why should they be permanently skewed to the right? If there is open entry into the capital markets for the bottom 80% of the population, why shouldn't wealth be more evenly distributed? Is there some psychological barrier to entry, such as a widespread fear of losing investment capital or the fear of becoming self-employed, that keeps the distribution curves skewed?

There is continuous movement into and out of the top 20%. The story of rags to riches to rags in three generations is a familiar one. Some very wealthy families do seem to maintain their presence over several generations. This may be due to political favoritism, i.e., restrictions on competition. It is hard to say. Detailed academic studies of permanent intergenerational wealth at the top are not common.¹⁵ But there appears to be considerable mobility into and out of the top quintile for most of its members. But there is not mobility of the distribution curve itself.

15. In the United States, Ferdinand Lundberg wrote several books on this topic, but he was always considered a maverick historian by academic historians. His books are not cited by historians very often, especially The Rich and the Super-Rich: Who Really Owns America? How Do They Keep Their Wealth and Their Power? (New York: Lyle Stewart, 1968).

2. Moral Capital

If we consider moral capital as income-producing capital, then the Pareto rule does not apply. There is only so much moral capital that any person can possess. The rich cannot amass moral capital in the way they can amass tangible capital. If the members of all economic classes in a society were to have approximately the same moral standards and degree of adherence to them, then the shape of the curve of society's moral capital would match the shape of the population curve.

Let me clarify my argument by an example. Assume that in nation A, only the rich are literate. This means that the national rate of illiteracy is 80%. In nation B, there is almost universal literacy. Without knowing anything else about the tangible wealth of either nation, which one would you guess has the richest rich people? I am speaking only of the top 20% of the population. I would guess nation B. But what if I am wrong? What if nation A is richer, perhaps because it is a small, oligarchical, oil-exporting nation? Which group of rich people do you think will be richer in a century if the literacy rates stay the same in both nations, assuming that the rich in both nations do not send their investment capital outside their respective countries? I would still guess nation B. This has nothing to do with investment decisions made by the rich. It has everything to do with the determination of the less rich to learn how to read—a determination based on their moral capital. A rising tide of literacy raises all economic ships: poor, middle class, and rich. I argue that this same principle of national wealth formation applies to moral capital in general.

Without widely distributed moral capital, today's rich people could not retain the market investment capital for long. Competent and honest employees would value of their become increasingly scarce and costly, thereby lowering the value of investment capital. Voters would become envy-driven. They would elect politicians who would seek to confiscate the wealth of the rich in the name of the poor on behalf of middle-class voters (minus 50% for government handling). Per capita productivity would slow, stagnate, or fall. So would the nation's wealth. The shape of the wealth distribution curve would remain the same—heavily concentrated in the top 20%—but the growth of wealth in this society would slow down or even decline.

E. To Inherit the Earth

The Bible teaches that covenant-keepers will inherit the earth.¹⁶ If the covenant-breaking rich continue to own most of the wealth, how can covenant-keepers inherit the earth? Or are we to believe that this inheritance is post-historical? The Old Covenant texts that forecast this inheritance do not indicate that the inheritance is post-historical.

His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth (Ps. 25:13).

For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth (Ps. 37:9).

But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace (Ps. 37:11).

For such as be blessed of him shall inherit the earth; and they that be cursed of him shall be cut off (Ps. 37:22).¹⁷

How can Christians inherit the earth if the rich own most of it, and Christians are told not to seek riches? The answer: postmillennialism.¹⁸ God's kingdom will be extended by widespread religious conversion. The vast majority of people in all income groups will be brought to saving faith. Even the rich minority will be converted. If they aren't, then they will be replaced by Christians who become wealthy through serving customers more efficiently. Inheritance of the earth will be by conversion, not by a minority of Christians buying up the assets of the world. Redemption is spiritual, not financial.

F. The Spread of the Gospel

The key factor in contributing to the permanent wealth of nations is saving grace. Special grace is fundamental. Contrary to free-market economic theory, private property is a secondary issue, for it is an out-working of God's common grace. Without special grace to some members of society, common grace cannot be sustained indefinitely.¹⁹ The

16. Gary North, Inherit the Earth: Biblical Blueprints for Economics (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gninherit>)

17. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 40.

18. Kenneth Gentry, He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1992] 1997). (<http://bit.ly/klghshd>)

19. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress

nation will eventually adopt capital-reducing measures based on envy or the desire to preserve the existing distribution of wealth. The statistical law of large numbers operates in nations.

If Pareto's rule applies internationally, as it seems to today,²⁰ then there will continue to be inequality, but the same minority of nations will not retain the advantage over the others. The international wealth distribution curve will continue to be skewed to the right, but those nations inside the top quintile will change. The key issue is this: On what basis does a nation enter the top fifth? By covenant-keeping or covenant-breaking? In either case, no nation is likely to stay on top permanently. Either negative sanctions will come against covenant-breaking nations, or else other covenant-keeping nations will be blessed even more by God. But in the second instance, every covenant-keeping nation will get richer, as will rich and poor residents in all of them.

Jesus said, "Either make the tree good, and his fruit good; or else make the tree corrupt, and his fruit corrupt: for the tree is known by his fruit" (Matt. 12:33). The evil tree is eventually cut down: "Even so every good tree bringeth forth good fruit; but a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit. A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit. Every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire. Wherefore by their fruits ye shall know them" (Matt. 7:17–20).²¹

So, the spread of the gospel produces positive economic effects. God rewards covenantal faithfulness with prosperity (Deut. 8:18).²² This prosperity is not to become a snare: "And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth" (Deut. 8:17).²³ If it does snare the unrighteous society, then the "nothing" which it has—its wealth—will be removed from it.

The long-term movement of the kingdom of God is from poverty to wealth. To sustain their wealth and expand it, covenant-keepers must sustain their confession and their obedience to God's law. The mark of their commitment is their willingness to spend a portion of their wealth to take the good news of salvation and wealth to others. They must share their tangible capital with others, but more import-

(Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

20. Eighty percent of the world's wealth is owned by 25 percent of the world's population. Koch, 80/20 Principle, p. 22.

21. Chapter 18.

22. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 22.

23. Ibid., ch. 21.

ant, share the covenantal basis of their tangible capital: their moral capital. They must seek to take the gospel to those who suffer poverty because of their rebellion to God. Covenant-keepers are to use their economic capital to capitalize the poor in spirit. If those who have received wealth from God on the basis of their confession and obedience are successful in their efforts to share the wealth, the poor will get richer, and so will the rich. Increasing productivity for all is produced when the productivity of the poor increases. The increase in capital will increase the division of labor.

G. Unequal Distribution of Wealth

The nagging question does not go away: What about income inequality? In every modern society that economists have investigated, there is huge inequality. Twenty percent of the population owns most of the tangible wealth. Even after almost a century of steeply graduated income taxes and graduated inheritance taxes, steep inequality persists.

Pareto did not explain the existence of income inequality. In the century since he published his findings, no economist has come up with anything approaching a widely accepted explanation. We do not know why this inequality continues to exist in the face of both free market competition and socialist taxation.

The disparity in income and wealth may have something to do with disparities in future-orientation. Most people are not highly future-oriented. They are not willing to save money at low rates of interest. They prefer to borrow. They go into debt in order to buy consumer goods that depreciate. They do not get on the growth side of compound interest.

The disparity in income and wealth could be the result of inherent productivity of innovation. We might argue that successful new production methods produce enormous wealth for their early discoverers, who retain their wealth until innovative competitors find replacement methods. This explanation relies on a concept of economic growth that is overwhelmingly based on entrepreneurial skills rather than on moral capital. Surely, Christians' moral capital has not elevated them into the top 20% of wealth holders over the last century.

The entrepreneur bears a heavy load of uncertainty. Most people prefer to avoid this. They prefer predictable wages to market risks and uncertainty. They are willing to accept less income in order to avoid the loss of both capital and income. Those few entrepreneurs who survive free market competition become rich. Thus, the rich are always a minority.

An entrepreneurship-based explanation of income inequality reinforces the idea that Christians' inheritance of the earth will take place as a result of widespread conversions, not by any uniquely confession-based advantages possessed by Christians. Moral capital sustains the social order that allows entrepreneurship to produce wealth for all, but mainly for those who possess the skills. Moral capital does not make a majority of people wealthy. It does not even make Christians wealthy in comparison to successful entrepreneurs. But it makes all men richer over time. It makes sustained economic growth possible.

Few people believe this today. Almost no economist believes it. Economists believe that the free market social order is self-reinforcing and expansionist, irrespective of God, Christianity, or supernaturalism generally. They believe that the economic fruits of capitalism will persuade voters of the truth of its roots, and the roots are found in Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations: private property and personal self-interest. God's covenant has nothing to do with it.²⁴

Conclusion

The rich will get richer if their tangible wealth rests on their covenantal faithfulness, i.e., their moral capital. The expansion of covenantal wealth is based on the process of obedience-abundance-greater obedience, greater abundance (Deut. 8:18). This is a system of positive feedback. But if the tangible wealth of the rich is based on their faith in their own autonomy, they will eventually get poorer. Positive feedback reverses (Deut. 8:19–20).²⁵

Richard Koch, who has written a book on profitable applications of Pareto's rule, thinks that positive feedback is the key to understanding why the 20-80 phenomenon exists. "In the absence of feedback loops, the natural distribution of phenomena would be 50/50—inputs of a given frequency would lead to commensurate results. It is only because of positive feedback and negative feedback loops that causes do not have equal results. Yet it also seems to be true that powerful positive feedback loops only affect a small minority of the inputs. This helps

24. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), Appendix C.

25. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 23.

explain why those small minority of inputs can exert so much influence.”²⁶

Do the poor get poorer? Yes, if their poverty is spiritual. No, if their poverty is the result of their open hands to others. “For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich. . . . But by an equality, that now at this time your abundance may be a supply for their want, that their abundance also may be a supply for your want: that there may be equality: As it is written, He that had gathered much had nothing over; and he that had gathered little had no lack” (II Cor. 8:9, 14–15).²⁷

One goal of the gospel is to make all men rich spiritually. But, in achieving this, the gospel necessarily must make men tangibly richer. The covenant’s upward movement of confession-obedience-wealth will spread the blessings of both tangible and spiritual wealth to more people. But it will not spread tangible wealth evenly, according to Pareto.

The top priority in this passage is to gain the abundance that comes to him who has something. “For whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance: but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath.” This possession is redemption. He who has nothing—no redemption—will lose even the wealth that he has. This threat points to final judgment.

This process of spiritual development—positive feedback—is reflected in the realm of economics. There is a means by which the rich get richer, long term. They get richer under free market capitalism by enabling the poor to get richer. They invest capital, which provides the tools that increase the productivity of workers. The rich increase their incomes when the poor increase their incomes. Economic theory teaches that the rich do not get rich by exploiting the poor. On the contrary, they get rich by extending to others their knowledge of way to long-term wealth, i.e., compound economic growth. To sustain this process long term requires an open, merciful hand.²⁸

26. Koch, 80/20 Principle, p. 15.

27. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 5.

28. Chapter 10.

THE DECEITFULNESS OF RICHES

Hear ye therefore the parable of the sower. When any one heareth the word of the kingdom, and understandeth it not, then cometh the wicked one, and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart. This is he which received seed by the way side. But he that received the seed into stony places, the same is he that heareth the word, and anon with joy receiveth it; Yet hath he not root in himself, but dureth for a while: for when tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the word, by and by he is offended. He also that received seed among the thorns is he that heareth the word; and the care of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, choke the word, and he becometh unfruitful. But he that received seed into the good ground is he that heareth the word, and understandeth it; which also beareth fruit, and bringeth forth, some an hundredfold, some sixty, some thirty (Matt. 13:18–23).

The theocentric principle undergirding this passage is not immediately apparent. We are told that the fruitfulness of the soil determines the result of the sowing. The seed-sower—God—distributes the same seeds, but the results are different. This passage seems to minimize the work of the sower. But verse 22 provides a clue: “the deceitfulness of riches.” The same Greek root word for deceitfulness is found in another passage that deals with Satan’s work of deception. “For the mystery of iniquity doth already work: only he who now letteth will let, until he be taken out of the way. And then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming: Even him, whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders, And with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie: That they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness” (II Thess. 2:7–12).

God sends a strong delusion on those whom He hates in order that they might believe a lie. It is the same with the soils. God is sovereign in salvation, both as seed-sower and soil-maker. This is an aspect of God's sovereignty: point one of the biblical covenant.¹ But this sovereignty is manifested in a specific area: evaluation, meaning imputation. This is point four: judgment.²

A. Wealth and Autonomy

This passage is an explanation of the previous passage:

And he spake many things unto them in parables, saying, Behold, a sower went forth to sow; And when he sowed, some seeds fell by the way side, and the fowls came and devoured them up: Some fell upon stony places, where they had not much earth: and forthwith they sprung up, because they had no deepness of earth: And when the sun was up, they were scorched; and because they had no root, they withered away. And some fell among thorns; and the thorns sprung up, and choked them: But other fell into good ground, and brought forth fruit, some an hundredfold, some sixtyfold, some thirtyfold (Matt. 13:3–8).

Riches are here compared with thorns. The cares of this world and riches overwhelm a man's faith in the word of God. This points back to the curse on Adam: "Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field" (Gen. 3:18). The thorns are hindrances that thwart man's work. The work in question in the parable is the work of extending the kingdom of God in history. The measure of earthly success is wealth, yet wealth is what threatens the hearer's work. The cares of the world undermine his kingdom efforts. One such care is the amassing and care of riches. Great wealth requires great care to maintain it.

Riches are said to deceive men. What is it about riches that deceives men? Moses made this clear: the sin of autonomy. "And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth" (Deut. 8:17).³ The author of Proverbs wrote: "The rich

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

2. Sutton, ch. 4. North, ch. 4.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 21.

man's wealth is his strong city, and as an high wall in his own conceit" (Prov. 18:11).⁴ "Remove far from me vanity and lies: give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me: Lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the LORD? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain" (Prov. 30:8–9).⁵

What is it about wealth that persuades men that they are autonomous? One aspect is the great range of alternatives open to men with wealth. In fact, wealth is best described in terms of this range of alternatives. We say that a person's wealth has increased in direct proportion to the increase over his previous range of choices. The man of great wealth is tempted to trust in his wealth because it seems to endow him with him a Godlike power of decision-making. This is a delusion. The range of choices open to any man is minuscule compared to what God can do. God is infinite; He can do whatever He chooses. The rich man is blinded by his wealth because it is his preferred means of comparison with other men, not with God.

Another aspect is the seeming impersonalism of wealth. Wealth is a tool of dominion. Tools appear to be impersonal. They are not, but they appear to be. Wealth extends a man's power and influence over others in a seemingly impersonal way. A tool is usually regarded as impersonal device that extends the personal decisions of its owner. Wealth is seen as existing independently, or only as an extension of the owner. This is a delusion. Wealth does not exist independent of the decisions of other men. Other men impute value to the rich man's capital or to the services that he sells that provide him with his wealth. If their opinions change, he can be reduced to poverty. The familiar example of the buggy whip industry is correct. When the automobile came, the buggy whip business was doomed, except among the Amish.

Men seek those forms of wealth that insulate them from the changing opinions of other men. They accumulate money because money is more constant in value than the opinions of their customers. It is the most marketable commodity. We are now back to the issue of the wide range of choice. But when an invading army comes, or plague comes, or famine comes, or some other disaster comes, money is of little or no value. The environment that made wealth what it was has changed.

To attribute to any aspect of the creation a power associated with God is to move from theonomy to autonomy. Men are tempted to attribute to wealth or power this kind of autonomy. But most men recognize the inherent danger of power. It calls forth others who wish to claim such power by whatever means. Power is too personal to be shared easily; it must either be monopolized or surrendered.⁶ But wealth can be gained in many ways. Others can become wealthy without threatening the status of the wealthy man.⁷ So, wealth is the more common means adopted in the quest for autonomy.

4. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 54.

5. Ibid., ch. 85.

B. Riches vs. Fruitfulness

The deceitfulness of riches leads to unfruitfulness. This is because men are tempted to focus on the temporal. Riches are a convenient means of assessing productivity. Because of the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:27–28),⁸ men are inescapably confronted with the results of their own productivity in the task of subduing the earth. They seek to discover agreed-upon success indicators that will reveal their degree of success. In almost every society, money has been the most familiar success indicator, the one open to the widest audience. Unlike beauty or power or artistic creativity, wealth is open to a wide range of talents. In this sense, it is a more impersonal success indicator.

Because so many people acknowledge wealth as a measure of success, men are lured into pursuing it. Other men impute value to wealth as the measure of a man's life. It is easy to listen to the crowd and to evaluate one's own performance in relation to the economic success of others.

This is a snare and a delusion, Jesus taught. The crowd is wrong. What constitutes riches is right standing with God. "Then said Jesus unto his disciples, Verily I say unto you, That a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven. And again I say unto you, It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. When his disciples heard it, they were

6. In bureaucracy, power is divided up more finely and made less dependent on anyone's personal attributes. Bureaucratic power can be allocated widely. But it is circumscribed by rules. Bureaucracy is the common man's way to power.

7. If many people become wealthy, this can threaten his status. Some goods are positional goods. They are valuable only because they are in short supply. If mass production makes them widely available, they lose their status-giving power. Fred Hirsch, Social Limits to Growth (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1977), ch. 3. This is one reason why free market capitalism is hated by members of groups that have attained their social status in a pre-capitalistic economy, where wealth is not widely shared.

8. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 4.

exceedingly amazed, saying, Who then can be saved? But Jesus beheld them, and said unto them, With men this is impossible; but with God all things are possible” (Matt. 19:23–26).⁹

Then what is fruitfulness? “But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance: against such there is no law” (Gal. 5:22–23). Money does not buy these or empower these. The deceitfulness of wealth wars against these. Wealth is not inherently opposed to them, but the deceitfulness associated with it does undermine such fruitfulness.

The success indicators of spiritual maturity are not quantifiable. Wealth is. The lack of a quantifiable success indicator bothers most men. They want to “keep score” in life. They seek a numerical indicator. “He who dies with the most toys, wins” proclaims a popular American tee-shirt.

Did Jesus warn men not to use wealth as their success indicator, except perhaps as a negative indicator? If He did, then He broke with the Mosaic law’s covenantal principle of inheritance. There is no doubt that wealth was a legitimate success indicator under the Mosaic law. “The LORD shall command the blessing upon thee in thy storehouses, and in all that thou settest thine hand unto; and he shall bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee” (Deut. 28:8).¹⁰ Wealth was a success indicator even before the Mosaic law. “And Abram was very rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold” (Gen. 13:2). The loss of wealth was seen as a curse. “Ye have sown much, and bring in little; ye eat, but ye have not enough; ye drink, but ye are not filled with drink; ye clothe you, but there is none warm; and he that earneth wages earneth wages to put it into a bag with holes. Thus saith the LORD of hosts; Consider your ways” (Hag. 1:6–7).¹¹ Consider your ways, God told them. The disparity between their input (sown much) and their output (bring in little) was a lack-of-success indicator. It was to motivate them to spiritual introspection. There was a positive relationship between covenantal faithfulness and economic success. Did Jesus deny this relationship? If He did, then the New Covenant represents a sharp discontinuity with the Old Covenant, for the visible sanctions have changed.

9. Chapter 38.

10. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 69.

11. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 32.

C. Exchange Rate: Temporal Wealth vs. Eternal Wealth

The text does not say that riches lead men astray; their deception does. Man is easily deceived by riches, as we have seen. Riches are temporal; so, they focus man's attention on the temporal. The time-bound nature of riches is a snare and a delusion. Jesus kept teaching about the exchange rate between temporal wealth and eternal wealth. He kept saying that the rate of exchange is low, but men—especially rich men—think it is high. Why lay up treasure on earth, Jesus asked, where thieves break in? Is this not foolish? But the rich man cannot see the foolishness. Why? Because he refuses to see that he is as temporal as his wealth. They both dissipate—he more certainly than his wealth. But he turns a blind eye to his mortality. Even an old man thinks he has at least five years left to live.

1. Declining Marginal Utility

Economics teaches that as a person accumulates units of one asset, each additional unit is worth less to him than the previous unit. This is the law of decreasing marginal utility. It leads to the statement, “enough is enough.” So, a rich man should be progressively willing to surrender ownership of a unit of this asset to gain a unit of an asset that he does not own: eternal wealth. But there is an assumption behind the law of diminishing marginal utility: the person's tastes do not change. If there is an addictive aspect of the item, then the law of diminishing marginal utility applies differently. The enjoyment produced by each unit declines, as economic theory says it must, but demand nevertheless increases. To get the same thrill as before, the user must consume more of the drug per dose. To avoid painful withdrawal symptoms, the addict must consume more doses per unit of time. More and more units of the drug are demanded by the addict. Jesus' description of the deceitfulness of riches and the inability of the rich man to enter heaven implies that temporal wealth is addictive.

If temporal wealth were not addictive, then, in the eyes of a rich man, the exchange rate between temporal wealth and eternal wealth would shift in favor of eternal wealth. As a man accumulates more temporal wealth, he should find the value of each additional unit worth less to him. Eternal wealth would look more appealing to him. He would be willing to exchange some of his earthly wealth for a greater supply of eternal wealth. But this is rarely the case, Jesus taught.

This points to earthly wealth as addictive.

Yet the same can be true of the accumulation of eternal wealth. It, too, can become addictive, but not for many people. Still, the idea has had a fascination for Americans. In 1933, in the worst economic phase of the Great Depression, a 1929 novel by Rev. Lloyd C. Douglas, became a best-seller: Magnificent Obsession. The title reveals the theme: giving away wealth for God's kingdom becomes an obsession. As a few men learn this lifelong discipline, they prosper. The book was made into a popular movie in 1935 and again in 1954.¹² But most people find the suggestion hard to implement, especially rich men.

2. Radical Change

There is another explanation for the rich man's resistance: the non-marginal nature of the exchange. Eternal life is not sold for temporal wealth, unit by unit. It is given away as a package deal through special grace: definitive sanctification. This package is supposed to be filled over time by progressive sanctification.¹³ Marginal exchange is the meaning of this verse: "But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal" (Matt. 6:20).¹⁴ Laying up treasures is not a one-time event. It is a lifetime process of exchange, unit by unit, good work by good work. "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: Not of works, lest any man should boast. For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them" (Eph. 2:8–10). These exchanges begin only after legal access to the eternal treasury is transferred to the recipient.

Prior to receiving grace, the poor man is more likely than the rich man to think, "If this life is all there is, then I will consider eternal life." The rich man thinks, "This life is good for me. I cannot be sure about 12. Douglas was a theological liberal. He was the minister of the large and influential First Congregational Church of Los Angeles in the late 1920s. He wrote the book in an emotional depression, when the church's leaders were discussing his dismissal. He resigned, finished the book, then wrote a dozen more, several of which became best-sellers and movies. His most famous novel was The Robe (1942), which became the first movie in Cinemascope (1953), the wide-screen technology.

13. John Murray, "Sanctification," Collected writings of John Murray, 4 vols. (Edinburgh: Banner of Trust, 1977), II, p. 277. Cf. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 10:A:2.

14. Chapter 13.

eternal life. If I must sacrifice this life for that life, I shall stick with what I know and have come to depend on.” Riches focus a rich man’s attention and hope on the temporal, where he is successful. He will not readily believe that portions of his temporal wealth can be exchanged for eternal wealth. If he does believe this prior to special grace, he is deceived once again: works religion. He cannot open an account at heaven’s treasury on his own signature. Regeneration is the radical change that must precede the exchange process.

The price of radical change is lower for the poor man. He is not giving up much. The price of radical change is higher for the rich man. He surrenders much: his would-be autonomy. Radical decisions are rare. Most decisions are made at the margin: surrendering a little of this to get a little of that.

Jesus indicates here that the required change is radical: surrendering faith in this world’s ability to offer eternal bliss. You cannot buy your way into eternal life. So, it is not that the rich man is asked to give up his wealth that alienates him. He is asked only to tithe, just as the poor man is asked. But he is asked to surrender faith in his riches as a gateway to eternity. This is the great stumbling block of the gospel for the rich man: he cannot buy his way in. It is not much a stumbling block to the poor man, unless he is poor because of some addictive sin. The rich man is asked to see his riches as God’s gift, which God may remove at any time, just as He removed Job’s wealth. Job proclaimed, in the midst of his new-found poverty, “Naked came I out of my mother’s womb, and naked shall I return thither: the LORD gave, and the LORD hath taken away; blessed be the name of the LORD” (Job 1:21). The rich man is asked to proclaim this testimony in the midst of his treasure. Few do. They trust in their treasure.

Men generally see their success as well-deserved.¹⁵ They see any set-backs as deviations from justice. The poor man who comes to grips emotionally with his poverty can look forward to a better world after death. He is told by God that his poverty is part of God’s plan for him in this world. His poverty is no longer a curse or an injustice; it is merely an environment—even a predestined environment. He can mentally surrender faith in this world. But the rich man will not readily see his wealth as merely as a God-imposed environment. He sees his wealth as his legitimate reward for his own meritorious behavior, or at least his shrewd behavior. He is asked by God to turn loose of his positive, autonomous self-image, which is the product of the deceitfulness of riches. He refuses. His wealth reinforces—validates—his positive self-image. The gospel unquestionably removes this validation. He sees his wealth as a kingdom-building tool for his little kingdom. God says that his wealth is a kingdom-building tool for God's kingdom. The rich man sees his wealth as his tool. God says that both he and his wealth are God's tools. For a believer in autonomy, this is a bitter pill.

15. When they do not, they may be eaten up with guilt.

D. Inheritance

The issue of wealth is the issue of inheritance. Jesus told a parable of a rich man who dreamed of building new barns. "And he spake a parable unto them, saying, The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully: And he thought within himself, saying, What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits? And he said, This will I do: I will pull down my barns, and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods. And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry. But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then whose shall those things be, which thou hast provided? So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God" (Luke 12:16–21).¹⁶ His dream of new barns was legitimate. Grain must be stored. What was illegitimate was his thought that the barns would be his. He did not recognize his own mortality. He did not think about inheritance. He did not ask himself the question: "Whose shall those assets be?"

"Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth" (Matt. 5:5). Those who are meek before God will inherit.¹⁷ The rich man is deceived into believing that the might of his hand has gotten him his wealth. This was as true under the Mosaic Covenant as under the New Covenant. Jesus warned them that the success indicator of expanding wealth is not a legitimate substitute for being rich toward God.

But how can a person be rich toward God? Through worship. This was Haggai's warning to Israel. They had not built God's house of worship. "Go up to the mountain, and bring wood, and build the house; and I will take pleasure in it, and I will be glorified, saith the LORD. Ye looked for much, and, lo, it came to little; and when ye brought it home, I did blow upon it. Why? saith the LORD of hosts. Because of mine house that is waste, and ye run every man unto his own house. Therefore the heaven over you is stayed from dew, and the earth is stayed from her fruit. And I called for a drought upon the land, and upon the mountains, and upon the corn, and upon the new wine, and upon the oil, and upon that which the ground bringeth forth, and upon men, and upon cattle, and upon all the labour of the hands” (Hag. 1:8–11).¹⁸

16. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 25.

17. Chapter 4.

The open purse will be filled. The closed purse will be emptied. The open purse is open at the top, where its owner can reach in and pull out money to give at his discretion. The closed purse has a hole in the bottom. Its owner has no discretion as to what happens to the contents. The authority of a man over a full purse is based on his submission to God. This was as true in Haggai’s day as in Christ’s.

The inheritance that Christ spoke of is the whole earth. What greater accumulation of wealth could there be? It is accumulated by His people. How? By their wisdom, faithfulness, and generosity. By their efficiency, too. Honest wealth is the result of serving others, namely, customers. He who does not waste resources can serve customers better. Over time, this wealth builds up as His people extend the kingdom of God in history. This is the fulfillment of the dominion covenant.

Christ was warning His followers not to make the same mistake that those of Haggai’s generation made: the mistake of the tight purse. We are to be rich toward God. This is the basis of wealth accumulation under the New Covenant, just as it was under the Old. There is no discontinuity. The sanctions are the same. The law is the same. The sin is the same: autonomy.

Conclusion

The deceitfulness of riches chokes the word. What word? The word of God. The passage in Mark adds lusts. “And the cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, and the lusts of other things entering in, choke the word, and it becometh unfruitful” (Mark 4:19). The lusts that riches can temporarily fulfill blind men to the word of God.

The top priority here is to deal with riches in such a way as to avoid the great deception: autonomy. This was what Moses warned Israel; this is what Jesus also warned Israel. This warning is universal. Riches are either a covenantal blessing or a prelude to a covenantal curse. The man who dreamed of building barns was under a curse. He was a fool. He was building them for himself. He forgot about his own mortality. Mortals cannot enjoy the experience of wealth accumulation indefinitely. Either their time runs out or their wealth does. Jesus warned every rich man of the deception of riches. Riches seem to validate the rich man's presumption of immortality and autonomy. The rich man's wealth makes him feel autonomous and therefore divine. But men die, unlike God. The man with the barn-building plans forgot this.

18. North, Restoration and Dominion, ch. 32.

To be rich with God is not to dissipate one's wealth. It is to sew up the hole in the bottom of one's purse. Accounts receivable continue to exceed accounts paid. To be rich with God is also to accumulate wealth in the world beyond the grave. "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal" (Matt. 6:19–20).¹⁹ This investment program restores the lost continuity that individual mortality imposes. We inherit beyond the grave. By giving up the lust for autonomy in history, we can become our own heirs in eternity. We leave an inheritance behind, yet we immediately collect it in heaven. We can have our cake and eat it, too. He who succumbs to the deceitfulness of riches either consumes his cake before he dies or leaves it behind for others to enjoy. In either case, he is left without cake.

Men trust in wealth. The questions are these:

In what does permanent wealth consist?

Where is it accumulated?

When is it accumulated?

How is it accumulated?

When is it inherited?

Where is it inherited?

The content of a person's faith—his trust—is revealed by his answers to these questions.

19. Chapter 13.

CONTINUITY AND CIVILIZATION

Another parable put he forth unto them, saying, The kingdom of heaven is likened unto a man which sowed good seed in his field: But while men slept, his enemy came and sowed tares among the wheat, and went his way. But when the blade was sprung up, and brought forth fruit, then appeared the tares also. So the servants of the householder came and said unto him, Sir, didst not thou sow good seed in thy field? from whence then hath it tares? He said unto them, An enemy hath done this. The servants said unto him, Wilt thou then that we go and gather them up? But he said, Nay; lest while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat with them. Let both grow together until the harvest: and in the time of harvest I will say to the reapers, Gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them: but gather the wheat into my barn (Matt. 13:24–30).

The theocentric focus here is God's final judgment: sanctions.¹ In this passage, Jesus says that there will be no great discontinuous event that will precede this final judgment. The wheat and the tares will grow together in the same field until the reapers come to cut down the tares and destroy them.

A. Rival Kingdoms

The disciples were not sure what this parable meant. Jesus told them in private. "Then Jesus sent the multitude away, and went into the house: and his disciples came unto him, saying, Declare unto us the parable of the tares of the field. He answered and said unto them, He that soweth the good seed is the Son of man; The field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom; but the tares are the children of the wicked one; The enemy that sowed them is the devil; the harvest is the end of the world; and the reapers are the angels. As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire; so shall it be in the end of this world. The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity; And shall cast them into a furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. Who hath ears to hear, let him hear" (Matt. 13:36–43).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

First, this parable is about history and its consummation. The son of man sows the wheat: Jesus Christ. The field is the world. This is the arena of history. So, the parable concerns the development of history. This development is a contest between two kingdoms. The children of God constitute one kingdom; the children of Satan constitute the other.

Second, the two kingdoms develop in the field without any discontinuous event. The reapers do not enter the field until the wheat and the tares have fully developed. Each kingdom has extended its principles into the world. Each has sought to fill the field.

Third, the contest between the two kingdoms culminates in the final judgment: "The harvest is the end of the world; and the reapers are the angels. As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire; so shall it be in the end of this world." The great discontinuity is the final judgment. In it, the tares are removed from history; the wheat remains.

Fourth, neither kingdom establishes itself monopolistically in history. The tares remain; so does the wheat. History is the working out of the two kingdoms.

B. Eschatology and Development

The wheat and the tares develop over time. Neither can legitimately expect complete victory over the other. The contest will go on until the end of time. Each side strives to fill the field. Development is a feature of both sides.

As each side develops, it reduces the influence of the other. This parable does not indicate which side becomes dominant in history. It does indicate that there is no discontinuous event that will intervene to stop the development of either side. Neither side is cut off in the midst of time. Neither side sees its efforts completely reversed. Wheat and tares can hope for the future. The tares have no legitimate eternal hope, but they have legitimate earthly hope. They will never see their influence wholly suppressed in history.

1. Premillennialism

The premillennialist avoids dealing with this passage whenever possible. The premillennial interpretation of history rests on a view of the future that will contain a great discontinuity a thousand years prior to the final judgment. Historic premillennialists say that there will be a great tribulation period ahead for the church. After this period of persecution, Jesus will return bodily to set up His kingdom on earth. These expositors are post-tribulationists. There are very few historic premillennialists still writing. Pretribulation dispensational premillennialists say that Jesus will remove his church from history for seven years, or possibly three and a half years, during which the great tribulation will come on national Israel. Then Jesus, His church, the resurrected dead, and angels will return to set up a millennial kingdom.²

In both interpretations, the prior work of the kingdom is cut off in history, either by the Great Tribulation or the church's Rapture, which precedes the tribulation of national Israel. That is, whatever success the church has achieved culturally will be reversed. The world will become dominated by covenant-breakers. They will overcome the kingdom of God. It will take a cosmic discontinuity—the bodily return of Jesus—to overcome this great reversal.

This means that the investment, sacrifice, and commitment of Christians throughout history will not culminate in cultural dominance. Their efforts will be reversed in a great discontinuity: the Great Tribulation. Rather than compound growth's leading to cultural dominance, we are assured that virtually all of the church's work in history will come to ruin. Without the direct intervention of Jesus and His angels, the work of the church cannot produce cultural victory. There will be little or no trace of Christian institutions after the Great Tribulation. Covenant-breakers will make a clean sweep of history. Only Christ's overcoming of the process of history will restore Christian civilization. This implication is so horribly pessimistic that premillennialists rarely put it into print, but it is an inescapable conclusion of their system of interpretation.

2. The possibility of mixing resurrected saints and fallen humanity during the coming millennium has not been taken seriously by professionally trained dispensational theologians (e.g., John Walvoord, J. Dwight Pentecost), but popularizers of the dispensational position (e.g., Dave Hunt, an accountant) have asserted that this will take place. See John Walvoord, The Rapture Question, rev. ed.; Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan, 1979), p. 86; J. Dwight Pentecost, "The Relation between Living and Resurrected Saints in The Millennium," Bibliotheca Sacra, vol. 117 (Oct. 1960), pp. 337, 341. Hunt offers his contrary opinion: "After the Antichrist's kingdom has ended in doom, Jesus will reign over this earth at last. Which of these kingdoms we will be in depends upon the choice we make now—for God's truth or for the Lie." Dave Hunt, Peace Prosperity and the Coming Holocaust (Eugene, Oregon: Harvest House, 1983), p. 263.

2. Amillennialism

In contrast to the premillennialist, the amillennialist affirms continuity. He also affirms the progressive defeat of the church and Christian civilization (if any). Evil remains dominant in history. Some amillennialists place the Great Tribulation ahead of us. Premillennialism's pessimism regarding the pre-Second Coming church is also characteristic of the amillennial system of interpretation. What will save the church and Christians is the cosmic discontinuity of final judgment. Amillennialism teaches either a continuity of stalemate or a continuity of cultural surrender as the last day approaches.

Any suggestion that Christians should expect to see their efforts produce a transformed society is rejected by amillennialists as either naive or actually heretical. There supposedly can be no Christian civilization in history, and all attempts to build one is a manifestation of "triumphalism" or worse, "Constantinianism." Christian civilization is dismissed as a chimera and a false ideal that will always produce tyranny in the name of Christ. Amillennialists defend the idea of a religiously neutral civilization or even a covenant-breaking civilization as a preferred alternative to Constantinianism. Better to have tyranny in man's name than tyranny in God's name, they say. Their view of history predicts the universal rule of one or another form of tyranny. The preaching of the gospel can at best ameliorate this tyranny by creating pockets of righteousness: Christian ghettos. Yet even this protection will be lost during the Great Tribulation.³

3. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), pp. 76–92. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>) Cf. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), pp. 22–36; Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1992] 1997), Appendix A. (<http://bit.ly/klghshd>)

3. Postmillennialism

The postmillennialist argues that there will be a time of kingdom success and blessings prior to the final judgment. The kingdom of God will extend its influence across the earth. Rival kingdoms will be in minority opposition to the dominant culture, which will be Christian.

This means that Christians' efforts today to extend God's kingdom will produce permanent fruit in history. The eschatological continuity of history is a continuity of victory for God through His people. The dominion covenant will be progressively fulfilled in history. So will the Great Commission.⁴

The compounding process operates to the advantage of Christianity. Compound growth over time means that righteousness increases its dominance in history. Low rates of growth produce very large results if they are not interrupted or reversed. This means that a small investment today that compounds at a low rate will produce huge returns in the distant future. The inheritance of the righteous will grow. "For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth" (Ps. 37:9). "But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace" (Ps. 37:11).

C. Continuity and Risk

This promise of historic continuity lowers the risk of present investments for the person who looks beyond his own death. His heirs will reap the fruit of today's investment in the kingdom of God. By lowering the risk of a great reversal, Jesus' promise of continuity raises the reward to those who are future-oriented, i.e., those who have the kingdom of God as their goal rather than their own wealth.

The covenant-keeper who looks into the future and sees success for the kingdom of God rejoices. He defines himself by Christ's name. He claims the future victory of Christ's kingdom as his own. By identifying himself with the kingdom, he appropriates for himself its success or failure in history. The pessimillennialist announces the kingdom's cultural failure apart from an eschatological discontinuity. But if only a discontinuity can bring cultural victory to Christ's kingdom, then the return on any present investment in the kingdom will be culturally negative in the final analysis. The final victory of Christ's kingdom will have nothing to do with any investment made today. The risk of negative returns on today's cultural investments is total.

4. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/GentryGGC>)

This pessimillennial assessment of risk redirects Christian investment into narrowly defined activities, such as personal evangelism, church building projects, and defensive efforts to preserve a minimal degree of freedom from state interference. Because all efforts more comprehensive than these are said to be eschatologically doomed to failure, it is seen as a waste of scarce resources to attempt anything else. "You don't polish brass on a sinking ship," announced dispensational preacher J. Vernon McGee in the 1950's. Peter Lalonde, McGee's spiritual heir, says of the theonomic postmillennialist: "It's a question, 'Do you polish brass on a sinking ship?' And if they're working on setting up new institutions, instead of going out and winning the lost for Christ, then they're wasting the most valuable time on the planet earth right now, and that is the serious problem in his thinking."⁵ His is the theology of the rescue mission, not Christian civilization.⁶

The eschatological continuity described in Matthew 13:24–30 is in stark opposition to all forms of premillennialism. The pessimism of amillennialism is consistent with the parable of the wheat and tares, as is the optimism of postmillennialism. The parable does not say which seed will dominate the field. The pessimism of premillennialism is not consistent with the parable, for it affirms a discontinuity that the parable denies.

The kingdom parable of the mustard seed (v. 31) is consistent only with postmillennialism.⁷ The mustard seeds starts small and expands. Thus, Matthew 13 rejects premillennialism and promotes postmillennialism. When believed, postmillennialism promotes investments in culture-wide Christian projects. This outlook promotes future-orientation. It also declares that the return on today's investment in Christendom will produce a positive return. Future-orientation—the willingness to accept a low interest rate—when coupled with the promise of compound growth produces the investments that produce the capital that gets compounded.

5. "Dominion: A Dangerous New Theology," Tape 1 of Dominion: The Word and New World Order.

6. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, pp. 199–203.

7. See Chapter 30.

D. Continuity and Success

We are told to pray as a widow who bangs on the door of an unjust judge, until she receives judgment (Luke 18:2–6).⁸ That is to say, do not stop. Keep at it. Overcome resistance by persistence. The same strategy applies to our callings. “No man, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God” (Luke 9:62).⁹ We do not plow for the sake of plowing. We plow for the sake of harvesting and consuming or selling the harvest.

1. Line Upon Line

It is the steady worker who stays resolutely at his task who wins. The story of the tortoise and the hare are part of Western man’s worldview. Making it big on little deals is the correct procedure. “But the word of the LORD was unto them precept upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little, and there a little; that they might go, and fall backward, and be broken, and snared, and taken” (Isa. 28:13). “And I will send hornets before thee, which shall drive out the Hivite, the Canaanite, and the Hittite, from before thee. I will not drive them out from before thee in one year; lest the land become desolate, and the beast of the field multiply against thee. By little and little I will drive them out from before thee, until thou be increased, and inherit the land” (Ex. 23:28–30).

Inheritance extends across generations. So does God’s covenant. So do His commandments. “Know therefore that the LORD thy God, he is God, the faithful God, which keepeth covenant and mercy with them that love him and keep his commandments to a thousand generations; And repayeth them that hate him to their face, to destroy them: he will not be slack to him that hateth him, he will repay him to his face. Thou shalt therefore keep the commandments, and the statutes, and the judgments, which I command thee this day, to do them” (Deut. 7:9–11). The kingdom of God extends through history. Its persistence is its greatest strength. It does not go away.

Success parallels the kingdom in history. In fact, success is defined correctly only in terms of the kingdom of God. It is not my autonomous success that defines my success; rather, it is the part I play in the kingdom of God. Success is therefore based on continuity. It is also based on expansion. It is not that the kingdom holds its own; it spreads, as leaven spreads. The kingdom of God is not a holding action. It is a program of conquest.

8. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 42.

9. Ibid., ch. 20.

2. Amillennial Pessimism and Paralysis

The amillennialist looks at the kingdom and sees, at best, a holding action. Usually, he sees cultural surrender. He sees the church as a tiny band of stalwarts, surrounded by an ever-increasing enemy. Even those amillennialists who, like Van Til, rejected pietism, have created bleak expectations that paralyze long-term projects and commitments. Van Til warned against the temptation succumbed to by the premillennial fundamentalism of his day to “spend a great deal of their time in passive waiting instead of in active service. Another danger that lurks at a time of apostasy is that the few faithful ones give up the comprehensive ideal of the kingdom and limit themselves to the saving of individual souls.”¹⁰ He warned against ethical individualism. He understood that such individualism is a denial of covenant theology.

He believed with all his heart that evil triumphs visibly in history, and righteousness loses the culture war. He taught throughout his career that the principles of evil produce visible power and victory, whereas the principles of righteous living under God produce historical defeat. History is not neutral; one side or the other wins; one ethical system or the other produces victory; and Van Til sided with those who proclaim that Satan’s system works (wins) in history. He made this plain: “But when all the reprobate are epistemologically self-conscious, the crack of doom has come. The fully self-conscious reprobate will do all he can in every dimension to destroy the people of God. So while we seek with all our power to hasten the process of differentiation in every dimension we are yet thankful, on the other hand, for ‘the day of grace,’ the day of undeveloped differentiation. Such tolerance as we receive on the part of the world is due to this fact that we live in the earlier, rather than in the later, stage of history. And such influence on the public situation as we can effect, whether in society or in state, presupposes this undifferentiated stage of development.”¹¹

Notice especially his words, “we are yet thankful, on the other hand, for ‘the day of grace,’ the day of undeveloped differentiation.”

10. Cornelius Van Til, Christian Theistic Ethics, vol. 3 of In Defense of Biblical Christianity (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, [1958] 1980), p. 122.

11. Van Til, Common Grace (1947), in Common Grace and the Gospel (Nutley, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1972), p. 85.

This is nothing short of a ghastly reworking of the idea of God's grace. He knew it, too, which is why he puts the words the day of grace in quotation marks. He knew that it is the opposite of grace that Christians are not fully self-conscious epistemologically, and more to the point, ethically. But his amillennialism had a stranglehold on his theory of ethics. He viewed today's earlier so-called "day of grace" as a day in which covenant-breakers are also not fully self-conscious, and this, in the amillennialist's universe of progressive Church impotence and progressive humanist power, is a good thing for covenant-keepers in an external, cultural sense. In short, as time goes on, covenant-breakers will retain control—Satan's doctrine of "squatter's rights"¹²—and steadily consolidate their hold over world civilization as they become more consistent with their religion, while covenant-keepers will fail to gain or lose control over civilization because they become more consistent with their religion. This is the ethical outlook of both premillennialism and amillennialism. Ethics is tied to eschatology. If your eschatology is incorrect, your ethics will be incorrect if your worldview is internally consistent. To teach that the progress of the gospel in history is not progressive, i.e., that the gospel does not lead to worldwide dominion by covenant-keepers, is to teach that ethical cause and effect in history is perverse, testifying not to a God who keeps His promises in history but rather to a god who breaks them.¹³

3. Lost-Cause Evangelism

Those in the amillennial and premillennial camps who are upset that we theonomic postmillennialists dismiss their eschatological views as if they were not worth considering have failed to recognize that our uncompromising hostility to rival eschatological views is based on our commitment to biblical ethics. Our eschatology is deeply influenced by our view of biblical law and its effects in history. It is not this or that rival interpretation of this or that prophetic Bible passage that is the primary focus of our concern. It is rather the overall view held by our eschatological opponents, which affirms the culture-losing effects of biblical law in history, that draws our fire. Their view of history is not neutral; it is not random; and it surely is not "even." It is perverse: a belief that God will not bless covenant-keeping in history,

12. Gary North, Inherit the Earth: Biblical Blueprints for Economics (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), p. 61. (<http://bit.ly/gninherit>) and will not curse covenant-breaking.

13. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

Most people will not sacrifice for a guaranteed lost cause. They will be interested mainly in escaping the worst things that a life of assured defeat has to offer. It is naive to expect men to commit everything they own to a campaign which God has announced in advance that His people must lose. Only a handful of suicidal fanatics will do this, and the church is not built up by such people.

For those Christians who believe that God has abandoned history to the devil, mysticism is one way out. The Eastern church has adopted weekly mysticism through intensive liturgy as its way to cope with an oppressive history. The Western church has sometimes had mystical movements, but on the whole, Western Christianity is too judicial for mysticism to gain a foothold. Protestant amillennialists have adopted the fortress mentality: the church as a defensive institution. They call people into the fortress. They call people out of cultural confrontation and into the cloister. The churches hesitate to conquer occupied ground, for they teach that such ground will eventually be reconquered by the enemy. To spend time, money, and emotional commitment to conquer territory that will have to be surrendered later is no general's idea of a successful strategy. A good general does not call on all of his men to die for a lost cause.

What the Bible teaches is cultural victory through generational inheritance.¹⁴ It teaches that God's people can and will extend His kingdom into every nook and cranny of existence. Wherever sin holds territory, there must the conflict take place. The two kingdoms issue comprehensive claims. They have comprehensive programs and strategies. Christianity conquers slowly, but it conquers comprehensively. Whenever it surrenders territory, it must mark that lost ground for a future conflict. This is not done today, because Christians have denied the biblical covenant model. They have substituted an Arminian view of God for Augustine's, Luther's¹⁵ and Calvin's predestinating God. They have substituted a doctrine of polytheistic civil government for Trinitarian theocracy. They have substituted natural law for biblical law. They have denied that God brings corporate sanctions in history in terms of biblical law. They have substituted eschatologies of guaranteed cultural defeat for the church in place of postmillennialism. They have redefined the kingdom of God to apply only to souls,

14. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012).

15. Martin Luther, Bondage of the Will (1525).

families, and churches. Then they have called men to extend this truncated kingdom by means of gospel tracts, rescue missions, and toe-tapping music with lyrics only marginally more challenging theologically than children's songs. Having set their sights low, Christians have achieved even less.

Conclusion

Eschatology is important for culture. Rival views of the future produce different plans and different results. This passage teaches that there will be no discontinuous reversal in history for covenant-keepers. The great discontinuity comes only at the end of time: final judgment. This means that Bible passages that are invoked to defend a future secret Rapture in the midst of history are being misused. They apply only to the events immediately preceding the final judgment.

The top priority derived from this passage is the building of confidence in the kingdom's cultural future. There will be no great eschatological reversal in the midst of history. Covenant-breaking society will not overturn the kingdom work of covenant-keepers. An investment made today in the building of any aspect of the kingdom of God has the potential for compounding over time. This lowers the risk of making such investments. Such investments are not doomed eschatologically. When believed, this eschatological outlook will increase the number of such investments for two reasons: increased future-orientation and reduced risk of failure.

HOPE AND COMMITMENT

Another parable put he forth unto them, saying, The kingdom of heaven is like to a grain of mustard seed, which a man took, and sowed in his field: Which indeed is the least of all seeds: but when it is grown, it is the greatest among herbs, and becometh a tree, so that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof. Another parable spake he unto them; The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took, and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened (Matt. 13:31–33).

The theocentric focus here was the kingdom of heaven, which in the other gospels is referred to as the kingdom of God. The issue was growth: point five of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Small Beginnings

Jesus spoke these words to residents of a tiny nation which was under the rule of a great empire. His listeners were a captive people. Their nation had been under the rule of other empires for six centuries. Here was a limited audience indeed. Yet Jesus spoke to them in terms of great expectations.

The kingdom of God had been bottled up in Israel until the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities. Then it gained limited influence outside the borders of the Promised Land. But this influence had not transformed the empires that had ruled over Israel. A few kings had been impressed with the God of Israel, but this did not change the religious commitment of their empires.

The temple of Jesus' day was a great structure, but its rebuilding had begun over four decades earlier under a gentile king, Herod—the king who later sought to kill the infant Jesus.² The sacrifices still went on, but the world did not come to Israel in supplication. The kingdom of God was visible to those who wanted to see it, but few did. The Old Testament was available on scrolls, but only a handful of people possessed copies. The kingdom of God in Jesus' day was a highly circumscribed phenomenon.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

This was not to remain true much longer, but Jesus' listeners did not know this at the time. They had seen no victories. All they saw was foreign tyranny. They longed for deliverance, but there was no evidence that deliverance was possible. Yet Jesus was preaching victory: the expansion of the kingdom of God. He spoke of small beginnings and large results. There was no doubt in His mind: the kingdom of God was not a small matter. Despite the fact that His was a day of small beginnings, He told His listeners that something significant was in their midst. They could become part of a great kingdom. He had just told them, "But if I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you" (Matt. 12:28).³

They had seen this or had heard of it. Jesus was telling them that a new period of kingdom growth was imminent.

This was hard to believe. For too long, Israel had been isolated, trodden down by gentiles. The nation had never been large. After all these centuries, would the nation of Israel now become a significant factor in world history? Or did Jesus mean something else? Was the kingdom about to be separated from the nation? What did He really mean? Even His disciples were confused, which is why they came to Him in private for explanations of His kingdom parables.

B. The Mustard Seed

The mustard seed is small. Its results are great. The disparity between what is visible at the beginning and what takes place at the end is the heart of this analogy. Elsewhere, Jesus made the same comparison with respect to men's faith. "And Jesus said unto them, Because of your unbelief: for verily I say unto you, If ye have faith as a

2. Herod was a major builder. See Dwayne W. Roller, The Building Program of Herod the Great (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998).

3. In Luke's account, we read: "But if I with the finger of God cast out devils, no doubt the kingdom of God is come upon you" (Luke 11:20). This points back to the giving of the law. "And he gave unto Moses, when he had made an end of communing with him upon mount Sinai, two tables of testimony, tables of stone, written with the finger of God" (Ex. 31:18).

grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place; and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you" (Matt. 17:20). "And the Lord said, If ye had faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye might say unto this sycamine tree, Be thou plucked up by the root, and be thou planted in the sea; and it should obey you" (Luke 17:6).

The message was clear: that which is visibly small can have important results in the future. Do not be fooled by the initial indications. What lies ahead is much greater than what is visible today. He who focuses solely on what is visible today will be misled by what he sees. That which is visible today is not representative of that which will be visible later. Without faith, the tyranny of the present will overwhelm the faithful. Rome looked large; the kingdom of God looked small. Rome had great power; the kingdom of God did not seem to. But this was an illusion, Jesus said. The mustard seed does not reveal the future results. Those who knew something of mustard seeds could understand what Jesus was saying. Those without this knowledge could not.

What is visible today should not paralyze faithful men by undermining their confidence in the future. The mustard seed today is not what is important; what it will become is important. The same is true of God's kingdom. Jesus told His listeners of great things to come. The reality of these great things would have to be accepted on faith. But for those who took His words seriously, this new optimism would motivate them to work to extend God's kingdom in history.

C. The Transforming Effect of Leaven

Another brief analogy continued the theme of growth. The kingdom is like leaven. Leaven is inserted into dough in order to make it rise. A small amount produces visible growth throughout the dough. The loaf rises because of the presence of the leaven. The leaven spreads through all of the dough, affecting all of it.

Elsewhere, Jesus spoke of the leaven of the Pharisees. "Then Jesus said unto them, Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees" (Matt. 16:6). At first, they did not understand His meaning, but later they did. "Then understood they how that he bade them not beware of the leaven of bread, but of the doctrine of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees" (Matt. 16:12). The doctrine of the Pharisees and Sadducees would produce a different kind of loaf. Jesus was setting forth the image of dough that would accept either form of leaven. The leaven of the kingdom is also doctrinal. It presents a specific view of God, man, law, sanctions, and the future. Rival kingdoms are based on rival views of these same covenantal doctrines.

Leaven can be positive or negative, Jesus said. In the temple sacrifices, leaven was never offered on the altar (Lev. 2:11).⁴ But the firstfruits offering had to be leavened bread (Lev. 23:17). So, leaven was not a symbol of evil. It was a symbol of growth. The question is: Which leaven will raise the dough of history? Whose leaven will succeed in transforming the dough of civilization? God's or Satan's?

Jesus was arguing that the leaven of the kingdom raises the dough of history to produce the good bread. The leaven of the firstfruits is to be seen as representative of the final bread. The kingdom of God in history will be triumphant. The whole loaf is raised up, Jesus said. The loaf is a metaphor for history.

D. Eschatology and Hope

These two analogies—mustard seed and leaven—offer hope to God's people, and not just hope for eternity, but hope for history. The eschatology of these two analogies is clearly optimistic. It is based on the comprehensive transforming power of God's kingdom in history.

This hope which is designed to motivate God's people to extend His kingdom. The extension of God's kingdom is the essence of the dominion covenant. The whole world is to be subdued by God's people for the glory of God. The Great Commission (Matt. 28:18–20) is the New Covenant's reaffirmation of the original dominion covenant given to Adam (Gen. 1:26–28).⁵

Hope undergirds action. He who is without earthly hope finds it costly to commit resources to projects that cannot succeed. Jesus set forth a vision of the world transformed. He called His servants to participate in this endeavor. He told them of the world-transforming results of their earthly efforts. He did not tell them that their efforts would always be overshadowed by the leaven of rival kingdoms. He called them to replace the rival leavens with the leaven of God's kingdom.

4. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 2:B.

5. Chapter 48. See also Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/GentryGGC>)

Hope is a powerful motivation. Confidence in the future is a personally transforming force. The Communists once possessed this hope.⁶ They saw themselves as the vanguard of the proletarian victory. Their efforts transformed one-third of the world in the twentieth century and influenced much of the remainder. But when they lost hope, they faltered. The Communist movement died an embarrassing death, August 19–21, 1991, in the failed Communist Party coup in the Soviet Union. In a few days, the world was laughing at the seemingly drunken bureaucrats who had attempted to reclaim leadership for the Communist Party. Laughter doomed Russian Communism.

Hope for the future lowers the cost of action in the present. A law of economics is this: as the cost of anything falls, more of it is demanded (other things remaining equal). Here is an application of this principle: greater hope for the future produces greater sacrifice in the present. The investment of capital in the present finances the growth of the kingdom. By promising great things in the future, Jesus was presenting the case for His followers' increased commitment of resources to building the kingdom.

Conclusion

God extends His visible rule in history through the efforts of Christians. His kingdom replaces the rival kingdoms of Satan. Because God is sovereign, His kingdom cannot fail in history. No matter how small it seems at any time, it will expand in history. Its invisibility today is in contrast with its visibility in the future.

The top priority for covenant-keeping man is the extension of God's kingdom in history. This has been true ever since God told Adam to subdue the earth. Sin has made this task more difficult. Rival kingdoms now compete for control in history.

Jesus told His listeners that the kingdom of God would not always remain small. It would expand. He was inviting His listeners to participate in this expansion. They were not to despise the day of small beginnings. Instead, they were to commit themselves to a process that would transcend time and borders.

He gave them hope. This hope was to serve God's people as a motivation for their sacrificial commitment, generation after generation. Without this hope of earthly success over time, commitment to the dominion covenant becomes more expensive. Men are less likely to commit the resources necessary for victory if they do not expect victory. The cost is too high.

6. F. N. Lee, Communist Eschatology (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1974).

31

HIDDEN TREASURE

Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto treasure hid in a field; the which when a man hath found, he hideth, and for joy thereof goeth and selleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field. Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchant man, seeking goodly pearls: Who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had, and bought it. (Matt. 13:44–46).

The theocentric principle here was the high value of the kingdom of God. It is so high that a wise man will sell all that he has in order to buy it if it is available for purchase. The next parable in the passage reinforces this one: “Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchant man, seeking goodly pearls: Who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had, and bought it” (Matt. 13:45–46). The covenantal issue was sanctions.¹

A. Lost and Found²

This parable seems to be contradictory to the Mosaic law of lost property: “Thou shalt not see thy brother’s ox or his sheep go astray, and hide thyself from them: thou shalt in any case bring them again unto thy brother. And if thy brother be not nigh unto thee, or if thou know him not, then thou shalt bring it unto thine own house, and it shall be with thee until thy brother seek after it, and thou shalt restore it to him again. In like manner shalt thou do with his ass; and so shalt thou do with his raiment; and with all lost things of thy brother’s,

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 4.

2. This section and the one that follows is taken from Chapter 51 of Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012).

which he hath lost, and thou hast found, shalt thou do likewise: thou mayest not hide thyself. Thou shalt not see thy brother's ass or his ox fall down by the way, and hide thyself from them: thou shalt surely help him to lift them up again" (Deut. 22:1–4). Why isn't Jesus' example a case of lost property? Why isn't the finder required to report it to the presumed owner, i.e., the owner of the field? Because the treasure had been deliberately hidden.

Jesus was challenging Old Covenant Israel to cease hiding the treasure of salvation in a morass of legalism. The kingdom of heaven is not supposed to be hidden; it is to be shared with all the world. But someone had taken the treasure and had hidden it, He said. This was similar to the action taken by the responsibility-averse wicked servant who refused to multiply his master's goods as a faithful steward—another kingdom parable.

Then he which had received the one talent came and said, Lord, I knew thee that thou art an hard man, reaping where thou hast not sown, and gathering where thou hast not strawed: And I was afraid, and went and hid thy talent in the earth: lo, there thou hast that is thine. His lord answered and said unto him, Thou wicked and slothful servant, thou knewest that I reap where I sowed not, and gather where I have not strawed: Thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers, and then at my coming I should have received mine own with usury. Take therefore the talent from him, and give it unto him which hath ten talents. For unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance: but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath. And cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth (Matt. 25:24–30).³

The person who discovers a hidden treasure is not under any obligation to inform the owner of the field of its existence. Someone had taken steps to hide the asset. The original owner had decided to invest the treasure merely by hiding it. This is not the best way to increase wealth except in times of warfare or widespread theft. It is better to put the asset to work. The hidden asset probably is not being used productively. The finder takes a great risk by selling everything he owns to make a bid on the field. The field's owner, if he knows about the treasure, may dig it up and then sell the field—now far overpriced—to the finder. But if the field's owner does not know about the hidden treasure, the buyer is not under any moral obligation to tell him about it.

3. Chapter 47.

The field's buyer is reclaiming the asset from the heirs of the original treasure-hider, who know nothing about the whereabouts of the treasure and who did not hide it. They have no legal claims on this property. They are not like the owner of lost property, who does have a legal claim. The treasure in the field is not marked. It is not the responsibility of the discoverer to seek out the heirs, who may be scattered across the face of the earth, depending on how long the treasure has been hidden. The person most likely to put the hidden treasure to productive use is the treasure-finder who is willing to sell all that he has to buy the field.

The Jews had hidden God's kingdom in Jesus' era. They were hoarding it. They were not taking it in its pure form to the gentiles. They had encrusted it with layers of man-made law, thereby hiding it. This was hampering the growth of the kingdom. This is why Jesus also said: "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43). Jesus was telling His listeners that they had found the hidden treasure: the kingdom of heaven. It was time for them to commit everything they owned to the spread of the good news of redemption to gentiles as well as to Jews. The Jews refused to admit that what they had done by way of legalism and nationalism had concealed the kingdom from gentiles. Thus, the kingdom would soon rightfully be the property of the church, which would strip the message of redemption from its legalism and share it with the world. It was not that the kingdom had been lost; it had been deliberately hidden by the Jews and kept out of plain sight. Thus, the Mosaic law of lost property did not apply in this parable.

B. Idle Resources and Entrepreneurship

The economic principle governing hidden treasure is what W. H. Hutt called the theory of idle resources. Hidden treasure is not idle if it is the object of human decision-making. It is invested in a particular way. When resources are deliberately not being used to produce goods and services, this may be because of the owners' lack of information about how to maximize the value of the unused asset, i.e., to make it worth more in production than it is sitting idle. Or it may be because the owner is highly risk-averse. Hutt's economic analysis also identifies bottlenecks of information created by government policy, such as minimum wage laws or other forms of price control.⁴

When an idle resource is idle because no one recognizes it as valuable, or because the owner has forgotten where it is hidden, then the way to get it back into production is to allow a finder to buy it. This is an application of the Austrian school's theory of entrepreneurship: profit as the result of the decision of an entrepreneur who bears the economic uncertainty associated with production. He believes that he possesses better knowledge regarding future customer demand than his competitors do. He buys a productive good at a price that is lower than it would be if all producers recognized its highest future use. If his forecast is correct, and if he puts the underpriced asset to cost-effective use, then he gains his reward: an above-average rate of return on his investment. If his forecast is incorrect, or if he misallocates the resource, then he reaps losses.

To maximize the spread of accurate information and any customer benefits associated with this information, the free market social order allows entrepreneurs to buy fields containing "hidden treasure." These fields are in the form of scarce resources that are not priced as high as they would be if other entrepreneurs knew the truth: hidden treasures are buried in them, i.e., there are benefits that customers will be willing to pay for. These treasures are analogous to forgotten or ignored resources that are not being put to their maximum customer-satisfying uses. In short, accurate information regarding the future is not the equivalent of a lost sheep that has wandered off and will soon be missed by the owner. It is the equivalent of a treasure buried long ago: taken out of production by a previous owner, and then forgotten. There is no moral reason why someone who finds a way to serve the public better through putting that treasure back into production should be required to broadcast this information to anyone. But he must not steal it; he must buy the field in which it is hidden. He must bear the costs of gaining ownership.⁵

C. Risk and Information

Consider what the man in the parable was doing. He stumbles across an important piece of information. There is a valuable treasure

4. W. H. Hutt, The Theory of Idle Resources: A Study in Definition, 2nd ed. (Indianapolis: LibertyPress, 1977).

5. The remainder of the chapter, though not the Conclusion, is taken from an essay that appeared in The Freeman: "Exploitation and Knowledge" (Jan. 1982). (<http://bit.ly/gnexploit>) hidden in a field. He is not sure just who it was who hid it, but it is there. He presumes that the person who hid it is not the present owner of the field. He is not certain of this at first, but he is willing to take a major step. He hides the treasure again, and goes out and sells everything that he owns. I suppose he did some preliminary investigating, just to see if the present owner will sell the field. But the present owner may change his mind. Or he may have known about the treasure all the time, and he is luring the speculator into a disastrous decision. The treasure may not really be that valuable. The discoverer cannot be certain. But he takes a chance. He sells everything, and goes to the owner with his money. He buys the field. Now he owns the treasure. He took advantage of special information: his knowledge of the existence of a treasure in a particular field. He took a risk when he sold everything that he owned to come up with the purchase price. Then he went back to the owner, thereby alerting the owner to a possible opportunity—the possibility that something valuable is connected to the field. Maybe it would be unwise to sell it after all. But finally he decides to sell. The entrepreneur—the man with the information and some venture capital—has closed the deal. He has attained his goal.

D. The Socialist View

The modern socialist would be outraged at this parable. He says, “The entrepreneur, who was striving to better his position, was acting immorally. First, the land he was on should have been owned by the people, through the state. Second, he had no business being on the land, without proper papers having been filed with the state in advance. Third, he should never have hidden the treasure again. It was the state’s. Fourth, if it was not the property of the state, then he should have notified the private owner of the property. Fifth, failing this, he was immoral to make the offer to buy the property. He as stealing from the poor man who owned the property. Sixth, should he attempt to sell the treasure, the state ought to tax him at a minimum rate of 80 per cent. Seventh, if he refuses to sell, the state should impose a property tax, or a direct capital tax, to force him to sell.”

What the socialist-redistributionist really objects to is mankind’s lack of omniscience. The economy should operate as smoothly, as efficiently, and as profit-free as an economy in which each participant has perfect knowledge. Knowledge, in a “decent” social order, is a universally available free good, equally available to all, and equally acted upon by all. It is only the existence of private property, personal greed, and a willingness to exploit the poor that has created our world of scarcity, profits, and losses. Knowledge about the future should be regarded as a free good. Profits are therefore evil, not to mention unnecessary, in a sound economy. This has been the argument—the real, underlying, implicit argument—of all those who equate profits and exploitation.

Men are not God; they are not omniscient. This angers the socialists, and they strike out in wrath against the market order which seeks to encourage men to search for better information so that they can profit from its application in economic affairs. The socialists prefer to stop the search for information concerning the uncertain future, rather than to allow private citizens to profit personally from the use of knowledge in society.

E. The Transfer of Knowledge

Accurate knowledge of the future is a valuable asset. How can society profit from its discovery and application? Not everyone wants to take the time and trouble to forecast the future. No one can take the time and trouble to search out all the possible bits of information concerning an uncertain future that might be useful to him or his family. So, we allow specialists to bear the risks of action, and sell us the results at a price that we are willing and able to pay. We customers become the users, and therefore the beneficiaries, of the entrepreneur's willingness and ability to peer into the future, take steps to meet the demand of the uncertain future, and deliver the finished product—consumer good, consumer service, or spiritual insight—at a price we are willing to pay. Why should we care what price he paid or what risks he bore when we pay the price? Of course, if we knew what he paid, we might guess that he is willing to take less than what he is asking, but why should we care from a moral standpoint what he paid versus what he is asking us to pay?

Besides, the existence of a profit on a transaction, if recognized by others, encourages other entrepreneurs to search out similar opportunities to present to us in the future. Let us consider the entrepreneur-worker. He accepts the job with ABC Widgets. The workers throw a farewell party for him. The conversation inevitably gets around to the reason why he is leaving. "Hey, Charlie, why are you leaving XYZ Widgets? Haven't we had great times together? What are you trying to do, get on their bowling team or something?” And Charlie may be willing to say, now that he knows he has his new job. He can look like a smart operator in front of his friends. “I’m leaving because I’m going to make twice my present pay, that’s why. Why should I stay here at XYZ Widgets and work for less than I’m worth?” That bit of information will make itself felt in the labor market of XYZ Widgets very, very fast. The management of XYZ Widgets will have to do some explaining, and perhaps make some wage adjustments for the workers, as the effects of the new knowledge are felt. Workers leave for ABC Widgets. The spread of information is rapid because the pay-off for those who have it is immediate and personally beneficial for those who act in terms of it.

F. Profiting from Better Knowledge

Knowledge is a scarce economic resource. It is a good thing for members of society to act in terms of accurate information. It is certainly a wise policy to allow citizens to profit from the use of better knowledge. That way, there is an economic incentive for others to enter the “knowledge market” and take advantage of whatever knowledge is available. The spread of accurate knowledge is increased because of the profit potential offered to acting individuals. If better knowledge is a valuable asset, then its sale in the market should be encouraged.

Inaccurate knowledge should be abandoned rapidly. How do we best stop the transfer of inaccurate knowledge? Make it expensive to act in terms of inaccurate knowledge. This is why we need opportunities to make losses as well as profits. Make the use of inaccurate knowledge expensive to those who use it, and you will discourage its transfer through the whole society. This is perhaps more important than encouraging the production or discovery of new, accurate knowledge. There are always more good ideas available than capital to finance them. But the continued use of bad ideas—loss-producing ideas—inhibits the build-up of capital. It is always very risky to launch a new project, since there are so many variables. But dropping a bad economic idea is an immediate benefit to society, for it increases the capital base—the information base—by removing a major source of capital consumption. The existence of losses testifies to the existence of inappropriate plans in an economy. Without negative feedback—the loss portion of the profit-and-loss sheet—society has no effective way to eliminate bad economic ideas. If men see the danger of establishing censorship boards to reduce the spread of knowledge, they had better cling to the free market's mechanism for eliminating erroneous information.

Conclusion

The ethics of the parable is based on the suggestion that a treasure in a field belongs to the owner of the field. The field in this case belonged to Old Covenant Israel. This would not be true for much longer (Matt. 21:43). Hidden in that field was a lost treasure: the kingdom of God. To obtain possession of this treasure, the discoverer was told to commit everything he owns.

The top priority here is extending the kingdom of God. The proper response to the news of the kingdom is for a person to commit everything he owns to its extension. It is more valuable than personal wealth. It is the ultimate form of wealth.

There is another implication: do not hide this treasure. Israel had hidden it and was therefore about to lose possession of it. To keep ownership of it, a person or a society must share it. Its value increases as it is shared with others. The kingdom's division of labor increases when more people come into it. Its productivity increases because every participant's wealth increases. As with the telephone or other communications technology, the more people who use phones, the greater the value of the system to everyone. One telephone is useless. Two are not worth much. A large telephone system is very valuable. Each additional installed telephone increases the value of all of them, even though mass production decreases its price. So it is with the kingdom of God.

TRADITION AND INNOVATION

Then said he unto them, Therefore every scribe which is instructed unto the kingdom of heaven is like unto a man that is an householder, which bringeth forth out of his treasure things new and old (Matt. 13:52).

The theocentric principle here was progress in history, point five of the biblical covenant.¹ The kingdom of God offers those who understand it a way to preserve what is good in history, yet also innovate.

A. The Old Covenant Scribe

The Old Covenant scribe knew the Mosaic law. He was literate. He could read and write. He possessed authority because he possessed this technical understanding. But this was not enough. He also was supposed to understand God's written word. Jesus recognized that His disciples would have to possess comparable knowledge if they were to replace the scribes as agents possessing authority. "Jesus saith unto them, Have ye understood all these things? They say unto him, Yea, Lord" (v. 51). They were confident that they understood, despite the fact that they had just come to ask Him what His parable of the tares and wheat meant.

The disciples had to become masters of understanding and exposition, for the New Covenant church was about to replace the old priestly order. The office of priest would disappear when the temple and its sacrifices ended. What would replace this office? Jesus made the answer clear in this long-ignored passage. A New Testament expositor would be a scribe. He would have to declare the word of God in terms of the Old Covenant and the New. He would have to be a master of the Old Covenant and a minister of the New. Only through such public declaration could he gain greater authority than that possessed by the Old Covenant scribes.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

Jesus had already begun this transfer of authority. "And it came to pass, when Jesus had ended these sayings, the people were astonished at his doctrine: For he taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes" (Matt. 7:28–29).

Jesus had just finished describing the kingdom of God in a series of parables, analogies, and metaphors. Now He added a final analogy: the scribe, in his capacity as an interpreter of the kingdom, is like a householder with a treasure. Once again, Jesus moved the framework of discussion to the realm of economics.

B. Oikos

The word "economics" comes from the Greek word for house: oikos. This is the Greek root word for "householder," which we find in this passage. The household is the fundamental economic unit because it is where the division of labor begins. Wives help husbands; husbands support wives; both support children. The household is the starting point for a correct understanding of exchange and specialization.

The successful householder possesses treasure. This treasure includes old things: antiques. It also possesses new items. The mix of old and new is basic to the successful household. It is therefore basic to an economy.

The old items represent tradition. Men look back to the past in search of meaning. Who they are today, what they do, and what they possess depend on what took place in the past. Men respect the past because it made possible the present. It shaped the present. Men keep old objects that remind them of what went before, especially whatever went before that endures and is worth preserving.

The passage speaks of treasure. Items from the past have value because they are testimonies to the ways of success. They are also scarce. They are not being produced any longer. They are in limited supply. This makes them valuable when there is demand for them.

The passage also speaks of new items of value. The successful householder is alert to change. He lives in a changing world. He must respond to new demand and new techniques of production employed by his competitors. He must look into the future and guess what conditions will be like then. He must make plans now in order to prepare for the unknown future.

This is why new things are important. The householder possesses new things to make his life more productive or enjoyable. History does not stand still. There is progress. The wise man is alert to the reality of change. He buys or makes new possessions that enable him to keep up. To fail to do this is to fall behind. It is to remove oneself from the world of one's contemporaries.

C. The New Covenant Scribe

The New Covenant was about to replace the Old Covenant. Jesus' ministry was the first stage of this transition. "But if I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you" (Matt. 12:28). His death and resurrection would inaugurate the second stage, which lasted 40 days. On the basis of His resurrection, He announced His new power: "And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth" (Matt. 28:18). Then came His ascension to heaven (Acts 1), which was followed by the sending of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost (Acts 2). Finally, the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 marked the completion of the transition—the end of Old Covenant Israel and the cessation of new revelation.²

This was a covenantal discontinuity. The church would henceforth serve as the scribe: announcing what was still in force of the Old Covenant while applying the New Covenant to specific circumstances. The break from the past was not total. There was continuity, for the same God who revealed Himself in the Old Covenant has revealed Himself in the New. How was the church to regard the kingdom? As something old and new. As something that extended to the whole world that which God had begun in Israel.

The New Covenant scribe therefore looks back to the past and proclaims the future. He honors the past while working toward a far better future. He tells old stories and announces new applications of lessons learned. He is neither a priest nor a prophet. He does not offer sacrifices, nor does he speak with such authority that kings must obey him. He receives no authoritative revelations from God. The canon of Scripture is closed. His authority comes from his understanding of the written word of God, just as the Old Covenant scribe's authority came.

2. Kenneth L. Gentry, Before Jerusalem Fell: Dating the Book of Revelation (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/klgbjf>)

The New Covenant scribe applies to the present the written word's declaration of the past and future. He brings forth treasures of the past and the present. He looks to the future. He is future-oriented in a way that the scribes in Jesus' day should have been but were not.

D. The Inheritance

The biblical concept of inheritance links past, present, and future. Each generation is to add to the inheritance it has received. The inheritance is not so much a bloodline inheritance as confessional. The kingdom of God expands because it is cumulative. It extends over time; therefore it extends over borders. It develops.

Inheritance is normally associated with families. The oikos is the place where children learn of their inheritance: what was left to the household by the forefathers, and what will be left to it. The inheritance is both name and capital. The transition takes place with the death of the testator.

The crucial New Covenant inheritance is eternal life. This inheritance was suggested in the Old Covenant in Daniel 12:1–3. “And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people: and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time: and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever.” Second, in Job 19:25–27: “For I know that my redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth: And though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God: Whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another; though my reins be consumed within me.” In the New Covenant, eternal inheritance replaces family inheritance as the central concept of inheritance.

The Epistle to the Hebrews ties eternal inheritance to the death of Christ. “For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh: How much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God? And for this cause he is the mediator of the new testament, that by means of death, for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first testament, they which are called might receive the promise of eternal inheritance. For where a testament is, there must also of necessity be the death of the testator. For a testament is of force after men are dead: otherwise it is of no strength at all while the testator liveth" (Heb. 9:13–17).

The biblical doctrine of inheritance provided the basis of the concept of economic growth. Linear history is affirmed by the biblical concept of inheritance. But because the inheritance promised the whole world to the righteous,³ it implied the doctrine of corporate economic growth. The inheritance of the faithful will compound over time. This was a revolutionary idea in the ancient world, which believed in cyclical history. Not only is time linear, Jesus taught, it is progressive.

The inheritance passes down through the generations. It is therefore both past-oriented and future-oriented. The past has value today because it confirms God's faithfulness over time. It reinforces covenant-keeping men's faith in the future. The past testifies to the future. The continuity provided by covenantal inheritance gives covenant-keepers confidence in the future.

E. The Idea of Progress

Confidence in the future is vital for risk-bearing and uncertainty-bearing.⁴ It is vital to progress. The covenant-keeper can afford to risk much in his efforts to extend God's kingdom. He has inherited much. He has confidence in God's sustaining hand. This or that project may fail, but the kingdom expands. He may fail, but others involved in kingdom projects will succeed. His efforts are part of a comprehensive program of corporate dominion.

The past testifies to the existence of progress. This is the lesson of the householder in the analogy. He has old treasures and new treasures to show as his inheritance. The West is the product of this worldview. Linear history, economic progress, and the covenantal link between past, present, and future have all contributed to the West's doctrine of progress. Men have had faith that their efforts will lead to a better world, not just in heaven but also in history. Progress in the past has proven the reliability of their faith in the future. While this vision of

3. Psalm 25:13; 37:9; 37:11; 37:22.

4. The two are different. Risk is statistically calculable in advance through probability theory. Uncertainty is not. See Frank H. Knight, Risk, Uncertainty and Profit (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1921). (<http://bit.ly/KnightRUP>) linear progress has become increasingly secularized since the seventeenth century, its roots go deep in the West's theology.⁵

Conclusion

The scribe, not the priest, is the model of the New Covenant pastor. He is to declare the whole counsel of God. He is to seek in the Old Covenant standards for the New. He is to apply Old Covenant principles to New Covenant situations. He is to affirm the continuity of the covenants, just as the householder brings out old and new treasures.

The top priority of the faithful scribe is to understand the progressive continuity of the kingdom of God. He must not neglect the old or the new. He is to look to the past in search of standards for the present. He is to look to God's word in his attempt to envision the future. He works toward the future in the present on the basis of revelation given in the past. He sees cumulative successes in the past and thereby gains hope for the future.

A church that cuts itself off from the present for the sake of the past will wind up out of touch with the present. Its message will carry little authority, just as the Old Covenant scribes in Jesus' day did not possess much authority. It will become a museum for antiquarians. It will not shape the future because it does not attempt to change the present. It calls people out of the present in the name of the past. It calls people to celebrate the past in the name of continuity. But the continuity of evil compounds if it is not overcome by the leaven of righteousness. A call to the past in the name of the past is an abdication in the present in the name of eternity. It cuts the present off from eternity except by way of the past. It ignores the doctrine of progressive corporate sanctification. It leaves the world in the hands of Christ's enemies.

On the other hand, a church that cuts itself off from the past will be forever exhausted trying to keep up with the present. Having no history—no testament, no inheritance—it will also have little authority. Having no rudder, it will lose direction in the waves of change. In the name of the present, it destroys faith in the future. Having dismissed the past, the church thereby dismisses the relevance of the present, for why should its heirs in the future honor the present? The tyranny of the present is no less a tyranny than the tyranny of the past, and no less doomed to failure. If anything, the tyranny of the past is more likely to persevere. The tyranny of the past has persevered, so it is likely to continue to persevere.

5. Robert A. Nisbet, "The Year 2000 And All That," Commentary (June 1968).

This is equally true of any organization. A business must keep old customers and attract new ones. A political party must keep old voters and recruit new ones. Any organization that ignores its existing supporters, whose capital and tastes are linked to the past, will be cut off financially. The bulk of any organization's income comes from past customers or supporters. Yet any organization that caters primarily to its existing supporters will find itself buried when they are. The answer is continuity: past, present, and future. The kingdom of God is the model of such continuity, for it extends into eternity (Rev. 21; 22).

BUDGETS REVEAL PRIORITIES

But he answered and said unto them, Why do ye also transgress the commandment of God by your tradition? For God commanded, saying, Honour thy father and mother: and, He that curseth father or mother, let him die the death. But ye say, Whosoever shall say to his father or his mother, It is a gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me; And honour not his father or his mother, he shall be free. Thus have ye made the commandment of God of none effect by your tradition (Matt. 15:3–6).

The theocentric principle here was that God is honored more by obeying His law than by obeying man's law. There is a hierarchy of priorities, point two of the biblical covenant.¹

A. First Things First

The commandment to honor parents takes precedence over gifts to the temple. This point is made even clearer in Mark's account: "But ye say, If a man shall say to his father or mother, It is Corban, that is to say, a gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me; he shall be free" (Mark 7:11). Corban was a gift to the temple. When Judas returned the thirty pieces of silver, "the chief priests took the silver pieces, and said, It is not lawful for to put them into the treasury [corban], because it is the price of blood" (Matt. 27:6).

The Pharisees' personal pattern of expenditure reflected their commitment to a particular view of law. Jesus warned them that their budgets were in error. Their budgets revealed that the law to which they were committed was not God's moral law, as revealed by the commandment to honor parents.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

B. Undermining Authority

The Pharisees had criticized Jesus' disciples in an attempt to undermine His authority. If He allowed them to get away with something, this meant that He approved of their actions. It was safer for His critics to attack His subordinates than to attack Him directly. Yet it was clear who the target was: Jesus.

Jesus took a more direct approach. He undermined their authority by attacking their hypocrisy. When it came to their pocketbooks, they placed second things first. They placed their public reputation above their familial responsibility. They gave to the temple, not to their parents. They were trying to be holier than God's law.

The Pharisees had constructed an elaborate system of law around the Mosaic law. They established man-made legal "fences" around the law. To keep people from violating the law, they added extra laws that supposedly would make the violation of a Mosaic law more difficult.² This system was a failure, Jesus warned. It made hypocrites of those who enforced it. They became more concerned about the fences than about the core ethical principles of the Mosaic law.

But then He went beyond this first-stage criticism of the hedge system. He rejected a distinguishing principle of the Mosaic law: the law of defiled food. He announced that this law had been a temporary principle of holiness. To this extent, it had been a hedge. It had segregated Old Covenant Israel from the nations. But that separation was about to end. The gentiles were about to be called into the church, and the kingdom transferred to the church (Matt. 21:43). Jesus here announced a moral principle that undermined the judicial authority of the Mosaic food laws. It therefore undermined the Mosaic law's separation of Jew and gentile. This is what God told Peter in Acts 10, just before the arrival of Cornelius, a gentile.

C. The Economics of Obedience

Jesus was not here undermining the Ten Commandments. On the contrary, He appealed to the commandment to honor parents as having superior authority to gifts to the temple. Jesus used an example

2. This is the source of the same tradition in rabbinical Judaism. The rabbis frequently cite Leviticus 18:30: "Therefore shall ye keep mine ordinance, that ye commit not any one of these abominable customs, which were committed before you, and that ye defile not yourselves therein: I am the LORD your God." The Hebrew word for "ordinance," on which rests the rabbinical tradition of man-made laws as fences, does not offer support for such an interpretation. It means "charge," "keep," or "watch."

with economic implications as His means of undermining the Pharisees' authority. They had criticized the disciples' ritual negligence; He criticized them for elevating supplemental gifts to the temple over debts owed to parents. Jesus was saying that how people spend their money reveals more about their loyalties than the issues of religious ritual.

Money is the most marketable commodity. It can buy more things than any other commodity can. So, a budget reveals the budget-maker's priorities. He can use money to buy many things. By seeing what he buys, we can see what he regards as most important. The Pharisees' budgets revealed that they regarded their acceptance at the temple as more important than support of their parents. Jesus had warned His listeners:

Take heed that ye do not your alms before men, to be seen of them: otherwise ye have no reward of your Father which is in heaven. Therefore when thou doest thine alms, do not sound a trumpet before thee, as the hypocrites do in the synagogues and in the streets, that they may have glory of men. Verily I say unto you, They have their reward. But when thou doest alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth: That thine alms may be in secret: and thy Father which seeth in secret himself shall reward thee openly. And when thou prayest, thou shalt not be as the hypocrites are: for they love to pray standing in the synagogues and in the corners of the streets, that they may be seen of men. Verily I say unto you, They have their reward. But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly (Matt. 6:1–6).³

In private, His critics refused to support their parents. In public, they gave gifts to the temple. It was clear where their priorities were: the praises of men. "Nevertheless among the chief rulers also many believed on him; but because of the Pharisees they did not confess him, lest they should be put out of the synagogue: For they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God" (John 12:42–43). Paul later warned against this: "For he is not a Jew, which is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision, which is outward in the flesh: But he is a Jew, which is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God" (Rom. 2:28–29).

3. Chapter 11.

There was no doubt that Jesus was publicly undermining the Pharisees' authority. "Then came his disciples, and said unto him, Knowest thou that the Pharisees were offended, after they heard this saying? But he answered and said, Every plant, which my heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up. Let them alone: they be blind leaders of the blind. And if the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch" (Matt. 15:12–14). He was warning His listeners not to follow the Pharisees. If they did, they would wind up in the ditch. They would wind up being rooted up by God. This prophecy was fulfilled in A.D. 70.⁴

Conclusion

A budget is a revealing document. It is normally kept very private. People rarely discuss their pattern of expenditures with others. To see a man's budget is to invade his privacy. But God sees each man's life-time budget. He knows where men's priorities are. He can determine from the budget whether a man seeks God's praise or men's praise. The budget that God requires of each man must reflect God's priorities for him. God's law must be reflected in their pattern of expenditures. This begins with a tithe paid to the local church.⁵ This expenditure, more than any other, is to be the mark the covenant-keeper. The budgetary pattern of obedience extends to the support of aged parents. It also extends to the poor. God's presence among men and authority over men is to be reflected by His people's pattern of expenditures.

4. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

5. Gary North, Tithing and the Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994). (<http://bit.ly/gnithing>)

THE CRUMBS OF LIFE

Then Jesus went thence, and departed into the coasts of Tyre and Sidon. And, behold, a woman of Canaan came out of the same coasts, and cried unto him, saying, Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou Son of David; my daughter is grievously vexed with a devil. But he answered her not a word. And his disciples came and besought him, saying, Send her away; for she crieth after us. But he answered and said, I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel. Then came she and worshipped him, saying, Lord, help me. But he answered and said, It is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it to dogs. And she said, Truth, Lord: yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their masters' table. Then Jesus answered and said unto her, O woman, great is thy faith: be it unto thee even as thou wilt. And her daughter was made whole from that very hour (Matt. 15:21–28).

The theocentric principle here was that God is the source of all healing. The issue was sanctions, point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. In a Gentile Nation

In Jesus' day, this healing extended outward from His ministry to Israel. The world of the gentiles was generally untouched by His ministry at this point. But this gentile woman recognized the source of healing: Jesus, the son of David. She viewed Him as the heir of the most famous king in Israel's history. She may even have understood some of the prophetic implications of His heirship.

Jesus was outside of the land of Israel. He was in a far country: Phoenicia. We are not told why. A woman who had heard of His ministry in Israel came to Him, requesting that her daughter be healed.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 4.

“But he answered and said, I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel.”

She might have answered Him defiantly. “Then what are you doing in my country? Get back to where you belong!” It was a response that the religious authorities in Tyre and Sidon might have given. She might have rejected her one hope of healing for her daughter. But as a representative of someone she loved, she restrained herself. In fact, she subordinated herself. “Then came she and worshipped him, saying, Lord, help me.” He then escalated His rhetoric: “But he answered and said, It is not meet to take the children’s bread, and to cast it to dogs.” This was harsh language. He compared her to a dog. He was comparing all gentiles to dogs. The bread of healing was for God’s children, the Jews, He said.

She was not deterred. “And she said, Truth, Lord: yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their masters’ table.” She was the dog; He was the master. Was she not therefore entitled to some crumbs? He said that she was. He healed her daughter at a distance.

Her subordination was to the point of humiliation. This was the proof of her great faith. “Then Jesus answered and said unto her, O woman, great is thy faith.” To prefer to be among the dogs rather than away from the master’s table was the mark of true faith for a gentile.

The woman judicially represented her daughter. But she did more than this. She represented the gentile world. Her confession of faith was in sharp contrast to that of the leaders of Israel, who did their best to trap Jesus in some judicial contradiction, either Mosaic or Roman. She did not seek to contradict Jesus; she sought His greater consistency. “Yes, we are dogs, my daughter and I. But we are domesticated dogs. We are under the table, not out in the streets. Surely, domesticated dogs are entitled to some consideration.” This confession of faith gained for her what she had sought.

It was a matter of confession. She confessed Jesus as master, as the son of David: a messianic office. Outside the land of Israel, this was a powerful confession. It was a greater confession than the Pharisees offered when they heard that He had cast out demons. “This fellow doth not cast out devils, but by Beelzebub the prince of the devils” (Matt. 12:24b). Her daughter had a devil. She wanted to have it cast out. There was demonic possession in Israel and in the gentile world, but this gentile welcomed Jesus as an exorcist; the Pharisees had not. She acknowledged the need for healing in her daughter. The Pharisees did not any such need. That was what condemned them. Jesus had warned them: “They that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick. But go ye and learn what that meaneth, I will have mercy, and not sacrifice: for I am not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance” (Matt. 9:12b–13).

What was Jesus doing in the gentile coasts? He was announcing His authority. His authority was not confined to Israel. The proof of this was His ability to cast out unholy spirits in their land. “But if I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you” (Matt. 12:28). A major sign that the kingdom of God extended beyond the borders of Israel was the healing of her daughter. But it took her repeated confession of faith and personal subordination for this kingdom extension to take place.

What was true of this woman would soon be true of the nations. Her confession was an earnest—a down payment—on what would soon come under the auspices of the church, especially with Paul’s ministry. The gentiles would be blessed through their confession.

B. Dog Food

The dogs under the table are entitled to crumbs. This confession led to her daughter’s healing. It was a confession by a gentile. It was accounted as true faith.

Was her faith the equivalent of the faithful Israelite’s? No, for she was outside the boundaries of the land. This put her in an inferior position. Until the scattering of the Jerusalem church after the stoning of Stephen (Acts 8:1), this geographical separation served as a visible mark of the confessing gentiles’ second-class status. As for nonconfessing gentiles, they were like dogs in the street. They had the status of covenant-breaker.

Yet in a broader sense, covenant-breakers do have status as sons of God through Adam—disinherited sons. They are dogs under the table. They are entitled to crumbs. They participate in the community of man. They are under the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:26–28).² They are under God’s law. The work of the law is written in their hearts (Rom. 2:15).³

There is a division of labor in society. Each individual is productive

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia, Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3–4.

3. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 4.

in some way.⁴ Each brings any excess output of his labor for others to use. In this sense, each increases the wealth of others. For the sake of the adopted sons of God, the disinherited sons are allowed their time in history.

When God showers His blessings on a society, everyone is a recipient. “. . . he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust” (Matt. 5:45b).⁵ This means that everyone becomes responsible for thanking God. With blessings come responsibilities. With common grace, all men come under the judgment of God. There is no escape. Paul wrote: “If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men. Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord. Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head” (Rom. 12:18–20).⁶ With every undeserved benefit, God places eternal coals of fire onto the heads of covenant-breakers.

Common grace is like dog food. It is not what God intends for His people. It is suitable for His enemies. It keeps them alive. It is nutritious. But it is not the best. It is not special grace. “For therefore we both labour and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, specially of those that believe” (I Tim. 4:10).⁷ All men are saved, i.e., are temporarily healed from the death-producing curse of Adam. But all men are not given eternal life.

Conclusion

The Phoenician woman’s top priority was the healing of her demon-possessed daughter. To achieve this, she was willing to suffer repeated rejection by the only person who could heal her daughter. She kept coming back. She always had a correct answer. She claimed what was hers by right: dog food. She was not arrogant, but she was persist-

4. This assumes that he is not helpless. Babies, imbeciles, and Alzheimer’s victims are excluded from the ranks of the productive. But they provide a service to society: tests of how men treat them. “Then shall he answer them, saying, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me” (Matt. 25:45).

5. Chapter 10.

6. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 10.

7. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 6.

ent. She was like the widow of the parable of the unjust judge (Luke 18:2–5).⁸ She kept banging on the door. She eventually got her request.

Her confession was more than an admission of Jesus' power. It was an admission of His office as master, the Davidic office. She was not deterred by His initial rejection of her request. The prize was worth pursuing. The testimony was worth confessing. By subordinating herself to God, she gained her top priority.

This is a lesson for all mankind. Subordination to God is basic to the dominion covenant. Confession of one's subordination to God is the first step to dominion. "For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation" (Rom. 10:10).

8. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 42.

TO GAIN THE WHOLE WORLD

Then said Jesus unto his disciples, If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me. For whosoever will save his life shall lose it: and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it. For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul? (Matt. 16:24–26).

The theocentric principle here was the final judgment of God. Every man faces the final judgment. Compared to the loss of one's soul at this judgment, the gaining of everything that life has to offer is nothing. The issue was sanctions, point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Free Grace Is Not Cheap

Jesus here warned His disciples that there are no free lunches in life. There is free grace, but it comes at a price. It comes, first and foremost, at the price of the death of Jesus Christ. Redeemed people owe a lifetime service to God through Christ (Rom. 12:1).² But this service is insufficient to pay for eternal life. We know this because of the subsequent comparison: all the world could not redeem one man's soul. Anything less than this is also insufficient.

Obviously, these words are not to be interpreted literally. Nobody is asked to take up a literal cross. Perhaps some follower of Jesus was asked to do so under Roman rule, but we are not informed of this. Crucifixion is no longer any nation's means of execution except possibly in rare cases where Christians are executed this way as a symbol of their subordination to an anti-Christian state. In any case, one does not carry a cross through a lifetime of service.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 4.

2. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 9.

The imagery here is that of a burden that costs a person his life. The cross is heavy. At the end of the journey, it becomes the means of his execution. Taking up the cross means taking up the pre-resurrection life of Christ. It means death to the things of this world. A man carrying a cross is not going to be easily distracted by the things of this world. He has other things on his mind . . . and on his back.

The text warns: "For whosoever will save his life shall lose it: and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it." This is not a call to literal suicide. It is a call for covenantal death. The old man is executed. The old Adamic nature is executed. Paul provided a commentary on this passage:

Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death? Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection: Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin. For he that is dead is freed from sin. Now if we be dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with him: Knowing that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him. For in that he died, he died unto sin once: but in that he liveth, he liveth unto God. Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord. Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof (Rom. 6:3–12).

To say that we pay a price is to say that we give up something. What do we give up? Our old ways: the sins of the flesh. We forfeit the use of these attributes of Adam. Whatever pleasures or benefits they bring in history, we must give them up. This is the economist's meaning of cost: the most valuable thing foregone. There are no free lunches. We must give up something to gain eternal life. But the basis of our entrance into eternal life is not our payment.

B. The Fearful Exchange

"For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?"

(v. 26). There is a joke about lawyers. Satan comes to a newly certified lawyer and says: “I will give you the gift of persuasion. You will become a world-famous defense lawyer. I will enable you to get juries to declare guilty criminals innocent, for which these evil men will pay you huge fees. You will become the envy of your peers. All I ask in return is your eternal soul at the end of a life of enormous success.” To which the lawyer replies: “What’s the catch?”³

Jesus warned against this exchange. If gaining the whole world is a bad bargain for the loss of one’s soul, then gaining anything less is a worse bargain. This is what present-oriented men do not acknowledge. They either reject the thought of eternal judgment on these terms or else they discount the future cost to such a low level that the exchange seems worth it. This exchange of the eternal in favor of the temporal is the essence of foolishness.

Time offers what appear to be ways out of trouble. There is always an option, a way of escape. This faith is a reflection of an ethical truth: “There hath no temptation taken you but such as is common to man: but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it” (I Cor. 10:13). But eternity does not possess this characteristic feature of time. In eternity, there is no escape. This is unimaginable to the time-bound sinner who thinks he can find a way not to pay for his sins. There is only one such way: “That if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation” (Rom. 10:9–10). But this way of escape places a new perceptual burden on man: his recognition of the high price of sin. As the price of sin rises, less of it will be demanded, other things being equal.

The problem is, when sin is involved, other things do not remain equal. Sin has the characteristic feature of being addictive. The more you get, the more you want. The insatiable nature of sin leads some men into early death. They cannot control their addiction. Sin is like a ratchet upward: one level becomes normal, so new sins are sought out.

3. The existence of hundreds of anti-lawyer jokes in the United States indicates a widespread distrust and resentment against lawyers as against no other profession. The public understands that the legal profession offers great wealth to those who pervert the intention of the law, i.e., to be a terror to evil-doers. Lawyers are not penalized professionally for misusing the law in order to get rich by terrorizing the innocent.

But in a redeemed person, the insatiable nature of sin is reversed. He reaches a level of sinning that he recognizes as self-destructive. He sees the high price of sin. He then demands less of it. In fact, he can create an ethically positive ratchet: as he indulges in fewer sins, he finds that his taste for old ones and even new ones is reduced.

Such a transformation runs counter to what economics teaches. Economics teaches us that when the price of something is reduced, more of it is demanded. This is expressed graphically by a demand curve that slopes downward and to the right. Price is expressed on the vertical axis, and quantity is on the horizontal axis.

God's redemption of sinners lowers their eternal price of an individual sin. This is because the redeemed person is not condemned eternally when he sins. Why, then, should he not indulge himself all the more? After all, the price is lower. Answer: because redemption changes his taste for sin. In the terminology of graph-addicted economists, his entire demand curve for sin shifts to the left: reduced demand for sin all along the curve.

Paul understood the logic of economics in this application, and he rejected the conclusion. "For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous. Moreover the law entered, that the offence might abound. But where sin abounded, grace did much more abound: That as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord. What shall we say then? Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound? God forbid. How shall we, that are dead to sin, live any longer therein?" (Rom. 5:19–6:2). Other things, such as the demand curve for sin, do not remain equal. The redeemed sinner's taste for sin is reduced.

Redemption increases a man's perception of eternity. It lengthens a man's time perspective. It increases his future orientation. This makes it possible for him to count the cost of his thoughts and actions (Luke 14:28–30).⁴ Man always discounts the future. The more distant in the future an expected event, the less it affects a person's decision-making today. The payoff, discounted to the present, is too low, for either benefits or losses. But, if a man discounts eternity's effects to nearly zero, in the way that he discounts events a century hence, he has made a disastrous miscalculation. He does not grasp how important time is for the outcome in eternity. He compares time to time. He should be comparing time to eternity. The discount that he applies to very distant events is influenced by his knowledge that he will not be here to see the results of his actions. But eternity is different. He will be there to see the results of his actions, and to experience them (Luke 16:23; Rev. 20:14–15).

4. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 35.

Conclusion

Men set their priorities in terms of their values and their expectations about the future. Jesus said that our values should reflect the future—specifically, eternity. Any set of values that does not incorporate expectations about eternity must be wrong, He taught. The soul survives beyond the grave. Thus, any cost-benefit analysis in history should include costs or benefits in eternity.

The price of eternal life is sacrificial living in history. Christ's life of complete subordination to God and His undeserved death have set the judicial standard. He definitively paid the price. Taking up the cross and losing one's life for Christ's sake are aspects of the great exchange: a costly eternity vs. a beneficial eternity. Life is the constant exchange of one set of conditions for another. This includes eternal life. One way of life is exchanged for one kind of eternity. This exchange is definitive in history: God's judicial imputation to sinners of Christ's righteousness (Rom. 3:24–25; Phil. 3:9). It is also progressive: working out one's salvation in fear and trembling (Phil. 2:12). It is also final (Matt. 25; Rev. 20:14–15).

The marketplace of the soul is history. A man cannot buy back his soul. Either it has been bought back by Christ or it cannot be bought back at all. From whom is it bought back? From God, who is sovereign over the souls of men.

36

TRIBUTE MONEY

And when they were come to Capernaum, they that received tribute money came to Peter, and said, Doth not your master pay tribute? He saith, Yes. And when he was come into the house, Jesus prevented [anticipated] him, saying, What thinkest thou, Simon? of whom do the kings of the earth take custom or tribute? of their own children, or of strangers? Peter saith unto him, Of strangers. Jesus saith unto him, Then are the children free. Notwithstanding, lest we should offend them, go thou to the sea, and cast an hook, and take up the fish that first cometh up; and when thou hast opened his mouth, thou shalt find a piece of money: that take, and give unto them for me and thee (Matt. 17:24–27).

The theocentric focus of this passage was what we owe to God. The great king of the universe takes tribute from strangers, not from His sons. This is hierarchy, point two of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Tribute and Sanctions

The Romans imposed their will on the Mediterranean world. They extracted payments from the captive nations. The mark of a captive nation was its requirement to pay tribute. This was not a tax that citizens paid. It was a military exaction. The Roman Empire singled out defeated peoples as tribute payers.

Tribute was common in the ancient world. One benefit of operating an empire was the government's ability to transfer to subject peoples the costs associated with governing them. They paid for their own political subordination. The payment of tribute was a way of reminding the victims that they were not part of the ruling class. They were part of a mass of subjects without rights. They were not citizens of a larger commonwealth.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

There were ways out from under: a successful revolt, buying one's citizenship, being granted citizenship for special service to Rome, personal escape into another jurisdiction, or the breakdown of the empire from internal causes. Israel attempted the first approach, but this led to the destruction of Jerusalem and the burning of the temple.²

Roman rule brought advantages. Rome's navy cleared the Mediterranean Sea of pirates. Roman roads made transportation and communication easier. Roman law created an international economy. All of this was good for trade. It increased the division of labor and specialization. This increased output per unit of input. People generally got richer as a result of Rome's system of administration. The Pax Romana was in its early stages in Jesus' day—peace that offered many economic opportunities. These benefits were paid for by beneficiaries. When the Pharisees challenged Jesus regarding the payment of tribute, He had them bring him a coin. "Shew me the tribute money. And they brought unto him a penny. And he saith unto them, Whose is this image and superscription? They say unto him, Caesar's. Then saith he unto them, Render therefore unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's; and unto God the things that are God's" (Matt. 22:19–21).³ Caesar's government had extended trade to the Roman Empire. A tribute coin, which the denarius was,⁴ became the coin of the realm. The coin used for paying taxes was also used to increase trade and wealth.

So, there were positive and negative sanctions associated with the Roman Empire. The positive sanctions were mainly economic. The negative sanctions were mainly political.

B. Born Free

Freedom in Rome's Empire meant Roman citizenship. This gave a person special legal privilege. For example, a Roman citizen could not be physically punished without a trial. This was a mark of civil liberty. Paul, who was a Roman citizen, reminded the centurion of this prior to a whipping.

2. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

3. Chapter 44.

4. Ethelbert Stauffer, Christ and the Caesars: Historical Sketches (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1955), pp. 122–23. (Reprinted by Wipf & Stock, 2008.)

The chief captain commanded him to be brought into the castle, and bade that he should be examined by scourging; that he might know wherefore they cried so against him. And as they bound him with thongs, Paul said unto the centurion that stood by, Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman, and uncondemned? When the centurion heard that, he went and told the chief captain, saying, Take heed what thou doest: for this man is a Roman. Then the chief captain came, and said unto him, Tell me, art thou a Roman? He said, Yea. And the chief captain answered, With a great sum obtained I this freedom. And Paul said, But I was free born. Then straightway they departed from him which should have examined him: and the chief captain also was afraid, after he knew that he was a Roman, and because he had bound him (Acts 22:24–29).

1. Jesus' Subordination

Jesus told His disciples to pay tribute. He then provided them with a miracle. If they went fishing, they would be able to pay their tribute money. A fish would provide the coin. Furthermore, Jesus said that this payment would be on His behalf, not just theirs. He was announcing that He was under Roman authority. He proved this by submitting to arrest by the agents of Rome. He told Pilate, "Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, and he shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels? But how then shall the scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be?" (Matt. 26:53–54).

He was the true son, yet He accepted Rome's designation of a stranger. He refused to give offense. He was telling His disciples not to revolt against Rome. This message was lost on the Jews a generation later. It was the church's subordination to persecution in A.D. 64/65 under Nero that gained it separate legal status from Israel. Previously, the special legal status of Israel had protected Christians. Not after A.D. 63.⁵ So, when Israel revolted in A.D. 66, the Jews' status as revolutionaries did not extend to the Christians. The Christians' subordination to persecution earlier was what saved them from the Great Tribulation: the destruction of Israel.⁶

The true-born sons of God—sons of the Great King—are required to pay a tithe to God's church.⁷ This is not tribute. This is citizenship

5. Carsten Peter Thiede and Matthew D'Ancona, Eyewitness to Jesus (New York: Doubleday, 1996). pp. 48–51.

6. David Chilton, The Great Tribulation (Tyler, Texas: Dominion Press, [1987] 1997). (<http://bit.ly/dctrib>)

7. Gary North, Tithing and the Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994). (<http://bit.ly/gntithing>)

money. Their citizenship is in heaven (Phil. 3:20). The mark of their sonship is the payment of the tithe. Yet they also pay taxes in times of military defeat and tyranny. They do so in order not to give offense to civil rulers.

There is an old slogan, “one rotten apple spoils the barrel.” In the New Covenant, this is not the case. The freeborn sons incorrupt the rotten whole. Rome fell to the church, not the other way around. Evil is far more threatened by good than good is threatened by evil. This was not the case under the Old Covenant. Israel was separated from the nations by rituals and laws governing land and seed. Egypt’s corrupt leaven was a threat to Israel. This is why they celebrated Passover: a week without leaven. But under the New Covenant, the old laws of ritual cleanliness have been replaced by the law of the Lord’s Supper, which is open to all who subordinate themselves to Christ. Separation is not based on a threat of corruption through eating. It is based on a promise of incorruption by eating.

2. Salvation’s New Birth

The new birth of salvation establishes a man’s status as an adopted son of the Great King. This is an important doctrine for citizenship. Christians are citizens of heaven, and they are to work to bring this citizenship down to earth (Phil. 3:20).⁸ The Lord’s Prayer says, “Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven” (Matt. 6:10).⁹ Christians are to work for the creation of Christian nations, covenanted formally under the Trinitarian God of the Bible. They are to become citizens of the same kingdom, heavenly and earthly.

If they must pay tribute for a time in order not to give offense to their rulers, this is not to be seen by them as a permanent condition. They are sons of the Great King. His kingdom is forever. They must serve as leaven of righteousness. They pay tribute as strangers today in order to pay taxes as citizens of the holy commonwealth tomorrow. The goal is dominion in history by subordination and loyalty to God’s commonwealth. A mark of this loyalty is their acceptance of temporary tribute-paying status.

This means that ethics is more powerful than power. Dominion religion is more powerful than power religion.¹⁰ In the long run, right-

8. Gary North, Healer of the Nations: Biblical Blueprints for International Relations (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/gnhealer>)

9. Chapter 12.

10. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus

eousness triumphs in history.¹¹ This is why Christians can afford to be patient. They bear the burden of tribute payment for the sake of a larger program of world conquest. It is not that the pen is mightier than the sword. It is that the word is mightier than the sword—the word of God. Freeborn sons bring the message of liberation through adoption to a disinherited world. Men pay tribute to Satan through their sin. Liberation from bondage begins with liberation from sin. Paul wrote: “Know ye not, that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey; whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness? But God be thanked, that ye were the servants of sin, but ye have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered you. Being then made free from sin, ye became the servants of righteousness” (Rom. 6:16–18). “For when ye were the servants of sin, ye were free from righteousness. What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? for the end of those things is death. But now being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life” (Rom. 6:20–22). Liberation from sin leads to liberation from fear. Paul wrote: “For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. For ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God: And if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together” (Rom. 8:14–17). “Because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God” (Rom. 8:21).

C. From Tribute to Taxes

I remember hearing a speaker offer the example of the fish and the coin in defense of the requirement to pay taxes. A tax protester responded: “The fish paid the tax.” Clever, but wrong. Once the disciples had the coin in their possession, it was their responsibility to pay tribute. They could have used the coin to buy something rather than pay tribute. That which they might have purchased was their cost of paying tribute. They, not the fish, bore this cost.

(Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985).

11. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1997). (<http://bit.ly/klghshd>)

Taxes become tribute payments when those who pay them are not part of the household of faith that collects the taxes. The household of the king was religious. To be a citizen of Rome meant being part of the Roman system of religion—Rome’s confession. Citizenship, like sonship, is confessional. When men take an oath of citizenship, they announce their loyalty to a system of ideals, laws, and sanctions. This oath is religious.

Jesus did not tell His disciples not to pay tribute. He told them to pay. Why? Because their presence inside the borders of the Roman Empire was a means of conquest. They would work to spread the confession of adopted sonship. As more people confessed faith in God’s son, they would threaten the basis of Rome’s confession. The new confession would undermine Rome’s confession, which ceased in the fourth century with the death of the last pagan emperor, Julian the Apostate, in 363. The freeborn sons of God inherited the kingdom of Rome. This was an aspect of “thy kingdom come.” From that time on, they ceased to be tributaries. They became citizens. They continued to call this kingdom Rome, but Romulus would not have recognized it. Neither would Pontius Pilate.

Citizens can protest the level of taxation in a way that noncitizens cannot. Citizens are part of the oath-bound civil covenant. In a democracy or a republic, they can bring political sanctions against their rulers. What they pay may resemble tribute, but the confession and the sanctions indicate that they are paying taxes. They are part of the household of the national faith.

Conclusion

Jesus set forth a principle of dominion: do not give offense to those foreigners who rule over you. They have a rival confession. This confession can be undermined through preaching and obedience to God, which involves outward obedience to civil rulers. It can be transformed. The basis of this transformation is not revolutionary action. Rather, it is confessional and ethical: word and deed evangelism.

Jesus here established a program of conquest: dominion by subordination. He established priorities: the payment of tribute rather than giving offense by revolutionary action. The church’s acceptance of these political priorities is what saved it from the Great Tribulation in A.D. 70.

The top priority here was peace. By paying tribute, His disciples avoided a confrontation with Rome. This gained time for the work of evangelism. Evangelism eventually undermined Rome's confession. Rome was baptized in the fourth century, as the Great Commission mandates (Matt. 28:19).

HIERARCHY OF INDEBTEDNESS

Therefore is the kingdom of heaven likened unto a certain king, which would take account of his servants. And when he had begun to reckon, one was brought unto him, which owed him ten thousand talents. But forasmuch as he had not to pay, his lord commanded him to be sold, and his wife, and children, and all that he had, and payment to be made. The servant therefore fell down, and worshipped him, saying, Lord, have patience with me, and I will pay thee all. Then the lord of that servant was moved with compassion, and loosed him, and forgave him the debt. But the same servant went out, and found one of his fellowservants, which owed him an hundred pence: and he laid hands on him, and took him by the throat, saying, Pay me that thou owest. And his fellowservant fell down at his feet, and besought him, saying, Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all. And he would not: but went and cast him into prison, till he should pay the debt (Matt. 18:23–30).

The theocentric focus of this passage was God, the money-lender. He sets the model for forgiveness and for condemnation. The issue was subordination, point two of the biblical covenant.¹

A. The Unforgiving Steward

This parable is famous for its comparison of hell with debtors' prison. But the economic principle of this parable is not immediately apparent. This much is clear: the parable has to do with obligations owed, large and small. What is generally not understood is the hierarchy of debt.

A servant who owed a gigantic amount to his master was condi-tionally forgiven of this debt by his master. The judicial conditionality of salvation is clearly taught in this passage. The master has the right to revoke the debt release. He did revoke it. The steward was cast into prison until he should pay the debt in full. Then what kind of salvation is under discussion here? The salvation of common grace: the salvation granted to mankind apart from a complete and final repayment of the debt owed to God.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

The servant then demanded the immediate repayment of a comparatively tiny amount from a poor debtor, and when the poor man could not pay, the steward had him thrown into debtors' prison. Then the master revoked his mercy and delivered the servant to debtors' prison. "Then his lord, after that he had called him, said unto him, O thou wicked servant, I forgave thee all that debt, because thou desiredst me: Shouldest not thou also have had compassion on thy fellowservant, even as I had pity on thee? And his lord was wroth, and delivered him to the tormentors, till he should pay all that was due unto him. So likewise shall my heavenly Father do also unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother their trespasses" (Matt. 18:32–35).²

If we take this parable as a representation of God's judicial relationship with fallen man, we must conclude that God's forgiveness of a man's debts is conditional.³ These conditions are two-fold. First, a man's acceptance of Christ's payment to God on his behalf. Second, his grant of the same debt-free status to those who owe him anything beyond their ability to repay. The neighbor, according to the parable of the Good Samaritan, is that person who walks the same road we do who has been harmed along the way through no fault of his own (Luke 10:30–37).⁴ When I help him, I should not insist on immediate repayment if it threatens his ability to perform his work and eventually to repay the debt.

Why should this be true? Because the debt-credit relationship is inescapably hierarchical. The borrower is servant to the lender (Prov. 22:7). When God grants me credit, and I in turn grant someone else credit, that person has become God's servant through me. This is why biblical law recommends that God's people become creditors to cov-

2. Chapter 37.

3. Ray R. Sutton, "Whose Conditions for Charity?" Theonomy: An Informed Response, ed. Gary North (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991), ch. 9. (<http://bit.ly/gntheon>)

4. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 21.

enant-breakers, but not become debtors to them (Deut. 28:12).⁵

What commentators rarely (if ever) mention is this: the poor debtor still owed the money to the rich master. The steward had merely served as an economic and legal middleman—a representative of the master. The steward had advanced the person money that did not belong to the steward; it had been borrowed from the master. The steward had legal control over the money temporarily; he did not own it. This is the definition of all stewardship: temporary legal control over the use of another person's asset. This leads to an important conclusion: the master's legal annulment of the debt owed to him by the steward was therefore also a legal annulment of the debts of all debtors under the steward's economic authority. In other words, the obligation was hierarchical: from the poor man to the master through the steward.

Why was the steward unjust? His sin was more than ethical injustice to a poor person; it was judicial rebellion against the master. By trying to collect payment from the poor man, the steward was saying: "I am no longer a middleman, now that my debt has been forgiven. I am now the exclusive owner of assets. The credit that I extended with borrowed money is still owed to me irrespective of my previous obligations. I am therefore no longer a steward. I am no longer under a hierarchy. I can now collect what is lawfully mine from those who are under me." His refusal to cancel the debt that had been owed to the master through the steward's lending was a rebellious declaration of independence. He became a thief and a usurper, for he was trying to collect for his own account assets that, economically speaking, had belonged to the master. He was trying to profit from the master's mercy. He refused to acknowledge the economics of forgiveness: the master had implicitly released the poor man from his debt, which had been owed to the master by way of the servant, the day the master released his steward from his obligation. The unjust steward refused to acknowledge the legality of this indirect (representative) release. He held to the letter of the law—the terms of the original debt contract—rather than to the underlying economics of the transaction: hierarchical representation and lawful subordination. So, the master reimposed the original debt in order to remind the steward that he was still nothing but a steward, that he was still under the master's lawful authority.

However, by consigning the unjust steward to prison, the master was implicitly reimposing the debt on the poor man. The master in the parable did not order the release of the poor man. Why not? Because such a unilateral act of debt release would have been theft: stealing from the steward, i.e., taking away an asset that the steward could use to repay his debt. The master could forgive the poor debtor only by forgiving the steward's debt by the same amount. The steward's wife or heirs were legally empowered to collect everything owed to him in a vain attempt to pay off the master.

5. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 70.

The day of reckoning—an accounting concept—had come for both the steward and the poor debtor. Time had run out for both of them. Their debt pyramid had toppled. The hierarchy of debt repayment would now be felt up and down the chain of obligations. Those foolish enough to have indebted themselves would now be reminded of the hierarchical nature of debt. The master had at last pressed his lawful claims. By indebteding himself to an unjust steward, the poor man brought the master's judgment on his own head. Covenant-keepers should learn this lesson well: do not become indebted to covenant-breakers. "The stranger that is within thee shall get up above thee very high; and thou shalt come down very low. He shall lend to thee, and thou shalt not lend to him: he shall be the head, and thou shalt be the tail" (Deut. 28:43–44).⁶ When God periodically collects His debts from covenant-breakers in history, all those obligated to them or dependent on them feel the economic pain, including covenant-keepers. Anyone who doubts this should consider carefully what happens to debtors and everyone who sells goods and services to debtors during a deflationary economic depression. Of course, if the deflation is so severe that no one can pay, then the debtor escapes in a universal moratorium on repayment.

B. Representative Forgiveness

There was only one reasonable hope for the unjust steward: his kinsman-redeemer. Legally, he was still the head of his household, but economically his kinsman-redeemer was in authority. Only if someone possessing legitimate authority would show mercy on his behalf could he escape. There were only two ways for the kinsman-redeemer to help: (1) pay off the debt; (2) offer to replace the steward in prison. This much is sure: the poor debtor's fate was not in his own hands. He required mercy to escape: from the master or from his kinsman-redeemer.

6. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 70.

When God granted the grace of additional time to fallen mankind, He thereby also granted the grace of time to the creation, which was (and remains) under man's lawful authority. The covenant's hierarchical authority structure remained (and remains) in place. Fallen man still owes the restitution payment to God; nature is still under God's authority through man, and therefore is under God's curse on man (Rom. 8:19–22).⁷ Fallen man is told to treat those under his authority with mercy analogous to the mercy shown by God to fallen man. What is the evidence of God's mercy? A system of representative blood sacrifice.

1. Animal Sacrifices

Why did God require animal sacrifices? What had the animals done to deserve this? Biblically, the answer is simple: they fell with their commander, Adam. Their legal representative fell, and they came under a curse. This is why certain animals could serve as sacrificial offerings acceptable to God. The animal had to be slain before it was placed on the altar. This symbolized the death of a cursed being, fallen man. After death comes fire with salt.⁸ The sacrifice announced symbolically: "Either the dead animal roasts in history or else the dead sinner roasts in eternity." In order to preserve man's relationship with God, man must offer sacrifice. Old Covenant man had to offer animal sacrifices. These sacrifices also preserved the animal world's relationship with God. The sacrificed animals represented both the animal world and fallen man's world.

The animals came under God's judgment when Adam did. When God annulled the debts of all those who will ever come representatively under the debt protection of His son Jesus Christ, He also annulled the sacrificial system that had previously governed His set-apart covenant people. Animals today need no representative sacrifices by other animals, since their debts, like the debts of God's covenant people, have been paid representatively by Jesus Christ. When covenant-keeping men's debts were forgiven, so were the debts of the animal world, debts that had been paid representatively from Abel's day by the sacrifice of certain animals. This debt cancellation took place definitively with the crucifixion of Christ and finally with the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70.

7. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

8. Leviticus 2:13; Numbers 18:19; Mark 9:47–49.

There can be no mercy without sacrifice. God's mercy to mankind as a whole is demonstrated in his willingness to sacrifice His son, a perfect man.⁹ Men's mercy to the animal kingdom as a whole under the Mosaic system was demonstrated by the Israelites' willingness to sacrifice their own blemish-free animals. The fact that God was willing to sacrifice His son testifies to His protection of mankind. Similarly, the Israelites' willingness to sacrifice their most valuable animals testified to their hierarchical obligation to protect the creation. God's required sacrifices were testimonies to His mercy. When men refuse to offer God's mandatory sacrifices, they become progressively merciless.¹⁰ In the New Covenant, the blood sacrifices are no more. There is only one sacrifice: the death of Jesus Christ (Heb. 9:12). But all men are required by God to acknowledge this sacrifice: verbally, ritually, ethically, and financially, i.e., the tithe.

2. Deferred Payment

Man's debt to God was not forgiven under the Old Covenant economy; its repayment was only deferred. In a sense, the sacrifices could at most meet the required "interest payments" to God; they did not repay the principal. Analogously, whenever Israel quit paying because of her rebellion, these missed payments were added to the principal owed. Israel's debt to God grew ever-larger.¹¹ Finally, in A.D. 70, God called in the debt.¹² Israel went bankrupt publicly. "Forgive us our

9. Jesus did not die to save all men from hell, but His death provided the legal basis of the gift of life in history: common grace. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

10. The animism and the pantheism of the modern ecology movement are denials of the God of the Bible and His required system of sacrifice. If this movement's stipulations are enforced by international civil law, we can expect tyranny on an international scale. Men will seek to overturn the Bible's hierarchical system: God > man > nature. Mankind will be sacrificed to nature. For a defense of just this sort of sacrifice, see Bill McKibben, The End of Nature (New York: Random House, 1989).

11. In real estate, this is called a backward-walking mortgage: the missed monthly mortgage payment is added to the principal owed, so the subsequent payments must be larger. The national debt of the United States government in 2012 is well advanced into a backward-walking phase. The deficit is running $1.3 trillion a year. (The median price for a house was $70,000.)

12. David Chilton, The Great Tribulation (Tyler, Texas: Dominion Press, [1987] 1997); (<http://bit.ly/dctrib>) Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

debts” (Matt. 6:12) is no idle phrase. The presence of the required sacrifices in the Mosaic economy testified to the continuing presence of the debt in God’s account books, and also to each man’s need to repay God in the future. The cosmic Creditor will eventually demand repayment of everything owed to Him. On that final day of reckoning, every person will have to produce one of two things: sufficient funds to repay his debt (impossible) or evidence that he had already accepted the generosity of the Kinsman-Redeemer who had repaid his debt. At the final judgment, the books are forever closed. So is the exit from the ultimate debtor’s prison.

By forgiving a sin against us, we symbolically and legally forgive a debt owed to God through us. This is why one version of the Lord’s prayer says “forgive us our sins” (Luke 11:4), while the parallel in Matthew (the former tax collector) says “forgive us our debts” (Matt. 6:12).¹³ By extending forgiveness as God’s representative agents, we show God’s mercy to God’s debtors in God’s name: “as we forgive our debtors.” Offering up a scarce economic resource to God as a sacrificial offering is economically the same as forgiving a debt legally owed to us.

Consider the words of Jesus, the long-awaited representative who offered up Himself to God as a holy sacrifice: the ultimate Kinsman-Redeemer. He prayed to God from the cross: “Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do. And they parted his raiment, and cast lots” (Luke 23:34). He legally annulled this horrendous sin for those who had truly acted out of ignorance—most obviously, the Roman guards who gambled for His clothing. His death and His words annulled these specific debts to God the Father. These men had sinned against God the Father by sinning against Jesus. When He forgave them, He did so as the judicial victim. The principle of victim’s rights allows such forgiveness.¹⁴ He thereby also forgave them on His Father’s account, as God’s legal heir and representative agent.

The forfeited value of a sacrifice made to God symbolizes two things: (1) God’s payment of His own Son, the Messiah, and (2) the patience that we have shown to those who had sinned against us. We are stewards, not owners. When we forgive others, we offer up a sacrifice

13. Protestant churches that place heavy emphasis on liturgy (i.e., sacrifice-oriented) often pray “forgive us our trespasses.” This is closest to the covenantal focus of Leviticus: boundaries and their violation.

14. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), Appendix M.

to God: extending grace to sinners by forfeiting whatever they legally owed to us.¹⁵ Of course, we are gaining heavenly resources by doing this. “Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal” (Matt. 6:19–20).¹⁶

C. Seek Nothing in Return

God has forgiven us. We are to forgive others. This has to do with sin. But does it include debt? Are we literally to forgive all debts owed to us? In another passage, Jesus indicated that this is the case. “For if ye love them which love you, what thank have ye? for sinners also love those that love them. And if ye do good to them which do good to you, what thank have ye? for sinners also do even the same. And if ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye? for sinners also lend to sinners, to receive as much again. But love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again; and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be the children of the Highest: for he is kind unto the unthankful and to the evil” (Luke 6:32–35).

This is a hard saying: hard to understand and hard to obey. When we deposit money in a bank, we lend to the bank. The bank lends to others. Are we never to get our money back? The parable of the talents indicates otherwise. The steward who buried his coin was rebuked by the master. “Thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers, and then at my coming I should have received mine own with usury” (Matt. 25:27).¹⁷ The steward was not told to lend the master’s money to the bankers and then forgive the debt. He was told that he should have collected interest on the master’s behalf. Then what did Jesus mean, “lend, hoping for nothing again”?

He meant that we are to make charity loans to desperate people for God’s sake, not our own. In the Mosaic Covenant, interest payments on such charitable loans to brothers in the covenant was prohibited (Ex. 22:25).¹⁸ The New Covenant has broadened this classification. Those outside the confessional brotherhood are entitled to in-

15. We can still lawfully ask for economic restitution, but we can also forgive this payment or any penalty payment.

16. Chapter 13.

17. Chapter 47.

18. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 49.

terest-free loans and the forgiveness of debt in a crisis.

Then who has enough money to give money to all of those in need? Only God. A human lender will run out of money very fast: more demand at zero price than supply. If every person with money must loan to every poor man without money, the debt market will disappear fast. If poverty constitutes a moral claim on capital, there will soon be no capital. Without capital, poverty will become universal. Did Jesus call for universal poverty? No. God gives us capital; we are supposed to increase it.

If capital is to be preserved and increased, the lender will have to allocate his money based on considerations other than the mere poverty of the borrower. But he will also have to allocate it based on considerations other than an interest return. He will have to make judgments about people's reasons for needing a loan and their ability to put the assets to productive use. In short, he must substitute moral evaluation for interest rate considerations. The righteous poor man is more deserving than the unrighteous poor man. He is also more likely to repay the principal. But interest is still prohibited. The Mosaic law on this point has not been annulled. On the contrary, it has been broadened to include those outside the covenant.

God requires us to increase the capital that He has given us. That which we use as our investment capital is to be expanded, and expanded greatly. But we must do this only on one assumption: we are acting on God's behalf. If we act autonomously, we sin. "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal" (Matt. 6:19–20).¹⁹ In our business dealings, we are to be wise investors who seek a high return: ten talents from five, four from two. But we are not to abandon mercy. When someone in our debt falls into arrears through no fault of his own and asks for more time, we are to honor this request. Our success as producers is to increase our success as givers.

A huge sum of money can be given away systematically only through the establishment of a bureaucracy. This usually leads to the capture of the capital by salaried, formally educated bureaucrats who are hostile to the free market that led to its creation. The richest men in early twentieth-century America—John D. Rockefeller, Sr., Andrew Carnegie, and Henry Ford—set up charitable foundations that were immediately captured by humanists who had an anti-free market agenda. Many were lawyers, and they wanted economic control through the state, not free market competition. Rare is the donor who practices charity throughout his years as an accumulator of capital.²⁰ It takes practice to give money away. This is why rich men rarely succeed as donors. They know how to amass capital; they have no practice in giving it away.

19. Chapter 13.

D. The Debt Pyramid

1. Charitable Loans

The charitable loan is a top-down loan. It is extended from the richer to the less rich. Those with greater knowledge of money and how to accumulate it make loans to those with less knowledge. The owners of capital make risk calculations, knowing that they may not be repaid. They do not depend on income derived from these extensions of charitable debt. In fact, the Bible tells them not to become dependent on income from charitable debt: no interest rate.²¹ Those with greater economic authority are in control of the debt structure. They extend credit in the full knowledge that they are dealing with subordinates who possess less knowledge about wealth and its accumulation.

The debt pyramid of the parable is a top-down structure. The rich man had lent a great deal of money to the steward. He was rich enough to forgive the steward. He thereby granted a large gift to the steward. But the steward refused to extend the same mercy to the poor man whose money was not enough to make a difference to the steward.

Had the steward extended credit to other poor people? Had he become a money-lender to the poor? Was he seeking an interest return from charitable loans? This is what seems to be the case. He had not made a business loan to one of his peers. He had not become an investor in some profit-seeking venture. He had lent money to a poor

20. The best example I know of is William Volker, who created the Volker charities. He tithe from the age of 12. See Herbert Cornuelle, Mr. Anonymous: The Story of William Volker (Caldwell, Idaho: Caxton, 1951). Volker's money led to the creation of many libertarian organizations, including the Foundation for Economic Education (FEE). I was employed by the Volker Fund in the summer of 1963 and by FEE in 1971–73.

21. North, Tools of Dominion, ch. 23.

man. Not only was he not to expect an interest return, he was to lend, hoping nothing in return, Jesus warned elsewhere. He had no money of his own. He was too deeply in debt to his master. He was technically bankrupt. After the master revoked the gift and called in the loan, he was legally bankrupt. This parable warns that this is the condition of every man in relation to God: technical bankruptcy leading to legal bankruptcy apart from the intervention of the kinsman-redeemer (Lev. 25:23–24).²²

2. Business Loans

The charitable loan is a top-down loan. A business loan in the modern economy is different. First, the huge accumulation of capital in the modern world has been made possible by the loans and investments of millions of people. While Pareto's 20-80 wealth distribution predominates everywhere, it is also true that middle-class people make investments in pension funds that in turn make loans to large companies, customers, and anyone else who promises to repay and whose credit worthiness is acceptable. Pension funds also make investments. Investors are either dependent on income from these loans or will be upon retirement.

Capitalism's loans are commercial endeavors. Millions of people enter the credit markets in search of a positive return. Millions of other people borrow money. Millions of lenders (e.g., bank account depositors, pension fund owners) are also debtors (e.g., owners of mortgaged homes). The web of debt envelops the whole economy, which in turn becomes dependent on contractual repayment. This web is complex beyond calculation. The survival of a high-division-of-labor society is dependent on the permanent maintenance of this credit-debt structure. If the web fails through widespread default, the society fails. The division of labor contracts. Men's income disappears.

Second, the modern debt pyramid is based on fractional reserve banking. The banking system makes a promise to lenders: they may withdraw their funds at any time. But if even a small percentage of depositors do this in the absence of deposits made by others, the banking system faces a crisis. It has to call in loans. Businesses cannot pay off these loans. The banks stop making new loans. A wave of bankruptcies spreads through the economy. This produces a recession. It can produce a depression. Then the central bank steps in and buys assets in order to reflate the money supply. A new wave of inflation and debt begins.

22. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 28:B.

In a debt-based society, the failure of repayment at the bottom—the banks—threatens the entire capital structure. From bottom to top, the inverted pyramid of debt collapses. Contracts written in terms of the older economic conditions become unenforceable. The enforcement of debt contracts leads only to universal bankruptcy. This, of course, reflects fallen man's legal condition before God.

The more extensive the economy's reliance on debt, the more devastating the collapse. The more widespread the use of money substitutes, the more deflationary the collapse. The more deflationary the collapse, the greater the shrinking of the division of labor. Society's wealth disappears when the economic output provided by the division of labor disappears. When contracts become unenforceable in the courts, the rule of law disappears if men are not self-governed and merciful.

Conclusion

The parable of the unjust steward reveals the reason why we are required by God to forgive others: we are forgiven by God. Their sins against us are ultimately sins against God. We are representatives of God, made in His image and adopted by His grace. This is point two of the biblical covenant model: representation. Point two also includes hierarchy. When we forgive the sinner in history for the sin, God forgives him in history for the sin. (We do not have the authority to forgive him in eternity.) If we receive forgiveness from God and then refuse to forgive, we are insisting that the unforgiven sinner owes his debt to us rather than to God. We thereby act on our own behalf, as if we had not been representatives of God. We insist on our autonomy.

Mercy is a positive sanction, but it implies a negative sanction. God's common grace in history implies a negative future sanction for continued disobedience. That is the message of this parable. The debtor's obligation accumulates. The threat of a demand for repayment hangs over him. Paul cited Proverbs 25:21–22: "Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head" (Rom. 12:20).²³ That is why we are to pray, "forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors"

23. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 10.

(Matt. 6:12).

The top priority in this parable is to obtain and retain our judicial status as forgiven sinners. This requires our acceptance of others who need forgiveness of debts of all kinds, including money. God has extended His kingdom in history through us. We have made loans, placing others in our debt. But this places them in God's debt. He forgives us; therefore, as His agents, we are to forgive those who owe God through us.

Does God's spiritual forgiveness mandate our economic forgiveness? If so, this would destroy all commercial lending. It would make impossible the allocation of risk to those entrepreneurs who want varying degrees of it, which is what commercial loans do. The text indicates that the forgiveness is like for like: God forgives us spiritually; we forgive others spiritually. If God forgives us an economic debt, such as an unpaid vow, then we are to do the same.

When we lend to those in need, our priority should not be economic profit. Someone has fallen on hard times. We help him now, so that others, by God's grace, will help us if this ever happens to us. Lending to the poor is like an insurance policy. But the context of this passage is desperate need, not consumer lending or commercial lending. It is the kind of relationship we have with God. He is not our partner; He is our master. In our relations with subordinates, we are to show mercy because God has shown mercy to us.

THE RICH YOUNG RULER

And, behold, one came and said unto him, Good Master, what good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life? And he said unto him, Why callest thou me good? there is none good but one, that is, God: but if thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments. He saith unto him, Which? Jesus said, Thou shalt do no murder, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Honour thy father and thy mother: and, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. The young man saith unto him, All these things have I kept from my youth up: what lack I yet? Jesus said unto him, If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come and follow me. But when the young man heard that saying, he went away sorrowful: for he had great possessions. Then said Jesus unto his disciples, Verily I say unto you, That a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven. And again I say unto you, It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. When his disciples heard it, they were exceedingly amazed, saying, Who then can be saved? But Jesus beheld them, and said unto them, With men this is impossible; but with God all things are possible (Matt. 19:16–26).

This is commonly referred to as the story of the rich young ruler. He was young (Matt. 19:20). He was a ruler (Luke 18:18).

The theocentric principle here is God's criteria for entry into the kingdom of heaven. This was the issue of sanctions, point four of the biblical covenant.¹

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 4.

A. Access to Eternal Life

God has established standards of entry into His kingdom. The Ten Commandments are the summary of these standards, Jesus told the enquirer. But there is another barrier to entry: faith in God rather than faith in riches. The previous section had dealt with the same theme: entry into the kingdom. Men must become as little children, Jesus said. That is, they must trust God with the same confidence that a child trusts his father. In His answer to the enquirer, Jesus amplified this principle. Those who trust in money have transgressed one of the standards of entry. They have substituted a rival faith.

The young man was a ruler (Luke 18:18). He understood something of the doctrine of the resurrection. He sought eternal life. Jesus then referred to the kingdom of heaven. The entry into eternal life takes place in history. The kingdom of heaven must have manifestations in history. What men do or fail to do in history, Christ implied, determines their inheritance.

Can men earn their way into heaven? The young man thought so: he had kept the commandments. Jesus showed him that he had more to do: sell his goods and give them to the poor. But this seems to make access to heaven a matter of good works. He implied that the young man had not done enough by keeping the commandments. He had to do more. Taken at face value, this passage teaches works religion: man can earn his salvation. Such a view of salvation is antithetical to biblical religion. Then why did Jesus not verbally challenge the man to re-think his religion? Why did He imply that the man could buy his way into heaven? Why did He tell the man to give away his money to the poor? Was this what is always required of those who would follow Jesus?

B. Trust Not in Riches

What was Jesus really telling this man? The parallel passage in Mark makes Jesus' position clearer: "And the disciples were astonished at his words. But Jesus answereth again, and saith unto them, Children, how hard is it for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God!" (Mark 10:24). David had said something similar a thousand years earlier: "Wherefore should I fear in the days of evil, when the iniquity of my heels shall compass me about? They that trust in their wealth, and boast themselves in the multitude of their riches; None of them can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him” (Ps. 49:5–7).²

Jesus returned to this theme repeatedly in His parables and His dealings with rich men. Solomon had, too. “The rich man’s wealth is his strong city, and as an high wall in his own conceit” (Prov. 18:11).³ The rich man trusts in his power to get wealth. He trusts in the creation. Moses warned against this: “And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth” (Deut. 8:17).⁴ This is the sin of autonomy. It is the belief that man is the primary source of wealth.⁵ It is also the belief that this wealth is the coin of the realm in God’s kingdom. But it isn’t. “For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?” (Matt. 16:26).⁶

The lure of wealth is a powerful lure. Wealth seems to offer to man the ability to buy the good things of life. Money is the most marketable commodity. It seems to be a surrogate for wealth. This outlook proclaims: “Anything can be bought; every man has his price.” Jesus warned that this is a false premise. So did David: “For the redemption of their soul is precious, and it ceaseth for ever” (Ps. 49:8).

The enquirer had not understood Jesus’ warning about the worship of God rather than mammon. “No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon” (Matt. 6:24).⁷ The enquirer had not examined his own soul. He had not seen clearly regarding his faith. He still trusted in his riches.

What did his wealth buy him that was worth access to God’s kingdom? Wealth can buy many things: luxury, safety, fame, deference by others. But all of these are as fleeting as riches. Remove the wealth, and everything that wealth had bought disappears. Mammon is a fickle god. It leaves without warning, taking with it all that it had previously distributed.

2. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 54.

3. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 54.

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 202), ch. 21.

5. Julian Simon, The Ultimate Resource (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1981).

6. Chapter 35.

7. Chapter 14.

C. Give to the Poor

“If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come and follow me” (v. 21). Jesus called this would-be disciple to a complete rejection of his former way of life. Why? Does He call all men to the same rejection? If not, why not?

He told the man to sell his wealth and give the money to the poor. But, to do this, he had to sell his goods to someone. His wealth was not to be burnt on a pyre; it was to be exchanged for a more liquid asset: money. Money can be handed out in discrete units, a little at a time. The rich young man was to learn how to give money away. Then he was to follow Jesus—not before.

This was a two-fold transfer of wealth: to those who bought it for money and to those who received the money. The rich young ruler was to become a middleman in the transfer of wealth. The more money he received from the sale of his wealth, the more money he could give away. He was to negotiate a top price from the buyers, and he was then to become a wise giver. He was to become more skilled as an administrator of capital. He was to put it to better use: service to God.

Others were allowed to buy his wealth. Did this mean that Jesus was condemning the buyers to eternal torment? Is wealth illegitimate? No. “A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children’s children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just” (Prov. 13:22).⁸ The question, then, is the context in which the wealth is held: man’s or God’s. The theological issue is theonomy vs. autonomy. To whose use is the wealth to be put? Does the owner see himself as a steward of God?

The rich young ruler had a problem. He was at a turning point in his life. So was Old Covenant Israel. His wealth was held by means of a legal framework. He was under the authority of Rome. So was Old Covenant Israel. His wealth was no safer than this hierarchy. A generation later, Rome would crush Israel’s political revolt. Most wealth owned by Jews would be destroyed by war and their subsequent dispersion by Rome. Unless he died young, he lived to see this great destruction of wealth. Mammon cannot be safely trusted.

The young man was beguiled by his possessions. Jesus offered him a pathway to clarity regarding his priorities, but he went away troubled.

Jesus asked him to become poor. Wandering around Judea with a group of unemployed disciples was not a way of life preferred by most rich men. Matthew-Levi was an exception, but there were not many.⁹ Jesus called the young man into poverty as a way into the kingdom of God. This man's priorities were arranged differently from those required for faithful service in an era of definitive covenantal transition. He did not understand the times.

8. North, Wisdom and Dominion, ch. 41.

D. Hierarchies of Faith

"Verily I say unto you, That a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven. And again I say unto you, It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God" (vv. 23–24). This indicates that a rich man is rare in the kingdom of heaven. The kingdom of heaven operates in history. We enter it in history.

The disciples replied: "Who then can be saved? But Jesus beheld them, and said unto them, With men this is impossible; but with God all things are possible." Why did they ask this? There are few rich people in any population; Pareto's wealth-distribution curve assures this. If it didn't, the bell-shaped curve would. Jesus said more than once, "many are called, but few are chosen" (Matt. 20:16;¹⁰ 22:14). This was not a startling doctrine for Jews. (There were no gentiles in the kingdom during Jesus' ministry.) Why should the disciples ask, "Who then can be saved?" Just because a rich man cannot be saved, why should this raise any question about most men?

Jews expected victory in history. They did not believe they would be under foreign domination forever. They had read Deuteronomy 28:

Blessed shall be the fruit of thy body, and the fruit of thy ground, and the fruit of thy cattle, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks of thy sheep. Blessed shall be thy basket and thy store. Blessed shalt thou be when thou comest in, and blessed shalt thou be when thou goest out. The LORD shall cause thine enemies that rise up against thee to be smitten before thy face: they shall come out against thee one way, and flee before thee seven ways. The LORD shall command the blessing upon thee in thy storehouses, and in all that thou settest thine hand unto; and he shall bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee. The LORD shall establish thee an holy people unto himself, as he hath sworn unto thee, if thou shalt keep the commandments of the LORD thy God, and walk in his ways" (Deut. 28:4–

9. Chapter 21.

10. Chapter 40.

9).¹¹

They expected earthly rewards at some future time. “For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth” (Ps. 37:9). Yet here was Jesus telling them that these blessings would constitute a threat to Israel’s salvation. How could this be?

Jesus answered that, with God, all things are possible. That is, such salvation is abnormal but possible. Jesus’ point was clear: wealth is a great temptation. Those who get wealthy risk being snared by the doctrine of autonomy. The Old Covenant warned the rich man not to take advantage of the poor or to imagine that he was beyond the circumstances that afflict them.

Jesus’ answer indicated that wealth is a snare. Proverbs had said the same thing. “Remove far from me vanity and lies: give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me: Lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the LORD? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain” (Prov. 30:8–9).¹²

Autonomy’s lure is strong. Those who possess any special advantage that provides them with a barrier against life’s common burdens are tempted to regard themselves as beyond God’s negative sanctions. These advantages include wealth, power, beauty, and health. But wealth is the most universally sought-after advantage, for it offers the broadest range of immunities life’s common burdens. Of course, it adds new burdens. With an increase in the number of choices (wealth) comes an increase in responsibility (Luke 12:47–48).¹³

The message is clear: we should not expect to see many rich people subordinating themselves to God through the gospel. The rich are not willing to pay the price, namely, a transfer of their faith from wealth to Christ. Wealth seems to be under their control; Christ isn’t. Wealth extends their power; faith in Christ extends God’s dominion. They appear to be at the top of a hierarchy of wealth; not so with the kingdom of God. The rich man prefers to be at the top.

E. Continuity and Discontinuity in Jesus’ Teachings

Jesus did not break with the Old Covenant’s view of wealth and its

11. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 69.

12. North, Wisdom and Dominion, ch. 85.

13. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

inherent risks. What made His teaching different was His lack of emphasis on the covenantal basis of corporate wealth. There is not much in His teaching about the relationship between covenant-keeping and a society's accumulation of wealth. There are only occasional reaffirmations of the Old Covenant's system of corporate sanctions. "Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth" (Matt. 5:5). This cites Psalm 37:11: "But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace." Jesus placed most of His emphasis on the idea of wealth as a snare to the individual rather than as a tool of dominion. There is no doubt that this New Testament emphasis is overwhelmingly promotes the idea of great wealth as a risk to the soul.

There is nothing in the New Testament that indicates that economic growth as a goal for society is wrong. There is nothing wrong with reducing the number of poor people by increasing their productivity. Capital accumulation increases men's productivity. Better tools make men more productive. Personal thrift increases capital accumulation. Men have discovered no better way to increase the supply of capital than to allow investors to reap the fruits of their investments. The goal of greater personal wealth is the lure that increases per capita investment in a society. That which is dangerous to the soul—the quest for wealth—is also what reduces the number of poor as well as their degree of poverty. Not charity but thrift and wise investing are the secret of reduced poverty in society. This crucial fact is not taught in the New Testament. It is implied in the Old Testament, however, which teaches the legal and moral right of private ownership and the legitimacy of wealth. *When obeyed, the legal framework of the Mosaic Covenant will produce a capitalistic social order.*¹⁴

There are those who argue that Jesus did not adopt Old Testament standards. In fact, most Christians affirm this. But they affirm it selectively. At some point, they are forced to admit that sometimes He assumed the continuity of Mosaic standards. For example, conservatives¹⁵ insist that Jesus was not opposed to the free market, and was even favorable to it. Yet they also insist that He did not affirm a theocratic system of civil government, or any other political system. Liberals¹⁶ insist that He opposed both the free market and theocratic civil government. Trapped between the two are pietistic Christians who say that Jesus was indifferent to social issues; He was concerned only with personal salvation. They can appeal to the obvious fact that He was as silent on the free market social order as He was on theocratic civil government. Why this silence? Because He implicitly accepted both? Because He implicitly opposed both? Because He implicitly accepted one but not the other? Or because He was indifferent to both?

14. This is the most important conclusion of the 31 volumes in this commentary.

15. Those in the Scottish Whig tradition by way of Edmund Burke.

16. Those in the French Revolutionary tradition.

Theonomists assume covenantal continuity in the absence of specific annulments or a change based on the end of Israel's status as the Promised Land of the priestly nation.¹⁷ So, theonomists insist that Jesus accepted both the free market and theocratic civil government, since the Mosaic Covenant mandated both, and there is nothing in the New Covenant that annuls either institutional arrangement. He did not break with Moses on either point. His emphasis on the spiritual danger of wealth also did not break with Moses. He just skipped over the legacy of the Old Covenant that affirmed the legitimacy of great wealth, with Abraham and Job as leading examples. This was a matter of emphasis. The temporal emphases of the two testaments are different. This does not mean that the testaments are in opposition. For instance, the New Testament teaches the doctrine of the resurrection; the Old Covenant mentions it: Daniel 13:1–3; Job 19:25–27. The two covenants are not in opposition regarding the resurrection. Jesus was far more concerned with the doctrine of the resurrection than the doctrine of economic growth.

The personal economic goal recommended by the Old Testament was middle-class wealth (Prov. 30:8–9).¹⁸ There is nothing in the New Testament that would call this goal into question. Paul wrote, citing the account of the manna (Ex. 16:18): “As it is written, He that had gathered much had nothing over; and he that had gathered little had no lack” (II Cor. 8:15).¹⁹ But, in a world without manna from heaven, the output sufficient to fill most men's stomachs will make some men rich. Like the poor, Pareto's curve is with us always. Output sufficient to feed all men will make some men very rich. The question is: What will these rich men do with their wealth? Share it? Accumulate more of it? The rich young ruler had his answer straight from Jesus. He went away troubled.

17. Seed laws, land laws, and priestly laws. See Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), Conclusion.

18. North, God's Success Manual, ch. 85.

19. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 6.

F. Jesus' Priorities

The rich young ruler had a problem with the content of his faith. He trusted in what he thought he could do and had always done: keep all of God's commandments. Jesus showed him that his faith was in himself and therefore defective. His faith was leading him to eternal death. His law-keeping and his wealth had become his high walls. By challenging him to tear down the second of these two walls, Jesus forced him to reconsider the content of his faith. His problem was not his good works or his wealth; his problem was his belief in the spiritual efficacy of works religion. He could not earn eternal life.

To show to him how wrong he was, Jesus went to the heart of his faith: his wealth. He was a follower of mammon. What he had to do in order to gain eternal life was beyond his ability. What all men have to do to gain eternal life is beyond their ability. It is the task of the evangelist to identify whatever it is that an anxious enquirer cannot do or will not do for the sake of the prize: the good work that is just too much for him, the wall that he cannot climb over. The evangelist must then confront the enquirer with the existence of this wall, which is a barrier in between him and the eternal prize. Then the enquirer may be ready to hear the correct answer: "Then said Jesus unto his disciples, If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me" (Matt. 16:24). How does a man deny himself? By affirming faith in Jesus Christ, as Paul and Silas told the Philippian jailer: "And they said, Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thou house" (Acts 16:31).

Jesus placed the attainment of personal wealth very low on any man's list of priorities—far lower than generosity to the poor. He placed charity to the poor as the basis of attaining wealth (Luke 6:38).²⁰ He also did not place national per capita economic growth on the list. Yet the second condition, economic growth, follows from the first: the attainment of riches by the few. Without rich men's willingness to save money and invest it in their quest for wealth, there can be no widespread reduction in poverty: insufficient per capita capital.

The third point follows from the first two. He emphasized personal charity, which ameliorates individual cases of poverty but does not automatically solve the problem of widespread poverty. Only economic growth does this, but economic growth is the product of systematic investing by the richest 20% of the population. Many religions emphasize charity, but only in the West, where Christianity and especially Calvinist theology laid its economic foundations, has a two centuries-long period of compound economic growth occurred.²¹ Whether this can continue in the face of widespread apostasy, including debauchery and legalized abortion, remain to be seen.

20. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 11.

Compared to eternal life, economic growth is a pale sanction, but this does not deny the moral legitimacy of economic growth. Economic growth need not be a negative sanction. John Wesley's refrain is valid: "Gain all you can. Save all you can. Give all you can."²² It was this outlook that moved Methodists in England and the United States out of grinding poverty into middle-class respectability in a little over a century, 1740 to 1860. But, by 1900, Methodist bishops had adopted theological liberalism. The history of the twentieth-century mainline denominations in the United States is evidence of the truth of Christ's warning to the rich young ruler. Better to be a Methodist layman in a wretched hut in 1740 than a Methodist theologian in a wretched seminary in the early twenty-first century.

The New Testament does not mention any corporate economic goal. The economic goal of the Old Testament was middle-class comfort for the covenanted nation. Middle-class comfort for the masses takes generations of compound economic growth. This was not achieved in any society until the twentieth century, during which Western Christianity went into spiritual decline.

Conclusion

The rich young ruler had a problem with the content of his faith. He trusted in what he thought he could do and had always done: keep all of God's commandments. Jesus showed him that his faith was in himself and therefore defective. His faith was leading him to eternal death. His law-keeping and his wealth had become his high walls. By challenging him to tear down the second of these two walls, Jesus challenged him to reconsider the content of his faith. The young man's problem was not his good works or his wealth; his problem was his belief in the spiritual efficacy of works righteousness. He could not earn eternal life.

21. Whether it can continue in the face of widespread apostasy, increasing debauchery, and legalized abortion remains to be seen.

22. Sermon 50 (1744): "The Use of Money."

To show to him how wrong he was, Jesus went to the heart of his faith: his wealth. He was a disciple of mammon. What he had to do in order to gain eternal life was beyond his ability. What all men have to do to gain eternal life is beyond their ability. It is the task of the evangelist to identify whatever it is that an anxious enquirer cannot do or will not do for the sake of the prize: the good work that is just too much for him, the wall that he cannot climb over. The evangelist must then confront the enquirer with the existence of this wall, which is a barrier in between him and the eternal prize. Then the enquirer may be ready to hear the correct answer: "Then said Jesus unto his disciples, If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me" (Matt. 16:24). How does a man deny himself? By affirming his faith in Jesus Christ, as Paul and Silas told the Philippian jailer: "And they said, Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house" (Acts 16:31).

The New Testament is hostile to the quest for tangible riches. Yet it is favorable, as is the Old Testament, to middle-class living. But to attain middle-class comfort for the masses, a few people will get rich. Like the poor, the rich we shall always have with us. But if the way to riches is by serving paying customers, as it is under free market capitalism, then the greater the wealth of the rich minority, the less grinding will be the poverty of the poor (Luke 8:18).²³ The problem is, when the poor have become less poor because wealth-seeking entrepreneurs have been allowed to get exceedingly rich, both the rich and the poor can fall into the trap: "And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth."²⁴

The modern pietistic Protestant hymn is correct: "I'd rather have Jesus than silver and gold." But the theonomists' goal is better: "I'd rather have Jesus and silver and gold." So far, no society has achieved this. Without widespread conversions and widespread obedience to biblical law, no society can.

23. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 16.

24. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 21.

HUNDREDFOLD GROWTH

Then answered Peter and said unto him, Behold, we have forsaken all, and followed thee; what shall we have therefore? And Jesus said unto them, Verily I say unto you, That ye which have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. And every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my name's sake, shall receive an hundredfold, and shall inherit everlasting life. But many that are first shall be last; and the last shall be first (Matt. 19:27–30).

The theocentric focus of this passage was the name of Jesus: “for my name’s sake.” For His name’s sake, it is worth sacrificing everything we own. By this sacrifice, His followers will gain a huge return. This was the issue of expansion: point five of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Status: Thrones of Judgment

Peter’s question was in response to Jesus’ warning about how few rich men will enter the kingdom of heaven. Peter reminded Him that he and the other disciples had forsaken all, which included their families. They were not rich. He asked: “What’s in it for us?” He was looking for assurance of a positive sanction. Christ promised two. First, they would exercise authority. They would sit at 12 thrones alongside of Christ. They would judge the 12 tribes of Israel (v. 28). In Luke, we are given another account of this same promise. It relates to the meaning of the Lord’s Supper. “Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations. And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me; That ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel” (Luke 22:28–30). What did this mean? Why was this related to the sacrament of the Lord’s Supper? The link was sanctions. The Lord’s Supper is a sacrament of judgment: self-judgment, church judgment, and God’s judgment.² Second, they would gain the kingdom. The Jews would lose it, He told them. “Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof” (Matt. 21:43). Old Covenant Israel was coming to the end of the road. The church was about to inherit the kingdom-related promises of God. One aspect of this kingdom is the rendering of judgment. Jesus had already told them: “Verily I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven” (Matt. 18:18).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1988] 2012), ch. 5.

The apostles, by bringing the gospel of the kingdom to Israel, were bringing a covenant lawsuit against Israel. Like the prophets before them, they would suffer persecution by the Jews because of this covenant lawsuit. “Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad: for great is your reward in heaven: for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you” (Matt. 5:11–12). These were negative sanctions. This was not what Peter wanted to hear. What about the positive sanctions? Jesus told them that they would be agents of judgment against Israel. They would bring judgment against the Jews, who were bringing judgment against them. How would they do this? He did not say. He did not promise them that they would do this in heaven. This may have been His frame of reference, but then they would all have to die before the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, when judgment arrived.³ Jesus may have had in mind their preaching of the kingdom. This would be a means of bringing judgment. What He did say is that they would participate with Him in the rendering of judgment against the 12 tribes. The dozen apostles (minus Judas, plus Matthias) would replace the dozen tribes of Israel.⁴

2. “But let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup. For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord’s body. For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep” (1 Cor. 11:28–30).

3. David Chilton, The Great Tribulation (Tyler, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dctrib>)

4. Levi, the priestly tribe, was replaced by the church. The priesthood ceased: no more animal sacrifices.

They would serve judicially as representative agents of the New Israel of God, the church.⁵

This was a major blessing. They would become the patriarchs of a new Israel. They would become founders, not in the sense of biology, but rather as forefathers. Their names would extend down through the ages.⁶ So few people are remembered in history that becoming part of the historical record of a civilization is generally regarded as a great honor. Fame ranks with money and power in the minds of most people: the desire not to be forgotten. Wealth is far easier to achieve than fame.

B. Inheritance: Multiplication

Exercising authority would be one positive sanction. Second, “every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my name’s sake, shall receive an hundredfold, and shall inherit everlasting life” (v. 29). They would receive a hundredfold. This is an image of great wealth.

What had they forfeited? Above all, their families. Also listed is land. This was the context of the promise of a hundredfold increase. This is confusing. If they paid for their time spent with Jesus by losing contact with their families, or possibly losing the trust of their families, how could they be repaid a hundredfold? With money? How much money? How can anyone place a market value on lost family life? In any case, what income? Not monetary income from wandering the roads of Judea.

The context indicates the multiplication of families. The apostles had lost those things closely associated with family life. They would gain access to a new family inheritance. Their efforts in spreading the gospel of the kingdom would lead to a new family: the family of God. A new era of mass adoption by God was at hand. The founders of the church would be welcomed into households everywhere. They would become founders of a new family, a family analogous to the family of Old Covenant Israel.

5. “And as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God” (Gal. 6:16).

6. “Simon, (whom he also named Peter,) and Andrew his brother, James and John, Philip and Bartholomew, Matthew and Thomas, James the son of Alphaeus, and Simon called Zelotes, And Judas the brother of James, and Judas Iscariot, which also was the traitor” (Luke 6:14-16). “And they gave forth their lots; and the lot fell upon Matthias; and he was numbered with the eleven apostles” (Acts 1:26).

They would be involved in the burial of the old family of God. Israel's inheritance would come to them as the nearest of kin. "And if his father have no brethren, then ye shall give his inheritance unto his kinsman that is next to him of his family, and he shall possess it: and it shall be unto the children of Israel a statute of judgment, as the LORD commanded Moses" (Num. 27:11). Old Covenant Israel would die without leaving biological heirs. The covenantal heirs would inherit.

The inheritance of Old Covenant Israel would soon pass to the church. The patriarchs of the church would become heirs of all of Israel's promises. Through them, this inheritance would pass to the adopted children of God. The agents of this adoption were the apostles. They would receive the inheritance of Israel as trustees.

This did not necessarily mean that they would receive the inheritance in history. The language of their judging Israel on thrones of glory pointed to the opposite: their deaths, one by one, prior to the fall of Jerusalem. But inheritance is covenantal. It is inheritance by confession. Their confessional heirs would inherit the promises. In this sense, the apostles would inherit in the name of their heirs. They would inherit definitively in history, though not finally.

C. The First Shall Be Last

"But many that are first shall be last; and the last shall be first." This cryptic statement appears repeatedly in Matthew's gospel. It is quoted by Christians far more widely than it is understood. At least two very different interpretations are possible, given the context of this passage. One flows from what Jesus had just said. The other makes sense because of what Jesus would say next.

The immediately preceding context indicates that Jesus was talking about the apostles. Peter had asked the question: "What shall we have?" The question regarding Jesus' discussion of first and last is this: In relation to whom, future converts to the faith or the Jews? Which did Jesus have in mind? I will examine both possibilities.

As in English, "first" and "last" in Greek can refer to either status or sequence. I will examine both possibilities.

1. The Apostles and Future Converts

The context of Jesus' statement reflects both interpretations of "first" and "last": status and inheritance. Jesus had spoken to them of judging on 12 thrones: judicial status. He had also spoken of a hundredfold inheritance. The preceding context—though not the subsequent context—indicates that He was speaking of their personal futures, not the future of Christians in general. But was He? It is possible to make a case for such a corporate view.

Consider “first” and “last” in terms of status. “But many that are first [in status] shall be last [in status]; and the last [in status] shall be first [in status].” This makes no sense. The apostles would judge Israel. This meant that they would be first in status. They would occupy 12 thrones “when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory” (v. 28). Taken literally, this means that they would die prior to the fall of Jerusalem. James was executed in A.D. 62.⁷ We do not know about the others. Tradition says that John survived until the 90’s, but this is based on a late dating of the Book of Revelation. This late dating is difficult to defend. The book was probably written in A.D. 64 or 65.⁸

Consider “first” and “last” in terms of inheritance. “But many that are first [to inherit] shall be last [to inherit]; and the last [to inherit] shall be first [to inherit].” This also makes no sense. Those who died before Jerusalem fell in A.D. 70 would not see their inheritance in history. Those who came later would receive the visible inheritance, yet they were not the first to inherit. The apostles were first. Jesus said so. This was their reward for following Him. This was His answer to Peter’s question.

What about a combination of status and inheritance? “But many that are first [in status] shall be last [to inherit]; and the last [in status] shall be first [to inherit].” The apostles were clearly first in status. This was their reward for being the first to forsake all and follow Jesus. But to exercise this honor as judges on thrones, they would either have to die prior to the fall of Jerusalem—heavenly thrones, which seems likely—or perish in the terrible crisis, or escape it by fleeing the city. The first view is more likely: rendering final judgment against Old Covenant Israel from heaven. They would not be the historical recipients of the final inheritance. Rather, they would administer it from heaven. Conversely, the first to receive Israel’s covenantal inheritance—those Christians who survived Jerusalem’s Great Tribulation in A.D. 70⁹—would be last in status. They would become the forgotten generation.

7. Carsten Peter Thiede and Matthew D’Ancona, Eyewitness to Jesus (New York: Doubleday, 1996), p. 47. They cited Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews, XX: 197–203.

8. Kenneth L. Gentry, Before Jerusalem Fell: The Date of Revelation (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/kgbjf>)

9. Chilton, Great Tribulation.

So it was. Nothing written survives of the generation immediately following the fall of Jerusalem: the generation that inherited. The earliest surviving writings of the early church are thought to be from the period of the 90's, over two decades after the fall of Jerusalem. There would be no remembrance for members of the first generation who inherited. All we know is that the church survived the Roman wars in Palestine. Church history records that the Jerusalem church fled to the town of Pella, a gentile city, but this information comes from Eusebius, who wrote in A.D. 325.¹⁰ We know almost nothing about the church in the period of the final inheritance.

Inheritance, like sanctification,¹¹ is definitive, progressive, and final. The apostles received the definitive inheritance. Christ promised it to them. Their work for a generation in bringing the covenant lawsuit against Israel served as the legal basis of the transfer of the inheritance from Israel to the church. This was a progressive inheritance. It took a generation. It involved a war between the false heirs and the true heirs. When the persecutions began, the Jerusalem church fled; only the apostles remained behind to proclaim the covenant lawsuit (Acts 8:1). The apostles died before the final transfer was visible. They were first in inheriting but last in receiving. They were like the three patriarchs of Israel and the sons of Jacob: the promise of inheritance in the land had come definitively to Abraham, but none of them lived to see it.

This interpretation places the hundredfold inheritance in the possession of the apostles—an inheritance exercised by faith, not by sight. They became the church's forefathers. This was their reward, along with the reward of sitting on 12 thrones. But if we restrict this promise of hundredfold inheritance to the apostles, this does not answer the question of the inheritance for Christians throughout history. Are we not also participants in the great inheritance? Surely we all "shall inherit everlasting life." Why not also the inheritance? The second interpretation broadens this inheritance.

2. The Apostles and Israel

The second interpretation makes sense in the light of what Jesus said in the next exposition: "So the last shall be first, and the first last:

10. Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, Book III, Chap. V.

11. John Murray, "Sanctification," Collected writings of John Murray, 4 vols. (Edinburgh: Banner of Trust, 1977), II, p. 277. Cf. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 10:A:2.

for many be called, but few chosen” (Matt. 20:16). In the parable of the householder who goes into the public square to hire workers throughout the day, paying them all a penny per day, the contrast is between the group that worked all day and those groups that arrived throughout the day. The earliest workers complained to the employer that he had made the late-comers equal to them, even though the former had worked the whole day. They thought they deserved more, since they had worked longer.¹² The context of the parable indicates that the complainers were the Jews. Jesus was prophesying that they would resent the fact that God was about to make an offer to the gentiles: equal access to the New Covenant kingdom and also equal payment at the end of the kingdom in history, i.e., eternal life. The Jews would not be given any special consideration in the kingdom for their years of prior service. Furthermore, entrance into heaven would not be based on years of service.

If Jesus’ statement here of the first-last dichotomy is interpreted in terms of the next parable, then the comparison is not between the apostles and future converts, but between the apostles and members of Old Covenant Israel, whom the apostles would judge in A.D. 70 from thrones in heaven. The “first” in this context is Old Covenant Israel. The “last” is the predominantly gentile church, which was represented judicially by the apostles. The text would therefore read: “But many that are [chronologically] first [Israel] shall be last [to enter the New Covenant kingdom]; and the last [the church] shall be first [to enter the New Covenant kingdom].”

Most Jews, hearing of this, would resent it. Jews had long regarded themselves as first in terms of status because they were chronologically first in terms of God’s calling. But what they ignored was their history of rebellion, which would soon culminate in the crucifixion of Christ. Old Covenant Israel would continue to reject the message of the disciples. The nation would suffer the consequences. “And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear your words, when ye depart out of that house or city, shake off the dust of your feet. Verily I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrha in the day of judgment, than for that city” (Matt. 10:14–15). “But I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon at the day of judgment, than for you. And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell: for if the mighty works, which have been done in thee, had been done in Sodom, it would have remained until this day. But I say unto you, That it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment, than for thee" (Matt. 11:22–24).

12. Chapter 40.

The inheritance here is the inheritance of the kingdom throughout history, not just in the first century. The Jews will remain as would-be heirs. They will inherit their share of the kingdom only by being grafted into the church (Rom. 11),¹³ which grants access on the same terms, with the same rewards, to all men. They will enter the kingdom as lawful heirs, but they will enter last. They came into the Old Covenant church first, but this unique honor does not carry into the New Covenant. They would gain access to the kingdom as everyone else does: through the church.

3. A General Promise

Jesus told them, "every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my name's sake, shall receive an hundredfold, and shall inherit everlasting life." This was not a promise to the apostles only, but to Christians in general. Their multiplication through time will encompass the whole earth. The church's progressive fulfillment of the Great Commission will extend the dominion covenant to the uttermost limits.¹⁴

The second interpretation—apostles (first) and Israel (last)—seems more consistent with this interpretation of the promise. The promise is to every generation. He who forsakes all to follow Christ is adopted into a confessional family. He gains his inheritance through his brethren. The division of labor increases as the body of Christ expands (Rom. 12;¹⁵ I Cor. 12¹⁶). This increase in the division of labor increases every member's productivity and wealth, and also the wealth of those outside the church through common grace.¹⁷ Even the covenant-breaking dogs under the table will feast on the abundance of crumbs.

13. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 8.

14. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/GentryGGC>)

15. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 10.

16. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 15.

17. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

This is why Paul could write of the future conversion of the Jews: “I say then, Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid: but rather through their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to provoke them to jealousy. Now if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness?” (Rom. 11:11–12). When the gentile church achieves something worth being jealous of—the widespread extension of God’s kingdom in history—the Jews will join.

Conclusion

The promise of multiplication had to do with inheritance. Whatever the apostles had already lost and would continue to lose as disciples of Christ, they would regain a hundredfold through their spiritual heirs. The church down through history constitutes their inheritance. They would have lost their inheritance anyway, had they remained loyal to Old Covenant Israel, whose time had come. The transfer of Israel’s inheritance—the kingdom of God—was at hand. The apostles would become the original trustees in the transfer of the inheritance to their covenantal heirs. As forefathers, they would see their heirs and their heirs’ wealth multiplied. They would see this in history only by the eyes of faith, just as Abraham had seen his inheritance.¹⁸ But the transfer was as secure as Abraham’s had been. They had Christ’s word. They could trust Him.

This promise of inheritance extends to every generation. Adoption into the church brings every Christian into covenantal union with others of the same confession. Their inheritance is the whole earth.¹⁹ This inheritance is open to everyone who follows Christ. The expansion of this inheritance is achieved through the extension of God’s kingdom throughout history: the Great Commission.

This places top priority on the preaching of the gospel. The apostles’ task is our task, too: to work for the multiplication of heirs through adoption by God. The task in proclaiming the gospel was two-

18. “By faith Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went. By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise: For he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God” (Heb. 11:8–10).

19. Gary North, Inherit the Earth: Biblical Blueprints for Economics (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gninherit>) fold, for the covenant's sanctions are two-fold: blessing and cursing, inheritance and disinheritance. The apostles would gain their inheritance through their covenantal heirs. This would require the disinheritance of Old Covenant Israel, which they would oversee from the 12 thrones.

THE RIGHTS OF OWNERSHIP

For the kingdom of heaven is like unto a man that is an householder, which went out early in the morning to hire labourers into his vineyard. And when he had agreed with the labourers for a penny a day, he sent them into his vineyard. And he went out about the third hour, and saw others standing idle in the marketplace, And said unto them; Go ye also into the vineyard, and whatsoever is right I will give you. And they went their way. Again he went out about the sixth and ninth hour, and did likewise. And about the eleventh hour he went out, and found others standing idle, and saith unto them, Why stand ye here all the day idle? They say unto him, Because no man hath hired us. He saith unto them, Go ye also into the vineyard; and whatsoever is right, that shall ye receive. So when even was come, the lord of the vineyard saith unto his steward, Call the labourers, and give them their hire, beginning from the last unto the first. And when they came that were hired about the eleventh hour, they received every man a penny. But when the first came, they supposed that they should have received more; and they likewise received every man a penny. And when they had received it, they murmured against the goodman of the house, Saying, These last have wrought but one hour, and thou hast made them equal unto us, which have borne the burden and heat of the day. But he answered one of them, and said, Friend, I do thee no wrong: didst not thou agree with me for a penny? Take that thine is, and go thy way: I will give unto this last, even as unto thee. Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? Is thine eye evil, because I am good? So the last shall be first, and the first last: for many be called, but few chosen (Matt. 20:1–16).

The theocentric principle here was the sovereignty of God in choosing who is to be redeemed and who is not. The passage dealt with stewardship: point two of the biblical covenant.¹

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder

A. The Right of Voluntary Contract

This is one of Jesus' pocketbook parables. Most people understand the affairs of the marketplace far better than they understand theology. Jesus used pocketbook parables to communicate fundamental theological truths.

The householder had authority over his vineyard. He had the right to offer to hire whomever he pleased. No one had to accept his offer. The laborers were sovereign over their decision to accept his offer or reject it. Between the householder and a laborer, a bargain was possible.

The householder's primary goal was to care for his vineyard. This is an extension of God's assignment to Adam: to dress and defend the garden. He sought assistance in this task. He made use of the division of labor. He could not do everything that needed to be done. So, he went into the marketplace to hire workers. He went out early in the morning. He found men who were willing to work. He offered them a penny a day. They accepted his offer and headed for the vineyard. Then he went out at the third hour (nine in the morning by Roman standards).² He found other men standing idle. This time, he offered work on a different basis: "whatsoever is right I will give you" (v. 4). They trusted him, accepted the offer, and headed for the fields. He repeated this three hours later and six hours later. At the eleventh hour—late in the day—he did it again. "Whatsoever is right, that shall ye receive." They accepted. They trusted him. Then came the time of payment. He faithfully followed the Mosaic law. He paid them on the day of their labor. "Thou shalt not defraud thy neighbour, neither rob him: the wages of him that is hired shall not abide with thee all night until the morning" (Lev. 19:13).³ He abided by God's law. He was a just man.

He told his steward, "Call the labourers, and give them their hire, beginning from the last unto the first. And when they came that were hired about the eleventh hour, they received every man a penny. But when the first came, they supposed that they should have received more; and they likewise received every man a penny. And when they had received it, they murmured against the goodman of the house, Saying, These last have wrought but one hour, and thou hast made them equal unto us, which have borne the burden and heat of the day.” He had promised the early laborers a fixed wage. He paid them what he had promised. He had promised the others a fair wage. He paid them what he had paid the full-day laborers. Surely this was fair to the part-timers. But the full-day laborers begin to complain as soon as they received their pay. “This is unfair.” They had worked so much longer. They deserved more. So they said.

Spring, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. The sixth hour after sunrise in the Roman calendar was noon. The length of the hour varied according to the seasons.

3. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 13.

The employer’s answer rested on the moral validity of contracts. “Friend, I do thee no wrong: didst not thou agree with me for a penny? Take that thine is, and go thy way: I will give unto this last, even as unto thee. Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? Is thine eye evil, because I am good?” They had been paid what he had promised. What was the moral basis of their complaint?

B. Imperfect Knowledge and Risk

Earlier that morning, they had not known that there was going to be employment later in the day for a full day’s wages. They had wanted employment at the wage offered. He had offered it to them. The arrangement was perceived by employer and employees as mutually beneficial. The workers went to work. They received what they had been promised. No one had been cheated. The employer had not known that he would hire more people later in the day. Even if he had known, he had no moral obligation, and surely no legal obligation, to reveal this to the early workers.

Those who came later were more trusting of the employer. He had not said exactly what he would be paid. They would be paid what was right. They agreed to this verbal contract. They would not have an enforceable contract in any court if he paid them too little—too little from their point of view. Nevertheless, they decided that he was a righteous man who would not cheat them. They were proven correct at the end of the day.

The early workers had borne less risk. They had an enforceable contract. The later workers bore more risk. They did not have a specific contract. When men bear greater risk, they seek a higher rate of return to compensate them for the extra risk. The men who had gone to work early received a lower hourly rate of compensation, but they had borne less risk. The others received a higher hourly rate, but they had borne greater risk. There was nothing inherently out of order with the respective pay scales.

The parable ends with final payment. This parable has as its focus the entire history of the kingdom of God. The employer's final payment symbolizes final judgment. There would not be work available the next day. Had there been another day of work, cunning workers would have put off going into the marketplace until the afternoon, hoping to reap a full day's wages for a partial day's work. But the parable is not about second chances. The laborers in this parable did not have advanced information on the outcome of everyone's efforts. They had only a promise: a penny (early comers) or "what is right" (late comers).

The parable is not about long-term labor-management relations. It is about the kingdom of God in history. Men make decisions about what they can expect from God for their obedience. They think about the risk-reward ratio of their decisions. The early morning workers compared the risk of nonpayment vs. payment. They also compared expected wages with the likelihood of better employment offers later in the day. They concluded that a day of work in the vineyard was the best available offer. They did not have information about the employer's previous payment practices.

Those who came into the fields later did not have specific information about their pay. They could not spread the word to other workers that they were being paid a penny for less time in the fields. That might have created a walk-out on the part of the early workers. Only at the end of the day did they all receive information about comparative hourly rates of pay. By then, their work was completed.

God comes to every man, whether late in his life or early, and offers to pay what is right. Some men trust Him; others do not. For those who truly love their kingdom work, it matters little who gets paid what, just so long as they remain in favor with the Employer. The opportunity to work is what matters most to them. If they were recruited early, so much the better: they had more time to serve God.

C. False Expectations

The parable speaks of groups of workers. They are grouped by the time of day at which they were recruited. There is a collective aspect of this hiring process. It is not just a person-by-person recruiting process. It is this collective aspect that reveals what the parable is really about: Jews and groups of gentiles.

The workers who had toiled through the day had expected a penny for their efforts. But then came the time of payment. The paymaster eventually paid the early workers a penny, but he did not pay them first. He began with the latest comers and moved backward. None of the late comers who had arrived at the ninth hour complained about the pay given to the eleventh-hour arrivals. None of those who had arrived at the sixth hour or third hour complained.

As the pennies were handed out, the earliest comers may have grown worried. Each worker was being paid a penny, no matter how long he had toiled. Would the original contract still apply to them? Or would it be revised at the last moment? Doubt must have spread among the members of the first group, as each group was paid. What was going on here? Everyone was being paid the same. Yet no one was complaining. The third-hour arrivals had worked almost a full day, yet they did not complain. This was very strange. Why were they silent? This pay schedule was clearly unfair. But the earliest comers did not speak up in protest until their turn came, and each received his penny. They did not risk protesting until it was clear that their contract would not be revised upward. Then they complained bitterly. “Thou hast made them equal unto us, which have borne the burden and heat of the day.”

Equality. That was what bothered them. Not the money as such, but the equality it implied. It was all right with them that the others had been treated as equals to each other, no matter how early or late they went to work. But why should any of these late comers be regarded as the equals of the earliest comers? Yes, all the other late comers deserved a penny, no matter when they arrived on the job. But the earliest workers thought they deserved more. It did not matter what they had agreed to. The fact that late comers were being paid a penny made the early comers resentful. They were somehow being cheated—not contractually but morally. They knew they deserved more. When, at the end of the day’s labor, all of the workers were paid the same, the early comers could not contain their anger at the employer.

It is obvious who the complainers were in this parable: the Jews. Jesus made it plain in this parable that the final reward—access to heaven—would be handed out equally to all those who had worked in the vineyard. This was clearly a matter of mercy to the gentiles. The same reward would be obtained by all, irrespective of the time of day they arrived on the scene. All of the late arrivals accepted this, but the original workers did not. There should have been something extra for them, they believed.

The employer told them otherwise. “Friend, I do thee no wrong: didst not thou agree with me for a penny? Take that thine is, and go thy way: I will give unto this last, even as unto thee. Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? Is thine eye evil, because I am good?” Their eye was intensely evil. They deeply resented the grace shown by the employer to the other employees. It made the late comers appeal equal to the original men in the fields. This equality led them to protest. They were deeply opposed to the idea that the employer’s grace was the basis of their income. They believed that they had a legal claim on the employer beyond the contract. They had earned their wages fair and square, unlike the late comers.

D. Few Are Chosen

Jesus said, “So the last shall be first, and the first last: for many be called, but few chosen” (v. 20). Who had been called? All of the unemployed workers had been called. All those who responded to the call had been chosen to work. Then what did Jesus mean about few being chosen? Chosen for what? It is clear: eternal life.

The payment was the same for all. This has to refer to payment at the end of the day, i.e., final judgment. There would be no tomorrow. This time frame is history. They had all worked. They were all paid the same. The first ones to go to work were the last to be paid. The first nation to go to work in God’s Old Covenant kingdom was Israel. The parable warned the Jews that those who would arrive later—the gentiles—would be paid the same as the Jews, who had arrived first.

The Jews had long been told about what covenant-keepers would receive: the earth. “What man is he that feareth the LORD? him shall he teach in the way that he shall choose. His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth” (Ps. 25:12–13). “For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth” (Ps. 37:9). The basis of this inheritance is ethics, not race or nationalism. There had never been any doubt about this on God’s part. But the Jews misinterpreted this promise. They saw it in terms of nationalism. The victory would go to Israel. Gentiles could gain a share of this by becoming Jews, but access to the kingdom would always be through Israel. Israel would always have priority.

Not so, Jesus warned in this parable. Access to God’s kingdom is always by God’s grace. God would invite other groups throughout history, Jesus said. Nation by nation, gentiles would enter the kingdom. Late arrivals would gain the same reward: eternal inheritance.

In the parable, the late arrivals were paid first. The earliest arrivals did not know for sure that they would be paid the same amount. This parable made it clear: the Jews would be paid the same. The gentiles had not yet been invited into the kingdom at the time that Jesus gave this parable, but they soon would be. The sovereignty of God is the basis of who gets chosen. God had called the Jews, but they would soon lose title to the kingdom. “Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof” (Matt. 21:43). They would no longer be first in terms of status. Jesus knew their hearts. He knew God’s plan. They would not accept final payment—salvation—on the basis of equality with the gentiles. Many Jews were being called, but few would be chosen.

Jesus understood the pride of the Jews. Because they had been working longer, they thought they should be paid more. They wanted eternal life, plus something more, presumably status. Jesus’ previous lesson indicated that the plus—status—would go to the apostles, who would sit on 12 thrones judging the 12 tribes of Israel (Matt. 19:28).⁴ Jews and their representatives would be subordinate in the kingdom to the founders of the church.

This parable was a warning to the Jews. If they objected in advance to the payment offered for participation in the kingdom, they would not enter the kingdom. The earliest workers in the parable had not been told that others would come later, work shorter hours, and be paid the same. But the Jews were now being told this. The complaining workers of the parable clearly would not have accepted their jobs on these terms. Jesus warned them: you had better accept payment on God’s terms. The New Covenant would not favor any group, He said. Each group would have to accept its equality of legal status, i.e., judicially saved by grace.

When Christ said that many are called but few are chosen, He was referring to two groups, Old Covenant Israel and the gentiles. He was not referring people in general. He was not speaking of the percentages of people brought to saving faith in every generation in relation to the general population.⁵ He was referring to the percentage of Jews

4. Chapter 39.

5. This passage is not a valid proof text for amillennialists or premillennialists who would use it against postmillennialists.

who would enter the kingdom in the long period prior to their eschatological grafting in.⁶ In this parable, all of the late comers—the gentiles—gratefully accepted their pay. It was the original workers who complained. The employer asked: “Is thine eye evil, because I am good?” This was what Christ was asking the Jews. Were they going to interpret God’s looming act of grace to the gentiles as something evil because the gentiles would arrive in the kingdom later than the Jews had? Were the Jews going to reject the offer of eternal life because the same offer would soon be made to the gentiles? In the parable, Christ did not answer the question, but He made it clear that the morning workers resented equality with the late comers. The implication was that they would never have accepted the job on this basis. Many are called, but few are chosen.

The reference to groups of workers symbolizes nations. The Jews constituted one nation. Gentile nations would also come into the kingdom. This parable is not exclusively about individuals; it is also about groups. The Jewish nation was one group among many. This was the stumbling stone of Jesus’ message.

It is clear that the parable is about salvation: payment at the end of the day. All of the workers will be paid the same, Jesus said. This has to refer to eternal salvation. But isn’t eternal salvation strictly individual? Not according to the Bible. God brings nations into eternity. “After this I beheld, and, lo, a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands; And cried with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb” (Rev. 7:9–10). “And the city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it: for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof. And the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it: and the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honour into it. And the gates of it shall not be shut at all by day: for there shall be no night

6. “And they also, if they abide not still in unbelief, shall be grafted in: for God is able to graff them in again. For if thou wert cut out of the olive tree which is wild by nature, and wert grafted contrary to nature into a good olive tree: how much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive tree?” (Rom. 11:23–24). Cf. Charles Hodge, Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, [1864] 1950), p. 365; Robert Haldane, An Exposition of the Epistle to the Romans (Mac Dill Air Force Base, Florida: MacDonald Pub. Co., [1839] 1958), pp. 632–33; John Murray, The Epistle to the Romans, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1965), II, pp. 65–103.

there. And they shall bring the glory and honour of the nations into it” (Rev. 21:23–26). God deals eternally with men as they lived in history: members of large groups. The equal ultimacy of the one and the many in the Trinity will be reflected in humanity’s condition in eternity, just as it is in history. Only in hell and the lake of fire will individualism be absolute: God’s judgment on covenant-breakers’ self-professed autonomy.

This parable deals with nations or peoples: Jews and gentiles. Jesus said that gentile nations will come into the kingdom over time. He was warning the Jews: accept this arrangement or have the kingdom removed from you. They did not heed His warning. So, He removed the kingdom from them. The gentiles became the heirs.

E. The Owner’s Rights

The employer asked the ungrateful workers, “Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own?” (15a). Few verses in the Bible more eloquently defend the principle of private ownership. This parable is about God’s sovereignty in inviting gentiles and Jews on equal terms to participate in the New Covenant kingdom. But its language defending this doctrine of God’s sovereignty is not theological; it is judicial. The employer affirms his legal right to dispose of his own property as he sees fit.

This answer was intended to confound Jesus’ critics. It is God’s right to invite anyone He chooses into His kingdom. It is His right to grant to gentile converts access to the kingdom on exactly the same judicial basis that He grants it to Jews. The first to gain title to the New Covenant kingdom will be the gentiles, Jesus told the Jews. Paul made this even clearer in Romans 11.⁷

In the interim period when both covenants were in force, before the deaths of the apostles, Old Covenant Israel was given equal access to the kingdom. The kingdom was definitively transferred to the church with Christ’s resurrection (Matt. 28:18–20). It was progressively transferred after Pentecost. In A.D. 70, the kingdom was finally taken from the Jews and transferred to a new nation, the church. After the fall of Jerusalem, Old Covenant Israel ceased to exist. Rabbinic Judaism replaced it: the triumph of the Pharisees over the Sadducees, who had been associated with temple sacrifices. Herbert Danby, whose

7. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 8.

English translation of the Mishnah is still considered authoritative by the scholarly world, both Jewish and gentile, commented on the undisputed triumph of the Pharisees after the fall of Jerusalem (which lives on as Orthodox Judaism): "Until the destruction of the Second Temple in A.D. 70 they had counted as one only among the schools of thought which played a part in Jewish national and religious life; after the Destruction they took the position, naturally and almost immediately, of sole and undisputed leaders of such Jewish life as survived. Judaism as it has continued since is, if not their creation, at least a faith and a religious institution largely of their fashioning; and the Mishnah is the authoritative record of their labour."⁸

This parable teaches that the authority of the owner over the use of his property is analogous to the authority of God over the terms of salvation. This parable is a therefore stumbling block for every defender of socialism, communism, fascism, and the Keynesian economy. This parable sets forth a judicial principle of individual ownership and contract labor that leads to an inescapable conclusion: the modern welfare state is biblically illegitimate. Critics of biblical economics who argue that the Old Testament may have laid down laws that will produce a free market economy, but the New Testament does not, have steadfastly refused to comment on this parable.

Conclusion

When the parable says many are called but few are chosen, it refers to the Jewish nation. When it says that the first shall be last, it refers to the Jewish nation. The groups of workers in the parable came into the field at different times. Members of each group were paid at the same time. The later arrivals were paid first, from the latest to the earliest. The first nation—the Jews—was paid last. Workers were also paid the same.

This parable asserts the sovereignty of God in establishing the terms of access to the kingdom of God and payment for participation. It does so by invoking the right of property owners to do as they please with their property. It affirms the right of voluntary contracts between employers and employees. It defends the private property order against those who think that some higher principle of justice should override the terms of a labor contract. Occasionally, the Bible reveals such principles, such as the requirement that employers pay their employees no later than the end of the working day (Lev. 19:13).⁹ The Bible informs us of such exceptions to the sovereignty of contracts. Disgruntled workers or their political and academic spokesmen are not the source of authoritative information on the nature of contracts.

8. Herbert Danby, Introduction, The Mishnah (New York: Oxford University Press, [1933] 1987), p. xiii.

The top priorities set forth in this parable are faithful adherence to contracts and righteous dealing with others. An employer is allowed to give more to a worker than the worker expects. The employer is not to be criticized by those workers who receive what they had previously agreed to.

9. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 13.

41

THE PRINCIPLE OF SERVICE

But Jesus called them unto him, and said, Ye know that the princes of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great exercise authority upon them. But it shall not be so among you: but whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister; And whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant: Even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many (Matt. 20:25–28).

Jesus announced the same principle later in His ministry: “But he that is greatest among you shall be your servant. And whosoever shall exalt himself shall be abased; and he that shall humble himself shall be exalted” (Matt. 23:11–12). The theocentric principle undergirding this principle of rulership is the need for a ransom payment to God. God’s wrath must be placated. Someone must pay. This was the issue of servitude: point two of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Jesus Paid It All

Jesus identified Himself as the one who would pay this ransom on behalf of man. For paying this price, God the Father granted Jesus absolute power. “All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth” (Matt. 28:18b). This was God’s gift to Jesus. His sacrificial death led to His glorification in history.

Jesus gained absolute power over history, not solely in His status as God, but also in His status as human. He had possessed absolute power prior to His incarnation, but not in His status as human. To achieve this on man’s behalf, He had to humble Himself in His status as God. Paul wrote: “Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus: Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God: But made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name: That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; And that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father” (Phil. 2:5–11).²

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

What God did, covenant-keeping men must imitate. To achieve dominion in history, they must subordinate themselves to God. The evidence of this subordination is their service to other men. They must become servants.

B. Dominion Through Service: Covenantal

Jesus here made it plain that dominion is a legitimate goal. This has to mean dominion over others, i.e., holding an office. God has placed man over the creation (Gen. 1:26–28).³ Some men are placed legally over other men. This is the doctrine of judicial representation—also an aspect of point two. The question is: What are the legitimate means of attaining dominion?

2. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 20.

3. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

1. Military Command

We begin, as Jesus did, with a description of ecclesiastically illegitimate means. He said that the princes of the gentiles exercise authority over their subordinates. This means that they issue commands, and these commands must be followed. Those who refuse to obey necessarily risk the pain of negative sanctions. This system of rule requires a top-down chain of command. This is the kind of authority that Jesus exercised over sickness. When the Roman centurion described his own authority over his troops as analogous Jesus' authority over illness, Jesus praised this confession of faith. He healed the man's servant from a distance, which the centurion had affirmed that He could do, so great was His authority (Matt. 8:8–10).

This form of military command is not the model for the church's government. The military is a subset of civil government. The military serves the nation. Officers serve the nation best by placing at risk their lives and the lives of their men. Yet even here, the successful leader places his men's interests above his own. He protects his men's lives before he protects his career. He obeys orders that place his men at extreme risk, not to advance his career, but to serve as a model for his men. A battle plan sometimes involves the deliberate sacrifice of some units. Even here, the Western military tradition encourages volunteerism: high-risk operations are very often staffed by volunteers or special forces.

