The covenant between God and man was broken by Adam when he ate the forbidden fruit. The law's negative sanction is now applied to all men. Paul writes in Romans 2 that the negative sanction of final judgment is sure. Men will not be caught unaware by the final judgment, because they know enough about what God's law requires of every person for them to conclude that final negative sanctions are coming on "the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ according to my gospel" (v. 16). Paul is arguing the following: the ethical terms of the covenant are sufficiently well known to all men in history so as to render them without excuse before God. Men also know enough about God's final sanctions so as to render them without excuse. What kinds of evidence offers them such condemning testimony? Sanctions that are imposed by governments, including civil government. Men see that evil is punished in history by civil government and other lawful governments. Paul writes: "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God" (Rom. 13:1).⁷ Men know that every society requires such sanctions. They also know that these universal systems of governmental sanctions point to God's final judgment. But covenant-breaking people actively suppress this testimony of their consciences, just as they actively suppress the testimony that God must be worshiped in spirit and in truth.⁸

C. Corporate Action

The free market economist generally begins with the assumption of individual self-determination: man as the owner of his own person. The socialist economist begins with the state as the proper agency of economic representation: the owner of the means of production, including men's labor time. The free market economist cannot logically move from the sovereignty of an individual's value preferences to a concept of corporate social value that relies on state coercion that violates a law-breaker's individual values and preferences. The socialist economist cannot logically move from the sovereignty of the state's corporate social value scale to a concept of sovereign individual values and preferences. Yet, in practice, most free market economists do affirm the legitimacy of the state, and socialists do allow individuals to retain some degree of control over their persons and goods, if only for the benefits in improved efficiency that private ownership produces in individuals. There is a logical dilemma here. It involves the philosophical problem of the one and the many: dealing with hypothetically autonomous individuals and their underlying unity in society.⁹

7. Chapter 11.

8. Chapter 3.

A Christian economist has available to him a solution to this epistemological dilemma: the covenant. God established a covenant with mankind through Adam. This covenant still is binding, even though Adam violated its terms. It is still judicially representative. This doctrine of judicial representation rests on the doctrine of man as God's image in history (Gen. 1:26). In every person, there is a conscience that imparts some knowledge of what God's laws require. God brings sanctions, positive and negative, in terms of men's obedience to His laws. These sanctions are historical as well as final. They are both individual and corporate, but they are more predictably corporate (Deut. 28) than individual.¹⁰ Sanctions are less predictably applied in individual cases.

A Psalm of Asaph. Truly God is good to Israel, even to such as are of a clean heart. But as for me, my feet were almost gone; my steps had well nigh slipped. For I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked. For there are no bands in their death: but their strength is firm. They are not in trouble as other men; neither are they plagued like other men (Ps. 73:1–5).

Behold, these are the ungodly, who prosper in the world; they increase in riches. Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency. For all the day long have I been plagued, and chastened every morning (Ps. 73:12–14).

Until I went into the sanctuary of God; then understood I their end. Surely thou didst set them in slippery places: thou castedst them down into destruction. How are they brought into desolation, as in a moment! they are utterly consumed with terrors. As a dream when one awaketh; so, O Lord, when thou awakest, thou shalt despise their image. Thus my heart was grieved, and I was pricked in my reins. So foolish was I, and ignorant: I was as a beast before thee (Ps. 73:17–22).

9. R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1971] 2007). (<http://bit.ly/rjroam>)

10. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 1999] 2012), ch. 69.

Because the Bible authorizes civil governments to impose negative sanctions on behalf of God, it is possible for a society to avoid some of God's negative sanctions by enforcing God's civil laws. These laws are revealed in the Bible. Men can understand them. These biblical laws are consistent with the work of the law written in men's hearts. There is a common humanity. This common humanity involves a common perception of right and wrong. This ethical information is actively suppressed to one degree or other by sinful men. That men believe in God is clear from Romans 1:18–20.¹¹ That they do not come to a widely shared conclusion about what God is or how He wants men to worship Him is equally clear. Common revelation and common logic do not persuade covenant-breaking men that the God of the Bible has mandated specific forms of worship (Rom. 1:21–22).

The same is true of men's individual responses to God's law. Men know what the work of God's law requires, but they suppress this information in an attempt to escape the law's burdens and its sanctions. There is no system of logic that can persuade covenant-breaking men that the Bible's laws are mandatory. Even the Israelites needed regular reinforcement of this idea. The king was told to read the texts of God's law. "And it shall be, when he sitteth upon the throne of his kingdom, that he shall write him a copy of this law in a book out of that which is before the priests the Levites: And it shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the days of his life: that he may learn to fear the LORD his God, to keep all the words of this law and these statutes, to do them" (Deut. 17:18–19). The nation was to assemble every seven years to listen to a reading of the law. "And Moses commanded them, saying, At the end of every seven years, in the solemnity of the year of release, in the feast of tabernacles, When all Israel is come to appear before the LORD thy God in the place which he shall choose, thou shalt read this law before all Israel in their hearing. Gather the people together, men, and women, and children, and thy stranger that is within thy gates, that they may hear, and that they may learn, and fear the LORD your God, and observe to do all the words of this law" (Deut.

11. Chapter. 1.

31:10–12).¹² The work of the law of God is written in every human heart, but rebellious men nevertheless need written revelation and regularly scheduled reinforcement through hearing this written revelation.

D. Natural Law Theory

Natural law theory originated after the conquest of the Greek city-states, first by Alexander the Great and then by Rome. Stoic political philosophers had to replace their theory of the autonomy of the polis and its laws. They wanted to find some theoretical foundation for their ethical system, which had previously relied on intellectual defenses based on the sovereignty of the polis. Natural law theory was their solution.¹³

Natural law theory assumes that there is a common logic among men. This common-ground logic is said to bind all men, so that by adopting it, we can persuade all rational men of truths regarding social and political ethics. Christian philosophers have adopted this idea. They have confused it with the work of the law written on all men's hearts, which is a doctrine of common-ground ethics, not common-ground logic. The main effect of natural law theory today has been to persuade Christians to abandon the Bible as the basis of civil law and to begin a quest for common civil laws and common civil sanctions.

*The theoretical problem with natural law theory is that covenant-breakers suppress the truth in unrighteousness.*¹⁴ Their powers of reasoning have been negatively affected by sin. They begin with the assumption of their own intellectual autonomy. They cannot logically conclude from this assumption the existence of the absolutely sovereign God of the Bible and His binding law.¹⁵ Natural law theory is a logical system that begins with the assumption of man's autonomy, which means that natural law theory has nothing in common with the assumption of God's sovereignty. Natural law theory assumes that covenant-breaking men can build and sustain a just society on the basis of natural laws, natural rights, and universal logic.

12. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 75.

13. Sheldon S. Wolin, Politics and Vision: Continuity and Innovation in Western Political Thought (Boston: Little, Brown, 1960), pp. 77–82.

14. Chapter 2.

15. This was an argument in the philosophy of Cornelius Van Til. See Greg L. Bahnsen, Van Til's Apologetic: Readings and Analysis (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1998), pp. 309–10, extract from Van Til's The Protestant Doctrine of Scripture (P&R, 1967), pp. 12–13.

Natural law theory also assumes that sin and its effects have not adversely distorted the image of God in man. It assumes that fallen men do not actively suppress the truth. These two errors lead to a false conclusion, namely, that an appeal to common-ground logic can persuade fallen men. But if Paul was correct, how can natural men be persuaded to obey God, based on natural law theory? Paul entertained no such hope. “But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned” (I Cor. 2:14).¹⁶ God’s law is spiritually discerned, but only by those who are spiritual—and not even by very many of them, as the history of Christian political theory indicates. The work of God’s law is naturally discerned to a degree sufficient to condemn men for disobeying it, but not sufficiently to enable them to build a biblically moral society. The natural man suppresses the testimony of creation regarding God the Creator, reinterpreting God to conform to his covenant-breaking interpretation of reality. Why should Christians believe that the natural man will not do the same thing with the work of the law written on his heart? Why should Christians believe that an appeal to natural law should be any more successful in bringing men to judicial truth than to theological truth?

Today, Christian scholars are among the few remaining defenders of natural law theory. Darwinism has undermined faith in natural law theory among most humanists. Autonomous, evolving, impersonal nature is widely believed to offer no moral standards. The survival of a species is not a moral imperative. Darwinian nature has no moral imperatives. For Darwinism, there is no permanent natural law. Everything evolves, including ethics. Because man’s social and physical environments change, says the Darwinist, any ethical standards that do not promote the survival of humanity must be abandoned if mankind is to survive, yet survival is not an ethical imperative of nature unless man somehow represents nature on behalf of . . . whom? Man? God? Nature?¹⁷ There is no agreement among Darwinists regarding either the existence or the content of fixed ethical precepts that are derived from nature. Darwinian ethical systems are shaped by mankind’s uniquely understood requirement to survive in a constantly changing environment. This is the creed of social Darwinism, whether statist

16. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 2.

17. Bill McKibben, The End of Nature (New York: Anchor Press/Doubleday, 1989).

(e.g., Lester Frank Ward) or individualist (e.g., Herbert Spencer).¹⁸ This is also the creed of free market economists, Rothbard excepted.¹⁹

Natural law theory in Christian circles is always an attempt to fuse Jerusalem and Athens. It is an attempt to reconcile autonomous man and the God of the Bible. No such reconciliation is possible. Because of God's common grace, covenant-breaking men are restrained in their suppression of the work of the law in their hearts. But, as they think more consistently with their presuppositions regarding God, man, law, consequences, and time, they become more hostile to the work of the law in their hearts. Logic does not persuade them.

E. The Witness of Common Grace

God has revealed to all men what they must do to gain His positive sanctions in eternity: trust and obey. God has also given them sufficient revelation in nature to distinguish good laws from bad laws. God's Bible-revealed laws are the good laws that some covenant-breakers do recognize as beneficial. Moses told the generation of the conquest: "Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it. Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day?" (Deut. 4:5–8).²⁰

The fact that some covenant-breakers can and do recognize the beneficial corporate results of God's laws, including His civil laws, does not mean that they will adopt these laws or enforce them faithfully whenever they do adopt them. No foreign nation around Israel ever adopted Israel's legal system, although the people of Nineveh did repent temporarily from their most blatant personal sins (Jonah 3). The

18. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, Appendix A.

19. Rothbard defended the idea of permanent ethical standards, which he believed are derived from Aristotelian natural rights theory. Rothbard broke with Mises' utilitarianism and Hayek's social evolutionism. Murray N. Rothbard, The Ethics of Liberty (New York: New York University Press, [1982] 1998). (<http://bit.ly/RothbardEOL>) On Hayek, see North, Sovereignty and Dominion, Appendix B.

20. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 8.

Queen of Sheba did come for specific counsel from Solomon (I Kings 10:1–10).

These incidents in Israel's history indicate that on specific issues, covenant-breakers do recognize the wisdom of God's law. A covenant-breaking society may adopt certain aspects of God's law in personal ethics or even social ethics, but it will not adopt biblical law as a comprehensive system of justice. Apart from God's gift to a society of widespread, soul-saving, special grace, God does not empower a society to maintain its commitment to those few biblical laws that it may have adopted. Eventually, covenant-breakers rebel, just as Nineveh rebelled before Assyria invaded Israel. Common grace requires special grace in order to overcome mankind's ethical rebellion.²¹

F. Social Utility

1. Law Enforcement

Covenant-breaking men do recognize the existence of certain benefits from the enforcement of certain biblical laws. This offers Christian social theorists a solution to the epistemological problem of social utility. Because of the image of God in every man, all men can and do perceive the benefits of obeying God's law. They can see the positive results of God's law, meaning God's positive corporate sanctions for obeying God's civil laws. As we have seen, the Bible teaches this explicitly. The problem is, covenant-breakers suppress this testimony. Israel did, too. Men in their rebellion deny to themselves that God's law is valid. They deny that its benefits offset its costs.

Nevertheless, God restrains men's rebellion against His law, just as He restrains rebellion against false worship. He does not allow covenant-breaking men to become completely consistent in their rebellion. Because there is a shared perception among all the sons of Adam, due to God's image, it is possible for a civil government to pass laws against certain forms of public evil. These laws produce society-wide benefits. Evil-doers lose in this arrangement. This is one of the law's major benefits. Paul says that this is God's purpose for all civil law. "For rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. Wilt thou then not be afraid of the power? do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same: For he is the minister of God to thee for good. But if thou do that which is evil, be afraid; for he beareth not the sword in vain: for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil" (Rom. 13:3–4).²² The disutility produced by biblical civil sanctions in the life of the evil-doer is a benefit to society. His loss is society's gain. There is a net increase in social utility when evil-doers suffer losses for their evil deeds, either after they are judged by civil judges or before, when they decide not to seek their evil ends because of their fear of civil sanctions. Through natural revelation, covenant-breaking men know that this is the case, even though they partially suppress this truth. This is why all societies enforce laws against certain forms of public evil, such as murder.

21. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/gndcgg>)

2. Methodological Individualism

Methodological individualism, in its strict formulation, denies the existence of measurable social utility. It denies that there is any scientific case for social utility, because of the absence of any value scale common to all men.²³

Humanistic economics also denies the legitimacy of any appeal to God, and this includes any appeal to the biblical doctrine of the image of God in man. In theory, say free market economists, there can be no aggregating of individual utilities. Then most of them pull back from their conclusion. They do not become fully consistent.²⁴

To deny social utility is to deny to the free market economist the ability to assess scientifically the net social benefit of any proposal, public or private. The economist can legitimately say that a participant in a voluntary exchange entered into that exchange in the hope of benefitting from it, but social utility remains an illusion. He cannot logically say anything about social utility. This forces a consistent methodological individualist to remain silent when asked about the social utility of any piece of civil legislation. To use civil coercion in a quest to increase total social utility is to violate the principle of methodological individualism. Civil law discriminates against those who act in certain prohibited ways. But the consistent methodological individualist views all of men's actions as equally the result of utility-maximization. All utilities are equal, he says. The economist seeks to be ethically neutral,

22. Chapter 11.

23. Lionel Robbins, An Essay on the Nature and Significance of Economic Science, 2nd ed. (London: Macmillan, [1932] 1945), ch. VI. (<http://bit.ly/RobbinsEcon>)

24. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2011] 2012), Appendix B.

as true scientists supposedly should. So, he is trapped by his individualism and his claim of ethical neutrality. If he remains consistent, he cannot recommend or discourage any piece of legislation in his capacity as a scientist. He can say nothing about how to increase or decrease social utility, which does not exist as a scientifically valid category.²⁵

Do we find methodological individualists who remain silent regarding the positive or negative effects of legislation? Rarely. They have strong opinions on how to increase net social utility, which they attempt to defend scientifically. They use their skills as economists to take stands for or against specific civil laws. They say that a law would be a benefit or a liability to society. They implicitly rely on the concept of social utility to justify their support of or opposition to civil laws. In this sense, we can say that God restrains their consistency both as methodological individualists and as ethical neutralists. As fully consistent methodological individualists and as fully ethically neutral, they would remove legitimacy from all civil governments, which would undermine the God-ordained covenantal authority of the state. “Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God” (Rom. 13:1).

Paul identifies the office of civil magistrate as a ministry. “For he is the minister of God to thee for good. But if thou do that which is evil, be afraid; for he beareth not the sword in vain: for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil” (Rom.

25. Murray N. Rothbard deduced from a voluntary exchange an increase in social utility. Rothbard, “Toward a Reconstruction of Utility and Welfare Economics” (1956), in Rothbard, The Logic of Action I: Method, Money and the Austrian School (Lyme, New Hampshire: Edward Elgar, 1997), ch. 10. (<http://www.mises.org/rothbard/toward.pdf>) But he faced a major epistemological problem: envy. If each of two people increases his personal individual utility through voluntary exchange, but a third party resents this, the economist cannot legitimately say that there has been an increase in social utility. He cannot measure the increase in personal utility of the two traders and then subtract from this the disutility of third-party resentment. There is no common value scale. So, to make the logical case for his reconstruction, Rothbard had to deny envy, which he explicitly did. He said the economist must ignore envy because there is no way to know if a person really is envious. Years later, in one of his most important essays, Rothbard adopted sociologist Helmut Schoeck’s thesis of equalitarianism as the product of envy, which Schoeck presented in Envy: A Theory of Social Behavior (New York: Harcourt Brace, [1966] 1969). When Rothbard did this, he undermined the justification in his 1956 essay for saying that voluntary exchanges increase social utility. Rothbard, “Freedom, Inequality, Primitivism and the Division of Labor” (1971), in Rothbard, Egalitarianism: A Revolt Against Nature (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1974] 2000). (<http://bit.ly/RothbardEnvyYes>)

13:4).²⁶ God therefore restrains methodological individualists and ethical neutralists in their war against the legitimacy of the civil covenant. They abandon their epistemological commitments for the sake of their own relevancy in public discourse. They do not announce, “I’m sorry; I can say nothing about the social costs or benefits of this policy.” On the contrary, they encourage legislators and judges to estimate social costs and social benefits of some civil law in the state’s legitimate quest for greater social efficiency. They may even promote their own assessments of the policy in terms of social justice, which is usually seen by them as efficient, too.

Conclusion

In my studies of biblical economics, I have repeatedly returned to the themes of social utility and social cost, which are ultimately epistemological questions regarding the possibility of conceptual aggregation.²⁷ Economics as a science faces the same epistemological dilemma that political philosophy faces: logically reconciling the one and the many.²⁸ To move from the presupposition of the autonomous individual to a discussion of society-benefitting civil sanctions requires a leap of faith by methodological individualists. This leap of faith is eventually taken by all of them. They rarely explain why this procedure is valid, given their presuppositions.²⁹

Christianity offers the epistemological solution: the doctrine of man as the image of God, who Himself is both one and many, three persons yet one God. Men have the work of the law written in their hearts. A sufficient number of people in a society can come to agreements regarding the imposition of legitimate civil sanctions, thereby increasing total social utility. This is possible because they understand covenantal cause and effect as it applies to civil government, even

26. Chapter 11.

27. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 5; North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), Appendix H.

28. Rushdoony, One and the Many.

29. This includes Lionel Robbins, who reversed himself in 1939, fleeing from the inescapable conclusion in his Nature and Significance of Economic Science (1932) that all policy advice is illegitimate because of the impossibility of making interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. He backtracked in his debate with Roy Harrod: Lionel Robbins, “Interpersonal Comparisons of Subjective Utility” Economic Journal, XLVIII (1938), p. 637. For a discussion of this retreat, See North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 5:C:1.

though they suppress this knowledge to one degree or other.

Paul's discussion in Romans 1 of covenant-breaking man's willful suppression of the truth offers insights into his discussion of the work of the law in Romans 2. All men know who the Creator God is, Paul insists, but they suppress this revelation. They prefer to worship gods of their own imagination. Similarly, they perceive what God requires of them ethically, but they prefer to obey laws of their own creation.

The image of God in man enables a covenant-breaking legislator to perceive the social benefits of certain biblical laws, but covenant-breakers hold back³⁰ this perception in unrighteousness. They cannot completely suppress the truth, for God restrains them in their rebellion. This is why legislators do not pass utterly destructive laws. This is why civil judges can serve as ministers of God. It is also why economists can perceive the socially destructive effects of some pieces of free market-undermining legislation. But any moral or intellectual appeal to natural law subsidizes the enthronement of autonomous man. Autonomous man will eventually pursue programs that lead to his destruction. "But he that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul: all they that hate me love death" (Prov. 8:36).

30. Murray, Epistle to the Romans, I, p. 37.

4

IMPUTATION AND THE LAWS OF ECONOMICS

Seeing it is one God, which shall justify the circumcision by faith, and uncircumcision through faith. Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid: yea, we establish the law (Rom. 3:30–31).

The theocentric focus of this passage is sanctions, point four of the biblical covenant.¹ God is merciful, who justifies sinners by means of their faith in His son, Jesus Christ, who died for their sins. God upholds His law, yet He also grants mercy. The gospel of God's sovereign grace through the exercise of faith is not in conflict with the law of God. The law is established by faith.

Before we get to the implications of this passage for economic theory, we must first understand the passage in relation to its context: man's objective legal standing before God.

A. Imputation: Objective and Subjective

Paul clarifies what God has done on behalf of His people. He reminds his readers that the basis of their hope in God is not their personal fulfillment of the terms of God's law, which they have not done and cannot do. Rather, their only legitimate hope is in Christ, who died for their sins. "But God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:8).

God has declared His people righteous. That is to say, God has imputed righteousness to them. Here is the meaning of justification: God's declaration of a person's lawful judicial standing before Him. This is a judicial act, sometimes called a forensic act. The early chapters in Romans deal with God's imputation of righteousness to His people. "Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law" (Rom. 3:28). The Greek word translated here as "conclude" is the same as the word translated "impute." It should probably be translated here as "declare." The translators also translated the word as "reckoned" and "counted."

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

Now to him that worketh is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt. But to him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness. Even as David also describeth the blessedness of the man, unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works, Saying, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin (Rom. 4:4–8).

How was it then reckoned? when he was in circumcision, or in uncircumcision? Not in circumcision, but in uncircumcision. And he received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had yet being uncircumcised: that he might be the father of all them that believe, though they be not circumcised; that righteousness might be imputed unto them also (Rom. 4:10–11).

And therefore it was imputed to him for righteousness. Now it was not written for his sake alone, that it was imputed to him; But for us also, to whom it shall be imputed, if we believe on him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead; Who was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification (Rom. 4:22–25).

God declares a sinner justified in His sight. This declaration is a judicial act. God sovereignly decides not to count a man's sins against him. He announces, "Not guilty." He does this because of the perfect righteousness of Jesus Christ, whose moral perfection God transfers to the redeemed person at the time of his redemption.² Jesus Christ lived an objectively perfect life and died under God's objective curse. "For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit" (I Peter 3:18). God the Father made Jesus Christ to be sin for His people, to suffer objectively on behalf of His people in their place. ". . . God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation. Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God. For he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him" (II Cor. 5:19–21).

2. John Murray, "Definitive Sanctification" (1967), in The Collected Works of John Murray, 4 vols. (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, 1977), II, ch. 21.

Sin and its consequences are objective. The sinner comes under God's objective negative sanctions because of his sins. Jesus Christ suffered objectively on the cross. Justification is objective: right legal standing before God. Imputation is objective: God's declaration of the innocence of those who have put their faith in Christ's objective atonement as their substitute. Sanctification is objective: the transfer of Christ's moral perfection to the redeemed at the time of his redemption. All of these aspects of regeneration are objective. Yet they are also subjective, in the same sense that God's day-by-day witness to the goodness of His work of creation was subjective (Gen. 1). There is a subjective perception of an objective condition.

When God declares a person "not guilty," He makes a personal judgment. The sovereign Subject declares what is objectively true. The objective truth is assessed subjectively by God. Then He declares the truth objectively. But God does more than declare it; He has predestinated the objective historical conditions that make His declaration possible, beginning with the crucifixion. "And truly the Son of man goeth, as it was determined: but woe unto that man by whom he is betrayed!" (Luke 22:22). "The kings of the earth stood up, and the rulers were gathered together against the Lord, and against his Christ. For of a truth against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod, and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles, and the people of Israel, were gathered together. For to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done" (Acts 4:26–28).

There is the story of an umpire who makes a judgment regarding a violation of the game's rules. A player complains against the call. The umpire says one of three things in his defense. "I call them as I see them." This makes the game dependent on his perception; the violation does not have independent existence. This is the approach of philosophical nominalism. "I call them as they are." The violation has objective existence, and the umpire faithfully declares its existence. This is the approach of philosophical realism. "They are what I call them." This places sovereignty in the perception of the umpire. The violation derives its existence from the umpire's categories and his application of these categories to the perceived facts. This is Kantianism.

What is the correct view? When speaking of a declaration by the God of the Bible, the correct view is covenantalism: “I call them as I have foreordained them.” The event is what God had originally predestined it to be, and now He accurately assesses it. Then He declares it. When speaking of a declaration by a man, however, covenantalism applies differently: “I call them as I believe God has predestined them, but I am not God. The game, however, must go on.” A perfect call is possible only for God, but men can make progressively improved calls when they diligently study God’s rule book and gain experience over time by applying the rules to the real world. Even those umpires who have not studied the rule book can make calls sufficiently accurate to keep the game going, for the work of the rules are written on every observer’s heart (Rom. 2:14–15).³

Paul asks: “Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid: yea, we establish the law” (v. 31). Faith is a subjective act on man’s part, but it has objective results. Through a person’s subjective faith comes his objective deliverance from sin. Sin is not merely subjective. It is objective. Men objectively break God’s law. They come under objective sanctions because of their sin. Their faith in Christ then objectively redeems them from the worst objective consequences of sin.

B. The Laws of God and Nature

This two-fold aspect of redemption—subjective and objective—raises the question of God’s law. God’s law is more than a category of human thought. It is more than a conventional opinion of men in society. It is not the product of a subjective agreement among men. It is the objective product of subjective agreement among the three persons of the Godhead. God declares His law objectively. This declaration is based on subjective agreement. The declaration by God makes the law objectively true, just as He spoke the universe into existence out of nothing (Gen. 1).

1. Declared Law

Law is declared by God. He has revealed His law verbally to men in the past, beginning with Adam. “And the LORD God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die” (Gen. 2:16–

3. Chapter 3.

17). God caused Moses to write down God's law. "And the LORD said unto Moses, Write thou these words: for after the tenor of these words I have made a covenant with thee and with Israel. And he was there with the LORD forty days and forty nights; he did neither eat bread, nor drink water. And he wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant, the ten commandments" (Ex. 34:27–28). God subsequently raised up prophets to declare His law publicly. God's law is therefore both objective and subjective. It has been declared objectively in history by the Creator and Judge of man. But God is simultaneously three persons and one person—subjective. Law is under His authority. Law has no independent existence apart from God. It has no independent authority alongside God. It surely has no independent existence above God.

God has created the universe to be run by His laws, yet He actively sustains it. Specifically, this is the work of the second person of the Trinity. "Giving thanks unto the Father, which hath made us meet [fit] to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light: Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son: In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins: Who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of every creature: For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him: And he is before all things, and by him all things consist" (Col. 1:12–17).

2. Natural Laws

Men speak of the existence of natural laws. The archetype is the law of gravity, first described mathematically by Newton, but recognized and honored by all mankind. Newton could not explain gravity: attraction at a distance.

There is no record in the Bible of God's announcement of the law of gravity, but there is a description of its operation. "Then the devil taketh him up into the holy city, and setteth him on a pinnacle of the temple, And saith unto him, If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down: for it is written, He shall give his angels charge concerning thee: and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone" (Matt. 4:5–6).⁴

4. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 2.

We say that the law of gravity is a natural law because its operation does not depend on men's opinions. Even today, scientists do not know how it operates; they can only describe some of its effects. Scientists do not know how stars and planets attract each other physically in the vacuum of interplanetary space; they only know that this attraction exists, and that scientists can describe its operations mathematically. Furthermore, scientists do not know why the subjective logic of mathematics should describe the objective, impersonal operations of the natural world. It is unreasonable to imagine that certain subjective, common laws of men's minds should describe so precisely the physical operations of objective physical reality, but this is what science declares.⁵

The debate begins when men seek to defend natural laws as either laws of creation or laws of evolution. Did God create these laws, or did they evolve within an uncreated, impersonal universe? Modern science asserts the latter. Darwin's theory of the evolution of all species through impersonal, purposeless natural selection has been widely accepted by scientists because this theory extends modern science's theory of cosmic impersonalism to the origin and development of life. Modern science begins with the assumption of the autonomy of nature: naturalism. "Nature giveth, and nature taketh away. Blessed be the name of nature." Nature has produced mankind. Scientists can discover nature and nature's laws. "Evolutionary scientists giveth, and evolutionary scientists taketh away. Blessed be the name of evolutionary scientists."

C. The Logic of Economics

When we speak of economic laws, such as the law of supply and demand, we are not describing legislation that has been passed by a civil government. But the law of supply and demand does not exist independently of the opinions of men to the same degree that the law of gravity does. The way this law operates is shaped by legislation and enforcement. Nevertheless, the law of supply and demand is not dependent on government legislation, nor can it be repealed by legislation. In this sense, it is thought by some economists to be natural.

The law of supply and demand is not comparable to the laws of planetary motion, although economists have often adopted the mathematical style of the astronomer or the physicist in formally describing the law's operations. The economist offers a causal explanation for certain perceived regularities in human action. Men recognize these patterns of behavior; the economist offers reasons for these recurring patterns. He does so in part through introspection, although he may not admit this when he presents his explanations. First, he thinks about how he makes decisions; then he extends his discoveries to other men. The astronomer does not look inward in his attempt to understand the laws of planetary motion, which are exclusively physical. Economic laws are not physical. They are the product of human action in a God-cursed world of finite resources, i.e., the world of God's curse of the ground (Gen. 3:17–19).⁶

5. Eugene P. Wigner, "The Unreasonable Effectiveness of Mathematics in the Natural Sciences," Communications in Pure and Applied Mathematics, XIII (1960), pp. 1–14. (<http://bit.ly/WignerMath>) Wigner won the Nobel Prize in Physics.

1. Epistemology

How can men discover the laws of economics? This is the question of epistemology. Economists are not in agreement on the answer. Ludwig von Mises hypothesized a deductive logic of human action. He sought to discover a few universal axioms of human action. From these, he believed, an entire system of economics can be deduced logically. Mises was unique in this defense of axiomatic laws of exchange, a science that he called catallactics. Catallactics is a subset of a more general science of the laws of human action, a science which he called praxeology.⁷ Few economists have adopted this deductivist approach, and in this century, those who have adopted it have generally been followers of Mises.

In contrast to Mises, most economists say that they begin with tentative hypotheses regarding how men universally act in their quest to conserve scarce resources. Economists then look for supporting evidence in history. They also predict the outcome of certain market processes. But these predictions are of a peculiar kind. Economists adopt an “if . . . then” logic to make their predictions. “If the money supply increases, and if production does not increase, then some prices will rise.” Then they look for examples in history of monetary expansion, stable production, and generally rising prices, i.e., a rising index of prices. But there are times when the money supply increases, yet the official price index does not rise. This in no way disturbs economists. There are several ways around this discrepancy. “Prices would have fallen had there not been an increase in the money supply.” Or, “The velocity of money fell, despite the increase in its supply. People held onto money longer, so prices did not rise.” Or, “The official index of prices is no longer correctly weighted statistically to reflect the items that most people are buying.” Or, “The older definition of money is no longer applicable.” Economists remain committed to their theories long after these theories no longer describe what is taking place in the world of entrepreneurial decision-making.

6. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

7. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), chaps. 1–3. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>) Mises' distinction between praxeology and catallactics was his admission of the distinctions in the allocation and distribution of scarce resources in an institutional framework based on private ownership and open bidding (the free market) vs. institutions that are not based on these legal principles: family, church, state, and charitable agencies.

Economists assert a similar “if . . . then” logic to validate their epistemology. “If my ‘if . . . then’ predictions come true more often than the results of flipping a coin—random outcomes—then my hypothesis regarding a particular operation of the laws of economics should be accepted as provisionally true.” This methodology is called positivist: descriptive rather than prescriptive. It is also said to be empirical, i.e., ratified by observed evidence. To this extent, economics is said to be inductivist: derived from historical facts.

2. Human Autonomy

Both the deductivist (a priori) economic methodology and the inductivist (a posteriori) economic methodology begin with the assumption of the autonomy of man.⁸ Economists in both camps insist that any explanation that relies on the assumption of God, providence, or the supernatural has no place in economic science. Supernaturalism is said to be scientifically unverifiable. What economists do not mention is the fact that scientists have adopted standards of verification that exclude God, providence, and the supernatural. Modern science is methodologically naturalistic, a priori. Scientists assume what they need to prove: the autonomy of the universe, i.e., the absence of the providence of God.

Economists believe that the laws of economics are more than social conventions. These laws are said to govern human affairs irrespective of what men believe about them. These laws influence men's social relationships. Some of these laws' effects can be predicted, though not with absolute precision. For example, if civil government passes a law that sets a price of an item lower than the free market price, then shortages of the regulated items will develop at the official, legal price. More of these items will be demanded than supplied at the legal price. This law of economic cause and effect is not found in the Bible. It is also not discovered mathematically, although it is often described by economists with the use of mathematics or graphs. This law's results are sometimes visible, most notably when long lines form in front of stores that sell the price-controlled item.

8. Gary North, “Economics: From Reason to Intuition,” in North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1976).

3. Supply and Demand

The Bible records examples of the fundamental economic law of supply and demand. Consider the account of the siege of Samaria in Elisha's day. "And it came to pass after this, that Ben-hadad king of Syria gathered all his host, and went up, and besieged Samaria. And there was a great famine in Samaria: and, behold, they besieged it, until an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of dove's dung for five pieces of silver" (II Kings 6:24–25). This siege would soon be lifted, Elisha prophesied. Soon after it is lifted, Elisha said, prices will fall. "Then Elisha said, Hear ye the word of the LORD; Thus saith the LORD, To morrow about this time shall a measure of fine flour be sold for a shekel, and two measures of barley for a shekel, in the gate of Samaria" (II Kings 7:1). He was implicitly announcing that an objective increase in the supply of goods would soon produce an objective decline in prices. Elisha's economic forecast implicitly assumed that there would be no objective increase in demand to offset the objective increase in supply. Elisha used the imminent outcome of the law of supply and demand—lower prices—to present his prophecy of the end of the siege. He did not say that the Syrian troops would soon leave; he said that the siege-induced prices would soon fall. He knew that his listeners would understand what he was saying about the siege. The law of supply and demand operated in ancient Israel, but a detailed description of the logic undergirding this law—the logic of the auction—is not provided in the Bible.

4. Economic Imputation

According to modern economic thought, prices are the objective result of men's subjective evaluations regarding the value of scarce resources. Economists call this process "imputation." People are said to impute value to a good or a service. Different men impute different value, depending on their individual value scales. This imputation process is purely subjective, but it applies to objective conditions: supply, demand, and market price. Through objective bidding among sellers, and also through objective bidding among buyers, an objective price appears in the market. The market is a giant, complex auction system. The law of supply and demand therefore operates both objectively and subjectively. It operates in the affairs of men because men objectively bid for scarce resources that they subjectively believe are objectively necessary for them in order for them to attain their subjectively generated goals for the future.

The law of supply and demand is objectively true. It governs the economic decisions of men even though they may not understand it. Those who heard Elisha's forecast were expected by the prophet to understand it. His prophecy was a prophecy regarding the siege far more than it was a forecast of prices, but it was presented as a forecast of prices. He expected his listeners to deduce from this forecast that the siege would end before the next day was over. In this sense, the law of supply and demand was presumed by the prophet. So was the widespread public understanding of this law. Had this not been true, his prophecy would have been unintelligible.

Conclusion

God subjectively assesses a person "guilty" because of the objective guilt of the sinner. God objectively declares a redeemed person "not guilty" because of the objective innocence of Jesus Christ, which is then by grace transferred by God to the sinner. God's imputation is subjective, but it is based on objective conditions.

A man subjectively imputes value to one additional unit of a scarce economic resource in terms of his subjective perception of objective conditions: his existing supply of the good and the estimated objective supply held by other owners. His scale of values is subjective. He decides what is important to him, from most important to least important. But his scale of values is not autonomous. It does not exist independent of God, who has made man in His own image. The common *image of God in all people makes possible socially objective agreements about what is important.*⁹

The laws of economics are objective because man's image is objective, and also because God's curse of man's work and his environment is objective. Subjective imputations by men who live in an objectively cursed, finite environment lead to their objective decisions, which in turn establish objective market conditions: supply, demand, and prices. A man's subjective imputations make him objectively responsible before God, even before he takes objective action. "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not commit adultery: But I say unto you, That whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart" (Matt. 5:27–28). He is also responsible for the actions that result from his subjective decisions. "But those things which proceed out of the mouth come forth from the heart; and they defile the man. For out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies" (Matt. 15:18–19). God imputes meaning to each man's subjective imputations, his objective decisions, and the objective outcomes of his decisions. God does this in terms of His own subjective scale of values—moral values. These divine values govern God's establishment of analogous values that are to govern men, who are made in God's image. These analogous values become objective for men, either because of the work of the law objectively written on their subjective hearts (Rom. 2:14–15)¹⁰ or the law objectively written on their subjective hearts (Heb. 8:8–13; 10:15–17).

Humanistic economists deny that a supernatural realm affects the operation of the market. While they do admit men's subjective opinions about the supernatural realm may influence the array of prices, the supernatural is said by economists not to be an objective factor in economics. There is no divine objective scale of values, nor is the image of God in man a relevant issue for economic theory—so economists assume. There is no theoretically valid appeal beyond the realm of the creation, which is said to be autonomous. Man calls things as he sees them, or calls them as they are. Ultimately, things are what man calls them, the modern humanist insists. But which man? The sovereign individual or the sovereign state that represents collective man? On this, economists disagree. So do political philosophers.

9. Chapter 1.

10. Chapter 3.

5

SUBORDINATION AND DELIVERANCE

For the earnest expectation of the creature [creation] waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God. For the creature [creation] was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope, Because the creature [creation] itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now (Rom. 8:19–22).

The theocentric focus of this passage is God's curse on the creation (Gen. 3:18).¹ This is an aspect of sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.² Paul says that the deliverance of the creation from this curse will take place at some point in the future.

A. The Sons of Men

The creation awaits “the manifestation of the sons of God.” The word translated as “manifestation” is apokalupsys. It can be translated as “appearing.” Example: “That the trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and honour and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ” (I Peter 1:7). It is also the word for “revelation.” “Now, brethren, if I come unto you speaking with tongues, what shall I profit you, except I shall speak to you either by revelation, or by knowledge, or by prophesying, or by doctrine?” (I Cor. 14:6). “The Revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him, to shew unto his servants things which must shortly come to pass; and he sent and signified it by his angel unto his servant John” (Rev. 1:1).

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

2. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

The final revelation regarding the sons of men—all mankind—is the final judgment. “And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them: and they were judged every man according to their works. And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death. And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire” (Rev. 20:13–15).

Who are these sons of men? Does this phrase mean mankind in general? In the Old Testament, the phrase sometimes is applied to mankind in general. “What is man, that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that thou visitest him?” (Ps. 8:4). “Put not your trust in princes, nor in the son of man, in whom there is no help” (Ps. 146:3). The phrase appears most frequently in Ezekiel to name the prophet. “And he said unto me, Son of man, stand upon thy feet, and I will speak unto thee” (Ezek. 2:1). Daniel referred to the son of man as a messenger of God. “I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him” (Dan. 7:13). God spoke to Daniel using this phrase. “So he came near where I stood: and when he came, I was afraid, and fell upon my face: but he said unto me, Understand, O son of man: for at the time of the end shall be the vision” (Dan. 8:17). In the New Testament, Jesus used this phrase to identify Himself. “And Jesus saith unto him, The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head” (Matt. 8:20).³ “But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins, (then saith he to the sick of the palsy,) Arise, take up thy bed, and go unto thine house” (Matt. 9:6).

What is the context of the phrase in Romans? It refers to the work of the Holy Spirit in regenerating men. “For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. For ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God: And if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together” (Rom. 8:14–17).

3. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 19.

Here, the revelation of the sons of men has to refer to the coming of Christ's gospel in history. This revelation had already begun in Paul's day, but it had not yet transformed either Roman or Jewish society. The creation still awaits this greater manifestation, Paul says. What does the creation await? Deliverance from the bondage of corruption. "Because the creature [creation] itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God" (Rom. 8:21). But why should the creation expect such a thing? Because this deliverance will come for the sons of men. "For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us" (Rom. 8:18). This points to the final deliverance from sin. The sufferings of the present do not compare to the glory of the post-resurrection world.

B. Progressive Deliverance from Sin and Its Curses

Will there be any corporate manifestation in history of this final personal deliverance from sin? This raises the issue of eschatology. The amillennialist does not believe that history manifests this final deliverance, except insofar as the church reflects it, but the church is surrounded by a hostile world, and this non-delivered condition will continue until the end of history. The premillennialist believes the same until the Second Coming of Christ inaugurates His earthly kingdom's millennial reign. During this millennial reign, the premillennialist might say—if premillennialists ever commented on such matters—that the creation may begin to be delivered from God's curse because of the deliverance of human society from sin's effects. But this deliverance will not come prior to Christ's bodily return into history. Until then, the church will remain an oasis of deliverance from sin in a desert of evil. The creation will continue to groan.

Paul's revelation in this passage is a New Testament application of Isaiah's prophecy regarding the New Heaven and New Earth. "For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people: and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying. There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed" (Isa. 65:17–20). Isaiah's prophecy cannot refer to the post-resurrection state, for it speaks of sinners, who will not be present in the post-resurrection covenanted community (Rev. 20:14–15). Isaiah's prophecy has to do with history. So, therefore, does Paul's. Isaiah's prophecy is related to his previous messianic prophecy.

And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a Branch shall grow out of his roots: And the spirit of the LORD shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the LORD; And shall make him of quick understanding in the fear of the LORD: and he shall not judge after the sight of his eyes, neither reprove after the hearing of his ears: But with righteousness shall he judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth: and he shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked. And righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins. The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them. And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together: and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice' den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea (Isa. 11:1–9)

The creation will at some time cease to be a war zone. This passage refers to warring nations. It uses a metaphor to drive home this prophecy into the reader's consciousness: the peaceful interaction between fierce animals and the normal victims of their ferocity. Isaiah discussed nature, but he had in mind the transformation of Israel.

And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people, which shall be left, from Assyria, and from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush, and from Elam, and from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the islands of the sea. And he shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth. The envy also of Ephraim shall depart, and the adversaries of Judah shall be cut off: Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim. But they shall fly upon the shoulders of the Philistines toward the west; they shall spoil them of the east together: they shall lay their hand upon Edom and Moab; and the children of Ammon shall obey them (Isa. 11:11–14).

Paul's words also invoke nature. Deliverance takes place in nature, not merely in society. The metaphor is not a metaphor after all. Or is it? Is Paul merely retaining the metaphorical character of Isaiah's messianic prophecy about animals? Is he saying that human society will alone be delivered from sin? Is nature really going to change? Paul's message is that there will someday be a removal of God's curse on nature. The creation was placed under bondage by Adam's Fall. Adam judicially represented nature (Gen. 1:26–28).⁴ Nature came under a curse placed by God on Adam. The principle of subordination is basic to the biblical covenant.⁵ Those who are under the authority of a superior suffer when he does, or triumph when he does. Paul here refers back to Genesis 3, not to Isaiah 11.

Isaiah 65:17–20 prophesied an era in history in which children will die at age one hundred. This indicates a restoration of man's pre-Flood lifespan. There will be a transformation of human biology that enables men to live much longer. It is not said that this will be a scientific breakthrough, although it could be. Paul is saying that the creation under man will participate in a comparable removal of the effects of sin. The curse of God will be progressively removed from man and nature. Isaiah did not say that only the redeemed will be blessed with longer lifespans. So will sinners. This indicates that Isaiah was not speaking of Israel alone, but of mankind in general. The process of redemption will affect all mankind. This does not mean that every person will be redeemed, for sinners will still be sinners. It does mean that mankind's world, including human biology, will be transformed. It means that God's common grace will bring blessings to all.⁶

Why should the creation be relieved from some of the effects of God's curse? Because mankind is partially delivered from sin. But why should mankind be partially delivered? Because of God's grace of progressive sanctification in human society. As men become less rebellious against God, God will begin to bless both them and nature. He will remove the biological limitation that He imposed in order to restrain the evil behavior of mankind: short lifetimes. Moses wrote of his era,

4. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, chaps. 3, 4.

5. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 2.

6. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

which applies to ours: “For all our days are passed away in thy wrath: we spend our years as a tale that is told. The days of our years are threescore years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labour and sorrow; for it is soon cut off, and we fly away” (Ps. 90:9–10). Yet at age 130, Jacob called his days short (Gen. 47:9). Moses saw the shortened lifespan as a curse on mankind. Isaiah said that this curse will be reversed.

C. Progressive Social Sanctification

Paul’s words imply that there will be a time when the gospel will be so widely believed that most men will structure their outward behavior in terms of it. The revelation of the sons of men will be widespread. What at first is limited to the church will spread to all mankind. Jeremiah prophesied:

Behold, the days come, saith the LORD, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah: Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day that I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt; which my covenant they brake, although I was an husband unto them, saith the LORD: But this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel; After those days, saith the LORD, I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts; and will be their God, and they shall be my people. And they shall teach no more every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, Know the LORD: for they shall all know me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the LORD; for I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more. Thus saith the LORD, which giveth the sun for a light by day, and the ordinances of the moon and of the stars for a light by night, which divideth the sea when the waves thereof roar; The LORD of hosts is his name (Jer. 31:31–35).

The author of Hebrews applies this prophecy to the church. “For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people: And they shall not teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for all shall know me, from the least to the greatest. For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more” (Heb. 8:10–12). This is why the Old Covenant order is about to disappear, he says. “Whereof the Holy Ghost also is a witness to us: for after that he had said before, In that he saith, A new covenant, he hath made the first old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away” (Heb. 8:13). It is being replaced. And so it was, in A.D. 70.

The church is international. It is no longer geographically bottled up in Palestine. This is why Isaiah’s prophecies regarding nature (Isa. 11:1–9) and man (Isa. 65:17–20) can be fulfilled in history. The knowledge of God’s law—not just the work of the law in all men’s hearts (Rom. 2:15)⁷—will become widespread. The curse on nature will be progressively removed because God’s law will be progressively obeyed.

This is progressive social sanctification. The social laws of God will be progressively obeyed. This will bring His positive social sanctions in history. This is what Isaiah prophesied. It is within this prophetic context that Paul’s discussion of the redemption of the creation should be understood. Full redemption must await the post-resurrection New Heaven and New Earth (Rev. 21, 22). But partial redemption of nature is not only possible, it is prophetically inevitable.

As to whether this visible redemption will be accomplished by science or by God’s direct intervention, Paul does not say. Neither did Isaiah.

D. Economic Growth

God placed Adam under a curse in order to make his work less productive. “Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field” (Gen. 3:18). The curse on nature was a curse on Adam. Nevertheless, in all of God’s temporal curses, there is grace present.⁸ Adam’s reduced production gave him an incentive to cooperate with others to increase their individual output. “Two are better than one; because they have a good reward for their labour. For if they fall, the one will lift up his fellow: but woe to him that is alone when he falleth; for he hath not another to help him up” (Eccl. 4:9–10). This incentive for cooperation increases the cost of murder and war. The curse on fallen man and his environment can in some cases reduce the level of violence.

Cooperation among men is comparable to a joint effort between man and nature. It makes men wealthier. Any reduction in the resistance of nature in surrendering her fruits increases men’s wealth. Paul here prophesies a future in which nature will be delivered from its present groaning. This is necessarily a forecast of increased economic output.

7. Chapter 3.

8. North, Dominion and Common Grace, ch. 2.

Nature was cursed by God in order to pressure men to cooperate. Because men can increase their wealth through cooperation, men cooperate. If the curse of nature is reduced, there will not be so great a need for men's cooperation. The closer society approaches zero prices for factors of production, tastes remaining equal, the less need for the division of labor. But if the increase in nature's productivity is in response to mankind's greater covenant-keeping, as this passage suggests will be the case, then the result is greater dominion rather than increased leisure. Output rises, and people use this greater output to subdue the earth less expensively. In contrast, if nature's output should increase apart from covenant-keeping, its increased output will lead to reduced cooperation. Men will pursue more leisure. They will not feel the same environmental pressure to cooperate in order to increase their individual wealth. So, the cause of the increase is significant in assessing its results. An increase in nature's output will have different effects, depending on men's ethical commitment and vision of the future.

Economic growth is a positive sanction attached to God's covenant law. The early sections of both Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28 list blessings for corporate obedience. These passages include increased economic growth. "Blessed shall be the fruit of thy body, and the fruit of thy ground, and the fruit of thy cattle, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks of thy sheep. Blessed shall be thy basket and thy store" (Deut. 28:4-5).⁹ "The LORD shall command the blessing upon thee in thy storehouses, and in all that thou settest thine hand unto; and he shall bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee" (Deut. 28:8). Paul is forecasting a time when the earth will provide more of its wealth to men. This is part of a general removal of Adam's curse.

Because God had given Israel a vision of linear history, from the original creation to the expansion of God's kingdom, the Israelites had the foundation of a doctrine of progress. Deuteronomy 28 applied progress to economic affairs. Paul here extends this hope to the world at large. It is not just the land of Israel that will be blessed. It will be the whole earth. The gentiles can participate.

This passage is a standing testimony against those who declare that there should be laws passed to restrict economic growth. They are arguing against the blessings of God. They are attempting to overturn this prophecy in the name of wealth-redistribution by agents of the state.

9. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

There are reasons for this hostility to economic growth. If economic growth is legitimate, then population growth is legitimate. The modern secular West hates population growth. This is why abortion has become legal in the West. Sinners seek an increase in their personal wealth by killing their own children. Collectively, they seek an increase in their per capita wealth—their lifestyle—by killing their unborn children. They also see that the continual expansion of population in a finite world points to the end of time. They rightly fear God's final judgment. Filling the earth with people means fulfilling the God's dominion covenant given to Adam (Gen. 1:26–28) and Noah (Gen. 9:1–2).¹⁰ Covenant-breakers seek to delay God's final judgment by turning back both economic growth and population growth. They seek to escape their duties under God's dominion covenant. Here is the underlying theology of the zero-growth movement: deferring God's final judgment.

Conclusion

Paul prophesied the redemption of nature from God's curse. Nature had come under a curse because of Adam, Paul said. "For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope" (Rom. 8:20). But a second Adam has come, Jesus Christ. He has reversed the curse definitively. "For if by one man's offence death reigned by one; much more they which receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ. Therefore as by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life. For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous" (Rom. 5:17–19). What Christ began at His resurrection will be extended in history. "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order: Christ the firstfruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming. Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death" (I Cor. 15:22–26).¹¹ The reign of Christ will progressively overcome His enemies in history, culminating in the triumph over death at the final judgment. Death is the last enemy to be overcome. This means that before death is finally overcome at the end of history, the curses associated with Adam's fall will be overcome.

10. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 18.

Paul was saying that the gospel will be extended throughout the earth, and to the extent that man's society is redeemed by special grace, so will nature be redeemed by common grace. Nature will come under the reign of Christ. The prophecies in Isaiah 11 will be fulfilled. So will the prophecies in Isaiah 65.

11. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 16.

6

THE ORIGIN OF SOCIAL ORDER

And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose (Rom. 8:28).

The theocentric focus of this verse is the absolute sovereignty of God over every aspect of history.¹ Those who love God can legitimately be confident about the beneficial personal outcomes of their decisions. They can also be confident that God will thwart the outcomes of the decisions of God's covenantal enemies. God providentially sustains the universe in such a way that His people will be victorious in the end. Every fact of history leads to this victorious end.

A. Good Results from Evil Decisions

Paul says here that all things work for good for God's elect—not just a few things, but all things. There is no indication in the text that “all” means anything except “all.” Even the painful things that afflict covenant-keepers in history are for their good, just as Paul's thorn in the flesh was for his good (II Cor. 12). The universe is completely rigged by God in favor of God and His people. It is inherently good, but only for those who love God, who are called according to His purpose. For covenant-breakers, the reverse is true: all things in history work against them in eternity. “For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?” (Mark 8:36).

It takes enormous faith to believe this. It flies in the face of many visible facts in the lives of Christians. In the chapter immediately preceding his discussion of the thorn in his flesh, Paul wrote of his own experience: “Are they ministers of Christ? (I speak as a fool) I am more; in labours more abundant, in stripes above measure, in prisons more frequent, in deaths oft. Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one. Thrice was I beaten with rods, once was I stoned, thrice I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day I have been in the deep; In journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren; In weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness. Beside those things that are without, that which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the churches. Who is weak, and I am not weak? who is offended, and I burn not?" (II Cor. 11:23–29). Nevertheless, Paul tells us here that all things work for the good of those who love God. To believe this requires the adoption of a personal eschatology of victory. In fact, no passage in the Bible is more expressive of a personal eschatology of victory than this one. This verse is the great affirmation of personal victory.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

The cross is the supreme example of this two-fold process of historical causation. It initially appeared to bring an ignominious end to Jesus' ministry. His enemies believed that it had. So did His disciples. They scattered. The cross was so horrendous a prospect that Jesus asked God the Father that this burden might be kept from Him (Matt. 26:39). Nevertheless, without Jesus' bodily victory over death after the cross, there would be no guarantee of the promise of Romans 8:28. Paul wrote this twice: "And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain" (I Cor. 15:14). "And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins" (I Cor. 15:17). Christ's bodily resurrection is the legal foundation for covenant-keepers' confidence regarding the comprehensive, one-sided benevolence of the providence of God.

Jesus said of Judas before the betrayal, "And truly the Son of man goeth, as it was determined: but woe unto that man by whom he is betrayed!" (Luke 22:22). Judas had his goal and motivation; God had His. The Jewish leaders had their motivation; God had His. "Then gathered the chief priests and the Pharisees a council, and said, What do we? for this man doeth many miracles. If we let him thus alone, all men will believe on him: and the Romans shall come and take away both our place and nation. And one of them, named Caiaphas, being the high priest that same year, said unto them, Ye know nothing at all, Nor consider that it is expedient for us, that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not. And this spake he not of himself: but being high priest that year, he prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation; And not for that nation only, but that also he should gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad. Then from that day forth they took counsel together for to put him to death" (John 11:47–53).

1. Joseph in Egypt

Consider the story of Joseph in Egypt. Things turned out very differently from what his brothers had planned for him, as well as what Potiphar had planned for him. After their father died, Joseph's brothers feared that Joseph would impose vengeance on them. They had kidnapped him and then sold him to slave traders. Now he was second in command in Egypt, and they were dependent on Egypt for food. "And when Joseph's brethren saw that their father was dead, they said, Joseph will peradventure hate us, and will certainly requite us all the evil which we did unto him" (Gen. 50:15). "And Joseph said unto them, Fear not: for am I in the place of God? But as for you, ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good, to bring to pass, as it is this day, to save much people alive" (Gen. 50:19–20).

Here we have the clearest statement in the Old Testament regarding the superiority of God's decree over the plans of men. Man proposes, but God disposes. There is no doubt that the brothers had acted in an evil manner. Their intentions had been evil. Yet their actions resulted in their blessing. Joseph assured them, "Now therefore fear ye not: I will nourish you, and your little ones. And he comforted them, and spake kindly unto them" (v. 21). Out of evil came good—not just for Joseph but for the brothers, too. Their decision to sell him to slave traders became the means of their families' deliverance from famine.

The Pharaoh of the exodus provides another example of evil's producing good, though not for the perpetrator. His refusal to allow the Israelites to make a three-day journey to sacrifice to God led to their complete deliverance from Egypt. This was God's doing. "And the LORD hardened the heart of Pharaoh, and he hearkened not unto them; as the LORD had spoken unto Moses" (Ex. 9:12). In the next chapter of Romans, Paul uses this example in his defense of God's absolute sovereignty in God's electing some to salvation and some to perdition. "So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy. For the scripture saith unto Pharaoh, Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might shew my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth" (Rom. 9:16–17). Pharaoh had his priorities; God had His. God's were triumphant.

God was sovereign over the decisions of the brothers, Joseph said. God had intended their actions for good. The brothers had an evil motivation, and this had led to their action. This evil action led to other evil actions: lies by Potiphar's wife, forgetfulness by the Pharaoh's butler. Each evil action put Joseph closer to the office of deliverer. God had not only intended the brothers' evil actions for good, He had intended all of the evil actions that had afflicted Joseph to result in good for the family of Jacob. The brothers and their families would be blessed. God had predestinated the entire process. This is what Joseph told his brothers. There had never been any doubt in God's mind about the outcome of this series of decisions by people whose intentions were evil. They had their goals; God had His. They had their motivations; God had His. Both God's motivation and His goal were for good for the sons of Jacob. Joseph told them that they had done evil, but the results were good. Joseph honored God's goal. He did not seek to avenge himself on them. In imagining otherwise, they had thought evil of him, again. They were wrong, again.

B. Coordination from Above

The doctrine of God's absolute predestination undergirds Paul's promise in Romans 8:28. In Romans 9, he spells out this doctrine in detail. God is the grand coordinator of all events. Because the free-will theology of Arminianism is today almost universal in Christian circles, even as Calvinism had been almost universal in Protestant circles in the days of Arminius, Christians refuse to accept the plain teaching of these passages. They may give lip service to them, but they do not emotionally and intellectually accept them. They do not believe Paul when Paul writes: "And not only this; but when Rebecca also had conceived by one, even by our father Isaac; (For the children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of him that calleth;) It was said unto her, The elder shall serve the younger. As it is written, Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated. What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid" (Rom. 9:10–14). Before Esau had done good or evil, God hated him. And why not? Esau was an heir of Adam. The amazing fact is that God loved Jacob, not that he hated Esau. But the Arminian reverses this assessment. He is amazed that God hated Esau. He is more than amazed; he does not believe it. But the text is quite clear. God hated Esau in the womb. Calvinist commentator John Murray has commented on this passage. "Since the oracle points to a discrimination that existed before the children were born or had done good or evil (vs. 11), so must the differentiation in the present instance. Thus the definitive actions denoted by 'love' and 'hatred' are represented as actuated not by any character differences in the two children but solely by the sovereign will of God, 'the purpose of God according to election' (vs. 11)."² The Bible teaches that there is coordination from above. There are human actions in history, but coordination is imposed by God from beyond history. God is completely in charge.

I am the LORD, and there is none else, there is no God beside me: I girded thee, though thou hast not known me: That they may know from the rising of the sun, and from the west, that there is none beside me. I am the LORD, and there is none else. I am the LORD, and there is none else. I form the light, and create darkness: I make peace, and create evil: I the LORD do all these things. Drop down, ye heavens, from above, and let the skies pour down righteousness: let the earth open, and let them bring forth salvation, and let righteousness spring up together; I the LORD have created it. Woe unto him that striveth with his Maker! Let the potsherd strive with the potsherds of the earth. Shall the clay say to him that fashioneth it, What makest thou? or thy work, He hath no hands? Woe unto him that saith unto his father, What begettest thou? or to the woman, What hast thou brought forth? (Isa. 45:5–10).

Paul paraphrased this passage in chapter 9 of Romans. "Thou wilt say then unto me, Why doth he yet find fault? For who hath resisted his will? Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour?" (Rom. 9:19–21). Murray writes: "The similitude is that of the potter making vessels of different character from the same lump of clay, one to serve a high purpose, another a less noble. No one questions his right to make these distinctions. He has not merely the power; he has the au- thority.”³

2. John Murray, The Epistle to the Romans, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1959, 1965), II, p. 23.

There is an objective decree over history: God’s. His decree is not a matter of guesswork on God’s part. Neither is its outcome. His decree comes to pass in history. “The LORD of hosts hath sworn, saying, Surely as I have thought, so shall it come to pass; and as I have purposed, so shall it stand” (Isa. 14:24). With his sanity restored after seven years of madness, Nebuchadnezzar announced: “And all the inhabitants of the earth are reputed as nothing; and he doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth: and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?” (Dan. 4:35). The coordination of human affairs and nonhuman affairs is theocratic: God rules. There is a one-to-one correlation between what God proposes and what God disposes.

C. The Source of Economic Order

Social theorists who deny Augustinianism/Calvinism must offer some other theory of social coordination. These theorists search for cause-and-effect patterns within the creation that provide an explanation for the presence of social order in the midst of innumerable events that no man can begin to comprehend, and which no god is allowed to interfere with except sporadically. They search for an explanation for the correspondence between the one and the many, between the social order and the myriad decisions of individuals. Every time a new explanatory system is suggested by some social theorist or historian, it is refuted by other theorists as being insufficient as an explanatory device.

Adam Smith made famous the phrase, “the invisible hand.” His metaphor was supposed to explain how it is possible for public good to emerge from self-interested decisions by individuals who buy and sell.⁴ This metaphor invoked an image of an all-powerful God along the lines of Scottish Presbyterian Calvinism. But Smith did not believe in Calvin’s God. He believed in a more deistic sort of God, more Newtonian than Calvinistic. He did not believe that God personally inter-

3. Ibid., II, p. 32.

4. “Every individual necessarily labors to render the annual revenue of the society as great as he can. He generally indeed neither intends to promote the public interest, nor knows how much he is promoting it. He intends only his own gain, and he is in this, as in many other cases, led by an invisible hand to promote an end which was no part of his intention. By pursuing his own interest he frequently promotes that of the society more effectually than when he really intends to promote it.” Adam Smith, The Wealth of Nations (New York: Modern Library, [1776]), p. 432.

venes in history to bring social utility out of individual utility, social order out of seeming chaos. He believed that the free market performs this crucial service. Yet he used the metaphor of an invisible hand. A century later, Darwin adopted the same rhetorical strategy. He denied that nature has goals, yet his language of natural selection implied that something did the selecting. He compared nature to a professional breeder, even as he denied that nature did any such thing.

Smith was part of the eighteenth-century Scottish Enlightenment. He and his intellectual peers believed in undesigned social evolution. Smith's intellectual predecessor Adam Ferguson had argued in the mid-eighteenth century that society is the outcome of human actions, but not of human design.⁵ There is no designer of social order. Darwin used this insight a century later to structure his theory of evolution through natural selection. Darwin taught that there is no cosmic designer; nevertheless, there is biological order.⁶

A rival view of the Scottish Enlightenment's theory of decentralized social order was more common on the European continent, especially in France. Order was seen as the product of rationalism. The French Enlightenment believed that the state can and should direct the economy into profitable lines—for the state. This had been the view of the mercantilists for at least a century by 1776. It became the view of the French revolutionaries under Robespierre. It has been the view of socialists, communists, and Keynesian economists ever since.

Hayek contrasted these two views of Enlightenment rationalism in his book, The Counter-Revolution of Science (1954). The debate continues, though with much less confidence on the part of the defenders of government planning than existed before the visible collapse of the Soviet Union's economy in the late 1980s and the collapse of the Soviet government itself in late 1991. Socialists may today be willing to accept grudgingly the fact that the free market is more efficient than socialism in the delivery of goods and services to customers, but they deny that the initial distribution of wealth was morally just. Those who have the money to consume do not deserve to consume all that they consume, the socialist-interventionist argues. Thus, the free market's greater efficiency is not good enough for the socialist—good enough in all senses: social, moral, and economic. There must also be fair play—non-market intervention by the state—in order to establish a just society. State coercion is required to redistribute wealth and thereby ensure morally fair outcomes of individual decision-making in the marketplace.

5. F. A. Hayek, New Studies in Philosophy, Politics, Economics and the History of Ideas (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978), p. 264. This is from Ferguson's book, An Essay on the History of Civil Society (1767), p. 187.

6. Ibid. pp. 264–65. This is an essay on the influence of Bernard Mandeville's famous poem and his commentary, Fable of the Bees. See Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), Appendix C.

Individual economic decisions to buy and sell can and do produce a stable economic order. This is no longer widely debated. On this point, the intellectual defenders of the free market triumphed in the final decade of the twentieth century, a triumph that did not seem remotely possible in 1974, the year that Hayek won the Nobel Prize in economic science, which he shared with the socialist, Gunnar Myrdal. Hayek was taken far more seriously in the final decade of the twentieth century (he died in 1992) than he was in 1974. Before 1974, he was not taken seriously by most economists, and he was regarded as an anomalous throwback to the nineteenth century by the few non-economists in the academic community who had heard of him.⁷ The conservative book publisher, Henry Regnery, in 1975 described the American academic community's treatment of The Road to Serfdom, Hayek's most famous and best-written book.⁸

In 1944 the University of Chicago Press published an unassuming looking scholarly book without fanfare of any kind and in a very small first printing, which soon became the center of discussion and shook the liberal position to its foundations. This was F. A. Hayek's Road to Serfdom. It had first been published in England—Hayek at the time was professor of economics at the University of London [error: London School of Economics]—and had been rejected by several American trade publishers, in one case on the basis of the report of a reader who stated that, although he thought the book would enjoy a good sale, it was “unfit for publication by a reputable house.”⁹ The thesis of the book, simply stated, was that centralized economic planning—socialism, in other words—must inevitably lead to complete collectivism and the loss of personal freedom. The book was quite obviously the work of a serious scholar whose interest was not indul-

7. The most notorious example is Herman Finer's long-forgotten book, The Road to Reaction (Boston: Little, Brown, 1945), written by a political scientist at the University of Chicago, whose faculty Hayek joined in 1945. Presumably, Finer wrote it before Hayek arrived in the United States, and before he received the offer to join the tiny Committee on Social Thought, but not the Economics Department.

8. Henry Regnery, “The Age of Liberalism,” Modern Age, XIX (Spring 1975). (<http://bit.ly/HayekReviews>)

9. From a letter to W. T. Couch from William Miller, quoted in “The Sainted Book Burners,” The Freeman, April 1955, p. 423.

gence in ideological polemics but the preservation of the free society. The New York Times, to its everlasting credit and the astonishment of many, gave the book an excellent and favorable review in a prominent place by Henry Hazlitt, and the Reader's Digest made its ideas widely available by means of a skillful condensation. Such attention quickly mobilized a counterattack. Alvin H. Hansen, then much quoted as a "leading authority" on economic questions, pronounced categorically in the pages of the New Republic: "Hayek's book will not be long lived. There is no substance in it to make it long lived."¹⁰ The Library Journal spoke of its "abstract presentation and poor organization"¹¹ but the major attack came from Professor Herman Finer of the University of Chicago in a polemical, abusive book called The Road to Reaction, which is of much less interest now, except as a period piece, than the acclaim it inspired. The Kirkus Book Review Service, which was then, and still is, widely used by libraries in the selection of books, described the Finer book as "An exciting book—and a much needed one—the atomic bomb to explode the thesis of the reactionaries' Mein Kampf, Hayek's Road to Serfdom."¹² In the New York Times, S. E. Harris of the Harvard faculty of economics welcomed Finer's polemic with the words, "This brilliant, persuasive volume . . . exposes his [Hayek's] fallacies and errors of fact." Finer, of course, was "a world authority," and his book one "no reader can afford to disregard."¹³

Of Herman Finer's intellectual legacy there remains barely a trace. The climate of opinion has blown him into a well-deserved obscurity, and has taken Seymour Harris with him.¹⁴ Hayek is correctly regarded as one of the most important intellectuals of the twentieth century.¹⁵

The debate today is over ethics: the moral legitimacy of the outcome of market transactions. There is also the secondary issue of market failure, especially economic recessions. Here, most economists agree: there is a legitimate role for the state, especially the state-granted monopoly of central banking. But the role of civil government is today viewed as limited, more supplementary than determinative.¹⁶

10. The New Republic, January 1, 1945.

11. The Library journal, September 15, 1944.

12. Kirkus Book Review Service, September 15, 1945.

13. New York Times, December 9, 1945.

14. The best test of obscurity is a Wikipedia entry. Finer's has three sentences. It has this entry: "This biography of a political scientist is a stub." Harris does not even have a stub. (May 5, 2012)

15. A Google search produced over one million hits. (May 5, 2012) I interviewed him in the summer of 1985. (<http://bit.ly/HayekInterview1985>)

16. Robert H. Nelson, Economics as Religion: from Samuelson to Chicago and Beyond (University Park, Pennsylvania: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2001).

This represents an intellectual victory of the Scottish Enlightenment over the French Revolution's Enlightenment. Today, there is not much opposition to Smith's basic insight that a productive form of economic order predictably arises from the decisions of individuals to enter into voluntary exchange. Out of billions of exchanges arises a recognizable market order. Although no one planned this order, it nevertheless exists. It provides the means of subsistence and far more than mere subsistence. There is coordination through the price system. Hayek called this the spontaneous order. This view of society is evolutionistic.¹⁷

D. Coordination and Cooperation

Hayek's theory of social order rests on the insight of the Scottish Enlightenment rationalists, especially Ferguson, that the coordination of society is unplanned. It is the unintended product of individual human action. This is a powerful argument, though it is difficult to believe for most people. When most men hear the words, "invisible hand," they imagine a god or demon that pushes people around. The metaphor is either not understood as a metaphor or else it is not understood at all. The same problem of perception undermines Darwin's metaphor of nature as an animal breeder. It makes nature sound providential or at least scheming—the exact opposite of what Darwin was arguing.

When men see a watch, they think "watchmaker." When men see order, they think "planner." They find it comforting to attribute social order to a benevolent administrator. If this administrator is not supernatural, then he must be a bureaucrat. He must have planned, decreed, and brought to pass. Yet it is obvious that no administrator coordinates the complex affairs of the market. But if there is no administrator, how can men be confident in the benevolence of the system? This is the rhetorical question that socialists have asked ever since the early nineteenth century. They keep offering the same conclusion: people's confidence in the free market is misplaced. The familiar phrase, "President Roosevelt saved capitalism from itself" is representative. The capitalist order is neither self-sustaining nor self-justifying, its critics insist. They seek an administrator who can secure the benevolence of the system. This is true in the realm of cosmology.¹⁸ It is also true in the

17. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), Appendix B.

18. Michael J. Denton, Nature's Destiny: How the Laws of Biology Reveal Purpose in the Universe (New York: Free Press, 1998). Denton was Senior Research Fellow in realm of economics.

Ethics is important. Legitimacy is important. Appeals to economic efficiency have not answered the nagging doubts of the masses, let alone professors of sociology. Men want to believe that things will work out well for them. They want a world in which their children will have an opportunity to live happily ever after. It takes an act of faith to believe in the benevolence of an impersonal market that is the product of human action but not design. There is a tendency for men to search out inherent defects in the market order—"market failures," as they are called—in order to assure themselves that the market is not autonomous, that it responds positively to creative political tinkering, that administrators can make it better and secure the benevolence that systemic impersonalism cannot guarantee. Men do not wish to entrust their futures to impersonalism, whether cosmic or economic.

When men trust each other, there is greater cooperation. The institutional cost of policing deception and unreliable performance falls. The degree of trust in a society, and its distribution among contending institutions, dramatically shape and limits a national economy. The chief issue here is the division of labor—social cooperation. Where trust is lacking in institutions, economies remain backward, limited to family businesses and local trade.¹⁹ The degree of men's faith in the benevolence of the economic order affects the degree of social cooperation. If they believe that things will go well for them in the end, they are more willing to invest time and money in present projects than if they suspect that things may go badly. This is why optimism regarding the long-term benevolence of the social order in the broadest sense is so important in calling forth men's commitment. When people believe that the system is stacked against them, they will seek for ways to beat the system. One of the major ways that they attempted to beat the system in the twentieth century was to transfer their allegiance to the state.

Men also want to believe that positive outcomes are a product of moral behavior. They want to believe that right makes might, that truth will triumph over lies, that honesty is the best policy. They want to believe that their sacrifice on behalf of morality will be rewarded, at least in heaven but preferably in history. They are convinced that the relationship between justice and earthly success must be enforced by someone in authority. If this is not God, then it has to be someone molecular genetics at the University of Otago in New Zealand.

19. Francis Fukuyama, Trust: The Social Virtues and the Creation of Prosperity (New York: Macmillan, 1995).

with a great deal of political power. Men do not readily believe that impersonal market forces, described by value-free economists, are reliable enforcers of moral cause and effect.

E. The Need for Legitimacy

Academic economists assure the public and their students that their science is value-free. They insist that they are not coming in the name of a higher morality. On this point, they are self-deluded. There is no neutrality. Every social theory rests on a view of moral cause and effect. Every social theory offers a system of law and a system of sanctions.

For example, the anarcho-capitalist denies the legitimacy of civil law. He offers a theory of customer sovereignty that places negative economic sanctions into the hands of customers: their legal authority to refuse to buy. Profit and loss are the system's sanctions. To defend this system intellectually, the anarcho-capitalist equates customer sovereignty with moral right. It is regarded as morally wrong—unjust—for the civil government to interfere with private ownership and the right of contract: an act of theft. But why is theft wrong? Why is an economic order that promotes such theft illegitimate? The theory rests on morality that is outside the market. Rothbard recognized this. He was an Aristotelian. But most economists, including Mises, prefer to appeal to utilitarianism rather than morality. They invoke efficiency rather than morality.

Free market economists come in the name of buyer's sovereignty: "high bid wins." They also come in the name of seller's efficiency: "low bid wins." This is the famous law of supply and demand. Economists favor certain government policies. They speak of social utility as if they or others who use scientific economics can add up the utilities of individuals, and then subtract from this total all individual disutilities. They assume that they can make scientifically valid interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility.²⁰ They are wrong on this point. They cannot make such comparisons scientifically. Their methodological individualism prevents this. They cannot, as neutral scientists, move from individual value scales to corporate value scales. There is no common utility scale. There is no measure of individual utility. There are rankings—"first, second, third"—but no measure: "how much more."

20. Lionel Robbins, An Essay on the Nature and Significance of Economic Science, 2nd ed. (London: Macmillan, [1932] 1945), ch. VI. (<http://bit.ly/RobbinsEcon>)

Thus, they cannot legitimately invoke social utility in their defense of the free market's social order. At best, they can defend the individual property owner against theft. But even here, some free market economists are unwilling to do this. The school of thought known as law and economics specifically denies the suggestion that civil judges must always defend the existing property rights of owners. Instead, they say, judges must use social utility as their guide, determining who owes whom what payment based on the maximization of social utility.²¹

Social theorists continue to debate the moral legitimacy of the outcomes of economic decisions by profit-seeking individuals. Most men want to believe that they are doing the right thing. Economists want to believe that their recommended form of society honors valid, authoritative standards of justice. Yet they also want to separate economic science from all moral and theological assumptions, just as physics supposedly is separated. Academic defenders of the free market necessarily must surrender the case for justice whenever they come in the name of value-free economic analysis. But this is how almost all economists come.

Adam Smith did not attempt to prove in The Wealth of Nations the moral legitimacy of the outcome of free-market competition. He assumed that all men prefer greater wealth as individuals. That is, men will choose a lower price over a higher price, other things being equal. He used this motivation to describe the increasing wealth of nations as the result of allowing individuals to pursue their economic self-interest through trade. Smith's economics rests on the idea of ever-increasing wealth as a legitimate goal of both individuals and nations. To the extent that the pursuit of wealth is not a self-validating moral goal, Smith's economics lacks moral legitimacy.

Jesus taught that the pursuit of ever-increasing individual wealth is not a legitimate goal, if it is a man's only goal or his main goal.²² Yet Smith in The Wealth of Nations, in contrast to his earlier book, The Theory of Moral Sentiments (1759), offered no analytical tool other than the pursuit of individual wealth. Economists have rarely read The Theory of Moral Sentiments, and the morality-based analytical tools suggested in that book were not developed by Smith in The Wealth of

21. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), Appendix H.

22. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012).

Nations.²³ Modern economics rests on an assumption: more is better than less because individuals want more. Jesus taught that more is worse than less if individuals pursue only this world's wealth. "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal" (Matt. 6:19–20).²⁴ "For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" (Matt. 16:26a).²⁵

Smith explained the social market order in terms of men's pursuit of individual self-interest. He demonstrated that national wealth is normally increased by adopting the political policy of laissez-faire, but he proved this by implicitly assuming that it is analytically possible to add up individual wealth to compare aggregate wealth among nations. He offered a strong case for the idea that economic order is the result of individual decisions far more than it is the result of central planning by government bureaucrats. But this argument from description did not make the case for the moral legitimacy of the corporate outcome produced by the free market.

F. The Good Society

Paul here sets forth the case for the comprehensive providence of God. It is a beneficent providence for covenant-keepers. All things work for good for covenant-keepers. This is true in every period of history, under every social order. This means that providence is malignant for covenant-breakers: vessels of dishonor. "Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth. Thou wilt say then unto me, Why doth he yet find fault? For who hath resisted his will? Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour?" (Rom. 9:18–21).

The question then arises: Is one social system superior to another? If all things work together for good, does it make any difference which social order is dominant? It surely mattered under the Mosaic Covenant. Biblical law was mandatory for Mosaic Israel. God also sent Jonah to Nineveh to call that nation to repentance. In modern times, Christians have abandoned Old Testament law in the name of . . . what? They do not say. All they say is that the Mosaic law was temporary and confined to Israel, and therefore it must be completely abandoned unless the New Testament revives one or another of the Mosaic statutes. (The New Testament does not revive the Mosaic statute against bestiality,²⁶ so New Testament antinomians conveniently ignore bestiality as a legal issue.) They have concluded that any social order is superior to the one that God revealed to Moses. They assure us that Christians can live holy lives under any social order, except one—the Mosaic law—which is wrong to defend because God has annulled it. They attack biblical law—and only biblical law—in the name of Christ. They proclaim, “We’re under grace, not law!” In fact, they are today under humanistic lawyers and bureaucrats.

23. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), Appendix C.

24. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 13.

25. Ibid., ch. 35.

This hostility to the Mosaic law has left Christians as defenders of this or that system of humanist economics. Generally, most of them defend the economic status quo: either the academic status quo or the political status quo. Those few Christians who have attended graduate school in the social sciences or humanities tend to be more socialistic than the people in the pews, but neither group believes that the Mosaic law sets forth fundamental principles of social and economic order. They do not believe that the Bible provides a blueprint for economics. They may selectively defend this or that Old Testament law, but only as an example of the “Christian spiritual attitude.” There is no attempt to look at the whole of the Mosaic law and then use it to develop a framework for jurisprudence. This is why no one wrote an economic commentary on the Bible before mine. The same holds true for other academic disciplines: education, political science, sociology, law.

Thus, Christian social theory has not previously been Bible-based. It has been humanistic and eclectic. Except for the theonomists, Christian social theorists do not come in the name of God and His written revelation to declare the nature of the good society. They have surrendered social theory to humanists. They have baptized this or that humanist theory, usually one that is a decade or more out of date in

26. “And if a man lie with a beast, he shall surely be put to death: and ye shall slay the beast. And if a woman approach unto any beast, and lie down thereto, thou shalt kill the woman, and the beast: they shall surely be put to death; their blood shall be upon them” (Lev. 20:15–16).

humanist circles. They have not sought to develop a uniquely biblical social theory. The New Testament does not offer sufficient guidance, they say, and the Old Testament is not to be trusted.

This has created a condition in which Christians have been excluded, with their consent, from debates about the good society. Since about 1700, Christians have had to choose between right-wing Enlightenment social theory and left-wing Enlightenment social theory. They have baptized Locke, Smith, Burke and their disciples, or else Rousseau, Marx, Sorel, and their disciples—all filtered through the cosmic impersonalism of Darwinism.

In Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28, we read of God's corporate sanctions in history. The covenantal issue in both passages is society's obedience to God's specially revealed civil law, not just civil law in general. If Christians reject the idea of God's predictable corporate sanctions in history, they are left intellectually defenseless in the debate over social theory. This has been the case for three centuries. Before 1700, they were compromised by Aristotelian categories imported by the medieval scholastics.

Today, a tiny minority of Protestant Christians have begun to understand that there is no neutrality. Nevertheless, they still remain defenders of "equal time for Jesus." They do not perceive that the humanists' "equal time" doctrine was historically conditioned. It was formulated to silence the few traces of Christianity that still remained in public discourse. The slogan was always an illusion. This became obvious in the early 1920s in the United States when William Jennings Bryan challenged the right of tax-funded schools to teach Darwinism. He lost.²⁷ Today, it is illegal to teach anything in tax-funded schools regarding origins except materialistic evolution. There is no neutrality. But the moment that a Christian declares, "There is no neutrality," he faces a question: "If not biblical law, then what?" Modern Christians hate this question. They hate it almost as much as they hate this question: "If God hardened Pharaoh's heart, why was Pharaoh responsible?" Paul answered this question in Romans 9.

For the scripture saith unto Pharaoh, Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might shew my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth. Thou wilt say then unto me, Why doth he yet find fault? For who hath resisted his will? Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour? (Rom. 9:17–21).

27. Gary North, Crossed Fingers: How the Liberals Captured the Presbyterian Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1996), ch. 7.

Conclusion

God predestinates all things to work together in order to benefit covenant-keepers. God proposes, and God disposes. Men have their purposes; God has His. God's are absolute. Men's are conditioned.

Paul makes it clear that God brings His decree to pass in history. Men are responsible for what they think and do, but God brings all things to pass according to His decree. "And truly the Son of man goeth, as it was determined: but woe unto that man by whom he is betrayed!" (Luke 22:22) There is order in history. God provides it. Men make individual decisions, but God directs the outcome. "The king's heart is in the hand of the LORD, as the rivers of water: he turneth it whithersoever he will" (Prov. 21:1). God is absolutely sovereign; men are nonetheless responsible. This is what Paul teaches. He is rarely believed.

This passage is important for social theory. It teaches that there is social order despite individual decisions. Men make plans; God brings His plan to pass. The source of social order is the decree of God. Any theoretical system of cause and effect that does not rest on the decree of God is man's attempt to escape Paul's plain teaching in Romans 8 and 9.

Adam Smith explained social order as the product of self-interested decision-making by individuals. He established this as the methodological starting point of modern economics. It is a powerful paradigm, and it has steadily triumphed over rival views. But his conclusion rests on assumptions that are inconsistent with methodological individualism. His disciples cannot prove scientifically that increased wealth is a morally legitimate ideal, or that economic growth benefits the whole society. Smith's analytical tools in Wealth of Nations left no place for morality, which is the basis of social legitimacy. The free market social order is the product of certain legal arrangements, but their legitimacy is still debated. There is no religious neutrality when it comes to morals. There is therefore no religious neutrality when it comes to the wealth of nations.

THE REDEMPTION OF THE JEWS AND KINGDOM BLESSINGS

What then? Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for; but the election hath obtained it, and the rest were blinded (According as it is written, God hath given them the spirit of slumber, eyes that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear;) unto this day. And David saith, Let their table be made a snare, and a trap, and a stumblingblock, and a recompence unto them: Let their eyes be darkened, that they may not see, and bow down their back alway. I say then, Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid: but rather through their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to provoke them to jealousy. Now if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness? (Rom. 11:7–12).

The theocentric focus of this passage is God's judgment: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ The issue: His providential administration of Israel: Old Covenant Israel and New Covenant Israel. It raises a secondary issue: God's providential administration of the Jews in between the demise of Old Covenant Israel and their incorporation into New Covenant Israel.

A. Separation and Integration

A continuing theme in Romans is the separation of Christians from the covenant-breaking world. This raises a question that Paul deals with in the first two chapters in Romans: On what basis can separated Christians be part of the general culture? His answer is twofold: common humanity and common revelation. All men are made in God's image. They have all been given general revelation. They see nature, and nature testifies to God (Rom. 1:18).² There is also a common judicial revelation: the work of the law written on all human hearts (Rom. 2:14–15).³ Because of their shared humanity in Adam, Christians and non-Christians can cooperate. All men possess a common revelation in nature and a common understanding of God's ethical requirements. Covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers are covenantally separate, but mankind is still united, almost as competing half brothers are united, Paul preached in Athens: a shared father. God, he said, "hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation" (Acts 17:26). Also, the dominion covenant that God made with Adam is still binding (Gen. 1:26–28).⁴ It still unites humanity.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

In Romans 9–11, but especially 11, Paul raises a related issue: the separation of the Jews. The Old Covenant separated Jews from gentiles. The New Covenant separates Christians from non-Christians. But what of the disinherited (Matt. 21:43) sons of the Old Covenant? The Jews were still a political force when Paul wrote to the church in Rome. At the Jerusalem council, the church had formally broken with the "taste not, touch not" aspects of the Mosaic law (Acts 15), but a final break with the Old Covenant did not take place until A.D. 70, when the temple was destroyed by soldiers in the victorious Roman army.⁵

What of the covenantal separation after A.D. 70? Paul did not know when this separation would come, but he knew that it would be soon. The Old Covenant order would soon perish, he taught (Rom. 13:12). Were Jews then going to be dealt with by God as just another covenant-breaking people? There would be only two kinds of people, as always: covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers. But would there be covenantal distinctions among covenant-breakers? Would the Jews, as covenant-breakers, be dealt with by God as a separate people, ana-

2. Chapter 2.

3. Chapter 3.

4. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 4, 5.

5. An Israeli fringe group, Temple Mount and the Land of Israel Faithful Movement, is attempting to begin the rebuilding of the temple on the property of the Dome of the Rock, the Arab mosque in Jerusalem. The group sees this as prophetically necessary. (www.templemountfaithful.org) logous to the way that He had dealt with them under the Abrahamic Covenant and those covenants that followed, which were all part of one covenant: the Old Covenant? If so, how could a clear-cut distinction be made between covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers?

This was another aspect of the separation-cooperation issue. The issue that Paul raises in Romans 11 is this: How will the church and Judaism interact in the future? Judaism would no longer be Old Covenant religion, for the Old Covenant was about to perish. After A.D. 70, Phariseeism triumphed over Sadduceeism, for the Sadducees had been associated closely with the administration of temple sacrifice.⁶ Judaism replaced the religion that Christians refer to as Old Covenant religion. The Jews recognized this change, for the temple was no more. Their religion had to change, and it did change.

Paul was writing before this final separation had taken place, perhaps a decade before Nero's persecution of the church in A.D. 64 separated the church from Judaism in Roman law. The date of A.D. 55 is common for this epistle.⁷ Paul raised this question: What would be the future relationship between Jews and Christians? In asking this, as well as by answering it, Paul recognized that there would be a three-way covenantal relationship in history, at least until the conversion of the Jews: New Covenant, Adamic Covenant, and Jewish Covenant. The Jews would continue to be dealt with by God as a separate people—separate from Christians, but also separate from covenant-breakers in general. Paul's teaching has complicated covenant theology by inserting a prophetic element into it.

Paul teaches in Romans 11 that there will be a three-way separation for an unspecified period of time. But, at some point in the future, this three-way separation will become two-way, just as it was before Christ's ministry. Jews as a separate people will be absorbed into the church. Jews will no longer be dealt with by God as a separate people.

B. God's Covenant People, Emeriti

Paul speaks here of Jews as a covenantal, corporate entity. In cruci-

6. Louis Finkelstein, The Pharisees: The Sociological Background of Their Faith, 2 vols., 3rd ed. (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1962), I, ch. XIII. After Rome's destruction of the temple in A.D. 70, the Sadducees disappeared. The Encyclopedia of the Jewish Religion, ed. R. J. Zvi and Geoffrey Wigoder (New York: Holt, Rinehart, & Winston, 1965), p. 340. The Pharisees replaced them as the leaders of Judaism, which is the religion taught by the rabbis.

7. John Murray, The Epistle to the Romans, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1959, 1965), I, p. xvi.

fying Jesus, Jews had rebelled against God as a corporate unit—nationally—although not all of them did. Paul had been one of these rebels. Paul teaches in Romans 11 that Jews will someday be redeemed as a corporate unit, though not necessarily all of them.

The logic of Paul's argument rests on a temporal contrast between the ways that God deals with Jews as a corporate entity. The contrast is between how God dealt with the Jews in Paul's day and how He will deal with them in a future era. In Paul's day, a few Jews had been granted salvation by God, but most had been deliberately blinded by God. Paul writes that "God hath given them the spirit of slumber, eyes that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear; unto this day" (v. 8). As surely as God had hardened Pharaoh's heart, Paul says, so has He hardened the hearts of the majority of the Jews. Paul in this epistle had previously described what God did to Pharaoh. "For he saith to Moses, I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion. So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy. For the scripture saith unto Pharaoh, Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might shew my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth" (Rom. 9:15–18). The context of this discussion of Pharaoh was the blindness of the Jews in Paul's day.

What if God, willing to shew his wrath, and to make his power known, endured with much longsuffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction: And that he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, which he had afore prepared unto glory, Even us, whom he hath called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles? As he saith also in Osee [Hosea], I will call them my people, which were not my people; and her beloved, which was not beloved. And it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people; there shall they be called the children of the living God. Esaias also crieth concerning Israel, Though the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea, a remnant shall be saved: For he will finish the work, and cut it short in righteousness: because a short work will the Lord make upon the earth. And as Esaias said before, Except the Lord of Sabaoth had left us a seed, we had been as Sodoma, and been made like unto Gomorrha. What shall we say then? That the Gentiles, which followed not after righteousness, have attained to righteousness, even the righteousness which is of faith. But Israel, which followed after the law of righteousness, hath not attained to the law of righteousness. Wherefore? Because they sought it not by faith, but as it were by the works of the law. For they stumbled at that stumblingstone; As it is written, Behold, I lay in Sion a stumblingstone and rock of offence: and whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed (Rom. 9:22–33).

There was another corporate entity involved: the gentile church. God had dealt with gentiles differently prior to Christ's advent. They were outside of God's covenant of salvation. This was corporate discrimination. Now some of them were being grafted into His covenant, Paul explains here. The question Paul raises is this: What of the future? Will God deal with redeemed gentiles differently at some point? Paul's answer is yes. God will bless them as never before.

Paul is using two sets of contrasts to make a point. The first contrast is between (a) Jews who were corporately excluded from God's kingdom in Paul's day, and (b) Jews who will be corporately integrated into the church in the future. The second contrast is between (a) gentiles who were corporately excluded from God's kingdom before the era of the church, and (b) redeemed gentiles, who will be corporately blessed by God in the future. If we do not acknowledge and then accurately apply the corporate aspects of both contrasts, we miss the point of Romans 11.

C. The Conversion of the Jews

Paul in this chapter develops a unique argument. The Jews as a people have been cast aside by God, so that the gospel can come to gentiles as a people. The nation of Israel had long constituted God's visible earthly kingdom. In Paul's day, this visible kingdom was being transferred to a predominately gentile church, just as Christ had prophesied to the Jews: "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43).

The Jews as a people are like a domesticated olive tree, Paul says. Its branches have been broken off, so that God can graft in wild olive branches.

And if some of the branches be broken off, and thou, being a wild olive tree, wert grafted in among them, and with them partakest of the root and fatness of the olive tree; Boast not against the branches. But if thou boast, thou bearest not the root, but the root thee. Thou wilt say then, The branches were broken off, that I might be grafted in. Well; because of unbelief they were broken off, and thou standest by faith. Be not highminded, but fear: For if God spared not the natural branches, take heed lest he also spare not thee. Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God: on them which fell, severity; but toward thee, goodness, if thou continue in his goodness: otherwise thou also shalt be cut off. And they also, if they abide not still in unbelief, shall be grafted in: for God is able to graff them in again. For if thou wert cut out of the olive tree which is wild by nature, and wert grafted contrary to nature into a good olive tree: how much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive tree? (Rom. 11:17–24).

God's goal here is two-fold: extending salvation to gentiles and extending unprecedented blessings to the church after the Jews as a corporate people are brought to saving faith. Paul uses a "how much more" argument. He is saying, "If redeemed gentiles have been blessed by God's cutting off of the Jews corporately, how much more will gentile Christians be blessed when the Jews are someday granted saving faith corporately by God's sovereign grace?" Paul says that it is unnatural that wild olive branches should be grafted into holes made by cutting off the natural branches. How much more natural than this grafting in of gentiles would be the re-grafting in of Jews? Far more natural. So, Paul says, gentile Christians should expect this re-grafting in to take place. Someday, Jews as a people will gain access to membership in God's kingdom once again. This will be unlike the situation in Paul's day, when a few Jews were entering into God's kingdom through membership in the church, but most were not.

The argument is not this: "Jews were cut off corporately for the sake of the gentile church, and in the future, individual Jews will be brought into the church, leading to great blessings." The reason why this is not Paul's argument is the fact that individual Jews were being brought into the church continually in his day. Paul knew this; he was one of them. There is a great change coming, Paul says: a drastic contrast from his day, which will produce unprecedented blessings for the church. What will this change be? The corporate conversion of the Jews, after the era of the gentiles' near-exclusivity in the church is complete, i.e., after the fulness of the gentiles. The conversion of the Jews as a people will mark the end of the gentile era of the church, when "the fulness of the Gentiles be come in" (v. 25).

Paul's point is, first, that God in his day was dealing corporately with the Jews: blinding their eyes. Second, that God will deal with them differently, but equally corporately, in the future. Someday, they will not be deliberately blinded by God for the sake of redeeming the gentiles. Jews will be given eyes to see. This will be beneficial for both them and the gentiles in the church. Conclusion: God retains in His prophetic plan a positive role for the Jews as a people. There remains one unfulfilled prophecy that must be fulfilled after the era of the gentiles has ended, but before the final judgment. Paul continues:

For if thou wert cut out of the olive tree which is wild by nature, and wert grafted contrary to nature into a good olive tree: how much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive tree? For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob: For this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins. As concerning the gospel, they are enemies for your sakes: but as touching the election, they are beloved for the fathers' sakes (Rom. 11:24–28).

As with Job, who lost his wealth in order that he might learn some theology and then become even wealthier, so with the Jews. Individual Jews today are excluded from God's kingdom, except by abandoning their own people covenantally. In the future, they will join the church in such large numbers that there will be hardly any Jews remaining behind in their status today: members of a broken national covenant. They will come into the church en masse. John Murray wrote:

If we keep in mind the theme of this chapter and the sustained emphasis on the restoration of Israel, there is no other alternative than to conclude that the proposition, "all Israel shall be saved", is to be interpreted in terms of the fulness, the receiving, the ingrafting of Israel as a people, the restoration of Israel from unbelief and repentance. When the preceding verses are related to verse 26, the salvation of Israel must be conceived of on a scale that is commensurate with their trespass, their loss, their casting away, their breaking off, and their hardening, commensurate, of course, in the opposite direction. This is plainly the implication of the contrasts intimated in fulness, receiving, grafting in, and salvation. In a word, it is the salvation of the mass of Israel that the apostle affirms.⁸

It is worth noting briefly at this point that the refrain, which has been taught for decades to students in dispensational theological seminaries, that covenant theologians have no place for corporate Israel in New Testament prophecy, applies accurately to continental Calvinists in the amillennial and Dutch traditions, but it has not applied to Calvinists in the Scottish Presbyterian tradition. The Scottish Presbyterian tradition has been the dominant Reformed ecclesiastical tradition in the United States. William Hendriksen, a Dutch-American amillennialist, refers to this Scottish interpretation of the conversion of the Jews, which he does not accept, as the most popular theory.⁹ Decade after decade, dispensational seminary professors have steadfastly ignored comments on the conversion of the Jews that appear in commentaries by Charles Hodge, Robert Haldane, and John Murray—comments that refute the accusation that corporate Israel plays no role in the eschatology of covenant theology.

8. Murray, Romans, II, p. 98.

D. Postmillennialism

Romans 11 has long been viewed by Scottish Presbyterians as supporting postmillennialism. In the nineteenth-century commentaries on Romans by Hodge and Haldane, this view is presented clearly. In John Murray's 1965 commentary, the language is more guarded. The comments are less forthright. But Murray did acknowledge that an era of blessing for the church will follow the future conversion of the Jews. Had he wanted to defend an amillennial interpretation of Romans 11, he could have written, "This era of future blessings describes the post-resurrection New Heaven and New Earth." He did not do so. Instead, he wrote: "The fulness of the Gentiles' denotes unprecedented blessing for them but does not exclude even greater blessings to follow. It is to this subsequent blessing that the restoration of Israel contributes."¹⁰ Even more forcefully, he wrote:

The 'fulness' of Israel, with the implications stated above, is presupposed and from it is drawn the conclusion that the fulness of Israel will involve for the Gentiles a much greater enjoyment of the gospel blessing than that occasioned by Israel's unbelief. Thus there awaits the Gentiles, in their distinctive identity as such, gospel blessing far surpassing anything experienced during the period of Israel's apostasy, and this unprecedented enrichment will be occasioned by the conversion of Israel on a scale commensurate with that of their earlier disobedience. We are not informed at this point what this unprecedented blessing will be. But in view of the thought governing the context, namely, the conversion of the Gentiles and then that of Israel, we should expect that the enlarged blessing would be the expansion of the success attending the gospel and of the kingdom of God.¹¹

9. William Hendriksen, New Testament Commentary: Exposition of Paul's Epistle to the Romans (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, 1982), p. 379.

10. Murray, Romans, II, pp. 95–96.

Murray kept returning to this theme in his commentary on Romans. "This restoration of Israel will have a marked beneficial effect, described as 'life from the dead'. Whatever this result may be it must denote a blessing far surpassing in its proportions anything that previously obtained in the unfolding of God's counsel. In this respect it will correspond to the effect accruing from the fulness of Israel (vs. 12)."¹² Murray presented a postmillennial interpretation of Romans 11 in the tradition of Scottish Presbyterianism and Answer 191 of the Westminster Larger Catechism, where Christians are told to pray for the conversion of the Jews.¹³

God's New Covenant kingdom operates in history. It was present even before Christ's crucifixion. Jesus said, "But if I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you" (Matt. 12:28). He repeatedly cast out devils. Then what about a future millennial era? How will it be different from today? Unlike today, large numbers of people will give Jesus Christ full credit for historical progress. There will be enormous progress in every realm of life, as there has been in our day, but most people will no longer attribute this progress to anything but Jesus Christ, who works through His redeemed people to extend His kingdom in history.

The question is: When will this awareness become widespread? The obvious answer is this: after the conversion of the Jews. This may not be the correct answer, but given Paul's arguments in Romans 11, it is the obvious one. Those who reject this answer ought to suggest and then defend exegetically a better one. And it ought to be consistent with the rest of biblical prophecy, especially Isaiah 65:17–20, which prophesies an era of rejoicing by God's covenant people and the ad-

11. Ibid., II, p. 79.

12. Ibid., II, pp. 81–82.

13. His postmillennialism was not acknowledged by most of his students at Westminster Seminary. This was because his lectures on systematic theology did not take a postmillennial position. In the spring of 1964, I audited his class in senior systematics, on eschatology, and his class on Romans 9–16. I noticed that he was presenting a postmillennial position in the latter class and an apparently amillennial position in the former. He did not take a preterist position on Matthew 24:1–34.

vent of long lives for all mankind (pro-postmillennial), and the parable in Matthew 13 of the tares and the wheat, which says specifically that no separation between them in history (the field) will take place until the day of final judgment (anti-rapture).

1. Economic Blessings

Will the blessings of the post-conversion world be limited to spiritual matters? Or will these blessings include economics? Paul does not say in this passage. What he says is that the blessings will be unprecedented: “how much more.” God’s casting away of the Jews has brought the gospel to the entire world. Paul wrote to the church at Colossae: “And you, that were sometime alienated and enemies in your mind by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled In the body of his flesh through death, to present you holy and unblameable and unreprouvable in his sight: If ye continue in the faith grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel, which ye have heard, and which was preached to every creature which is under heaven; whereof I Paul am made a minister” (Col. 1:21–23). His words are clear: “preached to every creature which is under heaven.” These words were not meant to be taken literally. The gospel had not literally been preached to every worm, mosquito, and tiger on earth. Then what did Paul mean? He meant that the gospel had been carried across the earth. It had spread fast. Representative people in the tribes of man had heard it. The kingdom of God was no longer bottled up in Palestine.

The Jews were steadily losing the kingdom of God, which was being transferred to the church. The final transfer came in A.D. 70.¹⁴ Did this kingdom involve economic blessings? Of course. The positive sanctions attached to corporate obedience were in part economic.

Blessed shall be the fruit of thy body, and the fruit of thy ground, and the fruit of thy cattle, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks of thy sheep. Blessed shall be thy basket and thy store (Deut. 28:4–5).¹⁵

The LORD shall command the blessing upon thee in thy storehouses, and in all that thou settest thine hand unto; and he shall bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee. The LORD shall establish thee an holy people unto himself, as he hath sworn unto thee, if thou shalt keep the commandments of the LORD thy God, and walk in his ways. And all people of the earth shall see that thou art called by the name of the LORD; and they shall be afraid of thee. And the LORD shall make thee plenteous in goods, in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy ground, in the land which the LORD sware unto thy fathers to give thee. The LORD shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his season, and to bless all the work of thine hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow. And the LORD shall make thee the head, and not the tail; and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath; if that thou hearken unto the commandments of the LORD thy God, which I command thee this day, to observe and to do them (Deut. 28:8–13).¹⁶

14. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

15. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

Why should covenant-keeping gentiles expect anything less than this? Why would the transfer of the institutional kingdom of God from national Israel to the church strip away the desirable economic benefits that had been offered to the nation of Israel? Why should these universally acknowledged economic benefits not be part of God's inheritance to His church, the heir of His earthly kingdom? There are no good biblical reasons.

God had told the Israelites that corporate obedience to His specially revealed law would bring them corporate economic blessings. Paul says here that the Jews someday will corporately come to Christ and thereby re-enter the kingdom through membership in the church. Why should this corporate act of covenant-keeping not re-establish their access to the original covenantal promises given to them through Moses? Why should their temporary removal from membership in the visible kingdom during the era of the gentiles forever remove from them the blessings that had been available to them under the Mosaic Covenant? Paul is prophesying that their conversion will produce unprecedented blessings. If these blessings do not include the realm of economics, then these blessings will not only not be unprecedented, they will be inferior. The Mosaic Covenant will then be shown to the world as having provided greater blessings to ancient Israel than the New Covenant provides to covenant-keepers, even during its most glorious time in history as a result of its combined gentile-Jewish membership. In short, "how much less." This is not what Paul is arguing.

16. Idem.

E. Jealous Jews

What will be the great motivation for the Jews to convert corporately to saving faith in the work of Jesus Christ? Paul says it will be their jealousy regarding the gentiles as members of the church. “And David saith, Let their table be made a snare, and a trap, and a stumblingblock, and a recompence unto them: Let their eyes be darkened, that they may not see, and bow down their back alway. I say then, Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid: but rather through their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to provoke them to jealousy” (vv. 9–11). But this jealousy in Paul’s day had not produced their conversion. Rather, it had produced their wrath against the church. Paul himself had been an active agent of this wrath.

There must someday be sufficient jealousy that the Jews, as a nation, will conclude, “The kingdom inheritance that was once ours has been transferred by God to the gentiles. We must affirm our faith in Christ and abandon hope in the restoration of kingdom blessings apart from Christ.” This has not happened. Most Jews for almost two millennia believed that their messiah would come and restore dominion to them as a people. This faith began to wane only after Napoleon gave Jews full citizenship after 1800. Jews subsequently divided into three main camps: Orthodox,¹⁷ Reform, and Conservative. Reform Jews have sought worldly success through participation in the economic life of Western capitalism, but they have increasingly been assimilated into the non-Christian gentile world. Jewish birth rates dropped in the second half of the twentieth century. Intermarriage with gentiles in late twentieth-century America steadily decreased the number of young Jews who were raised to observe their ancient traditions.¹⁸ Most of the adult Jews who do still observe a few of the more famous traditions do so mainly for cultural reasons, not religious reasons, which produces a far less powerful commitment. The trappings of religion are not a long-term corporate substitute for a shared faith in a confession that specifies God’s dealings with man.

An unprecedented situation has developed since 1948: Jews today live mostly in the United States and the State of Israel. In the United States, Reform Jews are steadily being assimilated into the gentile culture. They constitute the majority of Jews, so Jews are disappearing statistically. In the State of Israel, Jews are vulnerable to a military defeat. It will take only one such comprehensive defeat to threaten their survival as a people. There are very few European Jews in reserve, either in urban ghettos or rural ghettos, as there have always been before. From the days of the Babylonian Empire until the European phase of World War II began on September 1, 1939, they were never threatened as a people by persecution by any one nation or alliance of nations.¹⁹ Now they are. Never before have they deliberately concentrated their numbers geographically. Now they have. Their decision to return to Palestine after World War II has placed half of their eggs in one basket.

17. Originally, “Orthodox” was a term of opprobrium applied by liberal, assimilating Western European Jews to Talmudic Jews in the early nineteenth century. The intellectual leader of the Talmudic Jews in Western Europe, Samson R. Hirsch, decided to accept the term and build on it after 1850.

18. North, Inheritance and Dominion, Appendix D.

Intermarriage and humanism's assimilation processes are systematically reducing the number of eggs in the other basket: the United States. Their greatest threat is not persecution; it is acceptance, but on this basis: "Welcome aboard! Don't maintain a separate economy. Take advantage of the division of labor. Here is a scholarship. Go to college." But in college, the rule is clear: "Leave your religious presuppositions behind." Pluralism is Judaism's greatest enemy, the one which Jews have not successfully resisted as a people.

The same temptation faces Christians. Jews and Christians alike have been seduced by pluralism. The lure of higher education and participation in the general economy and culture has offered Christians and Jews a Faustian bargain—not directly with the devil but indirectly: with the humanist kingdom of man. Jews are still not strongly tempted to become Christians, but they are strongly tempted to abandon Judaism. They are not yet jealous of Christians. They are jealous of humanists. The humanists have lured them out of Judaism by promoting a lie: "A religious person can be equally pious even after he has abandoned his religion's supernatural assumptions about God, man, law, causation, and the future. Supernatural religion, when stripped of its kingdom in history, is still equally valid." This has been an enormously successful lie.

Millions of Christians in the United States have resisted this lie by turning their backs on the benefits of participation in the general culture. Those denominations and congregational associations that have experienced the fastest growth through evangelism are least likely to have members who plan to attend the best universities or attend graduate school. Those denominations whose members are more likely to attend the best schools have been growing more slowly or actually shrinking since 1926, the year after the Scopes trial.²⁰ The cultural choice that took place in 1925—Darwin vs. the Bible—led to a self-conscious rejection by most American fundamentalists of any desire to exercise leadership in the general culture. The humanists' offer of participation on humanism's terms was less effective among fundamentalists, who concentrated on expanding their numbers. The fundamentalists made people this offer: "Come out from among them!" Millions of Americans did so, 1926–1976.²¹ Whenever American fundamentalists have sought political influence, they have done so far more self-consciously as members of a non-loyal opposition. The post-1975 political/ethical issue that made this non-loyal positioning ethically mandatory in the eyes of millions of Christians was the Supreme Court's legalization of abortion in 1973. There is no middle ground of compromise between a dead baby and a live one. It was the abortion issue, more than any other, that persuaded a minority of fundamentalists to adopt the slogan, "there is no neutrality." They do not really believe this, as their continuing opposition to biblical law indicates, but at least they now say it.

19. During the war with Rome, there was a large community of Jews in Persia, descendants of those Jews—a large majority—who did not return to Israel under Ezra and Nehemiah.

Jews today are not jealous of Christians. They are jealous of gentiles. Pluralism offers them the legal right to compete in the quest for the things of this world. They compete very well. Their problem is, they surrender their covenantal identities when they surrender their supernaturalism. As soon as they see success as the fruit of aggressive competition rather than the fruit of adherence to Talmudic tradition, they have abandoned the covenant of Judaism. They have done this by the millions, and they have justified this decision by telling themselves that to be a good Jew does not require personal faith in the authority of 20. Joel A. Carpenter, "Fundamentalist Institutions and the Rise of Evangelical Protestantism, 1929–1942," Church History, 49 (1980).

21. In 1976, the Presidential candidacy of Southern Baptist Jimmy Carter lured fundamentalists back into the political arena as self-conscious Christians. When Carter turned out to be no different from other humanistic political liberals, Ronald Reagan's 1980 candidacy attracted large numbers of fundamentalists. After Reagan decisively defeated Carter, he retained the support of fundamentalists during his eight years as President. In private conversations with fundamentalist pastors, Reagan indicated that he believed in Christ as his savior, but he was never open about this. Prior to his 1966 election as Governor of California, he had attended Bel Air Presbyterian Church in the West Los Angeles area, whose pastor, Donn Moomah, was an evangelical.

the Torah, the prophets, the Talmud, and rabbinical law. Yet these are what served as the core of Judaism after A.D. 70. What kept Jews together as a separate people were its claims regarding God's supernatural dealings with the Jews as a people, which involved, above all, a messianic future. Remove Jews' faith in a literal messiah, and Judaism becomes a cultural religion. Insert Zionism, and Judaism becomes a political religion. Political religions do not last for millennia. Neither do nations that rest on political religion.

Paul says that Jews will survive as a self-consciously separate people until the fulness of the gentiles arrives. This means that today's political-cultural Judaism cannot dominate Judaism indefinitely. Birth rates and intermarriage rates indicate that liberal Judaism has no future. Unless liberal Judaism does what liberal Protestantism has failed to do—recover its lost growth—Orthodox Judaism will replace liberal Judaism until the fulness of the gentiles.

Conclusion

Romans 11 is an important eschatological passage. It tells us that an event must intervene before Jesus brings the final judgment. This event is the conversion of the Jews. God will someday redeem the Jews as a people, meaning that a large percentage of them will, in a brief period of time, abandon Judaism and convert to Christianity, which will vastly increase God's blessings on His church. Future positive sanctions on God's church are tied prophetically to God's special grace shown to the Jews as a people. This conversion will be an act of corporate inheritance analogous to God's act of corporate disinheritance, which was taking place in Paul's day. But there would be a difference. If the cutting off of the Jews corporately has brought the blessing of redemption to gentiles corporately through membership in the institutional church, how much more should gentile Christians expect when the Jews are at last brought back into the kingdom corporately through membership in the church!

8

THE WHOLE OF OUR LIVES

I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service. And be not conformed to this world: but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God (Rom. 12:1–2).

The theocentric focus in this passage is God as the owner of every man. He places a legal claim on the whole of our lives. This is point one of the biblical covenant: sovereignty.¹

A. The Meaning of Sacrifice

Paul, in Romans 11, presented the case for the future conversion of the Jews to saving faith as a separate people. Here he switches to the theme of total sacrifice. He is writing to Romans. For Romans, total sacrifice meant human sacrifice. This is what it meant for the Greeks, too. Both societies had originally practiced human sacrifice.² Rome in Paul's day still imposed the death penalty on any vestal virgin who allowed the city's sacred fire to go out. She was buried alive.³ Paul was not advocating this form of living sacrifice. He did not want redeemed people to die; he wanted them to live.

For Jews, the image of a total sacrifice hearkened back to the whole

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

2. Lord Acton, "Human Sacrifice" (1863), in Essays in Religion, Politics, and Morality, 3 vols. (Indianapolis, Indiana: LibertyClassics, 1988), III, ch. 19.

3. Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955), III:VI, p. 147.

burnt offering (Lev. 1). But this could not be a living sacrifice. A sacrificial animal had to be slain before it was placed on the altar. The exception, theologically speaking, was Jesus Christ. He was placed on the altar alive: a perfect sacrifice, unlike bulls, lambs, turtledoves, and goats.

So Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation. For the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices which they offered year by year continually make the comers thereunto perfect. For then would they not have ceased to be offered? because that the worshippers once purged should have had no more conscience of sins. But in those sacrifices there is a remembrance again made of sins every year. For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins (Heb. 9:28–10:4).

Above when he said, Sacrifice and offering and burnt offerings and offering for sin thou wouldest not, neither hadst pleasure therein; which are offered by the law; Then said he, Lo, I come to do thy will, O God. He taketh away the first, that he may establish the second. By the which will we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all (Heb. 10:8–10).

We do not sacrifice ourselves on our own behalf in order to gain right legal standing with God. Jesus Christ has done this for us. Yet Paul speaks here of presenting our bodies to God as living sacrifices. We call upon God to consume us, just as He consumed the Old Covenant sacrifices. We become in effect drink offerings before God (Num. 15:5, 7, 10). We are poured out before Him. This requires our complete break with this world: “And be not conformed to this world: but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God” (v. 2). We must surrender the whole of our lives. This involves both body and mind, appearance and confession.

God possesses a legal claim on all men. This claim is made visible in the rite of baptism. The Christian acknowledges publicly that God possesses this legal claim, or else his parents acknowledged this publicly on his behalf through infant baptism. Earlier in this epistle, Paul described one implication of baptism: death to sin. “Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death? Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection: Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin” (Rom. 6:3–6). Here he describes a positive implication: service to God. Our lives are no longer our own. They belong to Christ.

Christ’s followers are supposed to regard their lives as utterly forfeited. They must place themselves completely at Christ’s disposal. This donation to God is their reasonable service. Paul makes it plain that everything we possess of any value rightfully belongs to God. We are to offer this to God, holding nothing back.

The highest military honor in the United States is the Congressional Medal of Honor. It is awarded, generally posthumously, to men who have performed “above and beyond the call of duty.” This phrase can never apply to Christian service. The Christian’s call of duty is total. He cannot go beyond it. He must not think of himself as superior to others when he performs well. He has only met his call of duty. “For I say, through the grace given unto me, to every man that is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think; but to think soberly, according as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith” (v. 3). A sober assessment of one’s performance, given the presupposition of the requirement of total sacrifice, leads to a sober conclusion. The individual has performed well, but this was only what was expected.

B. God’s Monopoly of Service

God possesses a legal monopoly: complete ownership of each person. He is the sole owner as well as the soul’s owner. He does not share this legal claim with anyone. But there are false contenders.

The Communist Party at one time commanded a degree of loyalty comparable to God’s. Benjamin Gitlow was one of the founders of the Communist Party of America in the early 1920s. He was expelled by Stalin in 1929. In 1924 and 1928, he was the Communist Party’s candidate for Vice President of the United States. He defected from the Party in the late 1930s. He testified against the Party in front of a Congressional investigating committee. He chose as the title of his study of American Communism, The Whole of Their Lives (1948). He understood what the Party had demanded from him and all other members: complete sacrifice. This aspect of Party rule was discussed by other defectors. Douglas Hyde, a high official in the Communist Party of England in the 1940s, made the same point in his memoir, Dedication and Leadership (1956). Hyde joined the Roman Catholic Church at the time of his defection from the Party.

No human institution may lawfully place such a claim on any man's life. Organizations may officially do this, but they cannot sustain such loyalty, generation after generation. I wrote to Hyde in the 1980's, hoping to get the right to reprint a series of lectures he had presented to church workers. He had taken certain Communist Party training techniques and had reworked them for application in service within the church. He refused to allow me to reprint the lectures. He told me that they had been delivered in an era in which such dedication by Party members was common. By the mid-1980s, this degree of dedication had disappeared. He did not want the public to imagine that the Communist Party still represented the threat that it had. He was correct about the threat. By 1989, faith in Communism had visibly departed inside the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. In 1991, the Soviet Union collapsed.

For any human institution to claim such dedication from its followers is to make a false claim of divinity. It requires the divinization of some aspect of the creation. God will not tolerate such claims. He is a jealous God.

C. Dedication and Profitability

God requires total dedication. This dedication is always mediated institutionally. It is not just that people are required to pray to God. They are also required to obey Him. This means that they must serve Him in history and through history. They serve Him by serving in the church, family, and state. They serve Him in their occupations. They serve Him enthusiastically. Paul writes: "Servants, obey in all things your masters according to the flesh; not with eyeservice, as menpleasers; but in singleness of heart, fearing God: And whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord, and not unto men; Knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance: for ye serve the Lord Christ" (Col. 3:22–24).

The goal here is dedicated, enthusiastic service to those people in lawful authority. Men serve those in authority above them. In the free market, this means that producers ultimately serve customers. It is the customer who possesses final authority in the free market, for he possesses the most marketable commodity: money. Money is the free market's means of bringing sanctions. Customers decide to buy or not to buy. This imposes positive sanctions on some sellers, and negative sanctions on others.

In the next section of chapter 12, Paul describes the division of labor in the church. The church is described as a living organism with specialized organs: members. Each organ has a function that supports the rest of the body.⁴ The goal is service to God. In the early verses, Paul establishes the individual basis of the church's corporate life: personal sacrifice. When people adopt this attitude of service, the church prospers.

This is true of any institution whose members adopt this view of service. No institution may lawfully claim total service, but it can become the beneficiary of workers who have as their personal ideal their complete dedication to God. Christians who adopt this outlook and who then discipline themselves to achieve it become highly valuable members of whatever organization employs them. The attitude of complete dedication to God produces employees who are profitable. They put more wealth into the employing organization than their competitors do. They in effect buy attention from their employers.

There should be a premium on hiring covenant-keepers. Organizations should recognize that covenant-keepers perform better than their rivals at any given wage. This should make them more desirable employees. They should be near the top of the list of those who are "first hired, last fired." If this is not the case, then there is an abnormality. Perhaps they are not being faithful to Paul's injunction. Or perhaps employers do not yet recognize their superior performance. But, over time, faithful service gains attention. It is always rare. It calls attention to itself. The supreme Old Testament example is Joseph, who faithfully served Potiphar, the jailer, and the Pharaoh's cup-bearer. Another is Ruth, the gleaner.

Dedicated service increases social cooperation. It reduces the risk of failure. A society filled with people who possess this ideal of service will gain greater wealth, including greater wealth per capita, than a society that lacks it. The earth will be subdued by people who possess this outlook on service. The dominion covenant is fulfilled in such a way that those who obey God on this point become the heirs of the world. "What man is he that feareth the LORD? him shall he teach in the way that he shall choose. His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth” (Ps. 25:12–13).

4. Chapter 9.

Conclusion

Paul announced God’s comprehensive claim on His people. God’s redeemed people are supposed to serve God without reservation. They are to hold back nothing. They do, of course, just as Ananias and Sapphira did (Acts 5).⁵ But Jesus Christ did not hold anything back. His perfect sacrifice, in life and death, becomes the possession of all those who are redeemed by grace through faith. Christ’s perfect righteousness is imputed—transferred judicially—by God the Father to Christ’s followers.⁶

The goal of perfect service is inescapable. We are to become living sacrifices. As God’s people approach this ideal, however imperfectly, they serve God by serving other men. They serve in institutions and in institutional settings. They begin to gain a reputation for humble, efficient service to humanity. This advances the kingdom of God in history.

They become more valuable employees because they do serve their employers faithfully. This is how they serve God. This makes covenant-keepers more desirable employees.

5. Gary North, Sacrifice and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Acts, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 4.

6. Chapter 4.

9

THE CHURCH AS AN INTERDEPENDENT BODY

For as we have many members in one body, and all members have not the same office: So we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another. Having then gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us, whether prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith; Or ministry, let us wait on our ministering: or he that teacheth, on teaching; Or he that exhorteth, on exhortation: he that giveth, let him do it with simplicity; he that ruleth, with diligence; he that sheweth mercy, with cheerfulness (Rom. 12:4–8).

The theocentric focus of this passage is Christ. Christ is head of His church: hierarchy. This is point two of the biblical covenant.¹ Elsewhere, Paul writes of Christ: “And he is before all things, and by him all things consist. And he is the head of the body, the church: who is the beginning, the firstborn from the dead; that in all things he might have the preeminence” (Col. 1:17–18). The church is Christ’s body.

A. The Metaphor of Members

Membership today means “belongs to.” People are members of clubs, associations, teams, and churches. The original meaning of “member” is closer to Paul’s metaphor: an appendage of a body. This usage is not common today. Because of this, the metaphor has lost much of its power. It is still a useful metaphor. Paul describes the church as a living organism, a body. He does not say it is like a living organism. He does not offer an analogy. He says that we are members of a living organism. The church's members participate in a society called the church, but Paul describes it as a body. Members in a judicial sense he describes as members in a biological sense. Paul does not describe church members as cogs in a great machine. He describes them as appendages—members—of a body.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 1.

Sociologist Robert Nisbet observed that "The organism serves not only as a model of growth for contemplating the world, but also as a model of structure, of the articulation of separate entities, such as the heart and lungs. To emphasize the harmonious interaction of parts in an organization, it is customary to use 'organic' as highest praise."² Metaphors of organic change are more commonly used than metaphors of mechanical change. This may be because mechanical change is cyclical. A machine does not grow. It performs a limited task over and over. A machine has no sensations. A person does not normally look at a broken machine and then make a comparison with himself. He does not see a broken machine rusting in a junk yard, and think to himself, "How terrifying!" A machine has a maker, an owner, or a user, but it has no head. A body has a head. A body develops through time. This is why the organic analogy is far more powerful than mechanism for describing social processes or organizations.

As surely as a body dies without a head, so does an institution die without leadership. It may merely flounder at first. The phrase, "running around like a chicken with its head cut off," is used to describe an organization that has no leadership. It runs around aimlessly before it dies. But, of course, organizations do not literally run around. They have no feet. Either they stay in operation or they close. The proper question is: Does an organization operate in terms of a shared vision? A leader must articulate this vision and impose sanctions in terms of it. For a hierarchy to function, there must be a representative agent who speaks with authority, and who makes decisions to delegate part of this authority. There must be a hierarchy in order to gain the advantages of the division of labor.³ Institutional cooperation is structured by a hierarchy with a representative figure who possesses the authority to impose sanctions.

Paul describes Christ as the head of the church. This head cannot die, nor can the body, which extends into eternity (Rev. 21; 22). But this body can lose appendages. A body that is missing an appendage does not function as well as a body with all of its appendages. If an appendage does not work properly, the body suffers. Paul calls on members of the church at Rome to do their work well. This will benefit the church even as a body benefits from healthy appendages. Paul expects his readers to understand what he is getting at: strife is bad for a church. He calls them to righteous behavior. “Let love be without dissimulation. Abhor that which is evil; cleave to that which is good. Be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love; in honour preferring one another; Not slothful in business; fervent in spirit; serving the Lord; Rejoicing in hope; patient in tribulation; continuing instant in prayer; Distributing to the necessity of saints; given to hospitality” (Rom. 12:9–13).

2. Robert Nisbet, Prejudices: A Philosophical Dictionary (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1982), p. 219.

3. Chapter 1.

There are conceptual weaknesses with organic metaphors that describe institutions. Unless organic metaphors are carefully qualified, they are not perceived as judicial; they become merely functional. The covenantal issues of life are judicial. It is not simply that an institution has a leader. The leader serves representatively: in between the organization and the individuals who lawfully own it.

Paul could have limited his language to strictly judicial categories. He could also have invoked the image of a family. He did neither. What is it about a body that is so powerful an image? I suggest that the economic principle of the division of labor is best understood in terms of an organic metaphor. We can easily understand the operation of a social organization when it is described as a body. A body that experiences conflict among its members may become helpless. A person whose body suffers epileptic seizures is unreliable. A person who suffers from spastic discoordination is limited in what he can do. People see such afflictions in others and shudder. “What if I were so afflicted?” It frightens them. The affliction is of a specific kind: discoordination.

Paul takes this common fear and makes use of it. How terrible when a church suffers from conflicts. This discoordination threatens to paralyze the church. He is making a comparison: if you fear becoming physically afflicted in such a way, you should fear that the church of Christ should become similarly afflicted. Paul wants Christians to regard strife in the church as they would regard epileptic seizures. Christians should not take lightly such disruptions inside the church.

B. Joint Productivity, Joint Service

Paul says that we possess different gifts, “gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us.” This diversity of gifts is a benefit to the church. The church has within its membership people with many kinds of abilities. They can offer their gifts to the church in faithful service. The church is then in a position to offer to its members and to the world a wide range of assistance. The church becomes a clearing house for a diversity of services. The larger the church grows, the greater its range of services.

The same principle of organization operates in the world outside the institutional church. An increasing division of labor is a major benefit to a society. Men have been given many different skills and insights. A social order that encourages people to offer their services for sale to others is able to increase the wealth of its participants, meaning an increasing range of choices. Adam Smith, in Chapter 1 of The Wealth of Nations (1776), relied on the principle of the division of labor to explain how people can increase their personal wealth through voluntary exchange and production for a market.

The institutional church is not a profit-seeking entity. It is funded by the tithes and donations of its members, not by profit. It offers healing of all kinds to its members, beginning with physical healing. “Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord” (James 5:14). Service begins with love. “A new commandment I give unto you, That ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another” (John 13:34–35). “Be of the same mind one toward another. Mind not high things, but condescend to men of low estate. Be not wise in your own conceits” (Rom. 12:16). As the church grows, more people are brought into the community of saints. Some of them have needs that they cannot satisfy outside the covenant community. Others possess abilities that can meet the needs of others. The church enables those with needs to gain the help required to restore them. As they become restored to health in the widest sense, they can become sources of aid to those who are not yet healthy.

Covenant-keepers serve Christ by serving each other. This is true inside the institutional church and outside. Then what is unique or different about the institutional church? Answer: it alone offers the sacraments. God’s special judicial presence in the sacramental rites is unique. Participation in sacramental rites brings God’s people under God’s judgment. Sanctions are dispensed to church members by God as a direct result of their participation in the sacraments. These sanctions can be positive⁴ or negative.⁵ A sense of community is one result of participation in the sacraments. Church members participate in a community that has been called by God to leave a world that is ultimately perishing, yet they must return to this perishing world when the worship service ends. Their worship inside is designed to make them better citizens outside. “If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men” (Rom. 12:18). Formal worship strengthens them in their status as residents of two worlds: eternity and time. Jesus prayed publicly to His Father: “I have given them thy word; and the world hath hated them, because they are not of the world, even as I am not of the world. I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that thou shouldest keep them from the evil. They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world. Sanctify them through thy truth: thy word is truth. As thou hast sent me into the world, even so have I also sent them into the world” (John 17:14–18).

Paul in this passage calls his readers to faithful service inside the institutional church. His goal is to persuade his readers to present their bodies as a living sacrifice to Christ. The starting point for their sacrificial service is the institutional church. The proper motivational impulse is charity, not earthly profit.

The division of labor aids church members in their ability to serve each other. Each member knows that there are other members who possess skills that may benefit him sometime. He can put his mind at greater rest because the church includes people who are willing to serve each other. The church in this respect seems more like a family than a body, yet Paul describes the church in terms of a body. It is almost if he is reluctant to encourage his readers to associate the church with the family. A family is the more obvious mental association, yet Paul uses a metaphor instead: body. Otherwise, many people would be tempted to proclaim the structure of a family to serve as a model for the church. The church is not a family.⁶ It has sacraments. A family does not. The church extends into heaven. Men there have access to the ultimate sacrament, the tree of life. “Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city” (Rev. 22:14). A family does not

4. “And now why tarriest thou? arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord” (Acts 22:16).

5. “For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep” (I Cor. 11:30).

6. Gary North, Baptized Patriarchalism: The Cult of the Family (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1995). (<http://bit.ly/gnbap>) continue in heaven. "For in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven" (Matt. 22:30).

A church member knows that whatever he lacks, others in the church may possess. The larger the church or association of churches, the more likely that there will be providers of every kind of service. A member does not have to master every area of service, which is beyond his abilities. He need only concentrate on the limited range of services that he performs best. The same message appears in Paul's first letter to the Corinthians, chapter 12.

C. The Institutional Church

Paul is not speaking here of the church in the sense of believers in general, i.e., the invisible church. He is speaking of the body of Christ as an identifiable organization that uniquely represents Christ in history and eternity. Paul's audience was a group of Christians who were assembled together to hear the reading of his letter. This organization had members. (Our term for a group reflects Paul's metaphor: organization.) It had a structure: hierarchy. This hierarchy had sanctions. The focus of his concern in this section is the smooth functioning of an institution. The same is true of I Corinthians 6 on church courts.

The body of Christ represents Christ visibly in a way that the family and the civil government do not. This is why the church extends into eternity. The family and civil government do not. This means that the central institution in God's kingdom is the institutional church. Sociological analysis often begins with the family. The idea of the centrality of the family is not a biblical principle. It is far more pagan than Christian. It places biological relationships above sacramental relationships. It places loyalty to death-bound people above loyalty to the resurrected Christ, who is represented in history by His body. Jesus severely condemned the idea of family loyalty's being superior to loyalty to Him. "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter in law against her mother in law. And a man's foes shall be they of his own household. He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me: and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me" (Matt. 10:34–37). The idea of the centrality of the state is pagan. This was the great heresy of Classical civilization.

This ideal, too, is in conflict with the biblical principle of the centrality of the church. It is the church alone that lawfully offers the dual covenantal oath-signs of baptism and the Lord's Supper, which are eternal sanctions, not just temporal.

The state can represent Christ judicially. So can the family. But both institutions can also represent other worldviews, other gods. The church is uniquely Christ's. The sacraments are judicial oath signs that point uniquely to God's final judgment. The sanctions that are imposed by family and state do not uniquely point to God's final judgment. Excommunication—separation from the sacraments—judicially represents hell. Paul never uses the following language with respect to family or state. "For I verily, as absent in body, but present in spirit, have judged already, as though I were present, concerning him that hath so done this deed, In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, when ye are gathered together, and my spirit, with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ, To deliver such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus" (I Cor. 5:3–5).

Family and state sanctions do not covenantally deliver a man's body to Satan, nor do they involve a man's spirit. Family and state are common-grace institutions. Their covenantal blessings are available to all people irrespective of people's personal confessions. The church is a special-grace institution that is lawfully open only to those who confess Jesus Christ, and Him crucified. "For I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified" (I Cor. 2:2). The church is uniquely Christ's body.

Conclusion

The church is the body of Christ. It has many members, Paul says here. It possesses unity. "So we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another." It also possesses diversity: "Having then gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us." Each member is to serve God by serving others. This fulfills Paul's initial command: "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service" (Rom. 12:1).

The division of labor strengthens the church. It creates a broad range of talents and services. Individuality is affirmed by this broad range of talents, yet institutional unity is also established: a more self-sufficient entity.

Paul places no restrictions on either this diversity or this unity. He does not suggest that members should not cooperate with each other. The range of services is limited only by the size of the church. There is no indication that the church is to be broken into non-cooperating subdivisions. On the contrary, the church is Christ's body. It cannot be broken up into noncooperating subdivisions without injuring it. The range of the division of labor is limited only by the size of the church. The church is international. The division of labor within the church is international. In the midst of international violence, there should be a beacon of peace. In the midst of noncooperation among peoples and nations, there should be an example of cooperation. The church is designed by God to be the premier example. When it is not the premier example, then either it is at fault or the observers are.

10

COALS OF FIRE

Recompense to no man evil for evil. Provide things honest in the sight of all men. If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men. Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord. Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good (Rom. 12:17–21).

The theocentric basis of this passage is God as the final judge: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. The Goal of Peace

A continuing theme in Paul's epistles is the goal of peace. He wrote to Timothy: "I exhort therefore, that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men; For kings, and for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty" (I Tim. 2:1–2).² The quest for peace is important in the spread of the gospel. Peace allows Christians to bring the message of salvation to people in a non-threatening way. Peace is good for the gospel in the same way that peace is good for trade. It reduces costs.

The more that people must spend to defend their property, the less money remains to improve services and products. The same is true of building the church. The more that Christians must spend in defending themselves in courts, the less they have for helping the poor, sending missionaries, and building schools.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 2.

Of course, there is no guarantee that the savings which peace provides will not be used to fund personal luxury. The wealth that peace provides can also be used to confirm men in their assertion of autonomy. This is what Moses warned against. “And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth. But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:17–18).³ So, peace is a factor of production, one that is paid for by peaceable behavior and prayer. These are the currency of peace, not gold or silver. Gold and silver purchase protection when peace is in short supply.

B. Rendering Good for Evil

Jesus offered a similar plan of action.

Ye have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth: But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil: but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloke also. And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain. Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away. Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you (Matt. 5:39–44).

When facing tyrants, Jesus said, go out of your way to cooperate with them. Call attention to yourself as a person who does not cause trouble. We can call this strategy “bribing tyrants.”⁴ When facing evil men, do not challenge them directly. Do not give them an opportunity to get even with you. They are evil. They have bad motives. They delight in revenge. Recognize this in advance, Jesus implied. When facing a hammer, do not look like a nail.

Paul writes: “Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good” (vv. 20–21). This is a direct citation from Proverbs: “If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink: For thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head, and the LORD shall reward thee” (Prov. 25:21–22). Paul here makes the connection between Jesus’ instruction in the Sermon on the Mount and Solomon’s instruction a millennium earlier. Paul clarifies the strategy by calling attention to the negative sanction: coals of fire. The strategy has a positive aspect, which Jesus referred to: love your enemies. But it also has a negative aspect, which Solomon referred to: heap coals of fire on their heads.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), chaps. 21, 22.

4. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 9.

How can the positive sanctions and the negative sanctions be reconciled? By the doctrine of final judgment.

C. Final Judgment

The Old Covenant had almost nothing to say about life after death. Daniel refers briefly to the final judgment.

And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people: and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time: and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever (Dan 12:1–3).

This is the clearest statement of final judgment in the Old Covenant. Job’s statement is less clear: “For I know that my redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth: And though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God” (Job 19:25–26). There are no other statements. There was Samuel’s appearance to Saul and the “witch” of Endor (I Sam. 28:15).

Solomon’s statement did not refer to final judgment. In the New Testament, Jesus’ doctrine of hell makes clear what was implied by Daniel’s statement, “shame and everlasting contempt.” Jesus warned: “And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell” (Matt. 10:28). The description of hell in Luke 16 is graphic.⁵ Even more explicit is John's statement regarding final judgment: "And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death. And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire" (Rev. 20:14–15).

5. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd

There is no doubt that Paul's reference to coals of fire refers to the final judgment. But how can being good to an evil-doer increase the number of coals on his head, i.e., increase his eternal misery? Because of Jesus' teaching about information and responsibility.

And that servant, which knew his lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more (Luke 12:47–48).⁶

The principle is this: greater knowledge creates greater responsibility. Therefore, when an unregenerate person receives blessings from God, including blessings from God's designated covenantal agents (covenant-keepers), his responsibility increases. If he remains unregenerate until his death, these undeserved blessings—grace—testify against him. All of the blessings in history become curses in eternity.

D. Means of Special Grace

There is the positive side of righteous dealing. The covenant-breaker can see that a covenant-keeper is not reacting as expected. He is not returning evil for evil. This sets the covenant-keeper visibly apart from other people. Jesus discussed this in the context of His command to return good for evil. "For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same? And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the publicans so? Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect" (Matt. 5:46–48).⁷ If you are no better than a publican—a tax collector—then you are not much good at all, Jesus said.

The evil person is not morally blind. He has the work of the law written in his heart, Paul insists (Rom. 2:14–15).⁸ He can see the difference in attitude between the typical sinner and the untypical coven-

ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 40.

6. Ibid., ch. 28.

7. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 10.

8. Chapter 3.

ant-keeper. The policy of returning good for evil eventually eats at the evil man's conscience. He may try to provoke an evil response by further evil, but then his evil-doing is more of a challenge to the covenant-keeper's ability to keep the faith than it is a desire to inflict evil for its own sake. It is a test of commitment, a measure of commitment. It takes an abnormally self-conscious evil-doer to persist in this sort of exercise. The typical evil-doer grows weary of such testing. It is more desirable to inflict his will on someone who fights back. This resistance provides him with an opportunity to display his power. To use a modern example, a thug may steal an old woman's purse, but he is unlikely to return to taunt her. Beating up an old woman does not demonstrate his manhood. It may even lead to a challenge to his manhood by a rival thug, who has little respect for someone who beats up old women.

The testimony of non-resistance is powerful. It disorients the evil-doer. He may not understand that this non-resistance comes from a position of emotional strength. In one of the most significant events in the history of the United States, the baseball player, Jackie Robinson, was brought up from the Negro League to the major leagues, which were all-white, by the Brooklyn Dodgers' general manager, Branch Rickey. Rickey had hired him in 1945 and assigned him to the Dodgers' all-white minor league team in Montreal, Canada, where there was much less racial discrimination and very few blacks. (Two decades earlier, Rickey had been the first owner to buy a minor league team to use as a recruiting-training system.) In 1945, no other black athlete was allowed to play in a major professional team sport in the United States. Robinson would test the color barrier in professional team sports.⁹ He had been legendary in the Negro League for his temper and for his resistance to racial discrimination by whites whenever he could get away with it without going to jail.¹⁰ As an Army officer, he had been court martialed, though not convicted, in 1944 for his refusal to sit in the back of an Army bus in the South, where the requirement was universal in non-military buses. Rickey promised to bring him up to the Dodgers in 1947, but with one proviso: for three seasons, Robinson could not fight back in any way against racial slurs from fans or players, which might even include Dodgers players. He could not fight back off the playing field, either. Rickey asked him if he would agree to this. Robinson did not answer immediately. He mentally counted the cost. Then he agreed. He kept his part of the bargain. So did his wife as she sat in the stands. By the end of three years, he was so well respected by the other players that he no longer faced the problem. Meanwhile, other teams had hired players out of the Negro League. Robinson was a highly talented player, but talent was not enough. He had to swallow his pride and his anger in order to serve as a wedge for other members of his race.¹¹

9. Jules Tygiel, Baseball's Great Experiment: Jackie Robinson and His Legacy (New York: Oxford University Press, 1997).

10. When a gasoline station attendant refused to let him use the toilet, he told the team's bus driver to stop filling the tank, which was a big sale: 100 gallons. The attendant then relented. This was the first time anyone in the black league had risked this, or even thought of it: "no toilet facilities—no gasoline sale."

Paul's requirement was covenantally based. It was tied to eternal sanctions: heaven or hell. It went beyond this division. The coals of fire would accumulate in hell. There are differences in rewards in eternity, he taught (I Cor. 3:13–15).¹² There also differences in punishments in eternity.

E. Social Cooperation

Christians are supposed to treat evil men well. They are to gain the reputation of being reliable servants and colleagues, even to the extent of dealing magnanimously with oppressors. This brings into play the important “how much more” factor. “If these people are reliable when working with oppressors, how much more reliable will they be when working with well-meaning people?” If Christians are low-cost workers, meaning trouble-free workers, in situations commanded by troublemakers, how much more will they cooperate with decent people?

A reputation for being a low-cost worker is an economic asset. When an employer is looking to hire someone, he wants a cooperative employee. Similarly, when he is looking to fire someone, he prefers to keep a cooperative employee. The economic law is this: “When the price falls, more will be demanded.” When the cost of working with someone falls, he will receive more job opportunities. He will possess an advantage over competitors who are not equally easy to work with.

Paul's command, like Jesus' before him, is a means of peace and prosperity for those who obey it. The person who follows these guidelines will receive a reward: more opportunities for profitable service. This is not “pie in the sky by and by.” This is a system of temporal rewards.

11. He was not the first member of his family to challenge the racist attitudes of his day. His older brother, a sprinter, won the silver medal behind the great black sprinter Jesse Owens in the 200-meter dash at the 1936 Olympic games in Germany: a challenge to the race-based Nazi movement and a cause of acclaim by American fans.

12. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 3.

What of temporal coals of fire? Think of the tyrant. If a man persecutes evil people, the common man is not concerned. But if he persecutes decent people, he will find that common people grow suspicious of his motives and his character. They will tend to avoid working with him or for him. Who can safely trust someone who persecutes decent people? Every tyrant requires voluntary cooperation. He does not possess sufficient resources to gain cooperation solely by threat of violence. He must gain the support of people who are self-governed. People withhold such support from those whose motives and character they do not trust. They may not resist, but they do not offer cooperation voluntarily. This increases the costs of production.

Conclusion

Paul’s command to treat persecutors well is a means of the expansion of God’s kingdom in history. It benefits covenant-keepers in history. It also testifies to God’s common grace to all men in history, as Jesus said. “But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you; That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust” (Matt. 5:44–45).¹³ It is a means for bringing eternal sanctions against persecutors. It produces results that hamper the expansion of evil in history by bringing tyranny into disrepute. Men withhold cooperation from tyrants.

This is a strategy to gain peace. Peace is an economic asset, a benefit that must be paid for. The cost in this case is self-government: the overcoming of the natural desire to reward evil with evil.

13. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 10.

11

LEGITIMATE GOVERNMENTS

Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God: and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation. For rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. Wilt thou then not be afraid of the power? do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same: For he is the minister of God to thee for good. But if thou do that which is evil, be afraid; for he beareth not the sword in vain: for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil. Wherefore ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath, but also for conscience sake. For this cause pay ye tribute also: for they are God's ministers, attending continually upon this very thing. Render therefore to all their dues: tribute to whom tribute is due; custom to whom custom; fear to whom fear; honour to whom honour (Rom. 13:1–7).

The theocentric principle that undergirds these commandments is God as the supreme authority: hierarchy.¹ At the top of the pyramids of institutional power is God, who delegates authority to men.

A. Plural Authorities

Paul speaks of higher powers. Strong's Concordance defined the Greek word exousia as follows: "(in the sense of ability); privilege, i.e. (subj.) force, capacity, competency, freedom, or (obj.) mastery (concr. magistrate, superhuman, potentate, token of control), delegated influence: authority, jurisdiction, liberty, power, right, strength." It means, basically, lawful authorities. There are more than one. There is no single hierarchy in this life. God has created competing jurisdictions in order to eliminate the possibility of an absolute centralized tyranny. “And the LORD said, Behold, the people is one, and they have all one language; and this they begin to do: and now nothing will be restrained from them, which they have imagined to do. Go to, let us go down, and there confound their language, that they may not understand one another’s speech. So the LORD scattered them abroad from thence upon the face of all the earth: and they left off to build the city” (Gen. 11:6–8).² A national civil government or empire has always faced competition: from foreign civil rulers, local civil rulers, families, kinship groups, churches, voluntary associations, and businesses.³

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

Paul says here that lawful authorities deserve obedience. He does not say or imply that there is only one lawful institutional authority that must be obeyed. In his confrontation with the high priest, he made this point clear. Even though he was an apostle and in possession of lawful authority, he did not deliberately challenge the high priest. “And the high priest Ananias commanded them that stood by him to smite him on the mouth. Then said Paul unto him, God shall smite thee, thou whited wall: for sittest thou to judge me after the law, and commandest me to be smitten contrary to the law? And they that stood by said, Revilest thou God’s high priest? Then said Paul, I wist not, brethren, that he was the high priest: for it is written, Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people” (Acts 23:2–5). Paul honored lawful authorities. But when one authority could be used to offset another, Paul set them in competition to gain his freedom. “But when Paul perceived that the one part were Sadducees, and the other Pharisees, he cried out in the council, Men and brethren, I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee: of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question. And when he had so said, there arose a dissension between the Pharisees and the Sadducees: and the multitude was divided” (Acts 23:6–7). The Sadducee party, which denied the bodily resurrection, was associated with the temple's priesthood. Paul's words to the Pharisees immediately undermined Ananias' power to prosecute Paul on the authority of the priesthood.

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 19.

3. Defenders of the modern state sometimes claim final earthly jurisdiction for it: the divine right of civil government—no earthly appeal to anything higher. Such a claim was taken far more seriously in 1940 than at the end of the twentieth century. The high-water mark of the West’s faith in civil government is now behind us. The inevitable bankruptcy of all of the Western governments’ pay-as-you-go, tax-supported, compulsory retirement programs will eliminate most of the remaining traces of this faith before the mid-twenty-first century. On these statistically doomed programs, see Peter G. Peterson, Gray Dawn: How the Coming Age Wave Will Transform America—and the World (Times Books, 1999).

No power is established on earth that is not established by God. On this point, Paul is clear. "For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God" (v. 1). This English phrase—"the powers that be"—has come down through the centuries to describe the supreme rulers in a society. Therefore, obedience to them is biblically mandatory. "Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God: and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation" (v. 2). Because God has established authorities to rule over men, men are required by God to obey rulers.

Paul lived under the rule of Nero, a tyrant by any standard. Yet he writes: "For rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. Wilt thou then not be afraid of the power? do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same: For he is the minister of God to thee for good" (v. 4) Christians are to do good deeds, gaining praise from their rulers. God has set rulers in seats of authority to be a terror to evil-doers. Let these rulers devote their efforts to overcoming their enemies, not look for rebellious Christians to prosecute.

There are rulers who themselves are evil and allied with evil men. Nevertheless, Paul says to obey. The goal of governments is to defend social order. Every government has rules. It enforces standards with sanctions. Most civil rulers want more authority for themselves. They want things to run smoothly. God has built into human nature the desire to live in a predictable world. For predictability, there must be rules and sanctions.⁴ This is why rules and sanctions make life easier. Tyrants want predictability. The closer to righteousness the civil laws are, the more voluntary cooperation that rulers will gain from their subordinates. Rulers cannot rule without subordinates who voluntarily cooperate. If everyone refused to obey a law, there would not be enough police to enforce it. This is why rulers prosecute a representative figure. This sends a message to the public: "If you don't obey, and everyone else does, we'll get you." But there comes a day when many people take a chance and deliberately disobey the law. They refuse to cooperate with the civil government. On that day, the illusion of state omnipotence ends.

The early church lived under a pagan civil tyranny. Rome mandated idolatry as a means of extending the power of the empire. This polytheistic system of civil rule sought intercultural unity by divinizing the emperor. But Christians refused to offer public sacrifices to “the genius of the emperor,” for they understood the theology of ancient empires: the divinization of man and the state. For this rebellion, they were intermittently persecuted for almost three centuries. They did not rebel by taking up arms. They merely refused to participate in false worship. Over time, they gained the reputation for being good citizens and reliable subordinates. In the fourth century, they inherited the Roman empire. They had served under tyranny, and they became rulers when this tyranny collapsed into the chaos of civil war and bankruptcy. Nonviolent disobedience to civil authority on this one point eventually gained Christians civil authority. Otherwise, they were obedient. This is a biblical principle of authority: he who seeks to rule should first serve. Jesus told His disciples, “The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors. But ye shall not be so: but he that is greatest among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that doth serve” (Luke 22:25–26).⁵ But there is another principle of biblical authority. “Then Peter and the other apostles answered and said, We ought to obey God rather than men” (Acts 5:29). Both principles must be honored. Both principles must be intellectually defended by covenant-keepers. Both must be honored by the flock.

4. North, Sovereignty and Dominion., chaps. 3, 4.

B. The Legitimacy of Governments

Paul’s discussion of institutional authorities follows a passage that challenges personal vengeance. “Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord” (Rom. 12:19). If personal vengeance is wrong, then how does God bring vengeance in history? Through civil government. The text does not say that vengeance is wrong. It says that God possesses final authority to impose vengeance. He has delegated the authority to impose physical vengeance to two governments: civil and family. Peter agreed with Paul on this point. “Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord’s sake: whether it be to the king, as supreme; Or unto governors, as unto them that are sent by him for the punishment of evildoers, and for the praise of them that do well. For so is the will of God, that with well doing ye may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men: As free, and not using your liberty for a cloke of maliciousness, but as the servants of God. Honour all men. Love the brotherhood. Fear God. Honour the king. Servants, be subject to your masters with all fear; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward. For this is thankworthy, if a man for conscience toward God endure grief, suffering wrongfully" (I Peter 2:13–19).

5. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 51.

Neither Peter nor Paul demanded obedience to civil government at the expense of obedience to other lawful governments. Again, Peter explicitly told the Jewish leaders, "We ought to obey God rather than men" (Acts 5:29b). Yet they had the authority to beat him, which they did (Acts 5:40). He submitted to the beating, but not to their command to stop preaching the gospel. He disobeyed, but he submitted to the sanctions for the sake of his disobedience. So did Paul.

The point is this: Peter and Paul self-consciously operated within the existing Roman legal system. Paul understood Roman law, and as a Roman citizen, he invoked it. "But Festus, willing to do the Jews a pleasure, answered Paul, and said, Wilt thou go up to Jerusalem, and there be judged of these things before me? Then said Paul, I stand at Caesar's judgment seat, where I ought to be judged: to the Jews have I done no wrong, as thou very well knowest. For if I be an offender, or have committed any thing worthy of death, I refuse not to die: but if there be none of these things whereof these accuse me, no man may deliver me unto them. I appeal unto Caesar" (Acts 25:9–11). His words, "I refuse not to die," affirmed the legitimacy of civil government, including capital punishment. But, at the same time, he appealed to Caesar to escape the jurisdiction of Festus, who Paul believed was acting on behalf of the Jews. This was consistent with his affirmation of the ministerial office of civil magistrates.

The anarcho-capitalist rejects all forms of civil government. He can point to every kind of tax as distorting the free market.⁶ He sees the free market as legitimately autonomous. But then come the problems of violence and sin. How can these be predictably restrained? The biblical answer is government, including civil government. In an anarcho-capitalist world of profit-seeking private armies, the result is the warlord society. Militarily successful private armies will always seek to establish their monopolistic rule by killing the competition, literally.

6. Murray N. Rothbard, Power and Market (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1970] 2006). (<http://bit.ly/RothbardPAM>)

Civil governments always reappear. They are one of God's four ordained systems of government: self-government, church government, family government, and civil government. All four are sealed by an oath. All four involve sanctions.

Christians cannot legitimately adopt the libertarian quest to establish a world devoid of civil government. Sin mandates civil government and civil sanctions. The right of civil rulers to impose physical punishments is affirmed clearly by Paul in Acts 25. He affirms in Romans 13 the legitimacy of civil government among other legitimate governments. He says that rulers are ordained by God as His ministers. This is powerful language. It invokes the authority of God on behalf of the state. If Paul is correct, then anarcho-capitalism is incorrect. There is no way around this.

C. Crime vs. the Division of Labor

The threat of crime forces men to allocate scarce economic resources to the defense against criminals. The state is the primary institutional means of crime prevention. The state imposes negative sanctions on convicted criminals. The goal is to uphold justice by means of fear. "And the judges shall make diligent inquisition: and, behold, if the witness be a false witness, and hath testified falsely against his brother; Then shall ye do unto him, as he had thought to have done unto his brother: so shalt thou put the evil away from among you. And those which remain shall hear, and fear, and shall henceforth commit no more any such evil among you. And thine eye shall not pity; but life shall go for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot" (Deut. 19:18–21).⁷ Fear adds to the cost to criminal behavior. As the economist says, when the cost of anything increases, other things remaining equal, less of it is demanded. This is the goal of negative civil sanctions: less crime.

The expense of crime-prevention reduces men's wealth. They believe that this expenditure prevents an even greater reduction of their wealth by criminals. Men find it more expensive to cooperate when crime increases. Their lives and property are less secure. This makes them more cautious about entering into cooperative ventures with people they do not know well. The information costs of dealing with strangers are high, and some people choose not to take these extra risks. Because of sin, the division of labor is reduced. Crime-prevention activities are a means of removing risk and increasing the level of cooperation. Institutional authorities seek to reduce crime by imposing negative sanctions on law-breakers.

7. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 45.

To maximize the division of labor in a world of sin, the state must impose negative sanctions only on law-breakers, biblically defined. By adding laws that go beyond the Bible, or even go counter to it, civil rulers reduce the division of labor. Legislators and bureaucrats who go beyond the Bible in seeking to stamp out illegal activities make it more expensive for people to cooperate voluntarily to achieve their ends. This reduces the division of labor. It therefore reduces people's wealth. The state thereby produces the same condition that criminals produce. The difference is, good men feel justified in defending themselves against criminals. They feel far less justified in defending themselves against the state. The predator state can become a greater threat to economic and social cooperation than the predator criminal class. In some cases, the state allies itself with the criminal class.⁸

Conclusion

Paul speaks of the illegitimacy of personal vengeance. He does not deny the legitimacy of vengeance as such. He says that God has restricted vengeance to legitimate civil governments. Civil power is supposed to restrain unpredictable personal violence, family feuds, and gang warfare.

The free market is not autonomous. It is an extension of the individual or the family, both of which operate under civil law. The free market is under civil law. Civil law covenantally is superior to the free market. The civil covenant establishes the conditions of the free market by shaping public behavior and attitudes. Civil law is enforced by rulers who are ministers of God. Taxation as such is not theft, contrary to some libertarian theorists. Most forms of taxation are theft, and all levels above the tithe surely are (I Sam. 8:15, 17), but not all. Lawful authorities are entitled to economic support. Taxation supports the state.

Paul calls on Christians to obey lawful authorities. This may mean challenging one authority in the name of another. Authorities are to some extent in competition with each other. It is not unlawful to pit one against the other, as Paul's tactics in Acts indicate. Freedom is sometimes achieved by using one authority to reduce the power of another. Paul used Roman law to undermine Festus' desire to please the Jews. He lawfully removed himself from Festus' jurisdiction. A legal system should not be allowed to become monolithic.

8. In the early 1970s, Alexander Solzhenitsyn, in his multi-volume history, The Gulag Archipelago, said that this had long been the case in the Soviet Union.

12

DEBT-FREE LIVING

Owe no man any thing, but to love one another: for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law. For this, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Thou shalt not covet; and if there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. Love worketh no ill to his neighbour: therefore love is the fulfilling of the law (Rom. 13:8–10).

The theocentric principle here is God as the lawgiver whose legal system is the outworking of His love. This is point three of the biblical covenant: law.¹ By obeying God's law, we manifest our love to others. God commands that we love others. In doing so, we fulfill the law.

A. Debt: Secured and Unsecured

Paul begins with a command to avoid debt. He does not offer a reason. The Old Covenant did. Debt is a form of servitude. "The rich ruleth over the poor, and the borrower is servant to the lender" (Prov. 22:7). Debt does offer benefits. If it didn't, people would avoid debt. But servitude also offers benefits. This is why the Mosaic law allowed men to become permanent slaves. "And if the servant shall plainly say, I love my master, my wife, and my children; I will not go out free: Then his master shall bring him unto the judges; he shall also bring him to the door, or unto the door post; and his master shall bore his ear through with an aul; and he shall serve him for ever" (Ex. 21:5–6). The hole in the ear was the mark of a voluntary Hebrew slave. It symbolized a man who could be physically pulled around by his master by means of a ring in the ear. A ring in an animal's nose enables his owner to insert a rope and pull him around.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

Unsecured debt symbolizes a man's legal subordination to a creditor. If a debtor has indebted his body, his reputation, or his tools by means of a promise to repay out of his future earnings, then he is at risk. His future earnings may fall. His future expenses may rise. What if he cannot repay the loan? Until the late-nineteenth century, debtor's prison was common in the West. The debtor was put in prison until a relative paid off his debt. Today, he may legally declare bankruptcy, but he must sell most of his assets to repay his creditors.

Secured or collateralized debt is different. The loan is made to a borrower so that he can purchase an asset. If the borrower fails to repay, the creditor can legally take possession of the asset. The borrower then loses legal control over the asset, but he himself is not penalized, except possibly in the effects of a downgraded credit rating, i.e., his ability to take on debt. The creditor's legal claim is not against the debtor's person; it is against his debt-purchased asset.

A debtor today does not face the same degree of risk that debtors did in Paul's day. Because of the burden of debt, he may decide not to take certain risks that could threaten his income, such as quitting his job and moving out of town to look for a better job. His debt burden limits his physical mobility. But the mortgaged asset may give him greater upward social mobility, such as a tool or education that enables him to earn a larger income.

1. Debt and Deferred Delivery

Paul's general warning is in the form of a command. Do not owe anyone anything, he says. The advantages of debt should be avoided. Yet there is a hidden problem: the debt aspect of any purchased asset that is not delivered immediately. Say that a person buys a ticket to a future event. He wants to be sure that he can attend the event. The ticket's seller has become a debtor. The ticket's seller may choose to buy performance insurance in case the theater burns down. Then the insurer takes on the debt. This is a risk that the someone in a deferred delivery transaction has to bear: ticket-buyer, ticket-seller, or insurer. Is Paul saying that a Christian should never sell a ticket in advance? This would greatly increase the buyer's risk. If he waits until the last day to buy a ticket, the line may be long, forcing him to waste time. The event may even be sold out before he gets to the front of the line.

The risk of missing the event is inescapable, one way or another. Someone must bear it.

Then there is hired labor. A person goes to work. He is not paid in the morning. The Mosaic law mandated that he be paid in the evening. “Thou shalt not defraud thy neighbour, neither rob him: the wages of him that is hired shall not abide with thee all night until the morning” (Lev. 19:13).² The employer in Jesus’ parable of the hirelings honored this law (Matt. 20:8).³ So, the Mosaic law allowed some very short-term debt. It had to. Debt is inescapable in a labor contract. Either the employer owes the worker at the end of the day, or else the worker owes the employer a day’s work if he gets paid in the morning.

When a person writes a check to make a purchase, the check must clear before the transaction is settled. Until it clears, there remains a credit/debt aspect to the transaction. Must all transactions be made in cash? Doesn’t this make things more risky for buyers, who must then carry cash? Aren’t sellers at even greater risk? They have far more cash in the office than if checks and credit cards were allowed.

More than any other people, Americans use credit cards to buy items. For some period of time, credit card users are debtors, even if they plan to pay off the loan as soon as the bill arrives. The use of credit cards is a great convenience. But it establishes a debt.

A person may have a savings account at a bank. The bank that has allowed him to deposit his money is now a debtor to him. Is banking prohibited by Paul? It was not prohibited by Christ (Matt. 25:27).⁴

The world could not exist without debt, such as the employer’s daily debt to workers or their debt to him if he has paid them in advance. The modern economy’s high division of labor is funded by credit instruments, which are also debt instruments. If these were made illegal overnight, how could the modern world feed itself? The commodity futures markets are debt markets. They have made farming and other production activities less risky. Yet most futures contracts are forms of almost unsecured debt. Both parties to the transaction—long and short—present a small payment in advance, called margin, but in fact a performance bond. It is a small fraction of the total potential debt in most transactions.

2. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 13.

3. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 40.

4. Ibid., ch. 45.

Farmers borrow money to buy seed, fertilizer, fuel, and pay workers. Their property secures some of this debt. They are in bondage, but the Old Testament allowed people to be in bondage.

B. Unsecured Debt and the Division of Labor

There has been an enormous expansion of unsecured debt in the modern economy. No one knows how much unsecured debt there is. Futures contracts are basically unsecured debt. The conventional estimate in December, 2003 was that, worldwide, there were about $170 trillion in unsecured financial promises to pay, called derivatives.⁵ These were futures contracts, mostly ($142t) interest-rate guesses.

The overwhelming majority of the world's output is based on the extension of credit. Therein lies the threat. The modern system of deferred payments depends on an unbroken chain of payments. If debtor A cannot pay creditor B until debtor C pays creditor A, then there is a possibility of a collapse of the payments system if debtor C cannot repay. Near-universal bankruptcies would paralyze mass production. People produce in order to sell their output. Without expectation of payment, producers cease producing. Their suppliers cease making deliveries, as will their suppliers, all the way down the production line.

The modern world is wealthy beyond historical comparison, but its output rests on faith: faith in unbroken payments by debtors to creditors. Everyone assumes, implicitly or explicitly, that most creditors know what they are doing when they lend, and that most debtors know their limitations when they borrow. There is no way to prove in advance that this faith rests on legitimate assumptions. "Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen" (Heb. 11:1). This definition of faith does not apply only to faith in God. It applies to faith in everything that we rely on to sustain us.

The expansion of credit/debt has increased the division of labor to levels undreamed of before World War II. Credit has made capital available to entrepreneurs, who have used this borrowed money to add to the productive capacity of their businesses. They have, in the words of the Austrian School economists, lengthened the structure of production. They have increased the specialization of production on the assumption that customers will buy the output of these specialized, price-competitive systems of production. People in their capacity as producers have cooperated with buyers by becoming more specialized in their efforts to meet expected future demand. They have abandoned older, less specialized jobs to become more specialized and more productive. Credit has financed this extension of the division of labor all over the world. The problem comes when credit—especially unsecured credit—collapses in a wave of defaults. What happens then to customer demand? It falls. What happens to the highly specialized structure of production? It becomes unprofitable. The extended cooperation that had been induced by the growth of unsecured credit is reversed. There is now far less cooperation. This produces unemployment.

5. Detailed data on over-the-counter (OTC) derivatives markets (Basle, Switzerland: Bank for International Settlements, 2004), Tables D-1, D-2, D-3. Gold was $370 per ounce.

A collapse of the debt-based payments system would kill millions of people in the industrial world—possibly hundreds of millions. We depend on a complex system of production to sustain us. Very few urban people could survive if the system of debt-based payments completely collapsed. Very few commercial farmers could stay in business: no money to buy seeds, fuel, pesticides, and fertilizer. There would be no money to pay workers. Barter would replace today's electronic money. The division of labor would collapse. So, output would collapse. In the West, this would be a death sentence for millions of people.

Is such a breakdown in the payments system possible? Yes. But governments and central banks would then flood the financial system with fiat paper money to replace frozen contracts for electronic money. There are physical limits on the production of modern paper money, but governments could lower the paper's quality standards and crank out lots of paper bills with extra zeroes. This would threaten the world with mass inflation as an overreaction to the collapse of payments. There would be great uncertainty and enormous financial losses.

The extension of credit is the extension of debt. The modern world has prospered for at least two centuries because it has ignored Paul's warning, assuming that his warning was meant to be universal. Was it?

C. Lenders Without Borrowers?

Paul knew the words of Moses: "For the LORD thy God blesseth thee, as he promised thee: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow; and thou shalt reign over many nations, but they shall not reign over thee” (Deut. 15:6).⁶ “The LORD shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his season, and to bless all the work of thine hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow” (Deut. 28:12).⁷ This promise was given to a very small nation. International trade was minimal. There were no banks or futures markets. God’s message was clear: by extending credit, Israelites would be extending control over foreigners. They were in effect planting seeds in another man’s garden. Foreigners would be in debt to God through debt to God’s people. Extending credit was a means of extending God’s dominion.

This means that taking on debt that was extended by foreigners was a means of surrendering God’s kingdom to them. “The stranger that is within thee shall get up above thee very high; and thou shalt come down very low. He shall lend to thee, and thou shalt not lend to him: he shall be the head, and thou shalt be the tail” (Deut. 28:43–44).⁸ The Mosaic law recognized the two-sided nature of the transaction. For every credit, there is a debt, and vice versa.

The institutional reconstruction of society will come whenever the world adopts saving faith in the God of the Bible. As more people come under Paul’s command, there will be fewer willing debtors. This is a serious analytical issue for anyone who believes that there will be an unprecedented period of blessing for the church after the conversion of the Jews, which Paul believed.⁹ Where will God-fearing borrowers be after the world turns to Christ? If they heed Paul’s warning, they will pay off their consumer debts and not take on new ones. The Mosaic prophecy regarding credit extension to foreign nations will no longer be valid, if by “foreign” God meant “covenant-breaking,” which He presumably did.

If men refuse to borrow against hoped-for but uncertain future earnings, investors will have to buy ownership, which is risky, rather than settle for fixed payments. Paul’s command, if obeyed, means that in a progressively covenant-keeping world, the sale of ownership will replace debt as the primary means of funding new business projects. Owners will raise money for new business projects, not by borrowing

6. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 37.

7. Ibid., ch. 69.

8. Idem.

9. Chapter 7.

money, but by selling shares of ownership to investors. There are only four ways to raise money for a profit-seeking project, other than begging: (1) borrow money from interest-seeking creditors, (2) sell partial ownership to investors, (3) put up your own money, (4) borrow from your customers. The best example of the fourth method is a subscription to a periodical. The subscriber pays the full subscription price to the publisher, and the publisher becomes a debtor for the period of the subscription.

1. Reduced Risk

A slow, steady shift from credit investing to equity investing would reduce the likelihood of a financial breakdown due to a collapse of the payments system. The main threat to the payments system today is the widespread use of uncollateralized debt that is treated as money or near-money. A large default could create a domino effect. If nobody can pay his creditors until he is paid by his debtors, nobody will be paying. The monetary system is based on fractional reserves—uncollateralized loans—so the division of labor is at risk.

If businessmen ever refuse to borrow, creditors will have to buy ownership, which is risky, rather than settle for fixed payments. In a world where investors refuse to enter into unsecured, uncollateralized debt contracts, payments would be based on warehouse receipts for money metals. A warehouse receipt appears to be a form of debt—an IOU—but it is fully collateralized by an asset. It is better understood as proof of legal title to physical property. The warehouse receipt is not a debt that is issued by a creditor against uncertain future income. It is simply proof of existing title to a physical resource. The existing owner of the warehouse receipt exchanges it for another asset: goods or services. The recipient of the warehouse receipt must pay the warehouse for the services of storage and safekeeping. The owner of the stored asset is billed daily through an automatic digital payments system. When he sells the asset, the new owner begins paying. This is easy to do with computerized payments.

Ownership carries with it responsibilities. There are no free lunches in life, other than God's grace, paid for by Christ at Calvary. Therefore, whenever paper money or electronic money circulates free of charge, deception has to be involved somewhere in the series of transactions. Perhaps some precious metals storage company has issued receipts for monetary metals not on deposit. These receipts are spent into circulation by the issuer. This is a form of theft. It is fraudulent. This practice should be treated by civil courts as illegal. In the case of commercial banking, fractional reserves are universal. Banks make loans while simultaneously promising depositors the right to withdraw their money at any time. This is a form of counterfeiting. Its results are price inflation and the boom-bust cycle.¹⁰

D. Replacing Credit With Equity Ownership

Paul's general principle here is debt-free living. The threat is debt servitude: an economic obligation that can result in physical servitude. As we have seen, the Mosaic law made provision for servitude, including voluntary servitude. Sometimes servitude is preferable to liberty for some people, but it is always a condition of reduced personal responsibility. There are times when temporary debt is a means of dominion. A debt to fund one's education can be a means of dominion: temporary economic servitude in preparation for dominion. Also, when a debt is offset by collateral, such as a house, debt can be a tool of dominion. Buying a house from someone who wants a stream of income—a creditor—and then renting it to a person who is not ready or able to go into debt to buy a house, is a way to build capital. The renter pays the house's owner monthly, who in turn pays off the creditor. The creditor can repossess the house if the buyer defaults. He keeps all of the money paid by the buyer, and he reclaims his capital asset. This is a means of risk-reduction on the part of the creditor. He prefers to lend to a buyer with the house as security for the loan, rather than lend to some impersonal third party with no collateral to repossess, such as a bank.

Some owners of capital prefer to extend collateralized credit rather than buy an equity position (ownership). They seek out borrowers. This is biblical. In a Christian world that obeyed Paul's injunction, however, creditors would find fewer and fewer low-risk borrowers. Interest rates would then diverge sharply: falling for Christian borrowers and rising for non-Christians. Rates would fall because of these conditions: a fixed or increasing supply of loanable funds and decreasing demand for debt. The potential economic returns from purchasing ownership shares would look better. This change in people's borrowing habits would move the world's investors toward equity investing. Until then, lending is legitimate.

10. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State: A Treatise on Economic Principles, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), ch. 10. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardMES>)

What about borrowing from a creditor-seller to purchase an income-producing asset that serves as collateral for the debt? This form of borrowing places the borrower at risk of losing money that he has paid to the seller—i.e., the buyer-borrower's equity in the asset—but it does not place his other assets at risk. By paying down the debt each month, the asset's buyer becomes an equity investor, month by month. He can lose title to this equity if he ever stops paying. There is risk of loss. But there is always risk in life. The question is: How much risk? The buyer-debtor does not place his other assets at risk, only the down payment and the equity built up over time. Businesses are sold on this basis all the time. So is real estate.

A seller-financed sale of an income-generating asset makes the seller a creditor and the borrower a long-run equity purchaser. Both parties bear risk. Each bears the kind of risk he prefers. The seller may have to repossess the asset some day, but if it has a market price, he still owns equity in the asset. He can sell it if he chooses. The buyer risks having to surrender ownership of the asset, thereby losing all of his equity. But the loss of one's equity position—sale price above purchase price—is possible in any purchase of equity, with or without debt.

I do not think that Paul is here condemning a fully collateralized loan. If there were low debt in society, investment would have to shift to the purchase of equity. Paul's injunction, when coupled with post-millennialism, is a call to substitute equity for debt in investing. A collateralized loan is an equity investment. There is a debt element in the transaction, but essentially it is an equity investment. By paying off the loan, the debtor buys equity. This is consistent with the results of Paul's injunction in a Christian social order: to replace credit with equity in the portfolios of covenant-keepers and to reduce unsecured debt by covenant-keepers.

E. The Law and Love

"Owe no man any thing, but to love one another: for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law." John Murray does not think that love is an obligation. Rather, the sense of the passage is this: "Owe no man any thing, only love one another."¹¹ "He that loveth another hath fulfilled the law.” But what does this mean? Does it mean that dealing with others justly is the way that we should demonstrate our love toward them? Or does it mean that loving them fulfills the law? Which law? Moses’ law? Christ’s law?

11. John Murray, The Epistle to the Romans, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan:

Paul says which law: the Mosaic. “For this, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Thou shalt not covet; and if there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself” (v. 9). This summary follows the Septuagint’s translation of Deuteronomy 5:17–21.¹² The final clause is based on Leviticus: “Thou shalt not avenge, nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people, but thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself: I am the LORD” (Lev. 19:18). Here is the same theme as the one Paul introduced in the previous chapter: no personal vengeance. Christ used a similar approach in his summary of the Mosaic law. “And, behold, one came and said unto him, Good Master, what good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life? And he said unto him, Why callest thou me good? there is none good but one, that is, God: but if thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments. He saith unto him, Which? Jesus said, Thou shalt do no murder, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Honour thy father and thy mother: and, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself” (Matt. 19:16–19).¹³

Love is mandatory, Murray writes. “If love is the fulfillment of the law this means that no law is fulfilled apart from love. . . . It is only through love that we can fulfill the demands of justice.”¹⁴ Murray places the decalogue, and through it, the Mosaic law, at the heart of Paul’s injunction. “This appeal to the decalogue demonstrates the following propositions: (1) the decalogue is of permanent and abiding relevance. (2) It exemplifies the law that love fulfills and is therefore correlative with love. (3) The commandments and their binding obligation do not interfere with the exercise of love; there is no incompatibility. (4) The commandments are the norms in accordance with which love operates.”¹⁵

Eerdmans, 1959, 1965), II, p. 159.

12. Ibid., II, p. 161.

13. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 38.

14. Murray, Romans, II, p. 161.

15. Ibid., II, pp. 161–62.

Conclusion

Paul writes that debt is something to be avoided. Debt is the anti-thesis of love. Love fulfills the law, not by abolishing the Mosaic law, but by filling it to the brim.¹⁶ The Mosaic law identified debt as something to be avoided (Deut. 28:44). So does Paul. The debt he has in mind is a debt that places an individual at the mercy of the creditor. Jesus described hell as debtor's prison (Matt. 18:34). Paul was not arguing that all debt is evil—just those forms that place a defaulting debtor at risk of his loss of liberty or reputation. Unsecured debt is to be avoided. It presumes too much on the future.

16. Ibid., II, p. 164.

13

THE DAY (NOT THE NIGHT) IS AT HAND

And that, knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep: for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. The night is far spent, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armour of light. Let us walk honestly, as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying. But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof (Romans 13:11–14).

The theocentric focus here is sanctification: ethics. This is point three of the biblical covenant.¹ Its goal is to motivate God's people to righteous living. Sanctification means to put on Christ: to submit to His Bible-revealed law through His grace. Paul is writing to converts, not the unregenerate. He is not talking about conversion. He is talking about progressive sanctification.

A. The Meaning of Salvation

This passage is an eschatological time text. The meaning is clear: there is not much time remaining. Time remaining for what? "Our salvation." What is this salvation? The commentators disagree. John Murray believes that it refers to the second coming of Christ in final judgment.² So does amillennialist William Hendriksen.³ Others see

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

2. John Murray, The Epistle to the Romans, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1959, 1965), II, pp. 165–70.

3. William Hendriksen, New Testament Commentary: Exposition of Paul's Epistle to the Romans (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, 1982), pp. 441–47.

Paul as referring to the individual's death. This eschatology is therefore personal.⁴ Finally, some view it as referring to the end of the Old Covenant order and the delivery of the kingdom of God exclusively to the church (Matt. 21:43).⁵ This is my view.

1. Salvation Delayed

Murray and Hendriksen knew the problem that their interpretation raises: after nineteen centuries, there is still no deliverance for a world in sin, no fulfillment of the promise. If this interpretation is correct, then Paul was trying to motivate people to act ethically, using the hope of Christ's second coming as the motivation. Liberal theologians use this passage and other "imminent deliverance" passages to argue that New Testament authors were incorrect. The authors supposedly believed that Jesus was coming in final judgment in the immediate future. The early church fathers then had to re-think their plans for the church because this prophecy did not come true. In other words, there are major prophetic errors in the New Testament.

Murray and Hendriksen cited II Peter 3:8 as justification for their interpretation. "But, beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day."⁶ This converts a time text to a non-time text. This passage in Second Peter does not solve their problem, namely, the language of Paul's text. "The night is far spent, the day is at hand." Was Paul justifying his command to live chastely on the basis of an event that still has not come to pass? What kind of deceptive motivational tactic was this?

Liberal expositors argue that this strategy backfired on the church within a generation, that the early believers' focus on Christ's imminent return as their motivation for living righteously could not be sustained. The early church's leaders then had to find new motivations. They also had to explain away the obvious inconsistency. Murray and Hendriksen were still trying to explain it away. They did so by converting a time text—"soon"—to a timeless text. Murray wrote: "It is the nearness of prophetic perspective and not that of our chronological calculations.”⁷ Hendriksen wrote: “The error is committed not by Paul but by us when we apply earth’s chronology to heaven’s mode of life.”⁸ This does not solve their problem. A liberal can easily respond: “It is not our interpretational error alone, but also the error of the recipients of Paul’s epistle. They were supposed to conclude from his language that they should live righteously, for Christ was coming back in final judgment soon. They were thinking temporally, in terms of their own life spans, which was exactly how Paul was telling them to think, in order to motivate them to live righteously in the present. The following argument would not have been highly motivational: ‘Live righteously because Jesus is coming back in final judgment soon, by which I mean up to twenty centuries from now, and possibly a lot more.’ By deceiving them regarding Christ’s imminent return, Paul was either a charlatan or a false prophet.” Of course, a theological liberal would not accuse Paul in this way, for he might lose his teaching or preaching job. He would say, “Paul’s intensity regarding the need for holy living in the church led him to place a short timetable on Christ’s judgment.” Murray and Hendriksen refused even to consider this obvious response by liberals. Why? I think it is because they could not reply effectively to it in terms of their denial of the time element in this text. They also did not respond exegetically to either the “judgment at one’s death” argument or the “judgment on Old Covenant Israel” argument.

4. Hendriksen cites W. Sandy and A. C. Headlam, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (International Critical Commentary (1911), p. 378, and S. Greijdanus, De Brief van den Apostel Paulus aan de Genente te Rome, 2 vols. (Amsterdam, 1933), II, p. 578. Hendriksen, Romans, p. 445n.

5. Roderick Campbell, Israel and the New Covenant (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Divinity School Press, [1954] 1981), p. 107.

6. Murray, Romans, II, p. 168; Hendriksen, Romans, p. 446.

2. Individual Judgment at Death

The argument that Paul was referring to a person’s death has defenders. It acknowledges the obvious meaning of Paul’s language: soon. The night is far gone, Paul says. Jesus used language in a similar way: “I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work” (John 9:4). But there is a problem: Jesus said that the day was almost gone. Paul says that the night is almost gone. Jesus said that He was working hard before darkness fell, presumably referring to His death. Every person faces this night, He said. A man can work only while he is still alive. But Paul is saying that the day is coming. “The night is far spent, the day is at hand.” He calls on members of the Roman church to change their evil ways before daybreak arrives.

7. Murray, Romans, II, p. 168.

8. Hendriksen, Romans, p. 446.

That does “night” mean in this context? In what way was the night far spent? Not every member of the church at Rome was old when Paul’s letter arrived. In fact, the majority were not old, unless the Roman church was a statistical anomaly. Some members would have been youngsters. In what way were their nights far spent? Their lives lay ahead of them. If Paul’s reference was to each individual’s death, then night and day had to apply differently to different members.

Paul’s use of “day” does not refer to the day of the Lord in final judgment of all humanity. The time element was too specific: soon. It has been too long since Paul wrote. But “day” also cannot apply to individual’s judgment at death, for Paul was calling them out of a prevailing darkness. The contrast between night, which was far spent, and daybreak, which was close at hand, could not have applied equally to all of the recipients of his message. In matters of personal lifespan, a few people are at the end of the night—sin-filled living—while the majority have their lives to lead. Paul was not referring to the statistical possibility that all of them could die the next day, for that probability was low. In any case, his language was not probabilistic; it was emphatic: the night was far spent.

B. The End of the Old Covenant Order

Jesus had made it clear that the next great eschatological event would be the fall of Jerusalem. He told His listeners specifically:

And when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh. Then let them which are in Judaea flee to the mountains; and let them which are in the midst of it depart out; and let not them that are in the countries enter thereinto. For these be the days of vengeance, that all things which are written may be fulfilled. But woe unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck, in those days! for there shall be great distress in the land, and wrath upon this people. And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations: and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; Men’s hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth: for the powers of heaven shall be shaken. And then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory. And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh (Luke 21:20–28).

In the parallel Matthew passage, the reference to “coming in the clouds” appears in verse 30. “And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven: and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other. Now learn a parable of the fig tree; When his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh: So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors. Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled” (Matt. 24:30–34). Verse 34 says that the generation that was listening to Him would not pass before all of this would be fulfilled. This specifically includes His coming in the clouds. This phrase has to apply to the fall of Jerusalem. It does not refer to the end of history and the final judgment.

Liberal theologians accuse Jesus of making an error. He supposedly thought that He would return in final judgment within one generation, but He did not return in this way. Paul was merely being faithful to Jesus’ time perspective regarding final judgment when he passed along this misinterpretation to the church at Rome. They both believed that night was ending for this sin-filled world. They were both wrong.

When the fall of Jerusalem takes place, Jesus had said, “look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh” (Luke 21:28). What redemption? Not final judgment. This has yet to take place. Not personal judgment at death. Jesus was warning His followers to flee Jerusalem when they saw these signs. He wanted them to avoid being killed. The church survived the fall of Jerusalem. Then what happened? Liberation. His words can mean only one thing: redemption from the bondage of the Old Covenant order. This is also the meaning of Paul’s use of salvation in Romans 13:11: “And that, knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep: for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed.” The Greek word for salvation (soter) is used repeatedly in the New Testament to mean “deliverance.” “That we should be saved from our enemies, and from the hand of all that hate us” (Luke 1:71). “What then? notwithstanding, every way, whether in pretence, or in truth, Christ is preached; and I therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice. For I know that this shall turn to my salvation through your prayer, and the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ” (Phil. 1:18–19). “By faith Noah, being warned of God of things not seen as yet, moved with fear, prepared an ark to the saving of his house; by the which he condemned the world, and became heir of the righteousness which is by faith" (Heb. 11:7).

Gary DeMar listed three pages of New Testament prophetic time texts. Romans 13:11 was one of them. These texts are specific. They say that certain events will take place soon, or before the listeners die, or are near at hand.⁹ Commentators who attempt to place the fulfillment of these prophecies in the distant future are fair game for liberals who reply that New Testament authors obviously did not know what they were talking about when they used the language of imminence.

1. The Jewish Revolt

Prior to A.D. 66, the church was under continual persecution by the Jews. This included the gentile churches. The Jews still had influence with local Roman administrations. In Thessalonica: "But the Jews which believed not, moved with envy, took unto them certain lewd fellows of the baser sort, and gathered a company, and set all the city on an uproar, and assaulted the house of Jason, and sought to bring them out to the people. And when they found them not, they drew Jason and certain brethren unto the rulers of the city, crying, These that have turned the world upside down are come hither also; Whom Jason hath received: and these all do contrary to the decrees of Caesar, saying that there is another king, one Jesus. And they troubled the people and the rulers of the city, when they heard these things" (Acts 17:5–8). Jews were not always successful in their efforts to get the government to suppress the gospel, but they tried. "And when Gallio¹⁰ was the deputy of Achaia, the Jews made insurrection with one accord against Paul, and brought him to the judgment seat, Saying, This fellow persuadeth men to worship God contrary to the law. And when Paul was now about to open his mouth, Gallio said unto the Jews, If it were a matter of wrong or wicked lewdness, O ye Jews, reason would that I should bear with you: But if it be a question of words and names, and of your law, look ye to it; for I will be no judge of such matters. And he drave them from the judgment seat" (Acts 18:12–16).

When the Jews revolted against Rome, beginning in A.D. 66, their

9. Gary DeMar, Last Days Madness: Obsession of the Modern Church (Atlanta, Georgia: American Vision, 1999), pp. 38–40.

10. L. Junius Gallio Annaenus, the brother of the philosopher Seneca. He was pro-consul in Corinth under the emperor Claudius in the early 50s. See Dennis McCallum, "A Chronological Study of Paul's Ministry." (<http://bit.ly/PaulChron>) influence with Rome disappeared. For the next four years, Roman legions battled Jewish military forces in Palestine. Then, in A.D. 70, Jerusalem fell to the Roman siege. The temple was burned. This put an end to the Old Covenant order. Jesus' prophecy, recorded in Matthew 24 and Luke 21, was fulfilled. Some members of the generation that had heard His words were still alive when the siege of Jerusalem began. Far fewer were alive when it ended.

The end of the Old Covenant order was the context of Paul's remarks at the end of the epistle: "And the God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen" (Rom. 16:20).

C. The Transfer of the Kingdom

Paul here tells the church at Rome that their deliverance is drawing nigh. He assures them that they will not live under Jewish persecution forever. This did not mean that an era of peace with Rome was imminent, but this conflict would be between Christ and Caesar, not Christ and Caiphas. The church's confrontation with Rome led in the late fourth century to the replacement of Roman paganism with Christianity as the religion of the empire.

Paul tells the church to adopt holy living. The long night of the Old Covenant order is drawing to a close, Paul tells them. A far better covenant—Christ's—is about to replace the Old Covenant. The church will soon see God transfer His kingdom to the church, just as Christ had told the Jews. "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43). The fruits of righteousness are basic for identifying the recipient of this kingdom inheritance: the church. Jesus had said this; Paul repeats it here. Because of the imminent demise of the Old Covenant order, members of the church were therefore required to live differently from those around them. "The night is far spent, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armour of light. Let us walk honestly, as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying" (Rom. 13:13).

Paul offers a specific motivation for righteous living: the imminent dawning of the day. This cannot refer to the post-resurrection world of sin-free living, which has not yet arrived in our day. Whether it comes tomorrow or at a man's death is irrelevant for the call to righteous living. Righteous living is a moral obligation at all times. Then why does Paul emphasize the time factor here? What has the dawning of the day have to do with righteous living?

It has to do with the inheritance of the kingdom of God. In Romans 11, Paul spoke of the jealousy of the Jews against the gentiles (v. 11). Someday, this jealousy will lead to the conversion of the Jews, he told them. The original olive tree's branches, which were in the process of being cut off for the sake of the grafting in of the branches of the wild olive tree, will someday be grafted in again. This grafting in, Paul says in Romans 11, will mark the fulness of the gentiles.¹¹ But the original branches had not yet been completely cut off in history in his day. They were fighting the replacement process. They were attacking the church: the replacement branches. God's transfer of the kingdom of God was still in transition. It had not yet been completed. When would this transition period end? Paul makes this clear in Romans 13: soon. The transfer took place in A.D. 70, but the actual date was not known to the apostles. They knew only that it was close at hand.

The kingdom would be transferred to that nation whose citizens showed the fruits of righteousness, Jesus had said. The church was required by Christ to demonstrate publicly its commitment to living righteously. Paul tells them here, "But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof" (v. 14). To replace the Old Covenant order, the church must live in a way ethically superior to the Jews. Jesus had said as much: "Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled. Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven: but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven. For I say unto you, That except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 5:17–20). Gentile Christians during the transition period had a responsibility: to live ethically, so that the transfer could take place.

Does this mean that the transfer was conditional? Yes, in the same way that the promise to Abraham was ritually conditional: circumcision. It was a promise, but it was also conditional. This does not mean that the outcome of the promise was in doubt. The church's ethical performance would be acceptable. This had been foreordained. "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them" (Eph. 2:10).

11. Chapter 7.

D. Future-Orientation

In chapter 11, Paul told them that there will be a future conversion of the Jews. This re-grafting will bring in an era of extreme blessings for the church. Paul did not say when this will happen, only that it will happen. His readers were not being told to shorten their time horizons. They were not being told that the era of the gentiles will be short. They were being told that the dawn was at hand; the long night was coming to an end. Dawn is not evening. This was not a call to short-term thinking. The day would last a long time, just as the night had. This was not an apocalyptic message. On the contrary, it was a call to patience. Do not expect the end of the world, Paul was telling them. Before there is an end to this world, two things must take place: the conversion of the Jews and an era of kingdom blessing that will follow this conversion.

When Paul told them in this section that their salvation was drawing nigh, he meant that the era of church's exclusive kingdom would soon begin. The kingdom of God was being shared with the Jews in Paul's day, which is why he continued to honor the high priest (Acts 23:5). Paul had already told the church that not until the fulness of the gentile era is complete will the Jews be converted. "Now if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness?" (Rom. 11:12). This diminishing process was still going on. The era of gentile kingdom exclusivity had not yet begun. Until it did begin, and then continue for an unspecified period, there could be no completion of the gentile era. "For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in" (Rom. 11:25).

Paul's epistle to the Romans in no way can be classified as apocalyptic, as if the end of the world had been near. On the contrary, the epistle told the readers that the end of the world was not near. The end of the Old Covenant order was near.

1. Economic Growth

Time perspective is important for a theory of economic growth. The shorter that men's future-orientation is, the higher their rate of interest is. They want to attain their near-term goals at the price of not fulfilling long-term goals. They discount the present value of both future income and future costs. The importance of the future recedes rapidly at higher rates of interest.

The child does not think of his old age. He does not plan for it. He does not defer enjoyments in the present for the sake of greater wealth in his old age. Analogously, individuals who place a low value on the future do not save and invest as much money as individuals do who place a high value on the future. The same is true of societies. Men get what they pay for. Those who want instant gratification at the expense of future gratification achieve their goal by spending on consumer goods and services rather than saving. Emotional maturity involves a recognition of the uncertainty of the future and also the present cost of attaining income in the future. Extreme present-orientation is a mark of an immature person or an immature society.

Had Paul been teaching a doctrine of the imminent return of Christ in final judgment, he would have created extreme present-orientation in the minds of his followers. This was not his intention. It was not Christ's intention, either. Paul taught, as Christ had taught, that the transfer of the kingdom of God to the church was taking place, and that it would be completed soon. Then the exclusive kingdom era of the gentiles would begin.

E. Cooperation With Future Generations

Edmund Burke, in Reflections on the Revolution in France (1790), made an observation that has become one of the pillars of conservative political philosophy. In his chapter on "The Church of France," he wrote:

Society is indeed a contract. Subordinate contracts for objects of mere occasional interest may be dissolved at pleasure—but the state ought not to be considered as nothing better than a partnership agreement in a trade of pepper and coffee, calico or tobacco, or some other such low concern, to be taken up for a little temporary interest, and to be dissolved by the fancy of the parties. It is to be looked on with other reverence; because it is not a partnership in things subservient only to the gross animal existence of a temporary and perishable nature. It is a partnership in all science; a partnership in all art; a partnership in every virtue, and in all perfection. As the ends of such a partnership cannot be obtained in many generations, it becomes a partnership not only between those who are living, but between those who are living, those who are to be born.¹²

Burke used economic terms—contract, partnership—to describe what we would call a covenant. He viewed the social contract as a covenant: sealed by an oath. “Each contract of each particular state is but a clause in the great primaeval contract of eternal society, linking the lower with the higher natures, connecting the visible and invisible world, according to a fixed compact sanctioned by the inviolable oath which holds all physical and all moral natures, each in their appointed place.”¹³

Paul was calling the Roman church to take a similar view of their church membership. They belonged to an institution that will survive into eternity (Rev. 21; 22). The day was at hand, he said, not the night. They were part of a covenant made with them by the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Their good works will bear fruit into eternity, he was telling them.

In this sense, they were in a partnership, just as Burke described it. This partnership extended backward to Abraham and forward to our day. It was, and remains, cross-generational. This means that they were cooperating with generations yet to come. So are we. We are called by God to extend the work of the patriarchs, and in doing so, we extend this ancient legacy into the future. We are supposed to add value to this legacy. The late-twentieth-century’s marketing term, value-added, is a good one. It accurately describes what entrepreneurs are supposed to do with scarce economic resources. This is the underlying meaning of the phrase, “buy low, sell high.” To do this, the would-be seller must add value. So must buyers, who bid up the price of the asset.

Conclusion

This passage is often incorrectly interpreted as a prophecy of the imminent bodily return of Christ in final judgment. What it taught was that a long night was coming to a close, and the day would soon dawn. This also did not refer to their imminent deaths as individuals, which would take place at different times in the congregation. Some would die soon; others would die decades later. There would be no simultaneous dawning of the day, if “day” is interpreted as physical death.

12. Edmund Burke, Reflections on the Revolution in France (1790), I:3:3.

13. Idem.

What Paul taught in Romans 11–13 was the establishment of the New Covenant church on the ruins of the Old Covenant order. This is an important eschatological concept. It is inherently future-oriented. It should move covenant-keeping men’s thinking from the expectation of the imminent end of this world to a vision of an unprecedented expansion of God’s kingdom in history: the fulness of the gentiles and beyond. This establishes future-orientation. When believed, it redirects men’s goals to a distant earthly future: a kingdom legacy that their spiritual heirs will inherit, more surely than their biological heirs will inherit their earthly wealth. This temporal vision identifies the kingdom of God in the broadest sense as the one institution capable of achieving compound growth until the end of time.

Christians are members of a cooperative venture with future generations. They are supposed to build today on the assumption that future generations will inherit. Each generation is supposed to add value to this legacy. This is also what the meaning of compound economic growth is: adding value, generation after generation, to the original capital base.

14

CHRISTIAN LIBERTY

Him that is weak in the faith receive ye, but not to doubtful disputations. For one believeth that he may eat all things: another, who is weak, eateth herbs. Let not him that eateth despise him that eateth not; and let not him which eateth not judge him that eateth: for God hath received him. Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? to his own master he standeth or falleth. Yea, he shall be holden up: for God is able to make him stand. One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind. He that regardeth the day, regardeth it unto the Lord; and he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it. He that eateth, eateth to the Lord, for he giveth God thanks; and he that eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not, and giveth God thanks (Rom. 14:1–6).

The theocentric focus of this passage is the honor of God. Different members of a church seek to honor God in different ways. The message here is that this honoring is legitimately a matter of individual decision-making; a matter of conscience. Neither the church nor its individual members should impose sanctions, positive or negative, for honoring God in one way at the expense of another way. Sanctions are point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. The Strong and the Weak

“For one believeth that he may eat all things: another, who is weak, eateth herbs” (v. 2). Paul gets right to the point: some church members are weak. He identifies a weak member: a person who refuses to eat a particular kind of food. This refusal is not a matter of the food’s taste.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

It is a matter of taboo. The weak member believes that his commitment to Christ prohibits him from eating a particular food. Peter's initial response in Acts 10 is representative of this sense of taboo. God told Peter that the food taboos of the Mosaic law had ended. "And there came a voice to him, Rise, Peter; kill, and eat. But Peter said, Not so, Lord; for I have never eaten any thing that is common or unclean. And the voice spake unto him again the second time, What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common. This was done thrice: and the vessel was received up again into heaven" (Acts 10:13–16). This revelation to Peter should have permanently ended the matter, but it did not, according to Paul's teaching here. Weaker members still had moral doubts about certain foods. So, Paul affirms God's revelation to Peter: no food is unclean in God's eyes. Nevertheless, in the eyes of weak Christians, there is uncleanness in certain foods. One mark of spiritual maturity is the lack of such concern. Paul wrote: "I know, and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus, that there is nothing unclean of itself: but to him that esteemeth any thing to be unclean, to him it is unclean" (Rom. 14:14).

Paul teaches that some church members are theologically stronger than others. The strong ones, Paul says, are those who are free from any sense of taboo regarding the foods they eat. Paul is writing this to a gentile church. He knows that there may be Jews in the membership. There may be members who were recruited from religions that have food taboos. He does not say that these people must abandon these taboos for the sake of Christ. He says only that they should not condemn others who do not honor these taboos.

1. The Jerusalem Council

The Jerusalem council had already dealt with the issue of prohibited foods. Members who were part of the Pharisee sect had argued that gentiles must be circumcised and must obey the Mosaic law (Acts 15:5). The council met to settle this question. "And when there had been much disputing, Peter rose up, and said unto them, Men and brethren, ye know how that a good while ago God made choice among us, that the Gentiles by my mouth should hear the word of the gospel, and believe. And God, which knoweth the hearts, bare them witness, giving them the Holy Ghost, even as he did unto us; And put no difference between us and them, purifying their hearts by faith. Now therefore why tempt ye God, to put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples, which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear? But we believe that through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ we shall be saved, even as they” (Acts 15:7–11). James followed Peter and made this suggestion: “Wherefore my sentence is, that we trouble not them, which from among the Gentiles are turned to God: But that we write unto them, that they abstain from pollutions of idols, and from fornication, and from things strangled, and from blood” (Acts 15:19–20). The council accepted this recommendation (vv. 22–29).

The deciding issue was not what kind of animal it was. The issue was its mode of death. Demonic paganism returns again and again to the drinking of blood. This is a matter of ritual.² Drinking blood becomes a covenantal act. Sometimes the drinking of blood is associated with taking the spirit of the slain animal into the drinker. The Mosaic law prohibited this by requiring the blood of an edible animal to be poured onto the ground and covered with dust. “And whatsoever man there be of the children of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn among you, which hunteth and catcheth any beast or fowl that may be eaten; he shall even pour out the blood thereof, and cover it with dust” (Lev. 17:13). “Notwithstanding thou mayest kill and eat flesh in all thy gates, whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, according to the blessing of the LORD thy God which he hath given thee: the unclean and the clean may eat thereof, as of the roebuck, and as of the hart. Only ye shall not eat the blood; ye shall pour it upon the earth as water” (Deut. 12:15–16). The Jerusalem council honored this prohibition, for the problem it dealt with still existed in the classical world: pagan ritual.

2. An Individual's Decision

Paul here tells the church at Rome that there should be no criticism within the fellowship regarding eating or not eating specific foods. Each member should do what he thinks honors God best: to abstain or to enjoy. The individual must make this decision, but only for himself. He is not to extend his personal self-assessment to others. Neither the strong Christian who treats all foods the same nor the weak Christian who avoids some foods should condemn the other. Paul's words could not be any clearer.

This means that the institutional church should not set up rules that prohibit certain foods. It also should not mandate certain foods, other than the Lord's Supper. Even in the case of the Lord's Supper, there are problems. Some fundamentalist denominations prohibit wine. In practice, so do many American Presbyterian congregations, in deference to former fundamentalists, who make up a significant percentage of conservative Presbyterian congregations. Paul's warning informs us that neither wine nor grape juice should be made mandatory, neither unleavened bread nor leavened bread. Both options should be made available.³ But, of course, this rarely happens. A few congregations offer a choice between wine and grape juice; I have never seen one that offers leavened and unleavened bread.

2. There is a scene in the popular movie, Red Dawn (1984), in which modern young men are required to drink the blood of a slain deer as a means of initiation.

Paul makes it clear that the chief issue here is the protection of the weak. "It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor any thing whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak" (Rom. 14:21). In his first letter to the Corinthians, he elaborated on this theme.

Howbeit there is not in every man that knowledge: for some with conscience of the idol unto this hour eat it as a thing offered unto an idol; and their conscience being weak is defiled. But meat commendeth us not to God: for neither, if we eat, are we the better; neither, if we eat not, are we the worse. But take heed lest by any means this liberty of yours become a stumblingblock to them that are weak. For if any man see thee which hast knowledge sit at meat in the idol's temple, shall not the conscience of him which is weak be emboldened to eat those things which are offered to idols; And through thy knowledge shall the weak brother perish, for whom Christ died? But when ye sin so against the brethren, and wound their weak conscience, ye sin against Christ. Wherefore, if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend (I Cor. 8:7–13).⁴

Paul is saying that it is not the theologically mature Christian who takes a stand against demon rum. It is the immature or spiritually weak Christian. He who dismisses any food or drink in God's name is a weak Christian, as defined by Paul. The problem is, in today's world, these weak Christians regard themselves as staunch defenders of the faith, the last bastions of orthodoxy. Fundamentalists in the pews are oblivious to church history, and proud of it. To them, church history earlier than 1870 is mostly Roman Catholicism and Protestantism that was corrupted with Romish practices. If they have ever read about Eastern Orthodoxy—highly unlikely—they dismiss it as Catholicism with long beards. They are not impressed by the fact that the most conservative wings of Protestantism, “way back when”—Calvinism and Lutheranism—rejected this view of alcohol. They are adamant that no one should ever drink alcohol.

3. The wine-grape juice division did not exist before the late nineteenth century. Prior to pasteurization, there was no commercial alternative to wine. In 1869, an anti-alcohol American dentist and Methodist, Dr. Thomas Welch, developed his non-fermented wine—today called grape juice—by boiling grape juice. He initially sold the product to churches that wanted a way to avoid alcohol in the communion meal. Welch's son took over the company on a part-time basis in 1872, and in 1896 made it his career. Even as late as 1914, it was the only fruit juice product on the market.

4. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 10.

Their spiritual predecessors existed in Paul's day. They were advocates of a “taste not, touch not” form of Christianity. Paul challenged them: “Wherefore if ye be dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why, as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances, (Touch not; taste not; handle not; Which all are to perish with the using;) after the commandments and doctrines of men? Which things have indeed a shew of wisdom in will worship, and humility, and neglecting of the body; not in any honour to the satisfying of the flesh” (Col. 2:20–23). This challenge remains in force.

Paul says here what he says in I Corinthians 8: for the sake of the weaker brother, the stronger brother must avoid eating the food feared by the weaker.⁵ “But if thy brother be grieved with thy meat, now walkest thou not charitably. Destroy not him with thy meat, for whom Christ died. Let not then your good be evil spoken of: For the kingdom of God is not meat and drink; but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost” (Rom. 14:15–17). “We then that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves” (Rom. 15:1).

Does this mean that the stronger brother must alter his lifestyle for the sake of the weaker brother? No. It means that in instances where the two are brought together socially, the stronger brother must forebear. If the stronger brother had to imitate the weaker brother's standards at all times, then the church would be weakened. The “touch not, taste not” legalistic standards of immature Christians would predominate in the church. Paul surely did not want this to happen.

Yet this is what has happened to most conservative Presbyterian churches in the American South. In the Lord's Supper, they follow the cultural pattern of Baptists and Methodists: grape juice exclusively. Dr. Welch's biologically dead grape juice has become the Protestant fundamentalists' symbol of communion between God and man, thus making ridiculous Christ's analogy of new wine. "Neither do men put new wine into old bottles: else the bottles break, and the wine runneth out, and the bottles perish: but they put new wine into new bottles, and both are preserved" (Matt. 9:17). If the new wine is dead grape juice, the wineskin problem does not arise. The kingdom of God does not expand. If only the Jews had been able to pasteurize the gospel! They did their best, but they failed. The main way that they attempted to do this was to persuade the church to restore the Mosaic food laws and circumcision. The Jerusalem council called a halt to this.

5. Idem.

If the stronger brother is supposed to capitulate to the weaker, then is the policy of exclusive grape juice correct? No. Paul says that each side must allow freedom to the other. Because the Lord's Supper is institutional, to mandate either exclusive wine or exclusive grape juice is wrong. Paul says that each side must be persuaded, and each must be tolerant. Allowing both wine and grape juice in communion upholds this principle.

The King James translation of the Greek word katakrino is "damnation." "And he that doubteth is damned if he eat, because he eateth not of faith: for whatsoever is not of faith is sin" (Rom. 14:23). Given Paul's view of the perseverance of the saints, this word should be translated as "condemned." It means that the person has condemned himself for his sin: acting against his conscience. This is how the Greek word is translated in the section in John on the woman taken in adultery. "When Jesus had lifted up himself, and saw none but the woman, he said unto her, Woman, where are those thine accusers? hath no man condemned thee? She said, No man, Lord. And Jesus said unto her, Neither do I condemn thee: go, and sin no more" (John 8:10–11).

B. Sabbath Observance

Paul does not limit his discussion to food and drink. He includes special days. "One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind. He that regardeth the day, regardeth it unto the Lord; and he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it. He that eateth, eateth to the Lord, for he giveth God thanks; and he that eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not, and giveth God thanks" (vv. 5–6). Elsewhere, he wrote: “Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holyday, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days: Which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ” (Col. 2:16–17). There, too, Paul linked food taboos and holiday taboos.

John Murray, a strict sabbatarian in the Scottish tradition, insisted that this passage does not apply to the weekly sabbath.⁶ He referred to the sabbath as a creation ordinance. There is one overwhelming problem with this interpretation: there was no law mandating the sabbath observance prior to the miracle of the double output of manna on the day before the sabbath. There was a positive biological sanction for sabbath observance: the manna did not rot overnight on the night before the sabbath (Ex. 16:21–23). There was no negative judicial sanction.

An ordinance is a law. A church law may have positive or negative sanctions attached to it. A civil law has only negative sanctions. The state prohibits public evil; it does not seek to make men good. There is no mention of negative sanction for mankind with respect to sabbath-breaking prior to the Mosaic law.

There is a pre-Fall reference to God’s blessing the sabbath: “And on the seventh day God ended his work which he had made; and he rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made. And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it: because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made” (Gen. 2:2–3). There was a structure to God’s creation week: six and one. There was to be structure to Adam’s week: one and six.⁷ But there was no law governing the sabbath. There was only one law in Eden: the law prohibiting access to one tree. There was no sabbath law from the Fall of Adam until the Ten Commandments (Ex. 20). Nehemiah said of the God of the covenant: “Thou camest down also upon mount Sinai, and spakest with them from heaven, and gavest them right judgments, and true laws, good statutes and commandments: And madest known unto them thy holy sabbath, and commandedst them precepts, statutes, and laws, by the hand of Moses thy servant” (Neh. 9:13–14).

The issue here is law, not the underlying structure of man’s work week. There is a recommended structure for the work week. God has announced it: six days of work, one day of rest. But this was not what

6. John Murray, The Epistle to the Romans, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1959, 1965), II, Appendix D.

7. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 6.

Adam had experienced. He had less than a full day of work on God's final day of creation. The Bible does not say whether he rested the next day. This six-one pattern was formally announced only after the exodus. There was never any sabbath creation ordinance. A law or ordinance must have sanctions attached. Without sanctions, a law is merely a suggestion. The Mosaic law had an explicit sanction: execution. "Ye shall keep the sabbath therefore; for it is holy unto you: every one that defileth it shall surely be put to death: for whosoever doeth any work therein, that soul shall be cut off from among his people. Six days may work be done; but in the seventh is the sabbath of rest, holy to the LORD: whosoever doeth any work in the sabbath day, he shall surely be put to death" (Ex. 31:14–15). "Six days shall work be done, but on the seventh day there shall be to you an holy day, a sabbath of rest to the LORD: whosoever doeth work therein shall be put to death" (Ex. 35:2).⁸

There was no institutional sanction for sabbath-breaking prior to Exodus 31. What Paul teaches in this passage is this: with respect to the sabbath, the New Testament has reverted to the pre-Mosaic standard. There is no longer any civil or ecclesiastical sanction attached to the New Testament sabbath. This is why there was no covenantal problem for the church when, beginning early in the second century, it began shifting from Judaism's seventh-day worship to first-day worship. On what basis could this shift had been made, other than the annulment of the Mosaic covenant? Moses said: "Wherefore the children of Israel shall keep the sabbath, to observe the sabbath throughout their generations, for a perpetual covenant" (Ex. 31:16). Yet this law is not honored, for the church changed the day of worship to the eighth day. The sabbath was replaced by the Lord's day. This is why there was no theological problem in the centuries-long interim period, when it was not clear to all Christians which day was the proper day of worship.

Today, those few Protestant church traditions that emphasize strict sabbatarianism generally accept the use of tobacco and the consumption of alcohol. Those churches that prohibit alcohol and look askance on tobacco generally have a loose view of sabbath observance. One tradition emphasizes Paul's views on Christian freedom with respect to food and drink, while the other emphasizes Paul's views on Christian freedom regarding sabbath observance. Each denies the biblical basis of the other's doctrine of Christian freedom. This was not true of either Luther or Calvin. Neither Calvin nor Luther was a strict sabbatarian, and both men defended Christian liberty regarding alcohol. The Lutheran tradition still upholds its founder's views. This is not equally true of modern Calvinists, e.g., whiskey-drinking Scottish sabbatarians or near-fundamentalist Presbyterians in the American South.

8. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 59.

The church sets aside one day a week for corporate worship (Heb. 10:25). This is not the same as specifying judicially what should or should not be done outside of the worship service by its members, let alone non-members. The Mosaic law did do this, with a vengeance: execution. This mandated civil sanction is null and void today, all church traditions agree. What they do not agree about is the judicial basis for the annulment of this negative civil sanction apart from the annulment of the prohibition. In fact, they never discuss this crucial judicial issue. But if the annulment of the negative civil sanction was not accompanied by the annulment of the civil prohibition, then on what covenantal basis has the civil sanction been annulled?

The theological answer, based on the New Covenant, is found in this passage and in Colossians 2: the transfer of the locus of sovereignty in sabbath enforcement from the civil government to the conscience.⁹ The church is also not to impose sanctions against sabbath violators; it also does not possess lawful authority in this area. Paul transferred this authority to the individual conscience. The same is true for Paul's other applications of the principle of Christian liberty, the "taste not, touch not" issues.

The Mosaic civil sanctions that enforced the fourth commandment have been annulled. Israel's civil government had been authorized by God—indeed, required—to enforce the fourth commandment, and to do so with its ultimate penalty: execution. The language of the sabbath statutes in Exodus is clear. So is the story of the stick-gatherer in Numbers 15. His crime was not a matter of a ritual act of rebellion. It was a matter of work.¹⁰ He had not profaned the temple; he had profaned the sabbath.

The New Testament church has always denied the right of execution to the state with respect to sabbath violations, as well it should. It thereby has acknowledged in principle that there has been a funda- mental judicial change in the covenantal administration of one of the Ten Commandments. Nevertheless, churches for almost two millennia have refused to state the theological reason for this shift. The state enforces laws against murder, theft, adultery, and perjury. The church has applauded this down through the centuries. The state has at times enforced laws against Lord's day-breaking, but not by means of the Mosaic law's mandatory civil sanction. Does this mean that the New Covenant regards Lord's day violations as less profane than the Old Covenant did? If so, why?

9. North, Authority and Dominion, Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 24.

10. He was not found in the act of kindling a fire on the sabbath, which was prohibited (Ex. 35:3). He was found working.

The judicial issue here is the transfer of the locus of authority for the enforcement of the fourth commandment: from the state and local church to the individual conscience.¹¹ Paul established the principle of the authority of the conscience regarding the honoring of special days. He did not exclude from this principle the sabbath or Lord's Day. When he spoke of holy days, he was not speaking only of special days other than the Jewish sabbath, whether Jewish or gentile in their origin. On the contrary, the sabbath was the one day that would have been the common holy day in both Jewish and gentile congregations.

C. Cooperation Within the Church

By identifying the conscience as the proper sanctioning agency in matters of food, drink, and sabbath observance, Paul provided a way for weak and strong Christians to cooperate institutionally. He taught that the church should remain a place where spiritually weak and strong Christians will forebear one another's views regarding taboos: food, drink, and sabbath.

is advice has rarely been taken since the Protestant Reformation. Protestant churches have split on taboo issues. In American fundamentalism, the taboo over alcohol is a major one. The taboo over sabbath observance is not. In practice, Scottish Presbyterian elders do not enforce discipline over nonsabbatarian members, no matter how many sermons they preach on the sabbath. Institutionally, Paul's injunction is honored on matters sabbatarian. But in fundamentalist congregations, demon rum is still the biggest demon around. The once-powerful demons of gambling, dancing, and movies have faded into the background. The demon tobacco is still lurking in the shadows, but

11. I have yet to see a detailed critique—or any published critique—of my thesis regarding the New Testament's transfer of the locus of sovereignty governing sabbath enforcement. I published my chapter in 1986. There has been plenty of time for sabbatarian critics to respond. They are conspicuously silent.

smoking has faded in popularity in the United States, except possibly among the generation reaching adulthood in 2000. Secularists have adopted this demon as their very own. They are more vocal in their opposition to tobacco than fundamentalists are.

Protestant denominations have divided over theology and taboos for almost five centuries. But, once established, the denominations' divisions over taboos tend to decrease. It is less expensive to transfer membership to a different denomination than to convince a majority of today's members to reconsider a taboo. Taboos define some denominations, but splits generally do not come because of debates about traditional taboos. They come over theological issues or personality issues. Cooperation may occasionally take place among denominations, but on the whole, traditional taboos remain institutionalized. Weak and strong Christians form their own denominations. All of them regard themselves as strong.

Conclusion

With respect to the Mosaic laws governing foods, they are completely abolished under the New Covenant. Jesus made the general point: "Not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man; but that which cometh out of the mouth, this defileth a man" (Matt. 15:11). God announced this change of administration to Peter in Acts 10. Paul brought the same message to gentile churches. The implication was inescapable: the cultural separation between gentile and Jewish cultures was no longer in force. This separation had been imposed by dietary restrictions on the Jews. It was over. So was circumcision. The new man in Christ had replaced the old man in Moses. "Lie not one to another, seeing that ye have put off the old man with his deeds; And have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him: Where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free: but Christ is all, and in all" (Col. 3:9–11).

There were never any prohibitions on the use of alcohol outside the boundaries of the temple (Lev. 10:9). In fact, the consumption of alcohol was encouraged by God's law. The following passage is simply never discussed by defenders of total abstinence:

And thou shalt eat before the LORD thy God, in the place which he shall choose to place his name there, the tithe of thy corn, of thy wine, and of thine oil, and the firstlings of thy herds and of thy flocks;

that thou mayest learn to fear the LORD thy God always. And if the way be too long for thee, so that thou art not able to carry it; or if the place be too far from thee, which the LORD thy God shall choose to set his name there, when the LORD thy God hath blessed thee: Then shalt thou turn it into money, and bind up the money in thine hand, and shalt go unto the place which the LORD thy God shall choose: And thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for oxen, or for sheep, or for wine, or for strong drink, or for whatsoever thy soul desireth: and thou shalt eat there before the LORD thy God, and thou shalt rejoice, thou, and thine household, And the Levite that is within thy gates; thou shalt not forsake him; for he hath no part nor inheritance with thee (Deut. 14:23–27).¹²

The Hebrew word for “strong drink” is found in other passages. Strong drink was prohibited to those who took a Nazarite vow. Also prohibited were grapes and raisins. “He shall separate himself from wine and strong drink, and shall drink no vinegar of wine, or vinegar of strong drink, neither shall he drink any liquor of grapes, nor eat moist grapes, or dried” (Num. 6:3). Strong drink was not for priests who were inside the temple (Lev. 10:9).¹³ Strong drink was also not for kings, as a general rule of personal conduct (Prov. 31:4). But it was all right for anyone else who was not addicted to it. It was even recommended. “Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine unto those that be of heavy hearts” (Prov. 31:6).

Activities on the sabbath come under the same liberating rule. Based on the evidence from the New Testament, Christians are not legitimately bound by institutional requirements to conduct themselves in a special way on Sundays, other than to attend church. They must attend church because of the general rule to assemble (Heb. 10:25), not because of the sabbath or Lord’s day. They are bound by conscience. Each individual must make the highly complex decisions regarding legitimate activities on Sunday.¹⁴

There is therefore no New Testament case for “blue laws” or other state-enforced restrictions on business activities on Sunday. Other than inside a family, where the head of the household exercises legitimate authority, all institutional enforcement of Mosaic laws governing the sabbath has been annulled, along with the law's mandated civil sanction: execution. The state no longer has any legitimate enforcement function in compelling people to honor the sabbath. If it did, it would be biblically compelled to execute the violators.

12. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 35.

13. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 8.

14. For those Christians who are unfamiliar with the Scottish sabbatarian position, personal conduct on the sabbath may not seem to be a complex issue. This is because they are part of a broad non-sabbatarian tradition, the one adhered to by Calvin. In Calvinistic circles, Calvin’s view is referred to as the Continental view of the sabbath.

The strict sabbatarianism of the Scottish Presbyterian tradition has always been theologically schizophrenic: he defends a Mosaic prohibition without its mandated civil sanction. Strict sabbatarianism has always been loose sabbatarianism when compared with Mosaic sabbatarianism.

The strict sabbatarian, like the strict prohibitionist, regards his position as the strong one. Paul dismisses both as weak positions. He taught that the church should not concern itself with either form of enforcement. Both are a matter of conscience. One more time: a law without sanctions is not a law; it is a suggestion. Only at the level of individual conscience should these prohibitions be regarded as biblically legitimate laws.

CONCLUSION

Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law. Is he the God of the Jews only? is he not also of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also: Seeing it is one God, which shall justify the circumcision by faith, and uncircumcision through faith. Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid: yea, we establish the law (Rom. 3:28–31).

The deeds required by God's law do not justify fallen man.¹ This means that the work of the law, which is in every man's heart (Rom. 2:14–15),² cannot redeem anyone. But neither can the Mosaic law. The Jew, no less than the Greek, is in need of saving faith. "For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. 6:23). Through saving faith, both Jew and Greek are justified by God.

Why should there continue to be strife within the institutional church over the law of God? Paul was asking an important judicial question in this epistle. He recommended ways to end such strife: church courts (I Cor. 6),³ the acceptance of people's differences (Rom. 13:12–14:13), and the patience of the strong regarding the weak in their mutual Christian liberty (Rom. 14:1–6).⁴

In seeking the basis of cooperation within the church, Paul raised issues of revelation and law that applied to the relations of church members with covenant-breakers. He told church members not to

1. It would be very hard to argue that works did not justify Jesus, whose righteousness is imputed to His people. I think this idea underlies James' affirmation that deeds do justify covenant-keepers "Ye see then how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only" (James 2:24). These are Jesus' works imputed to men judicially, and predestined before time began: "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them" (Eph. 2:10).

2. Chapter 3.

3. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 6.

4. Chapter 14.

take each other into civil courts run by and for covenant-breakers. He also told them that covenant-breakers cannot escape from God's revelation of Himself and the work of His law. This was a clear statement regarding the principle of natural law: it cannot be fully trusted in civil affairs. Nevertheless, as a matter of epistemology, it can be relied on by political necessity to some limited degree in a covenant-breaking social order, for there are limits on the ability of covenant-breakers to suppress the truth and act contrary to it. This is a blessing of common grace.

This general revelation of God and the work of God's law in every human heart are the biblical epistemological foundations of political and judicial assessments regarding social justice and social utility. Were it not for the image of God in man, including the work of God's law, the methodological individualist could not logically say that civil judges or voters can accurately aggregate individual utilities or values in their attempt to derive both a concept of social utility and a workable application of it to specific cases.

Social cooperation requires a shared discourse. Without this, society would disintegrate in the war of all against all. Original sin and total depravity would undermine society. God's common grace prevents this outcome. This is necessary for the fulfillment of the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:26–28; 9:1–3).⁵ Without the division of labor, there could be no fulfillment of the dominion covenant. The command to subdue the earth was given to all men. All men are expected to do their part to fulfill it.

Romans 12 parallels I Corinthians 12. It describes the institutional church as a body. This organic metaphor for an oath-bound covenantal association can be used to make sense of the economy. While the economy is not oath-bound, it is contract-bound. Paul's organic metaphor of the body is superior to mechanical metaphors to describe the auction process that best describes the free market. The ideal of the division of labor applies to the free market, just as it does to the church. There is coordination in society through individual decision-making and contracts. The unity of the church is secured by Christ as its head. There is no head for the economy, for there is no covenantal oath to bind its participants. The market derives its coherence from the interaction of enforceable contracts. There is justice, however: civil law. This is an oath-bound covenantal organization, and Paul goes so far as to identify it as a ministry (Rom. 13:4). The free market is not autonomous. It is established through innumerable contracts made by owners of property—families, individuals, corporations, partnerships, trusts—who are in turn bound by civil government. There is a court of appeals outside of the free market that can settle the conflicts that are not resolvable, violence-free, within the free market. Paul did not reject the legitimacy of civil courts. He argued only that they are no place for covenant-keepers to settle their disputes. He affirmed their legitimacy in non-ecclesiastical matters.

5. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4, 18.

Paul recommended social cooperation, both inside and outside of the institutional church. His argument for the work of the law in every heart can be used to justify the idea of non-Christian civil government as a default position, but Paul offered no case against theonomy as the civic ideal. It is also the ideal for the church. The church is superior to the state as a source of justice, as he made plain in Romans 6. Its courts are not open to everyone; they are open only to its oath-bound members.

Cooperation is a fact of life. Without the cooperation made possible by the modern division of labor, most people would die. But most men need to believe in something to put their faith in that is higher and more personal than the free market. The same is true for their faith in providence in contrast to the survival of the biologically fittest. They want to believe in cosmic personalism. Paul says that God is sovereign over all (Rom. 9). He is the source of order. He is the source of meaning, too. Man is made in God's image, so man can understand God's providence. But men rebel and worship products of their imagination. God restrains this through His common grace, but false worship and rebellious behavior go together (Rom. 1:18–22).⁶

6. Chapter 2.

JUDGMENT AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON I CORINTHIANS

Other Books by Gary North

An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)

Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)

An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)

Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)

Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)

Government by Emergency (1983)

Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)

75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)

Coined Freedom (1984)

Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)

Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)

Honest Money (1986)

Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)

Dominion and Common Grace (1987)

Inherit the Earth (1987)

Liberating Planet Earth (1987)

Healer of the Nations (1987)

The Pirate Economy (1987)

Is the World Running Down? (1988)

When Justice Is Aborted (1989)

Political Polytheism (1989)

The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)

Victim's Rights (1990)

Westminster's Confession (1991)

Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar

The Coase Theorem (1992)

Salvation Through Inflation (1993)

Rapture Fever (1993)

Tithing and the Church (1994)

Crossed Fingers (1996)

The Covenantal Tithe (2010)

JUDGMENT AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON I CORINTHIANS

GARY NORTH

Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on I Corinthians

Formerly:

Copyright © Gary North, 2012

??? Edition

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

This book is dedicated to

Kenneth L. Gentry

whose books on eschatology have established the terms of discourse

TABLE OF CONTENTS

| | |
|---|-----|
| Preface | ix |
| Introduction | 1 |
| 1. Two Kinds of Foolishness (I Cor. 1:18–25)..... | 12 |
| 2. Two Kinds of Minds (I Cor. 2:14–16) | 32 |
| 3. Final Judgment (I Cor. 3:10–15) | 42 |
| 4. Definitive Delegated Ownership (I Cor. 3:19–23) | 53 |
| 5. Progressive Knowledge and Responsibility (I Cor. 4:1–5) . | 63 |
| 6. Eschatology and Biblical Theocracy (I Cor. 6:2–9) | 72 |
| 7. Discipline and the Church’s Inheritance (I Cor. 6:9–11) .. | 79 |
| 8. Calling and Occupation (I Cor. 7:20–24) | 85 |
| 9. A Confirmed Bachelor’s Bias (I Cor. 7:25–31) | 105 |
| 10. Meat Offered to Idols (I Cor. 8:4) | 116 |
| 11. Retaining The Fruits of Our Labor (I Cor. 9:7–10) | 125 |
| 12. Running The Race (I Cor. 9:9:24–27) | 134 |
| 13. The Politics of Plunder (I Cor. 10:24) | 138 |
| 14. Full-Time Christian Service. (I Cor. 10:31) | 146 |
| 15. Hierarchy: Family, Market, And State (I Cor. 11:1–3) | 161 |
| 16. The Division of Labor (I Cor. 12:4–7) | 181 |
| 17. Eschatology and Capital Accumulation (I Cor. 15:21–28) . | 197 |
| 18. Systematic Charity (I Cor. 16:1–3) | 216 |
| Conclusion | 225 |
| Appendix A—A Critique of Heretical Preterism | 243 |
| Appendix B—Legalism vs. Alcohol. | 284 |

PREFACE

*And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul:
but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell (Matt. 10:28).*

A. Final Judgment

Modern man does not tolerate the suggestion that God will bring final judgment at the end of time, condemning His enemies to eternal torment. This doctrine is Christianity's greatest offense. It always has been. Paul's sermon to the Athenians on Mars' Hill alienated most of his listeners.

Forasmuch then as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device. And the times of this ignorance God winked at; but now commandeth all men every where to repent: Because he hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead. And when they heard of the resurrection of the dead, some mocked: and others said, We will hear thee again of this matter. So Paul departed from among them (Acts 17:29–33).

Every age so far has been at war with God. In the early church, men who agreed on the final judgment disagreed on the doctrine of the incarnation. These questions dominated their discussions: Is God monotheistic, polytheistic, or Trinitarian? Is Jesus Christ the incarnate God? Is He both man and God? The rejection of Christ's uniquely divine status was the heart of apostasy in both Jerusalem and Rome.

The doctrine of God is still a divisive issue, but most covenant-breakers today choose to shrug off the existence of the Trinity as one more unanswerable question that is neither here nor there in the larger picture. But they do not regard the final judgment in this way. They reject it, but they do not regard it as irrelevant. God has put a sense of foreboding in every human heart. He has also imposed death. Men can pretend that they do not see God's hand in life, but they cannot avoid death.

Sometimes the dividing issue is judicial hierarchy. Men ask: Who possesses lawful authority, i.e., the God-delegated right, to "lay down the law"? Sometimes the dividing issue is the law itself: its authoritative source and ethical content. At other times, the dividing issue is the nature of the judicial sanctions that are imposed by the civil magistrate. But, in every era, the dividing issue is God's final judgment. This is what leads to the question: Who has the right to enforce the law? The correct answer: the person who represents God. The definitive representative of God in history is Jesus Christ, as Paul told the Athenians, and as Christ told the Jewish leaders.

And, behold, they brought to him a man sick of the palsy, lying on a bed: and Jesus seeing their faith said unto the sick of the palsy; Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee. And, behold, certain of the scribes said within themselves, This man blasphemeth. And Jesus knowing their thoughts said, Wherefore think ye evil in your hearts? For whether is easier, to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Arise, and walk? But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins, (then saith he to the sick of the palsy,) Arise, take up thy bed, and go unto thine house. And he arose, and departed to his house (Matt. 9:2–7).

The judicial issue of rendering judgment is both eternal and historical. Jesus Christ is God's representative of final judgment: God "will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained" (Acts 17:31). As the final judge, Christ delegates representatives in civil government (Rom. 13:1–7).¹ Civil magistrates must execute judgment in God's name or in the name of some other sovereign authority. Let us consider an example from history. After the English took control in India, they banned the Hindu practice of suttee ("faithful wife"): burning alive a widow on her husband's funeral pyre. This practice was supposedly voluntary on the part of widows, but social pressure was placed on widows to conform, including ostracism. The 1829 ban was a direct interference with a long-standing religious practice. References to the practice exist as early as 316 B.C. The suppression of suttee was Victorian English Christianity's coercive suppression of a Hindu religious tradition. It was a political act against a religious practice.² The English imposed negative civil sanctions against those who imposed a permanent negative sanction on widows. One or the other deeply committed religious group was determined to impose its negative sanctions in the name of its divinity. There was no neutral religious position between the two groups on this issue. This was a legal and moral question: “Which group had the right before God to impose its negative sanctions?” Modern humanists in the West prefer not to think about religious questions such as this one. They avoid such questions whenever possible. This does not make these questions go away. They remain at the heart of the civil order. The source of every society’s law-order is the god of that society.

1. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 9.

B. Final Judgment vs. Relativism

The doctrine of God’s final judgment testifies against all forms of relativism. This is why secular liberalism rejects this Christian doctrine. So does secular conservatism. The doctrine of God’s final judgment announces that certain ideas are eternally true; therefore, other ideas are eternally false. God will impose eternal, irreversible negative sanctions on those people who believe certain theologically incorrect doctrines, such as the denial of the following truths. “He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him” (John 3:36). “Jesus saith unto him, I am the way, the truth, and the life: no man cometh unto the Father, but by me” (John 14:6). The doctrine of final judgment offers covenant-breaking men no wiggle room. There are no loopholes. There will be no plea bargaining on judgment day.

God’s final judgment is the foundation of men’s temporal judgments. The ability of men to make accurate judgments in history exists only because men are made in God’s image. Men can render preliminary judgments because God will render final judgment. If God will not render final judgment, then all human judgments are without either a moral or an aesthetic foundation. Everything that men do would then be swallowed up in cosmic relativism and impersonalism.

There are three scientific views of cosmic history, apart from the doctrine of creation and final judgment. First is the heat death of the universe. This is the most widely held cosmological position today. The world is said to be running down. If it is, then it must end in the meaningless, impersonal triumph of absolute zero over all life and over every natural process that supposedly can lead to life in the cosmos.³ Second in popularity is the idea of cyclical history. Everything repeats itself. The cosmic scientific version of this ancient doctrine is the eternal expansion and contraction of the universe.⁴ Third is the doctrine of continual creation and destruction. Hydrogen atoms appear out of nothing, and matter disappears into nothing. (This steady-state theory of the universe is not widely held among scientists, having been made difficult by the failure of the orbital satellites to detect the radiation which the theory mandates.)⁵ All three views are cosmically impersonal. There is no God to impute meaning to history and nature.

2. “Lord William Bentinck on the Suppression of Sati, 8 November 1829,” Speeches and Documents on Indian Policy, 1750–1921, ed. Arthur B. Keith (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1922), I, pp. 208–26.

The idea of imputation is the idea of judgment. To impute is to render judgment. Men assess the historical meaning, purpose, or role of this or that event. How can they do this on their own authority? What meaning, purpose, or role does anyone's judgment possess? After he dies, what meaning, purpose, or role will his lifetime of rendering judgment possess in retrospect? Which of his temporal successors will determine this authoritatively? How will any successor enforce his retroactive judgments? He is mortal, too. He will die. The final human judge in the process will have the last say. But if he, too, is at last swallowed up by the meaningless, purposeless, impersonal natural force of death, then no one has the last say. Everything turns out to be purposeless in retrospect when there is no agent capable of rendering retrospective judgment.

Modern man prefers to declare an official doctrine of relativism. He declares this doctrine authoritatively. "Everything changes. Nothing is permanent." This is a revised version of Heraclitus' doctrine that, in history, everything flows. "Change is the essence of reality." But this means a world without final meaning, a world without fixed judgments. This means the triumph of relativism. Modern pagan man, imitating ancient pagan man, prefers relativism to the doctrine of God's final judgment. Relativism is covenant-breaking man's

3. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

4. Stanley Jaki, Science and Creation: From eternal cycles to an oscillating universe (Edinburgh: Scottish Academic Press, [1974] 1980).

5. Stanley Jaki, The Road of Science and the Ways to God (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978), pp. 269–71.

preliminary declaration of final judgment on himself: “Not guilty.”

C. Christian Relativism

1. Inescapable Judgment

The presentation of the gospel—the good news of Jesus Christ—necessarily involves the doctrine of final judgment by Jesus Christ: the fearful news. The positive sanctions of God’s salvation of some people have meaning only in the context of the negative sanctions of God’s damnation of all the other people. Christians therefore must render preliminary judgment on those who reject the doctrine of Christ’s substitutionary atonement. They tell the listener, “no decision is still a decision: a decision against.” They are correct. Judgment is an inescapable concept. By ignoring Jesus Christ, men render judgment against Him. No decision is still a decision. Original sin begins with a decision against Christ. Christians assume this when they announce Christ’s legal claims on their listeners.

At the same time, Christians resent judgments placed on them by other Christians. They accuse their Christian critics of being judgmental, of being Pharisees. They say that they stand with Jesus against Pharisaism. They do not ask themselves this crucial question: “On what legal basis did Jesus accuse the Pharisees, other than His authoritative view of God, man, law, sanctions, and time?” Judgment is an inescapable concept.

2. Accurate Judgment

The dividing issue here is not the presence of judgment. Judgment is inescapable. There is no neutrality in life. The issue here is the accuracy of the judgment rendered: the judge’s lawful authority to render judgment, the authority of his standards, and the accuracy of his application of these standards to specific events or ideas. But naive Christians prefer to cite Matthew 7:1. “Judge not, that ye be not judged.” They do not understand that Jesus gave this warning in His sermon on the mount, in which He issued positive and negative verbal sanctions. They do not understand that Jesus was calling on His disciples to render judgment biblically as their affirmation of their right to be judged biblically.

Judge not, that ye be not judged. For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged: and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again. And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye? Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, Let me pull out the mote out of thine eye; and, behold, a beam is in thine own eye? Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye (Matt. 7:1–5).

His point was not the moral necessity of avoiding the task of rendering judgment against slivers in other people's eyes. His point was that critics must render accurate judgment first against beams in their own eyes, as the preliminary step in rendering judgment on other men's visual condition. But many Christians are blind on this point. They freely render judgments on the judicial status of non-Christians, but then they relegate both morals and doctrine to peripheral status within the church. This is a schizophrenic position, yet it is widespread.

Every Christian wants to stay within his moral, theological, and aesthetic comfort zone, rendering judgments against the antinomians on his left, who reject his authority, and the legalists on his right, whose authority he rejects. But this epistemological question is inescapable: By what standard? Roman Catholics cast out the Eastern Orthodox Church in 1054. The East responded in kind. There were mutual anathemas all around. Then Protestants left Roman Catholicism in the sixteenth century. More mutual anathemas all around.

3. Rhetoric of the Protestant Reformation

The Protestant Reformation was secured by controversy and bloodshed. Religious wars went on for over a century in Europe, culminating on the continent in the Thirty Years War between Catholics and Protestants (1618–48) and in England with a civil war between Protestants (1642–60). Yet there are millions of Protestants today who decry mere confrontational rhetoric. They seem completely unaware of Luther's repeated use of ridicule and sarcasm in mobilizing his Protestant forces.⁶ They are also unaware of John Calvin's use of invective in The Institutes of the Christian Religion. This includes the vast majority of those few people who identify themselves as Calvinists. They have not read what Calvin wrote.

6. Mark U. Edwards, Jr., Luther and the False Brethren (Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1975), pp. 52, 70, 89, 103, 197–98, 200–202, 205; Edwards, Luther's Last Battles: Politics and Polemics, 1531–1546 (Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1983), pp. 189–99.

Roman Catholics: “raving madmen” who “prate”⁷

Bullingerites: “squeamish men”⁸

Osiander (Lutheran): “perversely ingenious,”⁹ “ignorantly babbling”¹⁰ “absurd” “rubbish,”¹¹ a “Sophist”¹² writing “bombast,”¹³ “mad error,”¹⁴ and “deceits”¹⁵

Arminians: “dogs” who “vomit forth these blasphemies” and “rave,”¹⁶ “impious and profane men”¹⁷

Anabaptists: “madmen” who preach “pestilential error”¹⁸

Scholastic theologians: “babble childishly” and “chatter,”¹⁹ “mad school of wranglers,”²⁰ “blockheads”²¹

Calvin described Jews as “sharp-nosed fault-finders” and “dogs.”²² He treated Epicureans, Socinians, Servetus, and other non-Christian opponents in the same way. No major Christian publishing company would issue either Luther’s or Calvin’s writings if they were alive today unless their books were heavily edited to remove such language. John Knox was, if anything, more intemperate. It is only because their books are regarded as classics and therefore beyond any editor’s blue pencil that their invective remains in print. Commentators “within the camp of the faithful” generally pass over these rhetorical flourishes whenever they think they can get away with silence. Protestants in the pews remain unaware of the rhetoric of the Protestant Reformation. They may have come to grips emotionally with the fact that Protestant and Catholic armies waged war on each other for over a century, but

7. John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion (1559), translated by Ford Lewis Battles (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1960), Library of Christian Classics, vol. XX, Book I, Chapter XI, Section 3.

8. Ibid., I:XIII:3.

9. Ibid., I:XV:3.

10. Ibid., II:XII:6.

11. Ibid., II:XII:7.

12. Ibid., III:XI:7.

13. Ibid., III:XI:8.

14. Ibid., III:XI:10.

15. Idem.

16. Ibid., I:XVII:2.

17. Ibid., I:XVIII:3.

18. Ibid., II:X:1.

19. Ibid., III:II:8.

20. Ibid., III:II:43.

21. Ibid., III:XX:25.

22. Ibid., I:VIII:11.

they would be amazed to learn that Christian authors used offensive rhetoric against each other. Modern Protestants are almost terminally naive.

There can be inappropriate rhetoric, but when the great dual issue of eternal life and death is at stake, divisiveness is inescapable. Judgments must be made. The questions are these: (1) Who possesses the lawful delegated authority to render these judgments representatively in God's name in history? (2) Whose historical judgments will God uphold at the final judgment?

D. Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians

This epistle deals with the importance of rendering judgment: inside the church and against the world. Paul pressures the church to take action against a person who had committed incest (chapter 5). He also tells them to avoid going into secular civil courts in order to settle disputes with other Christians (chapter 6). In neither case does he say that they should avoid rendering judgments.

This epistle is based on the necessity of rendering judgments in life, beginning with self-judgment. Why is this necessary? Because of God's final judgment. "Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire" (I Cor. 3:13–15).²³

Ray Sutton used to say that the best way for a newly arrived pastor to split the congregation is to begin his ministry to the church with a series of sermons on First Corinthians. I have no doubt that Sutton's assessment is correct. He recommended beginning with one of the gospels. This is wise, if the pastor's goal is to avoid splitting the congregation. I am not persuaded that this is always the correct goal. Some congregations need to be split early by the divisive power of the Bible's message of judgment. The unity that Paul proclaims in chapter 12 could be secured only by their imposing excommunication in chapter 5.

Sutton also recommended weekly communion, yet he said that the Lord's Supper is divisive: an ecclesiastical means of imposing God's sanctions. The sanctions that God brings through the sacrament of the Lord's Supper cannot be avoided. Paul in chapter 11 warns against taking the Lord's Supper while harboring sin. "But let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup. For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord's body. For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep. For if we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged" (11:28–31). God's sanctions are real. Self-judgment is important as a way to avoid them.

23. Chapter 3.

The church is cleansed of sin and sinners by inescapably judgmental preaching, inescapably judgmental communion, and predictable formal discipline. These are the three marks of a faithful church. Without godly judgment, there is no church. There is only a weekly get-together.

Conclusion

The task of rendering judgment is inescapable. It is basic to the dominion covenant. This involves making economic judgments. In a world of God-cursed scarcity (Gen. 3:17–19),²⁴ we must choose among scarce resources. We do so on the basis of our imputation: how much value we ascribe to one resource vs. another, in terms of which scale of values. We do this also in terms of objective market prices. Subjective imputation by competing and cooperating market participants is what establishes an objective array of prices.

The nagging and continual theoretical question of the relationship between men's subjective values and the market's objective prices can be solved only by an appeal to God as the sovereign imputing agent. He will render final judgment at the end of time, thereby establishing retroactively how close individuals and corporate entities came to His standards. Case by case, life by life, God will provide an answer to this rhetorical question: "For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" (Mark 8:36).²⁵

24. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

25. Gary North, Trust and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Mark and John (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 11.

INTRODUCTION

Then the Pharisees went out, and held a council against him, how they might destroy him. But when Jesus knew it, he withdrew himself from thence: and great multitudes followed him, and he healed them all; And charged them that they should not make him known: That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying, Behold my servant, whom I have chosen; my beloved, in whom my soul is well pleased: I will put my spirit upon him, and he shall shew judgment to the Gentiles. He shall not strive, nor cry; neither shall any man hear his voice in the streets. A bruised reed shall he not break, and smoking flax shall he not quench, till he send forth judgment unto victory. And in his name shall the Gentiles trust (Matt. 12:14–21).

A. Judgments by Jesus

Jesus Christ rendered Spirit-filled judgments in history: on Jews and on gentiles. Yet He seldom spoke to gentiles. He brought positive sanctions to a handful of them: the Samaritan woman at the well (John 4), the Roman centurion whose servant He healed from a distance (Matt. 8:5–13), and the woman of Canaan whose daughter He healed from a distance (Matt. 15:22–28). The testimony of the Samaritan woman to her fellow townspeople led to their conversion to saving faith. One of them told her, “Now we believe, not because of thy saying: for we have heard him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world” (John 4:42). Jesus commented on the confidence in Jesus that the centurion had publicly announced, contrasting his faith with the faith of the Jews. “And I say unto you, That many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven.

But the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. And Jesus said unto the centurion, Go thy way; and as thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee. And his servant was healed in the selfsame hour” (Matt. 8:11–13). Jesus said to the woman, “O woman, great is thy faith:

be it unto thee even as thou wilt. And her daughter was made whole from that very hour” (Matt. 15:28). Jesus used the faith in Him shown by these gentiles as a means of condemning the Jews.

Jesus accurately assessed the Old Covenant order, and then He judged it negatively in full public view during His earthly ministry. He judged it by speaking against its leaders and also by healing their followers. He brought positive sanctions into the lives of common people. This action affirmed both His authority as a judge and His ability to bring negative sanctions into their lives. He healed bodies in order to prove that He could heal souls. He delivered some people from physical bondage to prove that He could deliver all people from spiritual bondage.

And, behold, they brought to him a man sick of the palsy, lying on a bed: and Jesus seeing their faith said unto the sick of the palsy; Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee. And, behold, certain of the scribes said within themselves, This man blasphemeth. And Jesus knowing their thoughts said, Wherefore think ye evil in your hearts? For whether is easier, to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Arise, and walk? But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins, (then saith he to the sick of the palsy,) Arise, take up thy bed, and go unto thine house. And he arose, and departed to his house. But when the multitudes saw it, they marvelled, and glorified God, which had given such power unto men (Matt. 9:2–8).

Jesus granted these positive sanctions in order to condemn Old Covenant Israel. “Woe unto thee, Chorazin! woe unto thee, Bethsaida! for if the mighty works had been done in Tyre and Sidon, which have been done in you, they had a great while ago repented, sitting in sackcloth and ashes. But it shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon at the judgment, than for you” (Luke 10:13–14). This was an Old Covenant strategy: condemnation through charity. “If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink: For thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head, and the LORD shall reward thee” (Prov. 25:21–22). Paul recommended this strategy. “Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord. Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head” (Rom. 12:19– 20).¹ By granting favors to covenant-breakers that they do not deserve, the covenant-keeper invokes God's curse on them, should they fail to repent. He judges them in history as a lawful agent of God's judgment for eternity. So Jesus did to the Jews. This is judgment unto victory.

At the cross, the Jews and the Romans jointly judged Jesus. Three days later, His bodily resurrection demonstrated that He, not they, possessed the God-given authority to judge. At His ascension, He was visibly raised above the earth (Acts 1:9), thereby demonstrating the truth of His post-resurrection words to His disciples: "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth" (Matt. 28:18b).² In A.D. 70, Jesus brought final judgment against Old Covenant Israel. Jerusalem was captured by the Roman army, and the temple was burned. His verbal judgment against Old Covenant Israel during His earthly ministry was confirmed in A.D. 70.³

Jesus was a servant during His earthly ministry, just as Isaiah had prophesied. "He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied: by his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many; for he shall bear their iniquities" (Isa. 53:11). He repeatedly rendered judgment against sickness by healing the sick. He verbally condemned the Jews' religious leaders. They fought back, but lost. The gospel spread. Jesus successfully brought visible judgment against the Jews and their institutions in A.D. 70. Whose judgment was judgment unto failure? Christ's or the Old Covenant order's? His church has replaced Old Covenant Israel, just as He told the Pharisees that it would. "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43). His church has replaced Rome's religion. His followers captured the Roman state. Whose judgment was judgment unto victory (Matt. 12:20)?

B. Judgment Unto Victory

Jesus Christ's judgment is judgment unto victory. This is a crucial covenantal concept. His sanctions in history, both positive and

1. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 10.

2. Kenneth L. Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/GentryGGC>)

3. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

negative, lead to the long-term victory of His kingdom. The gates of hell cannot defend against the kingdom of God (Matt. 16:18). All Christians believe this. They debate over the issue of whether this victory will be universally manifested both in history and eternity or only in eternity. This is a debate between amillennialists on one side and both premillennialists and postmillennialists on the other. Then there is another divisive eschatological question. Will His kingdom's victory occur prior to His physical reappearance in history? This question divides premillennialists from postmillennialists. Rival social philosophies and social theories result from these rival eschatological positions.⁴

In his first epistle to the Corinthians, Paul presents the biblical case for Christians' authority in history and their obligation to render judgments in history. There are two views of the world, Paul says in the early section of the epistle. They divide over the meaning of the cross (I Cor. 1:18). Each view judges the other to be foolish.⁵ There are two inescapably judgmental worldviews. One or the other must predominate in society.

Paul also calls on the Corinthians to judge each other formally in church courts (I Cor. 6:1–11).⁶ Is this a call for Christians to retreat from covenant-breaking society, or is it a call for them to prepare to judge covenant-breaking society? Again, the rival eschatological interpretations differ.

1. Victory Over Death

Chapter 15 of this epistle challenges the amillennial view. Paul insists that Christ will defeat all of his enemies in history, including the last one: death.

For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order: Christ the firstfruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming. Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith, all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted, which did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all (vv. 22–28).

4. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

5. Chapter 1.

6. Chapter 6.

Paul makes this clear: only after Christ has defeated all of His enemies in history will He judge the world. The defeat over death is the final victory. Then Christ will hand over this world to His Father. Paul's language leaves very little wiggle room, exegetically speaking. This passage can be dealt with exegetically in a straightforward manner by postmillennialists and premillennialists, but amillennialists must deny the literalness of its description of Christ's visible victory over His enemies. They do this by interpreting Paul's plain words as symbolic of something else—exactly what, it is difficult for them to say. The text's language is much clearer than amillennial expositions of it.⁷

2. Continuity, Not Discontinuity

Jesus' parable of the tares and wheat (Matt. 13) eliminates the possibility of both post-tribulation and mid-tribulation dispensationalism. The parable plainly teaches that there will be no separation of Christians from non-Christians in history.⁸ This leaves only historic premillennialism, post-tribulational dispensationalism, and post-millennialism as possible interpretations of chapter 15.

Premillennialism predicts a future political reign on earth by Jesus, beginning one thousand years before the final judgment. Thus, Christ's judgment in history is seen by premillennialists as two-fold: through His people by means of an international, bureaucratic chain of command, but also personally, at the top of both the political and ecclesiastical judicial pyramids. Premillennialists rarely discuss what justice will be like during the future millennial kingdom of Christ in history. By refusing to discuss this, premillennialists implicitly reject the suggestion that today's institutions will set any significant precedents for the future. Premillennialists, by their silence regarding the institutional structure of the millennial era, imply that there will be a sharp discontinuity between institutional judgment in the pre-millennial era and judgment during the millennial kingdom era.

7. Chapter 14.

8. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 29.

The postmillennial view allows for Christianity's victory in history and also today's judicial-institutional continuity with the millennial era of victory. The concept of Christ's representative victory in history through His servants' dominion is unique to postmillennialism. Any discontinuity between today's world and the future era of Christian victory is comparative, not absolute. That is, this view of discontinuity does not allow for resurrected, sin-free incorruption to operate in the midst of sinful corruption. Jesus alone possessed this unique distinction in history, both before and after His resurrection. Postmillennialism preserves Paul's doctrine of the separation of corruption from incorruption. "Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption" (I Cor. 15:50). Neither does incorruption inherit corruption. Christ will not reign in person on earth in history, either with or without resurrected Christians who will serve as His official sanctions-bringers.

This means that God's judgment in history—point four of the biblical covenant⁹—will be progressively established representatively—point two¹⁰—by covenant-keepers, which will eventually produce the millennial era of victory (point five).¹¹ How? By enforcing God's Bible-revealed law (point three).¹²

C. The Primary Theme of First Corinthians

This epistle is heavily judgmental of the congregation in Corinth. Paul calls them contentious (I Cor. 1:11). He calls them carnal (I Cor. 3:1). He defends himself against their critical judgment of his ministry (I Cor. 4:3). He deals with a major sin in the congregation: incest (I Cor. 5:1). He criticizes them for taking their disputes into pagan civil courts (I Cor. 6:1). He warns them against sinning against weak brethren (I Cor. 8:12). He warns them against violating the sanctity of the Lord's Supper (I Cor. 11:21–22, 29–30).

Is there a common theme? Yes: the inescapable task of rendering judgments in history. This epistle makes it clear that there can be no

9. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

10. Sutton, ch. 2; North, ch. 2.

11. Sutton, ch. 5; North, ch. 5.

12. Sutton, ch. 3; North, ch. 3.

neutrality, morally speaking. Men must make moral judgments. Then they must render judgment, i.e., speak and act in terms of their moral judgments. Judgments are either good or evil, wise or foolish. They are never morally neutral. Judgments are made in terms of a scale of values, and this scale of values is either covenant-keeping or covenant-breaking.

In chapter 1, he criticizes the Corinthian church for being contentious. Members have divided into factions based on their personal commitment to one or another co-founder of the congregation. This must cease, Paul says. The debate, he says, is not between this or that co-founder of the local congregation. Rather, the debate is between defenders of the cross and scoffers. “For the preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness; but unto us which are saved it is the power of God. For it is written, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent” (vv. 18–19). Paul does not here deny the legitimacy of confrontation. On the contrary, he affirms it. There is necessary contention between consistent covenant-keepers and consistent covenant-breakers. “Where is the wise? where is the scribe? where is the disputer of this world? hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world?” (v. 20).

There must be judgments in history. Paul says that God has enabled His people to render accurate judgments in history.

But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God. Now we have received, not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God; that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God. Which things also we speak, not in the words which man’s wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth; comparing spiritual things with spiritual (I Cor. 2:10–13).

Christians are supposed to render judgments in history as God’s stewards. “Let a man so account of us, as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God. Moreover it is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful” (I Cor. 4:1–2). We are required by Christ to render judgment on God’s behalf, not our own. We are God’s agents, responsible to Him. We are subordinate to the God who renders authoritative judgment. God judges representatively as well as directly. Representative judgment must begin with formal judgment by the church against the enemies within. “For what have I to do to judge them also that are without? do not ye judge them that are within? But them that are without God judgeth. Therefore put away from among yourselves that wicked person” (I Cor. 5:12–13).

D. Economic Judgment

To judge is to impute. To impute is to make a declaration. A civil jury is supposed to use binding legal standards in order to evaluate the facts placed before it during the trial. Then it renders judgment: “guilty” or “not guilty.” This is also the conceptual model for economic imputation. As decision-makers, everyone must make continual evaluations and then make a declaration: good or bad. He must buy, hold, or sell.

1. Scale of Value

In economics, to judge is to attribute value—meaning importance—to a scarce economic resource, meaning any asset that commands a free market price. The individual evaluates what something is worth to him. The word “evaluate” even contains the root English word for value. In order to evaluate what something is worth to him, he must first possess a hierarchical standard of value or personal ends. Then he assesses the position of the thing to be purchased or not purchased, acted upon or ignored, in terms of his personal scale of value. This scale of value is not scientifically measurable, but it does allow ranking. It is an ordinal scale—first, second, third—rather than cardinal: exactly this much more or less.

I say it again: to impute value is to make an estimation of something's importance on one's personal scale of values. This scale of values has a time component. Every decision is a decision about the future. Every decision also has an eternal component. Paul makes this clear in his discussion of final things. “Now he that planteth and he that watereth are one: and every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labour” (I Cor. 3:8). “Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is” (I Cor. 3:13). This is an extension of Christ's warning: “For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?” (Mark

8:36).¹³

Taking into consideration what he regards as relevant, a decision-maker then decides whether or not to take some action. He first imputes value; then he acts in terms of this imputation. The outcome of all of the competing and cooperating subjective individual decisions in an economy is an array of objective prices. Subjective individual imputations produce corporate objective prices. Individual values are manifested publicly—declared—through prices.

2. Value and Price

It is the relationship between individual value and objective price that is the heart of economic analysis. Value and price are related, and it is the task of the economist to explain this relationship in terms of economic theory. It is a task that has baffled secular economists for centuries. A price is objective. Is value objective or subjective? Value, most economists have said since the 1870s, is subjective. It is imputed by acting men. The free market's objective array of prices results from competitive bidding by economic actors who independently impute subjective value to objectively scarce resources—resources that command a price. The theoretical debate begins here. Is the free market's objective array of prices in some way morally justified—legitimate—because of the interplay between subjective value and objective scarcity? Economists hate to raise the issue of moral justification, but there is no escape. Men ask: "Does a free market price incorporate justice, even though it is the result of an unequal initial distribution of resources among the bidders? Does the array of free market prices maximize social value? Is there even such a thing as social value?" These debates never end. They never get resolved to everyone's satisfaction.

Oscar Wilde defined a cynic as a man who knows the price of everything and the value of nothing. This is very close to what Jesus taught about value and price, except that He did not limit His observation to cynics. Covenant-breakers are fools, He said, because they do not understand what is truly valuable in this life. They are seduced by the lure of temporal wealth. They are like the rich man who made plans to build more barns in order to store his overflowing wealth. "But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then whose shall those things be, which thou hast provided? So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God” (Luke 12:20–21).¹⁴

13. Gary North, Trust and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Mark and John (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 11.

3. The Mind of Christ

To render accurate judgment, a person must have the mind of Christ. The Christian definitively possesses this. “For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him? But we have the mind of Christ” (I Cor. 2:16).¹⁵ It is every Christian’s God-given task to improve his ability to render godly judgment over time. There should be progressive sanctification in each Christian’s rendering of judgment. There should also be progressive sanctification in each Christian institution’s rendering of judgment.

In the field of economics, the decision-making Christian is called on by God to assess the value of scarce economic resources, including the forfeited opportunities associated with owning one thing rather than another, and also the value of his investment of irreplaceable time, in terms of God’s special call to him as a steward. The Christian should put an objective price on resources based on his understanding of their value to God. Jesus said, “Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchant man, seeking goodly pearls: Who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had, and bought it” (Matt. 13:45–46).¹⁶ The Christian should think God’s thoughts after Him, for he has the mind of Christ. Inescapably, he must judge as a representative agent—a steward—of God.

Conclusion

Paul’s first epistle to the Corinthians is a call to every Christian to get his priorities straight and then make judgments in terms of them. Men’s judgments are initially subjective: the subjective imputation of subjectively perceived value. These subjective judgments become objective through men’s decisions. Each person’s subjective value scale at any point in time is judged by God in terms of His objective value. God, as both Creator and Judge, imputes value according to His subjective scale of values. But His subjective scale of values is objectively authoritative in history and eternity. In God is the reconciliation of subjective value and objective value. His scale of values is objectively true, not because God conforms Himself to standards that are external to Him and authoritative over Him, but because He is absolutely sovereign.

14. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 24.

15. Chapter 2.

16. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 31.

Christians are required by God to act in terms of what they believe to be true. Economically speaking, Christians should buy and sell in terms of what they believe. As men move through time, they continually exchange one condition for another. Possessing the mind of Christ, Christians are guided by the Spirit of God. They are supposed to accept this guidance. They are supposed to assess their situations in terms of this guidance, and then act in terms of this assessment. This is the integrating message of First Corinthians.

1

TWO KINDS OF FOOLISHNESS

For the preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness; but unto us which are saved it is the power of God. For it is written, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent. Where is the wise? where is the scribe? where is the disputer of this world? hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? For after that in the wisdom of God the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe. For the Jews require a sign, and the Greeks seek after wisdom: But we preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews a stumblingblock, and unto the Greeks foolishness; But unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God. Because the foolishness of God is wiser than men; and the weakness of God is stronger than men (I Cor. 1:18–25).

The theocentric focus here is the wisdom of God. It is contrasted with fallen man's knowledge, which fallen man regards as wise. God does not.

What is wisdom? The ability to identify the law of God and then to apply it: render judgment. Judgment is point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Foolishness: An Inescapable Concept

1. The Cross

Here, Paul assails the wisdom of this world. This world's wisdom regards the cross of Christ as foolishness. In contrast, the redeemed person knows that the cross is the power of God. Between these two assessments there is no common ground. Each regards the other's position as foolish. Paul is saying that there is no escape from the concept of foolishness. The question is: Who or what is truly foolish? By what standard? Decided by whom?

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

His use of "the cross" is broad. It refers to the substitutionary atonement of Jesus Christ: the death and bodily resurrection of Christ from the dead. The cross is the heart of Paul's message of redemption. Later in this epistle, he writes: "And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain" (I Cor. 15:14). "And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins" (I Cor. 15:17). The centrality of the cross is the centrality of the bodily resurrection of Christ. Christ's resurrection was God's visible, historical, definitive sanction on death. This is the essence of the gospel for Paul. This is the good news.

The wisdom of this world denies the doctrine of the bodily resurrection of Christ. It also denies the final resurrection and the final judgment of mankind. This was made clear during Paul's preaching in Athens on Mars' Hill. "And when they heard of the resurrection of the dead, some mocked: and others said, We will hear thee again of this matter" (Acts 17:32). This was the divisive doctrine for Paul's listeners.

I argue in this commentary that the central theme of this epistle is judgment: point four of the biblical covenant. Paul begins this epistle with a discussion of the cross. The cross remains the supreme manifestation of God's judgment in history: the sacrifice of God's son. This was a far greater judgment than the curses placed on Adam and Eve, including death. They were guilty. Jesus Christ was innocent. The supreme judgment fell on an innocent man who was also God.

Paul argues here that the defining characteristic of godly wisdom is an affirmation of the redemptive power of the cross of Christ. The defining characteristic of this world's wisdom is its denial of the redemptive power of the cross of Christ. These two positions are irreconcilable. There is no common ground between them. Paul begins with the assumption of the irreconcilable nature of these rival interpretations of reality. As he says later in this epistle, "But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned" (I Cor. 2:14).²

2. Chapter 2.

The power of the cross means different things to covenant-breakers and covenant-keepers. For covenant-breakers, the cross is the power of physical death over physical life. They deny the historical fact of Christ's literal bodily resurrection. For covenant-keepers, the cross is the power of God's redemption over sin and death. They affirm His bodily resurrection. For covenant-breakers, the cross manifests the superiority of this world's power over the power of God's covenantal redemption in history. For covenant-keepers, the cross manifests the power of God's comprehensive redemption over the power of this world.

2. Making Accurate Judgments

Paul is saying here that the only correct basis for making accurate judgments about reality is to begin with a presupposition: the redemptive power of the cross. Put another way, the only basis for making accurate judgments is to assume the redemptive reality of the cross, which was the supreme act of judgment in history: God's judgment of His son, followed by Christ's judgment on the power of the world, the flesh, and the devil. The supreme judgment of God that was manifested at the cross is the covenant-keeper's basis for making subordinate judgments. God's definitive historical judgment against sin is to serve as the basis of covenant-keeping man's progressive judgments against both sin and error. Covenant-keeping man's progressive rendering of judgment against both sin and intellectual error is an aspect of the kingdom of God in history. This is another way of saying that God extends His kingdom in history by empowering His people to render judgments as His representatives, even as Adam and Eve should have rendered judgment against Satan by rendering judgment against Satan's representative, the serpent.³ This empowerment is based on covenant-keepers' confession of faith in Paul's view of the cross.

God promises to bring to naught the wisdom of this world. "For it is written, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent" (v. 19). God promises to bring negative sanctions against the wisdom of the wise and the understanding of the prudent. Paul is using "wise" and "prudent" ironically: the wisdom and understanding of the covenant-breaking world. The wisdom of this world defies God's law. God will bring the wise to naught, i.e., to nothing. This is God's negative sanction.

3. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1987] 2012), Appendix E: "Witnesses and Judges."

God eventually brings positive sanctions in history on covenant-keepers (Ps. 72) and negative sanctions against covenant-breakers. "Until I went into the sanctuary of God; then understood I their end. Surely thou didst set them in slippery places: thou castedst them down into destruction. How are they brought into desolation, as in a moment! they are utterly consumed with terrors" (Ps. 73:17–19). God will eventually bring negative sanctions against this world's "best and brightest."

3. Rhetoric (Persuasion)

Paul asks a series of rhetorical questions. "Where is the wise? where is the scribe? where is the disputer of this world? hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world?" (v. 20). He identifies three types of men as defenders of foolishness: the wise, the scribe, and the disputer. Yet wisdom is not wrong. Solomon was wise (I Ki. 3:12). Also, it is not that the ability to write that is itself wrong. Paul wrote epistles. Finally, it is not that disputation is always wrong. Paul is spoken of as having disputed with critics. "And he spake boldly in the name of the Lord Jesus, and disputed against the Grecians: but they went about to slay him" (Acts 9:29). Paul is contrasting rival forms of wisdom, rival writers, and rival disputers. The dividing issue here is the correct knowledge of God. "For after that in the wisdom of God the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe" (v. 21). This is an extension of John's observation regarding Jesus. "He was in the world, and the world was made by him, and the world knew him not. He came unto his own, and his own received him not. But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name: Which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God" (John 1:10–13). Accurate knowledge about God's agent of redemption is closed to those who rely on the wisdom of this world.

Paul adopts a rhetorical technique: attributing to God the infirmities of men. "Because the foolishness of God is wiser than men; and the weakness of God is stronger than men" (v. 25). He does this in order to contrast two kinds of knowledge. He contrasts the worst of God (as if there could be a worst of God) with the best of mankind.

God's worst is superior to man's best. Paul is not saying that God is foolish. He is saying that whatever foolish men regard as the foolishness of God is nevertheless wiser than they are. The same rhetorical technique is evident in Paul's reference to the weakness of God.

4. The Great Reversal

God has a purpose in all this. "But God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty; And base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to nought things that are: That no flesh should glory in his presence" (I Cor. 1:27–29). The wisdom of this world will be confounded by that which the world's wise men regard as foolish. Similarly, the strong will be shamed by the weak. By using the base things of this world to outshine the "things that are"—the powers that be—God intends to glorify Himself.

Paul is arguing that there will someday be a great overturning by God. "I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent" (v. 19). This overturning will be comprehensive. It will elevate those who are today abased. It will tear down those who affirm the wisdom of this world. This great overturning will reveal for all to see that the world's system has rewarded those whose spiritual heirs will be forced to surrender their authority to covenant-keepers. This will be God's judgment on this world's system, i.e., its system of sanctions.

Paul is saying that there are rival systems of interpretation regarding cause and effect in history. These rival systems are irreconcilable. They are based on rival views of God, man, law, sanctions, and the future: the covenant. But the heart of the matter, he says here, is their rival views of sanctions. This is manifested in their rival interpretations of the cross as the agency of sanctions: either the world's victory over God's system of redemption, or else God's victory over this world through the bodily resurrection of His son.

B. This World and the World to Come

What constitutes the essence of this foolish world? Paul is speaking of a world that is opposed to his view of the cross. He makes this plain in his opening sentence. "For the preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness; but unto us which are saved it is the power of God” (v. 18). Men’s rival opinions regarding the cross are what separate this world from the world to come. Paul does not identify this future world by a specific time.

It could be argued that this coming world is eschatological: either eternity in contrast to time, or else a triumphant manifestation of God’s kingdom in history in contrast to the present. But this passage is not a time text. It does not provide evidence regarding the estimated time of arrival of the world to come.

Isaiah provided insight into the locus of the world to come: history. He prophesied regarding a future era in which there will still be churls. This is clearly a pre-resurrection world:

Behold, a king shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgment. And a man shall be as an hiding place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest; as rivers of water in a dry place, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land. And the eyes of them that see shall not be dim, and the ears of them that hear shall hearken. The heart also of the rash shall understand knowledge, and the tongue of the stammerers shall be ready to speak plainly. The vile person shall be no more called liberal, nor the churl said to be bountiful. For the vile person will speak villany, and his heart will work iniquity, to practise hypocrisy, and to utter error against the LORD, to make empty the soul of the hungry, and he will cause the drink of the thirsty to fail. The instruments also of the churl are evil: he deviseth wicked devices to destroy the poor with lying words, even when the needy speaketh right. But the liberal deviseth liberal things; and by liberal things shall he stand (Isa. 32:1–8).

Here we have pictured a future world in which men will act consistently with what they believe. They will also recognize the difference between the person who shows liberality and the churl. The liberal person will speak his mind openly. He will not conceal the truth. “The vile person shall be no more called liberal, nor the churl said to be bountiful.” Clearly, this is not today’s world. It was not Paul’s world, either.

Paul identifies his era as one in which foolishness reigns supreme in terms of its own pretended authority. Foolish men make judgments in terms of foolish standards. Those who are in positions of authority do not recognize the redemptive power of the cross. Not recognizing this, they are incapable of recognizing anything else clearly. Their judgment is distorted, and the proof of this is their assessment of the cross. They look at their world, and they conclude what they have initially assumed: the judgment of God does not hang over it.

In Romans 11, Paul presents a prophecy of a world blessed by God in response to the re-grafting in of the Jews.⁴ By combining Paul's prophecy with Isaiah's, we see the promise of a world to come in which men will make judgments in terms of wise standards. This is the promise of epistemological reconstruction. Men will agree with each other regarding what is foolish and what is wise.

This transformation will be more than epistemological. It will also be ethical. The epistemological question regarding what men know truly and how they can know it is always a question of regeneration. Paul writes in the next chapter: "But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned. But he that is spiritual judgeth all things, yet he himself is judged of no man. For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him? But we have the mind of Christ" (I Cor. 2:14–16).⁵ To have the mind of Christ is to be regenerated by God's grace through the power of the cross.

The world to come will be different from today's world. It will be a world in which the gospel has transformed large numbers of people. The Bible's standards of moral judgment and people's ability to make judgments in terms of these standards will be widely distributed.

Paul was writing about the cross. Men's opinions regarding the cross still divide them from one another. Most people today know nothing of the cross, and among those who have heard of God's plan of salvation, most believe that the cross is foolishness. In contrast, redeemed people believe that faith in the cross provides power: over sin, over death, over the devil. There is an irreconcilable division here. This division of opinion in history reflects the permanent division in mankind's eternal condition: the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14–15) vs. the New Heaven and New Earth (Rev. 21; 22).

C. The Question of Social Cooperation

The epistemological question is this: If rival views of what constitutes foolishness really do divide mankind, then on what basis

4. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

5. Chapter 2.

can men share accurate information? If these two interpretive frameworks really are irreconcilable, which Paul says they are, then how can men cooperate through the division of labor, including the intellectual division of labor? How can society exist? It obviously does exist. But how is this possible, given the truth of Paul's assertion regarding rival definitions of foolishness? How can fools and wise people continue to cooperate in history?

Paul elsewhere answers this question in his discussion of the human heart. He wrote to the church at Rome that the work of the law—though not the law itself—is written on the heart of every person. “For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves: Which shew the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the mean while accusing or else excusing one another” (Rom. 2:14–15).⁶ The law of God is written on the heart of every redeemed person. This has fulfilled the prophecy of Jeremiah regarding the coming covenant (Jer. 31:31–33). We read in Hebrews:

But now hath he obtained a more excellent ministry, by how much also he is the mediator of a better covenant, which was established upon better promises. For if that first covenant had been faultless, then should no place have been sought for the second. For finding fault with them, he saith, Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah: Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day when I took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt; because they continued not in my covenant, and I regarded them not, saith the Lord. For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people: And they shall not teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for all shall know me, from the least to the greatest. For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more. In that he saith, A new covenant, he hath made the first old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away (Heb. 8:6–13).

Between the covenant-keeper and the covenant-breaker, there are two epistemological-ethical connections: first, the image of God in every person; second, the work of the law written in every heart. The regeneration of one group makes the dividing issues clearer to both groups: foolishness vs. wisdom. Covenant-breakers and covenant-keepers see the differences between them ever-more clearly as each group becomes progressively more consistent with its rival presuppositions regarding the cross.

6. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 2.

This increasing self-consciousness is a liability for covenant-breakers. The more that covenant-breaking people hold back the truth in unrighteousness, as Paul said they do (Rom. 1:18), the less they can agree with each other and cooperate with each other. That is, the more ethically self-conscious they become, meaning the more consistent their behavior is with their covenant-breaking worldviews, the less they can benefit from the division of labor. They will not trust others sufficiently to become increasingly dependent on them. They will do unethical things that alienate prospective associates. They will not gain the cooperation they need to maximize their market-produced income. It is said that there is honor among thieves. As thieves become more consistent to their thievery, there will be less honor binding them. Their power will decrease.

Confessions of faith always have social, political, and cultural consequences.⁷ Confessions of faith cannot be limited to the mind. They have implications for human action. They spread from philosophy to behavior, from ideas to action. Confessions affect what individuals think. Therefore, they affect what individuals do. This means that they affect what people do jointly. A particular view of the way the world works affects the way that those who hold this view behave. Paul is saying that foolishness has consequences. Psalm 53 describes the results of foolishness: scattering.

To the chief Musician upon Mahalath, Maschil, A Psalm of David.
The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God. Corrupt are they,
and have done abominable iniquity: there is none that doeth good.
God looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand, that did seek God. Every one of them is gone back: they are altogether become filthy; there is none that doeth good, no, not one. Have the workers of iniquity no knowledge? who eat up my people as they eat bread: they have not called upon God. There were they in great fear, where no fear was:
for God hath scattered the bones of him that encampeth against thee: thou hast put them to shame, because God hath despised them. Oh that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion! When God bringeth back the captivity of his people, Jacob shall rejoice, and Israel shall be glad (Ps. 53:1–6).

7. R. J. Rushdoony, Foundations of Social Order: Studies in the Creeds and Councils of the Early Church, 3rd ed. (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1968] 1998).

D. Adam Smith on the Natural Social Order

Adam Smith's theory of individual economic motivation becomes important whenever we search for an explanation of men's cooperation. Smith argued in The Wealth of Nations (1776) that men's individual self-interest is what leads them to trade with other men. In pursuing his own self-interest, an individual voluntarily enters into exchanges with others. In this way, individual self-interest furthers social cooperation and the division of labor. This, in turn, increases output per unit of resource input.

Here are two questions that Smith had to answer. (1) How can the voluntary actions of competing individuals extend both social order and economic growth? (2) How do men's selfish actions create wealth for nations and not just wealth for themselves? Smith appealed to nature in search of answers. Smith regarded men's universal decisions to "truck and barter" as natural. That is, no one in authority needs to threaten to impose negative sanctions in order to persuade people to trade. They trade on their own authority, for their own purposes. A familiar folk phrase is this one: "Necessity is the mother of invention." Necessity here is assumed to be impersonal, imposed by scarcity, which is natural.

1. Natural Liberty

Smith extended his argument from the individual to society. There is a natural order of liberty, he said. Voluntary trade would still exist even if there were no civil governments that interfere with trade by imposing taxes, rules, and other impediments to voluntary exchange. This is what he meant by "the natural order of liberty." It was in contrast to what we might call "the unnatural order of political coercion." Throughout most of The Wealth of Nations, Smith discusses the decisions of the civil government as unnatural and restrictive. These restrictions interfere with what otherwise would take place. They undermine men's liberty, and they thereby undermine the natural growth of wealth. Smith argued that economic growth is natural. Political restrictions that curtail voluntary exchange thereby also curtail economic growth, and are therefore unnatural. He revolutionized economic theory by proclaiming economic growth as being part of the natural order of things. For millennia, at least until the Puritans' doctrine of postmillennialism, men had believed that progress is unsustainable, long term. "What goes up must come down." Nations rise and fall. Smith's theory of the wealth of nations applied to economic theory what Puritan eschatology a century earlier had applied to the doctrine of God's kingdom in history: a theory of compound economic growth.

Smith argued that scarcity in nature can be overcome through an increase in the division of labor. He began his book with what has become the most famous passage in economics: the description of the pin-makers, whose output is multiplied enormously by tools. It takes capital to create these tools. Because producers seek to increase their personal wealth by increasing the productivity of their workers, capital formation that funds innovation can steadily, "naturally" lead to the conquest of nature's scarcity. Nature's resources are scarce, Smith recognized, as did his Enlightenment peers. Smith revolutionized social theory by arguing that what is natural—scarcity—can be progressively overcome by what is also natural: the natural system of liberty. If men are simply left alone—laissez-faire—by civil government, their individual self-interest will lead them to trade with others, which will increase the traders' output, which will increase their wealth, which will increase society's wealth. The system of natural liberty, he argued, is the basis of the wealth of nations.

Smith's argument regarding the productivity of voluntary exchange soon became the central theoretical pillar of free market economics. It also became the most familiar version of what I call right-wing Enlightenment social theory. Smith moved the West's discussion of the foundations of social order from the corporate decision-making of politics to the individual decision-making in a free market. He placed the origin of economic order in the self-interested but peaceful decisions of individuals. He became the most famous and the most influential exponent of the Scottish Enlightenment tradition, which regarded social order as both unplanned and evolutionary.

2. The Problem of Sin

Smith recognized that there is a problem that is apparently not solved by the system of natural liberty: sin. How can men secure their liberty and their property from the sin-based predations of others? The universal answer is political coercion. It was also Smith's answer. Smith was not an anarchist. He believed that civil government is necessary to restrict private coercion and fraud. But he also recognized that civil government can become a tool of predation. His book emphasizes this aspect of civil government. He also believed that justice can be provided by the free market.⁸ He did not resolve this theoretical problem: the maximization of natural liberty vs. the suppression of sin. Sin is unquestionably natural.

That men are sinful was widely understood by Enlightenment social theorists. They argued that men are not totally depraved, but this did not lead them to abandon the doctrine of sin—just the Christian doctrine of original sin and the Christian doctrine of redemption. For over a century before Smith, English political theorists had taken up the challenge of Thomas Hobbes: to explain how individuals join with each other to create civil government for the sake of maintaining peace. The doctrine of the social compact was popular in Smith's day, but the establishment of this compact was understood as an event of hypothetical history, not an actual event. Enlightenment scholars knew that no group of men had come together far in the misty past to establish a society through a contract. The story of such an event was hypothetical history. It was a device for defending the legitimacy of civil government.

E. Rousseau's Rival Theory: Hypothetical History

The Enlightenment distinguished between factual history and hypothetical history: the way a sequence of events logically must have happened, even though there is no documentary evidence that it did happen this way. The classic formulation of this hypothetical approach to history is found in Part I of Rousseau's 1754 essay, "A Discourse on the Origin of Inequality."

Let us begin then by laying facts aside, as they do not affect the question. The investigations we may enter into, in treating this subject, must not be considered as historical truths, but only as mere conditional and hypothetical reasonings, rather calculated to explain the nature of things, than to ascertain their actual origin; just like the hypotheses which our physicists daily form respecting the formation of the world. Religion commands us to believe that, God Himself having taken men out of a state of nature immediately after the creation, they are unequal only because it is His will they should be so: but it does not forbid us to form conjectures based solely on the nature of man, and the beings around him, concerning what might have become of the human race, if it had been left to itself. This then is the question asked me, and that which I propose to discuss in the following discourse. As my subject interests mankind in general, I shall endeavour to make use of a style adapted to all nations, or rather, forgetting time and place, to attend only to men to whom I am speaking.⁹

8. Gary M. Anderson, "Adam Smith, Justice, and the System of Natural Liberty," Journal of Libertarian Studies, XIII (Summer 1997), pp. 1–20. This article is available on the web: <http://tinyurl.com/253t7>

Smith asserted a system of natural liberty by arguing that voluntary exchange exists naturally. Trade produces social cooperation and order; therefore, voluntary trade naturally leads to social order. Rousseau's position, presented in his book, The Social Contract (1762), appealed to a hypothetical General Will—a will that would manifest itself clearly, were it not for the distorting effects of voluntary associations. The General Will is thwarted by these local institutions and loyalties.¹⁰ The General Will is natural; voluntary associations are not.

1. The General Will

The General Will is mankind's realm of true freedom, he said. It is incarnated in the central civil government, which alone can overcome the blinding and distorting influences of localism. Individuals are blinded to the General Will by their local loyalties. A centralized state alone speaks in the name of the General Will. Men's true self-interest is found in political participation at the highest level of civil government. Of course, there remains the problem of representation. Who speaks legitimately for the state on behalf of the General Will? Rousseau was vague on this point. Modern political theory has yet to find an agreed-upon answer.

Rousseau's theory of the General Will is the antithesis of Smith's theory of natural liberty. The debate centers around the issue of the meaning of “natural.” Smith argued that what is natural is what men do naturally, on their own authority, in their own self-interest. Rousseau argued that what is natural is the social order that would exist if only men understood their true self-interest, which they cannot perceive because of the distorting influence of local and personal interests. Smith offered as evidence the visible practices of acting men: they trade voluntarily when left alone by the state. Rousseau offered hypothetical history (the social compact) and a hypothetical General Will.

9. Jean-Jacques Rousseau, A Discourse on the Origin of Inequality (1754), in The Social Contract and the Discourses, trans. G. D. H. Cole (London: Dent, 1913).

10. Robert A. Nisbet, Tradition and Revolt: Historical and Sociological Essays (New York: Random House, 1968), ch. 1: "Rousseau and the Political Community."

Smith explained the actual operations of a complex economy, not a hypothetical world somewhere over the rainbow, either in the misty past or the misty future. He did rely to some degree on a hypothetical construct in order to explain the daily workings of a free market social order: what men would do if there were no state intervention. This construct was at least partially grounded in reality: what men actually do when left alone by the state, i.e., trade. Smith offered an explanation that was also consistent with the widely accepted theory of human selfishness. His economic theory became one of the pillars of the right-wing Enlightenment’s social theory, along with his friend Edmund Burke’s defense of political localism. But his explanation was challenged by the intellectual heirs of Rousseau, who triumphed institutionally for most of the twentieth century through a series of statist political movements. By 1950, the academic and political defenders of Adam Smith’s economics were few and far between—mostly concentrated at the University of Chicago.

Rousseau’s defense of state centralization gained wide acceptance by intellectuals for over two centuries. Few political theorists followed him in his theory of the General Will, which had been the foundation of his social theory. This concept was far too metaphysical for the tastes of modern intellectuals, especially after Darwin had undermined their faith in the existence of purposeful nature. Rousseau’s political ideas were successful because he justified centralized political power in the name of individual freedom. His political theory justified the left-wing Enlightenment’s quest for political power in the name of the sovereign people.

2. The Fall of the Soviet Union

By the year 2000, Smith’s view had seemingly triumphed over Rousseau’s, although it had been rejected for two centuries by left-wing Western intellectuals. What had changed everything was the unexpected failure of the Communist Party's attempted coup in the Soviet Union, August 19–21, 1991. On December 31, 1991, the Soviet Union committed suicide. The leaders dissolved it. Nothing like this had ever happened before: the bloodless dissolution of a gigantic empire.

The visible failure of left-wing Enlightenment social theory—Marx's and especially Engels' top-down theory of social organization under socialism¹¹—in 1991 left its defenders almost speechless. Contrary to all expectations, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union had failed to maintain its power. Left-wing Enlightenment thought for two centuries had worshipped power in the name of freedom, beginning publicly with the French Revolution. The economic poverty of the Soviet Union had been visible to anyone who visited the country, but left-wing intellectuals had long denied the relevance of what they actually saw in the name of a hoped-for economic future and present-day military power.¹² The Soviet Union, in the words of Richard Grenier in the mid-1980s, was Bangladesh with missiles, but for left-wing intellectuals, Soviet society's legitimacy resided in those missiles. When the Communist Party visibly lost power in 1991, both Communism and socialism lost legitimacy among left-wing intellectuals, worldwide.

The triumph of Adam Smith's right-wing Enlightenment theory of social order through individual self-interest was achieved in intellectual circles overnight, but more by default than by widespread conversion. Intellectuals long for the good old days. They still dream of exercising political power over others. They had long believed that the exercise of such power would make society rich. Instead, it universally bankrupted every centrally planned economy. The failure was universal. Private property produces increasing per capita wealth; central planning produces economic irrationality and mindless bureaucracy. This is an unpleasant truth that left-wing intellectuals had resisted for two centuries.¹³ Smith turned out to be correct about the basis of the wealth of nations.

Smith's theory of economic coordination through impersonal free

11. Frederick Engels, "On Authority" (1873), in Marx and Engels, Collected Works, vol. 23 (New York: International Publishers, 1988), pp. 422–25.

12. Paul Hollander, Political Pilgrims: Travels of Western Intellectuals to the Soviet Union, China and Cuba, 1928–1978 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1981).

13. Tom Bethell, The Noblest Triumph: Property and Prosperity Through the Ages (New York: St. Martin's, 1998).

market forces created by individual competition—supply and demand—assumes the existence of universal standards of economic value. It assumes, above all, that men prefer more to less at any given price. This presumption remains at the heart of modern economic analysis. But there is a problem with this assumption. The Bible says regarding moral wisdom, “But he that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul: all they that hate me love death” (Prov. 8:36). This means that the rival forms of foolishness are ultimately not in agreement on values, even the values of life and death. How, then, can Christian social theorists explain social cooperation? What is the basis of the agreement that makes social cooperation possible?

G. Universally Agreed-Upon Benefits

Men are made in God’s image (Gen. 1:26). This means that they share a common perception and a common rationalism, without which social life would be impossible. This common rationalism is held back through man’s rebellion, but it cannot be completely erased from rational minds. It is sufficient to condemn men before God. It is also sufficient to enable the formation of economies and societies.

Moses told the Israelites to obey God; God would bless them if they did (Deut. 28:1–14).¹⁴ These blessings would be visible to foreigners. Foreigners would recognize the beneficial nature of these blessings. Moses said: “Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it. Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day?” (Deut. 4:5–8).¹⁵ Yet these foreigners are covenant-breakers. How can they recognize the truth?

In the modern industrial world, perhaps the greatest of all blessings is the high survival rate of children. In the second half of the twentieth century, the great child-crippling and child-killing diseases were overcome in the industrial nations, at least for the time being. Parents today can be confident that, statistically, all of their children will probably survive them. This benefit of modern civilization would be recognized as the supreme benefit, or close to it, by the vast majority of cultures throughout history. Burying one's child is one of the most emotionally painful of all events in this life. Burying more than one child during a marriage was common two centuries ago, extending back as far as recorded history extends. Smith spoke of Scottish highland women in the seventeenth century who had borne 20 children and buried 18.¹⁶ This is no longer common in the industrial West.

14. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

15. Ibid., ch. 8.

So, foolishness regarding the cross is an underlying foolishness—an ultimate foolishness—whose economic effects can be overcome in history through individual self-interest. There is an inescapable hierarchy of values associated with the image of God in man. Men hold back the truth of God in their rebellion, but it takes a supreme act of will for someone to suppress the testimony of the work of the law in his heart. This cannot be done completely. The covenant-breaker at the core of his rebellion loves death, but, like a drowning man, fights for life. He wants to stay afloat a bit longer. He will pay a great deal for a life preserver. “A horse, a horse, my kingdom for a horse,” Shakespeare put in the mouth of Richard III. We understand the king's sentiment, given his military situation.

H. Compartmentalizing Foolishness

I want to achieve certain goals. I will be able to do this only by means of assistance from others. How can I gain their assistance? Answer: by begging, by compulsion, or by offering something that others may want in exchange for their help. Smith argued that offering something in voluntary exchange is by far the most effective way to gain the cooperation of others most of the time. Trade is the way to increase one's personal wealth. But, Smith also argued, it is also the way to increase national wealth. This includes trade across national borders. If people on one side of a border are benefitting by cross-border trade, then so are people on the other side. Members of both nations are getting richer; therefore, he concluded, so are the nations.

Wealth does not make covenant-breakers any less foolish in the sight of God. They are foolish regarding Christ, the cross, the resurrection, and salvation by grace through faith. They are not necessarily foolish regarding their ability to advance themselves through voluntary trade. The kind of foolishness that Paul speaks of in this passage is spiritual. Cornelius Van Til used to say that when a person is saved by grace, he does not receive a new set of brains. He also used to say that a covenant-breaker's thinking is like a rotary saw that is set at a wrong angle. No matter how much he sharpens the blade, it will not cut properly. If a covenant-breaker is smart, he possesses a competitive advantage over a less intelligent covenant-keeper. This advantage may not be decisive, but it exists. But until he has his ethical outlook realigned, he will not cut straight. His foolishness will remain, no matter how clever he is.

16. Smith, Wealth of Nations, Bk. I, Ch. 8.

The question is: Which kind of foolishness will win the culture war? The foolishness of covenant-breakers or covenant-keepers? Covenant-breakers seem to have the advantage: there are so many of them. Most of the institutions of modern life have been designed by the use of blueprints that accommodate off-angle rotary saws. This seems to point to defeat for Christ's kingdom in history. But social reality intervenes, as does God, who has established the covenantal laws of society. The laws governing society, like the laws of economics, favor productivity. Covenant-keeping increases productivity. Many commonplaces of Western civilization reflect basic social and personal truths. "Honesty is the best policy." "A penny saved is a penny earned." (This is incorrect today: a penny saved is approximately 1.4 pennies earned, depending on your income tax bracket.) All of reality is structured in terms of God's law. Reality places constraints on all institutions. Anyone who wishes to achieve success through participation in the division of labor is pressured by reality to conform to God's social and economic laws. Institutions that were designed poorly in order to fit foolish men's off-center rotary saws will deteriorate rapidly or even collapse. The collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991 is the best example I know.

Foolishness about the cross is always a liability. Such foolishness cannot be kept perfectly compartmentalized. It flows through the moral cracks that exist in all foundations and walls. Societies progressively reflect their people's view of the cross. If the cross is power, as Paul says it is, then foolishness regarding the cross is weakness. This weakness will be progressively revealed as history moves toward its eschatological culmination.

Conclusion

Paul's concept of mankind's two kinds of foolishness points to the triumph of God's kingdom in history. The wisdom of the cross spreads into other areas of men's minds. It restructures redeemed men's vision. It recognizes God's supremacy over time and redemption's supremacy over sin. It realigns the off-angle rotary saws of this world. Over time, it produces visible wealth. Over time, men will see the difference that God's law makes economically. The foolishness of the cross produces economic success. Foolishness against the cross erodes the social foundations of apostate societies.

Paul returns to this theme later in his epistle. "Let no man deceive himself. If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wise. For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God. For it is written, He taketh the wise in their own craftiness. And again, The Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain" (I Cor. 3:18–20). God uses the confidence of the covenant-breaker to destroy his plans. In fact, even the verse Paul cites is an example of this. "He taketh the wise in their own craftiness: and the counsel of the froward is carried headlong" (Job 5:13). This was Eliphaz's admonition of Job. God later excoriated him for his criticisms of Job (Job 42:7). Eliphaz was too wise for his own good. He cited the truth, but applied it incorrectly to Job's situation.

Foolishness cannot be permanently compartmentalized. It spreads. Churls will come to no good end. Fools will fare poorly. But these developments take time to manifest themselves. Psalm 73 follows Psalm 72, but, in the history of mankind, Psalm 73 precedes Psalm 72. Psalm 73 deals with the temporary visible successes of the wicked.¹⁷ Psalm 72 deals with a righteous king whose rule transforms his society. "There shall be an handful of corn in the earth upon the top of the mountains; the fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon: and they of the city shall flourish like grass of the earth. His name shall endure for ever: his name shall be continued as long as the sun: and men shall be blessed in him: all nations shall call him blessed" (Ps. 72:16–17).

In the meantime, the image of God in all men leads almost all men to affirm certain truths, such as this one: more is better than less at the same price. Covenant-breakers and covenant-keepers can work together cooperatively in order to attain their common goal—the goal of more—even though their present presuppositions and long-term goals are at war.

17. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 17.

The nearly universal goal of increased personal wealth is made less costly to attain by means of voluntary exchange. People become wealthier when they successfully serve customers. The free market's principle of service to customers as a means to greater personal wealth is consistent with Christ's description of Christian leadership. "And he said unto them, The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors. But ye shall not be so: but he that is greatest among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that doth serve" (Luke 22:25–26).¹⁸

What is natural for natural man is not service but domination, coercion, and pillage. Hobbes' theory of man in the state of nature is closer to the truth of what natural man is than Smith's theory of the natural system of liberty. Smith lived in a Christian social order. So did Rousseau. Both men assumed what had to be proven, namely, that natural man is trustworthy. The Bible makes it plain that the more consistent natural man is with his covenant-breaking presuppositions, the less trustworthy he is. But his way of rebellion is ultimately suicidal. "But he that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul: all they that hate me love death" (Prov. 8:36). Thus, to the extent that he seeks greater personal wealth in a society that honors biblical laws that prohibit private physical coercion and theft, he must conform himself to principles of success that are denied by his presuppositions. He must become inconsistent in his thinking in order to prosper. He must abide by the work of the law that is written in his heart (Rom. 2:14–15).

18. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 51.

2

TWO KINDS OF MINDS

But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned. But he that is spiritual judgeth all things, yet he himself is judged of no man. For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him? But we have the mind of Christ (1 Cor. 2:14–16).

The theocentric issue here is the mind of Christ, which is fundamentally at odds with the mind of covenant-breaking man. The covenant-keeper possesses the mind of Christ. This distinction divides covenant-keepers from covenant-breakers. The covenant-breaker neither receives nor perceives the things of the spirit. The difference is an issue of rendering judgment: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Tainted Knowledge

Paul continues his argument regarding the two kinds of knowledge. Here, he focuses on two kinds of mind: natural and spiritual. He calls the spiritual mind “the mind of Christ.” The natural man does not receive the things of the spirit. With this assertion, Paul sets forth his case against every variety of common-ground philosophy. He distinguishes spiritual things from natural things. The natural man will not receive that which is spiritual.

How comprehensive are “the things of the spirit of God”? Are they limited to inner realms, such as personal salvation and its emotional results? Or are they limited to soul and church only? Or soul and church and family only? Are they limited to psychology? Or do they apply to the operations of physical nature? (As most people use the word “nature,” they have in mind “natural,” as distinguished from “supernatural.”) When Paul says that natural men cannot understand the things of the spirit, does he mean that they cannot understand personal salvation? Or does he mean that they cannot understand the universe?

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

The answer is found in the previous chapter of this epistle, in which Paul contrasts two kinds of foolishness.² Paul applies this contrast to men’s opinions regarding the cross and its redemptive ramifications. The natural man and the spiritual man interpret the cross differently, so they also interpret this world differently. These differences do not apply merely to isolated areas of the creation. They apply to all areas. The covenant-keeper sees this world as God’s creation. The covenant-breaker doesn’t, or else he defines both God and creation differently from what the Bible teaches.

This helps us to understand Paul’s next assertion: “But he that is spiritual judgeth all things, yet he himself is judged of no man” (v. 15). The person with the mind of Christ makes judgments regarding all kinds of things. He considers all areas of life in terms of the mind of Christ. This does not mean that he makes no mistakes. It means that his explanation of cause and effect is based on the idea of God as the Creator and Sustainer of the universe. As Paul writes elsewhere, Christians give “thanks unto the Father, which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light: Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son: In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins: Who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of every creature: For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him: And he is before all things, and by him all things consist” (Col. 1:12–17). The covenant-breaker does not give thanks for any of this.

This raises a crucial question: Can any aspect of God’s creation be accurately interpreted apart from God’s Spirit? If the answer is yes, then at least one of two conclusions follows: (1) God’s Spirit is sometimes inaccurate, since the interpreter has interpreted things differently from the Spirit’s interpretation; (2) God’s Spirit is sometimes irrelevant, since the interpreter came to the same conclusion on his own authority. On the other hand, if the answer is no, then the covenant-breaker's accurate conclusion is based on the fact that he is at some point thinking inconsistently with his own presuppositions regarding God, man, law, cause and effect, or the future. God's Spirit actively restrains him from becoming consistent and therefore destructive. He is not interpreting anything apart from God's Spirit, who restrains him. This was one of Cornelius Van Til's numerous intellectual achievements: to show that anything the covenant-breaker says that happens to be true in some narrow sense is inconsistent with his own assumptions about the autonomy of both nature and man. He comes to the truth in a limited area of his thought only because he has made a mistake in logic. He is not epistemologically self-conscious.

2. Chapter 1.

We can see Paul's opposition to a common-ground philosophy in his suggestion that the things of the spirit provide the correct interpretive framework—the presuppositions—for the non-spirit realm. The Bible's doctrine of original sin has implications for man's self-knowledge. There are, in the language of theologians, noetic effects of sin. The natural man cannot receive the things of the spirit, Paul insists. How will the natural man be able to comprehend accurately the doctrine of original sin? How will those who affirm such a doctrine find ways to persuade natural men to think and act in terms of it? These are not hypothetical questions. They are at the heart of all civil law. What is right, and what is wrong? Which acts should a civil government prohibit by law? As Rushdoony asked in 1959: By what standard.³

Paul is here speaking about the cross of Christ. "But we preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews a stumblingblock, and unto the Greeks foolishness" (I Cor. 1:23). "For I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified" (I Cor. 2:2). The spiritual nature of the message of the cross is not accurately understood by the natural man. The natural man may hear the words, but he does not understand them. Paul had already experienced this phenomenon in Athens. None of his covenant-breaking listeners accepted his message. "And when they heard of the resurrection of the dead, some mocked: and others said, We will hear thee again of this matter" (Acts 17:32).

3. R. J. Rushdoony, By What Standard? An Analysis of the Philosophy of Cornelius Van Til (Vallecito, California: Ross House [1959] 1995). (<http://bit.ly/rjrstandard>)

The cross is the message of God's comprehensive judgment: negative (the crucifixion) and positive (the resurrection). God judged Jesus Christ in history, so that Christ's covenant people will not have to suffer God's negative sanctions in eternity. God judged Jesus Christ—declared Him guilty as charged—and then executed judgment. "For he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him" (II Cor. 5:21). Then God publicly judged sin and death through Christ's bodily resurrection.

The natural man rejects knowledge that is "tainted" by spirit. He resists it. Yet, whether he believes it or not, the natural man faces a world in which all knowledge is tainted by God's Spirit. All creation testifies to the truth of God, Paul taught (Rom. 1:18–22).⁴ There is no escape from the testimony of God's Holy Spirit. Van Til once wrote that if there were one radio station that did not testify to the existence of God, natural man would listen to no other. But no such radio station exists. All creation testifies to the God of the Bible. The natural man rejects this testimony. He rejects the ideas of creation and providence.

This means that the natural man can never understand anything truly. He resists the testimony of all creation. He does not receive the things of the spirit, yet every aspect of creation testifies to God. So, he has to substitute rival explanations for the world he sees. For him, cause and effect in nature and history do not begin with the sovereign Creator God. This means that he cannot accurately understand cause and effect.

B. Rendering Judgment

Later in this epistle, Paul tells them that covenant-keepers are required to render judgment against lawless people in the congregation. They must enforce God's sanctions. "But now I have written unto you not to keep company, if any man that is called a brother be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner; with such an one no not to eat. For what have I to do to judge them also that are without? do not ye judge them that are within? But them that are without God judgeth. Therefore put away from among yourselves that wicked person" (I Cor. 5:11–13).

Covenant-keeping men are required to render judgments in history. These are comprehensive judgments. "But he that is spiritual judgeth all things, yet he himself is judged of no man" (v. 15). This is a very obscure sentence. The first half is clear: godly men lawfully do render judgments. The second half is the problem passage: "yet he himself is judged of no man." Could this mean that no man other than Christ, as the only perfect man, can legitimately lay sustainable charges before God against the spiritual man? No. The church can render such judgments in Christ's name. "Verily I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven. Again I say unto you, That if two of you shall agree on earth as touching any thing that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven" (Matt. 18:18–19). Church sanctions are a major theme in this epistle.

4. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 1.

The fact that the covenant-keeper can lawfully render judgment on others means that others with the mind of Christ can do the same to him. Later in this epistle, Paul writes: "And the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets" (I Cor. 14:32). This implies hierarchy—point two of the biblical covenant.⁴ Nevertheless, the covenant-keeper's worldview is not subordinate to the covenant-breaker's worldview. A covenant-keeper's judgments regarding the general authority of God over creation, and the Bible's authority over the minds of fallen men, cannot be judged authoritatively by covenant-breakers. This does not mean that the covenant-keeper is not subordinate to covenant-breakers who possess specialized technical knowledge, such as medicine or physics. It means that a covenant-breaker cannot legitimately speak authoritatively by means of his God-denying knowledge to challenge the covenant-keeper's confidence that God is sovereign in history.

The natural man seeks to undermine the spiritual man's commitment to the doctrine of the cross, but he cannot legitimately do this. He does not understand the cross. If this statement is correct, then Paul's sentence is a defense of the authority of the cross over the speculations of the self-professed autonomous man.

What about civil government? Can its ministers (Rom. 13:4)⁵ lawfully render judgment against a spiritual man? Yes. The natural man in civil authority has been granted limited authority by God to impose biblical civil sanctions against convicted criminals.⁶ Perhaps a spiritual man sinned and deliberately broke the law, or broke it by mistake. Or perhaps the witnesses made a mistake or rendered false judgment. This does not give to the natural man the God-given authority to judge the theological confession of the spiritual man.

4. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 2.

5. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 11.

6. Idem.

C. Economic Knowledge

Van Til denied that Christian philosophy is merely one partially valid philosophical approach among many. He said rather that Christian philosophy alone constitutes valid philosophy.⁷ By this, he did not mean that anti-Christian philosophers do not sometimes make technical points that are consistent with what the Bible reveals. He meant that anti-Christian philosophers draw narrow but accurate implications from presuppositions about this world that are inconsistent with their conclusions.⁸ The same general criticism applies to all other academic disciplines, including economics.

1. Science and Omniscience (Omni-Science)

Without the concept of an omniscient God, there can be no self-consistent science,⁹ including economic science. There can only be logical inconsistencies parading as economic science. Without the concept of original ownership by the Creator God, who has delegated ownership to individuals and organizations in history, there can only be an incomplete economic theory. The judicial and logical foundation of ownership by man is stewardship to God: the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:26–28).¹⁰ This, all modern schools of non-Christian economics deny. Christian economics directs economists' attention to the Bible in their search for accurate answers to real-world problems—answers that are not available, logically, to men who insist, for example, that it is impossible to make scientifically valid interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility, which means all of modern free market economics.¹¹

Furthermore, every system of humanist economics moves from reason to intuition when it seeks to explain what it is that economists

7. Greg L. Bahnsen, Van Til's Apologetic: Readings and Analysis (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: P&R, 1998), pp. 502–4.

8. Ibid., pp. 436–37, 451–53, 483–85.

9. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988). (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

10. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

11. Ibid., ch. 5.

know and how they can know it.¹² Intuition is irrational from the point of view of logic: something unexplained and inherently unexplainable. Economists continually draw implications for policy-makers that are based on theories that apply consistently only to a hypothetical realm in which all participants have perfect foreknowledge, or in which there are no transaction costs—search costs, negotiation costs, enforcement costs—in voluntary exchange.¹³ Even the economists' beloved supply and demand curves are based on a logical antinomy: the assumption of infinitesimal continuity from one price and one quantity to the next. But only discrete prices and quantities are subject to human evaluation and therefore to human action. The decision-maker must be able to say, "A price is exactly this much higher or lower than the next price." Contiguous prices and quantities that are represented on a continuous line, and separated by infinitesimal distances, cannot apply to or result from the world of human action. There is no measurement of "this much" that separates any pair of infinitely tiny contiguous points on an infinitely continuous line. This is why calculus has nothing to do with the logic of economics as human action. Calculus makes economics appear to be as scientifically rigorous as physics. So, calculus has been adopted by the major schools of economic interpretation, the Austrian School excepted. Members of all schools draw supply and demand curves.¹⁴

2. Economic Science and Autonomy

As a professional scholarly discipline, economics was the first to reject self-consciously any appeal to the authority of either God or morality. Late-seventeenth-century British economists believed that there can be no logical reconciliation of rival theological and moral views. They had just suffered the English Civil War (1642–49), in which warring armies fought in the name of the same God and same Bible. Economists looked instead to autonomous economic logic and economic statistics as ways to gain agreement among all rational investigators.¹⁵ This confession of faith has stripped economists of any way logically to reconcile the antinomies of autonomous man's philosophy, which includes economic philosophy. It is ironic that, of all academic fields, economics should be regarded as the one most divided, even though its early practitioners justified their supposedly morally neutral methodology in terms of attaining widespread agreement. Popular aphorisms touch on the economists' inability to come to agreed-upon conclusions. "Where there are four economists, there will be five opinions." "If you stretched all of the world's economists end to end, they would never reach a conclusion." Or President Harry Truman's classic line, "Give me a one-armed economist." This was his response to a familiar saying of economists, repeated by the Chairman of his Council of Economic Advisors: "On the one hand. . . . On the other hand. . . ."

12. Gary North, "Economics: From Reason to Intuition," in Gary North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1976).

13. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), Appendix A.

14. Ludwig von Mises never used curves, and Israel Kirzner did only in his intermediate level economics textbook, Market Theory and the Price System (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1963), which he allowed to go out of print. (<http://bit.ly/ikmtaps>) The absence of curves and lines is consistent with Austrian School presuppositions regarding methodology.

It is significant that the foundational work of modern economics, Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations (1776), begins with a chapter on the division of labor. This chapter contains the most famous passage in the literature of economics, the description of the pin-makers. Yet Smith's strategy was conceptually wrong. He should have begun with ownership, not the division of labor. There is very little space in Wealth of Nations devoted to private property, i.e., ownership.¹⁶ This turned out to be a strategic disaster for the intellectual defense of the free market, what Tom Bethell calls the economists' oversight.¹⁷ Almost immediately after Smith's book appeared, socialist thinkers began to re-structure economics in terms of ownership by the state.¹⁸ As Bethell shows, it took almost two centuries for academic economists to respond to the socialists with a rigorous theory of property rights.¹⁹

How could Smith have made such a strategic error? Why was this error not corrected early by economists? I believe that the most probable answer is the free market economists' ideology of value-free economics. The question of property raises the question of the moral right of ownership that undergirds the state's legal defense of property

15. William Letwin, The Origins of Scientific Economics (Cambridge, Massachusetts: M.I.T. Press, 1963).

16. Tom Bethell, The Noblest Triumph: Property and Prosperity Through the Ages (New York: St. Martin's, 1998), p. 97.

17. Ibid., ch. 7.

18. Ibid., chaps. 8, 12.

19. Ibid., ch. 20.

rights. In contrast, the economists could, they believed, speak authoritatively in a morally neutral manner regarding questions of the division of labor. But, when it comes to property rights—"This bread is mine!"²⁰—there is no intellectually honest way to avoid the issue of moral legitimacy. Free market economists nevertheless do their best to avoid the question of the moral basis of the right of private ownership. In the modern academic essay most notable for its discussion of the allocation of property rights by civil courts, R. H. Coase's "The Problem of Social Cost" (1960),²¹ the author deliberately and openly leaves aside questions of equity.²² This essay has become one of the most widely and approvingly cited essays in the world of academic economics. It became by far the most cited law review article ever written.²³ In the late 1960's, it became the basis of a new academic sub-discipline: law and economics. In 1991, Coase won the Nobel Prize in economics, in part for this essay. The next year, his colleague at the University of Chicago, Gary Becker, won the Nobel Prize for his application of Coase's theorem to the field of crime and punishment. He, too, is adamant about removing questions of morality from the field of law and economics.²⁴

I began my introductory 1987 book on economics with the doctrine of God's original ownership of the world.²⁵ I am aware of no other book on economics that does.

Conclusion

Paul here provides Christians with the confidence necessary to challenge covenant-breakers who are in positions of leadership. The natural man does not receive the things of the spirit, Paul says. But things of the spirit encompass everything. There can be no neutrality. God, as the Creator, Sustainer, and Redeemer, must be honored. To

20. The title of a book by the anarchist, Robert Lefevre.

21. R. H. Coase, "The Problem of Social Cost," Journal of Law and Economics, III (1960), pp. 1–44.

22. Gary North, The Coase Theorem: A Study in Epistemology (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1992). See also North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), Appendix H.

23. Fred R. Shapiro, "The Most Cited Law Review Articles Revisited," Chicago-Kent Law Review (1996), p. 751.

24. Gary North, "Undermining Property Rights: Coase and Becker," The Journal of Libertarian Studies, XVI (Fall 2002), pp. 90–97. (<http://bit.ly/CoaseBecker>)

25. Gary North, Inherit the Earth (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/gninherit>)

ignore God is to ignore the only possible basis for accurately comprehending the world. This is Paul's challenge to every doctrine of common-ground knowledge. To ignore God's revelation of Himself in the Bible is also to ignore the only possible basis for accurately comprehending the world. "All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness: That the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works" (II Tim. 3:16–17).

This is the philosophical basis for the reconstruction of all academic disciplines in terms of the Bible. This is also the philosophical basis for reconstructing all institutions in terms of the Bible. There is no neutrality. It is not sufficient for Christians to affirm this slogan. Christians should not expect to beat something with nothing. If there is no neutrality, then there must be biblically sanctioned alternatives to the present cross-denying world order. It is the task of Christians to search for these alternatives and defend them whenever they are discovered. It is also their task to seek to implement them.

In the field of economic theory, Christian economists should begin with an affirmation of God's ownership of the creation. They should then consider in detail God's delegation of authority to men to serve as His stewards. Then they should discuss the laws of economics as God-imposed laws. Then they should discuss economic cause and effect in terms of God's law. Finally, they should discuss long-term economic growth in terms of corporate and individual covenant-keeping and covenant-breaking. Covenant-keepers will inherit the earth. Christian economics should explain why.

3

FINAL JUDGMENT AND KINGDOM CONTINUITY

According to the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise masterbuilder, I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon. For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ. Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire (I Cor. 3:10–15).

The theocentric issue here is the final judgment: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ Christ is the foundation of the covenant-keeper's life, as well as the work of the kingdom. Final judgment is his motivation. The end-point historically should be the Christian's starting-point motivationally.

A. How Firm a Foundation

Paul begins this section with a warning to the church. The church had divided into factions. Each faction's members professed personal commitment to a founder. The two mentioned were Paul and Apollos (v. 4). Paul derides this divisiveness by calling attention to God as the One who brings men's work to fruition. "So then neither is he that planteth any thing, neither he that watereth; but God that giveth the increase" (v. 7). Nevertheless, Paul goes on to say that he did lay a foundation in Corinth. It was by the grace of God that he was able to do this, but he did lay it. He did not finish it. Others have added to his work. This points to the division of labor within the church, a theme he returns to in chapter 12.² He is talking about the church as a corporate entity.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

Paul then adds a warning. “But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon.” Paul had done his work in laying a foundation at Corinth. Others must now follow his example. They must add to the beginning that he has made. They must consider carefully what they are doing. This is a call to kingdom productivity. The context is the church planted in Corinth by Paul and Apollos. The general principle here is God’s call to men to work on God’s behalf. Men are responsible before God to perform effectively.

Paul in this epistle so far has led his readers through a discussion of two kinds of foolishness and another discussion of two kinds of minds. A covenant-keeper possesses the mind of Christ (I Cor. 2:16). He can perceive the world around him analogously to the way that Christ views it. He is spiritual. He can make accurate judgments as a representative of Christ. Now Paul tells his listeners that they have a responsibility to extend Paul’s original efforts. This has to mean work in building up the local church.

Paul speaks of laying a foundation. He has laid one in Corinth. What is its nature? “For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ” (v. 11). Christ is the foundation. Each covenant-keeper is told to build on this foundation. No man can lay such a foundation on his own. This foundation is provided by God’s grace. Once in place, covenant-keepers should build upon it. So, when Paul says that he laid a foundation, he is not saying that he laid it independently of Christ. Christ lays the initial foundation. When Paul speaks of his work in laying a foundation, he means his early work in church planting. But this work was possible only because Paul had stood on Christ’s foundation when he laid the one in Corinth.

Constructing a foundation in Corinth was merely an extension of the sacrificial work that Christ had performed on the cross. The cross is a continuing theme in First Corinthians. “For I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified” (I Cor. 2:2). First, there was the crucifixion; then there was the resurrection. “And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished. If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable. But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the firstfruits of them that slept" (I Cor. 15:17–20).

2. Chapter 13.

For a man coming into this work in Corinth, because Paul had finished laying the foundation, his work would extend Paul's, which had extended Christ's. Paul is speaking of progress through time. There is a visible extension of Christ's kingdom. The person following Paul should look back at Paul's efforts and then further back to Christ's. His work has meaning because it rests on a foundation originally laid by Christ, not by Paul. It is God who gives the increase. Christ had laid the foundation through His representatives. Paul is saying that God gets all the glory. God's son laid the foundation, and then God then gave the increase. Paul's work was part of that increase. But the Corinthians were dividing in the name of human founders. This is wrong, Paul says. Forget about the human founders. Look back to Christ's work on the cross and to God as the supplier of all success.

He tells those who are building up the congregation, or who will soon join in this effort, to pay attention to the quality of their work. They will build upon a foundation laid by Paul. "I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon" (v. 10b). He has just dismissed the importance of his own work, yet here he calls them to take care in building on his work. How can we reconcile this seeming dualism?

Paul sees himself as an extension of Christ—not of Christ's being, but of His work. Paul sees himself as an appendage to Christ. "I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me" (Gal. 2:20). Through the cross of Christ, Paul has become the embodiment of Christ. He does not mean embodiment by incarnation; he means embodiment by representation. "Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ. Now I praise you, brethren, that ye remember me in all things, and keep the ordinances, as I delivered them to you" (I Cor. 11:1–2).³ Paul tells them to take great care in their work. Paul wants them to work well. They should do as he had done. They should build on Christ's foundation. They should become extensions of Christ by building on His foundation, just as Paul was an extension of Christ.

3. Chapter 12.

This view of covenant-keepers' labor validates good work. Paul tells them to be sure they consider their work carefully. They have received grace in being allowed to build upon what Christ had laid at Calvary and what Paul had built in Corinth. They were participating in building the kingdom of God. Their work was a visible manifestation of God's kingdom. They were supposed to take care in doing the right work and doing it well.

B. Final Judgment and Continuity

Paul moves from the past—laying Christ's foundation—to the future. "Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is" (vv. 12–13). There are differences in the quality of construction. Some construction is much better than others. Some has high value. Some has low value. Some has no value.

Paul's warning here makes it inescapably clear that there is continuity between a person's work in this world and his rewards in the world to come. Men lay personal foundations in this life. They reap appropriate rewards in the next life. There are distinctions of performance in this life. There will also be distinctions of rewards in the coming life. God notes the quality of each man's performance in history and will reward him accordingly on the day of judgment.

The way in which rewards will be collected is significant. Our works will be tried by fire. This means that they are tried by God's standards. The sanction is fire. This is not hellfire. It does not refer to the lake of fire. It refers to God's judgment of a person's temporal works, not his immortal soul. "If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire" (v. 15). This is the fire of judicial purgation. It burns off impurities. In metallurgy, the fire burns off the base metals.

The fire of God's final judgment will test the quality of each man's work. This idea is a New Testament application of the Old Covenant's doctrine of God's historical judgment. Paul applies it to final judgment, a doctrine which was not clearly stated in the Old Covenant. In both cases, the imagery of the smelter appears.

The words of the LORD are pure words: as silver tried in a furnace of earth, purified seven times (Ps. 12:6).

Therefore saith the Lord, the LORD of hosts, the mighty One of Israel, Ah, I will ease me of mine adversaries, and avenge me of mine enemies: And I will turn my hand upon thee, and purely purge away thy dross, and take away all thy tin (Isa. 1:24–25).

The bellows are burned, the lead is consumed of the fire; the founder melteth in vain: for the wicked are not plucked away (Jer. 6:29).

Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts, Behold, I will melt them, and try them; for how shall I do for the daughter of my people? (Jer. 9:7).

Paul warns against the combustible trio of wood, hay, and stubble. After they are burned, nothing remains. A life of wood, hay, and stubble is worth living, but just barely. Their exclusive presence means that a God-fearing man has frittered away his life. He will escape the horrors of God's eternal fire (Rev. 20:15), but he will bring nothing with him into the world beyond. Passing through the judicial fire of final judgment will strip him of his legacy, his inheritance. This warning is consistent with Jesus' warning against laying up treasure in this world, and laying it up for the next world (Matt. 6:19–20).⁴

This passage refutes the doctrine that “you can't take it with you.” Jesus and Paul taught clearly that you can take it with you if you send it ahead in advance. We can surrender insecure ownership of assets that possess high value in this world in order to gain secure ownership of assets with permanently high value in heaven and (presumably) after the resurrection. Assets that possess value exclusively in this world are represented by Paul's trio of wood, hay, and stubble. Christ called them treasures that moth corrupts and thieves break in and steal (Matt. 6:20). Their present value is high, but only because natural men's time horizons are too short. Natural men do not see the personal value of assets collected beyond the grave. Economically speaking, they discount the infinity of eternity by a rate of interest that approaches infinity as a limit. They impute very low or no value to eternity. Paul calls on the Corinthians to abandon the mind of natural man and exercise the mind of Christ.

The phrase, “you can't take it with you,” is based on the natural man's short-sighted view of the future. What natural men possess in history they regard as bounded by death. This assumption is incorrect. This false assumption can lead to a false conclusion: “Consume it all before you die.” This is the outlook of the squanderer. The prodigal son of the parable is the best-known New Testament example (Luke 15).⁵ But an earth-bound time horizon can also lead to another conclusion: “Lay up treasure before you die.” Men seek a false immortality by the fame of their reputations as rich or powerful. Christ’s parable of the rich man who planned to build storage barns is representative of the asset-accumulator. “And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry. But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then whose shall those things be, which thou hast provided? So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God” (Luke 12:19–21).⁶ Both attitudes are symptoms of the same short time horizon. The first man risks running out of wealth before he runs out of time. The second man risks running out of time before he runs out of wealth. Both men have misunderstood the recommended exchange of assets: temporal for eternal.

4. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 13.

Paul is as emphatic as Jesus: you can take it with you. We need to understand this asset-exchange program. Jesus called on His followers to help the helpless. A person with many assets should voluntarily use them to help those people with few assets. Paul here calls on his readers to consider carefully the use of their time and any other assets they possess. He warns them to consider carefully what kind of work they will perform in history. Will it be of the asset-transfer variety—silver, gold, jewels—which of course are not literally silver, gold, and jewels? One surrenders literal silver, gold, and jewels in this life to fund good projects, in order to collect non-literal silver, gold, and jewels beyond the grave. Literal silver, gold, and jewels that are kept in storage for use exclusively in this life will be transformed retroactively into wood, hay, and stubble at the final judgment. We could say that God’s retroactive imputation of value to each Christian’s work will reduce the value of literal silver, gold, and jewels to that of literal wood, hay, and stubble.

Paul is speaking of assets hoarded for their own sake. He is not speaking of capital that is accumulated in order to generate income for kingdom projects. He is not saying, for example, that Christians or churches or ministries should not open bank accounts. He is not criticizing thrift. He is not saying that capital which covenant-keepers accumulate should be sold to covenant-breakers, thereby transferring to God's enemies the tools of production. Paul is saying only what Jesus said: if the temporal goal of the Christian capitalist is the multiplication of capital for its own sake, and for the sake of his own fame, then he is trapped in the worship of mammon. He has substituted the worship of the created for the worship of the Creator.

5. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 37.

6. Ibid., ch. 25.

Paul uses wood, hay, and stubble as images that represent all forms of temporal advantage. The pursuit of anything temporal for its own sake constitutes the accumulation of a form of wealth that will not survive the judicial fire of final judgment. Such wealth does not possess post-historical continuity. Its continuity is strictly temporal. The Bible testifies against everything that is strictly temporal.

C. Imagination and Judgment

Paul is trying to persuade his readers to take care in assessing the present value of the world beyond the grave. He is also telling them to assess the future value of their present assets. He is asking them to imagine the final judgment. From the vantage point of the final judgment, he tells them, look back at the work you are doing today in terms of how God will assess its value retroactively. Impute economic value to your efforts, but impute it in terms of God's retroactive judgment. Use the mental image of the last judgment to enable yourself to see things God's way today.

Paul is saying that covenant-keepers have the ability to think God's thoughts after Him. They can use their imaginations regarding the final judgment to help them in making better judgments in the present. Paul says that they can imagine the last judgment. Jesus told His followers the same thing (Matt. 25:31–46). This ability should become a source of Christians' knowledge of God's present assessment of their efforts.

Paul has already told them that covenant-keepers possess the mind of Christ. This announcement was preparatory to his discussion of final judgment. Because they possess the mind of Christ, covenant-keepers possess the ability to assess accurately the value of their efforts in building up God's kingdom. They can do this through an act of future-oriented imagination: passing retroactive judgment on their present actions. They impute value in the present because they can imagine God's retroactive imputation of value at the final judgment. They work from an imaginative future to assess the present. So does the covenant-breaker, who also imagines the outcome of his actions. The difference is, the Christian can imagine a post-historical retroactive imputation. This ability does not come naturally. It comes supernaturally. The natural man does not receive the things of the spirit.

Because covenant-keepers have been provided with information about God's final judgment—sanctions—they should search their Bibles for information regarding the standards that will be used by God to impose those future sanctions. This means that they must learn the specifics of the commandments.

And hereby we do know that we know him, if we keep his commandments (I John 2:3).

He that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him (I John 2:4).

And whatsoever we ask, we receive of him, because we keep his commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in his sight (I John 3:22).

And he that keepeth his commandments dwelleth in him, and he in him. And hereby we know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit which he hath given us (I John 3:24).

By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God, and keep his commandments (I John 5:2).

For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments: and his commandments are not grievous (I John 5:3).

And this is love, that we walk after his commandments. This is the commandment, That, as ye have heard from the beginning, ye should walk in it (II John 1:6).

The obvious question is this: Where do we find these commandments? In the New Testament only, or in the Old Testament, too? This is the debate over theonomy.⁷ There are comparatively few commandments in the New Testament, and I can think of only four that are aimed at magistrates in civil government. These mandate the honest carrying out of a magistrate's assignment, not the content of the civil law. These rules were provided by John the Baptist, not Jesus (Luke 3:12–14).⁸ So, if the righteous goal of both the citizen and the civil magistrate is to obey God's commandments, then God's laws governing civil government must be available somewhere. They are: in the Old Testament.

7. Gary North (ed.), Theonomy: An Informed Response (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991). (<http://bit.ly/gntheon>) Greg L. Bahnsen, Theonomy in Christian Ethics, 3rd ed. (Nacogdoches, Texas: Covenant Media Foundation, 2002); Bahnsen, By This Standard: The Authority of God's Law Today (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1985). (<http://bit.ly/gbbts>) ; Bahnsen, No Other Standard (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991). (<http://bit.ly/gbnos>)

D. The Continuity of Expansion

Paul tells his readers that they must pay attention to their work, which extends the work of Paul and Christ. Then he tells them to pay attention to the final judgment. Some of their work will not survive the application of God's purifying judicial fire. They may have meant well, but good intentions are not enough. There must be conformity between what covenant-keepers do in life and what God wants each of them to do. The question is: What has God predestinated each person to do? Elsewhere, Paul wrote: "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: Not of works, lest any man should boast. For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them" (Eph. 2:8–10). The Greek word translated here as "before ordained" appears in only one other place in the New Testament: "What if God, willing to shew his wrath, and to make his power known, endured with much longsuffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction: And that he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, which he had afore prepared unto glory" (Rom. 9:22–23). It means "prepare before." God has laid out our paths. We must walk in them. "The king's heart is in the hand of the LORD, as the rivers of water: he turneth it whithersoever he will" (Prov. 21:1).

Thus, Christians' efforts are not random. They are part of a plan in which every fact fits together. Paul says to consider carefully our work. This work is not strictly personal. It is part of a long-term program of kingdom-building. The foundation has been laid by Christ at Calvary. Now it is each covenant-keeper's task to build upon this foundation. These efforts are part of God's verbal decree. "So shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth: it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it” (Isa. 55:11). He spoke the universe into existence (Gen. 1). Now, he speaks His kingdom into existence by way of covenant-keepers.

8. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 2.

There is kingdom continuity through the ages. God has decreed what will come to pass. He has decreed the good works that His people will perform. He has given them His law. Paul reminds them that they must take heed how they build on a foundation laid by others. Each person is fully responsible for his own efforts. God coordinates these efforts in order to build His kingdom. There is continuity through the ages.

The end of this phase of the construction process is the final judgment. There will be continuity beyond the final judgment. God will reward His servants in terms of the value of their efforts. There will be distinctions of rewards. This should serve as a major motivation for covenant-keepers to take care in their work. What they do in history will have implications beyond the grave.

Conclusion

The Bible does not indicate what men will do with their rewards in the post-judgment New Heavens and New Earth (Rev. 21; 22). There will be an inheritance. “He that overcometh shall inherit all things; and I will be his God, and he shall be my son” (Rev. 21:7). We are not told what this inheritance will be. Paul teaches that there will be rewards, and that these rewards will be significant as indications of the value to God of each person’s work in history. We are told that it is better to receive rewards than not receive them, but we are not told anywhere in the Bible what people will do with them after the final separation of the sheep from the goats (Matt. 25:31–46). We are not told whether a man’s rewards will serve as a his initial capital base in the resurrection world, or whether they will serve only as medals of honor. There will be treasures in heaven based on what men have done in history. “But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal” (Matt. 6:20).⁹ We are not told what we will do with these heavenly treasures. There is continuity from this life into heaven. There is also continuity from this life into final judgment. We are not told the nature of the continuity beyond the final judgment, only that there will be an inheritance.

9. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 13.

Paul's injunction to pay attention to one's work is part of his overall message to the Corinthians. He tells his readers that their work has value today, but this value is imputed by God. They should look into the future, to the day of final judgment, and then consider retroactively God's judgment on their life's efforts. This should aid them in assessing their callings before God.

What covenant-keepers do in each era of history will have consequences for later eras. It will also have consequences in eternity, both individually and corporately for the church. Paul reminds them that what Christ did at Calvary has laid the foundation. No other foundation can any man lay better than this one. Needless to say, the proof of the superiority of this foundation will not be the failure of the church in history to complete its task. God predestined the cross. "And truly the Son of man goeth, as it was determined: but woe unto that man by whom he is betrayed!" (Luke 22:22). He has long ago predestined each covenant-keeper's good works: "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them" (Eph. 2:10). He has not predestinated cultural defeat for His kingdom in history.

4

DEFINITIVE DELEGATED OWNERSHIP

For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God. For it is written, He taketh the wise in their own craftiness. And again, The Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain. Therefore let no man glory in men. For all things are yours; Whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours; And ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's (I Cor. 3:19–23).

The theocentric principle here is God's ownership of the world. This is based on His absolute sovereignty over the world.¹

A. Conflict Over Ownership

Paul in this section of the epistle presents two worldviews. One is biblical; the other is anti-biblical. In the eyes of each group, the other's outlook is foolish. There can be no reconciliation between these two views. They are based on rival presuppositions regarding the world.

Paul says that God regards the wisdom of this world as foolish. The Greek word for "world" is kosmos. A few verses later, Paul says that "For all things are yours; Whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours; And ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's." The same work appears: kosmos. So, there is a conflict between the wisdom of this world and the owner of this world. The owner regards as foolish the wisdom of those who are described as "the world."

1. Rival Claims

This conflict is covenantal. There are rival claimants for ownership. Those who are members of the kingdom of Satan assert ownership rights to the world. Paul speaks of them here as the world. The Christians in Paul's day were few in number. Yet Paul says here that they possessed title to this world. How can this be? On what basis could Paul have made such a claim?

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1.

Satan gained control in history by deceiving Eve and successfully tempting Adam (I Tim. 2:13). Adam had been the delegated owner of the world (Gen. 1:26–28).² He was God's covenantal agent. But when he challenged God's law, he did so as an agent of Satan. He listened to his wife, who had listened to the serpent, who was Satan's delegated agent. By accepting Satan's interpretation of the forbidden fruit, Adam transferred his covenantal allegiance from God to Satan. This has always been the basis of Satan's ownership claims in history. But he holds title only as a squatter. Adam forfeited his title and therefore also the lawful inheritance of mankind by rebelling against God. Only because of God's grace to Adam and to mankind in general (Gen. 3:15) has covenant-breaking mankind, and therefore Satan, retained operational control over most of the world.

Paul writes in this epistle about Christ's resurrection. Christ, he tells the Corinthians, is the last Adam. "And so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit" (I Cor. 15:45). The literal, bodily resurrection of the last Adam is the basis of our faith, Paul says. If Christ was not resurrected, our faith is in vain (I Cor. 15:14, 19).

Because of Calvary, Christ has re-established ownership claims over the world. In His post-resurrection instruction of His disciples, Christ announced this: "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth" (Matt. 28:18b). Given by whom? Here, Paul makes it clear: God the Father. Christ belongs to God. He is the last Adam. Christ representatively re-established redeemed mankind's covenantal allegiance to God the Father. He has therefore restored the pre-Fall hierarchical system of ownership: God > covenant-keeping man > world. God the Father has identified Christ as His delegated agent in history. Christ, by His literal bodily resurrection, publicly demonstrated this restoration of the pre-Fall hierarchy. Christians belong to Christ through adoption (John 1:12). In the same way that God has delegated ownership of this world to Christ, Christ has delegated ownership of this world to His people.

2. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, chaps. 3, 4.

2. Victory Over Death

In this passage, Paul tells the Corinthians that they are possessors of all things. This includes death. This is a strange concept. How do Christians own death? Through Christ, who now controls death. “And when I saw him, I fell at his feet as dead. And he laid his right hand upon me, saying unto me, Fear not; I am the first and the last: I am he that liveth, and was dead; and, behold, I am alive for evermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell and of death” (Rev. 1:17–18). Death serves God’s purposes, and therefore the purposes of covenant-keepers, by cutting short the work of covenant-breakers, but extending the work of His people through covenantal continuity.

Death is the great enemy of man. Death is the curse that God placed on Adam in the garden, as promised. Death, Paul writes later in this epistle, is the last enemy. Death will be finally overcome after Christ has brought all things visibly under His authority.

For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order: Christ the firstfruits; afterward they that are Christ’s at his coming. Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith, all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted, which did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all (I Cor. 15:22–28).³

Paul’s words here say specifically, “For he hath put all things under his feet” (v. 27a). This has already taken place, as Christ told the disciples. Yet it is obvious that death is not yet subdued. So, there is a distinction between what has been done, what is the case now, and what will be done. Theologians assign this description whenever they encounter such a past-present-future condition: definitive, progressive, final. It describes personal sanctification. It also describes the kingdom of God.

God has put all things under Christ’s feet, yet some things remain to be put under Christ’s feet. What can this mean? God definitively placed all things under Christ’s authority immediately after the resurrection. Christ announced this to the disciples. He achieved a visible victory over death by His resurrection. This is the key fact of Christianity, Paul writes in chapter 15, without which Christians' faith would be in vain. This victory was definitive. It was a visible victory that in principle marked the defeat of God's curse in history. Christ, as the last Adam, publicly reversed God's curse on heirs of the first Adam. Yet death still operates. What was definitive with Christ has not yet been made final by Christ. It will be, Paul insists, but this will mark the culmination of history.

3. Chapter 16.

The judgment of God on Adam has been definitively removed, Paul says. It will be finally removed. What about in between? Isaiah said that death's curse will be progressively removed.

For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people: and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying. There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed. And they shall build houses, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them (Isa. 65:17–21).⁴

Mankind's long life spans during the pre-Mosaic era will be restored. Death will still operate, but not as it does today. There will be an era of visible victory over death—incomplete, but statistically significant. (One economic manifestation of this change will be a reduction of life insurance premiums.)

So, there are three phases of Christ's victory over death: definitive (I Cor. 15:12), progressive (Isa. 65:20), and final (I Cor. 15:26). Paul encourages the Corinthians in their testimony, despite the fact that the world regards this testimony as foolish.

3. An Analogous Transfer of Ownership

Paul asserts Christ's definitive victory over death at Calvary. He also asserts Christ's final victory over death as the last enemy to be subdued. Isaiah announced covenant-keepers' progressive victory over death. It is in the context of his discussion of death that Paul brings up the issue of cosmic ownership. He lists death as one of the things possessed by the Corinthians.

4. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 15.

What does it mean, to own death? It means that death, as an aspect of the creation, is under the God-delegated authority of Christ, who has in turn delegated authority to His people. Life and death belong to the Corinthians, Paul says. So does the present and the future. All things are under their ownership. God owns Christ, Christ owns His people, and they own the world.

It was clear to the Corinthians that they did not run the affairs of Corinth. As Corinthians, they were under the judicial authority of Rome. Then in what way were they owners of the world? In the same way that they controlled death: definitively. They would die in history, but the resurrection was ahead for them. They possessed legal title to this final resurrection unto life. As covenant-keepers, they also possessed the progressive victory over death that had been prophesied by Isaiah. Through their covenantal heirs, they possessed this progressive victory over death. The same three-fold title to the world was also theirs. Definitively, title had officially passed at the resurrection from God to the last Adam, Christ. Progressively, it is the task of Christians to redeem the world—buy it back from covenant-breakers—as lawful agents of God. Finally, covenant-keepers will inherit.

For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD,
they shall inherit the earth (Ps. 37:9).

But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace (Ps. 37:11).

Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth (Matt. 5:5).

The meek before God will exercise dominion finally. They already exercise it definitively. The debate today is over the exercise of dominion progressively.

B. Progressive Redemption

Elsewhere, I have written about Christ's comprehensive redemption of the world.⁵ Wherever sin reigns in history, there we find an area of life fit for redemption. The word “redeem” means “buy back.” Christ bought back the world at Calvary, not from Satan, but from God the Father. Adam in his sin had surrendered ownership back to God, the original Owner, on behalf of mankind. It is a mistake to conclude that Satan lawfully received the transfer of delegated ownership. Adam did not possess the authority to make such a transfer. Satan is therefore a squatter on stolen land.

5. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C. (<http://bit.ly/>

Adam broke the terms of the lease. He was judicially therefore disinherited by God. Only on the basis of God’s grace to Adam could mankind continue to fulfill the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:26–28). God looked forward to Christ’s work at Calvary as the basis of grace for Adam and his heirs, whether special grace (soul-saving) or common grace (culture-continuing).⁶

The definitive repurchase of the world on behalf of covenant-keeping mankind took place at Calvary. This transfer of ownership to covenant-keeping mankind will be manifested for all to see on judgment day. But what about history? How is this cosmic redemption to be manifested?

Christ came as a servant. He made it clear that His disciples are to continue His work of service. “But Jesus called them to him, and saith unto them, Ye know that they which are accounted to rule over the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and their great ones exercise authority upon them. But so shall it not be among you: but whosoever will be great among you, shall be your minister: And whosoever of you will be the chiefest, shall be servant of all. For even the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many” (Mark 10:42–45). The progressive redemption of the world is to be achieved through faithful service to men in the name of God. Paul fully understood this. He told the Roman church, “Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord. Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head” (Rom. 12:19–20).⁷ He was quoting Proverbs. “If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink: For thou shalt heap

gnworld)

6. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

7. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 10.

coals of fire upon his head, and the LORD shall reward thee” (Prov. 25:21–22).⁸

Service to covenant-breakers imposes God’s positive sanctions—economic success or grudging acceptance—as well as negative sanctions on covenant-breakers: coals of fire. The principle of service is also the heart of free market economic theory and practice. Producers serve customers. When they are successful, they earn income. Christians are supposed to be good stewards of God’s resources by imitating Christ in His office as a servant. They are to buy back the world in a way analogous to Christ’s purchase of redemption on their behalf. They extend the kingdom of God in history by serving others, by preaching the gospel, and by becoming more competent producers.

In every realm of life, Christians are supposed to strive to be better performers than covenant-breakers. They represent the Redeemer of the world. They should therefore be superior performers. Paul later tells the Corinthians, “Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ” (I Cor. 11:1). The Greek word for “followers” means “imitators” or “mimics.” Paul represented Christ; they are to mimic him. He served; they must also serve. They will extend God’s kingdom in history, just as Paul did. It is Christ’s kingdom because He is owned by God, and His followers are owned by Him. “And ye are Christ’s; and Christ is God’s” (I Cor. 3:23).

Christians buy back the world progressively because Christ has bought it back definitively. They can do this as representative agents of Christ because they belong to Christ, just as Christ belongs to God. There is a hierarchy of ownership: from God the Father to Jesus Christ, as the last Adam, to His followers. The definitive ownership of the world is Christ’s, by way of Calvary. The definitive ownership of the world is Christians’, by way of their definitive redemption by God’s imputation of Christ’s perfection to them.

C. Eschatology and Economics

Eschatology affects how Christians view the future, both progressively and finally. Each eschatological interpretation has implications for social theory. Each has implications for economic theory.

The amillennialist denies that Isaiah’s prophecy should be taken literally. Somehow, the passage does not really prophesy the extension of mankind's life spans. Amillennialist theologian Anthony Hoekema took this approach.⁹ All the others implicitly do, if they even acknowledge the text's existence. There will supposedly be no progressive extension of Christ's definitive victory over death. There will be a final victory over death, but not a progressive victory that is tied to the extension of God's kingdom in history. This implies that the progressive extension of God's kingdom in history will not affect either society or economy in any long-term sense. So, the amillennialist concludes, Paul's assertion of a link between death and ownership in this passage has no literal implications for history.

8. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 76.

Premillennialists make the same assumptions that amillennialists do with respect to the era of the church prior to Christ's bodily return to establish a millennial kingdom in person. A premillennialist would admit that Paul's statement here is valid with respect to definitive death and ownership, but the historical application of both the death and ownership principles must await a discontinuous future event, namely, the bodily return of Christ. Any significant progressive manifestations of Christ's definitive victory over death or His definitive ownership in history must await the establishment of His millennial reign, which will not be delegated from heaven but rather from some earthly headquarters. While Satan's disciples are acknowledged by premillennialists as reigning visibly in history without the physical presence of Satan, premillennialists deny Christians the same degree of authority in history. Christians will supposedly never reign visibly in history apart from Christ's physical presence.

The postmillennialist argues differently. He teaches that the progressive manifestations of Christ's definitive victory at Calvary will take place in history, even though Christ will remain at His Father's side in heaven. God's system of delegated ownership—from Christ to His people—will be progressively manifested in history despite His bodily absence. The ascension of Christ to the right hand of God has empowered Christians through the sending of the Holy Spirit. "But when the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me" (John 15:26). Christ's return in final judgment will come only after God has visibly put all things under His feet, Paul says in chapter 15. The means of this extension of Christ's visible ownership in history must come through progressive redemption: Christians' buying back of the world progressively from covenant-breakers as proof of their faithful stewardship as adopted sons.¹⁰

9. Anthony Hoekema, The Bible and the Future (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1979), p. 202.

Conclusion

Paul here teaches that everything in the world belongs to Christians because everything belongs to Christ. But what is definitive is not yet final. Between Christ's definitive victory over death and sin at Calvary and the final judgment of the world must come the progressive redemption of the world by Christ's covenantal representatives. They must buy back the world progressively on His behalf because He has bought it back definitively on their behalf. He has definitively validated God's gracious extension of the dominion covenant to mankind after Adam's rebellion. The dominion covenant has been definitively established by God with the second Adam, Jesus Christ, and through Him with covenant-keepers.

Satan still occupies most of the world as an illegal squatter. He occupies through his covenantal agents, just as he did before Calvary. He does not occupy a physical throne in history. Neither does Jesus Christ. The covenantal competition for ownership of the world takes place in history through representatives of rival original claimants, both of whom are supernatural and beyond history. Legal title is now held by Jesus Christ, Paul says, and by His covenantal representatives through Christ. This fact will be made manifest to everyone on judgment day, but it will become progressively visible even before, as Isaiah taught regarding death (Isa. 65:17–20).

The comprehensive repurchase of the world by covenant-keepers must come about through their faithful, law-abiding service to God through their efficient service to men. This progressive, comprehensive redemption of the world is denied by amillennialists and, with respect to the era prior to Christ's bodily return to set up an earthly kingdom, by premillennialists. Both groups admit that this redemption was definitively achieved by Christ at Calvary. They also admit that it will be finally achieved at the day of judgment. Amillennialists deny that it will be progressively achieved by Christ's covenantal agents in history. Premillennialists deny that it will be done before Christ's bodily return. Both groups believe that economic capital that is devoted to the redemption of anything except souls, Christian families, churches, and skid-row rescue missions is wasted in this, the church age. They think that efforts to redeem society as a whole are the equivalent of polishing brass on a sinking ship, as dispensationalist radio pastor J. Vernon McGee once put it. When this pessimistic vision of the earthly future is widely shared, Christians rarely have the motivation to strive for a lifetime in the hope of becoming the most accomplished servants in every area of life. This retards the fulfilment of the dominion covenant. In this sense, it delays the return of Christ in final judgment. Typical of this outlook are the words on the penultimate page in Hal Lindsey's best-selling book, The Late, Great Planet Earth (1970), which sold some 35 million copies and set the tone for fundamentalism in the final decades of the twentieth century. He told his readers, "We shouldn't drop out of school or worthwhile community activities, or stop working, or rush marriage, or any such thing unless Christ clearly leads us to do so."¹¹ This is the closest thing to a call for Christian social action that appears in the book: do not drop out unless Christ tells you to. This is not what I regard as a stirring exhortation to engage in world transformation for Christ.

10. On the relation between eschatology and social theory, see my book, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

11. Hal Lindsey, The Late, Great Planet Earth (New York: Bantam, [1970] 1977), p. 176 It is one of those delightful oddities that Bantam Books is located at 666 Fifth Avenue.

5

PROGRESSIVE KNOWLEDGE, PROGRESSIVE RESPONSIBILITY

Let a man so account of us, as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God. Moreover it is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful. But with me it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you, or of man's judgment: yea, I judge not mine own self. For I know nothing by myself; yet am I not hereby justified: but he that judgeth me is the Lord. Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts: and then shall every man have praise of God (1 Cor. 4:1–5).

The theocentric focus here is God as the judge who judges in history and will judge retroactively at the end of time. Judgment is point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Stewardship and Judgment

Paul speaks of himself both as a minister of Christ and as a steward of the mysteries of God (v. 1). By this, he means that he is an apostle. The plural, “us,” refers to the other apostles. Apostles possessed special knowledge of the future. Paul possessed such knowledge. Later in this epistle, he writes: “Behold, I shew you a mystery; We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed” (1 Cor. 15:51). He also possessed special knowledge of the present: the great mystery that prophets of old had sought to discover, but could not. This was the mystery of the church as incorporating the gentiles. Gentiles would be made equal to Jews inside the church.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

How that by revelation he made known unto me the mystery; (as I wrote afore in few words, Whereby, when ye read, ye may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ) Which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, as it is now revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit; That the Gentiles should be fellowheirs, and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ by the gospel: Whereof I was made a minister, according to the gift of the grace of God given unto me by the effectual working of his power. Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ; And to make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery, which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God, who created all things by Jesus Christ: To the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known by the church the manifold wisdom of God (Eph. 3:3–10).

1. Responsibility

To possess any gift from God is to be made responsible before God for its proper use. “Moreover it is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful” (v. 2). A steward is someone who takes responsibility for property owned by someone else (Matt. 21:33–43;² 25:14–30;³ Luke 12:42–48;⁴ 19:12–27⁵). He acts as the lawfully delegated agent of the owner. A righteous steward is not supposed to act on his own behalf directly (Luke 16:1–12).⁶ He is supposed to act on his own behalf indirectly by faithfully managing whatever has been put in trust with him by the owner. In doing so, he can maximize his return on his investment of time by maximizing the owner’s economic return on his investment of capital (Matt. 25:21, 23;⁷ Luke 19:17, 19⁸). Both the owner and the steward can maximize their return when the steward is faithful because he trusts the owner to be a fair judge of performance, and the owner turns out to be a reliable judge. But the profitability of the mutual arrangement becomes visible only at the end of a time period. In the case of Jesus’ parables on stewardship, the steward is not

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 43.

3. Ibid., ch. 47.

4. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

5. Ibid., ch. 46.

6. Ibid., ch. 38.

7. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 47.

8. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 46.

told by the owner how long this time period will be. Jesus concluded the parable of the ten virgins with this eschatological warning: “Watch therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh” (Matt. 25:13).

An apostle, however, was in a special situation. He possessed continuing revelation from God regarding his performance. He did not have to wait until the final judgment to be given such knowledge. This was why Paul was not concerned about critics in the Corinthian church who were followers of Apollos or anyone else. “But with me it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you, or of man’s judgment: yea, I judge not mine own self” (v. 3). This was because he was in close contact with God, who revealed Himself to Paul. “For I know nothing by myself; yet am I not hereby justified: but he that judgeth me is the Lord” (v. 4). Paul’s self-knowledge was not sufficient to justify him, but God’s day-by-day judgment was. The Corinthian church could not validate this assertion, but this did not concern Paul. The fact that his letter has survived as part of the canon of Scripture is sufficient evidence that Paul’s knowledge of God’s judgment of his performance was accurate. He was under a greater Judge than the church of Corinth.

He says that it is not given to men to make final pronouncements. This is because God alone is omniscient. God will reveal the truth of all things at the last day. Until then, a man can be certain that his knowledge is not the equivalent of God’s. “Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts: and then shall every man have praise of God” (v. 5). Man’s knowledge is at best analogous to God’s. But an apostle’s knowledge was superior to any common man’s knowledge. Later in this epistle, Paul provides detailed information about the final judgment (I Cor. 15).⁹

2. Provisional Judgment

So, what does he mean when he tells them not to judge anything before the time? What about rendering ecclesiastical judgment in God’s name? This is mandatory. Jesus said:

Verily I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven. Again I say unto you, That if two of you shall agree on earth as touching any thing that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven. For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them (Matt. 18:18–20).

9. Chapter 15.

We must draw inferences from what Paul has already written. He says here that he is justified by God, meaning that God has judged Paul as at least “satisfactory” in the performance of the duties of his office. Paul knows this from God. Paul also possesses knowledge of certain mysteries. He has made it clear that he is in a special position as a minister because of what he knows. The Corinthian church is not in a position to judge him. Then he warns them not to make final pronouncements. God later “will bring to light the hidden things of darkness” (v. 5).

These brief sentences convey the following. First, a steward of God is responsible to God for what he knows and does. Second, God judges every person’s knowledge, day by day, just as He judged Paul’s. Third, final knowledge is not given to anyone—final in the sense of knowledge that is equivalent to what God will reveal to men at the final judgment. This indicates that God’s judgment is a continual process through time. God knows the knowledge that every man has, and He judges a man’s use of this knowledge day by day, moment by moment. He had judged Paul, and He judged the members of the Corinthian church. This assessment goes on continually.

3. Stewardship

What should Paul’s readers learn from this passage regarding their stewardship? First, they had been given knowledge of some mysteries of God, for Paul had revealed them. Second, they were responsible for the proper administration of this unique knowledge. They had to do something productive with this knowledge. They were not to let themselves be paralyzed just because they did not have complete knowledge equivalent to what God will reveal at the last day. Third, they had misused their knowledge. They had split the congregation with needless wrangling.

Paul criticizes divisions that were based on their individual preferences for various church leaders. He uses sarcastic language to describe the foolishness of what they have done. “Now ye are full, now ye are rich, ye have reigned as kings without us: and I would to God ye did reign, that we also might reign with you. For I think that God hath set forth us the apostles last, as it were appointed to death: for we are made a spectacle unto the world, and to angels, and to men. We are fools for Christ's sake, but ye are wise in Christ; we are weak, but ye are strong; ye are honourable, but we are despised" (vv. 8–10). He contrasts their inaccurate self-judgment with God's judgment of them. Paul calls them rich. Compared to the life of poverty that Paul was living, this was economically correct. But their riches were of the wrong kind. He also calls them wise. They were wise as the world is wise, i.e., foolish.

They had misunderstood what their task was. It was not to create factions based on personalities or the knowledge imparted to them by these personalities. Whatever knowledge they possessed had been a gift to them from God by way of church builders. "For who maketh thee to differ from another? and what hast thou that thou didst not receive? now if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory, as if thou hadst not received it?" (I Cor. 4:7). He is charging them with being poor stewards of the knowledge which they had received as a free gift from God. They were misusing this gift.

B. Misusing Accurate Information

Their poor stewardship was the result of their poor use of the good knowledge that they had received. Paul was not saying that their knowledge was inaccurate. On the contrary, they had been given accurate knowledge. This was what made them responsible to God. They had failed to apply the knowledge that they had received. They had made a mistake by dividing the church into rival groups based on its multiple founders.

The misuse of knowledge is different from not having enough knowledge. Paul warns them against trying to penetrate the affairs of this world as if they had access to future perfect knowledge. They were unable to look forward and see the panorama of history in retrospect, as God will declare it on judgment day. But they were also told that they had been given access to mysteries. This put them in a better position to understand their times than someone who had not been given such information. They had greater responsibility because of this. They had misused the knowledge they had been given.

So, he warns them not to over-rate their abilities to judge the world, but, at the same time, they also must not ignore the knowledge they had been given. They lived, just as we live, in a world that is like a looking glass. As he says later in this epistle, “For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known” (I Cor. 13:12).

Paul had superior knowledge of some things than the prophets of old had possessed. Knowledge had advanced considerably with the coming of the New Covenant. It had advanced even beyond what Jesus had announced. Jesus had told the disciples, “Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not: But go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel” (Matt. 10:5b–6). Then God told Peter to go to a gentile’s house (Acts 10). This was followed by an unforeseen event. “And they of the circumcision which believed were astonished, as many as came with Peter, because that on the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost” (Acts 10:45). God told Paul to go to gentile nations. This was the great mystery. Gentiles were being incorporated into the church.

The point is, there had been an increase of knowledge over time. As men move closer to the final judgment, mankind’s storehouse of information increases. Men are expected by God to possess greater insights into the workings of this world. Men cannot attain in history the equivalent of the knowledge that will be given by God on the last day, but they have been given access to more knowledge than men possessed in earlier days. Paul is speaking of progressive knowledge. Knowledge increases over time, and so does responsibility. The steward must do a better job as knowledge increases. Jesus taught this explicitly. “But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more” (Luke 12:48).¹⁰

C. Dispersed Knowledge and Its Coordination

How can any person keep up with the flood of knowledge today? Each day, he has additional historical information to master. He has knowledge coming at him from a myriad of sources. God makes him responsible for faithfully acting in terms of this ever-growing flood of knowledge. How will this responsibility not overwhelm him?

Paul provides a preliminary basis of the answer in chapter 12, where he sketches the concept of the division of labor.¹¹ The church is a body made up of members. They work as a unit. This implies that each member has specialized knowledge that accompanies his specialized skills. He brings this knowledge into the church. It becomes available for others to use.

10. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 28.

1. Responsibility and Grace

Paul is telling the Corinthian church that their responsibility has increased, but their performance has been substandard. There is cause and effect in history. Greater responsibility arrives as time moves forward. As men get closer to the day of final judgment, they possess greater knowledge.

For an individual to deal successfully with this increase in responsibility requires an increase in God's grace. Without this, no one can legitimately hope to avoid God's negative assessment of his performance. The steward possesses more knowledge, greater responsibility, and no way to keep up on his own. If even a church cannot see into the future sufficiently clearly to make definitive assessments of its era, how can covenant-breakers do this? Common grace may increase for a period, but special grace is required in order for any society to continue to maintain common grace and thereby deal with the added responsibility that comes with increased knowledge. Sinners will eventually rebel against God at some point, despite their prosperity, thereby bringing on His negative historical sanctions.¹² Self-proclaimed autonomous man is foolish, according to Paul. He cannot possibly make maximum use of the knowledge provided to him by God through the social division of labor and historical progress. His responsibility as a steward before God (Gen. 1:26–28)¹³ will overwhelm him.

Paul tells them that they cannot hope to attain the degree of knowledge about the present that God will use to judge the world on judgment day. This means that the quest for exhaustive knowledge is illegitimate. A man cannot become God. He can improve his knowledge, but this should never be regarded as a way to attain divine knowledge. The Creator-creature distinction cannot be overcome.

11. Chapter 14.

12. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

13. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

God told Israel: “For my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the LORD. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts” (Isa. 55:8–9). Transcendence is closed to man. He tried to gain it in the garden. This attempt brought him under negative sanctions.

2. The Free Market Coordinates Knowledge

This same principle of dispersed knowledge can be applied outside the church. Society is the functional equivalent of a storehouse of dispersed knowledge. It is also a kind of factory for the production of additional knowledge. Knowledge is dispersed among billions of economic decision-makers in their capacity as producers and customers. The question is: How best to mobilize this dispersed knowledge into a system that benefits more people?

F. A. Hayek emphasized the knowledge-coordinating aspect of the free market. He saw the free market as an institutional structure that rewards accurate knowledge of the future whenever an appropriate mobilization of resources accompanies this knowledge. He saw the free market as a means for coordinating individual plans. Competition on a free market is a process of discovery. The free market’s system of profit and loss motivates producers and economic forecasters to put forth their best efforts in mobilizing scarce resources to serve future customers. It is not merely that producers seek to minimize the costs of production. They do apply their knowledge to the production process, but the production process has a goal: to serve customers in the future. The free market coordinates dispersed knowledge by rewarding successful entrepreneurs who serve specific customers most efficiently.¹⁴

Production for future customers is a form of stewardship. We might call it horizontal stewardship. Serving customers is a system of mutual exchange: horizontal service.¹⁵ Legally, customers are not in a position to render formal judgment on producers. In their capacity as customers, they do not own any entrepreneur’s resources. They do not occupy a superior position legally. Economically, however, they do occupy a superior position. They possess the most marketable resource: money. They are therefore in a better bargaining position than producers are, whose markets are narrow. As in Jesus' parables of stewardship, the success of a producer cannot be known until the customer judges among many producers, and then issues his judgment in the form of a purchase or a refusal to purchase. His judgment is retroactive on producers. The customer asks competing producers, "What have you done for me lately?"

14. F. A. Hayek, Individualism and Economic Order (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1949), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/HayekIAEO>)

15. North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), pp. 26, 30, 33.

When society's dispersed knowledge is put at the disposal of other individuals, both social and individual capital increase, for knowledge is a form of capital. It is not a free resource.¹⁶ Through investment, knowledge can increase over time. When knowledge increases, the potential for increased output also increases. Producers can purchase access to this knowledge, and customers can purchase access to its results. Customers pay for the results of specialists' knowledge.

Conclusion

Paul reminds the Corinthian church about the burden of responsibility that they have as a result of the teachers who had come to them, men who had laid the foundation of the church, which is Christ crucified. The church's members are poor stewards because they are squabbling over which founder provided the foundational theology. Paul dismisses this factionalism. It is the foundation that is crucial, not its sources. This foundation is Christ. "For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ" (I Cor. 3:11).

Paul sets forth a principle here: with greater knowledge comes greater responsibility. The quest for perfect knowledge—judgment-day knowledge—is illegitimate. It cannot be attained in history. But there is now and will continue to be greater knowledge over time. This will bring greater opportunities and greater responsibility. This increasing burden of stewardship cannot be avoided. What is then the covenant-keeper's hope? Greater grace, which increases responsibility, which leads to greater grace. Men are always in debt to God. God's grace always races ahead of men's ability to match it with their performance. Men always fall short of the mark. But Jesus Christ did not. His perfect humanity, imputed to us judicially by God's grace, is the only legitimate basis of any individual's hope. It is therefore also the only legitimate basis of society's hope.

¹⁶ Thomas Sowell, Knowledge and Decisions (New York: Basic Books, 1980).

6

ESCHATOLOGY AND BIBLICAL THEOCRACY

Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? and if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters? Know ye not that we shall judge angels? how much more things that pertain to this life? If then ye have judgments of things pertaining to this life, set them to judge who are least esteemed in the church. I speak to your shame. Is it so, that there is not a wise man among you? no, not one that shall be able to judge between his brethren? But brother goeth to law with brother, and that before the unbelievers. Now therefore there is utterly a fault among you, because ye go to law one with another. Why do ye not rather take wrong? why do ye not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded? Nay, ye do wrong, and defraud, and that your brethren. Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? (1 Cor. 6:2–9).

The theocentric focus here is the final judgment of God, when He will judge the entire world: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Ethics Above Power

Paul teaches here that Christians will be God's representative agents on that final day of judgment. We will judge the angels. This is the clearest passage in the Bible that places authority above power. Angels are more powerful than men are, but they possess less covenantal authority than Christians do. The implication that follows from this fact is that ethics is more important than power. The fundamental issues of life are ethical. Elsewhere, Paul wrote: "When For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places. Wherefore take unto you the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all, to stand" (Eph. 6:12–13). The armor is not physical, but ethical. This is because the battle is not physical, but ethical.

1. Paul R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

B. Church Courts

The institutional church is to serve its members by offering justice to all. Paul says that it is wrong for church members to go before a civil court to seek judgments against each other. The question is: Why is this wrong? Paul begins the passage with a presupposition: covenant-keepers will render final judgment on the angels. This doctrine is taught nowhere else in Scripture. It means that man is God's judicial representative, not merely in history, but also in eternity. Angels possess more power and knowledge than men do in history, but this does not entitle them to the office of judge. Man alone is made in God's image. The essence of this image is the ability and authority to render final judgment. Covenant-keepers will be God's agents of final judgment on the angels because they possess the mind of Christ (I Cor. 2:16).²

Once covenant-keepers understand that they will judge the angels, Paul writes, they should not subordinate themselves to pagan civil courts. These courts are staffed by covenant-breakers. To subordinate oneself voluntarily to a pagan civil court in order to bring sanctions against another covenant-keeper is to affirm the legitimacy of the power that covenant-breakers and non-biblical law exercise over covenant-keepers and biblical law. Theirs is a false claim, Paul says, and the proof of this is that covenant-keepers will finally judge angels and the world.

Paul's argument begins with eschatology: the doctrine of the last things. He offers a prophecy regarding the final judgment. After God renders judgment against covenant-breakers, covenant-keepers will render judgment against the angels. Here is the sequence of events.

And I saw a great white throne, and him that sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them. And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened: and another book was opened, which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works. And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them: and they were judged every man according to their works. And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death. And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire (Rev. 20:11–15).

2. Chapter 2.

Satan will be banished to the lake of fire before the judgment of resurrected mankind begins. “And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever” (Rev. 20:10). After God’s removal of all covenant-breakers from the presence of covenant-keepers, the judgment of the angels will begin. Which angels will follow Satan into the lake of fire?

Paul is arguing against the authority of civil government in a pagan society to bring sanctions against covenant-keepers who obey God’s law. But is he also arguing against civil government in general to exercise such authority? No. Here is the infraction: “But brother goeth to law with brother, and that before the unbelievers” (v. 6). The issue here is the presence in civil courts of unbelieving judges. In a biblical commonwealth, it is legitimate for Christians to appeal to civil government to settle explicitly civil conflicts. Paul is not arguing against civil government. He is surely not arguing against Christian civil government. He is arguing against voluntary submission to a pagan state by Christians in conflict.

C. The Cost of Common Grace-Based Justice

For every benefit, there is a cost—added responsibility, if nothing else (Luke 12:48).³ For the benefit of Christians’ maintaining their own courts, the cost is the unavailability of the monopoly of violence to enforce their claims against other Christians. In their disputes with fellow Christians, they cannot legitimately appeal to a pagan state, which Rome was.

This does not mean that Christians cannot legitimately appeal to a pagan state against covenant-breakers. Paul appealed to the emperor against a Jewish court. “For if I be an offender, or have committed any thing worthy of death, I refuse not to die: but if there be none of these things whereof these accuse me, no man may deliver me unto them. I appeal unto Caesar” (Acts 25:11). This declaration affirmed the legitimacy of the death penalty, which was Rome’s monopoly. This declaration also showed Paul’s greater trust in the covenant-breaking Roman court system than in the supreme court of the Jewish religious leaders: the Sanhedrin. He knew the truth: Pontius Pilate had resisted crucifying Jesus, but the Jewish religious establishment had insisted. The Jews, who had been covenant-keepers in history, had now become less just than the pagan Roman emperor and his judicial agents. Why? Because the Jews had initiated the crucifixion of Jesus Christ. As Peter had warned them, but not the Romans, “Be it known unto you all, and to all the people of Israel, that by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, whom God raised from the dead, even by him doth this man stand here before you whole” (Acts 4:10). Rome had enforced the civil judgment of Pilate, but Peter said that God held the Jews responsible. As a nation, Old Covenant Israel had not heeded Peter’s warning.

3. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

Paul says that it is better to suffer economic loss at the hands of a fellow covenant-keeper than to enter a Roman civil court in quest of justice. This assessment had to do with eschatology. Those who will be judged negatively by God on the final day should not be submitted to in history for the sake of gaining a favorable settlement against a fellow believer. Why not? Because such subordination in history testifies to a false eschatology: the final judgment of covenant-keepers by covenant-breakers.

Paul uses strong language: “Why do ye not rather take wrong? why do ye not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded?” (v. 7b). The cost of avoiding dependence on a pagan state for justice is whatever the value of the forfeited property right is. The benefit is the avoidance of subordination to covenant-breakers, which would testify to a false eschatological future. The benefit outweighs the cost. Paul’s assessment could not be clearer.

Paul goes beyond the economic category of suffering a loss. He warns against becoming an economic oppressor. “Nay, ye do wrong, and defraud, and that your brethren” (v. 8). Why is seeking pagan civil justice a form of fraud? Because this act testifies to a false eschatological future: inheritance. “Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God?” (v. 9). This means that the kind of justice that is provided by a pagan civil court is injustice when compared to justice in a church court, even when the ecclesiastical judge is not educated. "If then ye have judgments of things pertaining to this life, set them to judge who are least esteemed in the church" (v. 4). He adds, "I speak to your shame" (v. 5a).

Paul is arguing that a system of justice that is provided by a civil court that operates in terms of God's common grace is inherently inferior to a church court that operates in terms of God's special grace. A church court is a special-grace court. So vast is the difference between the two sources of justice that going before a pagan civil court is comparable to seeking to defraud a fellow Christian.

The dividing issue is not "civil court vs. ecclesiastical court." The dividing issue is "pagan authority vs. Christian authority." Paul is quite clear about this. "But brother goeth to law with brother, and that before the unbelievers" (v. 6). "Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God?" (v. 9a). His argument leads inescapably to a conclusion: biblical theocracy is the proper basis of social and political order. Paul is arguing that a society that relies on covenant-breaking civil judges and any concept of civil law other than biblical law has adopted anti-Christian rulership. Civil justice is substandard in such a society. Such a system of civil law testifies to a false eschatology in which covenant-breakers will impose final sanctions on covenant-keepers. Paul tells the church at Corinth that it is better to suffer economic loss than implicitly to admit such a view of justice by taking a brother before such a court.

Conclusion

This well-known passage has been interpreted to mean that church courts are morally superior to civil courts. This is not what Paul taught. He taught that church courts are morally superior to pagan civil courts. A pagan civil court allows a covenant-breaker to declare and then impose his court's concept of civil justice on covenant-keepers. This is its great offense, in Paul's opinion. Such a system of civil justice testifies to a false eschatology. Paul uses eschatology to impugn pagan civil courts.

To conclude that every civil court is inherently inferior morally to any church court is to conclude that the church is superior judicially to the state. This assumption moves legal theory toward judicial dualism: one legal order for covenant-breakers and another for covenant-keepers. This was Martin Luther's position.⁴ It also promotes pietism's proposed downgrading of politics to the realm of adiaphora—things indifferent for the Christian faith. Finally, this assumption implies that the gospel cannot redeem civil institutions. Calvinism opposed this conclusion until the Enlightenment era, beginning in the eighteenth century, when Protestants made an unofficial alliance with humanism to establish political polytheism.⁵

The Christian West previously had come to an agreement between the Pope and the emperor in 1076: both church and state possess legitimate claims to enforce the law in their respective jurisdictions. Both institutions rule officially in the name of God. This was the meaning of what legal historian Harold Berman has called the papal revolution of Western law.⁶ In contrast, Eastern Orthodoxy has long tended toward Caesaropapism, with the church subordinate to the state. The split between Eastern Orthodoxy and Catholicism in 1054 made possible the Papal legal revolution, beginning two decades later, which in turn laid the foundation for the development of canon law, which paralleled and intermingled with a revived Roman civil law.⁷

To elevate a Christian civil court to separate but equal authority with a Christian church court, two steps are mandatory: judges must be members of Trinitarian churches, and the civil legal order must be based self-consciously on biblical revelation, just as a church court is. This means theocracy.

Paul here does not invoke biblical law as the basis of his opposition to pagan civil courts. Instead, he invokes eschatology. In order to defend point four of the biblical covenant model (judgment and sanctions), he invokes point five (eschatology), not point three (law). This New Testament passage presents the eschatological foundation of the case against political pluralism. After the final judgment of mankind, covenant-keepers will declare covenant-breaking angels as deserving of eternal torment, and God will enforce their declaration.

This principle of hierarchical authority—covenant-keepers' exer-

4. Charles Trinkaus, "The Religious Foundations of Luther's Social Views," in John H. Mundy, et. al., Essays in Medieval Life (New York: Biblo & Tannen, 1955), pp. 71–87.

5. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), Part 3. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

6. Harold J. Berman, Law and Revolution: The Formation of the Western Legal Tradition (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983).

7. Roman law entered Europe by way of the Emperor Justinian's sixth-century legal code, the Corpus iurus civilis.

cise of rule over covenant-breakers—governs Paul’s definition of civil justice. Pagan civil courts are inferior to church courts, and they should therefore be avoided by Christians in disputes with each other. Better to suffer economic loss, he said, rather than to violate this principle of justice. To violate this principle of justice is to defraud the brethren.

DISCIPLINE AND THE CHURCH'S INHERITANCE

Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived: neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind, Nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God. And such were some of you: but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God (I Cor. 6:9–11).

The theocentric focus of this passage is the inheritance provided by God. Inheritance is point five of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Condemnation Despite Confession

This continues Paul's discussion of church courts and the proper administration of justice.

Which acts identify an unrighteous person? Paul answers this without hesitation. He lists sins that identify men as being outside the kingdom of God. He had just presented another list: "I wrote unto you in an epistle² not to company with fornicators: Yet not altogether with the fornicators of this world, or with the covetous, or extortioners, or with idolaters; for then must ye needs go out of the world. But now I have written unto you not to keep company, if any man that is called a brother be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner; with such an one no not to eat" (I Cor. 5:

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

2. A lost epistle.

9–11). There was no question in Paul’s mind that such sinners as these were members of the congregation. He compiled another list in his first letter to Timothy. “Knowing this, that the law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners, for unholy and profane, for murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, for manslayers, For whoremongers, for them that defile themselves with mankind, for menstealers, for liars, for perjured persons. . .” (I Tim. 1:9–10a).³ And he had more. “This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, Without natural affection, trucebreakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, Traitors, heady, highminded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God; Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof: from such turn away. For of this sort are they which creep into houses, and lead captive silly women laden with sins, led away with divers lusts, Ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth” (II Tim. 3:1–7). Such men were inside the churches, operating as shepherds. This was not a prophecy of some distant era. The last days had come: “God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, Hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things, by whom also he made the worlds” (Heb. 1:1–2).

Paul was the great preacher of salvation by grace through faith. He was also the great cataloguer of sins that testify judicially against the presence of saving faith. Those who consistently commit evil acts such as these are outside the kingdom of God. Unless they repent, they will not inherit the kingdom, because they are not in it. Any theology that denies Paul’s doctrine of grace is wrong. Any theology that denies Paul’s doctrine of non-inheritance is wrong. He provided the church with catalogues of sins that mark people without grace.

The question is this: When a person says that he is saved by grace, and he has gained church membership based on this confession, yet he commits sins that mark him as outside the kingdom of God, what is his local congregation to do? What standard should its court use to assess the legitimacy of his confession? Is his confession judicially annulled by his actions?

3. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 1.

B. Purging the Local Church

The first group of non-inheritors is sexually debauched: fornicators (which in the Old Covenant was associated with idolaters),⁴ idolaters, adulterers, effeminate, abusers of themselves with mankind. Members of the second group commit economic crimes: thieves, covetous, extortioners. The list in First Timothy includes another economic category: menstealers. This is kidnapping in the broadest sense. It unquestionably includes slave-traders.

(Rev. George Bourne, a Presbyterian minister in Virginia, was defrocked by his presbytery in 1815 for saying that slave-owning is a sin because slave-owners prior to 1808 had paid professional kidnappers to commit the crime for them.⁵ The Presbyterian Church's General Assembly in 1818 permitted this decision to stand, but only after it had retroactively eliminated this interpretation of kidnapping from its Constitution [1806].⁶ Bourne's abolitionist ideas were, more than a decade later, adopted by Unitarian leaders of the abolitionist movement, but without attribution. Only after the military defeat of the South in 1865 did the South's Christians and their churches finally conclude that the South's system of chattel slavery had been opposed to the Bible, just as Bourne had said. Southern pastors and theologians, Robert Dabney excepted,⁷ surrendered to Bourne's view of the institution, but only after General Lee had surrendered to General Grant.)

Economic sins are not so prominent in these lists as sexual sins. All of these sins draw men into the paths of destruction. Better put, they keep fallen men on these paths, for men are born on these paths. This conclusion is one application of the doctrine of original sin.

The theological problem here is not the fact that sinners are outside of the kingdom of God. The theological problem that concerned Paul was the presence in the congregations of people who

4. The obvious example is the Book of Hosea: Israel as a prostitute and idolatrous.

5. By 1815, Virginian slave-owners commonly bred slaves for export into the deep South, where the land was more fertile for high-income cotton production. The importation of slaves had legally ceased in 1808. This law created an oligopoly for Southern slave-owners. On the profitability of Southern slavery, see the articles in Hugh G. J. Aitken (ed.), Did Slavery Pay? (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1971), especially "The Economics of Slavery in the Antebellum South," by Conrad and Meyer.

6. Gary North, Crossed Fingers: How the Liberals Captured the Presbyterian Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1996), pp. 123–29.

7. He published his wartime manuscript, A Defense of Virginia, which defended chattel slavery, in 1867, two years after Lee surrendered.

are known to commit such sins. How could it be that those who had gained admission as members could practice such sins? Does this mean that a verbal profession of faith and participation in the sacraments condemned these people? Did their actions constitute testimony against them? Paul clearly warns against the presence of such people in a congregation. What, then, had been the efficacy of their original profession of faith? Are they backsliders who have somehow lost both their faith and their salvation? If so, then what happens to the doctrine of the perseverance of the saints? How are we to interpret Paul's words? "For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, Nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. 8:38–39).

Paul's point: faith that does not produce sin-reducing changes in human behavior is not saving faith. Protestants may not like this conclusion, but Paul's words leave no wiggle room. The people who practice these sins are covenant-breakers, no matter what they say now or have said publicly. The church must exercise discipline to rid itself of such people. This is what the epistle's fifth chapter is all about. "In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, when ye are gathered together, and my spirit, with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ, To deliver such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. Your glorying is not good. Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump? Purge out therefore the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump, as ye are unleavened. For even Christ our passover is sacrificed for us: Therefore let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness; but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth" (I Cor. 5:4–8). The "old leaven" spoken of here is a church member who seeks to participate in the Lord's Supper, the New Testament's equivalent of the Passover's shared meal.

C. Inheritance and Disinheritance

The language of inheritance once again appears in the context of God's kingdom. Jesus had told the Pharisees: "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43). This nation is the church. The public mark of the church, Jesus said, is its bearing of the fruits of righteousness. These fruits are public evidence of its inheritance. Paul is here unsparing of sinners. They must be expelled. They are not Christians, despite any public confession of faith they might make. They must not be given access to the table of the Lord.

Paul is demanding their public disinheritance by the church. This is the economic meaning of excommunication. It is also the eschatological meaning. The known sinner must not be allowed to participate in a common meal that is the church's formal means of covenant renewal. Disinheritance of sinners helps to retain the fruits of righteousness inside the church. These fruits are the mark of the church's inheritance, Jesus had told the Pharisees. God had disinherited Old Covenant Israel because of the nation's persistent sins. A local congregation has this example as a warning: disinherit or be disinherited.

The concept of inheritance is more than economic. It has to do with sonship, and sonship is more than economic. Paul is setting forth moral criteria that enable church officers to distinguish the disinherited sons of Adam from the adopted sons through Christ. The fulness of the church's inheritance can come only after the complete removal of the disinherited sons. This will not take place in history. "The field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom; but the tares are the children of the wicked one; The enemy that sowed them is the devil; the harvest is the end of the world; and the reapers are the angels. As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire; so shall it be in the end of this world" (Matt. 13:38–40).⁸

Disinheritance is an inescapable concept. It is never a question of inheritance vs. disinheritance. It is always a question of whose disinheritance. In this epistle, Paul makes it clear that the church must publicly announce the legal status of every disinherited son. It does this through excommunication. If it does not do this, then it becomes corrupted. This calls into question the church's inheritance. Flagrant sinners are not part of the kingdom. A church that refuses to impose discipline on its unrighteous members risks being dealt with harshly by God. The public disinheritance of sinful church members is mandatory for the church's inheritance in history.

8. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 29.

Conclusion

This epistle is about judgment. Peter wrote: “For the time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God: and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God?” (I Peter 4:17). Paul made the same point in this epistle. The church is to judge those under its covenantal authority who bring disrepute to the church. The sins of commission include economic sins. The church serves as an agent of God in bringing judgment against economic wrongdoing. It possesses lawful authority over its members.

8

CALLING AND OCCUPATION

Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called. Art thou called being a servant? care not for it: but if thou mayest be made free, use it rather. For he that is called in the Lord, being a servant, is the Lord's freeman: likewise also he that is called, being free, is Christ's servant. Ye are bought with a price; be not ye the servants of men. Brethren, let every man, wherein he is called, therein abide with God (1 Cor. 7:20–24).

The theocentric focus here is God's sovereignty over every person's current position in life. This is point one of the biblical covenant.¹

A. The Calling

"Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called." The Greek work translated here as "calling" is used repeatedly the New Testament in the sense of God's redemption of sinners and His assignment to them of their kingdom tasks. Paul wrote elsewhere: "There is one body, and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling" (Eph. 4:4). "Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me his prisoner: but be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel according to the power of God; Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began" (II Tim. 1:8–9). God has a lifetime purpose for each of His called-out saints.

Paul notes that in Corinth, the church did not have members who were leaders in society. This, he says, was a universal condition of the church in his day. “For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called” (I Cor. 1:26). Paul’s message was that Christians in Corinth were not among society’s “best and brightest.” His observation need not apply to the church in every era of history, but generally it has. This means that the early church began with a seeming liability: a lack of experienced leadership. Nevertheless, he wrote in chapter 6, members should rely on the lowliest member to provide judgment between disputants in preference to going before covenant-breaking civil judges. Better to be governed by men who fear God than by experts in Roman civil law.²

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

1. Called by God

Here is Paul’s main point in this passage: redeemed men’s callings are from God, not from society. Covenant-keepers are to look to God, not to society, for guidance on what they are to do with their lives. They have legitimate hope in their kingdom inheritance, but not in earthly success, Paul wrote elsewhere. “The eyes of your understanding being enlightened; that ye may know what is the hope of his calling, and what the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints” (Eph. 1:18). The Christian walk is inherently a lowly walk, psychologically speaking. “I therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called, With all lowliness and meekness, with longsuffering, forbearing one another in love (Eph. 4:1–2). But this lowly walk is a high calling. “I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus” (Phil. 3:14)

The calling is a God-given assignment. We are to work diligently to prove to ourselves that we received God’s call. Our work testifies to the legitimacy of our election, Peter said. “Wherefore the rather, brethren, give diligence to make your calling and election sure: for if ye do these things, ye shall never fall” (II Peter 1:10). This is consistent with Paul’s discussion of personal salvation and a lifetime of predestinated good works: “For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: Not of works, lest any man should boast. For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them” (Eph. 2:8–10).

2. Chapter 6.

The New Testament's concept of the calling does not usually refer to a man's income-generating occupation, although it can sometimes mean this, as in the case of the job of minister of the gospel.³ Its meaning is broader: the call to lifetime service that God has given to each of the elect. This distinction between calling and occupation is not widely understood. A misinterpretation of the Pauline meaning of "calling" has been made famous in academic circles by a book by the German sociologist, Max Weber: The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (1906). Weber argued that the Calvinistic idea of the calling as an occupation was central in the development of the inner discipline that is so important in the formation of the capitalist spirit. Success in one's occupation was seen by Calvinists as temporal proof of God's eternal blessing, he argued. Weber hedged his language, but this is what he meant.⁴ This is surely how his readers have long understood his thesis. Essentially, Weber transferred Peter's words regarding the calling to the occupation. "Wherefore the rather, brethren, give diligence to make your calling and election sure: for if ye do these things, ye shall never fall" (II Peter 1:10). This view of the calling was not what Calvin held. He did not see personal economic success as confirming a man's election to salvation. Nevertheless, some elements of Weber's version of the idea of calling can be found in the writings of certain seventeenth-century Calvinists. Some of them did believe that God rewards faithful covenantal service with economic success. But none of them believed that economic success constitutes stand-alone evidence of saving faith.

2. Service to God

Paul's idea of the calling was lifetime service to God. We can think of this as vertical subordination.⁵ But how do we manifest our service to God? It has to involve service to other people. This is because God is represented in history by men. Mankind is God's corporate steward in a hierarchy. This is the meaning of the dominion covenant, which

3. "Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour, especially they who labour in the word and doctrine. For the scripture saith, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn. And, The labourer is worthy of his reward" (I Tim. 5:17–18).

4. Gary North, "Weber's 'Protestant Ethic' Hypothesis," The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, III (Summer 1976).

5. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 2. North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 2.

defines man (Gen. 1:26–28).⁶

Men own resources. They possess the legal authority to dispose of these resources as they see fit. Inanimate resources possess no lawful claim against owners. Then what about slavery? Is it a valid Christian ideal? Paul said no. In this passage, Paul specifically recommends that slaves accept their liberty if it is offered to them by their masters. Why? Because Christians can better serve God as free agents who are not legally bound to another individual. Paul said much the same thing in the same passage in regard to the wisdom of avoiding marriage. “But I would have you without carefulness. He that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord: But he that is married careth for the things that are of the world, how he may please his wife. There is difference also between a wife and a virgin. The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and in spirit: but she that is married careth for the things of the world, how she may please her husband” (I Cor. 7:32–34).

In what way is slavery like marriage? First, both systems are established by a legal bond. Marriage’s bond is much tighter; it is established by covenant oath under God. Second, both institutions restrict the independence of their members. A legal bond limits the mobility of all parties who are bound by its terms. This usually includes geographical mobility. Paul recommended mobility for God’s servants: a life unencumbered by legal obligations to others. He possessed such mobility. A slave does not possess this. Neither does a married person.

Paul told slaves to take their liberty if it was offered. This meant a change in their occupations: from permanent service to one family to permanent service to the market. This meant abandoning predictable income and legal protection provided by another person. It also meant the legal authority to choose one’s occupation from among the opportunities available. It was this greater flexibility in choosing how to earn a living that strengthened their callings before God. They could make their own decisions regarding the selection of one lifetime calling and multiple jobs over time. Paul’s job was making tents (Acts 18:3). This was not his calling. It was his occupation. Being a tentmaker gave him tremendous geographical flexibility. He could earn an income almost anywhere. This strengthened his calling as an evangelist and an apostle. What his calling required was geographical mobility.

6. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

The calling is always a matter of subordination to God through specific human mediators. Point two of the biblical covenant is hierarchy.⁷ God is represented in history by specific individuals. He has delegated lawful authority to these individuals. No one operates in this world without mediators. Something must sustain every person. We are all dependent on nature. Except in the case of hermits, men's mediators include humans. These human mediators are only rarely sacramental mediators. Only when preaching from the pulpit during a worship service or when administering the sacraments does a man exercise sacramental mediatory authority. But everyone is under mediatorial authority all of the time. Even a hermit is under Christ's mediatorial authority.

3. Multiple Hierarchies

Because of multiple hierarchies in history, an individual serves multiple masters. A wife serves her husband. Her husband serves his employer, who in turn serves customers. Church members pay tithes and subordinate themselves to church officers. Citizens serve magistrates, yet in a democracy, they have indirect authority over who is hired or fired. A general in an army is under civilian control in most democracies. The men under his immediate authority are also voters. So, authority under democratic capitalism is mixed. There is no final voice of human authority other than Jesus Christ, the perfect man, who sits on a throne in heaven (Heb. 12:2). He is outside of history. The final voice of authority in history is the Bible, but it speaks through multiple interpreters. There is no agency in history that lawfully declares: "This is the final authority."

This means that service to God—the calling—has multiple aspects. It is not just about making money. It is not just about exercising ownership. It is not just about obedience to civil law. The calling requires performance under mixed authorities.

Men live under multiple oath-bound, covenantal hierarchies in history: church, state, and family. They are also under hierarchies that in turn are under one or more of these primary hierarchies. The most universal hierarchy for modern man is economic: the free market. It is not visibly a hierarchy, but both conceptually and operationally, it is. It is a system of dual authority: partially judicial, partially economic. The judicial hierarchy is the hierarchy of ownership. The owner of property has the legal right to use it as he sees fit and to exclude non-owners from its use. The economic hierarchy is customer-driven: money talks.

7. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 2. North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 2.

The judicial hierarchy of ownership is subordinate to the economic hierarchy in the sense of dependence. If customers refuse to compete for the ownership of any consumer good, its price falls to slightly above zero. Its price is whatever asset its owner must forfeit by retaining ownership. If customers refuse to buy a producer's output, he will go out of business. Those under his economic authority will lose their jobs. So, the legal owners do act on behalf of God and God's kingdom, but this hierarchical authority is mediated through customers. Owners fulfil the dominion covenant as legally responsible agents before God, but they do so as economic agents of customers.

A worker is subordinate to his employer's hierarchy, which gives him instructions and provides him with tools and marketing services for his output. His employer pays him a salary in exchange for his labor. But this hierarchy is a dual hierarchy. A specific group of potential customers will determine whether he can keep his job. Their identities are unknown to the worker. His identity is equally unknown to them. He is employed by a specific group of entrepreneurs, the corporation's share owners, who have delegated to senior managers the task of persuading certain customers to buy the company's output at a price greater than what it paid to produce this output, i.e., sell at a profit. If these customers refuse to buy, the company will go out of business. This is a fearful negative sanction for share owners, senior managers, and employees.

Hierarchies can be both judicial or economic. A judicial hierarchy is a system based on a legal claim: God's legal claim on an individual and his output through God's delegated representatives' legal claims on a person. Church, state, and family all involve legal claims that are established by voluntary oaths and oath-signs in which the oath-taker implicitly or explicitly calls down God's wrath on him if he violates the terms of the covenant. That is, a covenantal oath is self-maledictory. An economic hierarchy may also involve legal claims, called contracts, which may be enforceable in a civil court, but this hierarchy is not established by a self-maledictory covenantal oath. It is temporary. A man may lawfully remove himself from the jurisdiction of this hierarchy when he has fulfilled the terms of the contract. He has much greater mobility. This non-covenantal relationship is what Paul recommended to slaves and unmarried people.

B. Replacement Cost

I have adopted a definition of the calling that is faithful to the biblical idea of the calling as God's service assignment to the individual. My definition adds an economic aspect: the cost of a person's replacement. Here it is: "Your calling is the most important work you can do in which you would be most difficult to replace." The cost of replacement is a major consideration because of the individual's other opportunities for service. If he leaves one calling, he must be replaced. He serves in a new way, so he no longer serves in the old way. This places a burden on those who had depended on his service in the old calling: his employers and the beneficiaries of his output.

Think of a key athlete. Without him, his team may not win many games. Yet he may be better equipped to serve God in some other way. Can he somehow find a way to serve God both ways? Should he? In the twentieth century, the best-known example of a Christian athlete who faced such a dilemma was Eric Liddell, who refused to run in the 100-meter dash in the 1924 Olympic Games because a preliminary race was held on a Sunday. He was a strict sabbatarian. He had known of this scheduling for months in advance. He therefore switched to the 400-meter race. Instead of running the standard races for a sprinter, the 100 and 200, he ran the 200 and the 400. This was unheard of at the time. Only in the 1996 Olympics did America's Michael Johnson run both distances and win gold medals in both. Liddell in 1924 won the bronze medal (third place) in the 200 and the gold medal in the 400. Because he did not run in the 100, his teammate, Harold Abrahams, won the gold medal. This positive outcome was unforeseen prior to the races. Half a century after Liddell's triumph, a movie director read about his decision not to run, and the result was Chariots of Fire (1980), the unexpected Academy Award winner in 1981, and now a classic film.

Liddell knew what his calling was: a Christian missionary, not an athlete. He viewed his athletic prowess as an extension of his ministry. He viewed his victories in the same way. He became a world-famous athlete, whose fame later made him the best-known foreign missionary in China and the best-known missionary ever sent out from Scotland. As the movie records at the end, when he died in a Japanese concentration camp in 1945, all of Scotland mourned.

Liddell's service as an athlete was part of his service as an evangelist and later as a foreign missionary. The movie, for drama's sake, created a conflict over his two forms of service. It portrayed Liddell's sister as being opposed to his running. This was not the case in real life. She, too, fully understood that his victories on the track were part of his larger service to God. In any case, he could not continue to run faster than the competition as he grew older. So, he could freely leave his status as an athlete without violating Paul's injunction regarding the fixed lifetime calling. He would eventually have had to be replaced in the world of amateur athletics. Everyone knew this. It is expected of every athlete.

The dilemma of fixed lifetime service to God vs. better personal economic opportunities weighs heavily on modern Christians—or would if they had ever heard about this Pauline dilemma—because of the modern division of labor. They face so many opportunities.

C. The Division of Labor

Different people possess different gifts. Paul begins his discussion of the calling by saying that Christians generally serve in lowly capacities. "For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called" (I Cor. 1:26). The division of labor enables the church to function as a body, Paul says. Some of these tasks are undistinguished. "And those members of the body, which we think to be less honourable, upon these we bestow more abundant honour; and our uncomely parts have more abundant comeliness" (I Cor. 12:23). Those Christians who have specific skills in one area should not think of themselves as inferior just because their area of service has low prestige. What he says about the division of labor in the church applies to every institution. It functions best as a unit when all of its members know their specific tasks and perform them well, irrespective of their tasks' social status.

1. Freedom

Paul says that a Christian should remain in his present calling. The one exception is the slave. It is best for the slave to gain his freedom. This was a new insight. The Mosaic law had made provision for voluntary servitude of covenant-keepers under covenant-keepers.

And if thy brother, an Hebrew man, or an Hebrew woman, be sold unto thee, and serve thee six years; then in the seventh year thou shalt let him go free from thee. And when thou sendest him out free from thee, thou shalt not let him go away empty: Thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock, and out of thy floor, and out of thy winepress: of that wherewith the LORD thy God hath blessed thee thou shalt give unto him. And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt, and the LORD thy God redeemed thee: therefore I command thee this thing to day. And it shall be, if he say unto thee, I will not go away from thee; because he loveth thee and thine house, because he is well with thee; Then thou shalt take an aul, and thrust it through his ear unto the door, and he shall be thy servant for ever. And also unto thy maidservant thou shalt do likewise (Deut. 15:12–17).

Paul's injunction represents a significant departure from the perspective of the Mosaic law. Freedom is said to be preferable to servitude. It is superior for Christian service. This means that a covenant-keeper is granted greater responsibility by the New Covenant than under the Old Covenant. God expects him to be an independent laborer. The benefit to God's kingdom of such freedom rests on a premise: covenant-keepers should serve God directly as independent owners of their own labor services, not as lifetime subordinates whose labor services legally belong to others.

The Old Covenant's model of covenant-keeping servitude was household servitude.⁸ The permanent servant's hole in the ear was a covenantal mark of lifetime servitude. By a covenant oath and an oath-sign, a man was brought into a family, though not as a legal heir. This extension of family authority over non-adopted, voluntary hirelings is weakened in the New Testament, though not formally abolished. The faithful slave owner in Paul's era—before the Old Covenant was completely replaced by the New in A.D. 70⁹—was not compelled to release his covenant-keeping slaves, but he was encouraged to do so (Philemon), and slaves in turn were encouraged to accept their liberty. Paul made an important break with the Mosaic covenant on this point. There should be no doubt: freedom is preferable to slavery, even voluntary slavery. The New Covenant is liberating, compared to the

8. Inter-generational slavery for covenantal foreigners was a completely different model (Lev. 25:44–46). See Gary North, Tools of Dominion: The Case Laws of Exodus (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/gntools>)

9. Kenneth L. Gentry, Before Jerusalem Fell: Dating the Book of Revelation (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/klgbjf>)

Old Covenant.

2. Responsibility

This change in perspective had to do with increasing an individual's responsibility before God. A covenant-keeper is supposed to make an assessment of whatever it is that God wants him to accomplish in history. He should seek counsel, but he must decide for himself. He must bear the consequences of his decisions and his actions. Paul later wrote to the Corinthians: "But this I say, He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully" (II Cor. 9:6).

A society with a high division of labor allows an individual a far wider selection of areas of service. His personally unique array of talents is more likely to match the opportunities for serving God in a society that enjoys a high division of labor. The match-up of skills and demand will be tighter, if he can discover the opportunity. The New Testament Christian is understood to be the best judge of this match-up. He must bear the consequences and also reap the reward—a heavenly reward. He must select his area of service. This takes accurate self-judgment. He must assess both his abilities and his opportunities. Then he must choose what to do.

A high division of labor allows an employer to identify more rigorously the economic value of each employee's contribution to the production process. He can pay the worker what the customers have determined that he is worth: his replacement cost. The division of labor also allows the employer's competitors to assess this market value, which is the result of competition: employers vs. would-be employers; employees vs. would-be employees. Information about the economic value of a specific task is more readily available when this task is narrowly circumscribed by the free market's production process. As Adam Smith wrote in 1776, the division of labor is limited by the extent of the market.¹⁰

The greater the degree of personal economic freedom in a market, the more pervasive the free market becomes. When men compete for resources, the market's system of pricing extends into more areas of life. This means that productive services become more narrowly circumscribed: specialization of labor. Freedom of choice extends the domain of the free market. Paul's advice to slaves is to accept this increase in personal freedom. This necessarily involves an extension of personal responsibility.

10. Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, Book I, Chapter III.

What Paul did not say was that a man's highest area of service is best determined by competitive bidding by customers. Paul had no concept of the calling as the highest-paying form of employment. He taught that men should remain in their callings, with the exception of slaves. In this sense, Paul was not a defender of increasing per capita output, either for individuals or societies. He did not say that the servant of God should decide how best to serve God by accepting a job that pays a high salary and offers other benefits, such as a large expense account and a budget sufficient to hire a good-looking secretary. By opposing an exclusively monetary view of success, the New Testament retards the market-driven extension of the division of labor. How? Because the increasing use of money in an exchange economy extends both free trade and the specialization of production. Paul was no lover of money. As he wrote elsewhere, "the love of money is the root of all evil: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows" (I Tim. 6:10).¹¹

D. Changing Jobs

Paul says that a Christian should not change his calling. Does this mean that he should not change his job? No. To identify the calling with the job is a mistake. It would be as if someone had identified Eric Liddell's calling with his running, which the movie portrays the British Olympic committee as having done. The movie makes it clear that running was not his calling. The central scene in this regard is where the committee meets with Liddell in an opulent drawing room. The crusty old man who chairs the committee argues that Liddell should run the 100-meter dash. His country is counting on him. The proper order of importance of service is to country, then to God. A younger committee member defends Liddell, suggesting that the idea of country before God is what got the nations of Europe into the devastation of the world war. Liddell believes in God before country, the man says, and his opinion should be respected. The movie makes it clear that Liddell's calling encompassed his running, but running did not define it. The non-Christian screenplay writer, who won the 11. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 10.

Academy Award, grasped this fact and made this theme central to Liddell's story. The screenplay also recognizes that Harold Abrahams was also more than a runner. He was a Jew, and as he was portrayed in the movie (by a Roman Catholic actor), he was determined to defeat in a larger sense all those who were prejudiced against him. The screenplay makes it clear that Abrahams was running for personal glory as a way to make a personal statement of his own excellence. The movie ends with Abrahams' emotional defeat: the gold medal did not mean much to him after all. The heart of the difference between the two men is seen in their callings, not their occupation. Liddell ran for God; Abrahams ran for glory. Liddell's victory was a joy to him because, as he says in the movie to his sister, "When I run, I feel God's pleasure."

Eric Liddell had a job in 1924: running the 100-meter and 200-meter dashes in the Olympics. For the sake of his calling, he switched from the 100 to the 400. He received public criticism for making this switch until after the 400-meter race was over. He set the Olympic record in the 400. This forever silenced the critics of his job-switching.

Liddell changed jobs in 1925: from athlete and part-time domestic evangelist to foreign missionary and part-time athlete. He remained involved with sports in China. He taught children how to play British sports. He occasionally ran in races, which he won. At no time did he did change callings. He was a missionary—though not always a foreign missionary—from the beginning of his athletic career to the end of his life. He died in a prison camp in this capacity. He was inside that camp because of the calling he had chosen, and he retained his godly testimony among the prisoners.

Let me return to my definition of a calling as the most important service to God in which you would be the most difficult to replace. My calling in life to write this economic commentary and the economic treatise that will be based on it. No one else has ever attempted to write an economic commentary on the Bible. I began in 1973, four decades ago. The project has not earned me a living. It has cost me a great deal of donated time to raise the money to pay for typesetting, printing, and distribution of the pre-Web volumes and their supporting books.¹² I have never taken a salary or book royalties for this work.

I supported myself from 1974 to 2005 by writing an economic newsletter and by investing. Beginning in 2005, I launched my website, 12. Dominion and Common Grace (1987), Is the World Running Down? (1988), Political Polytheism (1989), Millennialism and Social Theory (1990).

Gary North's Specific Answers. It immediately became my primary source of income. I sent out the first issue of my Remnant Review newsletter exactly one year after the first chapter of my projected commentary was published in the Chalcedon Report (May 1973). I firmly believe that God gave me the idea for the newsletter because I had already begun my calling and had continued in the commentary project for a year. God has sustained me in both of these publishing efforts. I have had other jobs in addition to the newsletter. I worked for six months as a researcher for Ron Paul (1976). I worked part-time as a financial counselor for The Ruff Times (1977–79). I briefly held an endowed professorial chair in free market economics at Campbell College (1979). But my calling has never changed. The most important work that I can do in which I seem to be irreplaceable is writing this commentary. No employer would have imagined that this was my most important work. No employer would have funded it. My legal freedom to make my choice of calling enabled me to begin it and to pursue it. The wide range of employment opportunities in the world's largest and most free market has enabled me to earn a living in order to pursue my calling.

E. Specialization and Compound Economic Growth

Specialization of production accompanies an increase in the division of labor. The specialist masters a narrow aspect of production. In a free market society, through the competition of the employer against would-be employers, and the competition of the employee against would-be employees, an employee is paid the value of his productive services to the overall production process. Customers decide retroactively whether this expenditure was profitable for the employer. By specializing, the worker maximizes the value of his output. If he seeks to maximize his monetary income, he must match his skills with the customers' highest bidding for these skills.

When a person devotes time and concentration to a particular skill, he gets better at it. This increases his productivity. He can produce more in the same time period with the same tools. Paul's injunction promotes specialization in the calling. He tells his readers not to change their callings. In the words of the traditional folk saying, they should stick to their knitting.

This strategy takes advantage of the phenomenon known as compound growth. When any base—e.g., population, capital, or knowledge—grows over time, it becomes ever-more dominant in its environment. The compounding effect creates enormous results if it continues long enough. Eventually, the base approaches infinity as a limit. Paul tells his readers that they should devote a lifetime to the mastery of their individual callings. “Brethren, let every man, wherein he is called, therein abide with God” (v. 24). This lifetime of service adds up over time. It more than adds up; it multiplies.

What applies to individuals also applies to the kingdoms of which they are members. Each kingdom’s compounding process goes on inter-generationally. The process ceases for a covenant-breaking society after a few generations, but covenant-keepers are able to extend the process indefinitely. “Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them: for I the LORD thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me; And shewing mercy unto thousands of them that love me, and keep my commandments” (Ex. 20:5–6). This compounding process makes possible the steady extension of the kingdom of God in history. The compound growth of the kingdom of God can fill the earth over time because Satan’s rival kingdom cannot maintain such growth. This conclusion is consistent with Daniel’s vision.

Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay, and brake them to pieces. Then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold, broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshingfloors; and the wind carried them away, that no place was found for them: and the stone that smote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth (Dan. 2:34–35).

The postmillennial implications here are obvious.

F. Social Status

Social status is not the same as economic class. There is a French phrase, nouveaux riches. It refers to newly rich people. As it is commonly used, the phrase implies that their economic success has not been matched by their social success. They have made money; they have not gained the necessary social graces to enter into high society. They may have bought large homes. They have not been able to buy social acceptance by those people whose opinions really matter.

Who are these people who really matter? This is the social question. We might say, “matter to themselves” and “matter to certain socially excluded rich newcomers.”

In academic sociology, the word “class” relates to economic position. Karl Marx is the most famous theorist of class, even though he never got around to defining the term.¹³ The word “status” refers to social position. Class and social status are analytically distinct. Class position is earned: by economic performance, by inheritance, or by an unforeseen event. Social status positions are conferred. This is why people with a high class position resent their not being able to obtain high social status. Their inability to obtain it seems to put them in their place, and they resent being put there. They are not able to set the terms of their social status. They are dependent on the non-economic evaluations of others, who may not have attained equal wealth. Customers or possibly citizen-taxpayers have granted them their class position, but those who possess high status ration out status positions to rival claimants. The terms of competition are different.

Paul did not concern himself at all with social status. As a Pharisee, he had possessed high social status in Israel. He offered this as background in his letter to the Philippians (3:4–6). He had abandoned all this in no uncertain terms. “But what things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ” (v. 7). He knew that his office as an apostle now condemned him in the eyes of the religious leaders of Israel. Roman officials were required to honor his legal status as a Roman citizen, but they did not accept him socially, nor did he expect them to. As for economic class, he knew that he was a poor man. So, two of the most powerful personal motivational factors in the creation of a social order, class position and social status position, did not motivate him. He said that the gospel should make a person indifferent to these motivations. “Art thou called being a servant? care not for it” (v. 21a). The slave was at the bottom of the social hierarchy and the economic hierarchy. This is of no concern, Paul says. What matters is the freedom to pursue one’s calling.

The model for this lack of concern about social status is Jesus.

Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus: Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God: But made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name: That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; And that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father. Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling. For it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure (Phil. 2:5–13).¹⁴

13. On the final page of his never-completed third volume of Das Kapital, Marx said he would define “class.” He lived for more than a decade after writing this, but he never got around to this deferred project.

Jesus rose in both senses—socially and bodily—because He first subordinated Himself in both senses. He went to the cross as a convicted criminal. Christians are to do the same in principle. Paul in chapter 6 says that Christians will judge the angels. But the price of this authority is low status in history until His kingdom's compounding process finally replaces covenant-breaking society. In a covenant-breaking society, upward social mobility is blocked for the faithful covenant-keeper. Those who confer high social status are opposed to the gospel's standards and motivations. The gospel regards high social status as nothing of eternal importance, and therefore nothing of spiritual importance. Jesus warned His disciples: "Neither be ye called masters: for one is your Master, even Christ. But he that is greatest among you shall be your servant. And whosoever shall exalt himself shall be abased; and he that shall humble himself shall be exalted" (Matt. 23:10–12). This is a reversal of conventional concepts of social hierarchy and therefore social status. The servant is the model.

In contrast to social status, a concept of servanthip underlies the economic theory of the free market. The economically successful person is a producer or seller who best serves the wants of customers.

Social status, however, is conferred. Christian virtues do not lend themselves to high social status in a covenant-breaking society. These virtues do sometimes lend themselves to special status. In our once-Christian West, such virtues as honor, sacrificial service to the less fortunate, courage under fire in wartime, and other forms of voluntarily accepted service still bring special status. This special status is conferred in terms of an essentially Christian view of service. The person who possesses these virtues will not normally be invited to gatherings of socially prominent people, for he has few contacts with them, but he is welcomed as an honored, one-time guest when he is invited by a representative of the group. Again, the example of Eric Liddell would be representative. He did not move in high social circles in the British Empire, but anyone in these circles would have regarded it as an honor in 1925 to have met him at such a gathering. He possessed special status after his Olympic victory, which was not the same as high status. Paul would have regarded such special status, based on sacrificial service, as legitimate, but not worth pursuing for its own sake.

14. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 20.

To confer status is to make a judgment about someone's personal characteristics, which may include his family's status. Social status is imputed by those persons making the judgment. If he who possesses high social status then persuades others with high status to join with him in the unofficial conferring of such status, then the object of this confirmation gains high status. The recipient cannot purchase this in a competitive market marked by open entry. The social status market is necessarily a closed market. The high value of high status is maintained by the closed nature of the confirmation process. High social status is like currency: the more of it that is distributed, the less its value.

High social status is conferred on an individual by those who already possess it. They decide to share it with him. They retain what they issue: high status. This is in sharp contrast to a free market, where customers impute value to output rather than to the producer. Irrespective of his social status, a producer can gain money by satisfying the desires of customers. This is because customers judge the value of the output in terms of their goals, not in terms of the personal characteristics of the producer. Customers confer money, not status. They possess money, which is easily transferable in a marketplace with open entry. The status "marketplace" is marked by its closed entry.

The difference in the free market and status is analogous to the difference between a supermarket and an exclusive club. It costs money to join the club, but money alone is not sufficient. You must be invited to join. In contrast, it costs no money to walk into a supermarket. It costs money only to carry something out of it that you did not carry into it. Money alone is sufficient. Ownership is conferred at a check-out counter. Status is not conferred at a check-out counter.

The free market allows people of low social status to become rich.

Immigrants, members of racial minorities or religious minorities, and other people who face social discrimination can achieve economic success because of the nature of imputation in a free market. Customers impute value to output rather than the status of the producer. This is a liberating force in society.

G. Judicial Status

God unilaterally and sovereignly confers the only status that counts eternally: saved or lost. Both are judicial categories. Judicial status is conferred by God, not purchased by the recipient. Jesus warned: “For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?” (Mark 8:36).¹⁵ In this sense, salvation is closer to social status than it is to class. The key issue is confirmation.

What distinguishes this judicial status from social status is the basis of the confirmation. The granting of salvation has nothing to do with the personal characteristics of the recipient. It has everything to do with the personal characteristics of the individual’s judicial representative: either Adam or Christ. Later in this epistle, Paul writes: “For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive” (I Cor. 15:22). God grants salvation—superior judicial status—to those whom He chooses. He does not make this grant based on the accomplishments of the recipient. “For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: Not of works, lest any man should boast” (Eph. 2:8–9).

Because the judicial status of salvation can be at odds with both class and social status, Paul dismisses both as spiritually peripheral matters. Both class and social status are subordinate to a person’s calling before God. This calling is the individual’s life-long working out of the original grant of salvation by God. Elsewhere, Paul writes: “Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling” (Phil. 2:12). This does not mean that we work our way into salvation. It means that we must work out the salvation that is already ours.

In chapter 3 of this epistle, Paul discusses God’s final judgment.¹⁶ God imputes value to a redeemed person’s work: gold, silver, and precious stones vs. wood, hay, and stubble (v. 12).¹⁷ He announces this retroactively on judgment day. In this sense, God acts as a customer does. He judges the value of a redeemed person's lifetime output. But this person is already redeemed. His output is an extension of his salvation, not his damnation. "If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire" (vv. 14–15). This means that the economic aspect of God's imputation is secondary to the judicial aspect of God's imputation. Personal production is important, whether we are speaking of calling or occupation, but not nearly so important as salvation, which is granted exclusively in terms of God's sovereign grace. Paul makes this clear in Romans 9: "For the scripture saith unto Pharaoh, Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might shew my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth" (vv. 17–18). Then God sovereignly grants the redeemed person's output, step by step: "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them" (Eph. 2:10). So, it is all grace.

15. Gary North, Trust and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Mark and John (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 11.

16. Chapter 3.

Conclusion

Paul recommended that each person accept a single lifetime calling in God's earthly kingdom. The person who discovers his highest area of service to God and who pursues it throughout his life is a successful person, according to God's imputation of success. This calling need not have anything to do with high monetary income. It usually has nothing to do with high social status, except perhaps negatively: making it unattainable in a covenant-breaking society. The calling is a matter of matching one's God-given talents to a God-given assignment. Freedom allows a person to make a better match-up. This is why Paul recommended that a slave accept manumission if it was offered. A high division of labor also enables a person to make a better match-up. The more opportunities for lifetime service there are, the more likely that a person will be able to match up his God-given gifts with his God-given assignment. His assignment may not have much to do with his gift of making money. His assignment is a matter of performing a unique service that is needed in the kingdom. How unique? Sufficiently unique so as to make his replacement difficult.

17. Ibid., ch. 12.

Nevertheless, a high division of labor society, which is based on monetary exchange, offers greater temptations to miss one's calling. How? Because it offers greater choice. With greater choice comes greater responsibility. The lure of money is very great. Men are then tempted to define the calling as occupation. They may choose that occupation which offers the most money. This is service to mammon rather than God. In short, there are no free lunches in this life. With greater liberty comes greater temptation. Paul did not place economic growth and the reduction of poverty on his list of desirable goals. Neither did Christ. These beneficial economic results are the products of covenant-keeping, but they are not valid substitutes for it.

9

A CONFIRMED BACHELOR'S BIAS

Now concerning virgins I have no commandment of the Lord: yet I give my judgment, as one that hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful. I suppose therefore that this is good for the present distress, I say, that it is good for a man so to be. Art thou bound unto a wife? seek not to be loosed. Art thou loosed from a wife? seek not a wife. But and if thou marry, thou hast not sinned; and if a virgin marry, she hath not sinned. Nevertheless such shall have trouble in the flesh: but I spare you. But this I say, brethren, the time is short: it remaineth, that both they that have wives be as though they had none; And they that weep, as though they wept not; and they that rejoice, as though they rejoiced not; and they that buy, as though they possessed not; And they that use this world, as not abusing it: for the fashion of this world passeth away (I Cor. 7:25–31).

The theocentric focus of this passage is service to God. The context is marriage, a covenantal institution sealed by a lawful, binding oath.¹ The concept of the self-maledictory oath is point four of the biblical covenant model.²

A. The Time Is Short

This passage is unique in the New Testament. Paul offers marital advice, but he admits that he is not speaking authoritatively. He is not laying down the law. The key phrase is “my judgment.” “Now concerning virgins I have no commandment of the Lord: yet I give my judgment, as one that hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful” (v. 25). “The wife is bound by the law as long as her husband liveth; but if her husband be dead, she is at liberty to be married to whom she will; only in the Lord. But she is happier if she so abide, after my judgment: and I think also that I have the Spirit of God" (vv. 39–40). His readers did not have to take his advice. They still don't. There is no other command in the Bible that begins with such an announcement: "Take it or leave it."

1. Ray R. Sutton, Second Chance: Biblical Blueprints for Divorce and Remarriage (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/rssecond>)

2. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

Paul was speaking in terms of a specific time frame. "But this I say, brethren, the time is short" (v. 29a). Why short? He did not say. Did he expect the imminent bodily return of Jesus Christ in final judgment? Some liberal Bible commentators argue that he did. Paul made a mistake, they say or at least imply. This interpretation undermines the doctrine of the verbal inspiration of the Bible. If Paul got the facts wrong, yet the epistle still is part of the Bible, then the entire Bible becomes suspect—guilt by association. Why was the time short? Was this a reference to eschatology: the end of history? That cannot be, unless he made a mistake. History did not end.

Did the short time frame refer to the replacement of the Old Covenant at the fall of Jerusalem?³ The period of transition from the Old Covenant to the New Covenant had about fifteen years to go when he wrote this letter. Part of that transition was Nero's year of persecution in A.D. 64/65, about a decade in the future. This persecution judicially separated Christianity from Judaism in Roman law. In A.D. 66, the revolt of the Jews in Palestine began. It did not end until it was crushed in A.D. 70. The church, having gone through its time of troubles with Nero, was not implicated in this Jewish revolt.⁴ Rome went through five emperors from A.D. 66–70, and the survivor was Vespasian, the general who, along with his son Titus, was the victor over Israel.

It is possible to make the case that Paul was looking ahead a decade to the church's time of troubles. A church member who was encumbered with a wife and children would be especially burdened. Better not to marry, Paul concluded. "Nevertheless such shall have trouble in the flesh: but I spare you" (v. 28b). But was near-term prophecy really what undergirded his marital advice? Before we can answer this with any confidence, we need to consider the context: Paul's discussion of the world.

3. Kenneth L. Gentry, Before Jerusalem Fell: Dating the Book of Revelation (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/klgbjf>)

4. Carsten Peter Thiede and Matthew D'Ancona, Eyewitness to Jesus (New York: Doubleday, 1996), pp. 48–51.

B. The World

God made the world (Acts 17:24). The world is temporary. “For the fashion of this world passeth away” (v. 31b). This world reflects God. “For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse” (Rom. 1:20).⁵ God predestined the salvation of every redeemed person before the creation of the world. “According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love” (Eph. 1:4).

The Greek word for “world”—kosmos—is broader than just the Old Covenant order. It is used in several ways in the New Testament: the creation in general, the sin-cursed biological world (Heb. 11:7; II Peter 2:5), sinful humanity (John 14:22; Rom. 5:12; II Cor. 5:19; John 17:9; II Cor. 11:32; I John 5:19), time, in contrast to eternity (Matt. 4:8; John 12:25; I Cor. 7:33; Eph. 2:12; I John 2:15), the social and economic affairs of this life (Mark 8:36), covenant-breaking society (John 7:7; 17:14; 18:36; Eph. 2:2; Col. 2:20; James 4:4), the Roman empire (Rom. 1:8), and the Mosaic law (Gal. 4:3–5). Paul in this epistle uses it most often in the sense of covenant-breaking society.⁶ But in this chapter, he uses it with respect to the social and economic affairs of life.⁷ Paul in this section is saying that the affairs of this life are inherently transitory. It was not just that the Roman civil order was transitory, or that the Old Covenant order was transitory, but the concerns of this world are transitory. This is because the world itself is transitory. Paul here returns to a theme found in Christ’s parables: the sharp contrast between this world and eternity. This world is not to be trusted. Jesus

5. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 1.

6. “But God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty” (I Cor. 1:27). “Now we have received, not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God; that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God” (I Cor. 2:12). “For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God. For it is written, He taketh the wise in their own craftiness” (I Cor. 3:19). “Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? and if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters?” (I Cor 6:2).

7. “But he that is married careth for the things that are of the world, how he may please his wife” (I Cor. 7:33). “There is difference also between a wife and a virgin. The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and in spirit: but she that is married careth for the things of the world, how she may please her husband” (I Cor. 7:34).

said that we are to lay up treasure in heaven by surrendering our treasure in history for the sake of kingdom-building projects.⁸ Paul says that Christians would be wise to avoid marriage.

Paul is speaking as a man with no ties to either family or nation. In order to serve Christ, Paul had abandoned everything except the church and his legal status as a free man, and he would eventually abandon even his freedom. He had no wife and no place to call home. Jesus had lived in a similar condition. “And Jesus saith unto him, The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head” (Matt. 8:20). Neither of them possessed any of this world’s comforts. But why did Paul recommend his pilgrim lifestyle to others? Paul is not recommending moderation; he is recommending asceticism—an asceticism that begins with sexual asceticism. “Now concerning the things whereof ye wrote unto me: It is good for a man not to touch a woman” (I Cor. 7:1). A man can legitimately enjoy what is good in this life if he already possesses it, Paul says, but he should not trust it, and if he loses it, he should not seek to replace it. Paul’s example here is the widow. “The wife is bound by the law as long as her husband liveth; but if her husband be dead, she is at liberty to be married to whom she will; only in the Lord. But she is happier if she so abide, after my judgment: and I think also that I have the Spirit of God” (vv. 39–40).

This message is in stark contrast to what God had said of Adam. “And the LORD God said, It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him an help meet for him” (Gen. 2:18). Paul’s advice leads to a different conclusion for widows than for men: serving God through serving a husband is a less happy condition for a widow than serving God alone. Yet this recommendation, if widely followed, would leave widowers without replacement wives. Adam was given a wife because he needed a helper. Paul’s advice to widows—to remain single—is in conflict with God’s advice to men in general. What of widowers? Will they be happier alone? Will they be more productive alone? Are they unlike Adam, who needed a helper? Who will help them? If they marry younger virgins, then what happens to young men who also seek to marry? If widowhood and widowerhood are in fact less productive for God’s kingdom than marriage, then Paul was recommending a widow’s personal happiness and independent productivity at the expense of a greater extension of the kingdom of

8. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 26.

God in history through the division of labor in marriage. Not only was Paul recommending a low division of labor for widows, he was implying the same thing for the men whom widows would never marry.

Paul in this passage speaks of marriage as the God-given means of channeling lust—nothing more (vv. 1–2). There is no hint of the biblical doctrine of dominion through biological multiplication (Gen. 1:28). There is no discussion of the family in terms of the division of labor, which is in contrast to his discussion of the church (I Cor. 12).⁹ His emphasis throughout this passage is on the superiority of individual service to God. “For I would that all men were even as I myself. But every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that. I say therefore to the unmarried and widows, It is good for them if they abide even as I” (vv. 7–8). He implies that an unmarried individual can serve God more effectively than a married person can because marriage is inherently worldly, unlike celibacy. He is quite forthright about this. “He that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord: But he that is married careth for the things that are of the world, how he may please his wife. There is difference also between a wife and a virgin. The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and in spirit: but she that is married careth for the things of the world, how she may please her husband” (vv. 32B–34).

Why is seeking to please a covenant-keeping spouse “caring for the world”? Why not discuss marriage as part of a program to extend the kingdom of God in history? Having denigrated the concerns of this world in this passage, he then identifies marriage as second-best to celibacy because marriage is inherently more worldly than celibacy. Yet, for a covenant-keeper, seeking to serve another human being is surely seeking to serve God. If pleasing a spouse is worldly, then every institution in this life is worldly. Elsewhere, Paul wrote that Christ loves His church as a man loves his wife (Eph. 5:25–33). Is Christ’s love for His church somehow defective because this love is expressed in history? Hardly. Then what is the problem with love for a spouse? How else are Christians to learn of Christ’s love for His church? Why did Paul identify service to a spouse as serving the world?

I think it had to do with his personal preference for mobility. A marriage covenant binds a person judicially and, to some extent, geographically. It channels the forms of service even as it channels the sex drive. Marriage places boundaries on people's choices. A married man is less mobile than a single man. Paul in this chapter identifies worldliness as institutionally restricted options: slavery and marriage. A married person is like a slave: restricted. A slave should take his freedom, if it is offered (I Cor. 7:21).¹⁰ So should a widow, he said. This implies that a widower should, too.

9. Chapter 14.

Study after study has confirmed what God told Adam: marriage is more productive than unmarried life is. It significantly reduces crime. It extends men's life expectancy. The responsibilities of marriage pressure a man to work harder and smarter. He has mouths to feed other than his own. To increase his income, he must strive to serve customers more efficiently. His restricted options persuade him to concentrate his efforts on a limited set of tasks. This furthers the division of labor. The specialization of labor increases productivity, which increases personal wealth, which increases the options available for service—maybe not the worker's, but surely the missionary families he supports through his tithe and offerings. It was a young Karl Marx, not God, who laid down this rule: “. . . in communist society, where nobody has one exclusive sphere of activity but each can become accomplished in any branch he wishes, society regulates the general production and thus makes it possible for me to do one thing today and another tomorrow, to hunt in the morning, fish in the afternoon, rear cattle in the evening, criticize after dinner, just as I have a mind, without ever becoming hunter, fisherman, shepherd or critic.”¹¹ This view of economic production is opposed to the idea of specialization of production and the division of labor.

C. Christian Stoicism

Paul is arguing that this world is not trustworthy. It is passing away. The proper emotional attitude toward a world in which the time is short, Paul says, is to go about one's activities as if the environment that makes possible the good things of life is insecure. “But this I say, brethren, the time is short: it remaineth, that both they that have wives be as though they had none; And they that weep, as though they wept not; and they that rejoice, as though they rejoiced not; and they that buy, as though they possessed not; And they that use this world, as not abusing it: for the fashion of this world passeth away” (vv. 29–31). This sounds like Stoicism: a patient emotional acceptance of the good and the bad.

0. Chapter 8.

1. Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, The German Ideology (London: Lawrence & Wishart, [1845–46] 1965), pp. 44–45.

How can a man with a wife live and think as though he were single? How can men weep or rejoice, yet do so as if they did not? How can someone buy goods, yet live as someone with no possessions? Paul does not explain any of this, here or elsewhere. Nevertheless, he says that the Corinthians must do all of these things, “for the fashion of this world passeth away.” There is no reason for a Christian not to enjoy his wife or his possessions, Paul says, but he is told to live as though he could lose both at a moment’s notice. He could lose his life, too. This was Solomon’s attitude in Ecclesiastes.

Live joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest all the days of the life of thy vanity, which he hath given thee under the sun, all the days of thy vanity: for that is thy portion in this life, and in thy labour which thou takest under the sun. Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest. I returned, and saw under the sun, that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, neither yet bread to the wise, nor yet riches to men of understanding, nor yet favour to men of skill; but time and chance happeneth to them all. For man also knoweth not his time: as the fishes that are taken in an evil net, and as the birds that are caught in the snare; so are the sons of men snared in an evil time, when it falleth suddenly upon them (Eccl. 9:9–12).¹

Solomon’s final sentence indicates that a man can pass away at any time. Paul says that the fashion of this world is passing away. Yet the world is still here. So, Paul must have meant that, as far as an individual is concerned, this world passes away, for all men pass away. A man’s time is short. The world’s time, compared to a man’s time, has been long.

What does a short life span have to do with the advantages of not marrying? If every man’s time is short, then “the present distress” had nothing to do with this universal condition. If time had been uniquely short for members of the Corinthian church, then it might have made sense for a man to avoid the added responsibility of a family. But there is no indication in the text or in the historical record that Corinth was suffering or about to suffer anything unique. On the contrary, Corinth was in a strong financial position to send money to the hard-pressed church in Jerusalem (II Cor. 9).¹³ If Paul had in mind the coming persecution of all the churches, still a decade away, then he would have warned other churches, offering the same marital advice. He did not do this in his epistles that have survived. If he was concerned about the imminent passing of the Old Covenant order, this was no threat to gentile churches. Besides, he referred to the present distress, not the distress of Jerusalem a decade or more in the future. So, what was he talking about?

1. Gary North, Autonomy and Stagnation: An Economic Commentary on Ecclesiastes (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 34.

Is his advice universal? If so, then the present distress must be universal. If the present distress is the transitory nature of this life, then his advice regarding marriage is at odds with the dominion covenant: multiplication. One of two conclusions is inescapable. First, the present distress (need), whatever it was, was unique to Corinth, and this led Paul to offer the local congregation marital advice that was different from what the creation ordinances required: marriage (Gen. 2:24) and multiplication (Gen. 1:28). Second, the present distress is a universal condition, namely, the insecurity of life, in which case, he was non-authoritatively recommending a celibacy as a superior way of life, a way of life that cannot become universal without annulling the pre-Fall dominion covenant and its renewal with Noah's family (Gen. 9:1–3).¹⁴ This would mean that Paul was recommending an elitist way of Christian living based on the absence of the sex drive. It would be convenient to affirm the first possibility—a unique situation at Corinth—but the evidence from the text points to the latter. F. W. Grosheide comments: “The reference is not to a need which was only present in Paul's own days nor to an imminent coming of the Lord whereby life on earth would lose its significance. Paul speaks in this chapter of the needs of all Christians in general (cf. v. 29 and 31). He has in view the distress which exists for every Christian at all times.”¹⁵ Conclusion: if the present distress is universal, then his recommendation is elitist.

Adults today face approximately the same time on earth that adults in Paul's day did. The life span of modern Western man is not much different from the typical life span in Moses' day. "The days of our years are threescore years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labour and sorrow; for it is soon cut off, and we fly away" (Ps. 90:10). Our time is still just about as short today as it was then. So, any difference in life expectancy facing the Corinthian church's members and what we face is not significant—surely not significant enough to recommend marriage today and recommend against it in Paul's day.

3. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 7.

4. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 18.

5. F. W. Grosheide, Commentary on the First Epistle to the Corinthians (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1953), p. 175.

We are faced with a major explanatory problem: figuring out why Paul is so emphatic here that Christians should not marry because of "the present distress," when it was the same general distress faced by mankind from Moses' day until today.

D. Paul's Defense of Celibacy

Paul suggests that taking on additional responsibilities in family life is not wise unless a person just cannot live comfortably outside of marriage. This attitude toward marriage, if extended to the institutional church, would undermine the kingdom of God. If every church member were called to be a wandering evangelist, as Paul was, the church would turn into something like the medieval friars. But the friars existed only through the charity of Christian families. That the church can use a few evangelists who are constantly on the move is obvious. That the church cannot use many of them is also obvious.

Marriage is the main topic in this passage. Paul also discussed the calling. He seemed to regard marriage as being an inferior calling, a product of most men's lack of God's special gift of no interest in sex, a gift which Paul said he had been given. Yet, overwhelmingly, the Old Covenant had favored marriage, beginning with the command to Adam to be fruitful and multiply. This is why this passage baffles commentators. Why would Paul spend so much space in praise of celibacy, when celibacy is a rare condition which, if distributed universally, would end mankind, and if distributed widely, would impoverish humanity by restricting the division of labor? Why would he recommend to Christians an attitude toward marriage that would hand over dominion to those covenant-breakers with large families?

Jesus said that some men are eunuchs for the sake of the kingdom. "For there are some eunuchs, which were so born from their mother's womb: and there are some eunuchs, which were made eunuchs of men: and there be eunuchs, which have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake. He that is able to receive it, let him receive it" (Matt. 19:12). I assume that the third variety is spiritual rather than physical. Christ was not calling men to become Skoptsi, the Russian cult that requires castration. Paul was one of Christ's eunuchs. But the gift of celibacy has to be limited by God if society is to be preserved, let alone extended. Why spend a chapter praising celibacy when celibacy is limited, and must be limited, to a handful of people? My guess is that Paul was defending his own gift and his marital condition. He was calling others to live as he did, if they possessed his gift. "For I would that all men were even as I myself. But every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that" (v. 7). But why single out widows? Did he expect them to become foreign missionaries, as he was? The practice of sending out unmarried women—not usually widows—began in late-nineteenth-century Protestant missions. This seems to have worked well as far as planting churches was concerned. But even here, there have been problems. Women cannot lawfully speak in church, according to Paul (I Cor. 14:34–35). They surely cannot lawfully be ordained as ministers. So, the lawful missionary efforts of women are limited to teaching, nursing, and support activities.

Paul does not say that widows can serve God better as single women. He says they will be happier. But why do widows generally remarry when they have the opportunity? Why have they rejected Paul's advice? I have a controversial answer: his personal advice has not applied well to most widows, despite the fact that his language seems all-inclusive. He thought that he was offering good advice to most widows. It makes more sense theologically to assume that Paul's advice here was never meant by God to be permanent.

Conclusion

Paul's initial declaration is crucial for understanding this passage: "Now concerning virgins I have no commandment of the Lord: yet I give my judgment, as one that hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful" (v. 25). He was not offering a command from God. Therefore, his personal preference for celibacy as a superior way of life can be seen as non-binding. Second, "the present distress" seems to refer to mankind's general condition: a short life in an insecure, cursed world. Jacob's confession links him to our era. "And Jacob said unto Pharaoh, The days of the years of my pilgrimage are an hundred and thirty years: few and evil have the days of the years of my life been, and have not attained unto the days of the years of the life of my fathers in the days of their pilgrimage” (Gen. 47:9). If the present distress is the human condition—life in a temporal world—then this is an affirmation of continuity between the Mosaic Covenant and the New Covenant. This means that Paul’s defense of celibacy as a superior way of life is advice for a highly restricted population. It means that the best way of life is closed to most Christians. I think Paul really believed this. This outlook is elitist, as he knew: most men are not beneficiaries of the gift of celibacy. (Happily married couples rejoice in the fact.) Paul’s outlook in this passage has reinforced the doctrine of the celibate priesthood in Roman Catholicism and has also led to the institutional elevation of monks over married clergy in Eastern Orthodoxy. Both denominations have treated Paul’s personal, non-binding opinion on bachelorhood as if it were a command from the Lord, which Paul insisted that it was not.

MEAT OFFERED TO IDOLS

As concerning therefore the eating of those things that are offered in sacrifice unto idols, we know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is none other God but one (I Cor. 8:4).

The theocentric focus of this passage idolatry. This is an aspect of point two of the biblical covenant: representation.¹

A. Idols as Representatives of Demons

An idol is nothing: a lifeless object. Paul calls it dumb: silent. “Ye know that ye were Gentiles, carried away unto these dumb idols, even as ye were led” (I Cor. 12:2). Yet the Second Commandment indicates that God regards idols as rival gods. “Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth: Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them: for I the LORD thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me; And shewing mercy unto thousands of them that love me, and keep my commandments” (Ex. 20:4–6).² This is a strict prohibition against the worship of lifeless objects. But how can a lifeless object be a god? Only through covenantal representation.

The Second Commandment is found in the first five commandments, which all have to do with priestly issues. The second five have to do with kingly issues.³ The Second Commandment is an application of point two of the biblical covenant model. David declared: "For great is the LORD, and greatly to be praised: he also is to be feared above all gods. For all the gods of the people are idols: but the LORD made the heavens" (I Chron. 16:25–26). God is above all other gods. But what were these gods? They were not gods. They were either nothing or else they were representations of demons. Hierarchy always implies representation. Who represents God in history? The commandment is clear: idols do not. We must not worship any physical representation of God. This is why prayer to icons of church-designated posthumous saints is prohibited by this commandment. So is kneeling before them.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 22.

Paul is adamant here that idols are nothing. That is, they are not the original source of power. They cannot themselves answer prayer. This is a basic Old Covenant doctrine. "But our God is in the heavens: he hath done whatsoever he hath pleased. Their idols are silver and gold, the work of men's hands. They have mouths, but they speak not: eyes have they, but they see not: They have ears, but they hear not: noses have they, but they smell not: They have hands, but they handle not: feet have they, but they walk not: neither speak they through their throat. They that make them are like unto them; so is every one that trusteth in them" (Ps. 115:3–8). Idols represent not only supernatural beings or forces but also the people who worship idols. The people who worship idols are like their idols: impotent. This condemnation rests on the assumption that God will be victorious and will bring judgment against all pretenders to divinity. He is a jealous God.

Then why did people in the ancient world and also in primitive tribes today persist in believing in idols? Because idols represent demons, and demons sometimes offer occult power to men. Paul fully understood this, as he said a few paragraphs later. "What say I then? that the idol is any thing, or that which is offered in sacrifice to idols is any thing? But I say, that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils, and not to God: and I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils" (I Cor. 10:19–20). There can sometimes be visible benefits from praying to idols and for sacrificing to them. The value of these sacrifices initially seem minimal compared to the power offered through them.

Paul is speaking here of the power of idols in themselves, as was

3. Ibid., Preface.

David. They have no power. But this does not mean that they do not serve as representatives of demons who do possess power. This is why Paul forbade participation in idolatrous meals: “Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of devils: ye cannot be partakers of the Lord’s table, and of the table of devils” (I Cor. 10:21).

B. Unholy Waste: Sacrificing to Idols

God requires sacrifice from His followers. So do demons. But God’s command to worship and sacrifice is open to all people. The command to sacrifice to a demon may not be. This is especially true inside oath-bound secret societies or clans.

Paul is writing here of meat offered to idols. Why would this concern a Christian? What opportunity would a Christian have to eat meat offered to an idol, other than at an idolatrous meal, which Paul prohibits? Answer: the meat that was offered to idols sometimes was subsequently offered for sale in the marketplace. The priestly representative of the idol could increase his income by the sale of such meat.

The question arose: Was this meat ritually tainted? Did it constitute false worship to buy something offered for sale by those priestly representatives who had received the idolatrous sacrifices on behalf of an idol? Paul says no. The idol is nothing in this free market context. Here, it does not grant power. Here, it does not command sacrifice. Formerly idolatrous meat that is offered for sale commercially has lost its rival sacramental character, which it had possessed in the context of a ritual meal or offering. The context of ritual eating was crucial to Paul’s argument. The free market had removed the ritually tainted nature of the meat. The market had made access to the meat universal and without an oath. Thus, Paul writes: “Whatsoever is sold in the shambles [butcher shop], that eat, asking no question for conscience sake: For the earth is the Lord’s, and the fulness thereof” (I Cor. 10:25–26). This precedes the section that prohibits participating in ritual meals offered to idols. The earth is the Lord’s, and the fulness thereof. Paul makes it clear that there is nothing wrong with eating meat offered to idols. The market removes all traces of ritual pollution from meat that had been offered to idols.

This principle applied in Paul’s day even when a temple was the place where the meat was purchased and eaten, where a Christian could “sit at meat in the idol’s temple” (v. 10). Some temples in Corinth sold their meat and served it on their premises. This was clearly not done during the times of their disciples' celebrations. The meat was sold to be eaten on common ground, not to be offered and then consumed in worship. Paul is clear that there is nothing intrinsically immoral with buying meat offered to idols and then consuming it on the premises of a pagan temple. By opening access to the general public, and by charging a price, the priests had converted their local temples into what we might call "spiritual theme restaurants."

C. Weak Christians and Strong Judaizers

1. Weakness

The problem of weak Christians reappears here. In Romans, Paul dealt with the same problem with respect to prohibited foods. "Him that is weak in the faith receive ye, but not to doubtful disputations. For one believeth that he may eat all things: another, who is weak, eateth herbs" (Rom. 14:1–2).⁴ What should a mature Christian do about the concerns of a weak Christian? He should defer to the weak Christian in public activities. "I know, and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus, that there is nothing unclean of itself: but to him that esteemeth any thing to be unclean, to him it is unclean. But if thy brother be grieved with thy meat, now walkest thou not charitably. Destroy not him with thy meat, for whom Christ died. Let not then your good be evil spoken of: For the kingdom of God is not meat and drink; but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost" (Rom. 14:14–17).

Christian liberty is valid, but this liberty should not be used to create doubts or guilt in the lives of weak Christians. "But take heed lest by any means this liberty of yours become a stumblingblock to them that are weak" (I Cor. 8:9). This is the context of his discussion of eating meat in a temple. "For if any man see thee which hast knowledge sit at meat in the idol's temple, shall not the conscience of him which is weak be emboldened to eat those things which are offered to idols; And through thy knowledge shall the weak brother perish, for whom Christ died? But when ye sin so against the brethren, and wound their weak conscience, ye sin against Christ. Wherefore, if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend" (vv. 10–13).

4. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 12.

What is the weak Christian's problem? He does not understand basic theology, namely, that there are no gods other than the biblical God. He does not understand that meat offered to idols is ritually prohibited only within the confines of the sacrificial ritual meal itself. Paul warns us: "Howbeit there is not in every man that knowledge: for some with conscience of the idol unto this hour eat it as a thing offered unto an idol; and their conscience being weak is defiled" (v. 9).

To what extent must mature Christians change their lifestyles for the sake of weak Christians? Paul's example is the Christian who is seen eating a meal in a pagan temple. His visibility in a public place is what constitutes the threat to a weak Christian. There is no suggestion that whatever a mature Christian eats in private is a threat to anyone's faith. So, Paul is saying to curtail public displays of legitimate liberty in Christ.⁵

2. Theological Blindness

This leads us to a related issue, one which Paul does not raise in this context, but did deal with elsewhere: the stubborn Christian who is impervious to sound doctrine. This "weakness" is really a matter of false interpretation. This is not someone who is new to the faith; this is someone who is familiar with the basic theology of Christian liberty, but who rejects it.

The classic examples of stubborn, heretical Christians in Paul's writing were members of the sect of the circumcision. They were attempting to impose the Mosaic law of circumcision on gentile Christians. He had no patience with them. He called them promoters of another gospel. He told the Galatian church, "I marvel that ye are so soon removed from him that called you into the grace of Christ unto another gospel: Which is not another; but there be some that trouble you, and would pervert the gospel of Christ" (Gal. 1:6–7). In this context, he returned to the theme of Christian liberty. "For, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another" (Gal. 5:13).

Paul had no patience for the opinions of the circumcisers. He did his best to oppose them publicly. He reported: "But when Peter was come to Antioch, I withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed. For before that certain came from James, he did eat with the

5. A related issue is the attitude of weak Christians regarding alcohol. See Appendix B.

Gentiles: but when they were come, he withdrew and separated himself, fearing them which were of the circumcision. And the other Jews dissembled likewise with him; insomuch that Barnabas also was carried away with their dissimulation. But when I saw that they walked not uprightly according to the truth of the gospel, I said unto Peter before them all, If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews? We who are Jews by nature, and not sinners of the Gentiles" (Gal. 2:11–15). He did not regard the sect of the circumcision as refuge for weak Christians. Their position was wilfully heretical. He told Peter not to alter his lifestyle out of concern for their opinions.

3. Spiritual Immaturity

Paul in this passage has in mind spiritually immature Christians who had not been exposed to accurate theology regarding the liberty of the Christian in Christ. These people were still worried about the Mosaic law's rules governing food and clothing. This passage and the passage in chapter 10 on the right to buy food in a butcher shop make it clear that the prohibitions on eating certain meats, which did not prevail prior to Moses, are hereby annulled. Paul elsewhere warns them: "Wherefore if ye be dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why, as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances, (Touch not; taste not; handle not; Which all are to perish with the using;) after the commandments and doctrines of men? Which things have indeed a shew of wisdom in will worship, and humility, and neglecting of the body; not in any honour to the satisfying of the flesh" (Col. 2:20–23). The concern over meat offered to idols was equally misplaced.

Nevertheless, weak Christians are at risk. Their consciences warn them, even when there is no sin involved. So, when asked about what he eats, the mature Christian must be patient. "But if any man say unto you, This is offered in sacrifice unto idols, eat not for his sake that shewed it, and for conscience sake: for the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof: Conscience, I say, not thine own, but of the other: for why is my liberty judged of another man's conscience? For if I by grace be a partaker, why am I evil spoken of for that for which I give thanks? Whether therefore ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God. Give none offence, neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, nor to the church of God: Even as I please all men in all things, not seeking mine own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be saved" (I Cor. 10:28–33).

Give no one offense: this is a good rule. The problem comes when circumstances dictate that the mature Christian must offend someone in order to avoid giving offense to someone else. When pressured by the Judaizers in Antioch, Peter gave offense to the gentiles. Paul warned him not to give offense to the gentiles. This warning necessarily gave offense to the Judaizers. In such cases, Christians must give offense to the legalists.

4. Judaizers

The prohibited meats of the Mosaic law were presumably also a concern of the Judaizers, just as circumcision was. Paul's authorization of meats offered to idols applied equally to meats prohibited by the Mosaic law. Peter had already been told this in his vision in Cornelius' home. "And there came a voice to him, Rise, Peter; kill, and eat. But Peter said, Not so, Lord; for I have never eaten any thing that is common or unclean. And the voice spake unto him again the second time, What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common. This was done thrice: and the vessel was received up again into heaven" (Acts 10:13–16). This, we might call a blanket authorization of meats (v. 11).

Judaizers were not weak Christians. They were not Christians at all. They preached another gospel. Paul anathematized them. "But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed. As we said before, so say I now again, If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed" (Gal. 1:8–9). So hostile was Paul to them that he adopted sarcasm as a tool of condemnation: his reference to cutting off. "And I, brethren, if I yet preach circumcision, why do I yet suffer persecution? then is the offence of the cross ceased. I would they were even cut off which trouble you. For, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another. For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this; Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. But if ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another" (Gal. 5:11–15). The key phrase is this: called unto liberty. The Judaizers were calling men back into bondage. What had been the road to liberty under the Old Covenant—circumcision—had become the road to serfdom under the New Covenant. Paul told Christians to stay off the road to serfdom. The end of the Old Covenant was at hand.

Conclusion

Christians should avoid walking down the road to serfdom. With respect to meats, the “touch not, taste not, handle not” theology is one road to serfdom. God has removed the “No Trespassing” sign from all biologically edible meats. Ritual sacrifice to idols and the demons they represent was prohibited by Paul (I Cor. 10:21). The ritual context of eating, not the meat, is what establishes the element of profanation.⁶

Weak Christians do not understand this. Neither do the modern cultic equivalents of the Judaizers. Mature Christians are supposed to respect the former and condemn the latter. The road to serfdom for the weak Christian is any violation of his conscience. Mature Christians should avoid giving offense to weak Christians by publicly refusing to participating in an activity considered profane by weak Christians. The reverse is true for dealing with Judaizers. Peter in Antioch avoided giving offense to the Judaizers by publicly withdrawing from the table of the gentiles. This gave offense to the gentiles. Their sensibilities, not the Judaizers' sensibilities, were what was important. Paul therefore condemned Peter.

6. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 21. Cf. North, “The Annulment of the Dietary Laws,” ICE Position Paper, No. 2 (Nov. 1984), a reprint of my 1970 essay. (<http://bit.ly/DietaryLaws>) R. J. Rushdoony’s advocacy of the Mosaic laws governing unclean meats undermined his theology of grace. John Calvin took a strong stand against any revival of the Mosaic Covenant’s dietary laws. “As touching meats, after the abrogating of the law, God pronounceth that they are all pure and clean. If, on the other side, there start up a mortal man, making a new difference, forbidding certain, he taketh unto himself the authority and power of God by sacrilegious boldness. Of this stamp were the old heretics, Montanus, Priscillianus, the Donatists, the Tatians, and all the Encratites. Afterwards the Pope, to the end he might bind all those sects in a bundle, made a law concerning meats. And there is no cause why the patrons of this impiety should babble that they do not imagine any uncleanness in meats, but that men are forbidden to eat flesh upon certain days, to tame the flesh. For seeing they eat such meats as are most fit, both for delicacy and also for riot, why do they abstain from eating bacon, as from some great offence, save only because they imagine that that is unclean and polluted which is forbidden by the law of their idol? With like pride doth the tyranny of the Pope rage in all parts of life; for there is nothing wherein he layeth not snares to entangle the miserable consciences of men. But let us trust to the heavenly oracle, and freely despise all his inhibitions. We must always ask the mouth of the Lord, that we may thereby be assured what we may lawfully do; forasmuch as it was not lawful even for Peter to make that profane which was lawful by the Word of God.” John Calvin, Commentary upon the Acts of the Apostles, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker, [1560] 1979), I, pp. 422–23.

By passing meat through a market transaction, any trace of pagan ritual is removed from the meat. The public exchange of goods, money for meat and vice versa, de-sacralizes meat that has been offered to idols. Eating such meat is therefore not a profane act. The customer violates no unholy boundary. To cross from common ground into unholy ground constitutes a profane act for Christians. To participate in unholy communion with demons is a profane act for Christians. But this has nothing to do with eating meat that has been sold to the public. The sale removes the unholy element of the meat. The meat needs no special prayer, no holy water, to cleanse it ritually. All it needs is a market.

11

RETAINING THE FRUITS OF OUR LABOR

Who goeth a warfare any time at his own charges? who planteth a vineyard, and eateth not of the fruit thereof? or who feedeth a flock, and eateth not of the milk of the flock? Say I these things as a man? or saith not the law the same also? For it is written in the law of Moses, Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn. Doth God take care for oxen? Or saith he it altogether for our sakes? For our sakes, no doubt, this is written: that he that ploweth should plow in hope; and that he that thresheth in hope should be partaker of his hope (1 Cor. 9:7–10).

The theocentric principle here is God as the caretaker. He takes care of oxen, and He takes care of His people. This is different from the more familiar description of God as the owner. Ownership is derived from part one of the biblical covenant: sovereignty.¹ Caretaking is an aspect of point two: guarding.²

A. Paying Ministers a Salary

The conclusion that Paul reaches is that ministers of the gospel have a moral claim on a portion of the tithes of the members. Paul possesses the same claim, he tells them, but he has chosen not to ask for support.

If we have sown unto you spiritual things, is it a great thing if we shall reap your carnal things? If others be partakers of this power over you, are not we rather? Nevertheless we have not used this power; but suffer all things, lest we should hinder the gospel of Christ. Do ye not know that they which minister about holy things live of the things of the temple? and they which wait at the altar are partakers with the altar? Even so hath the Lord ordained that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel (I Cor. 9:11–14).

1. Gary North, Inherit the Earth (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/gninherit>).

2. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

This is the same conclusion that he reached in his other citation of this Mosaic law. “Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour, especially they who labour in the word and doctrine. For the scripture saith, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn. And, The labourer is worthy of his reward” (I Tim. 5:17–18).¹ Ministers of the gospel perform services that deserve funding by the churches’ members.

This conclusion rests on the Mosaic law governing oxen. This obscure law remains binding in the New Testament era. The ox has a legal claim on the field’s owner. The ox cannot speak for itself. The authorities must be prepared to intervene on its behalf. This means that someone has a legal obligation before God to intervene on behalf of a muzzled ox and report the infraction to civil or ecclesiastical authorities. This law establishes the legitimacy of private organizations such as the Humane Society and the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.²

Paul then moves to the more general principle: labor and hire. Here, there is no need for a third party to intervene. The participants are humans. They can bargain with each other regarding appropriate payment for work rendered. There is no legal claim beyond the terms of the contract or agreement because of the humanity of the actors. Similarly with ministers: there is no legal claim. But there is a moral claim. Paul argues that if an ox has a legally enforceable claim on payment from their owners, surely ministers possess a moral claim on church support. But to reach this conclusion, he passes through a more general application of this case law: the laborer is worthy of his hire.

B. Costs and Benefits

Paul begins with a rhetorical question: “Who goeth a warfare any

1. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 8.

2. Both organizations have headquarters in the United States.

time at his own charges?” The assumption here is that a warrior does not seek his own personal economic advantage when he goes into battle. He is serving the state and, in theory at least, the society that is represented politically by the state. Others in society will benefit from his efforts on the battlefield. He is therefore not asked by the state to pay his personal costs of service to the state. Paul implies here that there is a relationship between gaining a unique personal advantage and bearing the expenses of one’s activities. Where there is no unique personal advantage, there should be no personally born expenses.

This implication is reinforced by two more rhetorical questions. “Who planteth a vineyard, and eateth not of the fruit thereof? or who feedeth a flock, and eateth not of the milk of the flock?” A person who makes an expenditure out of his own assets is entitled to reap the fruits of his labor, his capital, his planning, and his vision.

Paul used rhetorical questions. Why? Because the logic that undergirded his conclusion he regarded as so persuasive that he did not have to spell out and then defend the logical steps in his argument. He expected the reader or listener to be able to perceive the logic of his argument. He also expected the reader to accept the truth of his argument. By comparing the three rhetorical questions, we find a common thread: the relationship between costs and benefits. First, he who does not benefit economically should not bear the economic costs of keeping him on duty. Second, he who bears the costs should also reap the benefits.

“Say I these things as a man? or saith not the law the same also?” Paul adds that he is not merely appealing to human reason by means of logic. He implies here that an appeal to logic possesses less authority than an appeal to Scripture. To say something as a man is one thing, but when the Scripture says something that verifies logic, men can legitimately have greater confidence in what is being said. Paul appeals to logic by means of rhetorical questions, but his appeal to Scripture possesses greater authority, he implies.

C. Plowing in Hope

“Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn” (Deut. 25:4). This Mosaic law protected the ox’s interests. The ox was entitled to be fed by the field that he had previously plowed.³ Paul adds: "For our sakes, no doubt, this is written: that he that ploweth should plow in hope; and that he that thresheth in hope should be partaker of his hope" (v. 10). Like the ox, so is the producer who allocates resources to produce a finished good or service in the future. Because he has invested time, raw materials, money, and labor into the project, including a plan of production, he is entitled to benefit from his investment. This is his hope. It is a biblically legitimate hope. It is why he made the investment in the first place. His original hope was his motivation for his subsequent productivity. This hope may be thwarted by unforeseen events, but from a legal standpoint, it is based on the concept that the laborer is worthy of his hire, that the fruits of his labor, time, capital, and money are his.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 63.

This is the great hope, when defended by the courts, that has produced the West's free market economy, with its enormous per capita wealth.⁴ It is a hope secured by civil law: property rights. Property rights are enforceable legal claims for an owner to use his resources in ways determined best by him and for him. Most important, an owner has the legal right to exclude others from using his property, just as God excluded Adam from the forbidden tree. He can legally sell this right permanently or rent it to others temporarily. This view of property is the basis of the eighth commandment: "Thou shalt not steal" (Ex. 20:15).⁵ It also is the basis of the tenth commandment. "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife, nor his manservant, nor his maidservant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor any thing that is thy neighbour's" (Ex. 20:17).⁶ It is also the basis of other Mosaic laws.

1. Property Rights

In a book-long defense of private property, Roman Catholic social commentator Tom Bethell linked property rights and Christianity. Christianity defends the justice of private ownership.

Rights may be defined as "just claims," but in relation to the state, they refer to aspects of the human person that belong to us in consequence of our nature. If we are deprived of them without due process, injustice is done. The rise of the doctrine of rights is a facet of the slow democratization of life in the West, and may owe its origin to the influence of Christianity. “All equal are within the Church’s gate,” George Herbert wrote. The privileges of rank will not carry weight on Judgment Day—they may turn out to be a disadvantage, in fact. This theological insight was by degrees transported into the secular realm: All men were created equal, and although individual men might differ greatly in the “content of their character,” in their talents and in their aptitudes, they should be presumed equal in their rights, and should be treated equally by the law.

4. Douglas C. North and Robert Paul Thomas, The Rise of the Western World: A New Economic History (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1973).

5. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 28.

6. Ibid., ch 30.

The argument here is that it is self-defeating to talk of protecting individual rights if the right to own property is not prominent among them. At the most general level, the phrase “life, liberty, and property” does outline our most fundamental rights. As an eighteenth-century Virginian (Arthur Lee) said: “The right of property is the guardian of every other right, and to deprive a people of this is in fact to deprive them of their liberty.” This truth became obscured in the twentieth century, especially in the period of false hopes for collectivism. It is imperative that it be revived today.⁷

An individual who possesses legal title to specific property is burdened with legal responsibilities for the use of this property. God holds him responsible for the use of his property. So does the civil government. For example, he may not physically injure others with it. Society also holds the owner responsible through the free market’s bidding process. At all times, there are competing bids for the use of scarce resources. The owner or the renter of property pays a price—forfeited income—whenever he refuses to sell this property or allow others to pay him to use it. This is a cost imposed on him by other market participants. There is no escape from this responsibility of ownership. It passes to the new owner along with lawful title.

When an owner decides to use a particular resource as an input in some production process, he thwarts the desires of competing producers who are bidding for this resource. The owner then allocates this property on behalf of future customers, possibly including himself, who will want the final product to solve their problems or fulfill their dreams. The owner decides to use the asset in a particular way. This excludes other ways. Someone must accept this allocational responsibility in society. If the asset is to be put to its highest and best use, someone with legal authority over the asset must decide which use is highest and best. In a free market social order, the owner makes this decision. He is legally sovereign over the asset. He possesses legal title to it. By legally linking (a) title to an asset and the income it generates with (b) full economic responsibility for any physical damages imposed by the asset (Ex. 21:28–32,⁸ 35–36;⁹ Ex. 22:5–6¹⁰), the Bible necessarily promotes a free market economy: the private ownership of both the means of production and the fruits of production. The Bible is not neutral toward the free market. It provides a blueprint for establishing a free market economy.¹¹ This is why Christian opponents of a free market economy vehemently deny that the Bible provides blueprints for any economic system. They know that the Old Testament condemns their anti-market views.

7. Tom Bethell, The Noblest Triumph: Property and Prosperity Through the Ages (New York: St. Martin’s, 1998), pp. 169–70.

2. Costs of Protection

A civil government is supposed to protect every individual under its jurisdiction. Individuals should be defended by the state against fraud or coercion by others who seek to take possession of the existing owners' assets. The higher the risk of theft for any item, the greater the value of scarce resources that are necessary to protect ownership rights. This reduces the supply of high-risk items that are unprotected by civil law.

The costs of protecting assets take many forms. These costs reduce the producer's net income. He therefore produces fewer goods than he would have, had the threats not existed, or had the state defended his right of ownership more effectively. These costs may persuade him to raise the selling price, thereby reducing the number of potential buyers. The excluded buyers are harmed. The seller is harmed, too: reduced sales and income. Or, the owner may lose control over the item when a thief is successful. These economic effects hurt the customer. They also hurt the producer. The end result is reduced production, as producers allocate resources to protection instead of production. This lowers the wealth of individuals and also of society. The thief is benefitted, but his benefit leads to reduced wealth for productive, honest people.

8. North, Authority and Dominion, Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 40.

9. Ibid., ch. 42.

10. Ibid., ch. 44.

11. North, Inherit the Earth.

The thief may be the state. In our day, the state's level of taxation and its degree of regulatory control over the production process¹² make it the most effective thief in man's history. The level of theft is literally beyond calculation. Producers and customers labor under the burden of confiscation of half or more of their output. The loss imposed by the state's theft is more predictable than the loss imposed by a private thief. This makes its burden a cost of production. It becomes more manageable because of its predictability. But the burden is enormous.

D. The Ownership of Inputs and Output

Output requires inputs. This is a law of economic scarcity. We cannot get something for nothing. A man looks at his options, and concludes, "If I want something that I can consume or sell, I must first produce something from the resources that are available to me." He looks at what is available, and he then attempts to forecast the future. He asks: "What will someone be willing to pay me in exchange for my output? What will it cost me to produce this output? Will it produce a gain or a loss?" Then he decides whether the project is worth pursuing.

If he must assemble resources over time in order to gain control over future output, he wants legal protection for whatever it is that he produces. If he spends time and resources in producing an item that is then taken from him without warning, he becomes a loser. He has worked, unpaid, for someone else. He has sown, but another has harvested the crop. Paul says that no rational person will do this. "Who goeth a warfare any time at his own charges? who planteth a vineyard, and eateth not of the fruit thereof? or who feedeth a flock, and eateth not of the milk of the flock?" (v. 7). An individual expends resources in planting a vineyard or feeding a flock of animals. He expects to gain a reward for his efforts. There is nothing immoral about a person's desire to gain a positive net return from an expenditure of scarce resources, including time. This is normal. It is sufficiently normal that Paul uses these examples as evidence of what rational people do.

2. James Bovard wrote two books on regulatory outrages by the United States government. Lost Rights: The Destruction of American Liberty (New York: St. Martins, 1994); "Feeling Your Pain": The Explosion & Abuse of Government Power in the Clinton-Gore Years (New York: St. Martins, 2000). On the background to this loss of liberty, see Bovard, Freedom in Chains: The Rise of the State and the Demise of the Citizen (New York: St. Martins, 1999).

Logical as this sounds, Paul is not content here to appeal solely to human logic. He invokes biblical law: “Say I these things as a man? or saith not the law the same also?” (v. 8). The biblical law in question is this one: “Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn” (Deut. 25:4).¹³ On the surface, this is an obscure, narrowly constrained law, yet Paul invokes it here and also in his first epistle to Timothy (I Tim. 5:17–18).¹⁴ This principle of morally legitimate compensation is at the heart of the free market economy. It is not wrong to seek a reward for one’s labors, any more than it is wrong for a working ox to seek food on the job.

God has assigned to mankind a task: to subdue the earth as God’s agent. This task mandates fruitfulness. “And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth” (Gen. 1:28).¹⁵ Mankind is supposed to add value to God’s creation. Each individual is supposed to add value to whatever God has entrusted to him. This is what it means to be a profitable servant.

How does a producer add value? By altering resources in such a way that they better meet the desires of customers. How does he know when he has done this? Whenever customers pay him more to buy his output than it cost him to produce it. An exception to this rule of thumb for estimating profitability may be the profitable sale of a good or service to the civil government. The producer has created value for himself, but at the expense of taxpayers, some of whom are less well off because of these costs. Others, however, may be benefited. This raises the complex issue of social costs.¹⁶

My main point here is this: there is an imputation of final economic value by customers. Only after a producer has sold his output can he know whether he has added value in the eyes of customers. If he has not made a return on his investment equal to the value of all the inputs, including the income he could otherwise have earned as a salaried worker, and also the interest payment for time that his capital might otherwise have earned, then he has subtracted value: the

3. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 62.

4. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: [2001] 2012), ch. 8.

5. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 4.

6. North, Authority and Dominion, Appendix H.

forfeited income of the scarce economic resources that he used to produce the goods he offered for sale.

Conclusion

The delegated goal of all economic activity is to add value to God's creation. A legitimate motivation for working to add value is to secure the added value for oneself. God requires a tithe of 10 percent of the net increase in income. Beyond this, a producer lawfully retains the surplus. He must pay taxes, but total taxes must be limited to less than 10 percent of net income (I Sam. 8:15, 17).¹⁷

Value hoped for leads to productive activities: men's re-structuring of the creation. These re-structuring activities may or may not result in value added to society. The free market allows customers to determine whether or not they regard these activities, in retrospect, as having added value. Customers determine this by buying or not buying the output of the production process at prices that generate revenues sufficient to compensate the producer for his expenditures.

The legal right to bid is the customer's tool of economic authority. Making bids is how customers gain their ends. They are legally authorized to make bids, and anyone who rejects a bid suffers an economic loss: whatever was bid and was then turned down. He may then decide to consume whatever he owns, but he cannot do this at zero price. He forfeits something: ownership of whatever was bid.

In order to encourage men to devote the time, money, risk, and planning required to produce for future customers, the Bible establishes a legal and moral principle: the ox is not to be muzzled when he treads out the corn. This Mosaic legal principle means that the laborer is worthy of his hire (I Tim. 5:18) and the plowman should plow in hope (I Cor. 9:10). It means that privately owned property must be respected by individuals and their representative institutions. There is no eleventh commandment: "Thou shalt not steal, except by majority vote."

7. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 14.

12

RUNNING THE RACE

Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain. And every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible. I therefore so run, not as uncertainly; so fight I, not as one that beateth the air: But I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection: lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway (I Cor. 9:24–27).

The theocentric issue here is reward: sanctions, point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. For the Sake of a Prize

No one enters a race to lose it, unless he has been paid to lose. A gambler would pay a favored athlete to lose a race. So would a rich relative of the man expected to come in second. But no one on his own authority suffers the years of training required to win a race, and then runs to lose. He runs with all of his strength.

Paul says that the person seeks a reward: the prize. The prize may be merely a cheap piece of metal or a cheap ribbon. The reward represents the victory. It is a public testimony to the owner's position, at a particular place and time, as the best performer.

There is a payoff for victory. The athlete does not run a race merely for the joy of running. He could run on his own, without a crowd watching. He would not risk the agony of defeat² for the sake of

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. The phrase "agony of defeat" comes from a weekly American television show, Wide World of Sports, the fist mass audience sports show. A ski jumper became the glory. But there would be no acclaim.

The idea that biblical ethics is not grounded in public acclaim is nonsense. At the heart of the Christian life is the desire for reward. This reward is not exclusively earthly. The final payoff is beyond the grave at the final judgment. There are the equivalents of precious metals and jewels to be received. There is also the possibility of wood, hay, and stubble (I Cor. 3:12–15).³ This will be public: “Every man’s work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it” (3:13a). This will not be revealed in private. The goal is an incorruptible crown (v. 25). Incorruptible wealth is available only after death, when covenant-keepers receive their incorruptible bodies. “For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality” (I Cor. 15:53).

Paul tells his listeners that the Christian walk is not a walk: it is a run. There is no time to spare. There is no strength to spare. This is consistent with what he told the church at Rome: this is a time for maximum sacrifice: the whole of our lives (Rom. 12:1–2).⁴

B. Training to Win

“But I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection” (v. 27a). This is a matter of self-discipline. As a disciple of Christ, Paul imposed self-discipline. As a representative of Christ, he sacrificed the good things of life, as interpreted by the pagan world. He suffered for the gospel’s sake. This was the cost of discipleship.

This is no doctrine of “think and grow rich.”⁵ This is not “name it and claim it.”⁶ This is a lifetime of hard work and personal self-sacrifice.

visual incarnation of the agony of defeat: <http://bit.ly/AgonyOfDefeat>. Decades later, the show did a detailed look at how this video was made: <http://bit.ly/AgonyOfDefeat2>. The word “Agony” comes from the Greek word agonia. It referred to war and sports. It was at the heart of classical Greek culture. Jacob Burkhardt, The Greeks and Greek Civilization (New York: St. Martins, [1872] 1999), Book II, Ch. III.

3. Chapter 3.

4. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 8.

5. This is the title of a personal success manual that sold by the millions in the United States.

6. This is the slogan of a heretical movement within charismatic Christianity, sometimes called “positive confession.” It is very popular in the poverty-stricken third world. Its emphasis is on mental contortions of faith in great personal wealth, not on planning, thrift, education, and a lifetime of hard work.

The philosopher Immanuel Kant argued that ethics, if valid, must not seek personal rewards from ethical action. “But if we do good because of the advantage or pleasure which we derive from the act, the ground of impulse is not moral. Virtue is good in itself and does not need false support.”⁷ This position is anti-Christian to the core.

Paul tells his listeners that the Christian life is strenuous. It need not be physically strenuous, although Paul’s was, which he informed the church in his second letter (II Cor. 11:23–27). But whether physical or not, the faithful Christian is expected by God to work hard in order to be a good servant. He should work as hard as an athlete trains.

C. Earthly Rewards

This brings us to a controversial topic. There can be no doubt that Paul worked for a public reward. He said so plainly. But this does not mean that he worked for an earthly reward. His experience of persecution (I Cor. 11:23–27) testifies otherwise. He did not go through that as a way to increase his wealth.

Here, the Mosaic Covenant is relevant. Societies experience positive external sanctions in terms of their faithfulness in obeying biblical law (Lev. 26, Deut. 28). The Book of Job rests on the long-term predictability of personal covenant sanctions in history.⁸ To argue that there is a radical discontinuity between historical sanctions and eternal sanctions is a denial of the continuity of the Bible, Old Covenant to New Covenant. The Old Covenant had no clear doctrine of final judgment and reward. It makes no sense to argue that the New Covenant reversed the system of sanctions in the Mosaic Covenant. God has given additional revelation. Historical sanctions are a testimony to eternal sanctions. The church will not snatch victory out of the jaws of defeat at the end of time. The church will participate in the extension of the civilization of Christ, which is the meaning of the kingdom of Christ.

Amillennialism teaches otherwise. So does dispensational premillennialism with respect to the dispensation of the church.⁹ This is why both eschatological systems are mute with respect to social

7. Immanuel Kant, Lectures on Ethics (New York: Harper Torchbooks, [1780–81], 1963), p. 75.

8. Gary North, Predictability and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Job (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012).

9. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>) theory, including economic theory. They cannot identify any New Testament social sanctions. This was mandatory under the Mosaic Covenant. They have not devised explicitly biblical theories of social order. So, they deny that any theory of Christian society or social order is valid. They all commit to political pluralism.¹⁰

The idea that Christians must content themselves with internal victory over sin, but tolerate defeat for the kingdom of God in history, has led to three centuries of compromise with the existing world order. Christians have settled for a temporary cease-fire with the humanists. It is clear that this is not possible with Islam, but not until the twenty-first century has this awareness penetrated the thinking of Christians.¹ They perceive that Islam does not want compromise with Western secular culture. It therefore wants no compromise with Christians who have compromised with humanist culture.

Conclusion

Paul's metaphor of the Christian life as race points to victory. It points to victory in history when it is informed by the system of social sanctions outlined in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28.

Both amillennialism and premillennialism deny that such a system of sanctions exists in the New Covenant. They do not defend this exegetically. They do not offer a biblically developed hermeneutic that establishes the case for such a discontinuity between the covenants. They merely assert it. In doing so, they undermine any attempt to create explicitly biblical social theory, including Christian economics.

0. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), chaps. 3–5. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

1. For Americans, the events of September 11, 2001, were the turning point: the hijacked airliners crashed into the twin towers of New York City.

13

THE POLITICS OF PLUNDER

Let no man seek his own, but every man another's wealth (1 Cor. 10:24).

The theocentric principle here is service to God through service to other people. This is point two of the biblical covenant: hierarchy.¹

A. Prohibited Feasts

The tenth chapter of First Corinthians deals with temptation. The key verse is verse 13: “There hath no temptation taken you but such as is common to man: but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it.” The next verse applies this command to a specific sin: idolatry. “Wherefore, my dearly beloved, flee from idolatry.”

Christians participate in the Lord’s Supper. “The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ?” (v. 16). In this, Christians attain ecclesiastical unity. “For we being many are one bread, and one body: for we are all partakers of that one bread” (v. 17). Participation in a ritual meal bonds the participants with the supernatural being in whose name or honor the meal is being celebrated. “Behold Israel after the flesh: are not they which eat of the sacrifices partakers of the altar?” (v. 18).

The issue of applied ethics here is the offering of sacrifices to idols, which represent devils. “What say I then? that the idol is any thing, or that which is offered in sacrifice to idols is any thing? But I say, that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils, and not to God: and I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils” (vv. 19–20). The idol is nothing in itself. Paul has insisted on this previously. “As concerning therefore the eating of those things that are offered in sacrifice unto idols, we know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is none other God but one” (I Cor. 8:4).² What is something, however, is a devil who is represented by an idol, and ultimately, the system of supernatural, covenant-breaking power in which devils participate. So, the participant must choose which feast represents the one true God: the idolatrous feast or the Lord’s Supper. Paul warns: “Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of devils: ye cannot be partakers of the Lord’s table, and of the table of devils” (v. 21). Then he asks two rhetorical questions. “Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? are we stronger than he?” (v. 22). We must not make him jealous. “Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth: Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them: for I the LORD thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me” (Ex. 20:4–5).³

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

Then comes a famous statement: “All things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient: all things are lawful for me, but all things edify not” (v. 23). What is he speaking about? Is he saying that it is lawful for him to participate in idolatrous feasts, but merely inexpedient? No, because he has already prohibited such participation, not on the basis of expedience, but on the basis of avoiding God’s jealousy. The second commandment also prohibits idolatry for the same reason. Then what is he speaking about? He is speaking eating meat that has been offered to idols. “Whatsoever is sold in the shambles [butcher shops], that eat, asking no question for conscience sake: For the earth is the Lord’s, and the fulness thereof” (vv. 25–26). A Christian is also entitled to attend a common social feast hosted by a covenant-breaker. “If any of them that believe not bid you to a feast, and ye be disposed to go; whatsoever is set before you, eat, asking no question for conscience sake” (v. 27). This is an aspect of Christian liberty. But Christian liberty has self-imposed limits.

2. Chapter 10.

3. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 22.

But if any man say unto you, This is offered in sacrifice unto idols, eat not for his sake that shewed it, and for conscience sake: for the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof: Conscience, I say, not thine own, but of the other: for why is my liberty judged of another man's conscience? (vv. 28–29)

This is the context of verse 24: “Let no man seek his own, but every man another’s wealth.” The translators inserted the word wealth. Paul had in mind wealth in the broadest sense: well-being or welfare. He says that each Christian is to seek another person’s good or benefit.

B. Personal Gain Through Ritual Subordination

Paul tells his readers that they may lawfully eat meat that has already been offered to idols. They may not lawfully eat meat while it is being offered to idols. What is the difference? Answer: the presence or absence of the element of ritual sacrifice. When men exchange money for meat, they are not involved in sacramental rites. They are merely seeking to assuage their hunger. They must give up something in order to gain something in voluntary exchange. When they attend a social feast, they eat meat that has been purchased by their hosts for money. In contrast, when men offer meat to idols, and then partake of this sacramental meat, they are not seeking to assuage their hunger. This is why Paul tells Christians to eat before they attend the Lord’s Supper: so that they will not be hungry at the communion meal (I Cor. 11:21–22). Similarly, in their covenant meals, covenant-breakers ritually confirm a demonic covenant in acts of covenant renewal. Participation in such pagan meals is prohibited to covenant-keepers.

What do sacrificial offerings have to do with seeking personal gain? The motivation of the participant is either to gain positive sanctions from the god to whom the meat is offered, or else to avoid the god’s negative sanctions. The sacrificer’s goal in either case is self-centered. The participant invokes the name of the idol in an attempt to secure a personal advantage.

The sacrificer surrenders something in his quest for personal gain. He offers something of value to an idol: public subordination. This is of value to the devil represented by the idol because it is a covenant-breaking act. This was the original sin of Adam. The participant in the demonic festival offers sacrifice under the officiating authority of the idol's priestly agents. We know this because these agents subsequently sell the meat to the general public. This was the issue confronting Paul. "Whatsoever is sold in the shambles [butcher shop], that eat, asking no question for conscience sake" (v. 25).

There was nothing wrong with buying meat from a middleman who operated in between a pagan feast and the buyer. Not all of the meat was consumed at the feast. The excess meat was then sold by the priest to a specialist in meat sales. This act removed the meat's unholy status. It was even legal to eat in the temple's public restaurant (I Cor. 8:10).¹ What was wrong was offering anything to the idol during a covenantal feast that sought aid from the supernatural being represented by the idol. This act of ritual subordination affirmed the power of devils by way of idols. This affirmation is what Paul prohibits.

C. The Re-allocation of Wealth

To sacrifice to an idol is to invoke the authority of devils to impose their sanctions in history. But there is nothing wrong, Paul says, with buying meat from the priests of idols. This is a transaction based on the principle of value for value. The exchange does not invoke supernatural power.

How does a devil reward his worshippers? He must intervene in history to provide them with something that they believed that they could not buy through their own productivity. The sacrificer turns to supernatural power as a way to attain his goals at a below-market price. He seeks to gain something of greater value to him than the value of the asset sacrificed to the idol.

A devil is not originally creative. Only God is originally creative. A devil cannot grant favors in a world of cursed scarcity without re-allocating assets from existing owners to new owners. He cannot autonomously offer something for nothing, or something of value for something of less value. To offer anything to his followers, he must first steal it. Satan is a thief and a squatter. He confiscated Adam's inheritance through his successful deception of Eve (I Tim. 2:14) and his successful temptation of Adam. Whatever he possesses, he possesses only by God's common grace² or by prior theft, temptation, or deception.

1. Chapter 10.

2. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/gndcgr>)

By invoking the power of devils, the sacrificer calls on them to re-allocate assets, including power, away from what God and God's social order have established as lawful. The sacrificer asks a devil or devils to overcome the results of the operations of God's common-grace social order, which is a private property-based order. He seeks his own ends at the expense of others in society, and he expects a devil to provide this. To the degree that the sacrificer's prayers are answered, wealth moves from covenant-keepers to covenant-breakers, or from productive covenant-breakers to less productive covenant-breakers. Under such a system, the wealth of the just is laid up for the sinner. This thwarts God's social order. "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov. 13:22).³

The sacrificer seeks to become the recipient of coercive wealth redistribution. He appeals to a devil through an idol to act on his behalf because of his sacrifice. He gives up something of market value—meat and time—to gain something of so much greater market value, that whatever he offers in exchange could not have purchased whatever it is that he seeks. He seeks his own wealth at the expense of someone else. He cares nothing about the loss that will be suffered by others in the hoped-for redistribution of wealth. He seeks his own gain at their expense.

Paul is implicitly saying here that it is not just the participation in unholy feasts that is wrong. He is saying that the mental attitude behind participation in this feast is also wrong. The participant seeks his own goals at the expense of others. He implicitly seeks to make it more difficult for others to attain their goals. This is not legitimate, Paul says. This is not the way of personal sacrifice. It is the way of coercing others to sacrifice for the benefit of the ritual feast's participants.

D. With Whose Assets?

Paul tells covenant-keepers to offer a very valuable sacrifice to God. "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service" (Rom. 12:1).⁴ One way to do this is to sacrifice some degree of your personal comfort for the sake of greater comfort of others. You forfeit what could have been yours for the sake of benefiting others. You re-allocate your wealth on behalf of others.

3. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 41.

4. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 7.

This is not the way of the world. The familiar practice is for men to seek their own ends at the expense of others. This is the heart of pagan sacrifice. Pagan sacrifice should be cut off at the root, not just at the branch. Covenant-keepers are to sacrifice to God on behalf of others, just as Christ did for covenant-keepers. “Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus: Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God: But made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross” (Phil. 2:5–8).⁵

This is what charity is all about: sacrificing one’s own wealth on behalf of others, asking nothing from them in return. There is nothing coercive about this. The person who aids another by means of what belongs to him has not used power to redistribute other men’s wealth on behalf of the recipient. In this sense, the sacrificer has not imitated Satan, who always uses evil to gain the assets that he then provides to his followers or to those covenant-keepers who have been deceived by him or his covenant-breaking subordinates.

An ethical problem may arise when someone decides to act on behalf of others, but not through the use of his own assets. He decides that someone else is deserving of support or aid of some kind. He decides that someone should sacrifice for the sake of this third party. He decides that this unnamed someone who should sacrifice is someone other than himself, or at least someone in addition to himself. If he appeals to the sense of charity in someone else, inviting him to join in a righteous cause of self-sacrifice, there is no coercion involved. There is no violation of ownership rights: the eighth commandment. But if the joint-sacrificer is compelled by threat of violence—legal or illegal—to sacrifice on behalf of another person, then the organizer of the “campaign to seek other’s wealth” has violated the eighth commandment. “Thou shalt not steal” (Ex. 20:15).⁶ Notice that this command does not say, “Thou shalt not steal, except by majority vote.”

5. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point five Press, 2012), ch. 20.

6. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 28.

Democracy degenerates into the politics of plunder when groups of voters ally with other groups in order to confiscate wealth from still another group and transfer it to yet another group—or maybe to themselves. This strategy is a system of buying votes from those who receive the plunder. This concept of democracy is the politics of two wolves and a sheep who vote on what to have for dinner.

Far more important than openly seeking to buy votes from the groups that receive the political plunder, this system of democracy is motivated by the goal of subtly buying votes from successful people who seek to assuage their consciences through helping the afflicted, not merely with their own money, but with other people's money. These would-be sacrificers understand that an appeal to voluntary sacrifice on behalf of others will rarely produce as much money as the threat of violence imposed by the civil government. Through politics or, in the United States, through the courts, they seek to gain control over the state, which is the only lawful monopoly of violence outside the family's lawful bounds. They adopt the politics of plunder in order to assuage their consciences, to incorporate their vision of a just and righteous social order, and to gain more votes at the next election. Their political goal is to steal from collective Paul to pay to collective Peter, minus about 50% for government handling.

This is what Satan also does. He has no assets of his own. He steals from some in order to reward others. In doing so, he seeks to extend his kingdom, which is based on the violation of all 10 commandments, including the commandment not to steal. The sacrificer at a demonic ritual feast who invokes demonic power in order to gain his own ends is not different in economic principle from the voter who subordinates himself to the state in order to gain his own ends by using the state's power to extract wealth from others. The devil is expected by the sacrificer to intervene in history on his behalf. So is the state expected by the voter to intervene on his behalf. A devil owns nothing that he has not confiscated from others, either through an appeal to sin, or the threat of violence, or the use of deception. The state, unlike a devil, possesses legitimate though limited authority and therefore legitimate limited power, but when it arrogates additional power to itself in order to use this power to redistribute wealth from one group to another, it has adopted the politics of plunder, which is in accord with Satan's view of his kingdom.

Conclusion

“Let no man seek his own, but every man another’s wealth” (v. 24). This is not a call to use state power to benefit the helpless, or, what is far more common in modern democracies, to benefit the middle class, which is the income group that most of the confiscated wealth actually subsidizes.⁷ Rather, this is a call for sacrificial giving on the part of the listeners. It is a call for them to extend God’s kingdom through voluntary sacrifice. It is not a call for them to organize politically to extend Satan’s kingdom by the coercive redistribution of wealth owned by covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers alike.

“Let no man seek his own, but every man another’s wealth.” If taken out of context, this verse could be interpreted as advocating universal theft and violence. If we are to seek another person’s wealth for ourselves, why not steal? After all, stealing certainly is a way to seek another person’s wealth! But this is not what Paul was advocating. He was advocating sacrificial giving, not universal theft.

The righteous system of ethics that undergirds this passage—seeking first the welfare of others—has been twisted by modern communists, socialists, and statists to mean that the state should use the threat of violence in order to redistribute privately owned wealth. This view of state power has produced the modern world’s officially democratic system of universal plunder. Private citizens are not encouraged by statists to steal from other individuals. Instead, they are encouraged to band together politically and use the voting booth as a way to establish a system of universal theft. Statists justify this practice in the name of “economic democracy.” They do this officially on behalf of the poor, the downtrodden, and the oppressed. They mimic Satan, the cosmic thief, for they, like he, gain access to the wealth necessary to subsidize other people’s goals by means of deception, temptation, and force.

7. Consider the modern tax-funded educational system. It is a subsidy mainly to the middle class. Poverty-stricken students rarely attend colleges and universities, and fewer still graduate. The rich pay the highest percentage of taxes that support the state. Most of the income tax revenues are generated by taxes on the top 20% of income recipients.

14

FULL-TIME CHRISTIAN SERVICE

Whether therefore ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God (I Cor. 10:31).

The theocentric principle here is the glory of God. This is an aspect of point one of the biblical covenant.¹

A. All of Life as Glorification

Paul tells the Corinthians that all of their activities should glorify God. This does not mean that any of their activities would not ultimately glorify God. The glorification of God is an inescapable concept. It is never a question of glorifying God vs. not glorifying God. It is always a question of how one glorifies God: by obedience or disobedience. First, God is presently being glorified by His creation, which testifies to His existence. “For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse” (Rom. 1:20).² Second, all people will ultimately glorify God by bowing to His son, Jesus Christ. Paul wrote elsewhere: “That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth” (Phil. 2:10).³

The crucial personal question is this: Will an individual publicly bow to Christ prior to the final judgment, or only at the final judgment? Paul told the church at Rome that Christians are required

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

2. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 1.

3. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 20.

in this life to acknowledge that they must bow to Christ on judgment day, and then conduct themselves accordingly. “For whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord: whether we live therefore, or die, we are the Lord’s. For to this end Christ both died, and rose, and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living. But why dost thou judge thy brother? or why dost thou set at nought thy brother? for we shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ. For it is written, As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God. So then every one of us shall give account of himself to God” (Rom. 14:8–12).

God is publicly glorified by His people in history, and He will be publicly glorified by all people at the final judgment, when every knee will bow. At the final judgment, God will publicly divide mankind into sheep (covenant-keepers) and goats (covenant-breakers). “And he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left” (Matt. 25:33). Both groups must publicly glorify Him then, but they will receive separate eternal sanctions. The sheep will receive positive eternal sanctions, while the goats will receive negative eternal sanctions.¹

Paul warned members of the church at Rome to avoid judging each other, because God will judge them all. He was not speaking of formal judgment in a church court. He was speaking of personal judgments regarding non-judicial infractions. The fourth point of the covenant relates to judgment and sanctions.² Paul reminded his readers in Rome that God’s final judgment will be sufficient to settle the non-judicial infractions in history.

God will judge all men finally, demanding and receiving honor as both Creator and Judge. In the meantime, everything in the creation necessarily glorifies God. He is being glorified as cosmic Judge: the bringer of sanctions. He brings sanctions in history (Deut. 28).³ The distinguishing issue in history, as in the final judgment, is the nature of these sanctions: positive or negative. Through His sanctions, God is being glorified today and will be glorified through eternity. His sanctions will never end: positive and negative.

History will culminate in the public glorification of God by the nations. “All nations whom thou hast made shall come and worship

1. On the final judgment, see Appendix A.

2. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 4.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

before thee, O Lord; and shall glorify thy name. For thou art great, and doest wondrous things: thou art God alone” (Ps. 86:9–10). Is this prophecy eschatological? It may be. We read of nations in Revelation: “And the city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it: for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof. And the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it: and the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honour into it. And the gates of it shall not be shut at all by day: for there shall be no night there. And they shall bring the glory and honour of the nations into it. And there shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie: but they which are written in the Lamb’s book of life” (Rev. 21:23–27). This cannot refer to history. The book of life has not yet been opened (Rev. 20:12). It does not yet screen access to the city of God. But Old Covenant saints knew almost nothing about the doctrine of eternal life. So, the references in the Psalms seem to be historical. The psalmist expected nations in history to glorify God sometime in the future. So did Micah. Micah’s prophecy is clearly historical. It refers to the last days, which began in the New Covenant era (Heb. 1:2). Micah wrote:

But in the last days it shall come to pass, that the mountain of the house of the LORD shall be established in the top of the mountains, and it shall be exalted above the hills; and people shall flow unto it. And many nations shall come, and say, Come, and let us go up to the mountain of the LORD, and to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths: for the law shall go forth of Zion, and the word of the LORD from Jerusalem. And he shall judge among many people, and rebuke strong nations afar off; and they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks: nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. But they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree; and none shall make them afraid: for the mouth of the LORD of hosts hath spoken it (Micah 4:1–4).

With God’s future historical judgment among nations in mind, the psalmist drew a personal conclusion: “Teach me thy way, O LORD; I will walk in thy truth: unite my heart to fear thy name. I will praise thee, O Lord my God, with all my heart: and I will glorify thy name for evermore” (Ps. 86:11–12). The psalmist said that he would praise God and glorify God’s name. He began his praise before the nations did. His belief in God’s future judgment among the nations led him to praise. God's sanctions are supposed to produce in His followers an impulse to glorify Him.

This Old Covenant perspective on God's glorification by His people is what Paul has in mind in this passage. He knew that all men must glorify God, one way or the other. He calls on his listeners and readers to glorify God self-consciously in history, so that they will not be forced at the final judgment to glorify God by God's external compulsion. God will inevitably gain His glory in full public view. It is better for men to glorify Him publicly through positive acts of worship in history than to be forced to glorify Him by imposed acts of submission on judgment day. Better to glorify God through the continuity of worship in history than by the discontinuity of permanent negative sanctions on judgment day.

B. Nothing Is Secular

Paul uses eating and drinking as representative examples of covenant-keeping men's acts of glorification. He does so in a passage that deals with participation in liturgical covenant meals: demonic (Chapter 10) and godly (Chapter 11). Verse 21 of chapter 10 has to do with eating meat offered to idols. Eating meat offered to idols is lawful for covenant-keepers, Paul says here and in chapter 8.⁴ The ethical problem arises when this lawful act creates spiritual problems for weak Christians. Mature Christians are not knowingly to give offense to weak Christians. So, he says, Christian liberty must not be abused. "Even as I please all men in all things, not seeking mine own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be saved" (v. 33).

1. Praising God

He is not speaking in verse 31 about formal worship. He has already condemned formal participation in demonic communal meals: "Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of devils: ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and of the table of devils" (v. 21). So, this reference has to do with what are sometimes referred to as secular activities. But Paul's words indicate that there are no secular activities. Paul is saying that all activities are acts of God's glorification. God will finally judge all acts of all mankind. Paul has already mentioned this. "Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts: and then shall every man have praise of God" (I Cor. 4:5).⁵ All men must praise God. There is no escape from this. The question is: Will a person praise God on the last day under His positive sanctions or His negative sanctions? Will his praise of God be an extension of his life's commitment or a public repudiation of his life's commitment?

4. Chapter 10.

The word "secular" refers to non-religious activities. Paul is saying here that there are no non-religious activities. In this sense, the word "secular" is a misnomer, in the same way that the word "autonomous" is a misnomer. Nothing is secular because nothing is autonomous. Everything is under God's overall sovereignty and under His hierarchical authority. Everything is judged in terms of God's law. This will be manifested for all to see on the last day. In this sense, all life is covenantal: under God's sovereignty, authority, law, sanctions, and final judgment.

This passage is important for reminding covenant-keepers that nothing that they think or do is irrelevant to God. This is because God's word is comprehensive, meaning all-inclusive. Jesus responded to Satan's temptation regarding the transformation of stones into bread by citing the second half of Deuteronomy 8:3, which reads: "And he humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know; that he might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the LORD doth man live." The issue that had faced national Israel in the wilderness was the same one that faced Jesus in the wilderness: hunger. Jesus replied to Satan, "It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God" (Matt. 4:4b).⁶ The word of God, not food, is central to the life of man. The content of all of the words of men should be structured by all of the words of God. This is because all of the words of men will be judged by the words of God. Jesus later warned His listeners: "But I say unto you, That every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment" (Matt. 12:36). All of men's words are relevant because all of God's words are relevant as the cosmic Judge. Man is made in God's image. His words either conform to God's words or are in opposition to them. All of a man's words are relevant, for they will be finally judged by God. The relevance of a man's words is imputed by God's words: judicial declaration.

5. Chapter 5.

6. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [23000] 2012), ch. 1.

Paul tells his listeners here that whatever they do, they must do in order to glorify God. Such activities as eating and drinking are specifically subject to this command. Paul brings all of life under a requirement: to glorify God. All things that men do are relevant. This means that all things that men do are under God's comprehensive judgment.

2. Religious vs. Secular: A False Distinction

The familiar distinction between "religious" and "secular" is misleading. It rests on a false assumption, namely, that God has exempted most of life from the requirement to worship Him. This assumption is not merely incorrect; it is defiantly incorrect. All of man's life is worship. Men worship God, or else they worship mammon (Matt. 6:24).⁷ They worship the Creator, or else they worship the creation (Rom. 1:18–22).⁸ Therefore, Christians are required by God to glorify Him in their common, everyday activities. There are therefore no non-religious activities.

The common distinction between secular activities and religious worship defines worship in two ways: (1) formal participation in corporate rituals; (2) personal prayer—before, during, or after some activity. This definition is not technically incorrect, but its implied assumption is incorrect, namely, that without formal acts of some kind, an act has no element of worship. The definition implies that worshippers choose to impute an element of worship in their activities. Put another way, they impute a religious element to some act. This is true; they do impute religious significance to some act. They are supposed to impute religious significance to every act. That is Paul's message here. The question is this: Does God do this, too? The common assumption today is that he who does not impute such religious value to a physical or mental act has thereby established its secular character for him. If enough people impute a secular character to their actions, these areas of life become secular. There is a kind of implicit democratic theory of secularism operating here. This theory of democratic imputation is incorrect. We live in a theocracy: God rules (theos = God; kratos = rule).

7. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 14.

8. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 1.

Does God impute secular status to anything? Paul implies here that He does not. God holds all men accountable for everything they do. Christians are therefore required to do everything they do in order to glorify God. They are to reclaim from the humanists' hypothetical realm of secularism everything that God's enemies have defined as irrelevant to God. Everything is relevant to God. Everything is an aspect of the praise of God, the glorification of God, and above all, the judgment of God.

In Psalm 147, we read: "He sheweth his word unto Jacob, his statutes and his judgments unto Israel. He hath not dealt so with any nation: and as for his judgments, they have not known them" (vv. 19–20). God's special revelation to the nation of Israel set that nation apart covenantally under the Old Covenant. This did not establish a realm of neutrality for the other nations, a neutrality that God exempted from His judgment. Jonah's ministry to Nineveh is proof. Nineveh was under God's law and the law's sanctions. "And Jonah began to enter into the city a day's journey, and he cried, and said, Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown" (Jonah 3:4). In Psalm 148, we read that nature itself praises (glorifies) God. "Praise ye the LORD. Praise ye the LORD. Praise ye the LORD from the heavens: praise him in the heights. Praise ye him, all his angels: praise ye him, all his hosts. Praise ye him, sun and moon: praise him, all ye stars of light. Praise him, ye heavens of heavens, and ye waters that be above the heavens. Let them praise the name of the LORD: for he commanded, and they were created. He hath also stablished them for ever and ever: he hath made a decree which shall not pass" (vv. 1–6). No area of creation is beyond God's judgment. The psalmist here denies the very concept of autonomy and its implication, secularism. Nature is not neutral. It testifies to the glory of God. Paul told the church at Rome the same thing. "For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness; Because that which may be known of God is manifest in them; for God hath shewed it unto them. For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse: Because that, when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools" (Rom.

1:18–22).⁹

C. Everything Is Worship

Paul in these chapters is dealing with true and false corporate worship: covenant meals. In this context, he discusses meals involving meat offered to idols. For the mature Christian, this should not be a problem, except insofar as he might disturb the spiritual lives of weak Christians. Paul then goes to the heart of the matter: the glorification of God. In eating, Christians are supposed to glorify God. They glorify Him by not participating in demonic ritual meals. They also glorify Him by eating meat offered to idols. They glorify Him by refraining from meat offered to idols, when weak Christians' faith is undermined. Finally, in chapter 11, Paul says that Christians are to glorify God by participating lawfully in the Lord's Supper. In all of these activities, Christians are to glorify God.

1. Rival Gods

Everything that men do is an act of worship. Men glorify the god whom they represent covenantally in history. They worship either God or mammon. They worship either the Creator or some aspect of the creation. There is no covenantally neutral realm in between these rival gods. Paul tells the Corinthians that they must self-consciously glorify God by means of their common daily activities. Sometimes this requires absolute abstention: demonic feasts. At other times, it involves selective abstention: meat offered to idols when weak Christians observe the mature Christian at his meal. At other times, it involves participation: enjoying a good meal of meat offered to idols. At other times, participation is mandated: the Lord's Supper. But nothing is neutral: neither eating nor abstention.

This view of life is not well understood by Christians, and never has been. The familiar but false distinction between the religious realm and the hypothetically secular realm has confused Christians since the days of the early church. Christian scholars have used the philosophical categories of Greek humanism to defend the faith since the days of Justin Martyr in the second century. Christians have confused other legitimate distinctions with humanism's distinction between religion and secularism. There is a legitimate biblical distinction between sacred and profane, i.e., correct formal worship vs. false worship.¹⁰ There is also a legitimate biblical distinction between sacred and common: formal worship vs. informal worship. Christians have not understood these distinctions. They have adopted something analogous to the humanists' false distinction: religious vs. secular. They have also adopted a variation of the humanists' myth of neutrality. They accept the humanists' view of a neutral, common-ground, secular realm of life, especially in politics, the realm of civil justice. They implicitly deny that God judges every area of life according to biblical law. Why implicitly? Because they explicitly deny that Christians, as God's covenantal agents in history, have a God-given responsibility to work for the establishment of civil institutions that govern formally in terms of biblical civil law, which includes biblical civil sanctions. They view the formal law of God as narrowly circumscribed, relating to personal morality and family morality. They regard the general culture as beyond God's law.

9. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 1.

As modern covenant-breaking society has become more self-conscious and more dominant, a few Christians have begun to question the reigning myth of neutrality. This change in opinion began in the United States in the 1970s. The Supreme Court's unilateral legalization of abortion in 1973 was a major factor in this shift of opinion. There is no neutral zone between a live baby and an aborted baby. There is no neutral realm of God's law that reconciles a live baby with an aborted baby. Humanistic law has come down against the live baby and in favor of its executioners. Humanistic law is clearly in violation of God's law. Humanists universally recognize this. Christians rarely do.

0. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 6.

2. Theocracy and Theonomy

A minority of Christian activists now say that they do not accept the myth of neutrality. Nevertheless, they still do accept it. To deny the myth of neutrality means denying it in every realm of life. Such a denial forces a Christian to come face-to-face with the ultimate implication of this denial: theocracy. If there really is no neutrality, then theocracy is an inescapable concept: the rule of either one god or another. In our day, the cultural conflict is between the kingdom of God and the kingdom of man. This culture war rages in every area of life.

Modern Christians do not want to defend or promote the institutional theocracy of the God of the Bible. In order to escape the embarrassment of proclaiming the institutional theocracy of the God of the Bible, they are willing to accept the kingdom of man as the only politically acceptable institutional alternative. And so, one by one, those American fundamentalist leaders who proclaimed in the 1980's that there is no neutrality have all quietly abandoned this proclamation. By attempting to retain their position both as political pluralists and as Christian activists, they have become intellectually schizophrenic. As political pluralists, they have come before the public as defenders of Christianity as one legitimate worldview among many, but never as proclaimers of an institutionally, culturally authoritative word of God. They are trapped on the horns of a self-imposed dilemma. They cannot answer this question, and so they pretend that it does not exist: "How can God's law be authoritative, yet also be merely one politically legitimate choice among many?" I ask: Which Old Testament prophet ever came before sinners in the name of such a view of social and political ethics? But it is worse than even this. They all proclaim the present-day inapplicability of Bible-revealed civil law. They declare that the issues of political life must not be settled by an appeal to explicit biblical laws.

When they first discovered the political, moral, and religious implications of legalized abortion, they told their followers and their opponents that abortion is murder. They opposed abortion, not on the basis of its prohibition by biblical law (Ex. 21:22–23),¹¹ but because it is murder. But then, when asked the obvious question by their critics—"Are you calling for the state to execute the legally convicted abortionist, his assistants (accomplices), and the mother, since the Old Testament requires the death penalty for murder?”—most of them grew uncharacteristically silent, others denied that abortion is really murder after all, while others declared that God no longer requires the death penalty for murder. Members of the last-named group not only have abandoned Moses; they have abandoned Noah. “Whoso sheddeth man’s blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made he man” (Gen. 9:6). They are intellectually schizophrenic. This condition affects their public positions in many areas. They affirm their commitment to political pluralism; they deny God’s theocracy; they deny the continuing validity of Old Testament law; and then they insist that Christianity and the Bible have answers to all of men’s problems, including politics. I commented on this dilemma in 1982, and said that it would not go away until they abandoned either political pluralism or Christianity.¹² It has not gone away.

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 37.

Every aspect of life is under God’s law. Life is therefore under God’s comprehensive judgment. All of life has been affected by Adam’s sin. Wherever sin reigns, there Christ’s offer of redemption has a healing role to play. This means that all of life is subject to God’s comprehensive redemption.¹³ To deny that God’s grace (positive sanctions) can apply to all of life is to deny that all of life is under sin and under God’s law and therefore also under God’s judgment (negative sanctions). This, in principle, is exactly what pietism denies. Pietism proclaims a souls-only redemption. Humanists enthusiastically agree, for such a view of history surrenders most of life to mammon and mammon’s covenantal agents. It willingly hands over the lawful authority of rulership in history to covenant-breakers. It does this in the name of Jesus. Pietists want to avoid responsibility for anything that happens outside of our homes and churches.

D. Part-Time Humanist Service?

Paul argues in this passage that all Christian service is supposed to be full-time. It begins with eating and drinking. Paul takes common daily activities and identifies them as means of glorifying God. Paul is saying that all service is necessarily full-time. The question is this: Which god does a man serve full-time? Does he serve God or mammon? Christ said that we cannot serve both.

2. Gary North, “The Intellectual Schizophrenia of the New Christian Right,” Christianity and Civilization, I (1982), pp. 1–40. (<http://bit.ly/BaptistCulture>)

3. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

Pietists do not accept Paul's teaching on this point, which does not conform with their view of the world as forever divided in history into two realms: Christianity's (small) and anti-Christianity's (large). They praise something they call full-time Christian service. By this, they have in mind mainly the work of ordained ministers of the gospel and unordained missionaries to foreign lands. They have in mind people whose income is financed by tithes and (mainly) offerings. This definition might include a church secretary. Less probably, it might include the church janitor. It might include a teacher in a Christian school, just so long as he or she is paid less than what a government-school teacher is paid. But it does not include a Christian businessman who is funding other Christians' full-time Christian service with his tithe. A Christian who owns a profit-seeking Christian school and who thereby gets rich would not be regarded by pietists as being in full-time Christian service. For pietists, full-time Christian service means poverty for Jesus.

The concept of full-time Christian service is the pietist's version of the humanist's doctrine of the sacred-secular distinction. The humanist claims that he wants to confine men's deference to God to the human heart and the church, "where religion belongs." But whenever humanists secure sufficient votes, they move to knock down or confiscate the churches. Russian Communists confiscated churches in the name of the state, and converted them into museums or warehouses. Then they took over the schools. Atheism became the official position of the schools, and the schools were a state monopoly. Communists used tax-funded, compulsory state education to drive the concept of a supernatural God out of the lives and minds of the students. This policy was consistent with the ultimate implication of all humanism: man is god, and the God of the Bible is a socially and psychologically dangerous myth. On this point, non-Communist humanists believe the same. The atheism of America's tax-funded schools is almost as intense as the Communists' schools, and the schools are becoming more anti-Christian, decade by decade. They were messianic humanist institutions from the beginning.¹⁴

4. R. J. Rushdoony, The Messianic Character of American Education: Studies in the History of the Philosophy of Education (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1963). (<http://bit.ly/rjrmcae>)

At every stage in the preliminary development of humanism as a civilization, there can be found humanist spokesmen who assure Christians that the eradication of all traces of supernatural religion is not their long-term goal. But whenever humanists gain sufficient votes or sufficient political power, this is when humanism's official commitment to pluralism ends. We have seen this again and again. We see it today in the textbooks of tax-funded schools. Nevertheless, most Christians remain content with proclaiming (though never receiving) "equal time for Jesus." Humanists want no time for Jesus, which is what Jesus officially receives whenever humanists gain sufficient political power. Humanists cannot serve God, any more than Christians can serve mammon, except inconsistently.

Pietists are inconsistent. They believe that Christianity cannot redeem the dominion of mammon, which necessarily rules this world, they insist. They believe that Christians must remain content to live in a bifurcated society in which mammon provides the means to wealth, and truly holy Christians must remain in the economic poverty of full-time Christian service. Pietism's commitment to this view of history is why, in the interim stages of humanism, pietists and humanists invariably establish an informal alliance. The pietists publicly defer to the humanists in the areas of public, tax-funded policy. They affirm only the right of "each person to worship God in his or her own way," which in the United States means mainly on Sunday and on Wednesday evenings. Almost everything else in life is assumed to be part-time humanist service, and fully legitimate for almost everyone, including most Christians, to remain a part of. They do actually not use this phrase, "full-time humanist service," but it is implied by a distinction between full-time Christian service and. . . ? What? They never say, exactly. Part-time Christian service? But if Christian service can legitimately be part-time, then humanist service is also part-time and also legitimate. Therefore, at least part of the time, most Christians are involved in part-time humanist service, and legitimately so, according to pietists. If there is no full-time Christian service for the vast majority of Christians, then there has to be part-time service to something other than Christianity.

Pietists refuse to discuss this implication of their position because, first, they have rarely thought systematically about what they are really saying, and, second, because to say such things in public might sound goofy. To tell most Christians that God has called them to part-time humanist service does, in fact, sound goofy. It was in opposition to such an idea that Paul wrote this passage.

This is Protestant fundamentalism's version of the worldview of medieval Catholicism, which taught a nature-grace bifurcation. The celibate priesthood was said to be devoted to full-time Christian service, which the church called the order of grace. Christians who supported the friars, monks, and parish priests with their a portion of their production were said to be involved in the order of nature. The Roman Catholic Church still formally honors this medieval tradition by maintaining two forms of priestly ordination: secular (parish clergy) and regular (monastic clergy). Protestant pietists are unknowingly the defenders of something resembling the medieval worldview, but without any monasteries to provide institutional brotherhood for those who are called into full-time Christian service.

Full-time Christian service is what Paul calls the Corinthians into. They were not self-consciously eating and drinking to serve Christ. Paul tells them that everything they do, they should do to glorify God.

Conclusion

This passage undermines every concept of a neutral zone in between service to God and service to anything else. Christians are required by God to serve Him with all of their being, all of the time. "And thou shalt love the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might" (Deut. 6:5).¹⁵ "Jesus said unto him, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind" (Matt. 22:37).

There is no concept of part-time Christian service found in the Bible. There is full-time Christian service; there is also full-time mammon service. "No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon" (Matt. 6:24).¹⁶

Full-time Christian service implies the existence of comprehensive, authoritative performance standards. It also implies God's sanctions. This is why Jesus offered parables of an owner who goes on a long journey, but who eventually comes back to demand an accounting from his servants. The owner finally imposes sanctions, positive and negative, in terms of their performance. God's testing of His stewards began in the garden of Eden, when God departed for a time, only to return to demand a formal accounting. Everything that Adam and Eve did during God's physical absence was supposed to be full-time Christian service: eating from all trees except one. Full-time Christian service did involve a refusal to eat from one tree. Full-time service to Satan involved eating from that one tree. Everything else would have been full-time service to God. But, had their act of defiance been maintained apart from God's negative sanctions on them for their disobedience, Adam and Eve from then on would have been involved in full-time Satanic service. Their eating and drinking would have been rebellious. It would have been full-time service to Satan. This is why God closed access to the tree of life (Gen. 3:24).

5. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 15.

6. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 14.

Christians are required by God to work to reclaim everything from Satan, who is a lawless squatter in history. They are, symbolically speaking, to reclaim the weed-burdened garden of the world for Christ. Having eaten at the Lord's Table, they are to go out and reclaim the world for Christ by eating and drinking to the glory of God. They are therefore to exercise dominion, as God required of Adam (Gen. 1:26–28)¹⁷ and also Noah (Gen. 9:1–3).¹⁸ They are not to forget that this dominion assignment involves obeying God's laws in every area of life. They are not to eat and drink unlawfully in demonic covenantal feasts, which were and remain recapitulations of mankind's forbidden meal in the garden of Eden. They are to practice godly judgment in whatever they do because God's laws invoke God's sanctions: in history, at the final judgment, and forever.

7. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

8. Ibid., ch. 18.

15

HIERARCHY: FAMILY, MARKET, AND STATE

Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ. Now I praise you, brethren, that ye remember me in all things, and keep the ordinances, as I delivered them to you. But I would have you know, that the head of every man is Christ; and the head of the woman is the man; and the head of Christ is God (I Cor. 11:1–3).

The theocentric principle here is the hierarchy of authority, with God at the top. God has established legal representatives in the middle of this hierarchy: God > representatives > constituents. This is point two of the biblical covenant.¹

A. What Would Jesus Do?

A widely popular American fundamentalist slogan in the late twentieth century was this: “What would Jesus do?” People even wore sweat shirts and tee-shirts with WWJD? written on them. When capital letters are used as substitutes for words, the slogan represented by these letters has become a commonplace within certain circles.

Anyone who has carefully read the Gospel of John knows that it was almost impossible for Jesus’ contemporaries to predict what He would do or say. His answers to questions baffled people, including those who were closest to Him. His responses seemed to make no sense. A good example is the incident at the wedding feast at Cana, when they ran out of wine. “And when they wanted wine, the mother of Jesus saith unto him, They have no wine.” Who could have predicted either His verbal response to His mother or His instructions to the servants? First, His verbal response: “Jesus saith unto her, Woman, what have I to do with thee? mine hour is not yet come” (John 2:3–4). Then, His instructions: “And there were set there six waterpots of stone, after the manner of the purifying of the Jews, containing two or three firkins apiece. Jesus saith unto them, Fill the waterpots with water. And they filled them up to the brim. And he saith unto them, Draw out now, and bear unto the governor of the feast. And they bare it” (vv. 6–8).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

What stands out in the four gospels, but especially John’s, is that Jesus was unpredictable. He kept His disciples and His opponents confused most of the time. If anything, His disciples were more confused than His opponents. The best example of this is their respective responses to His crucifixion. The disciples scattered. Meanwhile, the Jewish leaders took steps to see to it that the disciples could not steal His body and then announce His resurrection. They understood what He had predicted: His bodily resurrection.

Now the next day, that followed the day of the preparation, the chief priests and Pharisees came together unto Pilate, Saying, Sir, we remember that that deceiver said, while he was yet alive, After three days I will rise again. Command therefore that the sepulchre be made sure until the third day, lest his disciples come by night, and steal him away, and say unto the people, He is risen from the dead: so the last error shall be worse than the first. Pilate said unto them, Ye have a watch: go your way, make it as sure as ye can. So they went, and made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone, and setting a watch (Matt. 27:62–66).

The disciples had no idea about what Jesus was about to do. They had repeatedly heard His words about His resurrection, yet they had comprehended nothing. The Jews had heard the same words, and they had comprehended a little. Neither group expected Jesus’ bodily resurrection from the dead, but the Jews at least understood what He had said would happen next. They assumed, incorrectly, that the disciples had also understood. His closest disciples were the last to know. The women found out before they did (Luke 24:10).

What would Jesus do? Those who were closest to Him did not know. Even after His ascension and the coming of the Holy Spirit, none of them foresaw what Jesus would do and say to Saul on the road to Damascus (Acts 9). Yet that event changed both the history of the church and the history of the world. Paul would be sent by God to the gentiles to preach the gospel and establish new churches. He would also write his epistles.

B. Hierarchy and Ordinances

Paul instructs his listeners to follow him, even as he follows Christ. He does not tell them to follow Christ directly. He does not ask them to imagine what Jesus would do. He asks them to “keep the ordinances, as I delivered them to you” (v. 2). He tells them to turn to God’s supernaturally revealed law in their quest to follow Jesus.

1. Biblical Law as an Intermediary

God’s law is an inanimate intermediary between God and man. It always has been, from before the creation of man. “And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth” (Gen. 1:26).² Man was assigned the task of worldwide dominion before God created him. The three persons of the Godhead spoke on behalf of man even before man existed. Put differently, the persons of the Godhead spoke representatively for man. The law which they imposed on mankind was positive: to exercise dominion.

Next, God gave Adam a law to obey during His bodily absence. “And the LORD God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die” (Gen. 2:16–17). This law was both positive and negative: to eat and to avoid eating. Man was to enjoy feasting, but not from the forbidden tree. That tree was God’s exclusive property.

Because Adam was under God, he was necessarily under God’s law. He was therefore also under God’s sanctions. Man’s relationship with God is always judicial. Man’s judicial status determines where he is in God’s hierarchy. After the Fall of man, there were only two judicial statuses: disinherited son and adopted son.

In this passage, Paul describes a hierarchy. He is under Christ, he says. Paul’s listeners/readers are in turn under him. The intermediary factor is the system of ordinances, which Paul says that he delivered to the church. This hierarchy is judicial. The test of a person’s position in this hierarchy is therefore judicial: obedience or disobedience to the ordinances.

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 3.

The head of every man is Christ (v. 3a). Paul does not say “every believer.” He says “every man.” The Greek here is clear. This principle of Christ’s universal headship over all mankind is the basis of mankind’s final subordination. “For it is written, As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God” (Rom. 14:11). “That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth” (Phil. 2:10). Having announced that the head of every man is Christ, Paul writes that wives are subordinate to their husbands. “The head of the woman is the man” (v. 3b). This, too, is a universal condition. It is not limited to Christian marriages. It is based on the pre-Fall definition of the family. Finally, Christ is subordinate to God. “The head of Christ is God” (v. 3c). There is a cosmic hierarchy that extends from God through Jesus Christ, as perfect humanity, and from Christ to man and to woman.

2. Hierarchy Within the Godhead

Cornelius Van Til has written that all Christian heresies begin with false subordinationism: Christ as less than God.³ But this does not mean that Christ was not functionally subordinate to God in terms of His work. He repeatedly said that He was. “And he said unto them, How is it that ye sought me? wist ye not that I must be about my Father’s business?” (Luke 2:49). “I can of mine own self do nothing: as I hear, I judge: and my judgment is just; because I seek not mine own will, but the will of the Father which hath sent me” (John 5:30). “But I have greater witness than that of John: for the works which the Father hath given me to finish, the same works that I do, bear witness of me, that the Father hath sent me” (John 5:36).

Theologians preserve orthodoxy by explaining the Trinity, first, in terms of itself; second, in relation to the world. The ontological Trinity describes the interaction of three persons, each fully God. The economical Trinity describes the functional operations of each of the three persons in terms of the creation. In Luke, we read of the Holy Spirit’s being sent by the Father. “If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children: how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him?" (Luke 11:13). In Jesus' long sermon at the Last Supper, we learn that the Spirit is sent from the Father by way of the Son. "But when the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me" (John 15:26).

3. Cornelius Van Til, The Defense of the Faith, revised and abridged (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1963), p. 25.

Jesus said that He represented the Father so perfectly that he who had seen Him had seen the Father.

If ye had known me, ye should have known my Father also: and from henceforth ye know him, and have seen him. Philip saith unto him, Lord, shew us the Father, and it sufficeth us. Jesus saith unto him, Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? he that hath seen me hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then, Shew us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me? the words that I speak unto you I speak not of myself: but the Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works (John 14:7–10).

The incarnate Jesus, as perfectly human, was subordinate to God the Father. "Then said Jesus unto them, When ye have lifted up the Son of man, then shall ye know that I am he, and that I do nothing of myself; but as my Father hath taught me, I speak these things" (John 8:28). Yet Jesus was in union with the Father. "But if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works: that ye may know, and believe, that the Father is in me, and I in him" (John 10:38). His union with a divine being did not imply shared substance with mankind, for there are not four persons in the Trinity. So, this union has to be ethical. It is a matter of His perfect fulfillment of the law in history. Jesus did the works of the law. We are to believe these works, He said. Jesus kept God's ordinances.

3. Hierarchy and Adoption

Jesus is the last Adam, Paul writes later in this epistle. "And so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit" (I Cor. 15:45). Christ's perfect sonship is the sole legal basis of God's adoption of disinherited sons. "But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name" (John 1:12). Furthermore,

But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, To redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father. Wherefore thou art no more a servant, but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ (Gal. 4:4–7).

We are heirs of God through Jesus Christ. The public evidence of our sonship are these: our participation in the sacraments and our keeping of God's law. This evidence is necessary to identify a person as being in the camp of the redeemed.

He that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him. But whoso keepeth his word, in him verily is the love of God perfected: hereby know we that we are in him. He that saith he abideth in him ought himself also so to walk, even as he walked. Brethren, I write no new commandment unto you, but an old commandment which ye had from the beginning. The old commandment is the word which ye have heard from the beginning. Again, a new commandment I write unto you, which thing is true in him and in you: because the darkness is past, and the true light now shineth (I John 2:1–8).

Beloved, if our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence toward God. And whatsoever we ask, we receive of him, because we keep his commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in his sight. And this is his commandment, That we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another, as he gave us commandment. And he that keepeth his commandments dwelleth in him, and he in him. And hereby we know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit which he hath given us (I John 3:21–24).

Antinomianism cannot deal successfully with these passages. The antinomian seeks to escape the requirements of God's law. But the New Testament is clear: any such attempt to throw off God's law is evidence of covenant-breaking.

4. Male and Female Created He Them

"But I would have you know, that the head of every man is Christ; and the head of the woman is the man; and the head of Christ is God" (v. 3). God is over Christ in Christ's capacity as a perfect human. Christ, in turn, rules directly over every man. This is a universal hierarchy, based on original creation and also on Christ's bodily resurrection. “And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth” (Matt. 28:18).⁴ Christians are in a special hierarchy as adopted heirs. They are part of a redeemed hierarchy.

Every man is to rule over his wife. This hierarchy was challenged when Satan’s covenantal representative, the serpent, tested Eve, and Eve tested Adam. The war against God’s hierarchy was originally satanic, for Satan seeks to overthrow God’s hierarchical rule over him and his kingdom. Man, as God’s image, must be brought under Satan’s authority if Satan is to press his kingdom claims successfully. This is why he attacked the woman first. She, in turn, lured Adam into sin. There is a war over hierarchies in history.

Christ bore responsibility for the original sin of mankind by suffering the sanctions that God the Father applied to this sin. “For he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him” (II Cor. 5:21). Christ restored the hierarchy of inheriting sonship at the cost of the cross. All of the covenantal hierarchies were definitively redeemed at the resurrection. It is the Christians’ task in history to act as God’s agents in the progressive redemption of these definitively redeemed hierarchical institutions.

C. Capitalism and Feminism

Within the Trinity, there is a division of labor. Between husband and wife, there is a division of labor.

1. The Division of Labor

Free market capitalism has extended the division of labor by means of the pooling of capital, which in turn has funded technological improvements. In doing so, capitalism has narrowed the post-Fall gap between the productivity of men and women. This process is best represented by an electric light switch. A typical man has no advantage over a typical woman in turning on an electric light. Men did have an advantage in providing light when the main source of light was a burning log or torch. Men could haul large branches and chop wood more effectively than women could. The division of labor in pre-capitalist societies had to do with differences in physical strength as well as the distinction of childbearing. But, with the coming of electricity and the internal combustion engine, horsepower has replaced manpower. The result has been a steady development toward the gender-equalization of productivity. Physical dexterity increasingly counts for more than physical strength. The mental manipulation of images, sequences, and numbers counts for more than the physical manipulation of things.

4. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 45.

In the United States, the feminist movement, which began in the mid-nineteenth century, has paralleled the development of capitalist tools of production and the arrival of women into the marketplace as producers. The women's suffrage movement began in the northeastern section of the nation, where large numbers of women had been brought into textile mills. The shift of textile production from the household—a "cottage industry"—to the factory made possible the early political mobilization of women.

American women first gained the right to vote in Kentucky in 1838: local school elections. This legal precedent in school board elections continued throughout the nineteenth century. This political right reflected the fact that women were moving into the classrooms as teachers, displacing men. But it was not until electricity became widespread in the cities that all American women received the right to vote. Men voted to ratify this Constitutional amendment in 1919 and 1920 in part because they recognized that women had become significant factors in the marketplace, as producers as well as customers. World War I (1914–18) had made this clear to the West: women had gone into factories to produce the weapons that had been used on the battlefields of Europe.

2. Annie, Get Your Gun

In 1946, the year after World War II ended, Irving Berlin wrote a musical comedy based on the show business career of the late-nineteenth-century riflewoman and entertainer, Annie Oakley: Annie, Get Your Gun. One of the musical's best-known songs is "I can do better." Annie and a rival male sharpshooter, whom she defeated (in real life, but not in the play) and later married, sing a duet. The song's back-and-forth lyrics are silly, and presumably were meant to be, but its message reflected a new social perception in 1946, when millions of women did not leave the factories after the war ended, unlike the post-war tradition of World War I.

Anything you can do, I can do better,
I can do anything better than you.
No, you can't./Yes, I can.
No, you can't./Yes, I can.
No, you can't./Yes, I can. Yes, I can.

The rifle is a great physical equalizer. Annie Oakley was a master of this tool. She gained technical supremacy. Capitalism has mass produced rifles and many other tools that have the same equalizing effect.

Economic transformation preceded political transformation in the advent of women's suffrage. Women gained access to the marketplace as producers before they gained access to the ballot box as voters. Biblically speaking, the sequence of this transformation was undesirable. Covenant in principle precedes contract. Civil sanctions are in principle superior to economic sanctions. But when biblical principles are not honored in one realm of society, God sometimes transfers authority to people working in other realms. These realms may be geographical. They may be institutional. The free market encourages experimentation and change. Customers, by imposing the economic sanctions of profit and loss, pressure producers to make changes, and these changes have unforeseen and unplanned consequences in other social institutions.

Capitalism's empowering of women in the marketplace has led to a re-thinking of women's roles in every area of society. What began simply as a profitable way to produce textiles more abundantly or to teach children less expensively has resulted in a re-structuring of social roles. An increase in the division of labor through capital accumulation has allowed women to discover niches in the marketplace in which their skills can be matched more closely with customer demand—demand which is increasingly dominated by women. As they say in the American real estate industry, "Wives decide which house to buy; husbands, at most, retain the right of veto." The free market rewards producers who can meet customer demand more efficiently than their competitors. The free market's system of economic sanctions—profit and loss—rewards those producers who hire workers whose skills and whose willingness to compete in terms of price offer their employers an advantage. Producers who refuse to offer employment to niche-matching workers suffer losses when their competitors do offer such employment. Competition pressures all employers to seek out the most efficient workers. This is why women in capitalist societies have successfully invaded the work place. They have also gained political power.

Communist societies also brought women into the factories in the twentieth century. Their rulers had little choice. To compete in world markets, including the market for military supremacy, the Communists could not ignore the productivity of women.

The availability of employment for women in the marketplace has dramatically increased the cost of rearing children. Cost is defined as the economic value of the opportunities foregone. When women had few employment opportunities outside of the household, children were far cheaper for families. But, as women have become employable for money, the economic value of their labor time has increased. This has increased the cost of rearing children: forfeited monetary income for stay-at-home mothers. In an economy that offers mass-produced, price-competitive contraceptive devices, would-be mothers weigh the benefits of being full-time mothers at home against the net income they can earn in the marketplace. Children's perceived costs to the family sometimes exceed the perceived benefits when employment opportunities for women outside the home appear in the free market. This is another example of a fundamental law of life: with increased opportunities comes increased responsibility. The decision to bear children or not imposes costs on the decision-makers. Each result has its appropriate costs and benefits, not just for the decision-makers, but also for society. An obvious example is the effect that the uncoerced decisions of millions of families not to bear more children will have a generation later on tax-funded retirement programs. The West is about to find out what happens when there are too few workers entering the work force to support the retirees.¹

The welfare state has pressured married women to enter the labor market. The economic burden of wealth-transfer payments increases, especially the cost of tax-funded retirement and medical programs. Taxes rise. This has forced wives into the work force because after-tax family income keeps falling. Wives seek employment in order to maintain their families' life styles. This process has reduced the birth rate and has increased the abortion rate, which in turn steadily increases the tax burden per worker to fund a growing number of retirees. Usually, we call this a vicious circle, but defenders of state-funded retirement programs vastly outnumber the critics, so no one in authority speaks of this circle of taxation and reduced birth rates as vicious. It is simply not discussed publicly in terms of taxation. To do so would reveal a hidden cost of the modern welfare state.

1. Peter G. Peterson, Gray Dawn: How the Coming Age Wave Will Transform America—And the World (New York: Times Books, 1999).

D. Rival Hierarchies

When a wife becomes a significant contributor to a family's monetary income, she gains a stronger voice in her home. The cost of ignoring her opinions and desires keeps rising for husbands. Wives can walk out of a marriage, and do. They can threaten to quit working. They spend the money that they earn. The West's civil courts allow all of this.

The cost to husbands of laying down the law increases. There is an economic rule: as the cost of something increases, less of it is demanded. Husbands tend to defer to wage-earning wives more than they would defer to non-wage-earning wives. So, the structure of economic production has the effect of undermining the covenantal hierarchy of the family.

The free market does not count the cost that must be borne by non-market institutions. An employer is economically responsible to customers first and to share-owners second. He is not economically or legally responsible for what goes on inside the families of his employees. If he seeks to replace a factor of production, including an employee, the cost to him of making this replacement is whatever income the present factor of production offers to him, in comparison to the income offered by a replacement factor. Economists say that this difference is marginal. Usually, it is small. Key athletes, entertainers, or other employees may not be easily replaceable, but most employees are. The employer can afford to replace most factors of production. He may or may not consider the effects of corporate policies on the output of existing employees, but he pays no attention to the potential effects of his decision on the entire economy's employment policies. He cannot personally affect these society-wide effects, so there is no immediate economic reason for him to pay attention to them. He would be unwise to worry about whatever he cannot control. Nevertheless, competitive pressures within an industry can spread the adoption of new employment policies, and these policies may change society in unforeseen ways, even ways undesired by those whose individual decisions effected the changes. The decision to hire women is surely one of the most significant examples of this "law of unintended consequences.”

Decisions made at the margin of firms, such as whether to hire wives, can sometimes have society-wide effects that are not marginal, but fundamental. In a free market, the customer is at the top of the economic hierarchy. His decision to buy or not to buy imposes sanctions on sellers: profit or loss. The customer does not care about the marginal effects on society of his decision to buy or not buy. He makes his decision, not in terms of its society-wide effects, but in terms of his standards as a customer: quality, convenience, and price. He asks, “What’s in it for me?” He does not ask, “Did wage-earning wives have any part to play in producing this item?”

The covenantal hierarchy of the family is very often in conflict with the economic hierarchy of the free market or the economic hierarchy of a socialist commonwealth. The divisive issue in both economies is the division of labor. The division of labor imposes institutional costs as well as institutional benefits. When people are more concerned with monetary income than they are with maintaining proper covenantal relationships, they suffer losses, and society suffers losses. This insight regarding families’ monetary income and its effects on the covenantal chain of command is a specific application of a more general rule. “No servant can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon” (Luke 16:13).²

Economic growth expands the wealth available to members of both kingdoms: God’s and mammon’s. To blame economic growth and the extension of the division of labor misses the ethical point. The covenantal faithfulness or unfaithfulness of market participants as individuals is the determining factor. People make decisions in terms of individual costs and benefits, but they cannot properly assess either costs or benefits apart from considering the law of God. Their perception of God’s law in turn depends on God’s grace: common and special.

It may be easier to remember this principle by means of two images: a paycheck and a contraceptive. Choices are individual, but millions of individual decisions shape society. The West is visibly committing slow suicide. The national birth rate in every Western industrial nation is below the population-replacement rate of 2.1

2. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 39.

children per woman. Were it not for immigrants from non-Western or non-industrial nations, the national birth rates would be even lower. The dominion covenant—biological multiplication—is being rejected in the West. If this does not change, then the West will be replaced by cultures that conform themselves to the demographic laws that govern the dominion covenant, such as Islam.

E. Family Only?

Paul makes it clear in this passage that there is a covenantal hierarchy in the creation: God > Christ > man > woman. This is presented in universal terms. It clearly applies to the family: husbands and wives. Does it apply to the church? Does it apply to politics?

1. Women in the Church

It surely applies to the church. In the verses that immediately follow, Paul writes:

Every man praying or prophesying, having his head covered, dishonoureth his head. But every woman that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered dishonoureth her head: for that is even all one as if she were shaven. For if the woman be not covered, let her also be shorn: but if it be a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven, let her be covered. For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, forasmuch as he is the image and glory of God: but the woman is the glory of the man. For the man is not of the woman; but the woman of the man. Neither was the man created for the woman; but the woman for the man. For this cause ought the woman to have power on her head because of the angels (I Cor. 11:4–10).

In Paul's day, there were prophets and prophetesses. The daughters of the deacon Philip were prophetesses (Acts 21:8–9). So, in the prophetic division of labor, women possessed equal authority. Nevertheless, they did not possess equal judicial authority within the ecclesiastical hierarchy. They were required to cover their heads when they spoke in the name of God. Whenever they became lawful voices of authority, they had to subordinate themselves to male church leaders by means of a symbol: a head covering. Also, they lawfully spoke prophetically only outside of church worship services. In worship services, another rule prevailed. "Let your women keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law. And if they will learn any thing, let them ask their husbands at home: for it is a shame for women to speak in the church" (I Cor. 14:34–35).

A prophetess spoke authoritatively in God's name. Listeners were required to obey whatever a prophetess said during these unique instances of direct revelation from God. This gave her judicial authority. She was at the top of the ecclesiastical hierarchy in terms of obedience owed during these instances of direct revelation. But the temporary nature of her authority had to be marked by a public symbol of her ecclesiastical subordination to men: the head covering.³

A symbol is important. It represents a larger truth. The symbol of the prophetess's head covering represented the general legal status of women: subordinate to men. This subordination was true in the church. It was also true in the family. Yet in neither institution was the role of the woman in the division of labor denied. The word of the prophetess was no less authoritative because of her gender. She possessed the voice of authority. The value of her revelation was in no way diminished because of her subordinate covenantal status. Put differently, her subordinate covenantal status did not imply the judicially inferior authority of her words.

We can apply this ecclesiastical leadership principle to, for example, the ability to predict the movement of prices in a developed capital market. If a woman possesses an advantage here, statistically speaking, then investors would be unwise not to follow her suggestions. They should invest their money in terms of her forecasts. This has nothing to do with the covenantal subordination of women to men. It has everything to do with the economic authority of customers, whose individual decisions shape the free market's ever-shifting array of prices. This woman understands the price effects of future decisions of customers better than her male competitors do. The capital markets consider her gender irrelevant to the issue of satisfying customer demand. Investors in the capital markets ask only this: "What have you done for me lately?"

3. This referred to long hair. "Judge in yourselves: is it comely that a woman pray unto God uncovered? Doth not even nature itself teach you, that, if a man have long hair, it is a shame unto him? But if a woman have long hair, it is a glory to her: for her hair is given her for a covering" (I Cor. 11:13–15). Long hair is a mark of covenantal subordination. This is why the Mosaic law required captive foreign women who were willing to become wives of Israelites to shave their heads one month before the marriage (Deut. 21:12). This severed their subordination to their former nation's gods through the male heads of their households.

2. Women in the Military

In the military, the presence of women in the ranks creates enormous problems, beginning with the system of rank itself. Women are required to obey orders. This creates opportunities for men of higher rank to misuse their rank for sexual exploitation. Second, women in general are not as strong physically as men are. A soldier in the field cannot rely on a woman with the same degree of confidence that he would rely on a man. Third, society imposes on men a protective impulse with regard to women. A soldier in the field will tend to disobey orders in order to defend a woman in the ranks, when he would not be equally ready to disobey an order to protect another male. This threatens to disrupt the chain of command. This is also the reason why homosexuality in the military has been universally condemned in the West and in most non-Western armies. A combattant may abandon a buddy to his fate when the battle plan requires it, but he may not abandon a sexual partner. Homosexuality reduces the predictability of battle plans.

On the other hand, women in technical fields such as meteorology, weapons development, cryptography, software development, ordinance, navigation, and so forth may be equally capable as men. In an increasingly technological army, the light-switch phenomenon reasserts itself: no special gender advantage. The covenantal problem is the chain of command. How can women in the ranks be protected from sexual exploitation? How can their presence not affect joint-gender team performance? The camaraderie and esprit de corps in a military unit or a police unit is heavily dependent on shared risk. When women are exposed to the same degree of risk of life and death, this disrupts the military/protective function, which is unquestionably masculine. In this sense, the military is different from the free market, in which the shared risk is economic. In the free market, men have no sense of obligation to protect women. They may be quite happy to put rival women out of business.

Modern society has not yet found a way to integrate women's technical productivity into a military chain of command. Either the military is deprived of technical skills, which can be disastrous in today's high-tech warfare, or else the performance of battle units is compromised by the presence of women, who are perceived by men as needing greater protection. It is the life-and-death risk of participation in a military chain of command that makes the official equality of the sexes a liability organizationally.

There is one other factor that is rarely discussed in public: female homosexuality. The primary characteristics of success in combat are masculine. This subsidizes the careers of those women who possess masculine characteristics. It rewards certain features of female homosexuality. The creation of same-sex sexual relationships within a military chain of command leads to exploitation by rank and also leads to problems of protective impulses under combat conditions, and to hierarchical favoritism in peacetime, both of which undermine military discipline.

The best solution seems to be the use of specialized female civilian support units behind the lines. Throughout history, there have been such privately organized, highly specialized civilian support units—camp followers—so the presence of women close behind the lines is not a radical suggestion, strategically speaking. Only the services officially performed by women would be different. The military would have to pay competitive wages to the members of such technical support units, but that is the cost of maintaining the integrity of the chain of command.

In the Old Testament, Deborah served as a military commander. She officially commanded the Israelite army because her second in command, Barak, refused to go into battle without her presence (Jud. 5:8). This was a disgrace to the men of Israel, as she pointed out to him (v. 9). Barak commanded the troops (vv. 10, 14). Deborah remained behind the lines. She was at the pinnacle of the chain of command, but she faced death only if Israel lost. Her presence in the chain of command did not threaten the performance of the army. The protective impulse did not threaten men's performance on the battlefield. She was not on the battlefield. In this sense, she was more like a queen or a president or a prime minister than a general. Her authority was judicial. We should think of this arrangement as the civilian control over the military.

3. Women in Politics

Then what of politics? Should women not exercise political rule? Deborah did (Jud. 4–5). This was rare, but it did take place. There is no biblical evidence that women cannot lawfully declare God's law and impose civil sanctions. Deborah did. The deciding issue here is functional. Who best declares the law? This is a matter of competition, just as it is in the labor markets and capital markets.

In civil government, there is no explicit restriction comparable to the two ecclesiastical restrictions: the head covering for prophetesses and women's silence in corporate worship services. Question: In what way, if any, is the general principle of the subordination of women to men supposed to be manifested in New Testament civil government?

The covenantal issue here is sanctions. Should women be allowed to impose civil sanctions? This is what the right to vote is all about: the imposition of civil sanctions. If women cannot lawfully impose sanctions from the top by being elected or appointed, then on what legal basis can they vote, and vice versa? If women can lawfully impose civil sanctions at any level, then they are part of the civil covenantal hierarchy. The twin questions of hierarchy and the right to impose sanctions are inseparable: points two and four of the biblical covenant model.⁴

If Paul's words are interpreted as banning women from exercising all covenantal sanctions over men, then Deborah's judgeship must not be regarded as a precedent for the New Testament. The New Testament would have to be seen as annulling Deborah's precedent. But does it? Paul does forbid women from speaking in church worship services, but women never held ecclesiastical office in the Old Covenant. For women, there is continuity ecclesiastically, Old Covenant to New Covenant. Question: Why would the continuity of civil rule be different in the New Covenant? There is no express New Testament rule prohibiting women from exercising civil sanctions. There was no such rule under the Old Covenant, either.

The hermeneutics governing theonomy is this: if there is no New Testament annulment of an Old Testament law or principle, then the Old Testament law still prevails. Theonomy assumes judicial continuity. Deborah's example provides us with insight into the hierarchy of civil sanctions. Women had the right to impose them when they held civil office. Judgeship was surely civil.

F. Economics: Contractual, not Covenantal

Christian economics moves analytically from covenantal law to economics, which is contractual rather than covenantal (oath-bound under God). Economics is subordinate to family, civil, and ecclesiastical law because contracts are subordinate to covenants.

4. Sutton, That You May Prosper, chaps. 2, 4.

Point two of the biblical covenant model is hierarchy-authority-representation. The covenantal question is this: Who lawfully possesses the voice of authority? Hierarchy raises questions of representation.

This is the issue of covenantal authority in history. The doctrine of the covenant is itself a manifestation of point two. This is why Exodus, the second book in the Pentateuch, is called the book of the covenant. "And he took the book of the covenant, and read in the audience of the people: and they said, All that the LORD hath said will we do, and be obedient" (Ex. 24:7). The only thing in history that speaks finally is the Bible itself. It is the final voice of authority in history. The institutional question of lawful covenantal authority revolves around the Bible. Who speaks lawfully for God, in terms of the Bible, in any historical situation?

Paul refers to himself as Christ's representative. He tells his readers to follow him, even as he followed Christ. Paul serves as God's lawful model, according to Paul. Paul's writings are canonical, so we must take his claim seriously.

We must also take seriously his other claim: the man serves as the head over the woman, even as God serves as head over Christ. The question institutionally is this: Is a woman bound by oath under a man? In marriage, yes. What about in church government? Yes, because of the sacrament of baptism: an oath sign. Women are not to speak in church worship services.

Then what about civil government? There is no gender-specific oath of feminine obedience to men in a civil covenant, as the example of Deborah indicates. There is nothing in the New Testament that explicitly rejects the Mosaic office of judge. There is also nothing in the New Covenant that rejects the Mosaic authority of women to serve as judges.

In the realm of economics, there is nothing to prohibit women from competing with men. They do so as customers, for buyers compete against buyers. Customers, including women, make daily decisions regarding which producers have best served them. Customers exercise economic sanctions by buying or refusing to buy. Women make these decisions. The biblical hierarchy of ownership has always included women. The wife owned her dowry (Gen. 24:53). Daughters possessed the right of landed inheritance over the deceased's next of kin, if he died without leaving sons (Num. 36).⁵

5. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 22.

Women in the Old Covenant also competed against men as producers. “She maketh fine linen, and selleth it; and delivereth girdles unto the merchant” (Prov. 31:24).⁶

The covenantal hierarchy of legal ownership of resources includes women; therefore, the hierarchy of economic sanctions also includes women. Women compete against men as customers-buyers (sellers of money). They also compete against men as producers-sellers (buyers of money). Because women, as customers, lawfully impose economic sanctions on producers, they also possess the lawful authority to seek positive economic sanctions as producers.

The conclusion is inescapable: women possess lawful authority to impose economic sanctions. The Bible’s male-female hierarchy is not judicially applicable in economics. This hierarchy appears to be imposed by biology in certain areas,⁷ but free market capitalism tends to reduce gender-related differences in productivity. Capitalism produces labor-saving and therefore labor-equalizing tools of production. Women exercise authority over machines equal to men’s authority over machines. The electric light switch is the symbol of this equality.

The essence of the free market is open entry: the right of any legally responsible adult to make bids for both ownership and temporary control (rent). If women can legally own goods, then they also possess the right to make bids. If someone owns anything, he or she can legally seek to disown it. There is no right of ownership without the right of disownership. The means of disownership in a free market involves making bids.

The Bible says that women possess the right to own property and also the right to make bids. “She considereth a field, and buyeth it: with the fruit of her hands she planteth a vineyard” (Prov. 31:16). There is no escape from this Bible-based conclusion: there is no covenantal male-female hierarchy in economics. The economy is not a covenantal institution; it is contractual. No self-maledictory oath under God establishes the economy. Certain effects of the male-female hierarchy may at times influence economics because of innate gender differences or family concerns. Such considerations can and do influence the array of prices in a free market. Biblically, however, the

6. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 86.

7. Higher mathematics, theoretical physics, highest-level chess, and boxing come to mind. At the same time, very few men are able to compete in these areas.

male-female hierarchy must not be imposed on the free market by politics, which itself is not bound by any male-female hierarchical principle, as the example of Deborah the judge indicates. In family and church, the male-female hierarchy is mandated by biblical law, but not in civil government and the economy.

Conclusion

There are prices that must be paid and costs that must be borne in order for covenant-keepers to maintain the male-female hierarchy in family and church. The free market enables legally responsible adults to count costs more accurately. This is what Jesus recommended: count the costs (Luke 14:28–30).⁸ To blame the free market for imposing certain costs is to blame freedom for imposing costs. Christians are called into freedom, not into servitude (I Cor. 7:21).⁹ The costs associated with freedom must be borne by free people under God. Freedom means that mammon will make his bids ever-more clearly. This fact should not become an excuse for imposing political restrictions on the God-given legal right of adults to buy, sell, and make bids to buy or sell, unless a transaction is identified by the Bible as being both inherently immoral and prohibited by civil law. In such rare cases, the legal issue is immorality, not the male-female hierarchy.

The right of legally responsible adults to make bids must be defended by civil law in a biblical commonwealth. This means that neither gender-based equality of economic opportunity nor gender-based inequality of economic opportunity should be mandated by civil law. Nevertheless, Christians should recognize that the free market is a greater threat to those who seek to maintain gender-based inequality than to those who seek to legislate gender-based equality. It was the free market, not egalitarian socialism, that produced the light switch.

8. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 35.

9. Chapter 8.

16

THE DIVISION OF LABOR

Now there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit. And there are differences of administrations, but the same Lord. And there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God which worketh all in all. But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal (I Cor. 12:4–7).

The theocentric principle here is the unity and the diversity of the church in God. This has to do with the church's boundaries: point three of the biblical covenant.¹

A. The One and the Many

This chapter parallels Romans 12.² It deals with the unity and diversity of the church. There is unity despite the fact that its members are different from each other. They individually reflect various aspects of God. They represent God in history, both as individuals and in their corporate capacity as members. Covenant-keepers represent Christ in the church. Paul's two-fold concern in this passage is with the unity of the church and the diversity of gifts given to its members. Paul offers an extended analogy of the church as a body.

For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body: so also is Christ. For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit. For the body is not one member, but many. If the foot shall say, Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body? And if the ear shall say, Because I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body? If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole were hearing, where were the smelling? But now hath God set the members every one of them in the body, as it hath pleased him. And if they were all one member, where were the body? But now are they many members, yet but one body. And the eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee: nor again the head to the feet, I have no need of you. Nay, much more those members of the body, which seem to be more feeble, are necessary: And those members of the body, which we think to be less honourable, upon these we bestow more abundant honour; and our uncomely parts have more abundant comeliness. For our comely parts have no need: but God hath tempered the body together, having given more abundant honour to that part which lacked (I Cor. 12:12–24).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

2. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 9.

We read something similar in Romans:

For as we have many members in one body, and all members have not the same office: So we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another. Having then gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us, whether prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith; Or ministry, let us wait on our ministering; or he that teacheth, on teaching; Or he that exhorteth, on exhortation: he that giveth, let him do it with simplicity; he that ruleth, with diligence; he that sheweth mercy, with cheerfulness (Rom. 12:4–8).

What I wrote in chapter 9 of my commentary on Romans¹ also applies to chapter 12 in I Corinthians.

* * * * *

Membership today means “belongs to.” People are members of clubs, associations, teams, and churches. The original meaning of “member” is closer to Paul’s metaphor: an appendage of a body. This usage is not common today. Because of this, the metaphor has lost much of its power. It is still a useful metaphor. Paul describes the church as a living organism, a body. He does not say it is like a living organism. He does not offer an analogy. He says that we are members of a living organism. The church’s members participate in a society called the church, but Paul describes it as a body. Members in a judicial sense he describes as members in a biological sense. Paul does not describe church members as cogs in a great machine. He describes them as appendages—members—of a body.

1. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012).

Sociologist Robert Nisbet observed that “The organism serves not only as a model of growth for contemplating the world, but also as a model of structure, of the articulation of separate entities, such as the heart and lungs. To emphasize the harmonious interaction of parts in an organization, it is customary to use ‘organic’ as highest praise.”² Metaphors of organic change are more commonly used than metaphors of mechanical change. This may be because mechanical change is cyclical. A machine does not grow. It performs a limited task over and over. A machine has no sensations. A person does not normally look at a broken machine and then make a comparison with himself. He does not see a broken machine rusting in a junk yard, and think to himself, “How terrifying!” A machine has a maker, an owner, or a user, but it has no head. A body has a head. A body develops through time. This is why the organic metaphor is far more powerful than mechanism for describing social processes or organizations.

As surely as a body dies without a head, so does an institution die without leadership. It may merely flounder at first. The phrase, “running around like a chicken with its head cut off,” is used to describe an organization that has no leadership. It runs around aimlessly before it dies. But, of course, organizations do not literally run around. They have no feet. Either they stay in operation or they close. The question is: Does an organization operate in terms of a shared vision? A leader must articulate this vision and impose sanctions in terms of it. For a hierarchy to function, there must be a representative figure who speaks with authority, and who the makes decisions to delegate part of this authority. There must be a hierarchy in order to gain the advantages of the division of labor. Institutional cooperation is structured by a hierarchy with a representative figure who possesses the authority to impose sanctions.

Paul describes Christ as the head of the church. This head cannot die, nor can the body, which extends into eternity (Rev. 21; 22). But this body can lose appendages. A body that is missing an appendage does not function as well as a body with all of its appendages. If an appendage does not work properly, the body suffers. Paul calls on members of the church to do their work well. This will benefit the church even as a body benefits from healthy appendages. Paul expects his readers to understand what he is getting at: strife is bad for a church. He calls them to righteous behavior. "Let love be without dissimulation. Abhor that which is evil; cleave to that which is good. Be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love; in honour preferring one another; Not slothful in business; fervent in spirit; serving the Lord; Rejoicing in hope; patient in tribulation; continuing instant in prayer; Distributing to the necessity of saints; given to hospitality" (Rom. 12:9–13).³

2. Robert Nisbet, Prejudices: A Philosophical Dictionary (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1982), p. 219.

There are conceptual weaknesses with organic metaphors that describe institutions. Unless organic metaphors are carefully qualified, they are not perceived as judicial; they become merely functional. The covenantal issues of life are judicial. It is not simply that an institution has a leader. The leader serves representatively: between the organization and the individuals who lawfully own it.

Paul could have limited his language to strictly judicial categories. He could also have invoked the image of a family. He did neither. What is it about a body that is so powerful an image? I suggest that the economic principle of the division of labor is best understood in terms of an organic metaphor. We can easily understand the operation of a social organization when it is described as a body. A body that experiences conflict among its members may become helpless. A person whose body suffers epileptic seizures is unreliable. A person who suffers from spastic discoordination is limited in what he can do. People see such afflictions in others and shudder. "What if I were so afflicted?" It frightens them. The affliction is of a specific kind: discoordination. Paul takes this common fear and makes use of it. How terrible when a church suffers from conflicts. This discoordination threatens to paralyze the church. He is making a comparison: if you fear becoming physically afflicted in such a way, you should fear that the church of Christ should become similarly afflicted. Paul wants Christians to regard strife in the church as they would regard epileptic seizures. Christians should not take lightly such disruptions inside the church.

3. Paul established hospitality as a requirement for every candidate to the office of bishop (I Tim. 3:2). Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2003] 2012), ch. 4.

B. Joint Productivity, Joint Service

Paul says that we possess different gifts, “gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us.” This diversity of gifts is a benefit to the church. The church has within its membership people with many kinds of abilities. They can offer their gifts to the church in faithful service. The church is then in a position to offer to its members and to the world a wide range of assistance. The church becomes a clearing house for a diversity of services. The larger the church grows, the greater its range of services.

The same principle of organization operates in the world outside the institutional church. An increasing division of labor is a major benefit to a society. Men have been given many different skills and insights. A social order that encourages people to offer their services for sale to others is able to increase the wealth of its participants, meaning an increasing range of choices. Adam Smith, in chapter 1 of The Wealth of Nations (1776), relied on the principle of the division of labor to explain how people can increase their personal wealth through voluntary exchange and production for a market.

The institutional church is not a profit-seeking entity. It is funded by the tithes and donations of its members, not by profit. It offers healing of all kinds to its members, beginning with physical healing. “Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord” (James 5:14). Service begins with love. “A new commandment I give unto you, That ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another” (John 13:34–35). “Be of the same mind one toward another. Mind not high things, but condescend to men of low estate. Be not wise in your own conceits” (Rom. 12:16). As the church grows, more people are brought into the community of saints. Some of them have needs that they cannot satisfy outside the covenant community. Others possess abilities that can meet the needs of others. The church enables those with needs to gain the help required to restore them. As they become restored to health in the widest sense, they can become sources of aid to those who are not yet healthy.

Covenant-keepers serve Christ by serving each other. This is true inside the institutional church and outside. Then what is unique or different about the institutional church? Answer: it alone offers the sacraments. God's special judicial presence in the sacraments is unique. Participation in sacramental rites brings God's people under God's judgment. Sanctions are dispensed to its members by God as a direct result of their participation in the sacraments. These sanctions can be positive⁴ or negative.⁵ A sense of community is one result of participation in the sacraments. Church members participate in a community that has been called by God to leave a world that is ultimately perishing, yet they must return to this perishing world when the worship service ends. Their worship inside is designed to make them better citizens outside. "If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men" (Rom. 12:18). Formal worship strengthens them in their status as residents of two worlds: eternity and time. Jesus prayed publicly to His Father: "I have given them thy word; and the world hath hated them, because they are not of the world, even as I am not of the world. I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that thou shouldest keep them from the evil. They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world. Sanctify them through thy truth: thy word is truth. As thou hast sent me into the world, even so have I also sent them into the world" (John 17:14–18).

Paul in Romans 12 calls his readers to faithful service inside the institutional church. His goal is to persuade his readers to present their bodies as a living sacrifice to Christ (v. 1). The starting point for their sacrificial service is the institutional church. The proper motivational impulse is charity, not earthly profit.

The division of labor aids church members in their ability to serve each other. Each member knows that there are other members who possess skills that may benefit him sometime. He can put his mind at greater rest because the church includes people who are willing to serve each other. The church in this respect seems more like a family than a body, yet Paul describes the church in terms of a body. It is almost if he is reluctant to encourage his readers to associate the church with the family. A family is the more obvious mental association, yet Paul uses a metaphor instead: body. Otherwise, many people would be tempted to proclaim the structure of a family to serve as a model for the church. The church is not a family.⁶ It has sacraments. A family does not. The church extends into heaven. Men there have access to the ultimate sacrament, the tree of life. “Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city” (Rev. 22:14). A family does not continue in heaven. “For in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven” (Matt. 22:30).

4. "And now why tarriest thou? arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord" (Acts 22:16).

5. "For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep" (I Cor. 11:30).

A church member knows that whatever he lacks, others in the church may possess. The larger the church or association of churches, the more likely that there will be providers of every kind of service. A member does not have to master every area of service, which is beyond his abilities. He need only concentrate on the limited range of services that he performs best. The same message appears in Paul’s first letter to the Corinthians, chapter 12.

C. The Institutional Church

Paul is not speaking here of the church in the sense of believers in general, i.e., the invisible church. He is speaking of the body of Christ as an identifiable organization that uniquely represents Christ in history and eternity. Paul’s audience was a group of Christians who were assembled together to hear the reading of his letter. This organization had members. It had a structure: hierarchy. This hierarchy had sanctions. The focus of his concern in this section is the smooth functioning of an institution.

The body of Christ represents Christ visibly in a way that the family and the civil government do not. This is why the church extends into eternity. The family and civil government do not. This means that the central institution in God’s kingdom is the church. Sociological analysis often begins with the family. The idea of the centrality of the family is not a biblical principle. It is far more pagan than Christian. It places biological relationships above sacramental relationships. It places loyalty to death-bound people above loyalty to the resurrected Christ, who is represented in history by His body. Jesus severely condemned the idea of family loyalty’s being superior to loyalty to Him. “Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter in law against her mother in law. And a man's foes shall be they of his own household. He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me: and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me" (Matt. 10:34–37). The idea of the centrality of the state is socialist. This ideal, too, is in conflict with the biblical principle of the centrality of the church. It is the church alone that lawfully offers the dual covenantal oath-signs of baptism and the Lord's Supper, which are eternal sanctions, not just temporal.

6. Gary North, Baptized Patriarchalism: The Cult of the Family (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1995). (<http://bit.ly/gnbappat>)

The state can represent Christ judicially. So can the family. But both institutions can also represent other worldviews, other gods. The church is uniquely Christ's. The sacraments are judicial oath signs that point uniquely to God's final judgment. The sanctions that are imposed by family and state do not uniquely point to God's final judgment. Excommunication—separation from the sacraments—judicially represents hell. Paul never uses the following language with respect to family or state. "For I verily, as absent in body, but present in spirit, have judged already, as though I were present, concerning him that hath so done this deed, In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, when ye are gathered together, and my spirit, with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ, To deliver such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus" (I Cor. 5:3–5).

Family and state sanctions do not covenantally deliver a man's body to Satan, nor do they involve a man's spirit. Family and state are common grace institutions. Their covenantal blessings are available to all people irrespective of their personal confessions. The church is a special grace institution that is lawfully open only to those who confess Jesus Christ, and Him crucified. "For I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified" (I Cor. 2:2).

The church is the body of Christ. It has many members, Paul said. It possesses unity. "So we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another" (Rom. 12:5). It also possesses diversity: "Having then gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us." Each member is to serve God by serving others. This fulfills Paul's initial command: "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service" (Rom. 12:1).

The division of labor strengthens the church. It creates a broad range of talents and services. Individuality is affirmed by this broad range of talents, yet institutional unity is also established: a more self-sufficient entity.

Paul places no restrictions on either this diversity or this unity. He does not suggest that members should not cooperate with each other. The range of services is limited only by the size of the church. There is no indication that the church is to be broken into non-cooperating subdivisions. On the contrary, the church is Christ's body. It cannot be broken up into non-cooperating subdivisions without injuring it. The range of the division of labor is limited only by the size of the church. The church is international. The division of labor within the church is international. In the midst of international violence, there should be a beacon of peace. In the midst of noncooperation among peoples and nations, there should be an example of cooperation. The church is designed by God to be the premier example. When it is not the premier example, then either it is at fault or the observers are.

* * * * *

D. Offices and Gifts

Paul concludes I Corinthians 12 with a list of ecclesiastical gifts. He moves from metaphor to description. "And God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues. Are all apostles? are all prophets? are all teachers? are all workers of miracles? Have all the gifts of healing? do all speak with tongues? do all interpret? But covet earnestly the best gifts: and yet shew I unto you a more excellent way" (I Cor. 12:28–31).

The first office listed is apostle. This office no longer exists. There are still obscure Protestant sects or independent congregations whose leaders claim that they are apostles. They do not make it clear what distinguishes the office of apostle from the office of prophet, nor do they explain how someone gains this office, or what his distinguishing abilities are, or why an apostle should be removed or even can be removed for malfeasance, or how the office is passed on institutionally.

Next comes the office of prophet. Ever since the completion of the New Testament's documents and the necessary cessation of authoritative revelation equal to these documents, this office has not existed. There are still men and women who claim that they are prophets. The same comments apply to this office as apply to apostle.

Next comes the teacher. Churches do not usually recognize it as a separate office from pastor. Paul here does not mention presbyters or deacons. So, he is not dealing here with issues of judicial hierarchy. He is dealing with the diversity of gifts. "After that miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues."

The greater the diversity of gifts in any organization, the greater is its potential division of labor. The greater the division of labor, the greater the level of output from the same quantity of inputs. Paul is saying that a church's members should welcome the large diversity of gifts that is found within its membership. Church members who do not possess any of these gifts of office are nevertheless benefited by the presence in the church of those who do. The church as an institution can accomplish more when the members without these unique gifts cooperate with those who possess them.

This is why both envy and jealousy are terrible sins. They undermine social cooperation. Jealousy is resentment at another person's advantages, coupled with the desire to force the other person to share his advantages. Envy is resentment against another person's advantages, coupled with a desire to remove those advantages without gaining access to them. Jealousy seeks a levelling based on a redistribution of assets in favor of the jealous person. Envy seeks a levelling based on the removal or the destruction of the other person's advantages.⁸ Both involve tearing down. Jealousy delights in both the tearing down and the subsequent redistribution of assets. Envy delights merely in the tearing down. Ahab was jealous of Naboth's vineyard. "And Ahab came into his house heavy and displeased because of the word which Naboth the Jezreelite had spoken to him: for he had said, I will not give thee the inheritance of my fathers. And he laid him down upon his bed, and turned away his face, and would eat no bread" (I Kings 21:4). The Philistines were envious of Isaac's wells. "For all the wells which his father's servants had digged in the days of Abraham his father, the Philistines had stopped them, and filled them with earth" (Gen. 26:15).⁹ There was no cooperation between Naboth and Ahab or between the Philistines and Isaac. There was only conflict. Naboth and Isaac were innocent.

8. On the distinction between jealousy and envy, see Helmut Schoeck, Envy: A Theory of Social Behavior (New York: Harcourt Brace, [1966] 1970), pp. 5, 13, 14, 71, 96.

9. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 27.

The church in the broadest sense possesses a great diversity of gifts. A local congregation may not. As in the case of specialized profit-seeking organizations, churches specialize. They concentrate on what they do best. They evangelize different segments of society. They develop traditions that emphasize their particular specialties. This has been going on from the early church era, but as the church has spread its influence across borders and social groups, local congregations have grown very different from others. The same kind of tolerance that Paul tells the Corinthians to display toward one another is to be displayed by churches toward one another. The fundamental issue is confession of faith. This statement reflects the theological tradition known as Calvinism. Other traditions emphasize other core issues: the sacraments or emotional enthusiasm or forms of liturgy. But Jesus settled this issue long ago: confession is central.

He saith unto them, But whom say ye that I am? And Simon Peter answered and said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. And Jesus answered and said unto him, Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven. And I say also unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven (Matt. 16:15–19).

The church as an international organization possesses a multitude of gifts. The larger it grows, the greater the diversity of gifts that its members possess. This is why church growth is an imperative. It increases the efficiency of covenant-keepers as they seek to fulfill the terms of the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:26–28).¹⁰

E. The Social Division of Labor

The language of organic unity is often applied to society. We think of ourselves as members of society. We are less likely to think of ourselves as cogs in a great machine, except insofar as we perceive that we have lost too much of our independence. Yet the member of a body does not perceive itself apart from the body. It is an “it,” not a sentient being. So, what is the difference in principle between a machine and a body? I think the distinguishing feature is life. A member can grow; a cog cannot. A body can grow; a machine cannot. A body has a representative head; a machine does not.

0. Ibid., chaps. 3, 4.

What is the basis of growth in a society? Not biological law. But this comment also applies to the church. There have been social theorists who have sought to discover the permanent laws of society, as if society were biological. Their success has been minimal, as is testified to by all of the other social theorists who also claim to have discovered the laws of society, but whose laws are different.

Certain varieties of political theory have sought to identify a head for society. Monarchy lends itself to such a formulation, but there are no monarchs today who possess such overarching headship or even claim it. Political theory moves from the organic analogy to judicial categories as soon as it confronts the problem of the head. The issues of sanctions—voting—also move political theory away from organicism. This is also true of theories of the church. The language may be organic; the categories are judicial.

This concept of corporate interdependence applies to social organization in general, but especially to the free market. The free market integrates the plans and productivity of legally sovereign individuals—an amazing achievement—and thereby provides continuity through time. The free market integrates the one and the many by means of private ownership, the legal right to make offers to exchange scarce resources, the legal enforcement of contracts, and the price system. The legal right of ownership, including the right to bid, produces an enormously complex and productive society. Few people recognize or understand the cause-and-effect connection between private ownership and social cooperation. The system operates nonetheless.

In a free market economy, there is no overall chain of command. A major appeal of socialist theory has been its concept of a rational hierarchy. A central planning agency is seen as functioning as a head functions. But, as Ludwig von Mises pointed out in 1920, this head is not omniscient. It cannot plan rationally because, under socialism, there is no private ownership, especially of capital goods. There is no price system, so the planners cannot know what the price of scarce resources should be in order to maximize the value to society of whatever resources exist. A price system is a system of competitive bidding by individuals who possess the legal right to buy and sell and make offers to buy and sell. Such rights do not exist in a systematically socialist society. Therefore, Mises concluded, economic calculation is impossible under socialism.¹¹ There were several attempts to refute his theory, most notably by the Communist economist, Oskar Lange.¹² Lange's theory of a national planning board that could set prices and change them in response to shortages or surpluses was never adopted by any socialist or Communist society. His theory offered too much authority to customers. In Communist Poland, Lange served as chief economist, beginning in the late 1940s. He was the architect of Communist Eastern Europe's system of accounts. His system never incorporated his theory.

The free market's system of market pricing solves most of the practical problems of reconciling the one and the many, i.e., reconciling individual benefits and aggregate social benefits. But, in the realm of economic theory, the various theories offered by humanist economists have not solved the ethical issue or even the theoretical issue of the one and the many. From the days of Adam Smith, free market economists have pointed to the great advantage of the free market: encouraging greater individual output through an appeal to individual self-interest. Free market theorists have argued that greater individual output benefits all or at least most members of society, not just those who are directly involved in exchange. This, they have yet to prove, given their presupposition of methodological individualism. In order to say anything scientifically valid about social utility assumes that the economist can add and subtract individual utilities to produce an assessment of aggregate social utility. This necessarily assumes that it is possible to make scientifically valid interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. Because most free market theorists since the mid-1930s have followed Lionel Robbins in his argument that it is impossible scientifically to make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility, they have found no way theoretically to justify any statement regarding the free market and social utility. Economists make such assessments all the time when they recommend policies to governments, but they do so only inconsistently. They violate their own methodological individualism when they make such assessments and recommendations. There can be no concept of social utility in a world where it is impossible to make

1. Ludwig von Mises, "Economic Calculation in the Socialist Commonwealth" (1920), in F. A. Hayek (ed.), Collectivist Economic Planning (London: Routledge, 1935). This essay is posted on the Web: <http://www.mises.org/econcalc.asp>.

2. Oskar Lange, On the Economic Theory of Socialism (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1964). This is a reprint of Lange's articles that appeared in the Review of Economic Studies, IV (1936–37).

interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility.¹³

In 1956, Murray Rothbard made an attempt to derive a theory of social benefit based on voluntary exchange.¹⁴ He argued that if two people make an exchange, they do so because they think they will be better off after the exchange. Their individual utilities therefore increase. This assumes that after the exchange, they still think they are better off than they were before the exchange. This also assumes that no one else is hurt by their exchange. But an envious person may perceive his individual utility as having decreased because two people are made better off by an exchange. What if his decrease in social utility more than offsets the increase experienced by the exchangers? Rothbard dealt with this theoretical problem by denying the verifiable existence of envy. That is, he defined away the theoretical problem. In 1971, he changed his view of envy. He became an enthusiastic promoter of Helmut Schoeck's thesis in Schoeck's book, Envy: A Theory of Social Behavior (1966).¹⁵ Schoeck argues that envy has been an important motivation behind socialism. But as soon as he accepted the existence of envy, Rothbard destroyed the theoretical case that he had made in favor of a utility theory based on mutual exchange. He never dealt with this logical inconsistency over the next quarter of a century.

The biblical solution to this problem is the concept of methodological covenantalism. God deals with men in their capacity as individuals. He also judges corporate units to which men belong and in which they are represented by other men. God holds individuals responsible for their actions, but He also brings judgments in history on corporate entities (Lev. 26;¹⁶ Deut. 28¹⁷). He imputes

3. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 5; Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), Appendix H.

4. Murray N. Rothbard, "Toward a Reconstruction of Utility and Welfare Economics," in Mary Sennholz (ed.), On Freedom and Free Enterprise: Essays in Honor of Ludwig von Mises (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1956). (<http://bit.ly/SennholzMises>) This has been reprinted by Liberty Press, Indianapolis, Indiana. It also appears in Rothbard, The Logic of Action Two: Applications and Criticism from the Austrian School (Glos, United Kingdom: Elgar, 1997), pp. 211–54.

5. Murray N. Rothbard, "Freedom, Inequality, Primitivism and the Division of Labor," Modern Age (Summer 1971); reprinted in Rothbard, The Logic of Action Two: Applications and Criticism from the Austrian School, pp. 3–35. This essay is posted on-line at <http://www.mises.org/fipandol.asp>.

6. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), chaps. 34, 35.

7. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on value to men's actions, both as individuals and corporate groups. God makes judgments in history and also retroactively at the final judgment. Thus, we can say confidently that the reconciliation of the one and the many is found in God's perfect judgment. As an individual acting on his own behalf and also as a representative of a group, it is each man's unavoidable responsibility to make judgments in history based on his present estimate of God's final retroactive judgment on his actions.

Christians can legitimately conclude that any economic order that results when men obey God's laws will reconcile the one and the many in the realm of scarce resources. We read in chapter 12 of both Romans and First Corinthians that the division of labor is good for the church. We can legitimately extend this assessment to the economy. What is good for church members in the church—the division of labor—is good for individuals in the economy. The division of labor is a benefit to men in society whenever it is based on the private ownership of the means of production, except when the specialty is identified as immortal by the Bible.

Conclusion

Paul describes the church as a body and its members as members. So ingrained is his language today that we speak of church members, but the meaning has changed since Paul's day. We speak of church membership as if it were little more than joining a club, but the concept of church membership encompasses far more than formal belonging. Church membership is described by Paul as being organic. Church members are members of a body. Without organic union, the body ceases to function properly. It begins to die.

The power of Paul's metaphor of a body with members is very great. We seem to be able to understand it better than we understand such concepts as the division of labor or oath-bound subordination to a representative entity. The essence of the church is judicial-covenantal, but Paul's analogy points to cooperation, like the parts (members) of a body.

We belong to the church in much the same way as members of a body belong to each other. This is not the way that members of a club belong to each other. The church is far more significant. This means that we cannot do without each other without suffering individual losses.

ESCHATOLOGY AND CAPITAL ACCUMULATION

For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order: Christ the firstfruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming. Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith, all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted, which did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all (I Cor. 15:21–28).

The theocentric principle here is the complete historical triumph of God over His enemies in history. This is eschatology: point five of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Resurrection and Historical Continuity

The literal bodily resurrection of Jesus Christ in history is the starting point for this chapter. Paul writes, “For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures; And that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day according to the scriptures” (vv. 3–4). Christ’s burial was literal. His body was placed in the tomb by Joseph of Arimathea (Matt. 27:57–60). Christ’s resurrection was equally literal.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

His body was removed from the tomb, but not by any human being, for a great stone had been placed in front of the tomb's entrance by the authorities (Matt. 27:62–66). Christ's resurrection was not symbolic, meaning mythical, meaning a lie perpetrated by early Christian writers for the sake of deceiving the public, which is what liberal theologians would have us believe. The risen Jesus had hundreds of witnesses. "And that he was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve: After that, he was seen of above five hundred brethren at once; of whom the greater part remain unto this present, but some are fallen asleep" (I Cor. 15:5–6). When Paul testified before the Roman governor, Festus, he said, "For the king knoweth of these things, before whom also I speak freely: for I am persuaded that none of these things are hidden from him; for this thing was not done in a corner" (Acts 26:26).

So crucial is the doctrine of Christ's bodily resurrection in history, that Paul says twice that the Christian's faith is in vain if this doctrine is not historically accurate. "And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain" (v. 14). "And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins" (v. 17).

The doctrine of Christ's bodily resurrection serves as Paul's introduction to a discussion of eschatology: the last things and the next-to-last things. Christ was resurrected from the dead; His followers will also be resurrected from the dead. "Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead? But if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen" (vv. 12–13). Christ is risen; hence, there will be a future resurrection of the dead, who in life placed their trust in the historical life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Our hope is not confined to this life. "If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable" (v. 19).

Paul in this chapter discusses the final judgment. He says that God's final judgment will be characterized by an eschatological discontinuity: incorruption will inherit a redeemed world. "So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption: It is sown in dishonour; it is raised in glory: it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power: It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body" (vv. 42–44). The distinction here is between corruption and incorruption. Life prior to the final resurrection, the final judgment, and the establishment of the post-resurrection New Heaven and New Earth (Rev. 21; 22), is marked by corruption. All men in history are in sin. Sin affects everything men think and do. They cannot escape this corruption by sin in history. They cannot experience complete victory over sin in history. Death still rules them, no matter how long they live. There is only one deliverance from sin and its effects, i.e., God's sanctions on sin: final judgment for covenant-keepers. Wherever sin exists, sickness and death remain. Wherever sickness and death exist, sin remains. The end is not yet.

Resurrection was definitive in history: the resurrection of Jesus Christ is past. "Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead? But if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen: And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain" (vv. 12–14).

Resurrection is progressive in history: spiritual. "But thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord" (vv. 57–58).

Resurrection will be final. "Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption. Behold, I shew you a mystery; We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law" (vv. 50–56).

The literal truth of Christ's bodily resurrection in the past, and the literal truth of mankind's final resurrection in the future, must both be affirmed without qualification by any Christian who desires to defend orthodoxy and avoid heresy. Christians, East and West, have confessed the following for centuries: "The third day, He arose from the dead, and sitteth at the right hand of God, the Father almighty, from whence He shall come to judge the quick [living] and the dead." We call this confession the Apostles' Creed. It has long served the church as a major judicial standard of orthodoxy. The Nicene Creed (325) has a similar statement. "On the third day he rose again in accordance with the Scriptures; he ascended into heaven and is seated at the right hand of the Father. He will come again in glory to judge the living and the dead, and his kingdom will have no end.”

All of this has to do with Christ’s judgment against sin: at Calvary, in history through His covenantal representatives, and at the end of history. The resurrection was, is, and will be preliminary to public judgment by Christ against sin and its effects.

The Christian’s acts of exercising judgment are affirmations of the bodily resurrection, past and future. The Christian, through decision-making, is supposed to extend God’s kingdom in history. He is told by God to overcome the effects of sin in his own life and in those areas of life that are lawfully under his covenantal jurisdiction. He is to bring judgment against sin progressively. This is what Paul meant when he wrote to the Philippians, “Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling” (Phil. 2:12). This is what he meant when he told them, “Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended: but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus” (Phil. 3:13–14).²

The continuity of Christians’ individual and corporate exercise of judgment in history culminates in the eschatological discontinuity of Christ’s final overcoming of sin’s historical effects at the final judgment. The lake of fire will be God’s overcoming of sin’s effects eternally (Rev. 20:14–15). The efforts of Christians in history do not bring about this eschatological discontinuity. Their continuity is the continuity of definitive incorruption’s progressive overcoming of corruption in history. But the discontinuity of incorruption’s final inheritance and corruption’s final disinheritance will be exclusively the supernatural work of Christ, when he will end history by finally overcoming death, God’s original negative sanction against sin (Gen. 2:17). On that day, but not before, we will be able legitimately to declare, “O death, where is thy sting?” That is because we will also be able legitimately to declare, “O sin, where is thy power?” and “O, corruption, where is thy inheritance?” This event still lies in the future.¹

2. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 21.

1. Appendix A.

B. Millennial Viewpoints

The major divisive issue in Christian eschatology is the sequence of events that will precede the final resurrection of the dead. One highly divisive question in this regard is this: Will there be a major historical discontinuity prior to the general resurrection at Christ's second coming? Specifically, will Christians be removed from history prior to the second coming, as premillennial, pre-tribulational dispensationalists teach? That is, will what dispensationalists call the Rapture, or the secret Rapture, of Christians take place approximately one thousand years prior to the final judgment?

1. Wheat and Tares Together

Jesus categorically denied this. In his parable of the tares and the wheat, He made it plain that Christians and non-Christians will operate in history together until the end of time.

Another parable put he forth unto them, saying, The kingdom of heaven is likened unto a man which sowed good seed in his field: But while men slept, his enemy came and sowed tares among the wheat, and went his way. But when the blade was sprung up, and brought forth fruit, then appeared the tares also. So the servants of the householder came and said unto him, Sir, didst not thou sow good seed in thy field? from whence then hath it tares? He said unto them, An enemy hath done this. The servants said unto him, Wilt thou then that we go and gather them up? But he said, Nay; lest while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat with them. Let both grow together until the harvest: and in the time of harvest I will say to the reapers, Gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them: but gather the wheat into my barn (Matt. 13:24–30).²

The disciples were not sure what this meant. They came to Him later and asked for clarification. He provided it.

He answered and said unto them, He that soweth the good seed is the Son of man; The field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom; but the tares are the children of the wicked one; The enemy that sowed them is the devil; the harvest is the end of the world; and the reapers are the angels. As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire; so shall it be in the end of this world.

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 29.

The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity; And shall cast them into a furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. Who hath ears to hear, let him hear (Matt. 13:37–43).

He who has ears to hear, let him hear. Millions of pre-tribulational, premillennial dispensationalists have refused to hear ever since 1830, when their eschatology first appeared. So committed are they to the idea that Christians will be removed from the burdens of history either 1,007 years or 1,003.5 years before the final judgment, that they have refused to accept Christ's explicit warning that no such removal will ever take place in history. They have ears to hear, but they do not hear. They seek an escape from history and its burdens.

Jesus said that there will be historical continuity for tares and wheat, living side by side, until the final judgment. Christians who refuse to begin with this premise cannot accurately understand the future of Christianity. They cannot understand what God has called His followers to do in history: conquer the world on behalf of Christ as His covenantal representatives. They dismiss such views as "triumphalism," as if triumphalism were not the essence of the twin doctrines of Christ's bodily resurrection and bodily ascension in history. They regard triumphalism with respect to culture as ridiculous or even heretical, yet they regard triumphalism with respect to Christ's victory over physical death as basic Christian theology. Christ publicly demonstrated His authority to forgive sin by means of His ability to tell a cripple to get up and walk, which the cripple immediately did (Matt. 9:2–8). Christ's spiritual authority over sin in general was manifested publicly by His visible authority over one effect of sin in general: healing a physical disability. Nevertheless, both the premillennialist and the amillennialist insist that Christianity will never manifest publicly, by means of Christianity's progressive triumph over cultural evil in history, the truth of Christ's bodily ascension to the right hand of God and His present reign over history.

2. Future Longevity

In contrast, the prophesied continuity of historical victory for Christianity involves a social transformation so great that the life spans of men will begin to approach those that prevailed before Moses announced this rule: “The days of our years are threescore years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labour and sorrow; for it is soon cut off, and we fly away” (Ps. 90:10). Isaiah announced that, sometime in the future, sinners dying at age one hundred will be regarded as children. Jerusalem will rejoice.

For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people: and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying. There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed (Isa 65:17–20).³

This prophecy cannot possibly refer to the post-resurrection world, for in the era described by Isaiah, there will be sinners living and dying. This passage refutes amillennialism⁴ as surely as the parable of the tares and wheat in Matthew 13 refutes pre-tribulational and mid-tribulational dispensationalism.⁵ The amillennialist affirms historical continuity, but this continuity is a continuity of earthly defeat for Christianity. He says that there will never be a time when Christianity will rule the world. Always, he insists, Christians will be under the dominion of covenant-breakers.⁶

According to pre-tribulational, premillennial dispensationalism, Christianity will experience defeat culturally in this, the pre-millennial era of history. This defeat will be reversed only after Christ returns bodily to set up His earthly millennial kingdom seven years after the Rapture. At the Rapture, wheat and tares will be separated by divine intervention: the wheat will be removed from history. This will be a great discontinuity. There will be a continuity of defeat for Christianity until the Rapture’s discontinuity of deliverance out of history. According to amillennialism, Christianity also experiences defeat culturally. There is a continuity of defeat until the Second Coming’s discontinuity of deliverance out of history. Premillennialism and

3. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2021), ch. 15.

4. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), pp. 98–106. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

5. Ibid., pp. 296–98.

6. Ibid., ch. 5.

amillennialism are both highly pessimistic regarding our era, the era of the church.⁷

In historic premillennialism, which is not dispensational, there is no separation of the wheat from the tares prior to the final judgment. There is a great discontinuity, however: the bodily re-entry into history of Jesus Christ and (depending on the theologian involved) His angels. This is consistent with the parable of the wheat and tares: no separation. But it maintains an inherent pessimism regarding Christianity's influence during our pre-millennial era. It teaches a continuity of defeat for Christianity until the great discontinuity of Christ's second coming, which supposedly will take place 1,000 years before the final judgment. The discontinuity of Christ's bodily return will presumably establish a new continuity of victory for Christianity, one based on Christ's leadership over an international bureaucracy run by Christians. But this future victory has nothing or very little to do with the efforts of Christians—including you—prior to Christ's second coming and His establishment of an earthly millennial kingdom.

3. Questions of Social Order

The crucial question here is the issue of institutional continuity between the pre-millennial age—ours—and a future millennial age. We are told by premillennialists of all varieties that Christ will someday return to earth to rule in person. This view of Christ's millennial kingdom raises once again the problem faced by Moses, who ruled Israel by means of God's perfect and direct revelation. A long line of judgment-seekers formed in front of his tent and remained there all day long (Ex. 18:13).⁸ In premillennial social theory, there is a practical and presently unanswered question regarding the judicial effects of a discontinuity of perfection vs. imperfection within the worldwide hierarchy of judicial authority, with sinners governing at the bottom, and Jesus governing from the top. Jesus will be far more busy than Moses was. Moses ruled only over Israel. Jesus will rule over the whole world. There are just so many hours in the day. How will the hierarchical chain of courts operate—church courts and civil courts? What civil laws will predominate? Natural laws? Biblical laws? Some mixture?

7. Ibid., ch. 4.

8. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 19.

Then there is the matter of church courts. Will Baptists still insist on church independency when Jesus is there to settle the difficult ecclesiastical cases? Which higher regional church court will lawfully rule on disputes within a local congregation? Will Presbyterians and Episcopalians serve as judges in these higher church courts? How can ecclesiastical independency survive in a system of church courts that is constructed along the lines of Exodus 18's civil court model? Or is Jesus expected to settle in person every dispute in every local Baptist church? (Jesus would then be very busy!) These judicial questions are never, ever discussed in print by premillennialists. These questions are much too practical.

4. Institutional Continuity

There is another question regarding this future discontinuity: the transition between today's institutions and the institutions of the millennial era. Historic premillennialists and post-tribulation dispensationalists do not write about this transition, nor do pre-tribulation and mid-tribulation dispensationalists. That is to say, premillennialists rarely write about social theory at all. When they do comment on social theory, they do not use the Bible to defend their social recommendations.⁹ They do not discuss the institutional implications of whether or not Jesus will be assisted on earth by angels, or by resurrected, sin-free Christians, or merely by sin-cursed Christians. Thus, they offer no answer to this vitally important social question:

“Is there any significant continuity—intellectual, theological, financial, institutional—between our pre-millennial era and the millennial era to come?”

This is the question that premillennialist social theorists must answer in detail before they can develop a concept of premillennial institution-building that should be funded today by thrifty Christians. This question of the degree of institutional continuity or discontinuity must be dealt with forthrightly and in detail by premillennialist theologians before they or their academic followers can provide Bible-based opinions concerning the degree of future-orientation that is appropriate for today's Christians.

In the 1950s, the pre-tribulational, Los Angeles-based radio

9. Ibid., pp. 74–75.

preacher-pastor J. Vernon McGee dismissed all social action programs (except presumably for urban rescue missions and foreign medical missions) with this clever and socially debilitating phrase: “You don’t polish brass on a sinking ship.”¹⁰ Was he correct about the uselessness of brass-polishing? Given his eschatological views, he was correct, but his eschatological views were incorrect. I ask: Is it a waste of Christians’ scarce economic resources for them to finance explicitly Bible-based universities, academic research foundations, medical science, political action organizations, and all of the other institutions that provide social leadership and social transformation? These are the institutions that humanists have either taken over from Christians or built on their own ever since 1700, because Bible-believing Protestant Christians have either defected from such tasks or have never been involved. Amillennialists and premillennialists, if they had the courage of their convictions, would say “yes, polishing brass is a waste of resources.” J. Vernon McGee still speaks from the grave on behalf of all consistent pessimillennialists. Pre-tribulation dispensationalism has never offered anything beyond the social theory of the rescue mission.¹¹

First, in contrast to the institutional discontinuity of premillennialism, postmillennialism teaches continuity from our era until the final judgment. More specifically, postmillennialism teaches that there will be neither a Rapture nor the bodily return of Christ to set up an earthly kingdom approximately one thousand years prior to the final judgment. Only the future conversion of the Jews will create a significant historical discontinuity (Rom. 11), which will be positive for Christianity, but will not involve a change in Christ’s present reign from heaven.¹² Christ will still extend His earthly dominion representatively through His invisible church—Christians—but not in person, just as He has done since His ascension to the right hand of God.¹³

Second, in contrast to the institutional continuity of amillen-

0. I discuss this in greater detail in Priorities and Dominion, ch. 29.

1. Gary North, Rapture Fever: Why Dispensationalism Is Paralyzed (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1993), ch. 3, section on “Institutional Defeat?” (<http://bit.ly/gnapture>)

2. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

3. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1992] 1997). (<http://bit.ly/klghshd>)

nialism, which has been a continuity of Christianity's progressive defeat culturally, postmillennialism teaches a continuity of victory for Christianity, in time and on earth. Postmillennialism teaches that there will be a literal fulfillment in history of Isaiah's prophecy regarding the New Heaven and the New Earth (Isa. 65:17–20). Postmillennialism offers Christians the possibility of both social theory and economic theory based on the moral legitimacy and eschatological necessity of compound growth for Christianity.

C. Psalm 110 Revisited

Psalm 110 is the most frequently cited psalm in the New Testament. It is short.

A Psalm of David. The LORD said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool. The LORD shall send the rod of thy strength out of Zion: rule thou in the midst of thine enemies. Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power, in the beauties of holiness from the womb of the morning: thou hast the dew of thy youth. The LORD hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek. The Lord at thy right hand shall strike through kings in the day of his wrath. He shall judge among the heathen, he shall fill the places with the dead bodies; he shall wound the heads over many countries. He shall drink of the brook in the way: therefore shall he lift up the head (Ps. 110:1–7).

Verse 4, “The LORD hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek,” is the basis of the argument in the Epistle to the Hebrews that Jesus fulfilled this prophecy (Heb. 5:5–10). There is now a new priesthood, the author argues, for Jesus was part of the tribe of Judah, not Levi (Heb. 7).

The first verse of Psalm 110 is a familiar one. Jesus cited it in His final challenge to the Pharisees.

What think ye of Christ? whose son is he? They say unto him, The Son of David. He saith unto them, How then doth David in spirit call him Lord, saying, The LORD said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footstool? If David then call him Lord, how is he his son? And no man was able to answer him a word, neither durst any man from that day forth ask him any more questions (Matt. 22:42–46).

Psalm 110 speaks of a footstool. God will place His feet on His enemies, as if they were corporately a footstool. He will rule over them. The psalm then describes the nature of the rule of God. The language of victory is military. "He shall judge among the heathen, he shall fill the places with the dead bodies; he shall wound the heads over many countries" (v. 6).

Paul in this chapter picks up the theme of the footstool. "For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet" (v. 25). Who is "he"? Jesus Christ. When will He reign? Before the end of time. After He has put all of His enemies under His feet, then the end will come. "Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power" (v. 24). Paul's language could not be clearer. The reign of Christ is in history, prior to His final victory over His enemies. What is the last enemy to be defeated before the end? "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death" (v. 26). There can be no mistake about this: Christ's reign in history parallels the reign of death. As surely as death is present today, so does Christ presently reign in history.

A debate over eschatology has long existed over this question: Must Christ return bodily in order to establish His millennial reign in history? The premillennialist says yes. But the parable of the wheat and tares in Matthew 13 eliminates the exegetical basis of both mid-tribulational and pre-tribulational dispensationalism, both of which teach that the church will be removed from history for a few years prior to the bodily return of Christ to set up His earthly millennial kingdom. This leaves historic premillennialism and (possibly) post-tribulational dispensationalism as contenders in the eschatological debate.¹⁴ But I Corinthians 15 removes them from the debate. Christ's reign in history will be the same in the future as it is today, until death is finally defeated at the final judgment.¹⁵ His rule in history will continue to be representative. He will continue to reign from heaven. He will not leave His position of cosmic eminence at the right hand of God until the final judgment that will end history.

4. Here, I am assuming that post-tribulational dispensationalism does not predict the Rapture at the time of Christ's return to earth. Such a Rapture would separate the wheat from the tares. I am also assuming that post-tribulation dispensationalism does not predict the return of perfect, sin-free, death-free people to rule alongside Christ in history. This would constitute a denial of Paul's message that incorruption and corruption cannot share the same inheritance. Corruption does not inherit incorruption. Incorruption cannot inherit corruption. The two realms remain separate until corruption is removed by final judgment. For more on this, see the Appendix.

5. Appendix A.

The amillennialist would also like to remain in the debate, but Isaiah's teaching regarding the New Heaven and the New Earth removes him from the debate, unless he denies the literal truth of the prophecy regarding an era without tears and with extended life spans. This is a difficult exegetical position to defend, for it makes publicly unverifiable Isaiah's prophecy regarding the future. There is no way to verify its fulfillment.¹⁶ The fulfillment of a prophecy regarding extended lifetimes ought to be verifiable actuarially. If nothing else, the premiums for annual renewable term life insurance policies should fall dramatically. What the amillennialist categorically denies with respect to Christ's resurrection and ascension into heaven—their exclusively symbolic rather than literal character—he affirms for this prophecy of Isaiah.

What this passage in First Corinthians teaches is continuity. Christ was resurrected first. This points to the bodily resurrection of His people in the future. Paul calls Christ's resurrection the firstfruits (vv. 20, 23). This refers back to the Mosaic law's firstfruits festival, when there were offerings to God from the field of the harvest. "Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye be come into the land which I give unto you, and shall reap the harvest thereof, then ye shall bring a sheaf of the firstfruits of your harvest unto the priest: And he shall wave the sheaf before the LORD, to be accepted for you: on the morrow after the sabbath the priest shall wave it" (Lev. 23:10–11). This was a token offering, a kind of down payment on the greater offering to God after the harvest was complete. Christ's resurrection was God's down payment to His people, a promise of the great eschatological event to come.

D. Capital Accumulation

The issue of historical continuity is fundamental for any discussion of capital accumulation. Continuity is the central issue of compound economic growth. Investors who believe in long-term economic growth also believe in the possibility of expanding their capital through time. This means that they believe that capital, as a tool of production, can produce ever-greater output over time.

6. An example of such a denial is found in Anthony Hoekema's book, The Bible and the Future (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1979), p. 202. For my response to his argument, see Millennialism and Social Theory, pp. 98–106.

1. Social Discontinuity

If there must inevitably be a great discontinuity in between the church's work today and its work during some future earthly kingdom, then whatever Christians do today to accumulate capital will be thwarted by this great pre-millennial discontinuity. If the Antichrist's kingdom must be triumphant in between the Rapture and the millennial kingdom, as pre-tribulational and mid-tribulational dispensationalists teach, then the capital that is amassed by today's Christians will be inherited by their enemies during a future tribulation era. The wealth of the just is therefore being laid up today for sinners. But Proverbs teaches the opposite. "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov. 13:22).¹⁷

Even if a few elements of this capital legacy somehow survive the Great Tribulation, of what significance will this legacy be in a world ruled by Christ in person, possibly assisted by angels and perhaps even resurrected Christians, who will be sin-free, illness-free, and death-free? Corruption fades in comparison with incorruption. The inherently corrupt capital legacy of history can have no significant role to play in a world governed by the incorrupt. This is why Paul wrote that corruption cannot inherit incorruption (vv. 50–54). Why, then, should anyone believe that incorruption has any use for corruption? It is doubtful that most premillennialists have even thought about this question. I have never seen it raised by a premillennialist author. Yet this question is crucial for any understanding of the motivation for Christians to sacrifice in the present for the sake of a permanent and meaningful legacy to the future. When a man believes that his spiritual heirs will regard his legacy to them as peripheral to their lives, what is his motivation to save and sacrifice in order to build and extend long-term institutions? Premillennialists do not think carefully about this issue, but the general implications of their eschatology do trickle down to the masses of believers. The result is the familiar rescue-mission mentality. The trumpet of premillennialism is not the trumpet of cultural victory; it is the trumpet of a Salvation Army band.

Similarly, with respect to the cultural effects of Christianity, the amillennialist insists that the continuity of Christianity is a continuity of cultural defeat. Any capital amassed by Christians will either be dissipated or confiscated during a future period of escalating rule by covenant-breakers. Christ's reign in history is seen by amillennialists as almost exclusively internal and psychological, operating mainly in the hearts of His increasingly persecuted people. Amillennialists have no vision of compound economic growth and social redemption along the lines of Deuteronomy 28:1–14. They deny the eschatological possibility of comprehensive redemption.¹⁸

7. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 41.

With respect to the church's age, prior to Christ's physical return to set up an earthly millennial kingdom, premillennialists agree with amillennialists. Things will not go well for Christians or any institutional legacy of Christians that may be produced during the present church age, which dispensationalists call the Great Parenthesis because it supposedly was never predicted in the Old Testament.

It is appropriate at this point to comment on the dispensational doctrine of the church age as the Great Parenthesis. The preaching of Peter at Pentecost refutes the position of conventional dispensationalists on this point, for Peter cited a prophecy in Joel 2 as being fulfilled by the events at Pentecost. "But this is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel; And it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out of my Spirit upon all flesh: and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams: And on my servants and on my handmaidens I will pour out in those days of my Spirit; and they shall prophesy: And I will shew wonders in heaven above, and signs in the earth beneath; blood, and fire, and vapour of smoke: The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before that great and notable day of the Lord come: And it shall come to pass, that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved" (Acts 2:16–21). The only consistent way out of this theological dilemma for dispensationalists is to argue, as J. C. O'Hair, Cornelius Stam, and Charles F. Baker did, that Peter did not establish the church; Paul did. Peter's early converts were not members of the church, the body of Christ—the institution that we belong to. They were members of a brief, transitional organization.¹⁹ Very few dispensationalists have been willing to move into ultradispensationalism,²⁰ but in refusing, they remain committed to an obvious falsehood, for the Old Testament clearly did predict the church, according to Peter. The church age is not a Great Parenthesis. The church is the fulfillment of Old Testament prophecy, and is therefore the heir of Old Covenant promises. Old Covenant Israel was publicly disinherited by Christ. As Jesus told the Jewish leaders, “Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof” (Matt. 21:43). The international church is that nation. The question now is: How many fruits will it bring forth, and what kind? The final answer in history will depend heavily on the eschatologies that are held by its members.

8. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C: "Comprehensive Redemption." (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

9. Stam's book, Things That Differ (Chicago: Berean Bible Society, 1959), presents the case for one version of ultradispensationalism, which marks the origin of the church in Acts 9: Paul's ministry. Others argue that the church came after Acts 28.

The premillennial-amillennial view of the church’s progressive cultural failure shortens their adherents’ time frames. They become less future-oriented. They adopt what Ludwig von Mises called high time preference. They see few long-run benefits from the steady accumulation of capital in the broadest cultural sense. They believe that Christian cultural capital will either be dissipated over time or else confiscated by sinners during the Great Tribulation or its amillennial equivalent, when the powers of darkness overwhelm the ever-dimming forces of light. Their slogan: “Nice guys finish last.”

2. Time Perspective and Compound Growth

Mises argued that the more future-oriented a lender is, the lower the rate of interest that a borrower needs to offer him in order to secure a loan. Conversely, the higher the lender’s time-preference, i.e., the more present-oriented he is, the higher the rate of interest that he will demand from borrowers. High rates of interest in a society will lower the society’s future rate of economic growth. Capital becomes more expensive, so less of it is demanded.²¹

Future-oriented societies enjoy higher rates of economic growth than present-oriented societies. Members of a future-oriented society rank the value of future income higher than do members of a less future-oriented society. They consume less in the present, invest their savings for the sake of future income, and thereby finance economic growth. They get what they prefer: greater wealth and income in the future, which they value more highly than present-oriented people do. In contrast, a present-oriented society consumes more of its capital, leaving less to fund future economic expansion, than a future-oriented society does. Its members also get what they prefer: less growth in the future, more consumption now. Each society purchases corporately what its members prefer. The purchase price is thrift.

0. The movement is represented by the Berean Bible Society and Milwaukee Bible College. See the website: <http://www.gmaf.org/gracehistory.html>

1. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. 19.

Some view of eschatology forms the time perspective of every society. A Christian eschatology that is pessimistic regarding the cultural success of Christianity in the future will lead its adherents to invest differently from Christians who hold a more optimistic view of Christianity's compound growth in the broadest sense. The standard rhetorical question from a Christian who has just had his eschatology challenged exegetically—"Does it really matter very much what eschatology a person holds?"—deserves a forthright answer: "Yes, it matters greatly." It also matters greatly what eschatology a society holds.

The work of the institutional church is funded by the tithes and the above-tithe offerings of the faithful, and by the below-tithe donations of the less faithful. The greater the income of church members, the greater the percentage of their income that they should give away. Each additional dollar of net income per unit of time is used to satisfy a desire that is lower on the person's scale of values. People satisfy their basic needs with the income that they receive first. Thus, as their net income rises, their savings rate and their charitable contributions should increase as a percentage. Sadly, this is rarely the case.

Economic growth funds the expansion of God's kingdom into every area of life in which sin presently reigns. Anyway, it should. But when Christians have little faith in the long-term positive results of their work and their donations, God's kingdom in history is hampered by a lack of funding. Christians' lack of faith in the future of Christianity has led to an under-funding of local churches, as well as other Christian ministries. Men do not normally choose to invest in projects that they expect to go bankrupt.

E. Postmillennialism

Paul in this passage applies the footstool eschatology of Psalm 110 to the question of New Testament eschatology. Paul affirms here that the enemies of God will be placed under Jesus' feet in history. Only after this process of subduing is complete will God's final judgment come.

The central theme in Paul's eschatological argument here is the resurrection. Jesus Christ was resurrected bodily, Paul insists. This event is central to the Christian faith. Without it, he says, Christians' faith is in vain. But the doctrine of the bodily resurrection applies to Christians as well as to Jesus Christ. We will all be resurrected at the last day, Paul says. When will this be? Only after Christ's reign in history has put all of God's enemies under Christ's feet. The last enemy to be defeated will be death. This will mark the end of history.²²

Paul does not here explicitly refer back to Isaiah 65:17–20, but it ought to be clear that his prophecy regarding the final defeat of death represents the consummation of Isaiah's prophecy regarding the New Heavens and the New Earth in history, an era that will be marked by exceedingly long life spans. There will be increasing continuity over time, including biological continuity. People will live longer.

According to the parable of the wheat and tares, there will be no historical discontinuity prior to the final judgment, which will permanently separate Christians from non-Christians. This parable refutes pre-tribulational and mid-tribulational dispensationalism. There will be no Rapture, secret or otherwise, that removes all Christians from history simultaneously, leaving non-Christians behind to run the world for any period of time. The Bible's doctrine of historical continuity therefore also refutes the inescapable social implication of pre-tribulational dispensationalism, namely, that there will be a break in continuity between Christians' social investments in the broadest sense before Christ returns and the final victory of Christianity in history before the final judgment.

Postmillennialism teaches that there will be continuity between what Christians do today and the progressive victory of Christianity in history. In short, there will be compound growth for the kingdom of God in history.

Postmillennialism's confidence about the earthly future of God's kingdom makes postmillennial Christians more future-oriented than those Christians who are committed to pessimilennialism. They have confidence that their kingdom-building efforts in history, funded by their donations and their thrift, will produce inter-generational expansion for God's kingdom in history. There will never be a future discontinuity that will permanently reverse the progressive subduing of God's enemies in history. "For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet." Christ will have dominion, not through a great historical discontinuity in the midst of history (premillennialism) or by an eschatological discontinuity at the end of history (amillennialism), but through historical continuity. This means that He will have dominion representatively in history, through His church in the broadest sense. He will continue to reign from heaven at the right hand of God. His definitive victory over death at the resurrection will be progressively manifested in history, according to Isaiah. "There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed." Then, Paul writes, "the last enemy that shall be destroyed is death." Christ's definitive ascension out of history into heaven, to rule at the right hand of God, will be progressively manifested by the triumph of Christianity over God's enemies. "For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet."

2. See the Appendix.

Conclusion

This eschatology of victory, when widely believed, produces lower interest rates and, as a result of greater thrift, more rapid economic growth than exists in societies where this viewpoint is either absent or not widely believed. Jesus saves. He saves representatively through His people. Jesus saves the world progressively over time. Jesus' followers therefore are supposed to save and then invest wisely whatever they have saved. They are required by God to extend His kingdom in history, and this requires capital. Capital must therefore be progressively accumulated by covenant-keepers in history. This capital is primarily spiritual, but not exclusively. This is why a "good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov. 13:22). It is this inter-generational accumulation of capital that serves as the basis of the inheritance of the earth in history by God's covenantal agents. "What man is he that feareth the LORD? him shall he teach in the way that he shall choose. His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth" (Ps. 25:12–13).

SYSTEMATIC CHARITY

Now concerning the collection for the saints, as I have given order to the churches of Galatia, even so do ye. Upon the first day of the week let every one of you lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come. And when I come, whomsoever ye shall approve by your letters, them will I send to bring your liberality unto Jerusalem (1 Cor. 16:1–3).

The theocentric principle here is the requirement that God's covenant people who possess assets show mercy to God's covenant people without assets. God's covenant is extended in history through charitable giving. This is sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. The Church Universal

Paul indicates here that he was in communication with other congregations in the Mediterranean. These were gentile congregations. The object of his call for charity was the church in Jerusalem, which was made up mainly of Jews. The international church's confession was understood by Paul as the basis of a unity that transcended the differences between Jews and Greeks. "For there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek: for the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon him" (Rom. 10:12). This being the case, the suffering of one congregation had become a matter of concern for all of the others. The church of Jesus Christ is international. This fact should bring the sufferings of one congregation to the attention of the others.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

The universality of the church is part of the international division of labor in the broadest sense. The unity of the church is based on the doctrine of the church as Christ's body. "And he is before all things, and by him all things consist. And he is the head of the body, the church: who is the beginning, the firstborn from the dead; that in all things he might have the preeminence. For it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell; And, having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things unto himself; by him, I say, whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven" (Col. 1:17–20). The members of this international, inter-cultural body are interconnected, as Paul had explained earlier in this epistle (ch. 12). They are bound to each other by an oath to the same covenantal God.

Paul here mentions other congregations. They were also taking collections for the Jerusalem church. He reminds the Corinthians that they are not alone in this effort. He also subtly reminds them that other congregations are doing their share. No single congregation was being asked to bear an excessive burden. This was a joint relief effort.

Because the church is universal, its members are supposed to be able to rely on the generosity of other members. This membership extends beyond any local congregation. This sense of belonging and mutual obligation served the churches as an early form of economic insurance. Groups have always developed informal and formal systems of mutual aid in order to reduce the risks of disaster to individual members. This has always been one of the benefits of joining a closely knit group. Paul here establishes a principle that the group known as the church is larger than a local congregation.

The farther away from a central location—in this case, Jerusalem—the weaker are the perceived claims of mutual obligation. Local bonds are stronger. They are more personal. Participants know each other and possess information about each other. Donors know if recipients are wasteful or not. They know if the person who has fallen on hard times is in trouble because of external circumstances or because of his own folly. The farther away the recipient of charity is, the more that the donors must rely on the judgment of third parties regarding the legitimacy of a distant poor person's claims.

B. The Fund-Raiser

Paul was the most important third party in the gentile church. The congregations' leaders trusted him and his judgment. He had spoken on behalf of the Jerusalem congregation. Because the Jerusalem church was suffering as a collective unit, gentile donors could safely assume that the plight of that congregation was not the result of foolish behavior on the part of a few people. The Jerusalem congregation had overseers who were apostles. If that premier congregation was suffering, this must have been the result of external circumstances, not the moral weakness of its members or its leaders.

The importance of a trusted spokesman in raising charitable funds is very great. His assessment of the situation is vital for the success of the fund-raising effort. First, people must trust both his morals and his judgment. Paul, as the primary founder of the gentile churches, possessed this trust. Second, he must be an effective motivator. Not everyone knows how to persuade other people to donate money. Paul wrote effective fund-raising letters. His two surviving letters to the Corinthians contain fund-raising sections (II Cor. 8–9).² Third, he must have access to the donors, either directly or indirectly. In Paul's case, contact was both direct and indirect. He visited congregations. He also wrote letters, which would be read by local leaders. Fourth, there must be some way to collect the money. He said that he would visit the Corinthian church. He might even accompany the men who would take the money to Jerusalem. "And if it be meet [fit] that I go also, they shall go with me" (v. 4).

Paul left the details of collecting the money to the local congregations. He told the Corinthians to select representatives to go to Jerusalem and deliver the money. Transportation costs being what they were—high—this project was a major undertaking. The presumption was that a lot of money would be involved, making it mandatory that someone from the congregation personally deliver the money to the representatives of the Jerusalem church. Paul acted as a spokesman for that church, but the responsibility for the delivery of the funds was the local church's. Paul wisely delegated this responsibility to local church members. This reduced his responsibility, and it also made it clear to donors that they would be represented by people from their own congregation. No accusation could subsequently be made against Paul if something happened to him while he was carrying the money. He would not carry the money. He could not fairly be accused of misappropriating the funds if something happened to him or the money.

2. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 20912), chaps. 4, 5.

We can see that Paul had set up a system of international charity that was based on trust—several layers of trust. He was serving as an agent on behalf of the Jerusalem church, but also on behalf of the church international. Local control over funding was retained in his system, but he coordinated the collection of the funds. He also served as a trusted intermediary, thereby legitimizing the claims of the Jerusalem church. By doing all this, he reduced institutional and personal resistance to the Jerusalem church's appeal for funds. In fact, there is no mention by Paul of such an appeal by the Jerusalem church. He was acting on their behalf as the initiating agent.

Paul accepted no personal support from any congregation. He earned his money as a tentmaker (Acts 18:3). This was wise. He maintained his independence this way. So, when he asked for money, people knew that this money was not for his personal use. This tended to reduce criticism, but it did not eliminate it. By the time he was about to arrive to collect the money (II Cor. 8), he had come under fire by disgruntled members. He therefore reminded the church of their lack of charity toward him.

Behold, the third time I am ready to come to you; and I will not be burdensome to you: for I seek not yours, but you: for the children ought not to lay up for the parents, but the parents for the children. And I will very gladly spend and be spent for you; though the more abundantly I love you, the less I be loved. But be it so, I did not burden you: nevertheless, being crafty, I caught you with guile. Did I make a gain of you by any of them whom I sent unto you? I desired Titus, and with him I sent a brother. Did Titus make a gain of you? walked we not in the same spirit? walked we not in the same steps? Again, think ye that we excuse ourselves unto you? we speak before God in Christ: but we do all things, dearly beloved, for your edifying (II Cor. 12:14–19).³

Paul acted from the beginning of the collection process as though he knew that where donated money is concerned, criticism is close at hand. When people decide that they do not want to honor their promises, they seek ways to assuage their consciences. “Blame the fund-raiser” is a tried-and-true conscience-assuager. Paul called them to task for this: “Now therefore perform the doing of it; that as there was a readiness to will, so there may be a performance also out of that which ye have” (II Cor. 8:11).

3. Ibid., ch. 10.

It is easy to make a pledge. The hard part is doing what you have pledged. Jesus used this fact to accuse the Pharisees of treason against the kingdom of God.

But what think ye? A certain man had two sons; and he came to the first, and said, Son, go work to day in my vineyard. He answered and said, I will not: but afterward he repented, and went. And he came to the second, and said likewise. And he answered and said, I go, sir: and went not. Whether of them twain did the will of his father? They say unto him, The first. Jesus saith unto them, Verily I say unto you, That the publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you. For John came unto you in the way of righteousness, and ye believed him not: but the publicans and the harlots believed him: and ye, when ye had seen it, repented not afterward, that ye might believe him (Matt. 21:28–32).

Paul warned them months in advance to begin laying aside a portion of their wealth, week by week. “Upon the first day of the week let every one of you lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come” (v. 2). This was a serious fund-raising project. It was international. Paul was not relying on his ability to create a one-time event in which he would come through town, whoop up the crowd, take the money, and leave. He told them, on the contrary, that he would not ask them to donate anything new when he arrived. They were responsible before his arrival to lay aside their donations. Week by week, the accumulated wealth was to accumulate even more.

Paul was relying on the consciences of covenant-keeping men to provide the funding. He was not relying on his ability to whip people's emotions to a high pitch. He was an apostle. He acted like an apostle. He possessed lawful authority. He did not possess great speaking ability, as he had already admitted:

And I, brethren, when I came to you, came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom, declaring unto you the testimony of God. For I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified. And I was with you in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling. And my speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power: That your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God (1 Cor. 2:1–5).

So, he had to rely on their consciences and their self-discipline. He advised them to set aside their donations systematically, week by week. That would be sufficient.

C. Proportional Giving

Paul asks them to give as they are able, in terms of however much God had prospered them. This standard is consistent with the principle of the tithe. This special collection of funds went beyond the tithe. It was an offering, as in “tithes and offerings,” as modern Protestant churches put it. It was not to be tithes or offerings. The church is supported by the tithes of its members.¹ Paul’s request was in addition to the tithe. This was why he was writing a special appeal to church members. He was not asking the church’s leaders to pay for this special collection out of the local congregation’s tithe money, which belonged to the local congregation.

1. Charity

The principle here is that God provides men’s blessings, so church members should be willing to distribute a portion of their blessings to others who have suffered setbacks. The donor thereby becomes a means of God’s provision of a blessing for others. God has established charity as an indirect means of delivering His blessings. He normally does this through nature, human labor, creativity, and thrift, and through the division of labor, which includes markets. He enables people to produce goods and services for each other. The productivity of their labor is maximized through voluntary exchange. But, in some cases, God provides blessings indirectly. When people’s productivity fails to provide them with sufficient income, other people’s productivity can provide supplemental income. This is part of God’s overall system of blessings.

Clearly, the greater a person’s productivity, the more he is capable of providing blessings for others out of his surplus income. Similarly, the greater a society’s productivity, the greater its members’ ability to provide blessings out of their surplus income. Paul calls on the Corinthian church to give proportionally to their prosperity. He does not ask them to give sacrificially. He limits his request. Corinth was a rich city. Its local congregation was better able to provide blessings for others than were, say, the Macedonian congregations. Paul reminded them of this in a subsequent letter.

1. Gary North, Tithing and the Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994). (<http://bit.ly/gntithing>)

Moreover, brethren, we do you to wit of the grace of God bestowed on the churches of Macedonia; How that in a great trial of affliction the abundance of their joy and their deep poverty abounded unto the riches of their liberality. For to their power, I bear record, yea, and beyond their power they were willing of themselves; Praying us with much intreaty that we would receive the gift, and take upon us the fellowship of the ministering to the saints. And this they did, not as we hoped, but first gave their own selves to the Lord, and unto us by the will of God (II Cor. 8:1–5).²

2. The Very Poor Give More

By comparing the reactions of the members of the Corinthian church with the reactions of the members of the Macedonian churches, Paul soon discovered a fact of life about charitable giving: the very poor are often the more dedicated givers than the comparatively rich. This had been pointed out by Jesus in the incident of the widow's mite, a low-value coin. "And he looked up, and saw the rich men casting their gifts into the treasury. And he saw also a certain poor widow casting in thither two mites. And he said, Of a truth I say unto you, that this poor widow hath cast in more than they all: For all these have of their abundance cast in unto the offerings of God: but she of her penury hath cast in all the living that she had" (Luke 21:1–4).³

We would expect that charitable giving would increase as a percentage of after-tax income when men's income increases. They can more easily afford to pay for their basic necessities, which do not vary much from person to person, unless high medical expenses are involved. After all, people can eat only so much food. They can wear only one pair of shoes at a time. But it is well known that as people's income increases, their expenditures on consumer goods keep pace or even increase as a percentage of their income. Only when they attain enormous wealth do their consumption expenditures begin to lag behind their income.

This indicates that people's tastes change when their income rises. Tastes for consumer goods change. We hear of someone who has "more expensive tastes" than he had before his income rose. This is another way of saying that money and the things that money buys are addictive. The more money you receive, the more you spend. The more you spend, the more things you want. Jesus warned against the addictive power of money, especially in His sermons and sayings that are recorded in the Gospel of Luke.⁴

2. North, Ethics and Dominion, ch. 4.

3. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Pount Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 50.

In contrast, Christians believe that, through God's grace, righteousness can become addictive. A person who gives 10 percent of his income may find pleasure from giving an even larger percentage the next year. But Christians do not believe that this preference for righteousness is natural. It is a consciously developed taste which normally takes years to develop. A growing trust in God, which the discipline of giving produces, does not come naturally. It runs counter to autonomous man's assumption that this world is stacked against him, and that he must beat it into submission. Autonomous man does not believe in God's grace—an unmerited gift from God—nor does he believe that the universe is governed by an omnipotent God who takes care of His people when they give money to extend the kingdom of God in history. He sees the universe either as malevolent or impersonal. In neither case does grace influence its operations, let alone govern them.

The failure of Christians to increase the proportion of their giving when they are economically blessed by God testifies to their limited vision. They have not violated God's law, so long as they have tithed, but they have not shown the courage of their convictions regarding God's care of His people. They need not feel guilty if they have faithfully tithed, but they should feel a sense that something valuable is missing in their lives. God's kingdom must be funded. Assisting other Christians in their time of need is a great privilege. Paul made this clear: "I have shewed you all things, how that so labouring ye ought to support the weak, and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive" (Acts 20:35).⁵

Conclusion

Paul here asks members of the Corinthian church to show liberality toward the Jerusalem church. The Jerusalem church was in dire straits. Paul asks the members of the Corinthian church to display

4. Luke 8:11–15; 8:18; 12:15–21; 12:22–34; 16:13.

5. Gary North, Sacrifice and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Acts, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 9.

generosity to the Jerusalem church, even as God has provided generously for the members of the Corinthian church. There should be proportionality here: more received from God, more distributed in God's name.

This should be systematic giving, he said: week by week. God gives blessings daily; church members should set aside their surplus wealth and bring it to the church to coincide with weekly worship services. This is systematic giving. It is the model for all giving. It should be habitual. Habits are hard to break. Good habits are to be inculcated through self-discipline.

Paul avoided using his appearance at the church to pressure members to give at one meeting. He appealed instead to their self-discipline. A regular habit provides greater results in the long run than sporadic emotional commitments.

CONCLUSION

According to the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise masterbuilder, I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon. For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ. Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire (I Cor. 3:10–15).

A. Building Christ's Kingdom

Christians are workers who are engaged in a great construction project: building the kingdom of God in time and on earth (Matt. 28:18–20).¹ Paul says in chapter 3 of this epistle that Christians should understand that their work will be judged by God at the end of time. This future, final judgment should serve as the primary motivation for Christians to make evaluations—render judgment—in a God-honoring way, and then to act in terms of them. This epistle deals with the correct rendering of judgment.

This kingdom-construction project is a corporate effort, Paul says. He is not writing in this epistle primarily about personal salvation. We know this because he says that he has laid the foundation, and others have built on it. This refers to a foundation for something corporate. “According to the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise masterbuilder, I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon. For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ” (vv. 10–11). The foundation defines the building. What was this original foundation? Christ. This is the foundation of salvation in the broadest sense: comprehensive redemption.² Paul laid this foundation in Corinth. It is now each individual church member’s responsibility to build on it, he says. This is a corporate effort, as he explains in chapter 12.

1. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 48. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/GentryGGC>)

This joint effort in building Christ’s kingdom was being thwarted by divisions in the church at Corinth. Paul in this epistle deals with divisions within the congregation, which were based on rival allegiances to the perceived co-founders of the local church. “Now this I say, that every one of you saith, I am of Paul; and I of Apollos; and I of Cephas; and I of Christ. Is Christ divided? was Paul crucified for you? or were ye baptized in the name of Paul?” (I Cor. 1:12–13). Members were treating the foundation as if the builders, rather than Christ, were the foundation. This led them to adopt a theory of multiple foundations. These divisions in the Corinthian church were hampering the work of the local church. Paul argues that its members should find their unity in the church, which is the body of Christ (I Cor. 12).³ Paul here brings the Corinthian church under judgment.

B. Final Judgment, Present Judgments

Paul teaches in I Corinthians 3 that God’s final judgment of every Christian will involve God’s presentation of rewards for their earthly service. There is also the threat of a negative sanction: a public revelation of the worthlessness of a Christian’s vain efforts in history. “If any man’s work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire.” This means that everything that a Christian has accumulated in history will go through a cleansing fire at the last day. Some of it will survive; some of it will be consumed. In some cases, all of it will be consumed. This will be the bonfire of the vanities.

The message here is that there is continuity between history and eternity: spiritual gold, silver, and precious stones. This will survive into eternity. There is also discontinuity: spiritual wood, hay, and stubble. This will not survive into eternity. God’s final judgment will publicly test the quality of each Christian’s legacy in history insofar as it extends into eternity. A Christian possesses legitimate hope that some of what he does in history will extend into eternity. That is to say, the solid building that he constructs on Christ's foundation will serve as a capital asset in eternity. Jesus made the same point. He recommended that people make this exchange in history: temporal wealth for eternal wealth (Luke 8:11–15).⁴ Covenant-keepers can lay up treasure in heaven through their charitable activities and sacrificial service in history. "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal" (Matt. 6:19–20).⁵

2. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

3. Chapter 15.

What God will do at the final resurrection of mankind (I Cor. 15; Rev. 20:14–15), all men must do in history: render judgment. God's final judgment will involve declaring retroactive evaluations. Men make evaluations, too, but our major judgments should be future-oriented into the realm beyond history. There is no escape from making decisions in history, other than a severe, incapacitating mental disease, when the disease's victim becomes a ward of others. We exchange one set of conditions for another, decision by decision, as we move through time. We evaluate our present condition and imagine various possible future conditions. Then we decide which condition we should seek to achieve through our present actions. Individual decision-making involves making an overall self-assessment of our abilities and disabilities, our present assets, our plans for the future, and the nature of the challenge facing us. Then we allocate our scarce economic resources, including time, to fulfill our plans.

Paul recommends that we consider the likely outcome on judgment day of our present actions. This involves imagining the rewards that will come to us as a result of God's retroactive evaluation of our actions. We are to think God's thoughts after Him, in advance. This is possible only because covenant-keepers possess the mind of Christ. "But he that is spiritual judgeth all things, yet he himself is judged of no man. For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him? But we have the mind of Christ" (I Cor. 2:15–16).⁶

The covenant-keeper is told to imagine God's final judgment: the

4. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 15.

5. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 13.

6. Chapter 2.

content of God's judgment rendered retroactively on his lifetime of individual labors. Theologians call God's judicial assessment and declaration imputation. The decision-maker also imputes. He imputes future value to his possible rewards, and he also imputes future value to the possible destruction of part or all of his legacy. He renders judgment in the present regarding the probable declaration of God on judgment day. Having made this evaluation, the covenant-keeper is supposed to act in the present in terms of this imagined future judgment. He should impute to the present the net value to him today of God's future retroactive imputation of value to his work. A person's assessment or imputation of value to the future must be acted upon in the present, day by day. Making a correct judgment in the present involves making a correct judgment regarding the future value of the results of present decisions. This future value will be imputed by God retroactively.

C. Imputation and Economics

To impute is to assess. The Greek work translated as "impute" comes from another Greek word meaning "to take an inventory." The longest section in Scripture dealing with imputation is found in Romans 4.

For what saith the scripture? Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness. Now to him that worketh is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt. But to him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness. Even as David also describeth the blessedness of the man, unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works, Saying, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin. Cometh this blessedness then upon the circumcision only, or upon the uncircumcision also? for we say that faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness (Rom. 4:3–9).

God will impute judicially on judgment day. He will take a retroactive inventory of each person's thoughts and actions in history. He will assess his permanent judicial status in terms of His law. Then He will declare His findings: "guilty" or "not guilty." Were it not for Christ's perfect substitutionary atonement, the declaration would universally be "guilty." This is the doctrine of imputation: a judicial declaration by God. But this judicial declaration is also economic, for it assesses comparative value: wood, hay, and stubble vs. gold, silver, and precious stones.

Because each person is made in the image of God, he imputes value to things in the world around him. He assesses subjectively the value to him of whatever is the object of his decision. This includes comparing present subjective value to expected future subjective value. It also includes comparing its present market price to the market price of other resources. He then compares today's array of prices with tomorrow's expected array of prices. If he is wise, he then compares today's value with his expectation regarding God's retroactive assessment of today's value. "For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" (Mark 8:36). This imputation process is subjective, but it is ultimately related to objective value: God's imputation. God's imputation of value is objective, for He is the absolutely sovereign Subject. God's absolute sovereignty establishes objective value in history. This is why economics, in order to be objectively true, must be grounded in the doctrine of the sovereignty of God. If value theory is grounded solely on each individual's subjective valuations, then the objectivity of economic science dissipates into non-rational intuition.⁷

Price is not the same as value. A price is objective; value is subjective. A decision-maker estimates subjectively what the value to him of some resource is; then he checks its objective price. He then compares this price—what he must exchange in order to obtain legal control over the resource—with the price of other scarce resources. Then he asks himself: "What should I buy, if anything, in order to maximize my immediate subjective value?" His subjective decision is influenced by the objective array of prices. He seeks to minimize the objective price he must pay in order to obtain the subjective value he seeks.

People impute value to scarce economic resources. Then they make objective bids in order to obtain those resources that they expect will maximize their subjective value. The interplay of these objective bids is what we call the price system. These competitive, objective bids for ownership or temporary legal control over scarce resources produce an objective array of prices. These bids do not create value. On the contrary, the bids are the results of subjectively imputed value, decision-maker by decision-maker. Their competing bids establish objective prices.

7. Gary North, "Economics: From Reason to Intuition," in Gary North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1976).

To impute value correctly, the decision-maker must begin with an imaginative forecast regarding God's present and final retroactive imputation of value to the outcome of some decision facing the decision-maker. Imputed value has two aspects: value to the decision-maker and value to God with respect to building His kingdom. Needless to say, it is the second imputation that is authoritative, but both have eternal consequences.

D. Rival Scales of Value

Paul begins the epistle with a consideration of foolishness. Covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers have irreconcilable definitions of foolishness. What is considered wise by the covenant-breaker is considered foolish by the covenant-keeper, and vice-versa (1:18–25).⁸

Imputation requires standards. This is true of both judicial imputation and economic imputation. "Guilty" vs. "not guilty" is judicial; "valuable" vs. "worthless" is economic. There are rival standards of right and wrong. There are rival standards of valuable and worthless. The competition in history between the kingdom of God and the kingdom of Satan is based, not on power, but on the objective results of the imputations and actions of each kingdom's covenantal agents in history.

Imputation begins with an individual's scale of values. These value scales are not morally neutral. There is no agreement among acting men regarding the authority of these rival scales of value. On the contrary, there is great disagreement. But, as we shall see, the disagreement is not total. There is some agreement, as a result of God's common grace to covenant-breakers.⁹ If there were no agreement, there could not be economic cooperation. There could be no division of labor.

There are rival scales of value that separate covenant-keepers from covenant-breakers, but certain features of the biblical system of covenantal sanctions do invite obedience to covenantal laws. Common grace involves common law and common sanctions. The creation is under God's law and God's sanctions. This includes economic law. Moses wrote: "But ye that did cleave unto the LORD your God are alive every one of you this day. Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it. Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day?" (Deut. 4:4–8).¹⁰ For example, honesty is the best policy. Covenant-breakers generally perceive a predictable relationship between honesty (law) and success (sanctions) in history. This perception—this accurate judgment—on the part of sinners is why social order is possible in history.

8. Chapter 1.

9. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

The covenant-breaker seeks personal advantages that his presuppositions neither entitle him to nor enable him to attain. His presuppositions, when acted upon, lead to poverty and death. "But he that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul: all they that hate me love death" (Prov. 8:36). So, in order to gain his advantages, he must appropriate certain aspects of the biblical worldview, although stripped of their foundation: faith in God, Christ, and the power of the cross. God restrains the covenant-breaker in his pursuit of his God-denying, God-defying presuppositions. This is an aspect of common grace.

The covenant-breaker has a rival set of presuppositions and a rival set of ethics. His ethical values, if they conform to what the Bible teaches, are consistent with the attainment of success in history. He who serves customers effectively can become wealthy, despite his denial of God. Covenant-breakers see this economic success, and they are tempted to adopt the covenant-keeper's practices, so that they can also participate in the benefits—the positive sanctions—that obedience to God's law produces in history. The covenant-breaker is often willing to cooperate with covenant-keepers on the latter's ethical terms, for the sake of increasing his own wealth. If adherence to God's law did not lead to success in history, the covenant-breaker would have no incentive to obey God's law. But obedience to God's law does produce success, and covenant-breakers see this. God's sanctions in history—point four of the biblical covenant¹—promote social cooperation.

0. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 8.

Most Christian theologians and social theorists deny the existence of any New Testament correlation between covenant-keeping and visible success, and also between covenant-breaking and visible failure. They therefore have an obligation to explain the existence of social cooperation that is based on men's subjective agreement regarding the objective results of obeying or disobeying God's law. They generally invoke some version of natural law theory, which in the world of Darwinism, is no longer a persuasive argument. There are no fixed laws in Darwinism.

E. Making Godly Judgments

Free men are better capable of making accurate, responsible judgments regarding their lives than men in bondage are. This includes assessments regarding their service to God. Men are to assess their skills and their opportunities for serving God, and then match the two. They are supposed to seek out their most productive area of service to God. Then they are to accept this area of service as God's special call to them. This is what Paul calls the calling (I Cor. 7:20).¹²

Over time, covenant-keepers are supposed to increase their ability to perform their godly service. This means that they should experience increasing productivity over time. This principle of increasing productivity applies to the calling, and it also applies to a person's occupation. Increased performance is an aspect of a man's increased power of judgment. As covenant-keepers mature through on-the-calling training, they should become better able to understand and apply cause and effect (predictable sanctions) in history. They should be able assess more accurately the role of specific facts or opportunities before them in terms of general biblical principles. This is the art of casuistry. It is a nearly lost art today.

At some point in a man's life, old age intervenes. Men's performance may begin to falter. This was the problem faced by Barzillai. David asked him to come to Jerusalem with him. Barzillai declined on the basis of his age.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

2. Chapter 8.

Now Barzillai was a very aged man, even fourscore years old: and he had provided the king of sustenance while he lay at Mahanaim; for he was a very great man. And the king said unto Barzillai, Come thou over with me, and I will feed thee with me in Jerusalem. And Barzillai said unto the king, How long have I to live, that I should go up with the king unto Jerusalem? I am this day fourscore years old: and can I discern between good and evil? can thy servant taste what I eat or what I drink? can I hear any more the voice of singing men and singing women? wherefore then should thy servant be yet a burden unto my lord the king? Thy servant will go a little way over Jordan with the king: and why should the king recompense it me with such a reward? Let thy servant, I pray thee, turn back again, that I may die in mine own city, and be buried by the grave of my father and of my mother. But behold thy servant Chimham; let him go over with my lord the king; and do to him what shall seem good unto thee (II Sam. 19:32–37).

This indicates that there should be no abdication of the responsibility to make judgments until the infirmities of old age intervene. Covenant-keepers should continue to serve God for as long as they are capable. If they have selected their callings wisely, they can continue in them even after they are no longer capable of earning a living. Their lifetime service to God can continue. It is a great blessing to be able to continue to serve in old age. Caleb understood this, and he should be our model.

And now, behold, the LORD hath kept me alive, as he said, these forty and five years, even since the LORD spake this word unto Moses, while the children of Israel wandered in the wilderness: and now, lo, I am this day fourscore and five years old. As yet I am as strong this day as I was in the day that Moses sent me: as my strength was then, even so is my strength now, for war, both to go out, and to come in. Now therefore give me this mountain, whereof the LORD spake in that day; for thou heardest in that day how the Anakims were there, and that the cities were great and fenced: if so be the LORD will be with me, then I shall be able to drive them out, as the LORD said. And Joshua blessed him, and gave unto Caleb the son of Jephunneh Hebron for an inheritance. Hebron therefore became the inheritance of Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenezite unto this day, because that he wholly followed the LORD God of Israel (Josh. 14:10–14).

Sanctions and judgment are both aspects of point four of the biblical covenant model. Caleb had rendered accurate judgment, along with Joshua, with respect to the weakness of the Canaanites (Num. 14). For this public testimony, God blessed both men publicly. They alone of their generation would go into the Promised Land, God said. God then blessed Caleb with vigorous long life. Caleb, in turn, accepted great responsibility, despite his age, when the conquest of Canaan began. Blessings and responsibility go together (Luke 12:47–48).¹³ So do blessings and good judgment.

F. Private Property

A customer owns property. With his property, he can make offers to purchase other forms of property. He makes offers because he has imputed economic value to his own property and then to the property of others. He has concluded that the item that the other person owns is more valuable subjectively to him than whatever he himself owns. Exchanges take place because of men's subjective imputations—"mine in exchange for yours"—and also their legal right to make bids.

A worker has legal title to his labor. He can exchange it or use it directly to satisfy his wants. The laborer is worthy of his hire (I Tim. 5:17–18). Because an ox has the right to eat from the field that it plows, so is the producer entitled to his output (I Cor. 9:7–10).¹⁴ Customers impute value to the fruits (output) of a worker's labor. They make objective competing bids to purchase this output. Producers expect this imputed value by customers to continue, so they expect to sell its output to customers later. These competitive bids by producers-employers establish labor's free market price, which is the price of labor's expected output. Buyers of labor will not pay more than the expected price of the worker's expected output, discounted by the interest rate. They are happy to pay less, but competition from other buyers of labor keeps the price high.

Legally, a worker owns his labor. He can legally refuse any offer to buy it from him. When he does, he thereby forfeits whatever he was offered in exchange, but he has the right to refuse to sell. If a person owns something, he possesses the right to disown it or keep it, as he sees fit.

It is the legal right to make offers or bids that establishes economic freedom. It also establishes the final earthly authority of the customer. His legal right to make an offer to buy imposes economic costs on anyone who refuses to accept his offer. This is the customer's "hammer." This is the basis of his authority: legal and economic.

3. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 28.

4. Chapter 11.

Paul's command to covenant-keepers to seek other people's benefits is a call to voluntary charity (I Cor. 10:24).¹⁵ The context of this command is Paul's prohibition against participation in ritual feasts on behalf of idols. The devils represented by idols are thieves and seducers. People who sacrifice to idols seek their own goals at the expense of those from whom devils will steal or will deceive. The opposite approach is God's way: self-sacrifice for others. This is why Jesus Christ voluntarily died on the cross. "But God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:8).

This principle of self-sacrifice, when coupled with the prohibition against ritual feasting, leads to a conclusion: godly people must not use stolen or confiscated wealth to sacrifice on behalf of others. Christians must not mimic devils. They must not use coercion by the state to gain access to wealth that is then transferred to others, even if the beneficiaries are poor and needy. To use the state to conduct coercive wealth transfers on behalf of any economically needy group is to adopt the way of Satan. It is to violate property rights in a fundamental way. It violates the eighth commandment: thou shalt not steal.¹⁶

This violation of property rights has taken place on a massive scale, accelerating in the West during the second decade of the twentieth century and escalating rapidly during and after World War I (1914–18). The West has established enormous inter-generational wealth transfers by means of compulsory retirement programs and compulsory medical insurance programs that benefit the aged. This has led to escalating taxation and the entrance of wives into the work force. Working wives bear fewer children, which reduces the growth of the work force, which reduces the future tax base, which leads to the actuarial bankruptcy of the state's compulsory retirement programs. This is a classic vicious circle. It threatens the solvency¹⁷ and therefore the legitimacy of Western civil governments.

The extension of the economic division of labor through capitalist ownership has made opportunities for employment available to

5. Chapter 12.

6. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 28.

7. Peter Peterson, Gray Dawn: How the Coming Age Wave Will Transform America—And the World (New York: Times Books, 1999).

women as never before in history. Capitalism has produced technology that has steadily equalized the productivity of men and women. This has created disruptions in the social order, especially in the family's hierarchy, but also in politics. Because of the increasing division of labor under capitalism, women have been able to enter the work force, a development which employers and tax collectors have applauded. Output has increased, but the ever-increasing employment opportunities of women have increased the cost—forfeited income—for wives who decide to stay out of the work force. Salaried wives have gained greater influence in the family, in the consumer goods markets, and in politics. This development has challenged the covenantal male-female hierarchy in the family.¹⁸

G. Full-Time Christian Service

“Whether therefore ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God” (I Cor. 10:31). This admonition establishes an important principle of Christian economics: any form of lawful service to God can legitimately become part of a Christian's call into full-time Christian service. This is an aspect of a life of sacrifice. Paul wrote to the church in Rome, “I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service” (Rom. 12:1).¹⁹ This sacrificial service involves eating and drinking. These seemingly common activities become uncommon through God's grace. They do not become sacramental, but they become holy: set apart by God.

The familiar distinction in modern pietism between full-time Christian service and that form of Christian service which pietists refuse to name is a false distinction. Pietists see full-time Christian service as almost exclusively ecclesiastical, i.e., tithe-supported. The kingdom of God in history they see as limited to churches and Christian families. But full-time Christian service is much broader than ecclesiastical employment or running a Christian household. It involves every aspect of life. Wherever sin reigns, there we find a task for Christians: to overcome sin and its effects through the preaching of the gospel and progressive sanctification, both individual and corporate. Christ's redemption is comprehensive. No area of life in which sin operates is off-limits to Christ's redemption. Wherever

8. Chapter 14.

9. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 7.

Christians labor to overcome sin and its effects, there we see an aspect of full-time Christian service. To declare any area of life as being irrelevant to full-time Christian service is necessarily also to declare this area of life as either sin-free or beyond the command of Christ to redeem it. Both statements would be so obviously heretical that pietists do not announce either of them, but one or the other conclusion is implied by their view of Christ's supposedly limited atonement, i.e., atonement only for souls, not for social policies, practices, and institutions. Such a view of redemption officially hands most of the world over to the devil.

H. The Division of Labor

In chapter 12, Paul develops at greater length a theme found in chapter 12 of his letter to Rome. He pictures the church as a body. Members of the church are members of a body. The word "members" applies to both. Church members are part of a whole. Some of them perform prestigious tasks; others perform lowly tasks. All of this is necessary to the proper functioning of the church. No church-enhancing service should be despised, either by the person performing it or by others, who are the beneficiaries of the service. Paul does not argue that there are no differences among tasks. He does not argue that services should be equally rewarded economically. On the contrary, he elsewhere says that ministers of the gospel are entitled to double honor. "Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour, especially they who labour in the word and doctrine" (I Tim. 5:17).²⁰ What he is saying in this passage is that, with respect to the legitimacy of work, all God-honoring work is equally legitimate.

Paul's discussion of services and servants in the church is analogous to the theological distinction between the ontological Trinity and the economical Trinity. The doctrine of the ontological Trinity expresses the equality of being among the three persons of the Godhead. The doctrine of the economical Trinity expresses the differences in function among the three persons of the Trinity. There is no hierarchy of divine being; there is a hierarchy of divine function. So it is within the church. There is an equality of legitimacy for all labor, yet also a hierarchy—inequality—of function.

0. Paul does not say this of "teaching elders," but of "ruling elders." This traditional Presbyterian distinction within the office of elder faces a serious difficulty with this verse. Paul identifies rulership as the basis of double honor.

The implications of Paul's presentation extend far beyond any local congregation. They extend to the church international. They apply to all institutions that serve a legitimate end. Paul affirms the dignity of all God-honoring labor. I know of no biblical passage that more forcefully affirms this principle.

The division of labor is extended most effectively when workers have respect both for the legitimacy of their work and its positive effects on others. People are more willing to sacrifice in the present in order to increase their performance and output in the future when they view their work as legitimate. This passage should be seen as complementing Paul's earlier command that people not change their callings in life, except for slaves who are offered their freedom (I Cor. 7:20–24).²¹ That command applies to men's highest service to God: the calling. This passage applies also to service to God, but it can and should be extended to people's occupations.

I. Eschatology and Capital Accumulation

Paul's discussion in chapter 15 regarding the last things (eschatology) applies the footstool theology of Psalm 110 to the future of Christ's earthly kingdom. Christ will subdue all of His enemies, including death. This process of subduing His enemies has to refer to history. The final removal of death has to refer to the end of history, because people will still die during the era that fulfills the prophecy of Isaiah (Isa. 65:17–20).²² Christians can therefore have legitimate confidence that their efforts to extend Christ's kingdom can bear permanent fruit, in time and on earth. Whatever they do today that is of value on behalf of God's kingdom will extend into the future: gold, silver, and precious stones. This time perspective we call future-oriented. Ludwig von Mises called it high time-preference.

Using a subjectively determined rate of interest, men discount the value of their expected future income. For example, an ounce of gold is worth more in the present than the secure promise of an ounce of gold in the future. This is because we are responsible to God in the present. The value of our lives and our capital is greater for us today than in the future because we can apply our lives and our capital to our callings and occupations today. We are responsible to God for the use of our resources today. This immediate burden weighs heavily upon us. Jesus warned: “Take therefore no thought for the morrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof” (Matt. 6:34).²³ Those people who subjectively value future income more highly than other people value it will act accordingly. They save a higher percentage of their income than less future-oriented people do. Men seek their subjective goals, and those who value future income more highly will sacrifice in the present more willingly than those who do not place equally high value on future income.

1. Chapter 8.

2. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 15.

Christians who understand and accept the implications for history of Paul’s teaching in chapter 15—and very few ever have—see the future cultural success of Christ’s earthly kingdom as prophetically secure. They view their present sacrifices on behalf of God’s kingdom as contributing directly to the eventual triumph of Christ’s visible kingdom in history. They believe in a positive correlation between covenant-keeping and visible success. They place higher present value on these sacrifices than do those Christians who believe that either (1) Christ’s earthly kingdom will steadily lose influence culturally, and will in fact be ever-more under siege by victorious covenant-breakers (amillennialism); or (2) Christ’s earthly kingdom will steadily lose influence culturally, and will in fact be ever-more under siege by victorious covenant-breakers until Christ comes again in person to establish His millennial kingdom, thereby introducing a wholly new system of government, i.e., a new “economy” (premillennialism). The first view of the future predicts a falling rate of cultural return in history for any investment that Christians make in the kingdom. The second view does the same. Premillennialism teaches that only a future, discontinuous, supernatural reversal of today’s culturally futile kingdom-investment program—a future intervention which has nothing to do with today’s investment programs or today’s rate of saving—will reverse the kingdom’s falling rate of return. Both views confine their discussions of today’s manifestations of kingdom victory to inward spiritual experiences and the superior family values of an ever-declining percentage of the world’s population over time.

Only postmillennialism affirms a continuity of victory in history for Christ’s kingdom. Only postmillennialism fosters a theologically grounded optimism regarding the long-term growth of Christian capital that will compound over time, leading to the triumphant extension of Christ's kingdom institutions. Institutions must be funded, and this takes economic productivity. Postmillennialism affirms the inevitability of greater compound growth over time for covenant-keepers than for covenant-breakers. Compound growth over many generations, even at a very low a rate of growth, will outperform compound growth over three or four generations, even at a very high rate of growth. This is the implication of the second commandment. "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth: Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them: for I the LORD thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me; And shewing mercy unto thousands of them that love me, and keep my commandments" (Ex. 20:4–6).²⁴

3. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 15.

Greater future-orientation produces higher rates of thrift. Higher rates of thrift produce greater capital investment: tools. Greater capital investment produces an extension of the division of labor: the specialization of production. Greater specialization of production produces a higher rate of output for resource inputs, especially labor, because workers are better able to match their specific skills with ever-more specialized employment opportunities. Greater output produces a higher rate of compound growth. This is another example of why eschatology matters. It matters a great deal.

J. Giving Wealth Away Systematically

Unlike humanistic theorists of economic growth, Paul taught that Christians must give away some of their wealth. Jesus taught this even more emphatically, as the Gospel of Luke emphasizes. Instead of re-investing all of their income above a minimal standard of living, Christians are supposed to allocate a rising percentage of their increasing income to charitable activities. This outlook was best articulated by John Wesley in his 50th sermon, The Use of Money (1745), based on Luke 16:9: "And I say unto you, Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations." Wesley concluded, in a famous aphorism, "Gain all you can, save all you can, give all you can."

4. North, Authority and Dominion, ch.22.

The Methodists taught this doctrine to the lower classes of England, not to the rich, who were not the targets of the movement's evangelistic program. Within three generations, Methodists both in England and the United States went from abject poverty to middle-class comfort.

Paul in chapter 16 calls on the Corinthians to adopt a program of making weekly contributions to the fund for the relief of the church at Jerusalem. He identifies systematic giving as the proper way to raise funds for large projects. Week by week, the Corinthians were to bring their offerings for the Jerusalem church and hand over the money to church officers. This was their reasonable service.

Conclusion

Paul's first epistle to the church at Corinth is judgmental. He brings judgment against the congregation. He also calls on the congregation to begin to exercise greater self-judgment in order to heal the congregation's divisions. This self-judgment had to involve the following:

1. their recognition of the unity of the church in Christ;
2. their awareness of rival standards of evaluation between covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers;
3. their perception of personal rewards and punishment at the final judgment;
4. their devotion to living as stewards for God;
5. their excommunication of a public sinner;
6. their establishment of church courts;
7. their lifetime commitment to their individual callings before God (unless they are slaves who are granted their freedom);
8. their acceptance of the responsibilities of Christian liberty;
9. their adoption of hope regarding the fruits of their labor;
10. their understanding of the whole of their lives as the worship of God;
11. their willingness to serve their fellow-believers;
12. their willing subordination to the covenantal hierarchies of church and family;
13. their purging of bad practices during the Lord's Supper;
14. their development of the church's division of labor; and
15. their voluntary increase of sacrificial giving on behalf of the Jerusalem congregation.

He called on the church of Corinth to reform itself comprehensively through self-judgment.

The primary issue confronting the church at Corinth was the issue of responsibility, both individual and corporate. The Corinthians were indulging in a massive corporate flight from responsibility. They had adopted some sort of common-ground speculation with covenant-breakers, ignoring the fact that the wisdom of one group is the foolishness of the other. Paul called them to abandon common-ground thinking in every area of life. This meant that they had to set up a church court, so that members would not go before pagan civil courts against one another. The institutional mark of their irresponsibility was their subservience to heathen civil courts in preference to a church court.

This is not a call for Christians to withdraw from social life. It is rather a call for them to work to reform social life, to reform and then incorporate all of social life within Christ's kingdom, in time and on earth. It is a call for Christians to establish alternative social institutions, such as church courts, in preparation for the guaranteed historical victory of Christ over His enemies in time and on earth. This victory will be achieved, not by Christ in person, but through His covenantal representatives. It will be achieved by means of the preaching of the gospel and the progressive sanctification, both individual and corporate, that is produced by this gospel in time and on earth.

APPENDIX A

A CRITIQUE OF HERETICAL PRETERISM

For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth (Ps. 37:9).

Yea, they are greedy dogs which can never have enough, and they are shepherds that cannot understand: they all look to their own way, every one for his gain, from his quarter. Come ye, say they, I will fetch wine, and we will fill ourselves with strong drink; and to morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant (Isa. 56:11–12).

Well, which will it be? Will evil-doers be cut off at the end of history, leaving Christians with the complete inheritance of the earth? In short, will there be a corporate final judgment at the end of the age that will end the effects of original sin on earth forever? Or, on the contrary, will evil-doers operate in history forever? The eschatological question is this: Is original sin eternal in history? The first position says no; the second says yes. Here are two irreconcilable views of the culmination of history and what will follow. Which one is correct?

A. The Universal Creeds

The church of Jesus Christ has always accepted the first view and has publicly denounced the second as heresy. The fourth century's three main creeds declared that there will be an end to evil and evil-doers at the end of history. God's final judgment will end the sin-cursed realm of nature, including the curse of sin in human nature. There will be a final separation of sinners and saints, goats and sheep. Sin will cease to be a factor in the world of the New Heaven and New Earth that follows God's final judgment. All of this has been so commonly believed among Christians for so long that there has been no debate over these tenets of the faith. But now there is.

1. Denying the Creeds

These fundamental eschatological precepts of the Christian faith are now being challenged by an unorganized group of creed-deniers who call themselves full preterists. One of them posted this statement on-line in July, 2001, in response to an early version of this appendix:

6. Are the Nicene Creed and Apostles' Creed incorrect when they identify Christ's final judgment of the living and the dead as being in the future?

Absolutely.

At the end of this essay, I reprint the man's appendix on why the creeds are wrong. But, for now, be aware that I am not exaggerating. The spokesmen of this heretical movement are aware of what they are doing. Their agenda is clear: the reversal of Christian orthodoxy and its replacement by dualism, i.e., the doctrine that sin and righteousness necessarily exist side by side in history, and history will never end. Put theologically, this is the doctrine that the Fall of man will be operational in history forever. Or, as Walt Hibbert wrote in a lengthy private response—now much longer²⁵—to my initial challenge,

God has already demonstrated for 2000+ years in history that he has chosen to use sin for the sanctification of his people, by allowing its presence on the earth to prepare His people for their entrance into Heaven after they physically die. Would that so-called final generation be treated soteriologically different from the way that He has graciously treated His people for 2000+ years? Would God abandon the sanctification process for that one final generation?

The correct answers to his rhetorical questions are yes and yes.

Before dealing exegetically with this position, it is wise to survey what the church has taught on the issue of God's final judgment from its beginning, and which was placed into the church's earliest official common creeds and the Reformed Presbyterian confessions.

2. The Creeds' Affirmations

The Nicene Creed says this about the final judgment by Jesus Christ:

5. Hibbert's essay is posted here: <http://tinyurl.com/2e7pu>

He ascended into heaven and is seated at the right hand of the Father. He shall come again in glory to judge the living and the dead, and his kingdom will have no end.

The Apostles Creed says this:

He ascended into Heaven, and is seated at the right hand of the God the Father Almighty. From there he will come again to judge the living and the dead.

The Athanasian Creed says this:

He ascended into heaven, is seated at the right hand of God the Father almighty, and from there he will come to judge the living and the dead. At his coming all people will rise again with their own bodies to answer for their personal deeds. Those who have done good will enter eternal life, but those who have done evil will go into everlasting fire.

It adds this warning: "This is the true Christian Faith. Whoever does not faithfully and firmly believe this cannot be saved."

In these formulations, God's final corporate judgment of both the resurrected living and the resurrected dead is said to take place in the future. It cannot have been an event in A.D. 70. This eschatological affirmation is denied by all heretical preterists.

This is the official eschatology of the Christian church. It has been so from the beginning, when the New Testament's texts were written. This view extended through the first three centuries of the church until the earliest creeds were formulated. The men who formulated the judicial statements that have defined the Christian faith institutionally had no doubt about what the New Testament teaches regarding the last days. The church has been clear for almost two millennia that anyone who denies these views is a heretic. Therefore he who denies this view of the future and who remains voluntarily as a member of the church is a subversive. He remains in the institutional church in order to undermine the Christian faith and steal God's church, as surely as Arius and his followers were subversives who were trying to capture the church for the devil.

3. The Protestant Reformation

We come now to the confessions in the Reformed Protestant tradition.

Article 37 of the Belgic Confession (1561), "Of the Last Judgment," says:

Finally we believe, according to the Word of God, when the time appointed by the Lord (which is unknown to all creatures) is come, and the number of the elect complete, that our Lord Jesus Christ will come from heaven, corporally and visibly, as he ascended, with great glory and majesty to declare himself judge of the quick and the dead; burning this old world with fire and flame, to cleanse it. And then all men will personally appear before this great judge, both men and women and children, that have been from the beginning of the world to the end thereof, being summoned by the voice of the archangel, and by the sound of the trumpet of God. For all the dead shall be raised out of the earth, and their souls joined and united with their proper bodies, in which they formerly lived. As for those who shall then be living, they shall not die as the others, but be changed in the twinkling of an eye, and from corruptible, become incorruptible. Then the books (that is to say the consciences) shall be opened, and the dead judged according to what they shall have done in this world, whether it be good or evil. Nay, all men shall give an account of every idle word they have spoken, which the world only counts amusement and jest: and then the secrets and hypocrisy of men shall be disclosed and laid open before all. And therefore the consideration of this judgment, is justly terrible and dreadful to the wicked and ungodly, but most desirable and comfortable to the righteous and elect: because then their full deliverance shall be perfected, and there they shall receive the fruits of their labor and trouble which they have borne. Their innocence shall be known to all, and they shall see the terrible vengeance which God shall execute on the wicked, who most cruelly persecuted, oppressed and tormented them in this world; and who shall be convicted by the testimony of their own consciences, and being immortal, shall be tormented in that everlasting fire, which is prepared for the devil and his angels. But on the contrary, the faithful and elect shall be crowned with glory and honor; and the Son of God will confess their names before God his Father, and his elect angels; all tears shall be wiped from their eyes; and their cause which is now condemned by many judges and magistrates, as heretical and impious, will then be known to be the cause of the Son of God. And for a gracious reward, the Lord will cause them to possess such a glory, as never entered into the heart of man to conceive. Therefore we expect that great day with a most ardent desire to the end that we may fully enjoy the promises of God in Christ Jesus our Lord. AMEN.

The Westminster Confession of Faith (1647), chapter 33, says:

I. God hath appointed a day, wherein he will judge the world in righteousness by Jesus Christ, to whom all power and judgment is given of the Father. In which day, not only the apostate angels shall be judged; but likewise all persons, that have lived upon earth, shall appear before the tribunal of Christ, to give an account of their thoughts, words, and deeds; and to receive according to what they have done in the body, whether good or evil.

II. The end of God's appointing this day, is for the manifestation of the glory of his mercy in the eternal salvation of the elect; and of his justice in the damnation of the reprobate, who are wicked and disobedient. For then shall the righteous go into everlasting life, and receive that fullness of joy and refreshing which shall come from the presence of the Lord: but the wicked, who know not God, and obey not the gospel of Jesus Christ, shall be cast into eternal torments, and punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power.

III. As Christ would have us to be certainly persuaded that there shall be a day of judgment, both to deter all men from sin, and for the greater consolation of the godly in their adversity: so will he have that day unknown to men, that they may shake off all carnal security, and be always watchful, because they know not at what hour the Lord will come; and may be ever prepared to say, Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly. Amen.

The WCF teaches the following. First, this event is still in the future. Second, it will lead to the eternal assembling of all the saints: "For then shall the righteous go into everlasting life, and receive that fullness of joy and refreshing which shall come from the presence of the Lord." Third, the fear of this future event should "deter all men from sin." The timing of this day is "unknown to men, that they may shake off all carnal security, and be always watchful, because they know not at what hour the Lord will come." There is an ethical aspect of this doctrine, which must be upheld by orthodox Christians.

The Westminster Assembly's Larger Catechism (1647) explicitly refers to the joining together of all the saints, which will occur at the time of the resurrection. Notice the reference to being caught up in the clouds. At that time, the transformed saints will judge the angels.

Question 90: What shall be done to the righteous at the day of judgment?

Answer: At the day of judgment, the righteous, being caught up to Christ in the clouds, shall be set on his right hand, and there openly acknowledged and acquitted, shall join with him in the judging of reprobate angels and men, and shall be received into heaven, where they shall be fully and forever freed from all sin and misery; filled with inconceivable joys, made perfectly holy and happy both in body and soul, in the company of innumerable saints and holy angels, but especially in the immediate vision and fruition of God the Father, of our Lord Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Spirit, to all eternity. And this is the perfect and full communion, which the members of the invisible church shall enjoy with Christ in glory, at the resurrection and day of judgment.

This will be the unification of the saints: “perfect and full communion.” The church militant will disappear: “they shall be fully and forever freed from all sin and misery.” The church triumphant will replace it entirely: “filled with inconceivable joys, made perfectly holy and happy both in body and soul, in the company of innumerable saints and holy angels, but especially in the immediate vision and fruition of God the Father, of our Lord Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Spirit, to all eternity.”

In summary, these detailed Reformation statements define the doctrine of the final judgment for Reformed denominations. While lay members are not required to affirm these statements as a condition of communicant membership, elders are so required. The elders of local congregations determine which beliefs are required for communicant membership. Some local congregations are loose in their enforcement of theology. Others are rigorous. But any congregation that allows non-ordained members to promote beliefs that run counter to the denomination’s formal statements of faith are thereby allowing those with a different confession to pursue their clandestine agendas at the expense of members who uphold the confessions.

Each church tradition has defining documents. These documents are used judicially to screen church officers. These documents are designed to be used judicially. Those people who oppose the theological contents of these screening devices are unofficially invited to keep out. Those who have achieved membership and who then adopt views counter to the denomination’s formal statement of faith should be officially told to cease speaking about their views or else leave the church voluntarily. If they refuse to stop and refuse to leave, then contumacy is involved. They can and should be tried for contumacy and removed from membership through public excommunication.

When you think “screening,” think “Arius.” Had the early church not screened Arius and his followers by means of a judicially enforceable confession, Trinitarianism would not have prevailed. The church, had it survived, would now be some variant of the Jehovah’s Witnesses or Islam: unitarian. Heretics, once in power, know how to screen out their opponents, as the Arians demonstrated for two decades after the Nicene Creed was officially adopted (325). Athanasius was on the run for the rest of his life, because of his orthodoxy. But the defenders of the Nicene Creed had visibly triumphed by 381. We are the heirs of their triumph, a triumph based on excommunication and the formal screening of candidates for ordination.

Without sanctions, there is no law. Without excommunication, there is no orthodoxy.

Confessions of faith are an inescapable concept. It is never a case of confession of faith vs. no confession of faith. It is always a question of the content of the confession of faith and the people in charge of enforcing it.

B. Heresy Is a Reaction Against Orthodoxy

Heresies in the church begin as rival theologies, based on philosophies developed outside the church, and then are presented to the church as a new, improved orthodoxy. Alien philosophies of God, man, law, historical causation, and time and eternity are reworked to fit Scriptural terminology and concepts. They spread within the church as supposed clarifications of an original true Christianity. To remove these heresies from the church, theologians and pastors must first recognize them as alien imports. This is why J. Gresham Machen wrote Christianity and Liberalism (1923): to identify the heresy of theological liberalism as an alien religion, the religion of sovereign, covenant-breaking man.¹

In this brief study, I identify the theological origin what is clearly a heretical version of what is known as preterism. Preterism argues that most, but not all, of the prophecies of the New Testament were fulfilled at the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Heretical preterism argues that all of these prophecies were fulfilled in A.D. 70. Preterism is not taught in any of the church's creeds or confessions, nor is it rejected. In contrast, the conclusions of heretical preterism are denied by the creeds and confessions. The more forthright of the heretical preterists admit this publicly.

1. Gary North, Crossed Fingers: How the Liberals Captured the Presbyterian Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1996), Part 3.

In order to understand this heretical theology, the reader first needs to know where the heresy comes into conflict with orthodoxy. In two passages above all others in Scripture, the conflict becomes inescapable: I Corinthians 15 and Revelation 20.

Paul set forth the orthodox view of the final judgment in his account the Christ's second coming. He spoke of an inheritance that is closed to men in sinful flesh.

Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption. Behold, I shew you a mystery; We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? (I Cor. 15:50–55).²

Paul's discussion of the final judgment is the consummation of this epistle-long argument regarding judgment in general. He had pointed to the final judgment in chapter 3: "Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire" (vv. 12–15). At the final judgment, every covenant-keeper's work will be judged retroactively by God. "If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire" (v. 15). But every person's work will be judged and rewarded accordingly.

First Corinthians 15 might be interpreted as referring only to heaven. John undermined this interpretation. Revelation 20 provides additional information regarding (1) the historical events that immediately precede the final judgment, (2) the physical resurrection of the dead, and (3) the post-resurrection state of covenant-breakers.

2. Chapter 17.

And when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, And shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle: the number of whom is as the sand of the sea. And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city: and fire came down from God out of heaven, and devoured them. And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever. And I saw a great white throne, and him that sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them. And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened: and another book was opened, which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works. And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them: and they were judged every man according to their works. And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death. And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire (Rev. 20:7–15).

What is the first death, if the second death is the lake of fire? There is only one possibility: the physical death of each individual. Yet even here, there is a legitimate hope that it will be avoided by a few. Paul teaches elsewhere that at the final judgment, covenant-keepers who are alive at the time of Christ's bodily return will escape the first death.

But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent [precede] them which are asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first: Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words (I Thes. 4:13–18).

Those who "sleep with Jesus" have passed through the first death that separates history from heaven. They will accompany Jesus when He returns bodily in final judgment. Some people will be alive at the time when Christ returns with the trumpet and a shout. This will be no secret Rapture. This will be a public event—the most public event in the history of man. The dead in Christ will rise. This cannot mean “spiritually dead,” for in Christ, no one is spiritually dead. It refers to physical death. Those covenant-keepers who are still alive in their physical bodies will be caught up with the resurrected dead into the clouds.

C. Corruption and Incorruption

Paul teaches in I Corinthians 15 that those covenant-keepers who have not experienced what John would have called the first death, and who are therefore still burdened by sin and its curse, will join those covenant-keepers who return with Christ. For this to take place, they must be delivered from original sin and its curse, death. This will take place prior to their ascent into the sky. “In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed” (v. 52). This has to take place before the ascent because corruption cannot inherit incorruption. “For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality” (v. 53). This is Paul’s theme of inheritance in this chapter. Eschatology has to do with point five of the biblical covenant model: inheritance.³ Paul is speaking here of the nature of the covenant-keeper’s inheritance on judgment day. He will inherit incorruption. Whether he will subsequently receive rewards of gold, silver, and precious stones depends on God’s retroactive judgment of his work, but he will inherit incorruption, which begins with the transformation of his death-cursed physical body and his sin-ravaged soul.

And so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit. Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is spiritual. The first man is of the earth, earthy: the second man is the Lord from heaven. As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy: and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly. And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly. Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption. Behold, I shew you a mystery; We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? (vv. 45–55).

3. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

The theological issue here is the separate physical condition of what the English-language version of the Apostles' Creed calls the quick and the dead. Covenant-keepers are spiritually alive in history. Jesus said, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life" (John 5:24). But there is a difference between the celestial body, which covenant-keepers inherit at the time of their physical death, and the earthly body, which they must occupy in history. This difference cannot be bridged by sinful men, not even at the last trump. They must receive their celestial bodies before they can be joined with covenant-keepers who have already received their celestial bodies. The dead in Christ will rise first (I Thes. 4:16). All flesh is not the same flesh, and the two cannot mingle together.

But God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body. All flesh is not the same flesh: but there is one kind of flesh of men, another flesh of beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds. There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial: but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another. There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars: for one star differeth from another star in glory. So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption: It is sown in dishonour; it is raised in glory: it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power: It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body. And so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit. Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is spiritual. The first man is of the earth, earthy: the second man is the Lord from heaven. As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy: and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly. And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly. Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption (vv. 38–50).

There can be and has been mingling in history between men and sin-free angels, but angels are not members of the church. They are not part of the bride of Christ (body of Christ), which the church is. There was also mingling between incorruption and corruption in the earthly ministry of Jesus Christ, but He was born of a woman by the Holy Spirit. He was God as well as a perfect man. God can mingle with sinful men.

A biblical example of mingling in history between sinful humans and a deceased saint is Samuel's appearance to Saul and the witch of Endor. Calling him up from the grave was a major sin on the part of Saul, and he lost his kingdom and his life the next day because of it. Samuel told him: "Moreover the LORD will also deliver Israel with thee into the hand of the Philistines: and to morrow shalt thou and thy sons be with me: the LORD also shall deliver the host of Israel into the hand of the Philistines" (I Sam. 28:19). The judgment on Saul was an extension of his sin. Saul and his sons would soon mingle with the dead. His family's kingly inheritance in Israel would end.

D. Church Militant and Church Triumphant

The difference between the church in history and the church in heaven has long been acknowledged in the two terms applied to the church's two branches. The church in history is called the church militant. The church in heaven is called the church triumphant.

The distinguishing feature between them is not spiritual warfare with Satan. It is not that the church in heaven has in some way been taken out of the spiritual battle against Satan. We know this because of what John records in Revelation 6:

And when he had opened the fifth seal, I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held: And they cried with a loud voice, saying, How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth? And white robes were given unto every one of them; and it was said unto them, that they should rest yet for a little season, until their fellowservants also and their brethren, that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled (Rev. 6:9–11).

The saints in heaven remain in the fight against Satan, interceding with God on behalf of the church militant. In this context, “triumphant” refers to the heavenly church’s perfect victory over sin and corruption. Original sin no longer afflicts its members.

In contrast, the church in history is still afflicted with sin. It is still in the great ethical war against the kingdom of Satan. In heaven, the church has been transformed. Sin is no longer a problem. Incorruption has inherited incorruption in heaven. There is more to inherit, of course, for the bodily resurrection of all mankind still lies ahead. The final judgment lies ahead. “But the heavens and the earth, which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men” (II Peter 3:7). The post-resurrection transformation of the world after the final judgment has not yet taken place (Rev. 21; 22). But, in heaven, there is a preliminary inheritance of incorruption, beginning with the church’s complete victory over sin, which is the inheritance that counts most in the warfare between good and evil. Jesus made this clear in the Lord’s Prayer: “Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven” (Matt. 6:10). The ability to do the will of God perfectly is the greatest inheritance of all.

Because those who occupy corrupt bodies cannot do the will of God perfectly, as those in heaven do it, which is why they are required to pray this prayer, the two realms of the church are separated by a great gulf. So also are heaven and hell, and for the same reason. The sinner in hell remains a sinner. There is no good remaining in him. Jesus revealed in his parable of Lazarus the beggar and the rich man that the spiritual gulf that exists after the first death is permanent.

And it came to pass, that the beggar died, and was carried by the angels into Abraham’s bosom: the rich man also died, and was buried; And in hell he lift up his eyes, being in torments, and seeth Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom. And he cried and said, Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue; for I am tormented in this flame. But Abraham said, Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things: but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented. And beside all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed: so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us, that would come from thence (Luke 16:22–26).

The decisive issue here is original sin. Sin's presence and its curse afflict the soul: in history (all mankind) and in eternity (covenant-breakers). God does transform each covenant-keeper's sin-cursed soul, either at the first death, or, in the unique case of those still alive at the time of Christ's second coming at the final judgment, without any transition through the first death. Those covenant-keepers who will be graced by God by being alive at the time of Christ's Second Coming will be like Elijah: carried up into the sky without having to go into the ground or the sea in burial.

So, the terms "corruption" and "incorruption" refer to original sin and its effects. The word "corruption" refers both to men in history and covenant-breakers in eternity. In neither case can corruption inherit incorruption. Sin's great gulf separates covenant-keepers from their incorrupt inheritance until after the first death. Everything good which they possess in history is an earnest, or down payment, on their future inheritance.

Now he which stablisheth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God; Who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts (II Cor. 1:21–22).

For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened: not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life. Now he that hath wrought us for the selfsame thing is God, who also hath given unto us the earnest of the Spirit. Therefore we are always confident, knowing that, whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord: (For we walk by faith, not by sight:) We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord (II Cor. 5:4–8).

Will all of the members of God's church ever celebrate together in a joint victory over sin? Put another way, will there be any time in history when all covenant-keepers will be able to mingle together in a joint operation? The answer is no. A great gulf separates them sin-cursed covenant-keepers from sin-free covenant-keepers. So, if there is ever to be sin-free fellowship by all members of the church, then original sin's presence and its curse must be removed entirely.

E. Final Judgments in Matthew 25

Matthew 25 contains two parables and a prophecy. The parables are specific. They describe the kingdom of heaven. This means that they describe a single corporate entity which is still in existence. They tell of judgment: a final reckoning or accounting. The third section of the passage, the prophecy of the sheep and the goats, does not mention the kingdom. The expositor's task is to keep these categories straight. There is one common theme: final judgment.

1. The Parable of the 10 Virgins

The first parable presents the story of the bridegroom who comes in judgment.

Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom. And five of them were wise, and five were foolish. They that were foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them: But the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps. While the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept. And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him. Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps. And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil; for our lamps are gone out. But the wise answered, saying, Not so; lest there be not enough for us and you: but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves. And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage: and the door was shut. Afterward came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open to us. But he answered and said, Verily I say unto you, I know you not. Watch therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh (Matt. 25:1–13).

Christ used a variation of the phrase, "I know you not," in the same eschatological context—final judgment—in another passage. "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven. Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity" (Matt. 7:21–23).

Both of these passages can be applied to God's judgment on Old Covenant Israel, which was final. The question is: Must this be their exclusive application? The kingdom of heaven in Matthew refers to the kingdom of God in history. The Old Covenant order still was part of God's kingdom in Christ's day. There will be final judgment, Jesus taught. The final judgment on Old Covenant Israel, which was still in the future when Christ spoke these words, took place at the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. The final judgment on the church will be the final judgment at the end of time. Wise virgins keep oil in their lamps. Unwise virgins do not. The latter will be caught short, Christ taught. This warning applied to Old Covenant Israel. Because the kingdom is still operating in history, it will also apply to self-deceived church members at the end of time. At the final judgment, there will be self-deceived people who have run out of oil.

The parable of the 10 virgins pictures a kingdom in which half the participants are on duty, and the other half are not. This applies to the church and Old Covenant Israel. Jesus was warning His listeners, who included representatives of both branches of the kingdom during the era of transition, that they should remain faithful, alert, and on the job. At the fall of Jerusalem, judgment came on members of the half associated with Old Covenant Israel. The other half survived, because they had paid attention to Christ's words in Matthew 24 (Luke 21). Their survival meant that they possessed exclusive title to the kingdom of God, just as Christ had warned the Jews: "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43).

The term "kingdom" applied in Jesus' day to both the New Covenant church and Old Covenant Israel. It no longer does. It now applies only to the church. This means that the parable of the 10 virgins now applies exclusively to the church. It indicates that within the church on the final day of judgment that will end Satan's kingdom, there will be unprepared church members who will be caught short. There will be covenant-breakers within the church at the final judgment. Original sin will still be a problem. This parable describes the kingdom of heaven, which still operates in history. Thus, we should conclude that its warning still applies to history. There will be an unexpected day of corporate reckoning. Keep oil in your lamp.

2. A Long Journey and a Final Accounting

The next parable in Matthew 25 presents the story of a rich man who leaves a great deal of gold behind for his workers to invest. This indicates a long period of stewardship. The Greek text does not mention the kingdom. The translators inserted the phrase on the assumption—reasonable—that this parable also describes the kingdom. Again, Jesus was telling His disciples to be diligent workers. This warning applies to every Christian throughout history. That it also applied to the Jews in Jesus' day is equally true. Their long time of testing was about to end. They were about to be forced to give an account of their stewardship. The kingdom was about to be taken from them and transferred to the church.

In the parallel version in Luke, this information is added. "But his citizens hated him, and sent a message after him, saying, We will not have this man to reign over us" (Luke 19:14). The king brings final judgment against them: "But those mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither, and slay them before me" (Luke 19:27). In Luke's version, the poor steward is not said to be cast into outer darkness, as the servant in Matthew is (Matt. 25:30). What little he had was taken from him and given to the most profitable servant (Luke 19:24). Jews literally died in A.D. 70. In the future final judgment, covenant-breakers will die the second death. "And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death. And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire" (Rev. 20:14–15).

In both versions of this parable, the profitable servants receive rewards based on their prior performance. "His lord said unto him, Well done, thou good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord" (Matt. 25:21). "And he said unto him, Well, thou good servant: because thou hast been faithful in a very little, have thou authority over 10 cities (Luke 19:17). This testifies to an extension of life on earth. Their venue does not change. What they have achieved in history will lead to greater authority and therefore greater responsibility in a post-judgment world. This testifies to a post-resurrection world that will have continuity with this one, but without the presence of evil-doers: a major discontinuity. With respect to the final judgment on Old Covenant Israel, the church inherited everything associated with the kingdom. In the post-resurrection world, the church will inherit the earth, which will then become co-extensive with God's kingdom.

What was final for Old Covenant Israel in A.D. 70 was at the same time the beginning of the church's exclusive monopoly of title for the kingdom of God/heaven. The inheritance of Old Covenant Israel in A.D. 70 was passed exclusively to the church. This kingdom still operates in history. The progressive extension of the kingdom by the church is described in the parable of the rich man: his departure, his long journey, and his return. The next accounting will be final. It will end the long period of history that the Bible defines as the kingdom of God/heaven.

With respect to the church, the time was short before the judgment came on Old Covenant Israel. Yet this parable speaks of a ruler who goes on a long journey. This indicates that Jesus looked ahead and saw two judgments: on Old Covenant Israel, as the culmination of its long period of poor stewardship, and the final judgment, as the culmination of the church's long period of stewardship.

3. Sheep and Goats Assembled, Yet Separated

Next comes something very different from the two kingdom parables. The final section of Matthew 25 deals with the final judgment at the end of time: the sheep and the goats. This passage is not limited to the kingdom of God. What it describes is a general judgment.

When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory: And before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats: And he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left. Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world (vv. 31–34).

Then shall he say also unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels (v. 41).

The goats here are corporately separated from the sheep. Why? Paul tells us why in I Corinthians 15, which also declares an absolute separation: celestial bodies vs. terrestrial bodies, spiritual bodies vs. natural bodies, incorrupt bodies vs. corrupt bodies. They will never mingle. This prohibition on mingling applies to the sheep. When God finally judges sin and its effects, he will bring together all of the members of His church, but none of them will be in a terrestrial body. This is why all covenant-keepers who are alive at Christ's second coming will have their bodies changed before they meet the returning saints from heaven. With respect to the goats, there is separation from the sheep because sin and its effects are still with the goats. They will not receive purified bodies and souls at the resurrection, for Christ's perfect humanity was not imputed to them by God in history. Their moral corruption extends into eternity. Therefore, they cannot mingle with the sheep. The wall of separation will be maintained throughout eternity, just as it is maintained between heaven and hell today.

To argue that sin-cursed covenant-keepers and sin-free covenant-keepers can operate jointly, either in heaven or in history, is to deny what Paul and Christ clearly taught regarding this mandatory separation. This is a major argument against any version of popular premillennialism which teaches that heavenly saints will return to rule in history alongside sin-burdened saints. (The professionally trained theologians of the dispensational movement, such as J. Dwight Pentecost,⁴ have fully understood this and have taught against any "mixed multitude" of saints during the millennium.) But there is a related heresy, as we shall see. To argue in favor of the permanent separation, but then to conclude that the church must be separated throughout eternity into two parts—celestial and terrestrial—because the church militant will always coexist with the church triumphant, is to deny the final judgment's bringing together of both branches of the church through the discontinuous transformation of the pre-first death members of Christ's bride: from corruption into incorruption. This eschatology—really, an anti-eschatology (no last things)—denies the literal historical fulfillment of Paul's prophecy regarding the future resurrection of the sin-free physical bodies of the saints, who have died the first death in Christ, to be joined with their sin-free souls returning to earth from heaven. It also denies the future transformation from corruption to incorruption of the bodies and souls of living and breathing covenant-keepers at the time of Christ's coming at the final judgment.

There were two final judgments in Christ's teachings: the one that ended the Old Covenant order in A.D. 70, and the other that will end

4. "Thus the millennial age will be concerned only with men who have been saved but are living in their natural bodies." J. Dwight Pentecost, "The Relation between Living and Resurrected Saints in The Millennium," Bibliotheca Sacra, Vol. 117 (Oct. 1960), p. 341.

Satan's kingdom in history. The two parables in Matthew 25 were therefore warnings to the Jews, but also still serve as warnings to Christians. The still unfulfilled prophecy of the sheep and the goats refers to covenant-keepers in general and covenant-breakers in general. Old Covenant Israel has nothing to do with it.

F. Heretical Preterism

Preterism is an interpretation of biblical prophecies that argues that many, but not all, of the New Testament's prophecies of judgment were fulfilled in A.D. 70 with the Roman army's destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, and the defeat of Israel's rebellion. This interpretation has been around for centuries. It is generally associated with postmillennialism, but there is nothing in preterism that cannot be accepted by amillennialists. It is because J. Marcellus Kik's short books, Revelation 20 and Matthew 24, revived interest in preterism a generation ago that postmillennialism is closely associated with this view. Kik was a postmillennialist, and so was R. J. Rushdoony, who encouraged the Presbyterian and Reformed Publishing Company to publish Kik's two short books in one paperback, An Eschatology of Victory (1971). It is quite possible for an amillennialist to hold classic preterism, just as C. Vanderwaal does.⁵

Classic preterism argues that the key to understanding the prophecies of Matthew 24 is verse 34: "Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled." Everything prior to this verse was fulfilled by the fall of Jerusalem. In contrast, the separation of the sheep and the goats in Matthew 25 has always been seen by the church as referring to the final judgment. Heretical preterism contends that Matthew 25 is governed by the prophetic time frame of Matthew 24:34. Indeed, all New Testament prophecy is said to be governed by this verse. As heretical preterist J. Stuart Russell asked rhetorically in 1878, "What can be more comprehensive and conclusive than our Lord's words, 'Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled?'"⁶ The point is, this passage is not comprehensive. It applies to the events described in Matthew 24, but we may not legitimately assume that it covers

5. C. Vanderwaal, Hal Lindsey and Biblical Prophecy (Neerland, Alberta: Inheritance Publications, [1978] 1991).

6. J. Stuart Russell, The Parousia: A Critical Inquiry into the New Testament Doctrine of Our Lord's Second Coming, new edition (Grand Rapids: Baker Book House, [no date] 1983), p. 545.

every eschatological passage in the New Testament, which is what heretical preterists assume and then attempt to prove. In this attempt, they wind up in one of two camps: dualism or perfectionism-Pelagianism, as we shall see.

A dualist believes in the eternality of evil. There will be no final judgment in history. There will never be a time in history when men are free from sin. History, cursed by sin, is eternal. It operates side-by-side heaven. The New Heavens and New Earth will always be sin-cursed. Satan's successful entrapment of Adam will have its effects throughout eternity. God will never overcome sin in history.

Heretical preterism is an interpretation of biblical prophecies that argues that all of the New Testament's prophecies of judgment were fulfilled in A.D. 70. To argue that all of the prophecies concerning God's final judgment were fulfilled in A.D. 70 is to take a public stand against Paul's teaching regarding the final inheritance of incorruption only by incorruption. It is also to reject the historic creeds of the church. The heretical preterists deny the creeds of the church on this point, which is why they are heretical ecclesiastically. They deny Paul with regard to the final overcoming of sin in history—the full inheritance of incorruption by incorruption—which is why they are heretical theologically. They proclaim “full preterism,” which denies the full inheritance of incorruption in the future. Corruption must remain the permanent incomplete inheritance of the church militant.

Because heretical preterists believe that God's final judgment is behind us historically—A.D. 70—most of them (probably all of them) also believe that sin is eternal. Sin is with the church today in this, the supposedly post-final-judgment world. They insist that there is no future eschatological event that will transform this world. “What we see now is what we Christians will get in history forever.” There is therefore no hope of deliverance from sin in history, and no hope of deliverance from history for the church militant. Because preterism is not necessarily postmillennial, this position can be interpreted as teaching that the church militant will suffer ever-more grievously at the hands of covenant-breakers in history, which will never end. Surely, it means at least this: there must forever be a separation between the church militant and the church triumphant. The Lord's Prayer will never be answered: “Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven” (Matt. 6:10b). Heaven's perfection is forever denied to history, which is infinite in duration. The church militant must forever struggle with sin and its effects. Satan's work of treachery in the garden will never be finally and completely overcome.

There are two ways to affirm this heretical position in the name of Christianity. First, deny that Satan is ever fully judged and cut off from history. Second—and this is the heretical preterist's position—affirm that Satan was finally judged in A.D. 70, but sin lives on in mankind in history, which is eternal. That is, sin has been forever cut off from any connection with Satan and his fallen angels, and is forever part of history. Thus, the following is no longer the case:

Put on the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil. For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places (Eph. 6:11–12).

Supposedly, Christians since A.D. 70 have been at war, not with principalities and powers, but only with their own independent sinfulness. Satan and the principalities have been out of the picture. This theological position was affirmed in a private letter to me by a predestinarian who adopted heretical preterism a decade ago. The author, Walt Hibbert, later put an expanded version on the Web. On page 12 of his 16-page paper dated August, 2001, he wrote the following: "Since Satan, therefore, was cast into the lake of fire at A.D. 70, giving the Lord complete victory over him, he is not a force to be reckoned with, either by the Church Militant or the Church Triumphant, since that time." He even quotes Walt Kelley, the cartoonist who put these words in Pogo Possum's mouth: "We have found the enemy, and it is us!" Walt Kelley was funny. Walt Hibbert is not.

Sin is eternal in this man's view. There will never be a final overcoming of sin in history or eternity, for history is coterminous with eternity. Responding to me (in this instance, accurately), he wrote: "He [North] demands a visible manifestation of sin being completely removed from the earth. He obviously is looking for an extreme literal fulfillment of this covenantal concept of deliverance from sin. The Scripture teaches otherwise" (p. 12). This is the heresy of dualism, pure and simple. He is clearly no perfectionist. He is therefore a dualist. This heretical preterist insists that death will reign in history forever. In effect, he answers Paul's rhetorical question "O, death, where is thy sting?" with this: "Forever."

But what of the final judgment? A myth, he says. "The phrase 'final judgment' does not appear in Scripture." My response to this bit of sophistry is simple: neither does the word "Trinity."

This view of history and eternity stands in opposition to what every branch of the Trinitarian church has taught throughout recorded history. This man knows this and is proud—immensely proud—of it. He responds to my defense of the creeds as follows:

Our author definitely makes it clear where his supreme authority lies. It's not the Bible; it is the historic creeds that are really his final authority. . . . The cry of some pseudo-preterists seems to be best expressed in the words: "Abandon Sola Scriptura—back to Rome.

This man is a sophist, and not a very skilled one. The creeds that I have cited are fourth-century creeds. Any orthodox Christian who defends the Trinity goes to them. Is this "back to Rome"? No; it is back to ecclesiastical orthodoxy. There is no institutional orthodoxy without creeds. This man, in the name of Calvin and the Reformation, throws out Nicea because he knows that it brands him and his fellows as heretics. He also abandons the Belgic Confession and the Westminster Confession, in the name of Reformed Presbyterianism (which he claims to represent). This is subversion. Mark it well.

Until recently, the heretical nature of their position has been downplayed by the system's own public defenders. They have preferred, for tactical and perhaps personal psychological reasons, to avoid discussing the obvious implications of their position. If they enthusiastically and continually declared their view of history as sin-cursed forever, they would eventually be excommunicated. Their main spokesmen have preferred to avoid this. But now a few of them are growing bolder than the more cautious founders, as late-arrival heretics eventually do. They will force the hand of the leaders, just as my original essay forced their hand. That was my original intent: to force a few of them to defend their heresy forthrightly in public. Now one of them has, on-line. For this, I am grateful. May his colleagues have equal courage. David Green responded in July, 2001. I reproduce his answers, word for word, at the end of this essay. When you read them, you will know why I have called for the excommunication of anyone who persists in defending these views.

If these people do get excommunicated, they will have to fund their own churches with their own money. This is as it should be. They should not redefine the meaning of common words in Scripture in order to make their secret, "insiders-only" positions seem more acceptable to naive church members who have not examined the details of their system. They should all forcefully say in public that the historic creeds are wrong and therefore not binding on them as church members. They should have the courage to challenge the elders in their congregations to publicly abandon or rewrite both the Nicene Creed and the Apostles' Creed. It is time for heretical preterists to come clean in public and confidently declare their belief in the eternal separation of the church militant and the church triumphant, challenging all of their theological opponents to refute them, to excommunicate them if they dare. To do less than this is to substitute a strategy of subversion for open theological discussion. It is time for them publicly to answer Paul's rhetorical question, "O death, where is thy sting?" with the only answer that is consistent with their system: "In history and forever."

The implications of this position are numerous. First, God will never bring history to a close; thus, good and evil will battle for the minds and souls of men eternally. Second, because corruption cannot inherit incorruption, as most heretical preterists acknowledge when pressed, the continuity of corruption in history makes impossible any inheritance of perfection in some post-resurrection New Heaven and New Earth (Rev. 21; 22). The only New Heaven and New Earth that Christians will ever obtain in their physical bodies is an extension of what Christians experience now. Third, Paul's promise of the eschatological transformation of the creation at the final judgment (I Cor. 15:24–25, 42–50) is seen as applying not to the creation but to the individual's transformation at death. Corruption in history is eternal. Terrestrial bodies will occupy the earth for as long as celestial bodies praise God in heaven. Fourth, covenant-breakers possess equally valid eschatological claims to the earth as covenant-keepers do. The tares will occupy the field of history eternally, right alongside the wheat. Matthew 13 will never come to pass as the end of history: "As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire; so shall it be in the end of this world. The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity; And shall cast them into a furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth" (vv. 40–42).

Anyone who equates the fulfillment of this prophecy with A.D. 70 has broken with the historic faith of the church. Such a view stands out most clearly in its rejection of the post-resurrection fulfillment of verse 43: "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. Who hath ears to hear, let him hear.” Heretical preterists refuse to hear.

Sometimes heretics help us to hear more clearly. They pressure us to do our homework. One place to begin is a book edited by Keith Matheson, When Shall These Things Be?, which is published by P&R Books. But the following ought to be sufficient.

G. The Deviant Theology of J. Stuart Russell

When a pastor discovers that someone in his congregation believes what the member calls full preterism, it would be wise for the pastor to devote several sermons to refuting the heretical version of preterism, most notably the views of J. Stuart Russell. Russell’s book is a common, agreed-upon source for contemporary proponents of heretical preterism. If the member can be made to say to the elders, “But I don’t believe what Russell taught,” the elders will have left the member theologically defenseless. To refute Russell is to refute the theological foundation for modern heretical preterism, at least in Presbyterian and Reformed circles. It is not worth your time to interact with numerous epigone who have adopted Russell’s theology. They want you to interact with them. Interaction appears to give them credibility. I recommend that you forego the opportunity. As the old saying goes, “you don’t need to eat all of a rotten apple to know it’s rotten.” Once you refute Russell, you have refuted his followers.

Russell taught that the parable of the 10 virgins refers exclusively to the imminent fall of Jerusalem. He also taught that the separation of sheep and goats described in Matthew 25 refers exclusively to this event. “The parables of the ten virgins, the talents, and the sheep and the goats all belong to this same event, and are fulfilled in the judgment of Israel.”⁷ Also fulfilled in A.D. 70 was the bodily resurrection of the dead, he said. “The resurrection of the dead, the judgment of the world, and the casting out of Satan are represented as coincident with the Parousia, and near at hand.”⁸ Here is his general principle of prophetic interpretation:

We have in these passages another new phrase in connexion with the approaching consummation, which is peculiar to the Fourth Gospel. We never find in the Synoptics the expression ‘the last day,’ although we do find its equivalents, ‘that day,’ and ‘the day of judgment.' It cannot be doubted that these expressions are synonymous, and refer to the same period. But we have already seen that the judgment is contemporaneous with the 'end of the age' (sonteia ton aiwnoj), and we infer that 'the last day' is only another form of the expression 'the end of the age or Aeon.' The Parousia also is constantly represented as coincident in point of time with the 'end of the age,' so that all these great events, the Parousia, the resurrection of the dead, the judgment, and the last day, are contemporaneous. Since, then, the end of the age is not, as is generally imagined, the end of the world, or total destruction of the earth, but the close of the Jewish economy; and since our Lord Himself distinctly and frequently places that event within the limits of the existing generation, we conclude that the Parousia the resurrection, the judgment, and the last day, all belong to the period of the destruction of Jerusalem.⁹

7. Russell, Parousia, p. 140.

8. Ibid., pp. 139-40.

1. Heresy by Stealth

Russell's book is an example of heresy by stealth, assuming that he believed in the doctrine of original sin. By relegating to A.D. 70 all of the New Testament's passages that relate to the final judgment, Russell implicitly introduced a variant of dualism: the eternality of evil as a force in history. I can well understand why he refused to put his name on the first edition of his book in 1878.¹⁰ He wanted to "test the waters" before he identified himself in public. Why else would he insist that his book be published anonymously, the same way that Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels published The Manifesto of the Communist Party in 1848.

Given the fact of original sin, which is permanent in corrupt mankind, Russell's eschatology is dualistic, but he moves his disciples to this position by default. As a result of his theology, they initially decide what they do not believe about eschatology—the final, comprehensive, worldwide inheritance of incorruption by incorruption—but they rarely publicly announce what they, by default, must believe about the future: an eternal conflict between good and evil. Russell was as subtle as a serpent, for he held the formal theology of the serpent: the eternality of the historical kingdom of Satan.

9. Ibid., p. 126.

10. Ibid., p. 1.

2. Dualism

Russell's language at the end of his book indicates that he was a postmillennialist. He was not. He was a dualist. If he was not a dualist, then he was a perfectionist and a Pelagian. Some perfectionists teach that a sinner can overcome original sin through self-discipline under God. Others teach that perfection is attained at the time of regeneration—not merely Christ's perfect moral status imputed to him legally, but His perfect moral status worked out historically. Pelagianism teaches that, in theory, some people need not ever sin at all, from womb to tomb.

Russell began the final section of his book with a crucial admission: the Bible is silent regarding the future of history. For him, the Bible is silent about eschatology—the last things—because all New Testament prophecy was fulfilled in A.D. 70. He writes: "Here we might pause, for Scripture prophecy guides us no further."¹ He spoke of history as if it were open-ended eschatologically—the essence of dualism in a world where original sin exists. His next sentence is important in this regard: "But the close of the aeon is not the end of the world, and the fate of Israel teaches us nothing respecting the destiny of the human race."² He was wrong. Christ's corporate judgment of the Old Covenant order in A.D. 70 teaches Christians to expect a future corporate judgment of the whole world. After a long period, from Abraham's call until A.D. 70, Christ returned to require a final accounting from that nation which had long possessed the kingdom of God. At that time, He transferred His kingdom to the church (Matt. 21:43), which is now an international institution, a new nation. He will come again in judgment to require a final corporate accounting from His people and from all mankind, as John taught in Revelation 20:12–15.

Russell continued: "Whether we will or no, we cannot help speculating about the future. . . ." Here he identified all statements about the church's future as mere speculation. This was because his hermeneutic applies all biblical prophecy to A.D. 70. There is supposedly nothing left over to guide Christians or the church regarding the future. For the brief remainder of the book, he cited not one passage that deals explicitly with prophecy. How could he? He had already squandered exegetically on A.D. 70 the church's eschatological inheritance. So, he speculated. What he proposed bore a superficial resemblance to postmillennialism's view of the future. But a postmillennialism that is stripped of all Bible passages relating either to prophecy or to eschatology—last things—is merely a disguised importation into the church of either the late nineteenth century's pop-Darwinian ideal of moral progress or else perfectionism-Pelagianism.

1. Ibid., p. 549.

2. Ibid., p. 549.

Russell then invoked the Lord's Prayer: "Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven" (Matt. 6:10b). He commented: "For every God-taught prayer contains a prophecy, and conveys a promise."¹³ Indeed, it does. This corporate prayer ("our Father," not "my Father") asks for corporate perfection: life on earth will someday be as sin-free as life in heaven. It asks for a world in which the church militant will follow the will of God on earth with the same success as the church triumphant does now. This can be achieved in only one way: by completely removing sin from the world. The church militant must be transformed into the church triumphant. This will be done discontinuously, Paul taught: in the twinkling of an eye (I Cor. 15:52). Perfection for sinful man can never be the culmination of the compound growth of righteousness over sin in history. Man is burdened by original sin. The effects of original sin are in his very being. Moral corruption is a permanent condition in every man in history, Paul taught (Rom. 7). It can be overcome only by the discontinuous intervention of God: either at the individual's death or at the last trump. In history, no person can ever escape this limitation: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us" (I John 1:8). The perfectionist denies this, which is why he is a heretic.¹⁴

Russell denied that there will be a last trump. There will be no final corporate transformation of the church militant. The church militant is eternal, as far as the Bible tells us, if we apply every passage dealing with final judgment to A.D. 70. Russell imported an alien imitation of postmillennialism to match his alien concept of time without end. He wrote: "The true implication of New Testament prophecy, instead of leaving us in darkness, encourages hope. It relieves the gloom which hung over a world which was believed to be destined to perish. There is no reason to infer that because Jerusalem was destroyed the world must burn; or, because the apostate nation was condemned, the human race must be consigned to perdition. All sinister anticipation rests upon an erroneous interpretation of Scripture; and, the fallacies being cleared away, the prospect brightens with a glorious hope.”¹⁵ Some hope: the ethical progress of the church militant in history, with no prospect of a discontinuous deliverance from the curse of death, or deliverance from the burden of original sin, or the final victory of God over His covenantal enemies in history. Some hope: the eternity of original sin and its curses in history.

3. Ibid., p. 553.

4. B. B. Warfield, Studies in Perfectionism (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, [1931] 1958).

Unless. . . Unless Russell did not believe in original sin. He ended his book on this upbeat note: “This world belongs no more to the devil, but to God. Christ will redeem it, and will recover it, and draw all men unto him.”¹⁶ This may mean progressive sanctification without final sanctification, i.e., the permanence of residual sin forever: a heresy (dualism). If it does not mean this, then it must mean absolute perfection in history: a heresy (perfectionism). It would therefore mean that Christians can escape original sin in history: a heresy (Pelagianism).

Russell was not a postmillennialist, despite a superficial resemblance. He was either a happy-face dualist or else a perfectionist-Pelagian. Whichever he was, he was heretical, and not just a little heretical. He stood in defiance of the church’s creeds and confessions on the question of the final judgment, and in doing so, he adopted either an implicit dualism or else multiple explicit heresies that deny the permanence of original sin in history.

This is always the reality of heresy. You cannot limit heresy to just one. To adopt one forces you to adopt others. Russell’s official heresy was his denial of the final judgment. He chose not to name his accompanying heresy (dualism) or heresies (perfectionism-Pelagianism), but they are inevitable implications of his system nonetheless.

Russell’s modern disciples can successfully refute my accusation that he was a dualist only by arguing that he was a perfectionist and a Pelagian. This will do them little good if they are brought to trial in churches that adhere to the teachings of John Calvin. (Lutheranism’s official amillennialism is sufficient to condemn them in Lutheran churches.) If they are found to be promoting heretical preterism in a Presbyterian church, they will find no theological support for any

5. Russell, Parousia, pp. 551-52.

6. Ibid., p. 553.

denial of their dualism by an affirmation of perfectionism-Pelagianism. On the other hand, if they are not perfectionists or Pelagians, then they are dualists. Take your pick.

I pick dualism for them. This is because I see Russell's theology as offering an indefinite extension of time to Satan and/or Satan's legacy to man: original sin. Russell says that the world belongs to God. So what? God has always owned the world. Original sin is nevertheless a force that can be overcome in men only by God's discontinuous translation of their bodies: terrestrial bodies into celestial. Only if Russell did not believe in original sin—and on this, he was silent—was he not a dualist.

If he was not a dualist, then the two key theological questions regarding his theology are these. First, on what theological basis can any Christian argue that original sin will be completely removed in history? Second, how much time has God allotted to history, i.e., the realm in which original sin operates, and the church militant struggles continually to overcome sin progressively? It is clear that Russell denied any future, final, and discontinuous corporate judgment of the world by God. He was therefore unquestionably heretical—a man who was wise initially to publish his book anonymously. It is clear that he also denied any future, final, and discontinuous corporate deliverance of the church militant from the bondage and curse of original sin. He was therefore unquestionably heretical.

His disciples now have the moral responsibility of deciding which of his possible heresies to accept by remaining his disciples: either dualism or a combined package of perfectionism-Pelagianism. There is no orthodox theological way out for any follower of Russell who affirms the doctrine of original sin. By adopting Russell's theory of world history without a final corporate judgment, but also without Russell's perfectionism and Pelagianism, he must affirm dualism: a world without end and also without deliverance from sin. This view grants to Satan what the creeds and confessions deny: influence in history forever.

I recommend demanding an immediate public recantation and personal repentance of Russell's theology. Barring this, I recommend the heretic's excommunication by his church's judicial body. But an excommunicant always retains his liberty of conscience. He has his choice among several possible Russellite heresies. Russell was a very creative theologian. He offered so many ways for his followers to drift into heresy! The elders should allow the accused member to identify the heresy for which he is then excommunicated.

Russell is typical of most one-shot theological heretics. He took his stand against the entire church, wrote one book, and let it go at that. But, in theology as in everything else, you cannot change just one thing. You cannot revise just one doctrine. Trinitarian theology after almost two millennia is a finely honed, carefully balanced enterprise. Orthodox theologians know that when anyone revises a single doctrine, even at the edges, a whole host of fall-out effects will result. An innovating theologian has an obligation to explore these unintended and unforeseen implications and deal with them before he releases his new discovery to the church.

Russell rejected the doctrine of final corporate judgment. He wrote a narrowly focused monograph that promoted the obviously heretical position of “no final corporate judgment and no end of history,” and then he abandoned his naive disciples to take the consequences for defending his thesis. His thesis immediately raised the issue of dualism vs. Pelagianism, but he provided no indication in his book that he recognized either implication. He did not try to deal with these issues exegetically or philosophically.

He initially published his book anonymously. This indicates that he recognized at least some of the personal risks in proposing such a creed-defying thesis. Most of his followers have not been equally alert to these risks. They have committed themselves emotionally and intellectually to a ticking time bomb. Russell’s book makes subversives out of his disciples. As awareness spreads among church officers regarding the dangerously heretical nature of his theology, only a few of his followers will avoid the accusation of being subversives by becoming frontal-assault kamikazes who are willing to go public in defense of his position. As laymen without any institutional base, such members can be dealt with easily enough. The subversives in the churches are the main threat. They are termites of orthodoxy.

I. The Structural Necessity of Subversion

Because heretical preterists oppose the historic creeds and confessions of the church, they have an institutional problem. Their spokesmen have only rarely been ordained as church officers. There is no good reason for a heretical preterist to seek ordination in any denomination that is governed by the historic creeds or by a Reformation-era confession. As soon as he announced from the pulpit or in print his views on the final judgment, he would be subject to formal de-frocking. Few men will spend the time and money necessary for ordination in a hierarchical, creed-bound church in order to be publicly de-frocked soon after he articulates his most precious distinguishing truths. What would be the point?

This makes the heretical preterist movement of necessity a permanent movement of laymen. These laymen recognize early that they will spend their lives in the wilderness, ecclesiastically speaking. They have come to grips with this emotionally; they remain in orthodox churches. They see themselves as ecclesiastical spoilers of other men's institutional legacies, not as long-term builders of their own. The means of their spoilation is clandestine evangelism among the faithful. They seek to recruit other laymen to a "new, improved" theology that breaks with almost two millennia of creedal tradition on the doctrine of the final judgment. Their theological position is not taught in any seminary. It is not found in any systematic theology. It is not the product of decades or centuries of formal debate and refinement. It is encapsulated in no formal confession of faith. This theology remains undeveloped. Nevertheless, its proponents continue to evangelize.

Heretical preterists want all of the benefits of church membership: Christian fellowship, the sacraments, and help in times of need. But they are unwilling to start their own congregations, ordain their own ministers, pay for their own buildings, start their own seminaries or, above all, come to any formal, judicially enforceable agreement with one another regarding the details of what it is that they believe about a universe without a final historical judgment.

They seek to create a fellowship of private confessional believers within a larger fellowship of public confessional believers. The larger fellowship is covenantal. It is based on a public creed or confession of faith that formally rejects the eschatological position of heretical preterism. Heretical preterists today cannot win by a frontal assault on these creeds and confessions. They do not have the votes. So, they seek to create their own insiders' group within a local congregation. They seek to create a divisive mentality of "them vs. us" in their targeted victims, where "them" represents the covenantal hierarchy of the church, and "us" refers to members of a clandestine sub-group who have formally placed themselves under the judicial authority of elders whose task it is to police the congregation by means of a doctrinal statement. Then they clandestinely deny the truth of the binding doctrinal statement. A few of their spokesmen are public; most of them are not. If these laymen do not call attention to themselves by making public pronouncements, they can continue to recruit.

They can operate in this way far more successfully in a denomination that does not require laymen formally to affirm their commitment to the denomination's confession of faith as a condition of gaining voting membership. This is one reason why heretical preterism is spreading inside Presbyterian churches. Presbyterianism's by-laws do not require either voting or communing members to affirm allegiance to the Westminster standards or any previous church creed. This fact makes far easier the recruiting activities of heretical preterists. They can quietly go about their evangelism, and, whenever discovered by church authorities, they can evade or at least postpone the threat of church sanctions. How? Because they have never affirmed the Westminster standards. The church's authorities must actively seek to force them to admit that they are in rebellion. This is not easy. It usually takes a formal hearing. It may take a trial. Only rarely will heretical preterists make an admission of guilt voluntarily. Why should they? Not for conscience's sake. They are not emotionally burdened by guilt for subverting confessional standards that they have never formally affirmed. By keeping quiet in public and recruiting in the shadows, they can undermine the orthodoxy of other laymen before church authorities recognize what is going on.

Presbyterian laymen can promote heresy without violating Presbyterian law until such time as they are ordered by a local church court to cease and desist. They have not previously been asked by the elders to affirm their commitment to the Westminster standards. As long as they do not seek ordination, which requires formal affirmation of the Westminster standards, they feel free to evangelize for their position on a guilt-free basis because, technically, they are not violating any formal rules. They adhere to the letter of Presbyterian law while defying its spirit.

J. "But I Don't Believe That!"

Heretical preterism is strictly a laymen's movement. Heretical preterists hold no church councils, hammer out no statements of faith, sign no affirmations, and submit themselves to no ecclesiastical authority that can enforce the provisions of their defining theology.

They refuse to subordinate themselves formally to anyone in their movement who could then hold them accountable for what they say or do. Instead, they officially subordinate themselves to historic churches, but they mentally cross their fingers regarding the clear statements of the historic creeds and confessions regarding the final judgment as being in the future. When it comes to these historic creeds, they mentally say to themselves, "But I don't believe that."

This phrase—"But I don't believe that!"—is a way of psychological preservation for them. It is their way of being in the historic church, but not being confessionally of it. This phrase is also a major component of their strategy of subversion. When confronted by church authorities regarding the obvious implications of their faith, they respond, "But I don't believe that." They can get away with this because their intellectual spokesmen usually refuse to put into print the obviously heretical implications of their faith: either dualism or perfectionism-Pelagianism. A critic cannot go to a public document that they have passed around privately that openly declares the dualism or perfectionist implications of their position. When they are confronted by church officials with these inescapable theological implications, they seek to evade responsibility for them by saying, "But I don't believe that." This gains them additional time to undermine the orthodox faith of laymen around them whom they continue clandestinely to seek to recruit.

They do not choose to make a public announcement of their faith in its dualist implications or its alternative perfectionist-Pelagian implications. Some of them may not even be aware of these implications. This is not an era in which laymen are encouraged or trained to think theologically. Those few who do have an interest in theology can be sidetracked by other laymen who hand them a thick, seemingly thought-out book like The Parousia. This is why the subversives gain converts.

Orthodox Christians, especially church officers, should recognize this heresy for what it is: either an affirmation of the eternal power of Satan through mankind's original sin or else a denial of the permanence of original sin in history. I think heretical preterism today is dualistic rather than perfectionist, because its adherents are believers in original sin. Given the doctrine of the permanence of original sin, heretical preterism represents one more attempt to import dualism into the church: the doctrine of an eternally unresolved struggle between good and evil.

Church officers who learn of any member's commitment to the doctrine of "full preterism" have an obligation to help this member clarify his or her thinking, and either become fully consistent with the full-preterist position or else fully abandon it. The member should be brought before the church's session or other disciplinary body and asked the following six questions in writing:

1. Is God's final judgment (Matt. 25:31–46; Rev. 20:12–15) behind us historically?
2. Is the physical resurrection of the dead (I Cor. 15; I Thes. 4:13–18; Rev. 20:12–13) behind us historically?
3. Will the church militant struggle against sin in history forever, paralleling the church triumphant's eternally sin-free existence in heaven?
4. Will sin and its curse, including physical death, continue throughout history, paralleling sin-free eternity in heaven?
5. Is original sin a temporary condition of mankind in history?
6. Are the Apostles' Creed, Nicene Creed, and Athanasian Creed incorrect when they identify Christ's final judgment of the living and the dead as being in the future?

If he answers yes to question four, he has adopted dualism. If he answers yes to question five, he has adopted either perfectionism or Pelagianism. If he answers yes to both four and five, he is confused.

It is quite possible that the member has not thought through the implications of his position. He may not be willing to affirm any of these conclusions. In fact, his refusal to affirm any of this is quite likely. The elders must be prepared for the standard answer of heretical preterists who are "caught in the act": "But I don't believe that!" In order to pressure the member to begin to think carefully about whatever it is that he really does believe, it is imperative that the disciplinary body obtain a signed statement from the member that he does not affirm any of these six views, and also that he holds the opposite views. The signed and dated statement should look something like this:

I believe the following:

God's final judgment is still in the future. The judgment that He brought on Israel and the Old Covenant in A.D. 70 was not the final judgment described in Matthew 25:31–46; I Corinthians 15:24–56, and Revelation 20:12–15.

God's final judgment will involve the simultaneous resurrection of all of the dead, at which time God will publicly identify covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers (Matt. 25:31–46). Members of each group will be consigned to their eternal places of abode: either the New Heaven and New Earth (Rev. 21; 22) or the lake of fire (Rev. 20:15).

Sin will no longer operate in history after this final judgment of Satan and all those joined by covenant to him.

This will be the fulfillment of the Lord's prayer, "Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven."

If the congregation is Presbyterian, the member must also be asked to sign an affirmation of chapter XXXIII of the Westminster Confession of Faith and Answer 90 of the Larger Catechism. This signed statement constitutes a formal rejection of the "full preterist" position. The member must be told in advance that this signed statement can be shown to others at the discretion of the session. If the member refuses to sign such a statement under these conditions, the elders should continue the disciplinary process.

There are only three lawful ways out of a local congregation: by death, by letter of transfer, and by excommunication. Presbyterian laymen who have been brought before the church's session because they are suspected of holding heretical preterism, and who persist in their commitment to heretical preterism by refusing to sign a statement that is consistent with the Westminster standards, must be removed from membership by excommunication.

K. Dealing Institutionally With Heretical Preterism

Those who hold heretical preterism are not inclined to keep their eschatological opinions to themselves—just the theological implications of their opinions. A pastor should assume that any church member who has been influenced by Russell's book or by Russell's contemporary disciples has discussed Russell's ideas with members of the congregation, though not its dualist or its perfectionist implications. As with Russell himself, who initially published his book anonymously, his disciples are sometimes clandestine in their promotion of these opinions. A pastor should automatically assume that a strategy of subversion is in operation whenever he discovers even one Russellite in his congregation. He must take steps to undermine it early.

Heretical preterism is a matter for church discipline, not academic debate in a joint forum. These two approaches for dealing with theological error must be distinguished. In 1880, the faculty of Princeton Seminary made a catastrophic error. They decided to enter into a joint publishing venture with liberal Union Seminary. This was the idea of Union's Charles A. Briggs, who was de-frocked for heresy in 1893, mainly because of his harsh rhetoric in an 1891 lecture.¹⁷ Briggs understood in 1880 that if he could lure the Princeton faculty into a jointly sponsored debate over the higher criticism of the Bible, he could move this issue from a matter of church discipline to a topic of formal academic debate—just one opinion among many. The jointly published journal, Presbyterian Review, opened the floodgates to higher criticism within the Presbyterian Church, 1881–83.¹⁸ These gates were never again closed.

No critic of Russell's version of preterism should participate in any joint venture with those who hold any variation of Russell's position unless he publicly identifies the position as heretical and a matter of church discipline. If a third party invites representatives of heretical preterism to present their case, orthodox Christians involved in the conference or forum should begin their presentations with a clear statement that heretical preterism is in fact heretical and should be a matter of church discipline. Academics tend to forget that public debates are representative forums. These forums grant equal status to all participants. A Russellite should never be acknowledged as possessing equal status by someone who affirms the historic creeds of the church. He should be treated as if he were a Jehovah's Witness. The Apostles' Creed is more clearly anti-Russellite than it is anti-Arian. Jehovah's Witnesses are Arians. Both forms of Russellism are equally heretical: J. Stuart's and Charles Taze's. They should be dealt with inside the church in the same way.

7. North, Crossed Fingers, chaps. 4, 5.

8. Ibid., ch. 3.

Conclusion

God's final judgment of the world is coming. It did not take place in A.D. 70, which was God's final judgment on Old Covenant Israel. The bodily resurrection of all mankind is in the future. The dumping of the contents of hell into the lake of fire also lies ahead. If a person is to be an orthodox Christian, he should take his stand publicly with Paul, John, and the historic creeds and confessions of the church. They all agree with respect to the final judgment: it lies ahead. For as long as original sin remains the condition of humanity, God's final judgment of the world remains in the future.

Heretical preterism offers no eschatology, if we define eschatology as "the doctrine of last things." For heretical preterism, there are no last things for the church militant. There is only eternity: the permanently sin-cursed world of the church militant and the incorrupt world of the church triumphant. In place of eschatology, heretical preterism offers either dualism or perfectionism-Pelagianism. In our day, it offers mainly dualism: the equal ultimacy of good and evil forever, world without end, amen. It offers a vision of a church that forever will receive a grim answer to its prayer, "Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven." That answer is simple: "Not a chance." It is Satan who gives this answer, not God.

J. Stuart Russell introduced his book with this statement: "The work is almost wholly exegetical; and there is no attempt to invent or establish a theory, but only, by honest and faithful interpretation of the New Testament Scriptures, to allow them to speak for themselves."¹⁹ I conclude with this warning: whenever anyone tells you that he is merely letting the facts speak for themselves, and that he has no hidden agenda or underlying theory, I strongly advise you to keep your hand upon your wallet and your back against the wall.

For orthodoxy to persist, heretics must be excommunicated. In the case of heretical preterism, it is highly unlikely that it will become a major ecclesiastical threat in my lifetime. There are too few of them, they are underfunded, they cannot get through ordination without hiding their beliefs, and they have yet to produce a single systematic theology that incorporates their dualism. The old rule is true: "You can't change just one thing." Their dualism threatens all aspects of orthodoxy and ethics, not just eschatology. Theology is a package deal. Their package is openly, forthrightly, defiantly, middle-finger-extended heretical.

9. Russell, Parousia, p. 1.

They are devoted to the cause of dualism. They want to take over our churches in order to rewrite the historic creeds to conform to dualism. That which they cannot subvert and capture, they will destroy. Whatever they cannot run in terms of their agenda, they will undermine. They have not been willing to pay the freight to build their own publishing houses, congregations, and ordination process. They seek the positive sanctions of church membership without the threat of negative sanctions. They want access to the sacraments despite their denial of the confession that gains them legal access to the sacraments. They want Christian fellowship on their terms, namely, their right to quietly teach an alien faith and subvert orthodoxy. They want the right to re-write the historic creeds and then toss you out. Fortunately, they are not competent enough to succeed, but they would give you the right boot of fellowship if you let them re-write the creeds. Take action now. Remove them.

They will do their best to persuade orthodox people to engage them as equals in open debate. This is a familiar tactic of heretics. They want to stay in the church and subvert it for as long as they can before sanctions are applied. You have already read enough to know that these laymen are obviously far too heretical for pastors to spend time arguing with them. Put them on trial. Let them conduct their debates in the shadows of the church on their own time, with their own money. If you have a lot of spare time to waste, you can argue with them to your heart's content after your church has excommunicated them, but not before. If they repent, you may decide to readmit them as communicant members after a year or two of close interrogation and careful monitoring of their activities. But you must take the initiative. Argue with them in private (never in public) only after they are outside the church, looking in. This is a war in defense of the orthodoxy of God's church, not a friendly debating society among equals. These people are no more "ignorant brethren" than Jehovah's Witnesses are. They are self-conscious in their defiance. They will undermine your ministry if you hesitate.

Here is a good statement of their position. You do not need more evidence to conduct a successful trial than the following.

Postscript: David A. Green's Reply

This is Mr. Green's Appendix I of his essay, "Gary North:

Postmillennial or Neo-Manichean?” It was still on-line as of March 19, 2004. (<http://tinyurl.com/2fy3p>) He had removed it by mid-2005, substituting an alleged refutation of this appendix, but in fact an earlier, weaker version of it. (<http://tinyurl.com/9cth3>). Clever!

APPENDIX I

North says that preterist church members “should be brought before the church’s session or other disciplinary body and asked the following six questions in writing.” (Ibid., “But I Don’t Believe That!”) Submitted below are answers to North’s six questions:

1. Is God’s final judgment (Matt. 25:31–46; Rev. 20:12–15) behind us historically?

Yes.

God’s corporate judgment of all men is behind us historically, and God continues to judge all men of every generation, in history (Zech. 14:16-19) and at each man’s death (Heb. 9:27).

2. Is the physical resurrection of the dead (I Cor. 15; I Thess. 4:13–18; Rev. 20:12–13) behind us historically?

No. The spiritual Resurrection of the dead is behind us historically.

3. Will the church militant struggle against sin in history forever, paralleling the church triumphant’s eternally sin-free existence in heaven?

This question has ambiguities, making it impossible for a preterist to answer it with an unqualified yes or no.

Does the church’s “struggle against sin” imply the church’s non-triumph over sin on Earth? If so, then No, the church militant will not “struggle against sin in history forever.”

What does “paralleling” mean? Does it mean that the power of sin and Satan on Earth is equal to the power of God and His Righteousness in Heaven? If so, then No, the church militant’s struggle against sin in history will not forever “parallel” the church triumphant’s eternally sin-free existence in Heaven.

Let us put it this way:

The church militant will increasingly triumph over sin and sinners in history forever, paralleling the church triumphant's eternally sin-free existence in Heaven. God's will is being done "on Earth as it is in Heaven."

4. Will sin and its curse, including physical death, continue throughout history, paralleling sin-free eternity in heaven?

Sin will continue throughout history, but believers have been forgiven of their sins. Death is no longer a curse for believers who fall asleep. Death no longer has any sting for them. There is nothing for them to fear (Heb. 2:15). Because they trust in Jesus and keep His word, they will never die (Jn. 8:51; 11:26).

Again, what does "paralleling" mean? Does it mean that sin and its curse on Earth are equal to the Righteousness of God in Heaven? If so, then No, sin on Earth is absolutely not equal to (parallel to) the Righteousness of God in Heaven. There is no "parallel" between sin and God's Righteousness. God wins. Sin loses, even if sin continues to exist.

North understands this, since he is a postmillennialist. The mere existence of sin and suffering does not imply the non-triumph of righteousness. If it did, we would be forced to say that the Cross of Christ has as of yet won zero victories, beyond Christ Himself.

5. Is original sin a temporary condition of mankind in history?

No. Otherwise, how could Christ Jesus be a "Priest forever?" (Heb. 7:21–25)

6. Are the Nicene Creed and Apostles' Creed incorrect when they identify Christ's final judgment of the living and the dead as being in the future?

Absolutely.

APPENDIX B

LEGALISM VS. ALCOHOL

And thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for oxen, or for sheep, or for wine, or for strong drink, or for whatsoever thy soul desireth: and thou shalt eat there before the Lord thy God, and thou shalt rejoice, thou, and thine householdm(Deut. 14:26).

The key biblical passage that is rarely discussed in detail by anti-alcohol, total abstinence advocates is Deuteronomy 14:26, which refers to the festival of celebration, part of the mandatory tithe system. “And thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for oxen, or for sheep, or for wine, or for strong drink, or for whatsoever thy soul desireth: and thou shalt eat there before the LORD thy God, and thou shalt rejoice, thou, and thine household.”¹ Total abstainers will occasionally refer to the passage’s authorization of wine, and then say that the Hebrew word really means grape juice. But their exegetical problem is the Hebrew word shekar, here translated as “strong drink.” It is based on the Hebrew word shakar, which means “to be, or become, drunk, drunken.”² Shekar is accompanied by the Hebrew word for wine in all but one instance (Numbers 28:7) of the 22 times that it appears in the Old Testament.³ This is because wine also intoxicates, just as stronger alcoholic beverages do.

This places the strict prohibitionist in an intellectually embarrassing exegetical position. He is either forced to deny literally all of the Hebrew lexicons⁴ and also the contexts of the passages that include

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed.(Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 35.

2. According to the standard lexicon by Brown, Driver, and Briggs. See Gentry, God Gave Wine: What the Bible Says About Alcohol (Lincoln, California: Oakdown, 2001), p. 60. This is an update of his book, The Christian and Alcoholic Beverages: A Biblical Perspective (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, 1986).

3. Gentry, idem.

4. Ibid., p. 34.

shekar,⁵ or else he is forced to conclude that God in the Old Covenant authorized the consumption of alcohol as part of a mandated family festival of celebration. How can a Christian logically make a universal condemnation of something that was specifically authorized by God for His covenant people, as part of their mandatory national worship? If he argues that alcohol used to be morally acceptable to God, but is now prohibited by God, he must find explicit references in the New Testament to prove his case. Problem: there is no such universal New Testament prohibition.⁶

The Mosaic priests were not allowed to drink either wine or strong drink inside the tabernacle. “Do not drink wine nor strong drink, thou, nor thy sons with thee, when ye go into the tabernacle of the congregation, lest ye die: it shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations” (Lev. 10:9).⁷ The reason for this prohibition was that alcohol belonged exclusively to God inside the tabernacle or the temple. Alcohol was a special offering to God. It was poured out to Him, not just wine, but strong wine—clearly not grape juice! “And the drink offering thereof shall be the fourth part of an hin for the one lamb: in the holy place shalt thou cause the strong wine to be poured unto the LORD for a drink offering” (Num. 28:7). Why would God demand a sacrificial offering of something inherently corrupt, foul, or immoral? This makes no sense. This is why strict prohibitionism makes no sense.

Wine in the Old Testament was not grape juice. Grape juice does not have the following effect: “Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging; and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise” (Prov. 20:1). Obviously, grape juice does not have any inflaming effect. Both wine and strong drink were legitimate for most people most of the time. They were both part of God’s holy system of mandatory national festivals. Furthermore, “Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine unto those that be of heavy hearts” (Prov. 31:6). It is addiction to alcohol that is prohibited: “Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning, that they may follow strong drink; that continue until night, till wine inflame them!” (Isa. 5:11). Wine is dangerous for addicts. Grape juice is not. “But they also have erred through wine, and through strong drink are out of the way; the priest and the prophet have erred through strong drink, they are swallowed up of wine, they are out of the way through strong drink; they err in vision, they stumble in judgment" (Isa. 28:7). Wine inebriates. So does strong drink. "Stay yourselves, and wonder; cry ye out, and cry: they are drunken, but not with wine; they stagger, but not with strong drink. For the LORD hath poured out upon you the spirit of deep sleep, and hath closed your eyes: the prophets and your rulers, the seers hath he covered" (Isa. 29:9–10). It is clear why the proponents of total abstinence from alcohol never discuss wine in the context of strong drink: both are intoxicants, yet God authorized both for one of His mandatory festivals. Did God authorize something that is immoral? Of course not. So, total abstainers avoid discussing Deuteronomy 14:26.

5. Ibid., pp. 38–39.

6. Ibid., ch. 4.

7. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 8.

In the world before pasteurization, all commercially available wine was fermented, i.e., alcoholic. Only after a Methodist dentist, Dr. Thomas Welch, figured out in 1869 that he could kill wine by pasteurizing it, so that he and his Methodist peers would no longer have to drink wine at the Lord's Supper, did grape juice appear, or, as his commercial product was originally called, Dr. Welch's Non-Fermented Wine. This company eventually evolved into the Welch company, which specializes in fruit juices.

Weak Christians should not drink alcohol if they think it violates some moral prohibition, but the source of their error is theological vinegar. Weak Christians are being herded like sheep by pastors who do not understand or respect the doctrine of Christian liberty. The task of the mature Christian is to refrain from publicly assailing the weak Christian's sensibilities. He has another responsibility, however: to wean the weak Christian away from a theology that does not honor the principle of Christian liberty.⁸

It should not surprise us that the most scholarly published defense of wine as exclusively grape juice, and the Bible as teaching total abstinence from alcohol, was written by a Seventh Day Adventist. It should also not surprise us that his book has been praised by Protestant fundamentalists, who have yet to publish anything equally scholarly on the subject.⁹ We should not regard these fundamentalist authors as weak Christians. We should regard them as stubbornly,

8. Gentry, God Gave Wine. See also G. I. Williamson, Wine in the Bible and the Church (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Pilgrim, 1976).

9. Samuele Bacchiocchi, Wine in the Bible: A Biblical Study on the Use of Alcoholic Beverages (Chicago: Signal Press, 1989). For a list of laudatory praise from fundamentalists, including Dallas Theological Seminary's John Walvoord, see Bacchiocchi's Web site: <http://tinyurl.com/2mev9>

heretically, arrogantly wrong.¹⁰ When David Wilkerson writes that “Christians who drink alcoholic beverages of any kind are deceiving themselves,”¹¹ he is deceiving his fundamentalist readers. When Jack Van Impe writes that “Alcohol is never approved of by God in any amount for the obedient Christian,”¹² he is being disobedient to God. When he writes that “Everyone who drinks has an alcohol problem,”¹³ he reveals that he has an exegesis problem.

Conclusion

Strict prohibitionism is a manifestation of legalism. Legalism is a system of man-made rules that are not found in the Bible, which are then substituted for covenantal obedience to God’s Bible-revealed laws. Legalism also substitutes the traditions of men for the clear revelation of God in His Bible. The heart of Pharisaism was its legalism. Jesus did not tolerate it. Neither did Paul.

10. Is “heretical” too strong a word? Fundamentalists regard Dr. Bacchiocchi’s and the SDA’s position on soul-sleep rather than hell as heretical. They regard the SDA’s and his view of the Saturday sabbath as heretical. It is their task to show exegetically why they are not heretical when they stand with Seventh Day Adventism on the alcohol issue.

11. David Wilkerson, Sipping Saints (Old Tappan, New Jersey: Revell, 1978), p. 35; cited in Gentry, God Gave Wine, p. 4.

12. Jack Van Impe, Alcohol: The Beloved Enemy (Nashville, Tennessee: Nelson, 1980), p. 8; cited in Gentry, idem.

13. Van Impe, Alcohol, p. 149; cited in Gentry, ibid., p. 2.

HIERARCHY AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON FIRST TIMOTHY

Other Books by Gary North

An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)

Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)

An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)

Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)

None Dare Call It Witchcraft (1976)

Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)

Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)

Government by Emergency (1983)

Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)

75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)

Coined Freedom (1984)

Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)

Honest Money (1986)

Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)

Dominion and Common Grace (1987)

Inherit the Earth (1987)

Liberating Planet Earth (1987)

Healer of the Nations (1987)

The Pirate Economy (1987)

Is the World Running Down? (1988)

When Justice Is Aborted (1989)

Political Polytheism (1989)

Judeo-Christian Tradition (1990)

The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)

Victim's Rights (1990)

Millennialism and Social Theory (1990)

Westminster's Confession (1991)

Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar

The Coase Theorem (1992)

Salvation Through Inflation (1993)

Rapture Fever (1993)

Tithing and the Church (1994)

Baptized Patriarchalism (1995)

Crossed Fingers (1996)

The Covenantal Tithe (2011)

Mises on Money (2012)

HIERARCHY AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON

FIRST TIMOTHY

GARY NORTH

Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy

Copyright © Gary North, 2012

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

This book is dedicated to

Nick Kozel

Who understands Christian education as dominion

TABLE OF CONTENTS

| | |
|--|-----|
| Introduction | 1 |
| 1. Theonomy as Orthodoxy (I Tim. 1:5–11) | 29 |
| 2. Intercessory Prayer (I Tim. 2:1–2) | 49 |
| 3. Monogamy and Social Order (I Tim. 3:1–2) | 61 |
| 4. Economics and Ordination (I Tim. 3:2–48) | 82 |
| 5. The Alien Spirit of Prohibition (I Tim. 4:1–6) | 90 |
| 6. Common Grace (I Tim. 4:10) | 96 |
| 7. The Support of Widows (I Tim. 5:3–4) | 100 |
| 8. The Power of the Purse (I Tim. 5:17–18) | 109 |
| 9. Masters and Servants (I Tim. 6:1–2) | 127 |
| 10. Godly Contentment (I Tim. 6:5–11) | 152 |
| 11. The Uncertainty of Riches (I Tim. 6:17–19) | 182 |
| Conclusion | 211 |
| Appendix A—Divorce and Remarriage | 227 |
| Appendix B—Economic Value and Imputation | 273 |
| Appendix C—Adam Smith’s Theory of Economic Causation | 280 |
| Appendix D—Slavery as a Cause of the American Civil War | 310 |

INTRODUCTION

For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; Who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time (I Tim. 2:5–6).

Jesus Christ established the definitive operational model for covenant-keeping man to fulfill the terms of the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:26–28).¹ This model is dominion through hierarchy. Christ serves as a judicial intermediary between God and man, on behalf of both. He is simultaneously the high priest (Heb. 2:17), the head of the church (Col. 1:18), the King of kings (Rev. 17:14), and the bridegroom (Luke 5:34–35).

A. Trinitarian Theology of Hierarchy

Jesus Christ is both God and man. As God, He is the Second Person of the Trinity, the son of God (Mark 14:61–62). As man, He was born perfect, and He did not sin. “For he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him” (II Cor. 5:21).

In His capacity as God, the Second Person of the Trinity, the ruler over creation (Col. 1:10–17), Jesus Christ has provided mankind and the world with unmerited grace, i.e., gifts in history that are unmerited by the covenantally disinherited sons of Adam. On this basis, redemption comes to former covenant-breakers. “And, having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things unto himself; by him, I say, whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven. And you, that were sometime alienated and enemies in your mind by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled In the body of his flesh through death, to present you holy and unblameable and unreprouvable in his sight” (Col. 1:20–22).

In His capacity as a perfect man who was completely subordinate to God (Luke 22:42), He offered God a suitable sacrifice to propitiate God's wrath and thereby make grace judicially possible (Heb. 10). By voluntarily humbling Himself before God and man at Calvary, Christ enabled God the Father to exalt Him above heaven and earth in His capacity as perfect man. "And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth" (Matt. 28:18). As God, He had possessed this power before the incarnation. As man, He gained it through complete subordination to God and man in history. His absolute subordination in history produced His absolute dominion over history. This is the covenant-keeper's ethical model, Paul taught.

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus: Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God: But made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name: That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; And that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father. Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling (Phil. 2:5–12).²

There is rulership: Christ as God. There is subordination: Christ as God-man (the incarnation). There was subordination in history: doing God the Father's business, which included the cross. This led to even greater rulership for the supreme representative of perfect humanity: Christ's bodily resurrection and His bodily ascension to the right hand of God.

Hereafter shall the Son of man sit on the right hand of the power of God (Luke 22:69).

Him hath God exalted with his right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance to Israel, and forgiveness of sins (Acts 5:31).

Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us (Rom. 8:34).

2. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 20.

Christ's judicially representative, hierarchical work in history on behalf of covenant-keeping mankind (special grace's regeneration) and also on behalf of the fallen world (common grace's preservation)³ provides the working model for covenant-keepers in exercising dominion. Christ's sending of the Holy Spirit has enabled covenant-keepers to understand this model.

But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you (John 14:26).

But when the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me: And ye also shall bear witness, because ye have been with me from the beginning (John 15:26–27).

Nevertheless I tell you the truth; It is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you. And when he is come, he will reprove the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment: Of sin, because they believe not on me; Of righteousness, because I go to my Father, and ye see me no more; Of judgment, because the prince of this world is judged. I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now. Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth: for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak: and he will shew you things to come. He shall glorify me: for he shall receive of mine, and shall shew it unto you (John 16:7–14).

The Spirit's empowerment of covenant-keepers has enabled them to implement this model.

Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do; because I go unto my Father. And whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son. If ye shall ask any thing in my name, I will do it. If ye love me, keep my commandments. And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever; Even the Spirit of truth; whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him: but ye know him; for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you (John 14:12–17).

3. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

The Holy Spirit is subordinate to God the Father. He intervenes on behalf of God the Son, i.e., in His name. It is through the Holy Spirit that covenant-keepers extend God's kingdom in history. They are under the Holy Spirit, who in turn is under God the Father on behalf of Christ. There is a cosmic hierarchy: from the throne of God through the Holy Spirit through the institutional church through the saints over the creation. To rule lawfully over the creation, covenant-keepers must subordinate themselves to this hierarchy.

I cannot imagine that anything that I have written so far in this Introduction is theologically controversial among Bible-believing Christians.⁴ There should be nothing unfamiliar with these basic theological concepts. If there is, then the reader's theological education is limited.

All of this has to do with hierarchy, which is point two of the biblical covenant.⁵ (Now things begin to get controversial.)

Paul's first epistle to Timothy develops this theme of hierarchy in several areas of theology and social theory. The epistle's focus is ecclesiastical hierarchy.

B. Biblical Law and Dominion

The epistle begins with a warning against false teachers in the church at Ephesus and a command that Timothy instruct them in the tenets of the orthodox faith. He tells Timothy to shift the Ephesian church's public discussion from genealogy to law. He places God's law—Mosaic civil statutes—at the foundation of this mandatory curriculum in orthodoxy. He places God's Biblical law at the heart of the gospel.⁶

But we know that the law is good, if a man use it lawfully; Knowing this, that the law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners, for unholy and profane, for murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, for manslayers, For whoremongers, for them that defile themselves with mankind, for menstealers, for liars, for perjured persons, and if there be any other thing that is contrary to sound doctrine; According to the glorious gospel of the blessed God, which was committed to my trust (I Tim. 1:8–11).

4. This excludes members of the Calvinistic, Dutch-related Protestant Reformed Church, who reject Calvin's concept of common grace.

5. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

6. Chapter 1.

Here we find an affirmation of certain Mosaic civil laws as guidelines for assessing the presence of God's grace in a man's life. Covenant-keepers are supposed to define their subordination to God through grace as inherently judicial: the avoidance of these prohibited practices. Covenant-keepers are under grace, not law, and the mark of their not being under law is their lawful avoidance of the Mosaic law's sanctions, laws that are enforced by God when not enforced by the state.

Paul is adamant about this law-grace relationship. Covenant-keepers can legitimately be said to be above these Mosaic civil laws, but only because they are not tempted to violate them. Subordination to God's special grace means being above the temptations relating to law-breaking, through the morally transforming effects of regeneration. Christians do not come under the law's eternal curse, for Christ has borne the comprehensive penalty of their sins (Rom. 5). But this is a different theological issue altogether from the question of the New Testament authority of God's biblical law and the threat of the law's sanctions in New Testament history. To violate any of these laws in the New Testament era is to place oneself under God's lawful negative sanctions.

It is never a man's choice in history between being under law vs. not being under any law at all. The covenantal judicial question in history is always this: "Whose law and whose sanctions? God's or some rival deity's?" Paul makes clear his answer: biblical law. The Christian who denies this has a great deal of exegetical work to do (1:8–11). Most Christians do deny the continuing authority of God's biblical law and its mandated sanctions, but very few of them have done any detailed exegetical work to defend this viewpoint. They do not even perceive that such exegetical work is necessary. The implicit and, all too often, explicit hostility to God's biblical law in the modern church indicates that the modern church is as offended by this passage as the Judiazers at Ephesus must have been. The modern church refuses to listen to Paul's explicit teaching regarding the law of God's intimate connection to the gospel. It is as if Paul had never written this passage. But he did write it, and God expects His people to believe it and then obey it.

C. Other Applications of the Principle of Hierarchy

Paul then moves to the church's role in performing intercessory prayer for the world. He tells Christians to pray for men in general and for civil rulers specifically. If Christians do this, he says, the church will enjoy greater peace. One price of peace for Christians is their intercessory prayer. Peace is meant to be a tool of dominion for Christians, so that they can work legally to spread the gospel and thereby bring the world progressively under Christ's dominion in history.⁷

Then comes Paul's discussion of monogamy as a requirement for holding church office. How a man rules over his family indicates how he will rule over the church. Do not subordinate yourself, Paul warns, to a man who does not rule his family well. How well his family's subordinates have fared under his rule indicates how you will fare.⁸

Also a consideration for high church office is the candidate's generosity. If he is not generous, beware. He may be a disciple of mammon, the great god More.⁹ Much in this epistle is directed against subordination to this immanent god.

Other economic applications—all related to the issue of hierarchy and dominion—are these: the support of widows,¹⁰ the power of ecclesiastical subordinates over their own money,¹¹ the responsibility of slaves to their masters,¹² the relationship between subordination and liberation,¹³ and the proper relationship between rich men and those in need.¹⁴

This epistle's theme of subordination is foreign to the worldview of modern Christianity. Quite frankly, it has been foreign to Christians, with the exceptions of monks and other celibate religious orders, from the day it was written. I regard this epistle as an extension and application of the gospel of Luke. In that gospel, Christ's warnings against the religion of mammon are more pronounced than in Matthew or Mark. (John's gospel says almost nothing relating to economics, other than observing the predictable relationship between wine-dulled tongues

7. Chapter 2.

8. Chapter 3.

9. Chapter 4.

10. Chapter 5.

11. Chapter 6.

12. Chapter 7.

13. Chapter 8.

14. Chapter 9.

and the serving of cheaper vintages.)

D. The Love of Money

In this epistle, a famous passage appears. “For the love of money is the root of all evil: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows” (6:10). This is an extension of Christ’s warning: “No servant can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon” (Luke 16:13).¹⁵

The question arises: “If a rich man can be generous to more people than a poor man can, should he seek even greater riches?” This question can be extended to a congregation. There is a hierarchy of wealth within a congregation. There is a hierarchy of wealth among congregations with similar confessions. There is also a hierarchy of wealth among denominations. Episcopalians in the United States are richer per capita than Pentecostals. They are also more liberal theologically. Whether they are more liberal in giving, I do not know.

The ethical issue of what men should do with their money is relevant to the theological issue of the legitimacy of riches. Paul and Jesus warned against the common temptation of riches: to forget God. So did Moses. “But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:18).¹⁶ So did Solomon. “Remove far from me vanity and lies: give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me: Lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the LORD? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain” (Prov. 30:8–9).¹⁷ There is nothing new in the New Testament regarding the moral temptation of riches. What is new is Jesus’ discussion of the consequence of succumbing to this temptation: hell. The former rich man is in hell; the former beggar isn’t (Luke 16:19–31).¹⁸ This is the context of Jesus’ most extensive discussion of hell. The stakes are much higher than

15. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 39.

16. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 18.

17. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 85.

18. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 39.

they appeared to be in the Old Covenant.

The moral problem with riches is not the existence of riches; rather, it is the problem of what men do in order to gain riches, and also what they do with their riches after having gained them. The same could be said of power, and has been.

But Jesus called them to him, and saith unto them, Ye know that they which are accounted to rule over the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and their great ones exercise authority upon them. But so shall it not be among you: but whosoever will be great among you, shall be your minister: And whosoever of you will be the chiefest, shall be servant of all. For even the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many (Mark 10:42–45).

Paul's first epistle to Timothy deals with riches and also the exercise of authority. Both discussions appear in the context of the institutional church. Both discussions relate to hierarchy. Both discussions have implications outside of the institutional church.

E. Covenantal Hierarchy: Transcendent/Immanent

In my previous commentaries, I failed to clarify certain important aspects of the five-point biblical covenant model. Sutton begins his study of the biblical covenant with the observation that God, as an absolute sovereign, is both transcendent and immanent to the creation. God is over history and separate from the creation, yet He has entered history, most obviously at the incarnation.¹⁹

1. Point Two

I previously failed to identify the five-point covenant as itself having both transcendent and immanent applications: hierarchy, law, sanctions, and continuity. I categorize the covenant itself as primarily an aspect of point two: hierarchy. This is because Exodus, the second book of the Pentateuch, is the book most closely associated with the covenant. "And he took the book of the covenant, and read in the audience of the people: and they said, All that the LORD hath said will we do, and be obedient" (Ex. 24:7). I hope that the following material will clarify the distinction between transcendent and immanent applications of the covenant.

19. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 1.

Here is my present insight, which I have not presented with equal clarity before. The hierarchical structure of the biblical covenant is simultaneously vertical and horizontal. In this sense it manifests both transcendence and immanence. This in turn reflects the simultaneous relationships within the Godhead: vertical (economic Trinity) and horizontal (ontological Trinity). The persons of the Trinity are vertically hierarchical with respect to both creation and redemption, but horizontally equal with respect to their being.

The Greek word for priest (hierus) is the root word for hierarchy. A priest was an intermediary who represented God to men and men to God in the Old Covenant church. He possessed judicial authority. Judicial representation is generally understood as vertical. But there are other manifestations of covenantal representation. These can be horizontal: inner and outer rings of authority.

The biblical covenantal hierarchy applies to individuals and also to three institutions: church, family, and state. Each of these covenants is established by a self-maledictory oath before God. God and men establish a mutual legal bond by oath. Redeemed individuals are, in Meredith Kline's words, by oath consigned.²⁰ This oath places the individual and the three institutions under God.

One corporate covenantal hierarchy is both vertical and horizontal in both history and eternity: the church.

2. Vertical Hierarchy

I begin my analysis with the individual covenant. Conceptually, the structure of God's vertical individual hierarchy of covenantal authority is like the father-son relationship. The individual covenant is a hierarchy of legal status: either a son of God by means of adoption or a disinherited son because of Adam's original sin. The covenant is administered representatively: either by Christ or by Adam. Either Christ or Adam is a person's legal representative before God. God deals with an individual judicially by imputing to him either Christ's perfection or Adam's sin.²¹ Covenant theologians speak of this judicial representation as federal headship. One or the other representative agent has spoken a binding oath before God the Father on behalf of the individual. Judicially, though not literally, Adam spoke on behalf of mankind when he sinned. God the Father spoke on behalf of redeemed individuals in the name of Jesus Christ before time began.

20. Meredith G. Kline, By Oath Consigned: A Reinterpretation of the Covenant Signs of Circumcision and Baptism (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1968).

21. John Murray, The Imputation of Adam's Sin (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, [1959] 1979).

Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ: According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love (Eph. 1:3–4).

God makes a covenant with an individual in history, redeeming his soul. God adopts him. “Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will” (Eph. 1:5). The individual covenant is marked by all five points of the biblical covenant. God is the absolute sovereign (point one).²² He delegates to mankind the responsibility of exercising dominion and stewardship over the earth, beginning with himself: self-government under God’s authority (point two).²³ Each man is supposed to use his knowledge of God’s law to establish dominion over nature, beginning with himself: self-government under God’s law (point three).²⁴ By obeying the law personally, and by using the law to extend God’s kingdom in history, a covenant-keeper identifies himself in history as bound for heaven: a positive sanction. By disobeying God’s law, and by enforcing laws associated with Satan’s kingdom, a covenant-breaker identifies himself as bound for hell: a negative sanction (point four).²⁵ These sanctions in history, positive and negative, reflect the sanctions of a post-temporal pair of conditions: heaven and hell (higher and lower), which are in turn foretastes of the re-created New Heaven/New Earth on the one hand, and the lake of fire on the other (point five).²⁶

This structure can be referred to as a transcendent hierarchy. It deals primarily with an individual’s eternal legal status, though not entirely, for one’s legal status is established in history. “He that believeth on him is not condemned: but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God” (John 3:18). Individual vertical hierarchy points to eternity: either inheritance or disinheritance.

22. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 1.

23. Ibid., ch. 2.

24. Ibid., ch. 3.

25. Ibid., ch. 4.

26. Ibid., ch. 5.

Conceptually, the structure of God's vertical corporate hierarchy of authority is like a pyramid. God the Father is at the top. He rules as a king. Christ sits at His right hand. "Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us" (Rom. 8:34). "Looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith; who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God" (Heb. 12:2). This cosmic throne of judgment serves as the model for Christian rulership in history. The judicial evidence of this delegated rulership under Christ is the Lord's Supper, which is a church ritual associated with covenant oath renewal. "And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me; That ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Luke 22:29–30).²⁷

God the Father rules from on high alongside of Christ, who represents perfect humanity, and who is seated at the Father's right hand. God appoints representative agents in church, family, and state. These agents represent those under their authority before God, and also represent God to those under their authority.²⁸ Representation and authority are aspects of point two of the biblical covenant model: hierarchy. Representatives are required to rule in terms of God's law (point three). They impose sanctions in terms of God's law (point four). In this way, God's kingdom perseveres through time (point five). Corporate continuity through linear time (horizontal) is established by a vertical hierarchy. Put differently, covenantal dominion outward is empowered by covenantal dominion downward.

3. Horizontal Hierarchy

This form of hierarchy also has to do with legal status: the identification in history of the legal heirs vs. the disinherited heirs. Who will inherit the earth?

What man is he that feareth the LORD? him shall he teach in the way that he shall choose. His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth (Ps. 25:12–13).

For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD,

27. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 51.

28. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 4.

they shall inherit the earth (Ps. 37:9).

Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth (Matt. 5:5).²⁹

The horizontal covenantal hierarchy is associated with corporate inheritance in history: the sons who are meek before God will inherit the earth, thereby disinheriting the sons of Adam. God is at the center (point one). He extends His influence outward, across the earth, through the multiplication of mankind, as He commanded Adam before the Fall and Noah after the Flood (point two). Men are required to use God's law-order to bring more of the earth, both agricultural and social, under God's authority (point three). The sanctions associated with biblical law enable covenant-keepers to extend God's kingdom across space and through time and also reduce the influence of Satan's kingdom in history (point four). History is both linear and cumulative: the principle of the heaven (point five). This can be referred to as an immanent hierarchy. The inheritance is in history, not just eternity.

And Jesus answered and said, Verily I say unto you, There is no man that hath left house, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my sake, and the gospel's, But he shall receive an hundredfold now in this time, houses, and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands, with persecutions; and in the world to come eternal life (Mark 10:29–30).

Conceptually, the structure of God's horizontal hierarchy of authority is like a series of concentric circles. In the Bible, the horizontal structure is best seen in the concentric circles of holiness that surrounded the holy of holies (Num. 3). Each of the three clans in the priestly tribe of Levi defended against unlawful intrusion into one of these three circles of holiness: Kohath (inner circle), Gershon (second circle), and Merari (outer circle).³⁰ Israel, as a nation of priests (Ex. 19:6), mediated between God and the nations. The temple's sacrifices covered the sins of the heirs of Adam, in a common grace sense of covering: restraining the wrath of God in history. The priestly aspect of hierarchy is better understood as horizontal rather than vertical: protecting a holy place. But the vertical element is always present. Even as Jesus sits beside God the Father on a cosmic kingly throne, so does He sit as high priest. “But this man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down on the right hand of God” (Heb. 10:12).

29. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 4.

30. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 3.C.

Both aspects of God’s hierarchy are equally covenantal, for God is both transcendent and immanent. One aspect of this hierarchy has to do primarily with a man’s legal relationship to God (justification). The other aspect has to do primarily with a man’s inheritance in history (progressive sanctification). Both aspects culminated in the incarnation of Jesus Christ, who is both man and God, who has His being both in time and eternity. He has already inherited everything in history. “And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth” (Matt. 28:18).³¹ On the basis of this definitive inheritance as God’s law-abiding son, Christ progressively inherits the earth through His church, which represents Him. “Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen” (Matt. 28:19–20). The end of the world will coincide with the defeat of God’s enemies in history. Christ will deliver up (vertical) His kingdom to God the Father upon the completion of its geographical extension (horizontal), which involves the subordination (vertical) of covenant-breakers to a covenant-keeping society.

Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith, all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted, which did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all (I Cor. 15:24–28).³²

As a manifestation of Jesus Christ’s transcendence and immanence, the church of Jesus Christ is both transcendent (the church triumphant: heaven) and immanent (the church militant: earth). Unlike Christ’s simultaneous dual status in history, a person’s participation in one branch of the church precludes simultaneous participation in the other branch until after the final judgment. At that point, ecclesiastical

31. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 48.

32. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 16.

transcendence and immanence will be eternally unified. This post-final judgment ecclesiastical unification will manifest throughout eternity Christ's dual ontological status: God and man, transcendent and immanent.

4. Temporal Hierarchies

We normally think of hierarchies both ways. We say that men seek power by climbing to the top of the pyramid. We also say that men seek power by breaking into the inner circle. We speak of leaders as top dogs. We also speak of them as insiders.

In civil government, magistrates reflect God's original sovereignty. They hold power only by His command. "Thus saith the Lord GOD; Remove the diadem, and take off the crown: this shall not be the same: exalt him that is low, and abase him that is high. I will overturn, overturn, overturn, it: and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is; and I will give it him" (Ezek. 21:26–27). The Old Covenant king's visible temporal throne reflected God's eternal throne. So does the office of civil magistrate in the New Covenant.

Political authority is not sufficient to represent God's hierarchical supremacy. Reflecting God in His kingly status is only part of the picture. God is also priestly. The Ten Commandments reflect this dual status: priestly (1–5) and kingly (6–10).³³ This is why every Old Covenant king had priests, and why every priesthood needed a king. In the post-Flood Old Covenant era, only Melchizedek lawfully possessed both offices (Gen. 14:18). Only Christ possesses both offices in New Covenant history. There are no longer prophets, priests, or kings. These Old Covenant offices are today exclusive monopolies of Christ in His capacity as perfect humanity. These three offices have been replaced in the New Covenant era by the Bible (prophetic), eldership (sacramental), and civil magistracy (the sword). But the hierarchical concepts of priest and king remain in common language. In the language of seventeenth-century English political theory: "No king—no bishops; no bishops—no king." This turned out to be literally true during the English Civil War (1642–46), a war to remove or retain both the king and his bishops. Archbishop Laud was executed for high treason by the Puritans in 1645. He had previously persecuted Puritans. Then Charles I was executed in 1649—for high treason. When his son Charles II was restored to the throne in 1660, his father’s executioners were executed—again, for high treason.

33. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 1912), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), Preface.

In economic theory, the same transcendent-immanent distinction applies. The owner of an asset exercises legal sovereignty over it. It serves his purposes. But its value in the market is established by the income that it can generate. This, in turn, is established by competitive customer demand. If an owner does not find a use for a capital asset to generate income from outside his own household, then its value is limited to its usefulness within that one household. By using a capital asset to serve customers who are outside the owner’s immediate family (the inner ring), the owner increases his stream of income, and therefore increases the value of the asset. So, he exercises legal sovereignty over the asset (vertical hierarchy), but in order to maximize its economic value in a division-of-labor economy, he must use it to serve the desires of paying customers (horizontal hierarchy). Legal status is vertical. Dominion use is horizontal. This two-fold aspect of ownership reflects the covenant’s transcendent hierarchy, which is a hierarchy of legal status, and it also reflects the covenant’s immanent hierarchy, which has to do with dominion and inheritance in history.

F. Covenantal Service: Vertical and Horizontal

Paul in this epistle focuses on the church. He focuses on the church covenant. His concern throughout is hierarchy. He speaks of service and obligation, but because he is speaking about the church covenant, vertical hierarchy is the conceptual framework for his discussion. This is because of point four: the enforcement of sanctions, whether ecclesiastical, familial, or civil. A ruler imposes sanctions on the ruled. They are bound together by covenantal oath. Without the oath, the relationship would be horizontal. It would not be a relationship of ruler and ruled.

Vertical service is only one form of service. The other is horizontal. To understand this distinction, consider the institutional church. Membership is by oath. The church offers positive judicial sanctions: baptism and the Lord’s Supper. It offers these only to church members. These ecclesiastical rituals are sacraments. They are not lawfully open to people who are not legally bound to God and a church by a covenant oath. Both of these sacraments invoke positive and negative sanctions under God. Excommunication by a church involves the removal of a member's access to the communion table.

The church also offers positive economic sanctions in a limited number of cases.³⁴ That is, it uses money, goods, and donated time that are provided by members, and then transfers these assets to poor members. Both the collection and the distribution are vertical. The assets are not collected from non-members, and the distribution is made to members. The model here is Acts 6: the establishment of the diaconate.

In other cases, ecclesiastical service is horizontal. Church money and donated assets go to aid non-members. These non-members are not bound by oath to honor the church's vertical hierarchy. They are not under the church's negative sanctions. But because they accept aid from churches, they do come under God's negative sanctions. "Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord. Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good" (Rom. 12:19–21).³⁵ The recipient of church aid becomes a debtor to God, but he does not become a debtor to the church. He is under no obligation to members of the church to perform reciprocal service unless the original grant of aid was made on the basis of his promised performance. Even in this case, there is no means of bringing negative church sanctions on him for subsequent non-performance.

Another reason for offering aid to non-members is to reveal to them the love of God. Some will respond in faith and join the church. Jesus and the early apostles used physical healing as a way to bring people into the kingdom of God by way of the church. "Then Peter said, Silver and gold have I none; but such as I have give I thee: In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth rise up and walk" (Acts 3:6). This act of charity led to the conversion of many (Acts. 4:4).

Because the world is wide and filled with great need, such acts of horizontal service by the church are limited in their power to transform society directly. They are representative acts. They demonstrate publicly and before God what the church is willing to do for others, with no temporal judicial strings attached, and would be willing to do on a much larger scale if there were more members or more money.

34. Chapter 5.

35. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 10.

The economic sacrifice of members becomes a testimony to Christ's supreme sacrifice for members (special grace) and non-members (common grace).³⁶ "But we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour; that he by the grace of God should taste death for every man" (Heb. 2:9). He was the suffering servant.

The civil government, unlike the family and the church, does not legitimately offer positive sanctions. It provides the service of civil justice, which is exclusively restricted to the imposition of negative sanctions against convicted trespassers. These sanctions include the enforcement of restitution from the criminal to the victim. They also include defensive warfare: the service of justice against invaders. But civil government is not like the family and the church with respect to the service of healing. It is the agency of the sword, an exclusively negative biblical sanction. Civil government offers no legitimate positive sanctions, either vertical or horizontal.

In this epistle, Paul does not discuss horizontal service. The main theme of this epistle is vertical hierarchy: proper rulership and proper subordination within the confines of the institutional church.

G. Non-Covenantal Service: Vertical and Horizontal

Non-covenantal service occurs outside of the legal boundaries of an institution that has been established by a self-maledictory oath under God. Its sanctions are not covenantal. These sanctions are not imposed vertically by an individual on those who are under his oath-bound legal authority. The sanctions are economic. They are established by contract, not by a self-maledictory oath under God.

Non-covenantal service can take two-forms: charitable and profit-seeking. Charitable service is familiar in every society. It is familiar in every tradition of ethics. The concept of profit-seeking service is an idea that originated in the West, and even more narrowly, Western Europe. Charitable service is non-reciprocal, person to person, or person to external environment. If there is a reward, it comes from God or from the servant's conscience. Profit-seeking service is reciprocal.

36. North, Dominion and Common Grace.

1. Vertical Charitable Service

Non-covenantal charitable service can be vertical. Such service involves positive sanctions. When we speak of offering a helping hand, we have a mental image of reaching down and helping someone who has fallen to get back on his feet. This is also the image of the familiar phrase, "getting back on his feet."

Offering voluntary assistance to someone is a means of visibly establishing the recipient's dependence on God. Sometimes this dependence may be permanent, such as in the case of assisting a severely retarded person or someone with Alzheimer's disease. Usually, it is temporary. The assistance establishes no reciprocal claims, donor to recipient. This is not a loan that must be paid back. But the assistance does establish reciprocity between God and the recipient. If the donor is a covenant-keeper, this reciprocity is even stronger. Grace precedes law, but law does follow grace. The recipient is now more visibly in debt to God than before. This should lead to repentance before God in the case of covenant-breakers. When it does not lead to repentance, the wrath of God increases. Thus, Paul wrote: "Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head" (Rom 12:20).³⁷ This was a citation from Proverbs: "If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink: For thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head, and the LORD shall reward thee" (Prov. 25:21–22).³⁸

In the Proverbs passage, we learn of reciprocity between God and the assistance giver. God promises to reward the giver. God also promises to punish the thankless receiver. There is reciprocity upward: the receiver owes God. There is reciprocity downward: God owes the giver. "The Lord shall reward thee." But the relationship between donor and receiver is not reciprocal. It is vertical: the helping hand downward.

The donor is the poor man's means of obtaining God's blessings. The poor man is the means of the donor's obtaining God's blessings. God uses each party as a mediator of His blessings for the other. There are two inter-related hierarchies. The donor is the intermediary in God's transfer of blessings to the recipient. The recipient is the intermediary in God's transfer of blessings to the donor.

37. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 10.

38. North, Wisdom and Dominion, ch. 76.

2. Horizontal Profit-Seeking Service

Here, there is reciprocity between the participants. This is not a relationship between a donor and a recipient. Each of the parties gives up something, and each receives something. The supreme example of horizontal service is voluntary exchange. Each of the parties is a seller. Each is a buyer. Traditionally, we refer to the seller of money as the buyer, and the receiver of money as the seller. This linguistic convention is useful, but it is analytically incomplete. Analytically, both parties are buyers and sellers. But because money is the most marketable commodity, the buyer (seller of money) possesses greater authority. If there is no buyer, the seller retains ownership of a less marketable asset.

The nature of the exchange is voluntary. Each party expects to be a net beneficiary after the exchange takes place. They may haggle over the price, but if the exchange takes place, then both parties must have expected to benefit. “It is naught, it is naught, saith the buyer: but when he is gone his way, then he boasteth” (Prov. 20:14).³⁹

Horizontal service is mutual. This is another way of saying that it is reciprocal. The obligation is future-oriented: promises to be fulfilled. Unless the agreement called for retroactive obligation after the exchange as part of the selling price, there is no further dependence of either party on the other. The dividing issue between horizontal service and vertical service is dependence. Vertical service establishes the recipient’s dependence on God as a result of a charitable act. Horizontal service does not.

3. Vertical Profit-Seeking Service

A man who hires a worker is performing a service: providing him with money. So is the person hired: providing labor. Each expects to benefit from the arrangement. The service is reciprocal.

With vertical service, there is a long-term relationship. The employer expects the employee to come to work on schedule, and the employee expects to be paid on time. There is also long-term mutual dependence. The employer depends on the employees to do their work. The employees expect the employer to sell the output of their labor to customers.

There is a pyramid shape of this allocation of responsibility. The employer can more easily replace an employee than an employee can replace an employer. There are more employees than employers. The services of the employees are more widely distributed. In rare cases, this is not true. A famous entertainer or star athlete may be less replaceable than an owner. But, generally, there is a disparity of both trust and dependence in an employer-employee relationship. The employer's skills are unique; the worker's are not. The level of trust required by an employee is greater than the trust required by an employer. This is equally true of dependence. The employer spreads his risk: lots of replaceable customers and lots of replaceable employees. The employee concentrates his risk: one employer. He can find a new employer, but his search costs are higher than the employer's search costs are to replace a worker.

39. North, Wisdom and Dominion, ch. 59.

Economists say that the consumer is sovereign in horizontal profit-seeking service: mutual exchange. This is because he possesses the most marketable commodity: money. Economists should therefore also say that the employer is sovereign in vertical profit-seeking service: mutual exchange. He also possesses the most marketable commodity: money. He is closer to the source of money—customers—than the employee is.

Whenever we hear about the benefits of achieving economic independence, we are hearing about the goal of escaping from pyramid-shaped dependence: salaried labor. There cannot be economic independence in a cursed world (Gen. 3:17–19).⁴⁰ There is rather economic dependence based on a broader distribution of risk: multiple buyers and potential buyers of the output of one's labor.

4. Abraham's Independence

Two incidents in Abraham's life illustrate the patriarch's dedication in remaining independent from the covenant-breakers with whom he had contact: his refusal to receive payment from the king of Sodom after his victory over Chedorlaomer, and his insistence on paying for the cave in which Sarah was buried.

And the king of Sodom said unto Abram, Give me the persons, and take the goods to thyself. And Abram said to the king of Sodom, I have lift up mine hand unto the LORD, the most high God, the possessor of heaven and earth, That I will not take from a thread even to a shoelatchet, and that I will not take any thing that is thine, lest thou shouldest say, I have made Abram rich: Save only that which the young men have eaten, and the portion of the men which went with me, Aner, Eshcol, and Mamre; let them take their portion (Gen. 14:21–24).

40. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 12.

And he spake unto Ephron in the audience of the people of the land, saying, But if thou wilt give it, I pray thee, hear me: I will give thee money for the field; take it of me, and I will bury my dead there. And Ephron answered Abraham, saying unto him, My lord, hearken unto me: the land is worth four hundred shekels of silver; what is that betwixt me and thee? bury therefore thy dead. And Abraham hearkened unto Ephron; and Abraham weighed to Ephron the silver, which he had named in the audience of the sons of Heth, four hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchant (Gen. 23:13–16).

In the first incident, Abraham refused a voluntary donation from the king of Sodom. He could have received payment for services rendered, which the king of Sodom voluntarily offered, but he refused. That is, he voluntarily transferred to the king the wealth that the king would have voluntarily transferred to Abraham. He was explicit regarding his reason for refusing payment: he wanted to avoid becoming visibly dependent on this king. To accept a voluntary payment would have meant consenting to the idea that he had been involved in a profit-seeking arrangement based on vertical service: a pyramid of authority, with a covenant-breaking king on top. This would have implied higher and lower, ruler and subordinate. He refused. It was better to do without the spoils of war. This was the price of his visible independence.⁴¹

In the second incident, Abraham insisted on paying Ephron. Ephron was offering him a voluntarily gift. These two men were rich. Four hundred shekels was a great deal of money. Ephron bragged: “the land is worth four hundred shekels of silver; what is that betwixt me and thee? bury therefore thy dead.” Abraham was not about to have word go out that he had accepted a donation of this magnitude. This was not conventional hospitality to Abraham; this was an implicit assertion of authority over Abraham. Because of the lack of reciprocity, such service was a form of charity: vertical dependence. It implied higher and lower, ruler and subordinate.

Abraham saw that he represented God in any arrangement with these covenant-breakers. To the extent that he became obligated to them, his God became obligated to their gods. Abraham avoided all signs of such obligation. He paid to maintain his visible independence: by foregoing spoils in the first case, and by foregoing the purchase price of a cave in the second.

41. Ibid., ch. 21.

H. Paul vs. Adam Smith

In this epistle, the contrast between two approaches to economic analysis becomes clear. Paul analyzes wealth in terms of ecclesiastical hierarchy, which is vertical. Adam Smith analyzes wealth in terms of reciprocal exchange, which is horizontal. Paul discussed the relief of poor in terms of a voluntary, vertical transfer of wealth downward. Adam Smith discussed the relief of the poor in terms of a voluntary, horizontal, reciprocal increase of wealth. Paul discussed the reduction of poverty in terms of what economists call a zero-sum game: the winner (a poor man) profits at the expense of the loser (a rich man). Adam Smith discussed the reduction of poverty in terms of mutual advantage: reciprocal exchange.

For Paul, poverty is a condition imposed on an individual by God's sovereign purposes. For Adam Smith, poverty is the product of insufficient national economic growth—insufficient economic growth per capita. For Paul, the poor man deserves help because his low productivity does not allow him to participate in the market. Adam Smith would have agreed regarding the analysis, but not the solution. Paul preached sacrificial charity by the rich. Smith preached profitable capital investment by the rich. For Paul, a sinking ship needs a bail-out. For Smith, a rising tide raises all ships. There will be more wealth available for helping the poor if most men benefit from an improving standard of living due to increasing corporate productivity.

These are fundamental differences in economic analysis. The Bible does not so much as hint at the possibility that poverty can be reduced through voluntary exchange. While Adam Smith occasionally discusses charity, his economic analysis rests almost entirely on the assumption that economic growth is the result of voluntary exchange in the context of a private property legal order. The Bible discusses economic growth in the context of national obedience to God's Biblical law (Deut. 28:1–14).⁴² Adam Smith discussed economic growth in the context of an autonomous legal and economic national order: capitalism. The Bible identifies God as the source of economic growth: the Creator and providential Sustainer. Adam Smith identified nature and mankind as the dual sources of economic growth: land, labor, and capital.

42. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 69.

Paul's presentation would have been understood by any social theorist, from the ancient world through the fifteenth century. A debate over economic cause and effect would have arisen only with respect to which God or gods are the source of economic sanctions. Smith's presentation is modern. The debate over economic cause and effect arises only with respect to which legal order provides the greatest economic growth: free enterprise, socialism, or the mixed economy. Smith used the analogy of the invisible hand of the free market to explain the existence of economic order apart from a central plan enforced by the state. A pagan in Paul's day would not have understood this reference as an analogy. "The Hand will get you if you don't obey," would have been his assessment. For Smith, the invisible hand was an analogy, just as natural selection along the lines of a breeder was an analogy for Charles Darwin. The pre-modern world viewed causation much more personally.

Paul did not put the question of wealth and poverty at the center of his exposition. Smith did, and ever since, there have been few rival issues of equal or greater authority than the question of wealth and poverty. The debate between truth and falsehood, beauty and ugliness, wisdom and foolishness do not occupy modern man's attention compared to the debate over wealth and poverty. Only the discussion of life and death is on the same plane, and this discussion eventually returns to wealth and poverty. There is far more public debate over who will pay for people's medical care than there is over the nature of time and eternity, a discussion which is confined mainly to Bible-believing churches. Liberal churches prefer to discuss wealth and poverty.

I. Service and Dominion

This epistle deals with hierarchy. It therefore deals with godly rule and godly submission. Because those in submission always outnumber those who rule, and because every vertical hierarchy is necessarily representative and therefore pyramid-shaped, Paul's message regarding submission applies to more people than does his message regarding leadership.

The Bible teaches that submission is a path to authority. Those who are under institutional authority are told to obey, even when their rulers are not motivated by service to those under them. The Bible also teaches that exercising authority is a form of service. People in positions of authority are told to make decisions in terms of what will benefit those under their authority. This means that service in a godly vertical hierarchy is a two-way street. Service extends upward and downward. Both the rulers and the ruled have trouble accepting this two-fold concept of vertical hierarchy, which is based on the ideal of service. This ideal interferes with their presumed autonomy.

Rulers find it difficult to understand that there are divinely created, built-in positive institutional sanctions for service to those under their authority. Subordinates find it difficult to believe that there are divinely created, built-in positive institutional sanctions for patient obedience to cruel or incompetent rulers. Neither rulers nor ruled find it obvious that their respective agendas are advanced by means of service to others.

Smith's Wealth of Nations (1776) revolutionized economic theory by placing service to customers at the center of economic analysis. It is central in two senses: conceptually irreplaceable and institutionally horizontal. Smith argued that a man's self-interest is best advanced by his service to the interests of others. Smith's theory applies to non-covenantal horizontal relationships. This distinguishes it from Paul's first epistle to Timothy, which has to do with a vertical covenantal hierarchy.

The full title of Smith's book is An Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations. The book was a refutation of earlier views of national wealth that relied on hierarchical state coercion to restrict imports and increase exports in order to build up a national hoard of gold. Smith did not argue that increased wealth is a bad thing. On the contrary, he favored it. He argued that open competition in a private property order is best able to achieve both increased national wealth and increased per capita wealth.

Similarly, the extension of the kingdom of God in history is Paul's goal, not just in this epistle, but throughout his entire career as an apostle. The difference is, Paul did not place economic growth at the center of his discussion of kingdom growth. Neither did Christ. Economic growth is not a prominent feature of New Testament social ethics. In fact, there is comparatively little space in the New Testament devoted to discussions of social ethics. This is because social ethics is covered in the Old Testament. There, economic growth is prominently featured, usually in the context of dominion. The biblical imagery of dominion is vertical: ruler and ruled. The economics of dominion is horizontal: inheritance.

And it shall come to pass, if thou shalt hearken diligently unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to observe and to do all his commandments which I command thee this day, that the LORD thy God will set thee on high above all nations of the earth: And all these blessings shall come on thee, and overtake thee, if thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God. Blessed shalt thou be in the city, and blessed shalt thou be in the field. Blessed shall be the fruit of thy body, and the fruit of thy ground, and the fruit of thy cattle, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks of thy sheep. Blessed shall be thy basket and thy store (Deut. 28:1–5).

And the LORD shall make thee plenteous in goods, in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy ground, in the land which the LORD sware unto thy fathers to give thee. The LORD shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his season, and to bless all the work of thine hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow. And the LORD shall make thee the head, and not the tail; and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath; if that thou hearken unto the commandments of the LORD thy God, which I command thee this day, to observe and to do them (Deut. 28:11–13).⁴³

What man is he that feareth the LORD? him shall he teach in the way that he shall choose. His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth (Ps. 25:12–13).

For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth. For yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be: yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall not be. But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace (Ps. 37:9–11).

J. A Kingdom of Law

There are social theorists, economists, and theologians who insist that the New Testament is a radical reconstruction of the Old Testament, i.e., that much of what God taught in the Old Testament is denied in the New Testament. This thesis of rival worldviews, Old Testament vs. New Testament, is prominent among theological liberals and theological pietists. In the modern world, liberals and pietists constitute the overwhelming majority of Protestants.

43. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 70.

I am neither a theological liberal nor a theological pietist. I am a covenant theologian. I discuss economic theory from the standpoint of the biblical covenant. In my theory of covenant law, I regard the following Mosaic laws as annulled: land laws and seed laws, which were related to Jacob's Christ-fulfilled prophecy to Judah regarding Shiloh (Gen. 49:10), a kingly prophecy; and priestly laws, which were also fulfilled by Christ.⁴⁴ With respect to the Mosaic law's cross-boundary civil laws,⁴⁵ of which the Ten Commandments are best representative, both covenants proclaim their binding authority. If these laws are still binding, then so are their sanctions: no sanctions—no law. The consistent civil enforcement of these covenant sanctions, over time, furthers the extension of the kingdom of God in history.

With respect to the non-civil Mosaic cross-boundary laws—sometimes referred to as moral laws—they are still in force in the New Testament, and so are God's predictable corporate sanctions, negative and positive. The moral laws are laws. Laws have sanctions attached to them. Laws without sanctions are mere suggestions. Negative sanctions retard the work of those who break the law. Positive sanctions extend the work of those who obey the law. Dominion in history is therefore by covenant law and its associated sanctions. The question is: "Whose law and whose sanctions?"

This line of reasoning is rejected by theological liberals and theological pietists. This is because both groups reject covenant theology. What is perplexing is that so many covenant theologians also reject the suggestion that covenant sanctions in history are structured to favor the extension of God's kingdom rather than Satan's. They argue that Old Covenant sanctions (1) are no longer in effect in the New Covenant; or (2) are random in the New Covenant; or (3) are anti-church in the New Testament. They agree entirely with theological liberals and pietists on this issue: the ideal of Christendom is illegitimate.

This is why theological liberals, pietists, and most covenant theologians reject any suggestion that there is a uniquely biblical approach to economic theory that rests on the presupposition of the universal presence of corporate covenantal sanctions that are built into every society by God. They share with humanistic economists a hostility to any suggestion of the existence of covenant sanctions in New Testament history. My suggestion is not taken seriously, namely, that economic profit and loss are in some fundamental way reflections of heaven and hell.

44. North, Boundaries and Dominion, Conclusion:C:2.

45. Ibid., Conclusion:C:3.

Conclusion

When we come to this epistle, we should not expect to find an exposition of economic theory, not because Paul was uninterested in economic theory or had nothing to say about it, but because he was dealing in this epistle with the vertical hierarchy of the institutional church. His narrowly confined discussion did not lend itself to the nature and causes of the wealth of nations. He discussed vertical covenantal service, not horizontal non-covenantal service.

The expositor must remain alert to the possibility that a Pauline application of the principle of ecclesiastical hierarchy may in some way be hostile to one or another theory of humanistic economics. My self-appointed task is to detect any such discrepancy and explain it in terms of the biblical covenant. An additional task would then be to reformulate economic theory in terms of Paul's principle. Neither the economists nor the theologians have bothered to do this. They are not interested in doing this.

There are numerous critics of my approach to economic theory. Mostly, there is silence. Secular economists have paid no attention to Christian economics. Christian economists have paid no attention to my biblical exegesis.⁴⁶ Theologians, especially covenant theologians, have also not adopted my efforts and especially my findings. In fact, they have ignored my findings.

To my Christian critics, I say, as always: you can't beat something with nothing. Gentlemen, where are your economic commentaries? Where are your Adam Smith-sized expositions of biblical economics? What hermeneutic are you suggesting as an alternative to a multitude of secular theories of economics? What system of economic cause and effect governs the New Testament era? What system governed the Old Covenant era? Was it confined to Mosaic Israel, or was it universal?

46. An example is provided Donald Hay of Jesus College, Oxford, who footnoted my book, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Craig Press, 1973), to justify this assertion: "The fundamentalist churches of North America have, for example, espoused the secular market doctrines of libertarian thought. . . ." Hay, Economics Today: A Christian Critique (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1989), p. 173. Hay's book was published seven years after my commentary on Genesis (1982), four years after my commentary on Exodus 1–19 (1985), and three years after my commentary on Exodus 20 (1986). It was published two years after Inherit the Earth: Biblical Blueprints for Economics (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). Hay made no reference to any of these books. Hay, with no detailed exegesis, defended a state-regulated economy in the name of biblical justice. He suggested no Bible-based limitations on the state's intervention into the economy. The book offers no Scripture index. It would have been a very short index.

These are not minor questions. Just because covenant theologians have chosen not to answer them, or even acknowledge their existence, does not mean that these questions are not important for covenant theology. It means only that covenant theologians have long preferred not to deal with these questions. These questions make them uncomfortable. These questions suggest the possibility of uniquely Bible-based answers, which in turn suggests theonomy. Theonomy suggests theocracy. Theocracy suggests Christian responsibility outside the four walls of the institutional church and outside the family. Responsibility is what covenant theologians are attempting to evade. They have more than they think they can handle in just trying to explain what has gone wrong in the institutional church, let alone what needs to be done to reform it. The reform of society at large is not even an issue for them at this point in time. But this point in time is the third millennium A.D.

Modern theologians reject the idea that the Bible provides authoritative laws that favor a free market economy, beginning with "thou shalt not steal." Even those theologians who favor the free market economy reject arguments that suggest a necessary connection between biblical law and the free market. They reject biblical law even when they accept the free market. They think Adam Smith is still relevant. They think biblical law is no longer relevant.

I think Adam Smith and biblical law are both relevant. It is in an economic commentary on this Pauline epistle that a discussion of Adam Smith and theonomy can no longer be legitimately deferred.

1

THEONOMY AS ORTHODOXY

Now the end of the commandment is charity out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned: From which some having swerved have turned aside unto vain jangling; Desiring to be teachers of the law; understanding neither what they say, nor whereof they affirm. But we know that the law is good, if a man use it lawfully; Knowing this, that the law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners, for unholy and profane, for murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, for manslayers, For whoremongers, for them that defile themselves with mankind, for menstealers, for liars, for perjured persons, and if there be any other thing that is contrary to sound doctrine; According to the glorious gospel of the blessed God, which was committed to my trust (1 Tim. 1:5–11).

A. Paul's Commandment

The theocentric focus of these laws is the reduction of men's in-subordination against God (v. 9). This goal is an aspect of hierarchy: point two of the biblical covenant.¹ Lawless men are in rebellion against God and the gospel of God's redemption through faith in Christ. Paul's affirmation of God's law in this passage is specifically associated with the gospel (v. 11). This is a very important passage that relates the law and the gospel. I would go so far as to say that without a clear theological understanding of this passage, it is not possible to accurately relate the law and the gospel.

Paul speaks of a commandment. He does not say explicitly what this commandment is. He says what its goal is: love from a pure heart, a good conscience, and a sincere faith (v. 5). The King James translates the Greek word for “love” (agápé) as “charity.” Modern translations substitute “love.” Charity has a narrow connotation in modern English, i.e., giving things away to those who need help. The differing meanings today of “charity” and “love” are seen clearly in I Corinthians 13. When we follow the King James and think “charity,” something important is lost. Paul is talking about a much broader emotion than the willingness to give things away.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

What was this commandment? Was it the commandment that God gave to Paul to become an apostle (v. 1)? Or was it Paul’s commandment to Timothy to remain in Ephesus and challenge the false teachers (v. 3)? I think it was the latter, for verse 5 appears in the context of the false teachers who have strayed from the commandment (v. 6). The goal of the commandment is being thwarted by false teaching (vv. 6–7).

Paul then moves from a discussion of the commandment to a discussion of God’s law. Timothy must enforce theological orthodoxy. This is Paul’s command to Timothy. Paul here links biblical law to theological orthodoxy. This epistle is Paul’s premier exposition on the ecclesiastical enforcement of theological orthodoxy. Paul teaches in this epistle that theological orthodoxy mandates theonomy: biblical law. According to this epistle, biblical law is not a temporary intrusion into the historical development of the kingdom of God. On the contrary, it is at the heart of this development, not as a means of redemption, but as a tool of dominion.²

B. Paul’s Defense of Theonomy

Verses 5–11 constitute an important New Testament passage on the subject of the correct use of biblical civil law. *I regard this as the most important New Testament passage dealing with the lawful use of the Mosaic civil law.*³ Yet the passage is not well known. Indicative of the lack of interest by modern theologians regarding this passage is the fact that Oxford University’s N. T. Wright, widely regarded as an academic expert in New Testament ethics, did not comment on this passage, or even refer to it, in his book, The Climax of The Covenant:

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990).

3. If I were to choose my turf in the New Testament defense of theonomy, I would choose I Timothy. Matthew 5:17–19 was Greg Bahnsen’s battlefield of preference. I have always preferred an ammo belt filled with judicial specifics to a single hermeneutical hand grenade. I can shoot better than I can throw.

Christ and the Law in Pauline Theology (1992), a monograph on Paul's use of the Mosaic law.

1. False Teachers

Paul speaks of law in the singular. He criticizes certain men who have raised themselves up in the church at Ephesus as teachers of the law. He does not criticize them for teaching the Mosaic law. He criticizes them for being false teachers who do not understand the law (v. 7). Then he begins a brief disquisition on God's law. He affirms God's law as a good thing when it is used lawfully (v. 8). Every example of the law that Paul lists here was a Mosaic civil law for which specific civil sanctions were mandated in the Old Testament.

What is the lawful use of God's civil law? Paul gives a clear answer: to place limits on evil-doers. "Knowing this, that the law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners, for unholy and profane, for murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, for manslayers" (v. 9). Certain people are lawless and insubordinate to God. He identifies what kinds of people he has in mind. He does so by listing a series of crimes. By "crimes," I mean sins that are lawfully punished by the imposition of civil sanctions on convicted perpetrators. Paul lists these crimes under the general category of unholiness and profanity (v. 9). An unholy person has violated a moral boundary. A profane person has violated sacred space or sacred property.⁴ This would include murder: destroying the image of God in men (Gen. 9:6). Certain crimes represent unholy behavior. Each of the infractions in Paul's list is also found in the Mosaic law: murder (Ex. 20:13; 21:14), manslaying (Ex. 21:22–25), fornication,⁵ male homosexuality (Lev. 20:13), kidnapping (Ex. 21:16), lying (Ex. 23:1)⁶ and perjury (Ex. 20:16; Deut. 19:15–21).

4. On profanity, see Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 6.

5. Under the Mosaic statutes, fornication for money by a priest's daughter was a capital crime (Lev. 21:9). This was a priestly law. It is no longer in force because the priesthood has been changed (Heb. 7). Fornication with an unbetrothed virgin was a crime against her father, and the state was required to enforce the fornicator's payment of 50 shekels of silver to the woman's father (Deut. 22:29). If a woman was betrothed as a concubine—a wife with no dowry—both she and the fornicator were to be scourged (whipped) (Lev. 19:20). Adultery—copulation with another person's spouse—was adultery, and this was a capital crime. The victimized spouse had the right to command the state to execute both of them, though not just one of them. See North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 32.

6. Lying is not a crime unless it accompanies fraud or slander, where an identifi-

2. Civil Sanctions

Without sanctions, there is no law. Without civil sanctions, there is no civil law. Paul is here defending the Mosaic civil law and its mandated civil sanctions. He is not speaking of Mosaic ceremonial laws that were enforced by the priests. He is also not speaking of violations of moral laws to which no civil sanctions are specified. In another epistle, Paul offered a similar list, although it was not made up of exclusively civil laws: “Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived: neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind, Nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God” (I Cor. 6:9–10).⁷ Any suggestion that Paul was an antinomian because he wrote that Christians are under grace rather than law (Rom. 6:14–15) ignores the passages in which he identified the eternally lost in terms of their behavior. Any discussion of Paul’s doctrine of grace that does not include a detailed consideration of these passages is incomplete and one-sided, i.e., antinomian.

3. New Covenant Laws

In Galatians, he spoke of the Mosaic law as a tool for instructing the children of the household. The distinction is between spiritual children (Old Covenant saints) and spiritual adults (New Covenant saints). Children are treated as servants in their father’s household (Gal. 4:1–7). This was Israel’s condition under the Mosaic law. Christians are no longer under the Mosaic law, taken as a covenantal unit, just as adult heirs are no longer under the authority of household servants (v. 7). This does not mean that all of what the servants had taught the heirs is irrelevant to the heirs. On the contrary, their father had placed them under the servants’ authority in order that they might learn to govern themselves internally by the external standards of the law. Paul in Galatians referred to the priestly (“ceremonial”) aspects of the Mosaic law, which he called weak and beggarly elements of the law (v. 9). His examples were Mosaic requirements for honoring special able injury to a third party takes place. Fraud in general is prohibited by the law prohibiting false weights and measures (Lev. 19:35–36). North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 19.

7. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 7.

ceremonial days and months (v. 10). These laws had been designed by God for righteous people under the Old Covenant. In fact, a person identified himself as a member of God's righteous nation by obeying these laws. But these laws were laws for children, i.e., God's covenant people at an earlier stage in the development of God's covenants. The question is this: Which laws are for the New Covenant era? Surely the list in I Timothy 1:9–10 constitutes one such list.

In this epistle to Timothy, he is not speaking of the weak and beggarly elements of the Mosaic law. He is speaking of civil laws that restrain evil-doers who are insubordinate to God, and who reveal this by their actions. The enforcement of these laws is lawful, he says. These statutes of the Mosaic law are not restricted in their authority to a society made up of spiritual children. They are not weak and beggarly elements of the annulled Old Covenant. They retain full authority in God's civil covenant. The New Covenant has not annulled any of these laws. Paul lists these unholy acts as examples of things contrary to sound doctrine (v. 10)—literally, “healthful teaching.” These crimes are contrary to the gospel (v. 11).

I regard this passage as the clearest example in the New Testament of Paul's commitment to theonomy as a principle of biblical interpretation. Here, he affirms the Mosaic civil law in general by identifying specific Mosaic civil statutes as defining unrighteousness. He says that God's law is designed to restrict specific behavior. Theonomy in this sense is not designed for righteous people, but for the unrighteous. He who commits such acts is not a righteous person. This was also Paul's point in I Corinthians 6:9–10.

C. “We’re Under Grace, Not Law!”

The phrase, “under grace, not law,” does not mean—cannot possibly mean—that all of the Mosaic civil laws and sanctions have been permanently annulled by the New Covenant. Paul in this passage affirms the continuing validity of several Mosaic civil laws. Paul says that these laws have no power over covenant-keepers, because covenant-keepers have been delivered from these sins. The power of these temptations over them has been removed by God's special grace. The gospel has delivered them from bondage to the law by redeeming their humanity. They are not under these laws, not in the sense of not being under a civil government that lawfully enforces these laws, but in the sense of their being new men in Christ.

1. The Power of Sin

What did Paul mean when he wrote in Romans that Christians are under grace, not law? He was referring to the indwelling power of sin.

For sin shall not have dominion over you: for ye are not under the law, but under grace. What then? shall we sin, because we are not under the law, but under grace? God forbid. Know ye not, that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey; whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness? But God be thanked, that ye were the servants of sin, but ye have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered you. Being then made free from sin, ye became the servants of righteousness (Rom. 6:14–18).

Paul in Romans was writing about personal ethics, not civil government. The passage has nothing to say about civil government. It speaks of the hierarchy of sin. Covenant-breakers are in bondage to sin. When Paul wrote that we are “under grace, not law,” he was referring to its eternal sanctions. Christians are not under these sanctions because Christ has suffered and died in their place (Rom. 5).

On the other hand, Christians are under the civil law because they are under civil sanctions, just as everyone is supposed to be. The judicial question is this: “Whose civil law and which civil sanctions?” In a Christian commonwealth, God’s Biblical civil laws are supposed to apply to every resident. This is the biblical principle of the rule of law in action. “One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you” (Ex. 12:49).⁸

A Christian is under God’s Biblical laws as a resident of the kingdom of God in history. God’s law is supposed to be enforced by family government, church government, and civil government. Above all, it is to be enforced by self-government. But a Christian is not under God’s law and its sanctions as a member of the kingdom of God in eternity. His dual citizenship (Phil. 3:20)⁹ is reflected in two different ways with respect to God’s law. A Christian is under God’s law in history, for he is under the threat of its negative sanctions. He is not under this threat in eternity, for Christ has suffered its negative sanctions on his behalf. This fact does not deny the eternity of God’s law. For covenant-keep-

8. North, Authority and Dominion, Part 2, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 14.

9. “For our conversation [citizenship] is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ” (Phil 3:20).

ers, the power of sin is gone. For covenant-breakers, the power to sin is gone. The law's sanctions, like the law itself, are eternal: exclusively positive for covenant-keepers; exclusively negative for covenant-breakers.

2. Law and Sanctions

Here is a fundamental principle of law: Where there are no sanctions, there is no law. In eternity, the negative sanctions of God's biblical law will not apply to covenant-keepers, for they have been applied to Christ on their behalf already. The sanctions will be applied to covenant-breakers, who were not beneficiaries of God's saving grace in history. In history, however, both the threat and the promise of the imposition of the positive and negative covenantal sanctions of God's biblical law apply to everyone, which is why there is a valid trio of covenantal hierarchies: church, family, and state. Each covenantal agency is required by God to enforce God's Biblical sanctions on all those under its jurisdiction.

Consider this example. Christians are not authorized to commit bestiality, despite the fact that there is no New Testament recapitulation of the Mosaic laws against this practice.¹⁰ Neither is the absence of any restatement of these laws valid evidence that God now allows the practice, or that the state should not enforce the Mosaic laws against bestiality. Yet there are very few Christians today who have a raging temptation to get involved in this sin. They are lawfully under civil laws against bestiality because these civil laws are not annulled in the New Covenant, but this temptation does not affect them personally. Its power over them is nil. In this sense, they are not under these laws, because they are not tempted by them, and even if they were, God restrains their temptation. "There hath no temptation taken you but such as is common to man: but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it" (I Cor. 10:13).

I use this theonomic example because, in the year of our Lord, 2004, mass e-mailings on the Internet promoted Web sites featuring bestiality. I received regular solicitations ("spam") in my e-mail box for such commercial Web sites. But I was not tempted to visit these sites, let alone practice the evil. Not many people are tempted. This ancient evil is not familiar to most Westerners. They have not developed a taste for it. Nevertheless, this ancient evil, long underground and on the fringes of Western society, is now reappearing, and its imagery is nearly beyond the arm of the law because of the nature of the Internet: beyond local civil jurisdictions. Christian civilization had kept this practice limited for almost seventeen centuries. Now, however, Christian civilization in the West is in a downward phase. Old evils are resurfacing.

10. "And if a man lie with a beast, he shall surely be put to death: and ye shall slay the beast" (Lev. 20:15). "And if a woman approach unto any beast, and lie down thereto, thou shalt kill the woman, and the beast: they shall surely be put to death; their blood shall be upon them" (Lev. 20:16).

To argue that the phrase, “we’re under grace, not law,” means that the practice of bestiality is now lawful, either for covenant-keepers or covenant-breakers, is to deny Paul’s explicit teaching about the law in I Timothy 1:5–11. The next time you hear someone cite Romans 6:14–15 in defense of civil antinomianism, ask him: “Are you referring to the legalization of bestiality?” See what he says.¹¹ It is even more relevant in today’s world of digital communications. Those Christians who cite “we’re under grace, not law,” have given almost no thought to the implications of their position for both civil government and public debauchery.

Then they follow with Matthew 7:1: “Judge not, that ye be not judged.” Ask them: “Do you mean that Christians should not get involved in politics and must never serve on a jury? Does you mean that no Christian can lawfully be a police officer?” They have no idea. They just rattle off these phrases. They never think about what they are saying. They react automatically to the suggestion that God judges people in history by means of hierarchical governments and sanctions. They do not understand that it is never a question of “sanctions vs. no sanctions.” It is always a question of which sanctions, imposed by what agency of government. Matthew 7:1 is in fact Christ’s solemn warning to society to covenant in terms of biblical law, for there is no way to gain justice for yourself without granting it to everyone else. “For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged: and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again” (Matt. 7:2). If you want to be judged by God’s law rather than by covenant-breaking man’s law, then you must judge by God’s law. This is the biblical principle of the rule of law.

Finally, they end with a confident citation. “He that is without sin

11. I first recommended this apologetic tactic in 75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won’t Ask (Tyler, Texas: Spurgeon Press, 1986): Question 26. (<http://bit.ly/75Questions>)

among you, let him first cast a stone at her” (John 8:7). They never bother to mention the following facts: (1) this was a set-up by the Pharisees to embarrass Christ (v. 6); (2) Christ was not a civil judge; (3) the Pharisees never bothered to bring in the co-adulterer, who was male. This was their attempt to get Christ to issue a public condemnation in what was clearly a rigged accusation, in which the Pharisees were shielding the man who presumably had initiated the adulterous act. Jesus knew that they were being unjust to the woman by not also bringing the man who had seduced her. They were not applying the law to both parties equally, a violation of the biblical principle of equality before the law (Ex. 12:49).¹² They all went out of His presence. But naive antinomian Christians, who know nothing of Mosaic law and its standards of justice, blithely cite this passage. A literal interpretation would mean that no civil government is legal, for all judges are sinners. But those who cite this passage as if it meant anything other than Christ’s response to a set-up using rigged evidence honestly think they are saying something profound when they cite this passage in response to the suggestion that God’s Bible-revealed cross-boundary civil laws¹³ are still binding in the New Testament era.

Christians announce, “we’re under grace, not law.” In fact, they are under pagan courts and pagan lawyers. They know this. They much prefer pagan law and pagan courts to God’s law. They have self-consciously denied the relevance of Christ’s warning: “For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged: and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again” (Matt. 7:2). They vote for politicians who mete out pagan judicial measures. They thereby bring themselves under pagan civil law and pagan civil sanctions, all in the name of religiously neutral natural law and religiously neutral social ethics. They prefer this arrangement to the enforcement of God’s civil laws and the ideal of Christendom, which they regard as both tyrannical and immoral. They announce: “Christians can live under any civil order,” but they do not really believe this. They do not believe that Christians can or should live under an explicitly Christian civil order. They deny the possibility of such a civil order, and they dismiss as immoral or at least ill-conceived any attempt to establish such an order. On this point, they are allied with humanists.

12. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 14.

13. On cross-boundary laws, see Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), Conclusion:C.

Sin places covenant-keepers under God's law. As an example, when a man commits adultery with a "strange woman," he risks contracting a venereal disease. He remains under nature's law and its sanctions. To argue that he is not under nature's law, because he has made a profession of faith, is ridiculous. Few Christians would argue for such a position.

I argue that it is equally foolish to insist that adultery is no longer governed by biblical civil law. When a modern society refuses to impose the Mosaic civil law governing adultery, including—at the discretion of the victimized spouse—its mandated capital sanction, God's direct negative corporate sanctions will eventually be imposed on that society (Deut. 8:19–20).¹⁴ To argue that "we're under grace, not law" in defense of a social order that adopts some law-order other than the Bible's is merely to call for the substitution of other civil laws and other civil sanctions for God's civil laws and civil sanctions. This rebellion brings that society under the threat of God's directly imposed sanctions.

3. False Teachers

Throughout my commentaries, I have long referred to God's biblical law, not just "God's law." I have done my best to distinguish my exposition of theonomy from what is called natural law theory. Theonomy is explicitly opposed to the natural law tradition, which had its origin in pagan Stoic thought,¹⁵ and was imported into the church mainly by medieval scholastic theologians.

Paul is not speaking in this passage about a system of natural law or common law. He is speaking of God's biblical law, lawfully used. He contrasts God's law, lawfully used, with the false teaching of men who do not understand the law of God. These men were involved in teaching fables and long genealogies (v. 4). Who were these men? They were spiritual disciples of the Pharisees. They were trying to persuade gentiles that the latter should obey Mosaic laws that mandated religious ceremonies (Gal. 2). We know that the targets of Paul's displeasure here were Judaizers.¹⁶ Gentile priests and philosophers were not engaged in detailed genealogical studies. Genealogy was a concern of the Pharisees. Paul was at war with Judaizers, who were inside the church. They sought to bring gentiles under the Mosaic ceremonial law, meaning laws associated with the priestly status of Old Covenant national Israel. The Judaizers were not promoting some gentile view of law.

14. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 23.

15. Sheldon S. Wolin, Politics and Vision: Continuity and Innovation in Western Political Thought (Boston: Little, Brown, 1960), pp. 77–82.

16. William Hendriksen, New Testament Commentary: Exposition of the Pastoral Epistles (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, 1957), pp. 58–59.

Paul here contrasts God's law, lawfully used, with fables and genealogies. He is not contrasting the Mosaic civil law with the Mosaic ceremonial law, as he did in Galatians. He does not dismiss the Mosaic ceremonial laws as fables that produce disputes. He does not even mention Mosaic ceremonial laws in this epistle. He is contrasting God's law with forms of error that produce disputes (v. 4). He calls this idle talk, or as the King James puts it graphically, vain jangling (v. 6). What had been mandated by the Mosaic law—ceremonial laws—had by Paul's day become perverted by false teachers. Christ had repeatedly challenged false teachers from the same theological camp. Paul here continues this challenge.

What is Paul talking about? He has in mind Phariseeism, of which he had been a part (Phil. 3:5). The Pharisees had built up an enormous unwritten code of legal restrictions. This oral tradition was regarded by the Pharisees as possessing authority equal to the Mosaic law.¹⁷ They insisted that the oral tradition went back to Moses.¹⁸ Beginning in the second century, A.D., a few rabbis began to write down these oral laws. By A.D. 500, there were two enormous compilations of these legal texts (mishnah) and rabbinic commentaries (gemara): the Babylonian Talmud and the Jerusalem Talmud, which was incomplete. The former compilation became dominant in Judaism.¹⁹ It defined Judaism until the nineteenth century, when mainstream Judaism began to go theologically liberal.

17. The Sadducees rejected the oral tradition. Louis Finkelstein, The Pharisees: The Sociological Background of Their Faith, 2 vols., 3rd ed. (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1962), I, ch. XIII. After Rome's destruction of the temple in A.D. 70, they disappeared. The Encyclopedia of the Jewish Religion, ed. R. J. Zvi and Geoffrey Wigoder (New York: Holt, Rinehart, & Winston, 1965), p. 340. The Pharisees replaced them as the leaders of Judaism, which is the religion taught by the rabbis.

18. Jacob Neusner, The Pharisees: Rabbinic Perspectives (Hoboken, New Jersey: KTAV, 1973), p. 196.

19. In medieval times, a small Jewish sect known as the Karaites rejected the Talmud. Their origin is generally traced to Anan ben David in the eighth century. About 30,000 of them resided in the State of Israel in 1999. Nechemia Meyers, "Israel's 30,000 Karaites follow Bible, not Talmud," Jewish Bulletin of Northern California News (Dec. 10, 1999). (<http://bit.ly/KaraitesIsrael>)

D. Making Society Safer

This passage promotes love out of a pure heart (v. 5). Paul's list of laws under the general category of "the law" is taken from the Mosaic civil law. But how can civil law create love? It cannot do this. The purpose of civil law is not the creation of good people. Rather, civil law seeks to restrict certain evil acts of insubordinate people, i.e., criminals. God's civil law is not made for righteous people, Paul says (v. 9). This is a warning for God's people to behave righteously.

1. Redemption

In what way is civil law related to redemption? If the goal of the commandment is the creation of internal righteousness—love from a cleansed heart—then civil law is impotent. Civil law cannot change human nature. No law can. This was Paul's permanent message: salvation is by grace through faith, not by law.

Paul specifically mentions the gospel at the end of this passage (v. 11). The gospel is the good news to fallen man of the substitutionary atonement by Jesus Christ, and God's judicial imputation of Christ's perfect righteousness to sinners.

For when we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly. For scarcely for a righteous man will one die: yet peradventure for a good man some would even dare to die. But God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. Much more then, being now justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him. For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life. And not only so, but we also joy in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the atonement (Rom. 5:6–11).

The gospel is the good news of men's deliverance from the bondage of sin by God's unmerited grace through faith in Christ. "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: Not of works, lest any man should boast" (Eph. 2:8–9). This grace is designed to produce good works: "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them" (Eph. 2:10).

2. Gospel and Law

Then what is the relationship between the gospel and the Mosaic civil law? Paul says that these civil laws are not made for righteous people. This means that righteous people are not to come under the negative civil sanctions mandated by God through Moses for violations of these laws, for righteous people do not commit such acts. God's saving grace removes specific sinners from the ethical category of the unrighteous. It transforms them, so that they do not commit such acts. The Mosaic civil law is not made for them, for they have been transformed. They still commit sins (I John 1:10), but not these crimes. If they continue to commit such crimes, this is evidence that testifies against their judicial status as covenant-keepers.

If they previously had committed these crimes, and were lawfully convicted for having committed them, they are still lawfully classified by society as criminals. They are still under the civil sanctions. But this does not change the fact that these laws were not made for them. The laws were made for what they had been: criminals.

If they committed any these crimes, but they have not been convicted, they still owe restitution to God and to any victims. Furthermore, if someone perjured himself, and, as a result, some innocent person was convicted or at least placed at risk of conviction, the gospel does not relieve the former criminal from confessing his crime and making restitution to the victim. But these laws were not made for the redeemed person he has become.

Paul's exposition of the law prepares Timothy for Paul's confession that he had been the chief of sinners (vv. 12–16). Jesus subsequently showed grace to Paul. This made Paul an example of God's grace (v. 16). Others may profit from this example. Paul uses this as an example of deliverance. What he had been, he no longer is. What he had done, he no longer does. What had condemned him, no longer condemns him. The Mosaic law that had been made for him is no longer made for him. He has participated in the transition from wrath to grace, which is the story of the Bible from Genesis 3 to Revelation 20.

The Mosaic civil law was not designed to transform men's nature. It was made to reduce evil. It infringed on the actions of evil-doers retroactively, imposing negative sanctions on them, or forcing them to make restitution to their victims. The law's presence in society was designed to put the fear of God into them and others like them. "And all the people shall hear, and fear, and do no more presumptuously"

(Deut. 17:13). The law in this sense was made for the Israelites. Paul does not so much as hint that the result of the Mosaic civil law—fear of committing crimes—is undesirable today. On the contrary, he says that the law is good (v. 8).

Critics of certain civil laws—very often laws associated with violations of sexual boundaries—insist that civil laws cannot make men good. “You can’t change human nature!” (It is worth noting that those people who argue this way also tend to be favorable to civil laws that interfere with an owner’s use of his property.)²⁰ Theirs is a spurious argument. Civil law is not intended to change human nature, which it cannot do. Civil law is intended to make people safer by restricting specified public evils. By increasing the criminal’s risk of coming under negative civil sanctions, civil law reduces the supply of crime by raising its cost. This is a law of economics: when the production cost of something rises, less of it is supplied. Civil law is designed to increase peace and safety by reducing the level of rebellion against God, which manifests itself as rebellion against righteous people and law-abiding sinners. The goal of civil law is increased peace and tranquility for society, a goal that Paul refers to in the next section (I Tim. 2:1–2).²¹ The civil law’s goal is not the transformation of human nature. Civil law does not make righteous men out of unrighteous men. It makes unrighteous men behave more like righteous men. There is a difference: the difference between the doctrine of salvation by law and the doctrine of salvation by grace.

Paul’s language allows for the possibility that he was using a rhetorical technique with his statement that the law is not made for the righteous person. Was he trying to persuade his readers that all men are unrighteous? Jesus had used a similar technique when He told the Jewish leaders that sick people, not healthy people, are in need of a physician (Luke 5:31). He was subtly warning them that they were morally sick. He said that He had come to call sinners to repentance, not the righteous (v. 32). Was Paul also using the terms “righteous” and “sinners” in this way? Was he implying that all men are sinners, so therefore they all need the restraints of these specific civil laws? Was he being rhetorical when he wrote that the law was not made for the righteous?

I do not believe that this was Paul’s line of reasoning in this pas-

20. This is not true of libertarians, who oppose civil laws against sexual acts and the free exercise of property.

21. Chapter 2.

sage. He was writing to Timothy. He was not confronting the Judaizers directly, unlike Jesus, who had publicly confronted the Jewish leaders. When Paul writes that these laws are made for the unrighteous, he means criminals, not sinners in general. He has in mind the Mosaic law in its capacity as a source of social peace.

E. Kidnapping, War, and Slavery

In verse 10, Paul identifies kidnappers as evil-doers. The Greek word is translated as “menstealers.” This Greek word appears only in this verse. It is a combination of two Greek words meaning “men” and “feet.” The literal meaning is a man who places others at his feet. Strong’s Concordance translates it as “enslaver.” This verse is the key New Testament passage relating to the immorality of one aspect of slavery—specifically, the forcible kidnapping of slaves by private individuals. Later in this epistle, Paul raises the issue of slavery.²² Paul’s discussions of slavery must be understood in light of this verse.

The practice of stealing men to make them into forced servants of others is evil. It is a form of kidnapping. This was a civil crime in the Mosaic law. “And he that stealeth a man, and selleth him, or if he be found in his hand, he shall surely be put to death” (Ex. 21:16).²³ Kidnapping remains a civil crime, according to Paul in this passage.

1. Harvesting Slaves

The Mosaic Covenant did not allow Israel’s conquest of foreign nations to become a means of stealing men for the purpose of harvesting slaves. When Israel made war with a city outside of Canaan (Deut. 20:15), and the city surrendered, its inhabitants became tributaries, i.e., taxpayers (Deut. 20:11).²⁴ If the besieged city refused to surrender, all of the males, young and old, had to be executed when it fell (v. 13). Only the females were to be spared (v. 14). This mandated that the females be brought back to Israel, in order to keep them from either starving or falling prey to another city’s warriors. Women could be made to serve as slaves as part of a military conquest. This was a form of mercy. They were not to be executed or left behind as defenseless widows or orphans. But the males were not to be enslaved and brought back to Israel, filling the land with covenant-breakers seeking revenge.

22. Chapter 8, below.

23. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 34.

24. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 48.

Paul's epistle was not written to the Jews. It did not assume that the gentiles had such a civil law as this one governing Israel's military conquests. In fact, it assumed the opposite. Israel was allowed to import slaves from foreign nations (Lev. 25:44–46).²⁵ These slaves had not been conquered by Israel. They would not regard Israel as the original cause of their enslavement. They had been the victims of another army.

Paul's condemnation here applies to the deliberate harvesting of slaves as a profession. By the first century A.D., the slave trade was centuries old and widespread in both Greece and Rome. Rome had long used its military conquests to harvest slaves, who were then sold to the slave traders who followed Rome's armies.²⁶ Paul does not here condemn this means of financing wars, even though the Mosaic law outlawed the practice for Israel. He condemns profit-seeking thieves who use coercion to steal individuals, as distinguished from armies that conquer cities, but spare the lives of those who are then sold into slavery. The former practice is an activity of private citizens. By the Mosaic law's standards, this was a capital crime.

Paul's identification of kidnapping as a sin is an extension of the Mosaic case law against kidnapping. What changed with the New Testament were the Mosaic laws of warfare. The Mosaic laws of warfare were applications of the Mosaic land laws. Israel was not to bring into its territories large numbers of slaves from a single nation. There was always the threat of a revenge-based uprising. By restricting the importation of male slaves who were the victims of other nations' armies, and by importing slaves from a multitude of nations, Israel was to reduce the threat of internal rebellion. The nation was not to use slave harvesting as a way to finance an empire.

Israel was required to execute all the males of a defeated city whose rulers had refused to surrender. This law did not extend into the New Covenant. First, it was a land law that was tied to Israel as holy ground. Second, the spread of the gospel is no longer dependent on one nation's missionary efforts, as had been the case under the Mosaic Covenant. Covenant-keepers in the New Testament reside in many lands. They represent many ecclesiastical and national traditions. To execute all of the male residents of a city whose rulers had failed to surrender would be to undermine the work of evangelism.

25. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 31.

26. Milton Meltzer, Slavery: A World History, 2 vols. (n.p.: Da Capo, 1993), I, p. 110.

The church has never called upon civil magistrates to adopt this Mosaic law. On the contrary, the church through the centuries has steadily adopted a view of warfare that exempts civilians and non-combatants from deliberate military sanctions, either during the war or after. The twentieth century saw a reversal of this view of warfare, but that bloody century was a humanist-dominated era.

The vast supplies of slaves that had been the result of foreign nations' non-enforcement of the Mosaic law of post-war extermination ended when Rome ceased to conquer territory. By the time that Christian emperors ascended to the throne, the Roman Empire was in its contraction phase. Steadily, Christianity adopted a new view of warfare: warriors vs. warriors. While a small supply of slaves from defeated tribes or cities did trickle into Europe during the Middle Ages, this was nowhere close to the scale of either Roman enslavement²⁷ or the enslavement of Africans that began in the year 1444.²⁸ The slave trade became a minor aspect of the medieval European economy, for foreign trade became minimal.

2. African Slavery

When the economy changed in the West, the two means of obtaining large numbers of slaves were kidnapping from Africa and breeding slaves domestically. The former practice is illegal in terms of biblical law, and the latter practice has involved the destruction of marriage and the family among the slaves.²⁹ Western slavery after 1444 always rested on the denial of biblical law. It was a system based on legalized kidnapping. The West's slave system after the discovery of the Atlantic sugar islands in the late fifteenth century brought mass slavery back to the West for the first time since the fourth century. Slavery became predominantly African slavery. The supplies of West African slaves were increased by coastal tribes that made war on interior tribes as part of harvesting operations. This was deliberate kidnapping by the state. The coastal tribes did not seek to occupy a foreign tribe's land as a means of extending the dominion of the coastal tribe. West African warfare became primarily an economic operation: slave harvesting. The West's slave traders were in an alliance with professional kidnappers. They were accomplices. The British Navy put an end to this alliance in the nineteenth century.

27. Meltzer, Slavery, I, chaps. 14, 15.

28. Hugh Thomas, The Slave Trade: The Story of the Atlantic Slave Trade, 1440–1870 (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1997), p. 21.

29. See Appendix D:E.

The only theological basis for justifying a New Testament extension of the slave system of Mosaic Israel would be (1) the abandonment of the medieval concept of limited warfare, and (2) the re-establishment of the lawful enslavement of defeated civilian populations. Mosaic Israel imported slaves from abroad—slaves that were either the captives of war or the heirs of such captives (Lev. 25:44–46). It was illegal to import the victims of kidnapping. The Mosaic law against kidnapping was not a land law, which is why Paul cited it in verse 10.

Paul's identification of kidnapping as sinful unto damnation was important in the development of the abolitionist movement in the United States. This influence began with the ecclesiastical trial of Rev. George Bourne. This was a landmark case in American Protestantism prior to the Civil War (1861–65). In 1815, Bourne, a Presbyterian minister in Harrisonburg, Virginia, presented an overture to the General Assembly to condemn slavery as anti-Christian. He based his condemnation primarily on I Timothy 1:10: manstealing. He was de-frocked for this by his Presbytery when he returned from General Assembly. He appealed his case to the General Assembly the next year. Officially, the General Assembly had adopted I Timothy 1:10 in a condemnation of slavery in 1806, but this had not been ratified by the presbyteries. The General Assembly then retroactively eliminated this section from its rules, leaving Bourne with only the Bible to appeal to. His de-frocking was ratified by the General Assembly in 1818.³⁰ The Northern Presbyterian Church refused to condemn slavery until after the Civil War began. The Southern Presbyterian Church, which split from the Northern Church in 1861 when the war broke out, did not condemn slavery until after the South's defeat.³¹ Bourne's ideas were picked up by the abolitionist William Lloyd Garrison in the 1830s, although Garrison never acknowledged the source.³² In this way, Bourne's anti-slavery crusade was brought into national politics. I Timothy 1:10 was officially the basis of this original ecclesiastical protest.

30. For an introduction to Rev. Bourne and his work, see John W. Christie and Dwight L. Dumond, George Bourne and The Book and Slavery Irreconcilable (Historical Society of Delaware and the Presbyterian History Society, 1969)

31. Gary North, Crossed Fingers: How the Liberals Captured the Presbyterian Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1996), ch. 2.

32. Christie and Dumond, George Bourne, pp. 78–80; ch. 6.

Conclusion

Paul in this passage defends the civil law of God. He cites specific Mosaic civil laws as examples of the law when it is being used lawfully. He challenges would-be teachers of the law who confuse the legal issue by offering fables and by arguing about genealogies. He identifies the Mosaic civil law as an aspect of the gospel (v. 11). No passage in the New Testament is more forthrightly theonomic.

Paul's concern in this passage is the presence of false teachers. He tells Timothy to stay in Ephesus and confront these false teachers. They were false teachers, not because they taught that the Mosaic civil law should still be enforced by gentile magistrates in the New Covenant era, but because they taught fables and detailed genealogies. Paul is identifying Judaizers, not gentile antinomians or gentile theonomists, as the false teachers in Ephesus.

Paul is not speaking of some theory of natural law, supposedly recognized as binding by all rational legal theorists, when he says that the law is good when it is used lawfully. The false teachers were not coming before the church at Ephesus in the name of Stoic natural law theory. The Stoics were not interested in genealogy. The Judaizers were interested in genealogy, for they were allies of the Pharisees. They were coming into a gentile church in the name of Moses. Paul asks Timothy to tell them to stop teaching their version of Pharisaic legalism. He calls on Timothy to continue the war that Paul had launched against them (v. 18).

The law (v. 8) refers to Mosaic civil laws (vv. 9–10). Paul's commandment to Timothy includes teaching the Mosaic civil law because civil law is inescapably a part of Christ's comprehensive kingdom of God in history. Civil law is a means of reducing crime and increasing safety and tranquility. It reduces the costs of dominion.

In my commentary on Leviticus, I distinguish among four judicial categories within the Mosaic civil law: laws governing land, laws governing seeds, which were both an aspect of Jacob's prophecy regarding Shiloh (Gen. 49:10), i.e., laws governing the separation of the tribes, which were annulled no later than A.D. 70 with the fall of Jerusalem;³³ laws governing Israel as a separate nation of priests,³⁴ which were annulled when there was a change in the priesthood (Heb. 7); and cross-boundary laws that applied to gentile nations such as Nineveh.³⁵ Only the cross-boundary laws are still in force.

33. North, Boundaries and Dominion, Conclusion:C:1.

34. Ibid., Conclusion:C:2.

The laws listed by Paul in this passage are cross-boundary laws. They are permanent stipulations of God's civil covenantal order. Not only did Paul never announce their annulment, he insists in this passage that they are aspects of God's law, lawfully used. By affirming their continuing validity, Paul implicitly asserts the continuing New Covenant validity of the concept of the civil covenant.

It is only by an oath that is publicly ratified under the Trinitarian God of the Bible that men can fully honor God in the realm of history: in church, family, and state. A state without an oath that is taken by every citizen under the Trinitarian God of the Bible is lawful, just as a family established without a similar oath under God is lawful, but neither institution is faithful to God. Common grace exists in both civil government and family government, but special grace is always preferable to common grace. Families and civil governments must be transformed by the gospel by way of God's gracious transformation of human nature. The evidence of a widespread transformation of human nature will be the proliferation of both family and civil covenants that are publicly ratified by oath under the Trinitarian God of the Bible. This is what it means to baptize the nations (Matt. 28:19).³⁶ Working toward this outcome is what the Great Commission requires of Christians.³⁷ Comprehensive Trinitarian covenant ratification—personal, ecclesiastical, familial, and civil—will be the social and political result of what Paul calls “the commandment.”

35. Ibid., Conclusion:C:3.

36. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 48.

37. Kenneth L. Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/GentryGGC>)

2

INTERCESSORY PRAYER AND ECCLESIASTICAL PEACE

I exhort therefore, that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men; For kings, and for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty (I Tim. 2:1–2).

The theocentric focus of this passage is the power of God, who structures history for the benefit of His church. It is a call to intercessory prayer, meaning a call to honor God’s vertical hierarchy. God’s church is placed above civil magistrates in this hierarchy of intercession. By speaking on behalf of all men, including civil magistrates, the church brings peace for itself and its members. The church is therefore a representative: point two of the biblical covenant.¹

A. The Power of Prayer

1. Invoking God’s Power

It is common to speak of the power of prayer. What most people mean by this phrase is the power of God to answer specific prayers. Prayer is the means of invoking God’s power in history. The person offering the prayer calls on God to intervene in history and direct events so that the desire of the prayer-offerer is fulfilled. He believes that God can and does exercise power over creation. The creation is governed by a supernatural hierarchy.

Paul here exhorts the church to pray for all men. The meaning of the word translated as “exhort” is closer to “plead.” It is often translated as “beseech.” Paul is not casually recommending something; he is pleading with his listeners and readers to perform a duty. Such prayer is not to be an afterthought. Prayer along these lines is not to be a peripheral activity. It is important for the corporate life of the church.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

Prayer takes time, forethought, and self-discipline. It may take a self-conscious overcoming of personal revulsion in the case of praying for a ruler who is a persecutor or debauched. This is not a spiritual discipline familiar to uncommitted Christians. Paul says that a specific result should be expected from this form of prayer: the peace of the church. This is a high-level goal. Paul implies that without prayer, this goal is less likely to be attained.

This passage proclaims a cause-and-effect relationship between prayer and external corporate peace. Paul is not speaking here of individual psychological contentment. He says that the church can attain tolerance through intercessory prayer. Because of prayers offered on behalf of all men, including men placed in authority over society, the church will be left in peace.

2. God’s Absolute Sovereignty

This cause-and-effect relationship would not exist, were it not for the ability and willingness of God to ordain external events so that His church can be left in peace. A man is supposed to pray to God on the assumption that God is sovereign over the affairs of men. If God were not in a position to answer such prayers, the prayers would have no power independent of the intercessor’s actions. Paul’s exhortation implies that the world is personal cosmically.² Society is under God’s authority. If this were not the case, then these prayers would be powerless. Their effects would be either random or negative.

God is at the top of the cosmic hierarchy that is implied by this passage. A God who controls the affairs of men is not some minor deity. He tells His people to call on Him to bring peace to the church. In some fundamental way, God wants His people to acknowledge that He possesses sovereign power. His people are to acknowledge formally through their prayers that God, not man, is in charge.

3. Representation and Hierarchy

Paul uses three nouns: supplications, prayers, and intercessions.

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1.

All three can be translated as “prayer.” The Greek word here translated as “intercessions” is elsewhere translated as “prayer.” “For it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer” (I Tim. 4:5). The meaning of “supplication” here is close to “petition.” In this case, it is a petition on behalf of others, yet indirectly for the peace of the church. An intercession is a prayer on behalf of others. The person praying is interceding. He is an agent for the one being prayed for.

This prayer is not selfless. It seeks a benefit for the intercessor: the peace of the church. The means to this end is prayer on behalf of all men. This seems to be an exclusively positive sanction, but it is not. This prayer can produce either a blessing or a curse on the person being prayed for. Paul wrote to the church at Rome:

Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord. Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good (Romans 12:19–21).

The ruler is judicially above the person offering the prayer, yet the latter is in a position cosmically superior to the ruler. He can call authoritatively on the Ruler of the universe. The civil hierarchy is under the cosmic hierarchy. A covenant-keeper who is a subordinate to the civil ruler is in a position to benefit the civil ruler through the hierarchy of prayer.

This indicates that there are multiple hierarchies operating in God’s kingdom. Power in hierarchies is invoked by words. God spoke the world into existence (Gen. 1). A civil ruler speaks, and his will is carried out because he possesses power. Ultimately, a ruler has the power to impose sanctions, both positive and negative. These sanctions are invoked by words, but they are not limited in their effects to words.

The Christian offers petitions to God on behalf of men, and his words produce positive results. The essence of faith in prayer is the confidence that covenant-keepers legitimately possess, through the authority of their words, the ability to alter their environment. This was the confession of the Roman centurion to Christ.

And when Jesus was entered into Capernaum, there came unto him a centurion, beseeching him, And saying, Lord, my servant lieth at home sick of the palsy, grievously tormented. And Jesus saith unto him, I will come and heal him. The centurion answered and said, Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldest come under my roof: but speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed. For I am a man under authority, having soldiers under me: and I say to this man, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it. When Jesus heard it, he marvelled, and said to them that followed, Verily I say unto you, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel (Matt. 8:5–10).

4. The Centurion's Confession

The centurion understood that Christ possessed authority because Christ was uniquely under God's authority. Just as the centurion could command men and would be obeyed because he was under a civil authority that possessed great power, so Christ could command nature because He was under an authority who possessed power over nature. Jesus' response to the centurion's comparison was to say that He had not heard so great a confession of faith in Israel.

The centurion's confession identified Christ as being under God and over nature. Despite his official power under Rome's civil authority—the civil hierarchy—the centurion fully understood that he was not sufficiently worthy to have Christ under his roof. This was his personal reason for not inviting Christ to come to his home to cure his servant. He verbally subordinated himself to Christ, and then asked Christ to heal his servant. He thereby publicly acknowledged that he needed an intercessor with God on behalf of his servant if his servant was to be healed. To gain dominion over his servant's illness, he subordinated himself publicly to Christ.

The centurion had a second reason for not inviting Christ into his home: it was not necessary for Christ to be present in his home in order for Him to heal the servant. Christ's authority was not limited by geography, any more than the centurion's rule required that he be present for his orders to be obeyed. The mark of great authority is independence from geographical constraints.

This was a confession of the existence of the same two hierarchies that are implied by Paul's instruction to Timothy. The civil ruler who exercises authority over the church is in fact under the church's authority because of his subordination to the God who controls events. The centurion understood this and confessed it. Because of this, Christ healed his servant. The centurion achieved his goal by confessing the existence of the two hierarchies, civil and cosmic. He identified his own authority as being inferior to Christ's. He was confessing Christ over Caesar. This is what made his confession of faith unique during Jesus' ministry.

The evidence of power is the degree of consistency between what is requested and what results. The centurion's confession of Christ's authority under God and over nature rested on the analogy of his own authority. "For I am a man under authority, having soldiers under me: and I say to this man, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it." He spoke, and his words were obeyed by his subordinates. So also could Jesus speak, he confessed, and His words would be obeyed. This is a statement regarding cause and effect: words produce otherwise unpredictable results, but they do so only because of personal hierarchy. Men's words possess no autonomous power. God's words do (Gen. 1). The centurion understood that Christ could speak a word and heal his servant: ". . . say in a word, and my servant shall be healed" (Luke 7:7). It is not clear whether he believed that Christ is God, who could therefore speak a healing word directly, or else that He was so completely under God's authority that God would bring to pass whatever Christ spoke. Because of Christ's nature is both divine and human—two natures in one person—we cannot be certain about this, either. It is not clear whether Christ's power over nature was direct during His earthly ministry, as the creator God (Col. 1:15–17), or intercessory, as the perfect human and only begotten son of God.

Paul's exhortation has meaning only in terms of the predictability of cause and effect. The church's prayers on behalf of all men, including rulers, would produce peace for the church. There is power in prayer because there is hierarchy in the creation. God is over the creation, so that words directed to Him by His people on behalf of others will produce a predictable result: peace for the church. The power of prayer testifies to the power of God in history and to the authority of His covenant with His church.

B. The Goal of Peace

In English, there is a phrase, "peace and quiet." Paul here identifies quiet and peace as dual goals for the church. He does not explain why these two goals are desirable. He does not have to. In this sense, peace and quiet are aspects of common grace. All men understand the advantages of peace and quiet. Paul does not present a logical case for the value of the benefit of peace. He assumes that anyone who reads this passage will understand the benefit.

1. Persecution and Peace

It is a commonplace observation that the church has flourished under persecution. This was surely the case during the Roman Empire. But persecution during that long period was intermittent. Times of systematic persecution were followed by times of relative peace, when Roman rulers ignored the church. In modern times, Communist rulers in China persecuted Christians for over two decades, from their ascension to power in 1949 through the Red Guard era of the late 1960s. The number of Protestants in China in 1949 when the Communists took over the mainland has been estimated to have been as few as 750,000. During the persecution years of the Cultural Revolution (1966–76), churches disappeared from public view. Today, everything has changed. Estimates of membership range from an official government estimate of 25 million to unofficial estimates of 130 million.³

Persecution under Islam, however, has not resulted in similar growth. The church in North Africa was completely destroyed in the seventh century by Arab armies. The Armenian church has suffered from repeated persecutions at the hands of the Turks over several centuries, culminating in the genocide of 1915–16. The Armenian church has survived, but it would not be accurate to say that it has flourished.

A legitimate goal for the church is peace. This is what all men seek for themselves, and Paul declares that the means to this legitimate goal is prayer on behalf of all men, including rulers. The peace that is attained through prayer on behalf of people who are outside the church is not a peace associated with spiritual lethargy. It is also not a peace established through the benevolence of covenant-breakers. It is an active peace sought through active prayer. It is an otherwise unexplainable peace, a peace that publicly confirms God's covenant with covenant-keepers. It also confirms the power of God to establish peace by His own authority.

The peace that Paul discusses here is the peace established through active prayer on behalf of God's covenantal enemies. The means of peace for a hated minority that would not conform to imperial Rome's liturgically mandatory pluralism of gods was intercessory prayer. Paul tells Timothy that he is to seek peace for the church by prayers for God's enemies offered on behalf of persecutors and potential persecutors.

3. "Sons of Heaven," The Economist (Oct. 2, 2008). (<http://bit.ly/SonsOfHeaven>)

Paul's exhortation was necessary because prayer, especially public prayer, for men in general and for pagan rulers specifically is not an intuitive discipline. The benefits, peace and quiet, are universally desired, but the cause-and-effect relationship between intercessory prayer and peace and quiet is also not intuitive.

2. Pluralism's Counterfeit Peace

There is another kind of peace: the peace of unconcern. This is the kind of peace that is sought by defenders of political pluralism: the civil equality of all religions. Access to citizenship is officially opened to members of every religious faith. The civil oath is designed to be neutral theologically. In fact, a legally enforceable theological confession is outlawed as a screening device for the exercise of civil authority.⁴

Political pluralism is not taught in the Bible. There has yet to be an exegetical defense of a theory of political pluralism in terms of the Bible. Paul is not calling for a peace based on the official irrelevance of the God of the Bible for the civil realm.

Peace is also not based on the presumption of a legal order that is neutral toward God. In the previous section of this epistle, Paul identified several Mosaic civil laws as marks of a sound confession (1:9–10).⁵ God's law is designed to punish the violators of such statutes, he said. This is what it means to use the law lawfully (1:8).

Legitimate peace results from the establishment of a kingdom of saints, that is, a society whose civil covenant is based on a Trinitarian confession. The civil persecution of the church by the state should stop. But peace was not the experience of the West under Christian rule. Ecclesiastical leaders sought more than a Trinitarian confession for citizenship and peace. They regarded the theological grammar of the Athanasian creed as insufficient for citizenship and peace. They demanded the civil enforcement of Trinitarian dialects. This led to ecclesiococracy under Roman Catholicism and national civil wars under Protestantism: in Germany (1618–48) and Great Britain (1642–49). Political pluralism was the solution offered by Christians and unitarians in their quest for peace in nations torn asunder by warring sects of Trinitarians. By 1660, the civil wars of northern Europe had persuaded a small minority of intellectuals that there cannot be civil peace in a political world of religious test oaths for citizenship. This theory was initially voiced publicly in 1642 by Roger Williams, the leader of the tiny North American colony of Rhode Island, who was also a defender of autonomous local church congregations. The only legitimate multi-layered covenantal hierarchy is civil, Williams taught, and it must not be tied to any reference to God.

4. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), Part 3. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

5. Chapter 1.

In 1788, the United States became the first Christian society to establish a national civil covenant devoid of theological confession. Article VI, Section 3 of the United States Constitution banned religious test oaths for holding national office.⁶ Williams' Rhode Island colony had set the pattern.

One result in the United States by 1973 was the creation of a civil order in which the slaying of unborn children was legalized by the highest court in the land. This decision was implicitly ratified by tens of millions of voters, whose elected representatives have the authority to amend the Constitution, but have chosen not to, out of fear of political reprisals. A majority of the voters prefer the legalization of abortion on demand. There is no neutrality possible between life and death. Humanists and pietistic Christians have chosen to accept the legalization of the death of the judicially innocent, in the name of maternal sovereignty. Preceding this legal development by about a decade and then paralleling it, the execution of convicted murderers almost disappeared, despite Genesis 9:6, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made he man." The murder rate has risen. When the cost of committing a crime is reduced by law, more of this crime is supplied. Men cry peace, peace, but there is no peace (Jer. 6:14; 8:11). There is no peace for the unwanted unborn in the United States. There is also no peace for the families of the victims of murderers.

Under such judicial conditions, covenant-keepers can and should expect the visible corporate judgment of God. Jeremiah told the Israelites, "And they built the high places of Baal, which are in the valley of the son of Hinnom, to cause their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire unto Molech; which I commanded them not, neither came it into my mind, that they should do this abomination, to cause Judah to sin” (Jer. 32:35). The result was the Babylonian captivity. The Israelites abandoned that hideous practice after their return to Israel. They had been slow learners. God had imposed negative corporate sanctions as a tool of education. He applied similar judicial sanctions on the American South in 1861–65 for a sin far less horrendous than the legalization of abortion.⁷

6. This was important for non-Christians who wanted to serve in the United States Senate. Most of the states in 1787 retained Trinitarian test oaths for holders of any state office. State legislatures elected Senate members until the Constitution was amended in 1913. Senators came from the ranks of state legislatures. Apart from Article VI, Section 3, a non-Christian politician could not be elected to the Senate because he could not be elected by a state.

C. The Price of Peace

Intercessory prayer is both active and time-consuming. It takes systematic self-discipline to achieve it. It also takes faith that God’s universe is covenantal. Such prayer is not a zero-cost good. It is exceedingly scarce. This is the economist’s way of describing short supply at the price offered by the buyers. It is not that the value of peace is low; rather, it is that the recipients of the offer—Christians—neither recognize nor believe in this relationship between the price of such prayer and the supply of peace. They do not believe that the benefits offered by God—peace and quiet—will predictably be paid by God. They also do not perceive the difficulty of achieving the personal habit of sustained prayer on behalf of covenant-breakers. So, the cost is higher than they perceive. They do not perceive the fixed relationship between the expenditure and the promised benefit. They cease to make the necessary investment before the benefit is delivered. This is a common temptation. It should be avoided. “And Jesus said unto him, No man, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God” (Luke 9:62).⁸

Some formal church liturgies include regular prayers for rulers. These tend to be high-church liturgies. Very few people ever pray them publicly. It is likely that even fewer pray such prayers in private. I have come across no liturgy that includes prayers for men in general in the context of the quest for peace.

Eschatology is another factor contributing to the absence of prayers on behalf of all men. Only postmillennialism teaches that the vast majority of mankind will at some point in time confess Christ and be baptized in His name. Men do not spend time praying for what they have been told is an impossibility eschatologically. They conserve their time and emotional commitment by praying for things that they believe are possible. They avoid praying for that which they believe is eschatologically prohibited.

7. Appendix D.

8. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 20.

This does not mean that amillennialism and premillennialism prohibit prayers that invoke God's common grace, e.g., prayers that promote all men's greater conformity to the work of the law written in their hearts (Rom. 2:14–15).⁹ But this aspect of God's common grace is rarely discussed from the pulpit or in volumes on systematic theology, which in turn are rarely read by laymen or even pastors. In general, the doctrine of common grace is not well understood, even in Calvinist circles that have a formal tradition of incorporating the doctrine into their systematic theologies.

Later in this epistle, Paul presents another important doctrine of common grace: the doctrine of the non-regenerative salvation of sinners, i.e., their healing in history, though not necessarily in eternity.¹⁰ "For therefore we both labour and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, specially of those that believe" (I Tim. 4:10).¹¹ Pastors rarely preach on this verse. They do not know what to do with it. Paul did. He instructed the church to pray on behalf of all men.

D. Giving Thanks for All Mankind

"I exhort therefore, that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men." Here is an unexpected requirement for effective prayer. Christians are to give thanks for all men, including covenant-breaking rulers. Why?

First, giving thanks for all men has something to do with general thanksgiving. Elsewhere, Paul wrote: "See that none render evil for evil unto any man; but ever follow that which is good, both among yourselves, and to all men. Rejoice evermore. Pray without ceasing. In every thing give thanks: for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you" (I Thes. 5:15–18). History is the outworking of the providence of God. As such, all aspects of the creation deserve thanks, for

9. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012)), ch. 3.

10. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

11. Chapter 6.

God's glory is the goal of all things.

Second, other people are part of God's general dominion covenant with Adam (Gen. 1:26–28),¹² which was reconfirmed with Noah (Gen. 9:1–2).¹³ Men are required by God to subdue the earth. God's delegation of authority and its accompanying responsibility has not been revoked. This is not widely understood by Christians. They do not see the Great Commission (Matt. 28:18–20) as an aspect of the call to subdue the earth, yet this is what it is.¹⁴

The division of labor is inescapable for the subduing of the earth. Men's talents vary ("labor").¹⁵ So do their environments, meaning their original resources ("land").¹⁶ Cooperation is necessary for maximizing men's productivity.

There is one alone, and there is not a second; yea, he hath neither child nor brother: yet is there no end of all his labour; neither is his eye satisfied with riches; neither saith he, For whom do I labour, and bereave my soul of good? This is also vanity, yea, it is a sore travail. Two are better than one; because they have a good reward for their labour. For if they fall, the one will lift up his fellow: but woe to him that is alone when he falleth; for he hath not another to help him up (Eccl. 4:8–10).

This cooperation extends from the family to the entire world. The division of labor is international. This is the basis of world trade. It began with the formation and scattering of the nations after the tower of Babel (Gen. 11).¹⁷

Conclusion

Covenantal social peace does not come automatically. It comes in response to systematic covenant-keeping. One aspect of this mandatory covenant-keeping is the frequent performance of this type of pray-

12. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, chaps. 3, 4.

13. Ibid., ch. 18.

14. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/GentryGGC>) Cf. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 48.

15. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 8; cf. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 15.

16. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 19.

17. Idem.

er. This prayer is the designated means for the establishment of peace, especially in times and regions where Christians are in the minority and are perceived as a threat to the existing political order because they call men to allegiance to a different Sovereign.

Western Christians have adopted political pluralism in an attempt to avoid the accusation of being a threat to the established pagan order, both social and political, but this does not achieve their goal for long. Covenant-breakers recognize their confessional enemies, and therefore seek to restrict their influence. Imperial Rome's polytheistic pluralists recognized the threat of Christianity to the sacred order of Rome.¹⁸ Despite the protests of early Christian theologians, and despite their accurate observation that the Christians were the most obedient and productive members of the Empire, the Caesars knew better. They knew that Christians did not and could not in good conscience make the confession of Christ's accusers: "We have no king but Caesar" (John 19:15). It was a confessional war to the death. Christians won it.

Christians were subordinate to Rome's civil government in everything but their confession of faith. But it was their rival confession regarding the authority of God that led to Rome's war against them and Christendom's eventual replacement of classical paganism for a thousand years.

This incomparable victory of Christian confession over pagan confession appalled Renaissance humanists, who dismissed Christian civilization as "the Dark Ages." They called their era a renaissance, i.e., a re-birth: a re-birth of classical paganism. Christianity's confessional victory over Imperial Rome has also embarrassed humanist-influenced Protestant intellectuals, who dismiss the ideal of Christendom as "Constantinianism." They agree entirely with Renaissance humanists on this point: the illegitimacy of the ideal of Christendom. They teach that Trinitarian confession is illegitimate for the civil covenant. They say that the civil covenant must somehow be made neutral regarding all supernatural religion. The problem with this position is easy to state: there is no neutrality. "He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth abroad" (Matt. 12:30). There is always a god of the civil covenant. The god of every society is its source of law.¹⁹ The question is: Which god?

18. R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1971] 2007), ch. 5.

19. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig

3

MONOGAMY AND SOCIAL ORDER

This is a true saying. If a man desire the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work. A bishop then must be blameless, the husband of one wife, vigilant, sober, of good behaviour, given to hospitality, apt to teach (1 Tim. 3:1–2).

The theocentric principle that undergirds the law mandating monogamous church officers is the love of Christ for His church (Eph. 5:25–33). Christ is not a bigamist. He has only one bride: the church. There is only one marriage supper of the lamb (Rev. 19:7–9).

This section of the epistle is an aspect of hierarchy: the screening of ecclesiastical officers. This is an aspect of vertical hierarchy: point two of the biblical covenant.¹

A. God's Lawful Divorce of Old Covenant Israel

The following background material is necessary to understand Paul's requirement that a candidate for bishop must be the husband of one wife.

The Old Testament presents Israel as a faithless nation. Even before Israel conquered Canaan, God had warned the nation against future corporate apostasy. The Mosaic Covenant repeatedly used the imagery of a harlot or an adulteress to describe false worship. "Lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land, and they go a whoring after their gods, and do sacrifice unto their gods, and one call thee, and thou eat of his sacrifice; And thou take of their daughters unto thy sons, and their daughters go a whoring after their gods, and make thy Press, 1973), p. 4.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

sons go a whoring after their gods" (Ex. 34:15–16). "And they shall no more offer their sacrifices unto devils, after whom they have gone a whoring. This shall be a statute for ever unto them throughout their generations" (Lev. 17:7).

Prior to the exile, Israel repeatedly worshipped other gods. By doing this, the nation became adulterous. These other gods were local and plural. Israel therefore became polygamous when she became polytheistic. Such spiritual polygamy was a form of harlotry. It was apostasy. Apostasy was a capital crime (Deut. 13:6–11).

God nevertheless remained faithful to Israel, just as the prophet Hosea remained faithful to his wife, a former harlot. God had commanded Hosea to marry her (Hosea 1:2) as a public testimony to Israel's fallen ethical condition (Hosea 3:1). Hosea's marriage testified to the fact of God's faithfulness to Israel despite Israel's unfaithfulness to God.

The Book of Hosea declares the mercy of God, for God had the right to divorce Israel, either by sending her away, just as Joseph initially planned to send Mary away (Matt. 1:19), or else by executing her, every time Israel replaced the worship of God with the worship of other gods. It was also God's legal right to forgive Israel. The principle of victim's rights is the fundamental principle of biblical justice.² This is why Jesus, as the victim, could lawfully declare from the cross, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do" (Luke 23:34b). Peter announced to the Jews, "And now, brethren, I wot [know] that through ignorance ye did it, as did also your rulers" (Acts 3:17). This is exactly what Jesus had said on the cross.

Mercy is God's option in dealing with covenant-breaking, but it is not God's obligation. Forgiveness by Christians is required,³ but not in the absence of repentance and restitution. God forgives apart from the sinner's restitution, which Christ alone has paid in full, but not without the sinner's repentance. The sinner is commanded by God to repent: to turn around ethically. God showed mercy to Israel until the day of Pentecost that followed the crucifixion of Christ (Acts 2). Until that day, God had not formally established a covenant with another nation. But Israel had been forewarned by Jesus that this would soon

2. Gary North, Victim's Rights: The Biblical View of Civil Justice (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnvictim>)

3. "Then came Peter to him, and said, Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? till seven times? Jesus saith unto him, I say not unto thee, Until seven times: but, Until seventy times seven" (Matt. 18:21–22).

happen. Jesus had told the leaders of Israel that this new covenantal administration would arrive during their lifetimes. “Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof” (Matt. 21:43). His listeners understood that this prophecy was not regarding distant events. “And when the chief priests and Pharisees had heard his parables, they perceived that he spake of them” (Matt. 21:45).

Peter on Pentecost announced a great divorce. This divorce was implied by his demand that his listeners be baptized (Acts 2:38). Baptism on that day replaced circumcision as the mandatory covenant mark. Circumcision, the mark of God’s priestly covenant with Abraham, had been required of no other nation. This was because God had established a priestly covenant with no other nation. Only Israel was a kingdom of priests (Ex. 19:6). National circumcision had been the mark of a nation’s entry into the nation of Israel, a mark of covenantal adoption. This is why the slaying of the newly circumcised Shechemites was a horrible crime, as Jacob knew (Gen. 34:30). This is also why the replacement of circumcision with baptism marked the definitive end of the Old Covenant order, which faded progressively until A. D. 70, when it ended forever. Ever since Peter’s sermon at Pentecost, God has not required gentiles to be circumcised in order for them to enter into a priestly covenant with Him. Instead, God has required Jews to be baptized in order for them to enter into covenant with Him. They must be adopted into His church.

This replacement of circumcision with baptism testified to Peter’s listeners regarding God’s replacement of Old Covenant Israel with the New Covenant church as His bride. God publicly divorced national Israel at Pentecost. He then gave the nation additional time to repent corporately and enter into His new marriage covenant through baptism. When national Israel refused, He publicly executed her in A.D. 70.⁴ Jews survived; national Israel did not.

Throughout the transition period, God retained His legal status as a monogamist. God has only one bride at a time. The mark of circumcision was no longer a covenant sign of membership in God’s corporate bride after Peter’s sermon at Pentecost. He did not execute Israel for several decades, but for Jews, circumcision no longer gained them access to God’s kingdom. Peter had made this clear to the temple’s officials: “Be it known unto you all, and to all the people of Israel, that by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, whom God raised from the dead, even by him doth this man stand here before you whole. This is the stone which was set at nought of you builders, which is become the head of the corner. Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved" (Acts 4:10–12). The Jews had removed the cornerstone from the structure of Old Covenant Israel. The structure could not visibly survive for long. God's divorce of Old Covenant Israel was final.

4. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

The historical means of Christ's transfer of the kingdom of God from national Israel to the church was His subordination to God at the cross. He voluntarily submitted to the pagan civil court of Rome and the apostate ecclesiastical court of the Sanhedrin. The cross placed Him under death's power. Then He visibly defeated death at the resurrection. This gained Him total power over history. "And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth" (Matt. 28:18).

B. Jews and Gentiles on Monogamy

In I Timothy 3:1–2, Paul presents a series of criteria for holding the office of bishop.⁵ The initial criterion for three church offices—bishop, deacon, elder—is monogamous marriage: "the husband of one wife." The question is: Why? We are not told specifically, either in this passage or in the others in which Paul establishes this ordination requirement. We must therefore search for reasons, first, in terms of the context of this law. Then we must search for additional reasons in terms of the effects of both monogamy and polygamy.

In this epistle's opening verses, Paul instructed Timothy to challenge certain false teachers who had a fondness for genealogies and fables (1:4). This has to refer to Judaizers.⁶ In the epistle to Titus, he referred derisively to Jewish fables (Titus 1:14). He also referred to "many unruly and vain talkers and deceivers, specially they of the circumcision" (Titus 1:10). He warned: "But avoid foolish questions, and genealogies, and contentions, and strivings about the law; for they are unprofitable and vain" (Titus 3:9). In that epistle, too, he listed this criterion for elders: one wife (1:6). In both epistles, Paul's targets were the

5. On the definition of "bishop," see chapter 4.

6. William Hendriksen, New Testament Commentary: Exposition of the Pastoral Epistles (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, 1957), pp. 58–59.

Judaizers. He established monogamy as a criterion for church office, which was calculated to offend defenders of polygamy. Who were the defenders of polygamy? Jews.

What about the gentiles? Was polygamy so common in gentile churches that Paul had to mention this criterion specifically, in order to challenge the practice of having multiple wives? On the contrary, monogamy was the standard, both culturally and legally, in Greece and Rome. Some of the Macedonian kings had practiced polygamy. So had succeeding kings in the Greek-speaking dynasties that replaced Alexander's brief empire. The result was chaos: murderous stepbrothers striving for the crown, intrigue by mothers and sons against other mothers and sons.⁷ In contrast, classical Greece's texts indicate that the early Greeks did not practice polygamy, although captive slave women who performed sexual services were common. The Iliad begins with a conflict between Agamemnon and Achilles over the ownership of a such a slave. Greek society was monogamous. The few exceptions prove the rule. Polygamy was authorized by Athens after the military disaster at Sicily, during the Pelopponesian War, in 413 B.C. The limit was two wives.⁸ Euripides' play, Medea, was the story of a rejected, vindictive first wife.⁹ It can be interpreted as a divorce rather than polygamy. Whether this play was about simultaneous polygamy or serial polygamy, the result was the destruction of her family. Hellenistic society in Paul's era was monogamous. Inheritance was through the monogamous family.

Rome was strictly monogamous. The father's role as the head of the household was unquestioned: the paterfamilias. His heirs came exclusively through his wife unless they had been adopted. Adultery and divorce did become common among the upper classes, beginning no later than the late republic phase of Rome's history.¹⁰ The poet Ovid was a great promoter of adultery for married men. His licentious poetry was popular. The Emperor Augustus banned him from the capital and exiled him to a distant province. This took place in Jesus' lifetime (A.D. 8). The cause of his exile is unknown for sure, but it is believed by some historians that it may have been the emperor's concern over the moral breakdown in his own family. His daughter was a notorious

7. Daniel Ogden, Polygamy, Prostitutes and Death: The Hellenic Dynasties (London: Duckworth, 1999).

8. Ibid., p. xxvi.

9. Ibid., p. xxvii.

10. Keith R. Bradley, Discovery of the Roman Family: Studies in Roman Social History (New York: Oxford University Press, 1991), ch. 7.

adulterer. Monogamy was the standard, just as it is today under similar moral conditions governing marriage.

In Paul's day, there were Jews in the Greek-speaking congregations. There were Jews in Roman congregations. Paul does not explicitly say—nor does any New Testament passage explicitly say—that polygamy is banned by God's law. But he says repeatedly that no one who is not a husband of one wife can become a bishop or a deacon. This meant that a polygamous Jew had to be denied ordination by the church.

The Judaizers were Paul's exclusive contemporary targets when he set forth monogamy as a requirement for church office. He wanted them out of the church completely. In his main epistle against them, Galatians, he even used sarcasm regarding them, whom he called "the circumcision" (Gal. 2:7–9): "I would they were even cut off which trouble you" (Gal. 5:12). He surely wanted them barred from church offices.

C. Polygamy Under the Old Covenant

Polygamy was part of the Old Covenant, beginning no later than Abraham.¹¹ There was a Mosaic law of inheritance associated with polygamy: a double portion for the oldest son, even if he was the son of the unloved wife (Deut. 21:15–17).¹² This indicates that polygamy can raise the issue of which wife is loved most. In this Mosaic case law, one wife was not loved at all. The Old Testament's model of the unloved wife is Leah (Gen. 29:30). God therefore gave her favor: she had many children, while Rachel initially had none (Gen. 29:31). This created a major disruption in Jacob's family. It led to two additional wives (Gen. 30:4, 9). The envious¹³ sons (Gen. 37:11) of all three wives later combined to sell the oldest son of Rachel into slavery. They told their father that Joseph had been killed by a wild animal, which brought great sorrow to him for seventeen years, until the family's descent into Egypt (Gen. 37). Envy also afflicted Moses' family: Aaron and Miriam revolted against Moses because of his second wife (Num. 12:1). There is no mention of Zipporah's having died. Hannah, the mother of the prophet Samuel, lived in a polygamous household. The second wife deliberately vexed Hannah because of Hannah's barrenness (I Sam. 1:6). Envy afflicted David's polygamous family: incest and murder (II Sam. 13). All of the polygamous households that are mentioned in the Old Testament were troubled with dissension. In Solomon's case, his polygamy led to his false worship. Because of this, Israel was divided during his son's reign. "Wherefore the LORD said unto Solomon, Forasmuch as this is done of thee, and thou hast not kept my covenant and my statutes, which I have commanded thee, I will surely rend the kingdom from thee, and will give it to thy servant" (I Kings 11:11).

11. There are Web sites on which Orthodox Jews promote polygamy. But polygamy is uncommon among Orthodox Jews, just as it is among Mormons. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints has never formally abandoned polygamy as an ideal, only as an acceptable practice in contemporary non-Mormon societies.

12. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 49.

13. Envy is the desire to tear down someone who is perceived as being higher in status, wealth, or favor. The envious person does not expect to gain the advantage of the envied person after the tearing down takes place. Jealousy is the desire to take the advantage away from the person and appropriate it for oneself. On the distinction between envy and jealousy, see Helmut Schoeck, Envy: A Theory of Social Behavior (New York: Harcourt, Brace, Jovanovich, [1966] 1969). The King James translators translated the same Hebrew word both ways.

1. Legality

This raises a crucial question: If polygamy has such negative consequences, why was it legal under the Old Covenant? If, for example, allowing one man to have several wives leaves younger men with no opportunity to marry, why did God allow this practice for his people for at least two millennia before Christ? Finally, if polygamy really is evil, then what New Testament principle implicitly annuls the Old Testament's laws that regulated polygamy? No explicit New Testament commandment mentions this annulment for the laity, only for church officers. In the Mosaic law, only the king was required to be monogamous (Deut. 17:17).

Under the Mosaic law, there was a way to minimize the effects of polygamy on unmarried young men who could not locate women to marry. There was a way to expand the pool of eligible women—at a price. It was legal for covenant-keeping men to marry foreign women under certain circumstances. Foreign slave women could be purchased from Israelite households or from abroad. The inter-generational enslavement of foreigners was legal (Lev. 25:44–46).¹⁴ Also, there were laws governing marriage to foreign widows and orphaned daughters after the Israelites had annihilated every male after a victorious war conducted outside of Canaan (Deut. 21:10–14).

14. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 31.

Living as a permanent servant inside an Israelite household was considered the equivalent of membership in the assembly. All males living permanently in the household of an Israelite had to be circumcised (Gen. 17:10–13). Every circumcised male had lawful access to Passover (Ex. 12:48), unless he was under some judicial condemnation. A female had no covenant mark on her, so her mere presence as a permanent member of an Israelite household made her eligible for Passover and therefore also marriage to an Israelite. A foreign woman who covenanted with God outside the land could lawfully be married, as the cases of Rahab and Ruth prove.

2. Marriage As Adoption

The legal issue was adoption. A permanent foreign female slave was automatically adopted into the household of her owner; otherwise, she would not have been eligible to attend Passover. She of course could not worship foreign gods in the household (Deut. 13:6–11). Solomon's wives broke this law, and it was a major sin on his part that he allowed this (I Kings 11).

An Israelite who wanted a wife and who could not find one from among the pool of eligible free women could buy a foreign female slave from an Israelite household. He could then marry her, if she consented. Also, there was no law prohibiting the purchase of a female slave from resident aliens. "Moreover of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you, which they begat in your land: and they shall be your possession" (Lev. 25:45). Resident alien fathers were allowed to sell their daughters into slavery. Also, a resident alien who took on a debt that could not be repaid could be sold into slavery. His children could lawfully be sold.

The purchase of resident aliens as slaves was a form of evangelism. It liberated them from the reign of foreign household gods. In the same sense that the purchase of a resident alien slave was a means of evangelism, so was marriage to a foreign woman who agreed to give up her gods. An Israelite male was not restricted to marrying a free woman or a woman with no dowry (a concubine) who had been born to a circumcised Israelite.

By bringing foreigners under permanent household subordination in Old Covenant Israel, the Israelites made possible the foreigners' liberation from the bondage of sin and demonic powers. Judicial subordination could then produce eternal liberation.

Israelite males could marry slave women. This would have left some male slaves without wives. What were the negative social consequences of unmarried foreign male slaves inside Israel? Very few. Slaves were under tight governmental control—family control. They were not a major threat to the social order. In any case, it was legal to buy foreign slaves from abroad. This option was open to the Israelite who owned male slaves without wives.

In the New Testament, church membership is by profession of faith and baptism. Females are baptized. Paul forbade Christians to marry non-Christians. “Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness?” (II Cor. 6:14). Adoption is now by profession of faith and covenant sign, not by mere presence within a household. The preliminary requirement for a Christian marriage is a shared confession of faith. The standards of membership in the ecclesiastical covenant are now the same for men and women. This New Testament equality has changed the laws of marriage.

The Old Covenant’s laws governing the permanent enslavement of foreigners were annulled by the New Covenant. These laws were part of the jubilee year’s laws (Lev. 25). The jubilee laws were land laws; hence, they ceased to exist no later than A.D. 70, when Israel lost its covenantal status as the holy land. While the inter-generational enslavement of foreigners was not formally abolished by the New Testament, the jubilee law was in principle abolished by Jesus (Luke 4:16–21).¹⁵ Enslaving others inter-generationally is no longer a valid means of evangelism. Adoption into God’s kingdom is accomplished by peaceful evangelism, not by military conquest or enslavement. Today, the covenant extends beyond the narrow confines of Old Covenant Israel. It is therefore no longer legal for covenant-keepers to buy themselves wives from pagan families or nations. These forms of Old Covenant adoption are now annulled. Marriage is voluntary.

3. Covenantal Oath

A woman retains the right to say “no” to any suitor. A free woman possessed this authority under the Old Covenant. Marriage is covenantal. It is established by a covenantal oath. A father does not possess the authority to seal a marriage oath on behalf of a daughter. We see this in the case of Rebekah's father and brothers, who negotiated a bride price from Abraham's servant. They asked her before they took the goods. "And they said, We will call the damsel, and enquire at her mouth. And they called Rebekah, and said unto her, Wilt thou go with this man? And she said, I will go" (Gen. 24:57–58). Marriage is not the same as baptism, where the parents' representative oaths on behalf of those baptized under their authority are legal.¹⁶ A baptized person has the authority to disavow the baptismal oath that had been made on his behalf by his parents. A New Testament era woman cannot lawfully be sold into marriage or forced into marriage by her father, let alone by an owner. She is not a slave who can be bought or sold. So, a suitor has no access to women for sale who can replace those free women who have been married by a polygamist.

15. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

New Covenant marriage laws are not the same as Old Covenant marriage laws. First, membership in the ecclesiastical covenant has changed for women: by confession and baptism, not merely by presence in an Israelite household. Second, the definition of what constitutes unequal yoking is also different: unshared confessions. Third, slavery has been annulled by Christ's fulfillment of the jubilee year and God's destruction of Old Covenant Israel.

Slavery and polygamy were related under the Old Covenant. The worst detrimental effects of polygamy on those covenant-keeping young men who could not locate wives were offset by the existence of resident alien female slaves who were eligible for marriage by purchase. This offsetting institutional arrangement is no longer legally available in a Christian society. In the same sense that slavery was not formally annulled by the New Covenant, so polygamy was not formally annulled. Both of these institutions were annulled by an extension of the same New Covenant principle: adoption into God's family through the church is established exclusively by confession of faith and baptism.¹⁷

The Mosaic law was a unit. Whenever a Mosaic statute was annulled by the New Covenant, this had an effect on other related laws. The annulment of the jubilee slave laws had an indirect effect on the Mosaic laws of marriage, for this change altered the laws governing adoption. Marriage is a form of adoption. The wife is brought into her husband's family. Ezekiel 16 is premised on the adoption aspect of marriage. God had found Jerusalem-Israel as a man finds an infant girl, brings her into his household, and later marries her. By coming under God's judicial protection in God's household, Israel was adopted by God. Circumcision meant adoption. For females, legally permanent presence in a household was adoption.

16. Anabaptists deny even this.

17. Appendix A:H.

The introduction of baptism—the New Testament's formal mark of adoption by God into the institutional church—changed the laws of marriage. No longer is the household adoption of women established judicially by purchase or by military conquest. It is not possible to make a non-Christian woman covenantally eligible for Christian marriage merely by purchasing her. Therefore, what was not a major threat to society under the Mosaic law—a shortage of marriageable women due to other men's polygamy—becomes a major threat under the New Covenant. To deal with this threat, the Christian West has always used both civil and ecclesiastical law to prohibit polygamy.

D. Monogamy as the New Testament's Ideal

A bishop must be married at some point before he is lawfully ordained. He must also have children. Candidates for bishop must manage their families well: "One that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity; (For if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?)" (1 Tim. 3:4–5).

Does this rule prohibit widowers from holding the office? The text gives no direct indication. We do know this much: no Mosaic law removed from office a priest whose wife had died. If a bishop's wife and his children die during a war or a plague, must he be removed from office? This seems highly unlikely. The legal issue here is marriage as a screening device for church officers. A successful marriage is one among several indications of high moral character and competent leadership ability.

What about childless candidates? Paul's language presumes that the candidate has children, or did at some point in his life. A childless man does not meet this criterion. The focus of Paul's concern here is the behavior of subordinates in the candidate's household. In Paul's list of criteria for deacons, the wife's characteristics are specifically mentioned: "Even so must their wives be grave, not slanderers, sober, faithful in all things" (1 Tim. 3:11).

No polygamous man should be considered for the three senior church offices. He must be the husband of one wife. The texts contain the Greek word for “one”: mia. It was not inserted by the translators. It is also not the Greek word for “a.” Paul is not saying “one wife among many.”

This indicates that the New Testament’s ideal for marriage is monogamy. Monogamy was also the highest standard in the Old Testament, which is why Israel’s kings were not allowed to be polygamous (Deut. 17:17). As we have already seen, the major polygamous leaders are pictured in the Old Testament as suffering because of it. The Mosaic law permitted polygamy; it did not recommend it.

A man who has been unlawfully divorced by a sinning wife—highly unlikely in Paul’s day—should not be penalized by the church by being excluded from consideration for church office. Neither should a man who has lawfully divorced a lawless wife who would have been lawfully executed in Mosaic Israel. The church should regard both men as widowers. To ban either of them from church office is to undermine marriage by undermining marriage-protecting judicial sanctions of God’s law.

I conclude that the Greek word mia is here translated correctly as “one.” A candidate for the office of bishop, presbyter, or deacon must have been married at some point, and to only one wife at a time. This rule does not ban widowers who have remarried, nor does it ban men who have been unlawfully divorced or who have divorced their wives lawfully. Paul does not here annul the principle of victim’s rights. The innocent man’s lawful divorce of a guilty spouse does not bring on him the negative sanction of either removal from church office or banning from church office.

A bishop or a deacon must be married or have been married, i.e., a widower. Paul says that success as the head of a household is also a criterion for holding church office. All branches of the Christian church have violated this rule for many centuries.

E. Universal Denial by the Church

The church after the fourth century allowed celibate monastic orders. Celibate monks were ordained. In both East and West, this tradition has prevailed. Eastern Orthodoxy closed the office of bishop to married men in the sixth century. Widowers who had been married only once were eligible. The rule still holds. The on-line article on “Eastern Orthodoxy” in the Encyclopedia Britannica summarizes the restrictions.

The lower orders of the clergy—i.e., priests and deacons—are generally married men. The present canonical legislation allows the ordination of married men to the diaconate and the priesthood, provided that they were married only once and that their wives are neither widows nor divorcees. These stipulations reflect the general principle of absolute monogamy, which the Eastern Church considered as a Christian norm to which candidates for the priesthood are to comply strictly. Deacons and priests cannot marry after their ordination.

Bishops, however, are selected from among the unmarried clergy or widowed priests. The rule defining the requirement for an unmarried episcopate was issued at a time (6th century) when monks represented the elite of the clergy. The contemporary decrease in the number of monks in the Orthodox Church has created a serious problem in some territorial churches, in that new candidates for the episcopacy are difficult to find.

Roman Catholicism closed the entire priesthood to married men no later than the twelfth century. In 1022, Benedict VIII banned marriages for existing priests. This tradition goes back to the early fourth century: the Council of Elvira in Spain, which preceded Nicea. By the end of the fourth century, hierarchical pressure was put on all married priests and deacons to live apart from their wives.

Among Protestant denominations, marriage has been optional for ordination, although Luther strongly recommended marriage for all ministers. Calvinistic Protestantism very early substituted formal education for the marriage vow as the preferred screening device for ministers. A college degree has been required for ministerial ordination—the authority to dispense the sacraments—for hundreds of years. A college degree required a working knowledge of Latin until well into the nineteenth century. To this was added Greek and Hebrew in college. With the invention of the theological seminary in 1808,¹⁸ a seminary degree became increasingly common as a screening device, and universal by the late nineteenth century. It was only in 1911 that the Northern Presbyterian Church in the United States officially eliminated a reading knowledge of Latin as a formal requirement for ministers.¹¹⁹ Few Presbyterian seminarians had understood Latin since the 1860s,²⁰ but the requirement was so respected that the denomination

18. Andover Seminary, a Calvinistic Congregational institution.

19. Minutes of the General Assembly, 1911, pp. 197–98.

20. Charles Hodge decided to allow the publication of his famous Systematic Theo- could not bring itself for half a century to admit the obvious.

The Methodists and the Baptists adopted circuit riding for their ministers in frontier regions of the United States. This was the primary reason for their success in evangelizing the western United States, 1801–1860. There were fewer than 500 Baptist congregations and virtually no Methodist congregations in the United States in 1780. There were fewer than 500 Presbyterian congregations. By 1860, there were about 20,000 Methodist congregations and 12,000 Baptist congregations. There were 6,400 Presbyterian congregations.²¹ Frontier circuit riders were not required to attend college or seminary. They were paid very little. In 1834, the official salary for a Methodist circuit rider was $100 a year, but most of them had difficulty collecting the money. Marriage was strongly discouraged because the minister was also supposed to be paid an extra $100 for his wife. This payment was even more difficult to collect. Baptists were usually guaranteed nothing; they got paid only what they could collect from individual congregations. Most of them had to take full-time jobs when they became settled pastors. They were paid $60 to $100 a year. In contrast, the Calvinistic denominations imposed strict educational requirements for ordination as ministers. These men rarely left the Eastern seaboard, where salaries were commensurate with their high (and costly) educational attainment. Presbyterians and Congregationalists were paid $400 to $1,000 a year in small cities, and $1,000 to $3,000 a year in large cities.²² Methodist and Baptist ministers were price-competitive because they had little formal education and no wives.

Had the church consistently honored I Timothy 3, it would be a very different organization today.

F. Monogamy vs. Crime

George Gilder for a brief period was one of America's most economically successful journalists. In 2001, he purchased the conservatlogy (1871–73) because he knew that students in each seminary year were selling handwritten copies of his lecture notes to students in the year behind theirs. His lectures were based on the early seventeenth-century Latin work of Francis Turretin, which few American students could read in 1860. Turretin was not translated into English until the 1990's.

21. Edwin Scott Gaustad, Historical Atlas of Religion in America (New York: Harper & Row, 1962), p. 43, Figure 32.

22. Roger Finke and Rodney Stark, The Churching of America, 1776–1990: Winners and Losers in Our Religious Economy (New Brunswick, New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, 1992), pp. 81–82.

ive magazine, The American Spectator, which had been publishing for over three decades.²³ He was the editor-publisher of an expensive and widely read financial newsletter on innovative communications technology.²⁴ Several of his books became best-sellers, beginning with Wealth and Poverty in 1981. He launched his career in 1973 with an essay in Harper's, "The Suicide of the Sexes."

That essay led to his first book, Sexual Suicide (1973). A revised version was titled Naked Nomads (1974). Still another revised edition was titled Men and Marriage (1986). The common theme in all three versions is that the sexes are fundamentally different. Men are inherently aggressive; women are inherently home-builders. Men want to possess women for sexual reasons. Women domesticate men by giving men what they are after, but only on terms established by women—and, he might have added, their fathers. A society that does not reinforce this domestication of men through law and custom is committing suicide.

In the Introduction to Men and Marriage, he says that he was unable to find a mainstream publisher for the book, despite the financial success of Wealth and Poverty. He had been approached by several major publishers to produce a manuscript, but all of them returned this one. In every case, he was led to believe, a feminist editor had vetoed publication.²⁵ Finally, it was published by an obscure publisher in an obscure town in Louisiana, a state not known for book publishing.

Gilder's book is a defense of heterosexual monogamy, which he said is a moral norm for society.²⁶ In the final third of the twentieth century, American society widely accepted a form of sexual liberalism that undermined this norm. He said that the breakdown of marriage had become much worse in the decade separating the first edition and the third. In retrospect, it is clear that the decline has continued.

Gilder's central argument is that unmarried young men are the primary source of social barbarism. Barbarians do not build civilizations; they undermine them. Unmarried young men are society's largest pool of dysfunctional people. "If the truth be known, all too many of them are entirely unsuited for civilized life. Every society must figure out ways to bring them into the disciplines and duties of citizen-

23. I wrote for it in the early 1970s, when it was called The Alternative.

24. Bad advice regarding a stock called Global Crossing, which went bankrupt in 2002, cost Gilder his reputation and his fortune. He wrote in June, 2002, that he was facing bankruptcy.

25. George Gilder, Men and Marriage (Gretna, Louisiana: Pelican, 1986), p. viii.

26. Ibid., p. viii–ix.

ship.”²⁷ He titles this chapter, “Taming the Barbarians.” At the age when most men marry, they are in rebellion against parents, teachers, and the church. They are at the bottom of their earning capacity. Only one institutional restraint consistently brings them into line: marriage. Society has a constitution that demands that they marry in order to relieve their passion. “It is the sexual constitution, not the legal one, that is decisive in subduing the aggressions of young men.”²⁸

Gilder offered statistics on the disproportionate rates of crime, poor health, and death that single, never-married men suffer. At the time when Gilder wrote this book, single men constituted 13% of the American population. They also constituted 40% of the criminals. They committed about 90% of violent crimes.²⁹ Divorced men are also high-risk members of society compared to divorced women. In the age group 35–64, they have over three times the death rate of divorced women in the same age range.³⁰

Then he presented other statistics on remarriage. Over age 40, most divorced women do not remarry. Divorced men remarry within three years. They marry women who are on average 30 years old.³¹ When a divorced man marries a younger woman, he removes her from the pool of eligible women. This leaves a younger unmarried man without a potential wife. A younger man will not marry a woman who is significantly older than he is, i.e., above the normal child-bearing years.

If the younger woman is also divorced, the problem is pushed down another notch in age distribution. Her divorced husband will marry a younger woman. At some point, the number of women eligible for marriage to the would-be barbarians will be reduced. Gilder concluded:

The only undeniable winners in the sexual revolution are powerful men. Under a regime of sexual liberation, some men can fulfill the paramount dream of most men everywhere: they can have the nubile years of more than one young woman. Whether a man takes these young women one at a time, staying married and having mistresses—or whether he marries two or more young women in succession, or whether he merely lives with young women without marriage—makes little difference to the social consequences. The man is no less

27. Ibid., p. 39.

28. Idem.

29. Ibid., p. 65.

30. Ibid., p. 66.

31. Ibid., p. 57.

a polygamist—or more specifically a polygynist—than if he had maintained a harem.³²

The social consequences of divorce are overwhelmingly negative, Gilder said. Divorced wives are left to live out their lives without husbands. Younger men do not find wives, and so commit more crime, earn lower incomes, and die younger. Children grow up in homes headed by single women or shared by a stepparent.

In Wealth and Poverty, Gilder discussed marriage and wealth. “The only dependable route from poverty is always work, family, and faith.”³³ The statistics indicate that married men work 50% more than bachelors of comparable age, education, and skills.³⁴ Every society that expects to prosper must find ways to persuade young men to marry and stay married. “If work effort is the first principle of overcoming poverty, marriage is the prime source of upwardly mobile work.”³⁵

Gilder minced no words in his defence of monogamy. Without monogamy, the social order will not hold.

Monogamy is central to any democratic social contract, designed to prevent a breakdown of society into “war of every man against every other man.” In order to preserve order, a man may relinquish liberty, property, and power to the state. But if he has to give up his wife to his boss—or hers—he is unmanned. A society of open sexual competition, in which the rich and powerful—or the sexually attractive—can command large numbers of women, is a society with the most intolerable hierarchy of all.

Monogamy is egalitarian in the realm of love. It is a mode of rationing. It means—to put it crudely—one to a customer. Competition is intense enough even so, because of the sexual inequality of human beings. But under a regime of monogamy there are limits.³⁶

Women become subordinate to men in marriage. Men become subordinate to society in marriage. The division of labor increases in the family and also in society. Capital increases, as does output. This is dominion through subordination.

Under the New Covenant, a nation’s supply of eligible single women cannot lawfully be increased by the purchase of resident alien wo-

32. Idem.

33. Gilder, Wealth and Poverty (New York: Basic Books, 1981), p. 68.

34. Ibid., p. 69.

35. Ibid., p. 70.

36. Gilder, Men and Marriage, p. 58.

men. Therefore, the social evils of polygamy threaten every New Covenant social order. Biblical law does not subsidize crime and anti-social behavior. In a society that prohibits the enslavement for foreign women, polygamy increases crime and anti-social behavior. This means that the principle of “one husband, one wife” is the judicial standard for marriage under a Christian civil order. The biblical legal principle of the rule of law has always applied to civil government. “One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you” (Ex. 12:49).³⁷ The standard that governs Christian marriages must govern all marriages.

G. Excess Single Women in Western Churches

Polygamy as the New Testament’s ideal standard for marriage has occasionally been defended by anti-establishment religious groups as a supposed means of strengthening the family—always the “patriarchal family.” This is a strange argument. Polygamy did not strengthen any family in the Old Testament. It surely does not strengthen families that it keeps from being formed by reducing the pool of eligible women for marriage. But what about the disparity between the number of male and female members in the Western Church? Would polygamy solve this problem?

It is not widely recognized that Western Christianity for many centuries has been afflicted by an imbalance of men and women church members. This may not be the case with Greek Orthodoxy, where equality seems to prevail,³⁸ but it has been the case with all other major denominations.³⁹ Women outnumber men, sometimes by wide margins. In African-American congregations in the United States, in Latin American and Italian Roman Catholic churches, and in white Pentecostal churches, women outnumber men by two-to-one or more. If Paul’s rule against marriages between Christians and non-Christians were honored by unmarried women in these groups, the formation of families would decrease.

Assume that unmarried women in the churches turned down all offers of marriage by non-Christians. Non-Christian males could not marry Christian women, who would refuse their offers. Meanwhile, many single Christian women would find no husbands. Unless the churches could find a solution to the problem of gender disparity, the widespread presence of churches in any society would produce increased crime, other things being equal. There would be too many unmarried young men.

37. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 14.

38. Leon J. Podles, The Church Impotent: The Feminization of Christianity (Dallas, Texas: Spence, 1999), pp. xii–xiii, 11.

39. Ibid., ch. 1.

The practical solution to this Western social problem has been simple: most Christian women marry covenant-breakers when asked, if no one else has asked or is likely to ask. This practice has continued for centuries. Adult sons of these religiously mixed marriages more often refuse to join the church than adult daughters. They imitate their fathers. Daughters imitate their mothers. They join the church and then marry non-members, just as their mothers did. In a book on this continuing disparity of membership, the author did not mention this imitation phenomenon as the reason why this disparity continues, generation after generation. He offered no explanation for the disparity, which appears in all branches of the Western church, nor does he explain why the problem does not afflict Eastern Orthodoxy. He recognized that sons reject their mothers as role models, imitating their fathers,⁴⁰ but he did not discuss the obvious: their mothers have broken God's law by marrying non-Christian men, and their daughters follow their example. Establishing a family covenant becomes more important to unmarried Christian women than maintaining the church covenant. Romance defeats confession.

Would polygamy in the churches reduce this problem? I have twice been asked this question by a prominent African-American pastor, whose congregation is filled with unmarried women who cannot find husbands. Polygamy might solve the problem for some of these women, but it would raise all of the other problems by setting a legal precedent which, if authorized by civil law and imitated by the general culture, would produce increased social disorder. Polygamy would not solve the underlying problem, namely, an excess of women in the churches. Because this problem is rarely discussed in public, churches have done nothing to solve it for several hundred years.

The negative aspects of not being married seem very great to eligible unmarried women. When asked by covenant-breakers to marry, they do not look into the future and acknowledge that their sons will go to hell if they imitate their fathers, which most of them will. Meanwhile, their parents and their churches offer no serious negative sanctions for this act of covenant-breaking. The lure of the benefits of marriage is not offset in their minds by the threat of immediate negative ecclesiastical and family sanctions or by long-term negative sanctions: the eternal fate of their sons and the temporal miseries of sharing a life with covenant-breakers. So, they marry these men. The disparity of church membership continues. To put it somewhat graphically, theology and sanctionless ecclesiology are no match for sexual passion during women's child-bearing years. As a result, Satan harvests the souls of many sons of Christian mothers, century after century. The institutional problem is weak ecclesiology, not monogamy. This problem can be solved only by the willingness of churches and families to impose the sanctions of excommunication and disinheritance, respectively, on women who marry covenant-breakers.

40. Ibid., pp. 38–43.

For over two millennia, Jews retained their separate existence as a people that dwelt in many different foreign cultures. They accomplished this remarkable historical feat by imposing extreme negative sanctions on sons who converted to Christianity. These departed sons were treated as if they had died. There were formal burial services for them. Biological grandparents never enjoyed the presence of their grandchildren. This was a heavy price to pay for all individuals concerned, but it made possible the survival of the Jews. Theological liberalism has undermined this commitment in Reform Judaism. Liberal Judaism is dying out as a result. Within a century, it will be reduced to invisibility except in the State of Israel because of the high rate intermarriage and the fact that the children of Jewish-gentile marriages are not usually raised as Jews.⁴¹ Aging liberal Jews delight in their gentile grandchildren, but they are committing suicide as a people. Negative sanctions are inescapable: either on sons who leave the faith or on the faith itself.

Conclusion

The monogamy of Jesus Christ is the main reason why the New Testament's ideal for marriage is monogamy. The institutional church, as the only bride of Christ, must be ruled by men who imitate Christ. They must have only one wife.

Paul in this passage and in others restricts church offices to men who are married to one wife, or who have been married to one wife at some point in their lives, i.e., widowers or men who lawfully divorced faithless wives. He also identifies success in managing a household as a criterion for holding church office. This makes a monogamous marriage a preliminary screening device for exercising formal authority in a church.

41. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), Appendix D: "The Demographics of American Judaism."

The Judaizers were Paul's immediate targets of this law. Greeks and Romans were monogamous. The Old Covenant allowed polygamy. Paul here sides with the gentiles against the Jews. The gentiles, by establishing monogamy as the legal standard, had come closer to God's view of what marriage should be.

Monogamy reduces crime. It increases married men's economic output, thereby increasing wealth. Biology produces approximately equal numbers of men and women. Polygamy, whether simultaneous or sequential, reduces the number of women who are available for single young men to marry. The presence of young men who have no hope of marriage is a social and economic liability.

Paul proclaimed a criterion for ecclesiastical ordination that he did not meet. He was not married. He was never ordained by the church. He was ordained directly by God. For those men, unlike himself, who are not ordained directly by God, marriage and children are a dual requirement for ordination. With the final termination of the Old Covenant in A.D. 70, God ceased to ordain apostles, either directly (e.g., Paul) or ecclesiastically (e.g., Matthias). No one after A.D. 70 has been directly ordained by God. Ordination is strictly ecclesiastical.

4

ECONOMICS AND ORDINATION

A bishop then must be blameless, the husband of one wife, vigilant, sober, of good behaviour, given to hospitality, apt to teach; Not given to wine, no striker, not greedy of filthy lucre; but patient, not a brawler, not covetous; One that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity (I Tim. 3:2–4).

Likewise must the deacons be grave, not doubletongued, not given to much wine, not greedy of filthy lucre (I Tim. 3:8).

The theocentric issue in this passage is the ecclesiastical hierarchy under God.¹ There is a required screening process before a man can lawfully be ordained to represent God ecclesiastically.

A. Bishops and Elders

The Greek word for “bishop” is related to the Greek word for “visitation.”² Grammatically speaking, a bishop is a church officer who makes visits. The Bible never says who is to be visited by a bishop. It also says nothing about what his jurisdiction is.

1. The Visitor

Church tradition has defined a bishop as a church official who rules over priests. Who are these priests? There is no New Testament

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. “And shall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee; and they shall not leave in thee one stone upon another; because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation” (Luke 19:44). “Having your conversation honest among the Gentiles: that, whereas they speak against you as evildoers, they may by your good works, which they shall behold, glorify God in the day of visitation” (I Peter 2:12).

office that involves offering sacrifices to God. The Old Covenant priesthood was annulled by Christ's final sacrifice (Heb. 7–9). But church tradition has long equated a priest with a church officer who is uniquely authorized to administer the sacraments. A bishop is said to ordain men to the priesthood, by which is meant the sacrament-administering ministry.

A bishop also is said to operate within a fixed geographical area, with no direct jurisdiction outside this area. In his legal capacity as a member of a college of bishops, he represents ministers and lay members of the denomination who reside inside his jurisdiction. None of this is found in the New Testament, but most of it has a long tradition that stretches back to the second century.

The presumption of the passage is that the investiture of the authority to conduct some sort of formal visitations in the name of the church must be restricted to men who have previously demonstrated specific leadership abilities. These abilities are ethical, marital, and economic. They are in no way related to formal education. The attempt to define "bishop" or an equivalent office in terms of formal education is a matter of tradition, though a much shorter tradition than the one which offers a geographical definition of the office.

There is a church officer mentioned by Paul in verse 17 of this epistle and also in Titus 1:5, presbuteros, meaning "elder." Paul mentions this office in the midst of two passages that list criteria for holding office. In both passages, he also refers to the office of bishop. It is not clear from either context that these two offices are different, even though the names are different. This has led to a division ecclesiastically between episcopacy or prelacy on the one hand, and Presbyterianism on the other. Presbyterianism has no bishops. Episcopacy³ and prelacy⁴ have bishops and elders, although both refuse to call elders "elders." They call them priests or ministers or rectors or pastors—anything but elders.

If a bishop visits, then who is supposed to get visited? Ever since the Protestant Reformation, Protestant churches have been divided over the answer. Churches in the tradition of either prelacy or episcopacy say that a bishop visits local churches within his geographical

3. Episcopacy differs from prelacy in that it entrusts a veto power over the bishops by a body representing laymen. An example is the structure of the Reformed Episcopal Church.

4. A hierarchical government of church offices that removes the clergy from any judicial veto by representatives of the laity.

district or diocese. He serves both as a counsellor and an agent of discipline for local pastors. He also performs the rite of confirmation, through which young adults are brought into the church as full members.

2. Presbyters

In contrast to this high-church tradition, Presbyterians say that the Greek word for “bishop” has the same meaning as the Greek word for “presbyter,” meaning elder. Presbyterians distinguish among elders, however. One variety—the teaching elder—is marked by church membership in a regional presbytery, not in a local congregation. He alone possesses lawful authority to preach regularly in a local congregation’s formal worship service and to administer the sacraments. Visitation is not a formal aspect of his office. That is to say, there is nothing in Presbyterian documents or tradition that authorizes anyone to bring formal charges against a teaching elder because he has failed to make visits of some kind. There may be a family visitation program in a local congregation, but it is not mandatory. The other kind of elders—ruling elders who belong to a local congregation—traditionally are supposed to participate in any family-visitation program. The implementation of such a program can be lawfully skipped by a local congregation. The Book of Church order does not mandate family visitation.⁵ So, for Presbyterians, “bishop” is grammatically defined as “elder,” despite the fact that “elder” has no connotation of visitation. Therefore, Presbyterian teaching elders do not have visitation in their formal job description.⁶ The two-fold exegetical problem for Presbyterians is this: a judicial identity is asserted where none exists grammatically (bishop = elder), and a judicial distinction is asserted where none exists grammatically (teaching elder vs. ruling elder).

3. Multiple Offices

It does not logically follow that the two offices, bishop and elder, are in fact the same office just because the criteria for the offices are similar, though not identical. The diaconate is a subordinate office, yet its requirements are similar, though not identical. It could be—but is not stated in any text—that the eldership is a lower office that has the

5. There is a reference to visitation of the sick. The Book of Church Order of the Reformed Church in America does mention family visitation: Chapter I, Section 8.

6. Again, the exception is the Reformed Church in America.

same criteria that govern the screening of bishops.

In his epistle to Titus, Paul referred to the criteria for elders (plural): blameless, monogamous, having obedient children. He then justified this list in terms of what is required of a bishop (singular).

For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou shouldest set in order the things that are wanting, and ordain elders in every city, as I had appointed thee: If any be blameless, the husband of one wife, having faithful children not accused of riot or unruly. For a bishop must be blameless, as the steward of God; not selfwilled, not soon angry, not given to wine, no striker, not given to filthy lucre; But a lover of hospitality, a lover of good men, sober, just, holy, temperate; Holding fast the faithful word as he hath been taught, that he may be able by sound doctrine both to exhort and to convince the gainsayers (Titus 1:5–9).

Paul's abrupt transition from a discussion of the criteria for elders to a discussion of the criteria for a bishop is not explained in the text. Is it a transition at all? Presbyterians say it isn't; it is the same office: elder. Paul mentions blamelessness as a requirement of elders and bishops, i.e., he mentions it twice. Did he do this for emphasis regarding the importance of this characteristic for someone seeking the same office, which for some unstated reason has two names, or was it because there are two offices with the same criteria? Protestant churches have never come to any agreement on the answer.

"Blameless" appears once in the Timothy passage and twice in the Titus passage. To be ordained, a candidate must have conducted his public affairs in such a way that he has gained people's trust. This means that he must possess a good reputation. The Greek word for "blameless" has the sense of "not being spoken against." Blame means the opposite. "But we desire to hear of thee what thou thinkest: for as concerning this sect, we know that every where it is spoken against" (Acts 28:22). The list of criteria in I Timothy 3 presents representative aspects of good conduct that constitute a blameless life. Men whose lives are marked by these characteristics are not spoken against.

Next, Paul introduces an economic criterion: hospitality.

B. Hospitality

Hospitality costs money. To care for others or to entertain others is an expense. A bishop is supposed to display a willingness to spend money on others.

The Greek word translated here as “hospitality,” philoxenos, is a combination of two Greek words, philos (love) and xenos (stranger). The hospitable man is someone who frequently invites strangers into his home. He entertains them or gives them shelter. There is an element of celebration involved in hospitality, or, if not celebration, then at least personal sacrifice. This is a drain on family resources on behalf of others. The bishop is supposed to place service to strangers above the maximization of his family’s net worth.

Because of this requirement, a candidate for bishop has to be a person with enough wealth to be hospitable. He must not be poverty-stricken. This means that he must have experienced a degree of economic success that some members of the congregation have not experienced. A bishop is set apart ecclesiastically by his money and by the use of his money. But he is not to be granted this office in exchange for a promise to promote even more hospitality at his own expense on behalf of the church. This would amount to buying the office: the sin known as Simony.⁷ Church salaries paid to bishops should be used in part to fund hospitality.

The candidate is required to have shown hospitality in the past. His reputation for having opened his home to strangers must be established before he attains high office. Patterns of behavior must be established early. This implies that the moral character of those eligible for the office of bishop must be established early.

Hospitality is to serve as an ideal for church members generally. It is not that hospitality is a unique function of the office of bishop.

7. A word derived from Simon the sorcerer, who asked Peter to sell him the power of ordination. “And when Simon saw that through laying on of the apostles’ hands the Holy Ghost was given, he offered them money, Saying, Give me also this power, that on whomsoever I lay hands, he may receive the Holy Ghost. But Peter said unto him, Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money. Thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter: for thy heart is not right in the sight of God” (Acts 8:18–21). Gary North, Sacrifice and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Acts, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

C. “Not Greedy of Filthy Lucre”

The Greek word for “money” is not the same as the Greek word found here. The Greek word here has the sense of not seeking sordid gain: aphilarguros. Literally, it means “no love of silver.” This word is the negative of philarguros, which appears only twice in the New Testament. “And the Pharisees also, who were covetous, heard all these things: and they derided him” (Luke 16:14). “For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy” (II Tim. 3:2). The King James translators used “not filthy lucre” in several passages to translate aphilarguros. For example, “Feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind” (I Peter 5:2).

The sense of philarguros is the desire to accumulate wealth for the sake of establishing one’s autonomy. This has to do with self-love. Self-love was regarded by Jesus and Paul as a sin. The lover of money is in fact a lover of himself. Verse 3 speaks of both greed⁸ and covetousness. “Not given to wine, no striker, not greedy of filthy lucre; but patient, not a brawler, not covetous.” Verse 8 also speaks of greed. “Likewise must the deacons be grave, not doubletongued, not given to much wine, not greedy of filthy lucre.” In both of these references to greed, the translators added “filthy.” It is not in the Greek text.

Paul says that a bishop should be screened in terms of his attitude toward wealth. If a candidate has accumulated wealth for the purpose of a vain display, he must not be ordained. The early twentieth-century anti-capitalistic economist Thorstein Veblen coined a phrase, “conspicuous consumption.” He regarded this as a great evil. It is not a great evil, but it is sufficiently evil to serve as a test of a man’s character—also, a woman’s. “In like manner also, that women adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety; not with broided hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly array; But (which becometh women professing godliness) with good works” (I Tim. 2:9–10).⁹ Con-

8. Textus Receptus. The NU (Egyptian) text omits this.

9. Peter agreed: “Likewise, ye wives, be in subjection to your own husbands; that, if any obey not the word, they also may without the word be won by the conversation of the wives; While they behold your chaste conversation coupled with fear. Whose adorning let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel; But let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price. For after this manner in the old time the holy women also, who trusted in God, adorned themselves, being in subjection unto their own husbands:

spicuous consumption is considered a moral liability by the New Testament. So is the amassing of less visible forms of wealth as a means of gaining security. Later in this epistle, Paul refers to the uncertainty of riches (6:17).¹⁰ He who trusts in his wealth has misunderstood the source of security in this life. Wealth is to be a Christian's means of charity, hospitality, and sufficient leisure to free him for non-profit service.

The criteria for screening candidates for the diaconate are quite similar to the criteria for bishops. The main economic difference relates to hospitality. This is not a criterion for deacons. The absence of greed is. The deacon is not to be greedy for money (v. 8).

Why is a candidate for deacon not required to be hospitable? This difference is related to the functions of the two offices. A deacon uses the church's wealth to provide charity to the poor (Acts 6:1–3).¹¹ He is an assistant to the bishop or elders. The bishop, in contrast, is supposed to have developed the habit of hospitality with his own money. He possesses greater judicial authority than a deacon. A selfless habit of hospitality identifies him as a servant. This character trait is crucial to the biblical concept of rulership. "But Jesus called them unto him, and said, Ye know that the princes of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great exercise authority upon them. But it shall not be so among you: but whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister; And whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant" (Matt. 20:25–27).¹²

There are other criteria for deacons, but they are not economic in nature.

Conclusion

Paul in this section of the epistle sets forth criteria that are to govern ecclesiastical ordination. These criteria are ethical, economic, and marital.

With regard to a candidate's attitude toward wealth, he must not put his trust in money. He is not to seek money as a means of gaining security. Wealth is not for display. It is for hospitality. Personal dis-

Even as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him lord: whose daughters ye are, as long as ye do well, and are not afraid with any amazement" (1 Peter 3:1–6).

10. Chapter 11.

11. North, Sacrifice and Dominion, ch. 5.

12. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 41.

plays of great wealth exclude men from the office of bishop and deacon.

Formal education is not mentioned as a requirement for church office in any New Testament passage. Yet ever since the high Middle Ages, the church has sought to replace the requirement of marriage with the requirement of formal education as the supreme criterion for ecclesiastical ordination. Paul was clear about what is required. The church has been adamant: Paul was wrong. What the church does testifies to what it really believes, not what it officially maintains regarding the authority of the Bible. The church, on this point, has rejected the Bible in preference for university training. It has officially substituted the writing of term papers in place of ruling one's household well.

5

THE ALIEN SPIRIT OF PROHIBITION

Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils; Speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their conscience seared with a hot iron; Forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth. For every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving: For it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer. If thou put the brethren in remembrance of these things, thou shalt be a good minister of Jesus Christ, nourished up in the words of faith and of good doctrine, whereunto thou hast attained (1 Tim. 4:1–6).

The theocentric focus of this law is God as the source of all good gifts. The judicial issue is boundaries. Evil-doers will come and announce boundaries around gifts from God. Boundaries are point three of the biblical covenant.¹ A gift is sanctified, meaning set apart, by prayer.

A. The Goodness of the Creation

Paul in this epistle is dealing with the influence of Judaizers. These infiltrators into the church were setting forth false doctrines. Paul instructs Timothy in ways for the local congregation to deal judicially with this sect and other theological evils.

Paul says here that Timothy is seeing the fulfillment of the prophecy of the Holy Spirit that in the latter times, teachers of errors will appear. The Greek phrase, “the latter times,” appears nowhere else in the New Testament. The Greek word for “latter” is sometimes translated as “last.” In the context of this epistle, the meaning is “last.” Paul was living in the last days. The author of the epistle to the Hebrews announced the same thing. “God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, Hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things, by whom also he made the worlds” (Heb. 1:1–2). These were the last days of Old Covenant Israel.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

Paul’s language is exceedingly harsh. He refers the heresy-preachers as being subject to “seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils.” There is no spirit of reconciliation here. This is not irenic language: “Speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their conscience seared with a hot iron.” The imagery of a seared conscience, as meat is seared to keep it from dripping, is powerful. It conveys the idea of something impervious to anything from the outside—in this case, God’s law.

What is their error? “Forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats.” These people were recommending celibacy and vegetarianism. Celibacy is geared for an elite: an elite that must recruit, for it does not reproduce. No society could adopt such a view and survive. Either its birth rate would fall to zero (true celibacy) or its bastardy rate would climb to 100% (destruction of marriage). In either case, the society would perish.

Vegetarianism’s error is to imply that animals were not made by God for man’s enjoyment, including culinary enjoyment. The vegetarian places meat within a boundary that says: “Unfit for Human Consumption.” This boundary, Paul says, is man’s doing, not God’s. Not only is meat fit for human consumption in the sense of being suitable for man, it is fit in the sense of being designed for man. Paul says, “For every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving: For it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer.” The supreme purpose of edible animals is to be killed and consumed by man. The model is God Himself, who delights in the odor of burning flesh.

Thou shalt also take one ram; and Aaron and his sons shall put their hands upon the head of the ram. And thou shalt slay the ram, and thou shalt take his blood, and sprinkle it round about upon the altar. And thou shalt cut the ram in pieces, and wash the inwards of him, and his legs, and put them unto his pieces, and unto his head. And thou shalt burn the whole ram upon the altar: it is a burnt offering unto the LORD: it is a sweet savour, an offering made by fire unto the LORD (Ex. 29:15–18).

B. A Break With the Mosaic Covenant

The Mosaic law's prohibitions against certain meats were not part of the pre-Mosaic era. The dietary laws were not part of any creation mandate. The Mosaic law's meat restrictions were a discontinuity in God's dealings with covenant-keeping men.

There were no Mosaic restrictions on vegetables. Vegetables were all considered ritually clean. All unclean foods were animals. These could not lawfully be eaten. The clean animals could be eaten. Meat was obligatory at Passover.

Paul's identification of these false teachers as vegetarians indicates that Paul's targets in this passage were not Judaizers, who were not vegetarians. What about the prohibition against marriage? The Jewish sect known as the Essenes was separatist. According to Josephus, one branch was celibate.² Another branch was not.³ This was a small sect. They had little contact with other Jews. It seems highly unlikely that Essenes, who were few in number and who had separated themselves from the surrounding Jewish culture, were evangelizing gentile churches in Asia. It is unlikely that they had imitators among Jews in a Greek congregation.

There seems to have been no Jewish sect that was vegetarian. So, the presumption has to be that the group which Paul is speaking about here must have been a gentile ascetic group inside the church. The main source of vegetarianism in Greek religion was the cult of Orpheus. This group believed in reincarnation, and therefore members avoided meat.⁴ It is unlikely that any former adherent of this cult would seek to persuade members of the church at Ephesus of this theology. Also, this cult was ancient in Plato's day.⁵ So, this could hardly be a fulfillment of the Spirit's prophecy regarding the latter days, which had to do with those who would depart from the faith, not invaders who had brought with them new doctrines. "Some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils." My conclusion is that this was a home-grown doctrine. It came from those who had been orthodox, but who had come up with new ideas.

Paul says that vegetarianism as a religious obligation is a doctrine

2. Josephus, War of the Jews, II:2.

3. Ibid., II:8.

4. W. K. C. Guthrie, The Greeks and Their Gods (Boston: Beacon Press, [1955] 1961), pp. 320–21.

5. Ibid., p. 320.

of demons. There is no trace of humility or forbearance here. Meat is something that “God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth.”

This leads Paul to make another observation: the goodness of the creation. “For every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving; For it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer.” Here, Paul breaks with the Mosaic law, which identified certain meats as unclean. In the post-resurrection world, this restriction has been annulled. To argue otherwise, Paul says, is to adopt a doctrine of demons.

This does not mean that certain animals are not poisonous to men. The fugu fish is poisonous if not prepared correctly.⁶ What Paul is rejecting is any suggestion that meats are ritually impure and therefore must be avoided. God created them good. The Mosaic restriction was clearly temporary. Any meat that is served by a host should be eaten by the recipient. If it will not kill you biologically, it will not kill you spiritually.

C. Needless Prohibitions

Paul says that religious leaders are lying to the flock. These leaders are importing an alien philosophy into the church. This must cease. Paul is not saying that refraining from marriage for the sake of a call from God is wrong. He is not saying that certain meats should not be avoided by people who are allergic to them. Instead, he is rejecting any suggestion that a universal prohibition on marriage is required, or that a universal prohibition on eating meat—or any species of meat—is legitimate.

The issue is theological. Paul tells Timothy to guard the flock against false ideas. These ideas are literally satanic: doctrines of demons. Those who promote them seek to create a works religion that promises to ingratiate man with God by means of man-made self-sacrifice. This not only does not ingratiate man with God, it angers God. Man is placing boundaries around God’s good gifts in the name of pleasing God. This is works religion.

These prohibitions are needless. They would commit the church to a program of expansion that would not rely on children who are born into covenant-keeping families: no marriages. These prohibitions would cut off church members from the joy of eating meat. They would create a mentality of personal sanctification through avoiding God's gifts. This was a theology of a greater blessing, a blessing greater than the blessings of marriage, children, grandchildren, and meat. It was of necessity a theology of an elite: people who are beyond the normal and valid desires of the flesh. It was a call to escape from history.

6. Nicholas D. Kristof, “Deflating a Poisonous Pufferfish Legend,” New York Times (June 10, 1996).

The New Testament calls men out of the realm of death into the realm of life (John 3:36). This is not a call out of history, but rather a call into the kingdom of God, whose representatives are to disciple the nations in history (Matt. 28:19).⁷

Paul writes: "For every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving: For it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer." Prayer sanctifies—sets apart—the common things of life. This indicates that saying grace before meals is both valid and beneficial. It is an act of thanksgiving. Prayer sanctifies food, including meat. There should be no fear regarding meat served by someone else. Do not refuse it, Paul tells Timothy.

This teaching opens the world to dominion by covenant. The entire creation is suitable for reclamation from Satan's kingdom because everything was originally designed by God to be good. The creation is eligible for restoration, i.e., sanctification by God through the activities of His covenant people. This is a theology of paradise restored.⁸

Conclusion

This passage opposes celibacy and religious vegetarianism as universal ideals within the church. It challenges both views as satanic doctrines. It makes it clear that sanctification is not a call to deny the world's pleasures, as long as these pleasures are bounded by covenant law. Marriage is not prohibited. Neither is meat.

This is a call to reclamation-restoration-reconstruction. God's good creation can be restored from sin. It will be restored at the final judgment, but, in the meantime, God's people are to treat the creation as good, not as a threat to their spiritual lives. The threat to men's spirits is sin, not the creation. The Fall of man was ethical, not metaphysical. So is the restoration of man and his environment.

7. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/GentryGGC>)

8. David Chilton, Paradise Restored: A Biblical Theology of Dominion (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1985). (<http://bit.ly/dcpardis>)

6

COMMON GRACE

For therefore we both labour and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, specially of those that believe (I Tim. 4:10).

The theocentric principle here is God's grace which is a gift unearned by the recipient. This is sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. The Savior of All Men

This verse is an enigma for those who reject universalism. In what way is God the savior of all men if billions of people are condemned to hell and then the lake of fire by the same God who supposedly saves them?

Calvin's said that the phrase, "Savior of all men," refers to God's kindness to all men.² There is no doubt that it has to mean this, but the theological question is this: In what way, and on what legal basis, does God show kindness to the unregenerate? If He saves all men, then why do they perish? If He saves all men, then how can some be saved when they have never heard to gospel of salvation by grace through faith in the substitutionary atonement of Jesus Christ at Calvary? The same question applies to I John 4:14: "And we have seen and do testify that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world."

The solution to this theological dilemma is the Greek word translated "specially." The word is malista. It means in this and other contexts, “particularly.” It is used within the context of a phenomenon that applies to a general category of individuals. The word identifies a subcategory to which the general phenomenon applies in to a heightened degree.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. John Calvin, Commentaries on the First Epistle to Timothy (1556), in Commentaries on the Epistles to Timothy, Titus, and Philemon (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, 1981), p. 112.

As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith (Gal. 6:10).

All the saints salute you, chiefly they that are of Caesar’s household (Phil. 4:22).

But if any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel (I Tim. 5:8).

Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour, especially they who labour in the word and doctrine (I Tim. 5:17).

So, there is a general phenomenon, salvation. Salvation applies in a heightened degree to people who believe in Jesus as savior. What can be said of salvation that applies to those who do not believe?

The Greek word for “savior” is soter. It comes from the root word, sozo. In many cases, it refers to redemption. “And she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name JESUS: for he shall save his people from their sins” (Matt. 1:21). But there are several instances where it cannot mean this. The Jews told Christ on the cross: “Thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, save thyself. If thou be the Son of God, come down from the cross” (Matt. 27:40). Again, “The rest said, Let be, let us see whether Elias will come to save him” (Matt. 27:49). In a broad context, the Greek word refers to wholeness in the sense of restoration to health.

For she said within herself, If I may but touch his garment, I shall be whole (Matt. 9:21).

And besought him greatly, saying, My little daughter lieth at the point of death: I pray thee, come and lay thy hands on her, that she may be healed; and she shall live (Mark 5:23).

And Jesus said unto him, Go thy way; thy faith hath made thee whole. And immediately he received his sight, and followed Jesus in the way (Mark 10:52).

They also which saw it told them by what means he that was possessed of the devils was healed (Luke 8:36).

Notwithstanding she shall be saved in childbearing, if they continue in faith and charity and holiness with sobriety (I Tim. 2:15).

In what way has God healed all men? In the sense of delivering them for a time from Adam's curse: death. This deliverance from death comes in a special way to covenant-keepers: deliverance from the second death, the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14).

So, Christ serves as a deliverer of all men in history, but also as a deliverer of His people in eternity. This deliverance takes place in history. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him" (John 3:36). There is a general deliverance, temporal existence, which fallen man does not deserve. Covenant-breakers are recipients of undeserved gifts from God. They are beneficiaries of common grace.³

It is on the judicial basis of Christ's death and resurrection that God extends undeserved gifts to covenant-breakers. This is the basis of common grace. The biblical doctrine of common grace does not imply God's favor to covenant-breakers, any more than His grant of time and power to Satan implies His favor.

There has been great confusion regarding the doctrine of common grace. It has been improperly used to justify versions of natural law theory. The doctrine can legitimately be used—indeed, must be used—to explain how the division of labor benefits both parties to a voluntary exchange, even though the exchange is made between a covenant-keeper and a covenant-breaker. Covenant-keepers benefit from the skills of covenant-breakers, and vice-versa.

B. The Division of Labor

God made the dominion covenant with all mankind (Gen. 1:26–28).⁴ Men were made by God to subdue the earth. This impulse to extend man's dominion is inherent in men's nature. What divides men is confession. There is division among men in terms of this question: On whose behalf does a man extend his dominion?

A man's ability to extend his area of responsibility in history is a gift of God that is unmerited by anything done by the recipient. It is a common gift because it is a gift to all mankind. But there is a law attached to this gift: any increase in a man's wealth is accompanied by an increase in his responsibility (Luke 12:47–48).⁵ Grace precedes law, but law always follows.

3. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

4. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

Because God's command to exercise dominion in history was given to all men, the division of labor becomes possible. A man can therefore cooperate with other men in joint ventures. All of them can legitimately expect to benefit from this voluntary cooperation. There is a common humanity based on God's creation of man in His image.

There need not be a common confession in order for the participants to benefit from their cooperation. There are many areas of life in which joint ventures are possible and desirable. On the basis of contract, people can create long-term ventures. A contract is not a covenant. A covenant is established by mutual oath between men under God. These covenants are limited to three areas: church government, civil government, and family government.

Conclusion

Common grace is the theological foundation of the division of labor in a fallen world. Participants in a voluntary exchange benefit, despite their rival covenantal confessions. Any theologian who denies the existence of common grace would have a difficult time explaining how covenant-breakers are not recipients of God's unmerited gifts. Covenant-breakers are clearly the beneficiaries of increased joint productivity and therefore increased wealth. How can this be explained theologically apart from the doctrine of common grace?

5. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

THE SUPPORT OF WIDOWS

Honour widows that are widows indeed. But if any widow have children or nephews [grandchildren], let them learn first to shew piety at home, and to requite their parents: for that is good and acceptable before God (1 Tim. 5:3–4).

The theocentric focus of this law is God’s office as Father, the faithful head of a household. This law is an application of the fifth commandment, “Honour thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee” (Ex. 20:12). Subordinates in a family owe allegiance and economic support to superiors. This is an aspect of hierarchy, not inheritance. Hierarchy is point two of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Responsibility and Welfare

The issue that Paul is dealing with in this section is whether the local church’s funds should be used to permanently support local widows. He makes it clear that the church is not the primary agency of welfare; the family is. The possibility that a widow should rely on the state for her support is not entertained by Paul. Roman politics had created tax-funded welfare programs for Roman citizens—bread and circuses—but Paul does not discuss them.

This judicial question must be raised: How did Paul define the family for the purpose of determining its economic responsibility? Paul says that a widow should be supported by children [tekna] or ekgona. The Greek word exgonoi is difficult to translate precisely. It appears only in this verse. Its root word indicates generation or origin.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

The word in this context refers to descendants. Nephews are not descendants. So, the word indicates grandchildren rather than nephews. Paul lays down a rule: a widow should be supported financially by her sons and grandsons. Children are supposed to support their parents, he says. The Greek word for “parents” appears in only one other verse, where it implies a more extended relationship: “I thank God, whom I serve from my forefathers with pure conscience, that without ceasing I have remembrance of thee in my prayers night and day” (II Tim. 1:3). Paul speaks in verse 3 of children and grandchildren; his concept of “parents” extends back more than one generation.

The West’s family structure is usually referred to as a nuclear family. This is defined as a married couple—male and female—who reside in the same household, along with their children. This definition of the family excludes uncles, aunts, and cousins, who are part of the extended family. In a nuclear family, one decision-maker, usually the male who controls access to the house and who generates the income for the family, has final responsibility. He exercises a veto. Legal control over access to the household is the mark of the head of a household. Even if his wife possesses the legal authority to disown the house—a good economic definition of ownership²—her husband still possesses final authority within the family because she is legally subservient to him. He controls access to the property even when he does not possess the authority to sell it. Ownership, biblically defined, is the legal right to exclude. It began with God’s restrictive boundaries around the tree in the garden of Eden. The head of the household possesses the legal authority to include or exclude his parents and his adult children.

In contrast is an extended patriarchal family, in which the oldest male possesses the veto unless he is mentally incompetent. He can gain legal access to his sons’ homes because of his biological status.

Paul places primary economic responsibility for the care of the aged widow on those who owe their existence to the person seeking care. This transfers to the widowed mother or grandmother an ecclesiastically enforced legal claim on the wealth of other households. These claims are limited hierarchically. They are strictly vertical. There is no horizontal extension to nephews. The original upward legal claim of the children on part of the economic output of the parents becomes a downward legal claim when the widow is aged and without property.

Paul acknowledges that the widow may be alone in life. In such a case, her commitment to active faith becomes a test of her eligibility to support. “Now she that is a widow indeed, and desolate, trusteth in God, and continueth in supplications and prayers night and day” (v. 5). Her mark of subordination is her constant intercessory prayer.

2. F. A. Harper, Liberty: A Path to Its Recovery (Irvington-on-Hudson, New York: Foundation for Economic Education, 1949), p. 106. (<http://bit.ly/LibertyPath>)

What if she has descendants who refuse to support her? If they are members of the church, they are candidates for excommunication. “But if any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel” (v. 8). What if they are infidels? Or what if they do not take seriously the threat of excommunication? Should she be awarded permanent assistance by the church as a legal obligation?

B. To Deny the Faith

Paul’s language is very strong. He compares these men unfavorably with covenant-breakers. Consider what Paul is saying. A man who will not support his aged mother or grandmother is worse than an infidel. It does not matter what his verbal profession of faith is; he is worse than an infidel. His refusal to support his mother or grandmother marks him as part of the covenant-breaking world.

How can this be? He has made a profession of faith in Christ. Doesn’t this guarantee his salvation? No. Paul’s language implies that his one-time profession of faith was devoid of saving faith. Words do not redeem a man; God’s unilateral imputation of Christ’s perfection redeems him. The one-time confessor is not part of the elect, despite his verbal profession. The theological content of his public confession of faith is offset by the content of his ethics. His actions have denied the faith. William Hendriksen wrote: “He has denied it not by means of words necessarily but (what is far often far worse) by means of his sinful negligence. Lack of positive action, the sin of omission, gives the lie to his profession of faith (subjective sense). Though he professes to be a Christian, he lacks the most precious of all the fruits that grow on the tree of a truly Christian life and conduct. He lacks love. Where this good fruit is absent, there cannot be a good tree.”³

The modern welfare state has substituted coercion for love. It has taxed each generation to pay the retirement expenses of previous generations. This has produced a permanent political conflict between the generations. The program has also undermined the sense of personal responsibility in the minds of children and grandchildren toward aged parents. "We are already paying," they think. Economically, they are correct; they are paying. But they are not paying for their own parents individually; they are paying members of a voting bloc of politically well-organized oldsters, who rarely think that they are receiving enough. At zero price, there is always greater demand than supply—in this case, demand for money.

3. William Hendriksen, New Testament Commentary: Exposition of the Pastoral Epistles (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, 1957), p. 171.

Because every industrial nation's compulsory retirement system is unfunded,⁴ these programs are all heading for bankruptcy. The statistics are well known to the actuaries in charge of the programs, but they are unknown to the general public. The public does not understand that all of the money that has been collected by the government in the name of the retirement programs has been spent, either to support earlier retirees or for everything else for which governments write checks. The "retirement trust funds" are nothing more than today's political promises of payments by future politicians. The retirement trust funds are filled with government IOU's that are usually not counted as debts in a national government's official budget. Voters think that there will be money for them at their retirement. They have been deceived by the politicians. They have demanded such deception. They have voted out of office any politician who has told the truth and has called for a substitution of a plan to invest these funds in the private sector, let alone a politician who has called for the abolition of the program and the establishment of full family responsibility. Without exception, every Western industrial nation is facing bankruptcy, either of these programs or their governments.⁵

Peter G. Peterson was Chairman of the Council on Foreign Relations, the most influential private advisory organization in the United States. He had access to most of the world's senior political leaders in the final decades of the twentieth century. Here is his assessment.

The leaders of the developed world all know what is coming. In private discussions I have had in recent years with President Clinton, Prime Minister Hashimoto, Prime Minister Thatcher, and other leaders of major economies, I learned that they were all fully briefed on the stunning demographic trends that lie ahead. But so far, despite the magnitude of the challenge, the political response has been paralysis rather than action, fear not commitment. Hardly any country is doing much at all. Yet year after year the crisis approaches with the measurable certainty of an advancing tidal wave. . . .

4. Chile's system is private, but it began late: the early 1980s.

5. Peter G. Peterson, Gray Dawn: How the Coming Age Wave Will Transform America—And the World (New York: Times Books, 1999).

Rarely have so many multilateral bodies—such as the International Monetary Fund (IMF), the World Bank, and the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD)—agreed with such unanimity on the dimensions of a problem. Margaret Thatcher told me that she repeatedly tried to raise this issue at the G-7 [large industrial nations] summit meetings. Yet the answer from her fellow leaders was, in effect, “Of course aging is a profound challenge, but it doesn’t hit until early in the next century. That means it won’t hit on my watch.”⁶

The modern industrial West, beginning with Chancellor Otto von Bismarck’s introduction of a compulsory old-age retirement program in late-nineteenth-century Germany, has steadily transferred responsibility for the care of the aged from the family to the state. Now the state faces bankruptcy, and those who have trusted the state’s promises face economic disaster in their old age. Their families, who have not prepared for the transfer of economic responsibility back to families, have no idea what is about to take place. Western voters thought in the twentieth century that they were wiser than God regarding old age care. In the twenty-first century, the West will find out that this assessment was incorrect. God is not mocked.

C. Helping the Truly Helpless

Consider the situation that Paul is dealing with in this passage. The widow has been adopted into the church through baptism. Her immediate biological family has abandoned her. If she is helpless, she deserves economic assistance. There are two other eligibility requirements. “Let not a widow be taken into the number under threescore years old, having been the wife of one man” (v. 9). “One” means one. Paul was not saying “the husband of a man.” As a widow, she had obviously been married to a man. By adding this limiting factor, Paul makes it clear that a widow who remarried and then was widowed again is not eligible for permanent, guaranteed assistance from the institutional church. This means that an infertile woman who married two or more men who left her no inheritance, and who also possesses no dowry, must seek permanent charity elsewhere. Paul offers no explanation for this restriction. For whatever reason, the institutional church is not to be burdened permanently with her care.

6. Ibid., pp. 7, 9.

On the basis of Paul's opposition to using the church's funds to support a twice-married, childless widow, his attitude toward compulsory wealth redistribution by the civil government can be inferred. He would have opposed any tax-funded welfare system. Moral claims, let alone legal claims, on other people's wealth are strictly limited in God's economy. If the local church where she is a member does not have any moral or legal responsibility financially for her support, then surely taxpayers do not have such a responsibility. The covenantal bond of the church is surely stronger than the state's bond.

Third, she must be of good reputation. "Well reported of for good works; if she have brought up children, if she have lodged strangers, if she have washed the saints' feet, if she have relieved the afflicted, if she have diligently followed every good work" (v. 10). The accent here is on service. She has served in the past; it is time for her to be served.

Younger widows are not allowed to receive permanent aid. "But the younger widows refuse: for when they have begun to wax wanton against Christ, they will marry" (v. 11). He recommends this to all young widows (v. 14.) Why, then, did he add the following? "Having damnation, because they have cast off their first faith" (v. 12). Their first faith had been Greek paganism. Abandoning this faith has not brought them under judgment. What did Paul have in mind here?

The Greek word for "first" sometimes means first in the sense of "chief" or "best."

And when a convenient day was come, that Herod on his birthday made a supper to his lords, high captains, and chief estates of Galilee (Mark 6:21).

And whosoever of you will be the chiefest, shall be servant of all (Mark 10:44).

But the father said to his servants, Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet (Luke 15:22).

What about the word, "wanton"? The Greek word is related to "delicious" or "luxurious." John wrote of the great harlot of Babylon, "How much she hath glorified herself, and lived deliciously [luxuriously—NKJV], so much torment and sorrow give her: for she saith in her heart, I sit a queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow" (Rev. 18:7). These widowed women had wasted their inheritances by easy living. They had ignored God's warning: "Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways, and be wise: Which having no guide, overseer, or ruler, Provideth her meat in the summer, and gathereth her food in the harvest" (Prov. 6:6–8).⁷ Why should the church now support them in their self-inflicted poverty? They had abandoned what had been their chief faith, which was faith in the God of sacrificial giving and personal service.

This was not a matter of eternal punishment. The Greek word translated as "damnation" can also be translated as "condemnation" or "judgment."

And one of the malefactors which were hanged railed on him, saying, If thou be Christ, save thyself and us. But the other answering rebuked him, saying, Dost not thou fear God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation? And we indeed justly; for we receive the due reward of our deeds: but this man hath done nothing amiss (Luke 23:39–41).

And if any man hunger, let him eat at home; that ye come not together unto condemnation. And the rest will I set in order when I come (I Cor. 11:34).

For the time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God: and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God? (I Peter 4:17).

Paul did not trust younger widows. He believed that they would become unproductive busybodies. "And withal they learn to be idle, wandering about from house to house; and not only idle, but tattlers also and busybodies, speaking things which they ought not" (v. 13). They need subordination. His suggested solution was marriage. "I will therefore that the younger women marry, bear children, guide the house, give none occasion to the adversary to speak reproachfully" (v. 14). Marriage can keep them in check. Keeping them in check is necessary, he says, "For some are already turned aside after Satan" (v. 15). He does not specify the nature of their infraction, but it seems to refer to an abandonment of the faith.

Here we have a contradiction with his recommendation in I Corinthians 7. "For I would that all men were even as I myself. But every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that. I say therefore to the unmarried and widows, It is good for them if they abide even as I. But if they cannot contain, let them marry: for it is better to marry than to burn" (I Cor. 7:7–9). Paul identified marriage in I Corinthians 7 as less productive for the kingdom of God than being unmarried. "But I would have you without carefulness. He that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord: But he that is married careth for the things that are of the world, how he may please his wife" (I Cor. 7:32–33). He argues the reverse in I Timothy 5 with respect to widows, who presumably are more likely to marry widowers than marry never-married men. This is why I conclude that Paul's recommendation in I Corinthians 7 was extra-revelational, as he said. "But I speak this by permission, and not of commandment" (I Cor. 7:6). Paul's personal bias as a bachelor or widower negatively influenced his assessment of marriage in his first epistle to the Corinthians.⁸ In I Timothy 5, he goes to the other extreme: a general distrust of all but old widows. This extreme position is the New Covenant's standard.

7. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 12.

The widow who has been married twice must do what she can to find a husband to support her. A husband must care for his wife. The church is not to be burdened with this legal responsibility.

Conclusion

Paul says it as clearly as it can be said: "If any man or woman that believeth have widows, let them relieve them, and let not the church be charged; that it may relieve them that are widows indeed" (v. 16). The economic support of widows is primarily the responsibility of family members, not the institutional church. The church must limit its commitment to those without any visible means of support.

Paul here establishes a fundamental New Testament economic principle: the family unit is the primary agency of welfare. The church should intervene only when there are no family members to support a widow, or where they have abandoned their responsibility. A Christian head of household who abandons this responsibility is subject to excommunication. He is worse than a covenant-breaker.

Widows who are under age 60 have no permanent claim on church resources. Widows who have remarried and who become widowed again also have no moral claim. When church members are not morally required to support all widowed members of the church, then there is no New Testament case for establishing a tax-funded welfare system that rests on the assumption that non-Christians are legally and morally required to pay to support such widows. Even less likely is a case for Christians' having to support non-Christians.

8. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 9.

8

THE POWER OF THE PURSE

Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour, especially they who labour in the word and doctrine. For the scripture saith, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn. And, The labourer is worthy of his reward (I Tim. 5:17–18).

The theocentric focus of this passage is the authority of God's written word: the Bible. The institutional issue is ecclesiastical vertical hierarchy. Elders represent God covenantally because of the supreme authority of the Bible. They speak on behalf of God by way of the Bible.¹ So, they are entitled to financial support from members' donations to the local church.

A. From Case Law to General Application

Paul cites a Mosaic case law: "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn" (Deut. 25:4).² This law is an aspect of hierarchy, specifically, God's authority as an employer. Men serve as God's delegated agents. An ox serves as a man's agent. There is a hierarchical system of responsibility upward and authority downward, with man as God's representative agent. This hierarchy includes the animal kingdom. I wrote in my commentary on Deuteronomy 25:4, second paragraph,

How a man treats his ox reflects how he treats workers in general. The ox is a symbol of dominion.³ It serves man as a working agent. It

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 63.

3. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), p. 779.

therefore is entitled to special protection. This is why the penalty for stealing and then either selling or destroying an ox is five-fold restitution (Ex. 22:1). For other forms of theft (except sheep), as well as for an ox or sheep found in the thief's possession, it is double restitution (Ex. 22:4).⁴

I must expand on this observation. Oxen and sheep in the Mosaic Covenant were judicially dealt with differently from other animals. This law governed sheep and oxen: "If a man shall steal an ox, or a sheep, and kill it, or sell it; he shall restore five oxen for an ox, and four sheep for a sheep" (Ex. 22:1). A second law governed sheep, oxen, and all other animals: "If the theft be certainly found in his hand alive, whether it be ox, or ass, or sheep; he shall restore double" (Ex. 22:4). Sheep and oxen were given extra protection by the added penalty for destroying them or selling them. The reason for this was that these domesticated animals represented mankind in a unique way. The ox was (and remains) symbolic of the employed servant.⁵ This is why Paul twice used the case law against the muzzling of ox as representative of employing men. Men use oxen for dominion purposes as a beasts of burden. Unlike a donkey or horse, both of which were unclean animals under the Mosaic law, an ox could lawfully be eaten. The same was true of sheep: they could be eaten after their wool production no longer produced a profit.

Rushdoony used the law against muzzling a working ox as a representative case of a general principle of biblical judicial interpretation. The jurisdiction of a case law is not confined to the specific judicial case to which it applies. It represents a broader principle of law.⁶

A laborer is entitled to his appropriate reward. This is a fundamental principle of economic justice. But the special honor of an elder has something unique to do with the judicial authority of an elder to interpret the word of God officially. The word of God, spoken from the pulpit at a church worship service, is an aspect of covenantal authority,

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 61.

5. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 43:D.

6. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 11, 506. Rushdoony used the Ten Commandments as general classifying principles for all of the Mosaic Covenant's laws. I am not persuaded that the Decalogue is the primary means of classification of every case law. I have pursued another approach in my commentaries: to discover the theocentric principle that undergirds a law, which may or may not be related primarily to just one of the Ten Commandments.

for the church is a covenantal institution established by a covenantal oath. In contrast, an employer-employee relationship carries with it no covenantal sanction, for it is established by voluntary agreement or contract, not by a joint self-maledictory oath under God as the agent of sanctions. Paul here refers to a covenantal obligation, not a market wage. A market wage is the product of open entry and competitive bidding. A wage earned by a pastor is not the product of open entry and competitive bidding. Not everyone qualifies to be a pastor. It should be presumed by those ordaining a man for pastor that he has a special call from God.

In another epistle, Paul cited this case law to justify his entitlement to financial support from a church, which he refused to accept. "For it is written in the law of Moses, Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn. Doth God take care for oxen? Or saith he it altogether for our sakes? For our sakes, no doubt, this is written: that he that ploweth should plow in hope; and that he that thresheth in hope should be partaker of his hope" (I Cor. 9:9–10). Paul was not saying that this law does not apply to oxen, or that it was exclusively for man's benefit. It applies to oxen. The Greek word translated here as "altogether" in another context means "surely." "And he said unto them, Ye will surely say unto me this proverb, Physician, heal thyself: whatsoever we have heard done in Capernaum, do also here in thy country" (Luke 4:23). It can also be translated as "by all means." "But bade them farewell, saying, I must by all means keep this feast that cometh in Jerusalem: but I will return again unto you, if God will. And he sailed from Ephesus" (Acts 18:21).

Paul says here that this case law was always meant for man more than it was for oxen. It applies to oxen as representatives of man. When a man treats an ox badly, this testifies to how he would treat other men, if he could get away with it.

B. Good Rulership

The Greek word for "rule" comes from two Greek words that mean "stand before." A ruler stands before the individual and tells him what to do. A teaching elder or minister traditionally stands before the congregation in a pulpit and tells them what God expects them to do. He possesses authority, as a ruler must.

Paul here differentiates elders who rule well from elders who do not. The former are worthy of double honor. Paul also differentiates between those elders who work in word and doctrine from those who do not. The former are especially worthy of honor. There is no doubt that Paul did not distinguish the specific task of preaching from the general task of ruling. Nevertheless, there is no clear evidence in this text or in Titus 1 that Paul had in mind two separate offices: either bishop vs. elder or preaching-teaching elder vs. ruling elder. What both passages clearly indicate is that Paul had this in mind: (1) two levels of performance and (2) two functional distinctions in service.

There is a grammatical distinction between the words for bishop and elder. The Greek word for “bishop” is related to the Greek word for “visit.” The Greek word for “elder” refers to age. “And they which heard it, being convicted by their own conscience, went out one by one, beginning at the eldest, even unto the last: and Jesus was left alone, and the woman standing in the midst” (John 8:9). “And it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out of my Spirit upon all flesh: and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams” (Acts 2:17). In every other instance in the New Testament, the word is used to describe an ecclesiastical officer. It is clear from this passage that elders do rule. Some rule well; others do not. Some specialize in preaching and teaching (doctrine); others do not.

If Paul is teaching a distinction between two offices—bishop vs. elder—then the text should reveal this. It does not. As far as this text reveals, there are two names for two functions: bishop and elder. The first function has to do with visitation. The second has to do with teaching: word and doctrine. Paul does not say here that these two functions are judicially distinct. Paul identifies all elders as holding the same office, some of whom are especially worthy of double honor because of their above-average performance or their specialization in doctrine and preaching. He does not single out bishops as automatically worthy of double honor.

C. Polity, Power, and the Purse

Paul here tells Timothy that those elders who rule well, especially those who teach, are worthy of double honor. He relates this distinction to a claim on financial support. The question arises: How is this claim to be enforced?

All elders exercise rule. Certain elders—those who rule well—are entitled to double honor, which includes financial support. This entitlement is a moral claim on a portion of the wealth of others. Those who are under the authority of elders are told by Paul to render both honor and payment to certain elders, i.e., those who rule well.

1. Institutional Authority

This raises the issue of evaluation. Who possesses the legitimate institutional authority to make the evaluation regarding the comparative performance of elders? Do the elders meet together and vote on who among them deserve financial support? Or do church members vote to determine this? Or do bishops make this determination? The institutional church has never come to agreement on this issue.

Paul says that elders who rule well are entitled to financial support, especially those who labor in word and doctrine. The emphasis is on theological instruction, not visitation.

There are two other things that Paul does not say here. First, he does not say that one group of elders, called bishops, possesses the authority to decide who among a second group of elders, called elders, deserve financial support. Second, he does not say that elders who possess equal authority are to meet with each other in order to decide which ones among them deserve financial support.

Paul writes this letter as an apostle (1:1, 2:7). He tells Timothy, his representative, to instruct the church at Ephesus regarding certain matters regarding ecclesiastical office. One of these matters is the question of access to formal church office. This is a judicial issue: the formal investiture of authority, which in turn should be based on performance criteria, such as hospitality, monogamy, good reputation, etc. A separate judicial matter is the question of pay deserved by certain elders. This has to do with an economic distinction between members and elders: one group pays; the other is paid. It also has to do with a distinction between elders: ruling well vs. ruling poorly.

Paul does not identify who it is in the church who possesses the lawful authority to determine which candidates for office meet the criteria for holding office. Through Timothy, he expects the church at Ephesus to be informed about these criteria. We know that additional information places additional responsibility on the hearers (Luke 12:47–48).⁷ This means that local members, not just elders, are responsible for seeing to it that the criteria for officers are met by the officers. This means that members who are not officers have a responsibility to impose sanctions on those officers who hold office unlawfully. What these sanctions are, Paul does not say. There are only two kinds of available ecclesiastical sanctions: judicial and economic. Members may or may not be allowed by denominational tradition to vote with their voices, hands, or ballots, but in every tradition, they can and do vote with their purses. The institutional church has never come to any agreement regarding the judicial sanctions that are lawfully possessed by members, but the church has always faced the reality of economic sanctions. The power of the purse is universal. It cuts across all denominational lines.

7. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

When Paul moves from a discussion of the criteria for church office to a discussion of that which some elders are owed by other church members, he raises the issue of church sanctions. Someone—unnamed—must make judgments regarding the performance of elders. These judgments must be enforced. Enforcement requires sanctions. What is the positive sanction? Money. What is the negative sanction? Withdrawal of economic support. These sanctions are imposed on elders. Because the epistle is directed to Timothy, the presumption is that its message is directed to church members, i.e., those who hear the epistle read to them. When this epistle was placed into the canon of Scripture by the church, the church thereby acknowledged that members possess the power of the purse.

Paul never specifically mandated judicial democracy for the church. That is, he did not say that members possess the lawful authority to grant church office or to withdraw it. What he says in this epistle is that church members do possess the lawful authority to decide which elders deserve their economic support: the power of the purse.

It could be argued that Paul's teaching is compatible with a hierarchical judicial system in which senior officers (bishops) decide which junior officers (elders) are entitled to economic support from members. Elders then threaten to impose judicial sanctions on church members who refuse to honor the judgment of the bishops by refusing to pay the elders identified by the bishops as deserving support.

The problem with this argument is that Paul's letter applied to all members of the church at Ephesus. All members were responsible for seeing to it that the criteria for church office were honored. They were also responsible for seeing to it that good rulers were paid. This raises a fundamental principle of ethics: responsibility is always accompanied by authority. There is no personal responsibility apart from the authority to impose sanctions in terms of personal judgments.⁸ Paul never wrote that church members possess the authority to vote for church officers, although this judicial authority seems to be implied by his listing of criteria for church officers. After all, why tell members about these criteria if members possess no institutional authority to bring judicial sanctions, either positive or negative? But it could also be argued that the sanctions they must bring are exclusively economic. Paul says only that the church owes economic support to good rulers. But if the right of church members to vote for church officers is denied, and their right to withhold economic support is also denied, then members in such a church are not personally responsible for what goes on in this church, for they possess no authority to impose formal sanctions of any kind. Such a denial of responsibility is contrary to Paul's letter. Paul's letter warns local church members to honor the criteria for church office and also honor the right of certain church officers to economic support. This means that Paul did authorize church members to impose the sanctions of economic support and the withdrawal of economic support.

Members have long ignored the criteria for church office, as have their officers. Never-married men are ordained to church office. Worse: married men in Eastern Orthodoxy and Roman Catholicism are denied access to high church office.⁹ Church members, for one reason or another, have always denied to the church the tithe that Jesus said men owe. "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithe of mint and anise and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith: these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone" (Matt. 23:23).¹⁰ So, church officers have evaded the criteria that Paul sets forth here for holding office, while church members have withheld the positive sanction of the tithe that Christ mandated. Rebellion against biblical law has been basic to church government throughout history. The officers have refused to abide by the specified judicial criteria, and the members have refused to abide by the specified economic criterion. Elders who, in terms of Paul's judicial criteria, are not entitled to hold office,

8. I speak here of the ethics of creaturehood. I am not speaking of a creature's responsibility or authority before God.

9. Chapter 3:D.

10. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 46.

nevertheless lay claim to members' money. Members withhold it, not because the elders were not lawfully ordained, but because members want their religion, but they want it cheap.

2. Fragmentation and Competition

Churches do not insist that members tithe as a condition of communicant membership. There have been times in the distant past when the institutional church did insist on the tithe, but officers could never successfully enforce this requirement. As the church has fragmented, beginning in 1054, when the Western Church excommunicated the Eastern church, this disintegration process has reduced the believability of any church that has insisted that "there is no salvation outside the church, and we exclusively are the church." The ability of a denomination's elders or bishops to persuade members to pay a tithe to the church has been related to their ability to persuade members that there is no salvation outside the denomination.

The Protestant Reformation created something like open entry into the market for churches. Churches have repeatedly appealed to the civil government to enforce the churches' regional monopolies, but the state has been unable to successfully enforce this grant of monopoly privilege ever since the mid-seventeenth century in Protestant countries. There have been direct grants of privilege, and still are in Europe, but not monopolies. There have been indirect grants of privilege, such as zoning laws that restrict the construction of new churches, but these regulations rarely constitute absolute bans on new construction. The automobile overcomes such local restrictions.

The Protestant Reformation increased competition both for membership and financial support. It did this by denying the Roman Catholic Church's claim of monopolistic control over the sacraments.¹¹ The Protestant Reformation multiplied the number of denominations beyond the two that had existed since 1054. Denominationalism has steadily undermined the public's acceptance of any single church's assertion of exclusivity as God's ecclesiastical representative in history. In the second half of the twentieth century, Roman Catholicism abandoned this exclusivism.¹² A few Protestant groups still claim such monopoly status,¹³ but the general Protestant view is that salvation is based on God's grace through an individual's faith, without any ministerial intermediation necessary to salvation. Parachurch ministries have also entered into competition with churches for financial support from Christians.

11. The Protestant Reformation was a battle over point four of the biblical covenant model: sanctions. It was a battle over the validity of prior ecclesiastical vows, and also over the lawful dispensing of the sacraments, including the judicial definition of the sacraments. It began over a theological dispute regarding the sale of indulgences, which the church alleged were certificates of exemption from eternal negative sanctions.

This competitive ecclesiastical market for members and money has moved churches in the direction of independency. Individual members decide how much money they will donate to a local church. Most Protestant churches allow members to elect church officers, who in turn make decisions regarding the hiring and firing of ministers, as well as ministers' salary levels. Democracy has become dominant: either formally or economically, or both. Members retain power over their individual purses, and this shapes polity, both officially and unofficially.

3. Authority and the Flow of Funds

Judicial authority flows upward from the people and downward from their representatives. This is a two-way flow of authority (Lev. 4).¹⁴ This is why God holds nations responsible for the actions of their leaders. This is why bad decisions by political leaders can have terrible effects in the lives of the citizenry.

Funds flow upward from those who are represented to those who represent them. This is true in both church government and civil government. Productivity originates in the efforts of church members or political citizens. A portion of the economic results of their productivity flows upward. Representative authority flows downward, but final judicial authority and also final economic authority both lodge at the bottom. Those people who are represented always have some degree of power over those who represent them, even in tyrannies. All forms of

12. When a Boston Jesuit, Leonard Feeney, continued to preach the older doctrine, he was excommunicated in 1953. This placed him in an ironic position: preaching that there is no salvation outside the Roman Church, he found himself outside the Roman Church for preaching this. He was readmitted into the church shortly before his death in 1978. His doctrine, which had been taught by the Roman Church throughout most of its history, by then had become just one more opinion among many—one no longer widely shared. To take him back was an exercise in the new ecumenical spirit. <http://www.fatherfeeney.com>

13. An example is the Church of Christ.

14. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 4.

temporal government rely on self-government. A central government possesses insufficient economic resources to compel large numbers of people to do anything that they have decided to resist, whether officially or unofficially. When those who are represented decide not to obey those who represent them, the representatives must either change the minds of the recalcitrant masses or else lose power.

Final authority in any system of government corresponds with the source of the funding. Final judicial authority over individual members lies with the hierarchy's senior officials, but final judicial authority with respect to the system of authority itself always lies at the bottom. This is why, in the long run, God holds individuals corporately responsible for what their leaders do in their name.

Economics reflects and reinforces this structure of judicial authority. Because economic productivity lies at the bottom of the hierarchy, so does economic authority. The hierarchical system must be funded. The producer at the bottom therefore retains a final veto if he is a free man. He can lawfully refuse to work. Every legally free man has a fundamental right not to work. Israel's exodus from Egypt is the supreme example of the right not to work. Their deliverance from slavery meant their right not to work for their former masters, who had enslaved them unlawfully.

Paul in this passage establishes a distinction regarding honor among elders, which he says is a distinction regarding funding. There are elders who do not rule well. The local congregation is not required to pay every elder. This clearly lodges final institutional authority over money with the members. As the delegated owners of God's money, they retain responsibility for deciding where it should go.

Because the local congregation is empowered by God to decide who gets paid and who does not, it possesses economic authority. Even in hierarchical denominations, local congregations retain most of the authority. The main issue is not the exercise of the franchise. Members in some denominations may not be allowed to vote regarding which elders are ordained to office. This is true in the case of prelacy generally and also Presbyterianism with respect to teaching elders, who are members of a presbytery rather than a congregation. Members nevertheless retain their God-given authority to reward those elders who rule well. This means that they possess the God-given authority to withhold payment from elders who, in their opinion, do not rule well. Members can voluntarily leave the local church in order to attend somewhere else. They take their purses with them. Legal authority may or may not lodge in the denomination's corporate assembly of members, but economic authority always does.

In the free market, an owner retains legal control over a resource. Customers possess the authority to assess this resource's value even though they do not own it. Competitive bidding—sellers vs. sellers, buyers vs. buyers—sets the market price of every economic resource in a free market. Owners can decide whether or not to offer an item for sale, but they do not determine the demand for their resource beyond their own personal demand. Customers determine demand.

The process of establishing the value of services supplied by elders is analogous to the free market's pricing system. Church membership is voluntary. Candidates for church office compete against each other. Judicial screening determines the supply of elders: the ordination process. Local congregations may ordain men directly, or a hierarchy of already ordained elders may do this on behalf of the members. In either case, the value of elders' services, with respect to their wages, is determined by members, who decide how much money to donate to a local church.

There is, in addition, competition among churches for members and elders. This affects the wages paid to elders. There is open entry for new congregations.

If every church member were required to tithe as a condition of communicant membership—access to the Lord's Supper—then formal economic authority would be transferred to that agency within the church which hires and fires elders, and which also determines the quality of their performance. I am aware of no denomination today that claims that its members have an obligation to tithe as a condition of participating in the sacraments. Therefore, if donors decide not to pay, the formal authority possessed by elders to extract payment from members becomes worthless, i.e., of zero market value.

If every communicant member were required to tithe as a condition of voting in church elections, then judicial authority in the church would tend to follow the flow of funds. Those who pay their tithes would gain corporate authority over the allocation of these funds. I am aware of no church that mandates payment of a tithe as a condition of the right to vote. Those members who do not tithe possess equal judicial authority—one member, one vote—with those who do tithe.

In churches where members cannot vote for elders, they can vote with their pocketbooks or with their feet. They can donate less money or leave the local church. Elders or bishops may retain the formal authority to allocate the church's income autonomously, but this income will depend on the members' assessment of the quality of rulership exercised by the elders. The power of the purse shapes denominational polity and influence.¹⁵

4. Democracy and the Veto

Legal access to church office is different from the legal authority under God to determine who rules well. Paul here establishes the legal authority of local church members to determine which elders are worthy of their economic support. Members possess a lawful economic veto. This is not merely a matter of functional economic authority. It is a legal authority established by Paul.

The laymen's legal authority over the payment of elders has influenced church polity throughout history. Debates over polity among the denominational traditions have not been resolved. There is no agreement regarding bishops, elders, and the locus of the authority to ordain officers. Despite these disagreements, the power of the purse has moved Christianity in the direction of localism. Hierarchies must respond to the flow of funds if they are to survive. Individual laymen possess lawful and operational authority over the allocation of their money. Corporately, they also possess a God-given authority over the allocation of the elders' wages. Paul makes this judicial principle clear in this passage. Elders in certain hierarchical church traditions have long resisted this principle of the judicial authority of laymen over payment to elders, but, over time, all branches of the church have accommodated this principle to some degree.

The institutional church is inherently democratic. This has been an important lesson of church history. The institutional church depends on donations. Donors possess legal authority over their money. The individual's conscience ultimately is the final economic authority under God. No church council can remove this authority. The member retains an economic veto. Paul acknowledges this final economic authority in this passage.

15. Mainline Protestant denominations in the United States have suffered from reduced growth in both membership and donations, compared with evangelical churches, ever since 1926, the year following the Scopes "monkey" trial. Robert T. Handy, "The American Religious Depression, 1925–1935," Church History, 29 (1960), pp. 3–16. This disparity increased after 1960. Members have brought negative sanctions on the liberal hierarchies. There has also been attrition due to the normal process of death and replacement. Liberal denominations are not replacing their dead. The spiritually dead are burying the biologically dead.

D. Taxation and Legitimacy

Civil governments are similarly constrained. Historically, kings have faced resistance from lower authorities regarding the level of taxation. The best example of this constraint in the Bible is the successful rebellion of Jeroboam and the ten tribes against the high-tax regime of Rehoboam (I Kings 12).¹⁶ The best example of this constraint in Western history is the Magna Carta (1215), in which barons and the lower military orders extracted from England's King John the acceptance of their authority to ratify or reject his tax policies. Civil governments always face taxpayer resistance.

1. Taxation and Localism

The power of national civil governments to compel payment retards the development of localism. The greater the power of the central government to collect taxes, the more centralized the state becomes. Money flows upward; so does power. The relationship between money and power is self-reinforcing, up to a point. At some point in history, however, the power of a particular civil government to collect taxes begins to fade. When it does, tax revolts produce decentralization. The centuries-long disintegration of the Western Roman Empire is the supreme example of this process in history.

The multiplication of political jurisdictions reduces the ability of central governments to collect taxes directly from the public. This is analogous to the effects of the Protestant Reformation. Competition for the output of citizens enables voters to make political decisions regarding how much to pay and which governments get what percentage of their wealth.

A popular slogan in the English American colonies in the years preceding the American Revolution (1775–83) was this: "No taxation without representation." This slogan was an extension of the principle that undergirded the Magna Carta. Colonists who favored resistance to the British Parliament argued that local colonial legislatures, not Parliament, possessed the lawful authority to tax citizens. Parliamentary theorists denied this principle of taxation. Technically, Parliament ever since 1689 has not had any formal restraints on its sovereignty.

16. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 20.

Realistically, it has had many restraints. The success of the American Revolution made clear to Parliament's defenders just how relevant these restraints were.

In the early modern period of Western European Civilization, beginning around 1500, there began a consolidation of civil governments. Soon after, the Protestant Reformation weakened the authority of a centralized church to oppose these new national governments in Northern Europe. This political centralization process visibly peaked on December 31, 1991, when the Soviet Union collapsed in a nearly bloodless transfer of power from the Communist Party.¹⁷ It is always difficult to date precisely a civilization-wide change, but that event surely represented a change in direction. The break-up of the Soviet Empire into a confederation of states immediately followed. The multiplication of nations after the end of World War II in 1945 has continued. The ability of central governments to enforce domestic peace and security is fading.¹⁸ The looming bankruptcy of Western industrial nations' programs of tax-funded retirement and medical care of the aged¹⁹ threatens to undermine the legitimacy of these governments.

The decentralization of ecclesiastical authority that began with the Protestant Reformation led to the centralization of regional political power in Europe. This centralization now seems to have reached its limits. Above all, the limit on taxation marks this reversal. It is becoming clear that high-tax nations lose their ability to compete economically in international markets against low-tax nations.

2. Competition in Taxation

Today, what the Protestant Reformation began in ecclesiology, the free market is producing in politics. Decentralization is making itself felt. The inability of churches to collect donations from members who can walk across the street and join another church is matched by the inability of civil governments to collect taxes from businesses that can move to another jurisdiction. Competition in taxation has appeared.

17. Michael Dobbs, Down with Big Brother: The Fall of the Soviet Empire (New York: Knopf, 1997), pp. 374–410.

18. Jacques Barzun, From Dawn to Decadence: 500 Years of Western Cultural Life: 1500 to the Present (New York: HarperCollins, 2000), pp. 776–77. Martin van Creveld, The Rise and Decline of the State (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1999), pp. 394–408.

19. Peter G. Peterson, Gray Dawn: How the Coming Age Wave Will Transform America—And the World (Times Books, 1999).

Businesses move outside a nation or to regions inside where local taxes are lower. Price competition among taxing authorities is reducing the power of the state.

Little of this was evident as recently as 1975. During the 1980's, England's Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, America's President Ronald Reagan, and Communist China's Premier Deng Xiaoping provided rhetoric for reduced taxation and reduced government control over the economy. All three followed through politically on their rhetoric. Thatcher and Reagan achieved reductions in the rate of taxation on the higher income brackets. Deng achieved a reduction in direct government control over business. All three nations experienced renewed economic growth, especially China, which had been far more regulated than England or America.

What the Western church experienced first, beginning with the Protestant Reformation, the state has now begun to experience: competition among jurisdictions. This echo effect from church to state took almost five centuries. But there had been a previous echo effect. What the Roman state experienced after the second century, the Western church experienced fourteen centuries later: decentralization and a loss of authority. The early church had imitated the political centralization of Rome. The church never attained equal power, for the decline of the Roman Empire and its economy was irreversible by the time Christian emperors came to power in the fourth century. The break-up of imperial Rome made impossible ecclesiastically anything like the centralization of power and money that the West's largest nation-states achieved after 1500.

The early church self-consciously adopted much of the structure of the Roman state, beginning no later than the mid-fourth century. The Roman state became the institutional model for the medieval church. The modern secular state has imitated imperial Rome's extension of power. This imitation was self-conscious, beginning with the Renaissance's revival of republican Rome as the ideal political order. As surely as republican Rome's constant warfare transformed it into imperial Rome, so did the constant warfare of Renaissance Italy's city-states erode their republican liberties.

The modern state has now begun to retrace imperial Rome's decline, after Rome's overextension began to erode the ability of its taxing agents to collect wealth from the oppressed residents of the empire. Resistance to state power is now growing. The weapons of this resistance are military and economic. The heart of both processes is price competition. Weapons keep getting cheaper, and so does the flow of capital. The ability of central governments to extract wealth from distant nations and nearby taxpayers is declining.

A transfer of political legitimacy always accompanies any sustained reduction of political power. The early modern Renaissance nation-states of Northern Europe provided protection for regional Protestant churches. In exchange, these churches offered legitimacy to the civil rulers. This dual process eroded the authority of the Roman Church, which could not impose physical sanctions without civil co-operation. Spain attempted to become the European enforcer for the Vatican in the sixteenth century. The attempt failed. Spain faded as a political force after England's defeat of the Spanish Armada in 1588. Protestantism prospered economically. But after the bloody civil wars of the mid-seventeenth century in the German states and the British Isles, it was humanism, not Protestantism, that received credit for political freedom, economic growth, and technological progress. Social theorists believed that Christianity and the Bible could not provide a method of obtaining agreed-upon answers to social and political problems. Intellectuals sought agreement through appeals to a common reason. The intellectual and political influence of all churches faded. Humanism gained steadily in public legitimacy after the French Revolution (1789–94), despite its horrors.

With the Renaissance, the religion of humanism hitched its wagon to the star of the modern state. It had to. Its role model was classical humanism, which had also hitched its star to the state: first, the Greek polis; then, Rome's empire. This alliance between humanism and statism accelerated rapidly after the political standards of Enlightenment humanism led to the United States Constitution (1788)²⁰ and the French Revolution.

Next, the humanist state created its own established church: tax-funded schools. By 1810, this church was well-established in France. It took until 1900 to consolidate the process in the United States, where private education has not died out completely.²¹ But confidence in the

20. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), Part 3. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>) I have updated this: Conspiracy in Philadelphia: Origins of the United States Constitution (Harrisonburg, Virginia: Dominion Educational Ministries, Inc., 2004). (<http://garynorth.com/philadelphia.pdf>)

21. The most prestigious universities in the United States, with one exception, are privately funded. The exception is the University of California at Berkeley, created in the early 1870s. They are: Harvard, Yale, Princeton, Berkeley, Stanford, Chicago, and state's abilities to ensure prosperity has now begun to fade, and so has public confidence in the more self-conscious and consistent institutions of humanism. The ability of humanism's institutions to extract wealth from the public through its enforcer, the secular state, is reminiscent of the sixteenth-century Vatican's attempt to extract wealth and obedience from Northern Europeans by means of Spain's flow of gold and power. That dream sank with the Armada.

Conclusion

The laymen's power of the purse is guaranteed ecclesiastically by Paul's observation that some elders rule well, while others do not. The former are worthy of economic support. The others are not. Someone must make the assessment of rulership. This someone is the communicant member. He retains his right to allocate his money. If the local church is faithful, allocating money to elders who rule well and who also meet the criteria for eldership, then members are supposed to tithe to the local church. If these standards are not upheld by the ordaining agency, then a man has the right to look elsewhere for membership.

A man's tithe is to go to his local congregation.²² But members are supposed to retain the right to assess the performance of their elders. If this right is negated by the elimination of a tither's right to vote for those who will exercise rule over them, as is the case in prelacy, then members are allowed by God to transfer membership without restriction. Not to permit this would constitute a denial of the right of members to assess the performance of their elders.

Competing churches have reduced pressures on members to pay tithes. Members use this competition to avoid meeting their obligation to tithe (Matt. 23:23). This is rebellion. The tithe is morally mandatory for members. This fact is not to become a justification for churches to Columbia, with Harvard always at the top, ever since its founding in 1636. This group remains constant, generation after generation. All of them are equally secular. Tax-funded higher education below these premier institutions is dominant, and has been since about 1900. There are about a dozen very high-prestige, little-known four-year private colleges, and about the same number college preparation academies in the Northeast for the sons of the rich and well-connected, but tax-funded education is what most Americans have faith in. This faith is now wavering, but it presently triumphs by default.

22. Gary North, Tithing and the Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994). (<http://bit.ly/gntithing>) Gary North, The Covenantal Tithe (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2011).

ordain men who do not meet God's qualifications, or to pay men who do not rule well.

Churches are democratic if they allow all members vote regarding (1) those who will serve in church offices, and (2) how much money to pay them. This transfers judicial authority to non-tithing members. But because of the effects of Pareto's unexplained law, approximately 20% of the members will contribute approximately 80% of the church's income. Whether they control the vote or not, these members will control policy because of the threat of their departure.

Western churches have moved in the direction of laymen's control. Their source of funding made this inevitable. So did the break-up of the international church in 1054 and after 1517 in the Western church. Any denomination's claim of monopoly status over the sacraments and access to the road to heaven has been challenged by the proliferation of rival churches. People have gone shopping for churches in much the same way that they have shopped for other services. They have decided which churches best meet their needs and beliefs. The twentieth century made universal a democratic tendency that was implicit in the Protestant Reformation. Luther's declaration of the right of conscience was ratified by the laymen's power of the purse. This trend toward democracy and local control became visible in Roman Catholicism after Vatican II in the early 1960s.

This trend has also brought about an increased influence by women, for in all branches of the Western church, women have been in the majority.²³ Husbands have long granted to women the authority to allocate part of the family budget to religious purposes. This, plus their donations of time, have gained women great influence over churches and parachurch ministries. No matter what church officers decree, she who pays the piper calls, if not the tune, then at least the orchestral arrangement.

Economic democracy extends from church to state. An individual can decide where his after-tax money goes, meaning the after-tax output of his productivity. He decides the degree of his cooperation with the state by means of voting and also by means of his participation in the division of labor economy. If he grows tired of paying so many taxes, he can refuse to work for money. He can grow his own food. He can withdraw from the division-of-labor economy. He is responsible before God for what he does (Luke 12:47–48).²⁴ No earthly committee will mediate for him on judgment day. So, in principle, conscience determines where the income from a person's productivity goes. The Protestant principle of the authority of the individual conscience is manifested in church and state through the individual's power over his purse.

23. Leon J. Podles, The Church Impotent: The Feminization of Christianity (Dallas, Texas: Spence, 1999).

24. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 28.

MASTERS AND SERVANTS

Let as many servants as are under the yoke count their own masters worthy of all honour, that the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed. And they that have believing masters, let them not despise them, because they are brethren; but rather do them service, because they are faithful and beloved, partakers of the benefit. These things teach and exhort (I Tim. 6:1–2).

The theocentric principle here is the holiness of God. Specifically, it is the holiness of God's name. Holiness is point three of the biblical covenant. It also refers to boundaries.¹ Paul's commandment is an aspect of the third commandment: the prohibition against taking God's name in vain. There is a boundary around God's name. The context of God's holy name here is the exercise of Christian faith, which involves obedience to lawful authorities: point two of the biblical covenant model.² Here, point three—holiness—is linked to point two: hierarchy/representation. Slave owners represent God, Paul says. But so do covenant-keeping slaves, who impute honor to their masters. Rendering judgment is an aspect of sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.³

A. Imputed Honor and Faithful Service

Paul is speaking here of slaves, not temporary hired servants. The Greek word, doulos, is the same for both forms of subordination. The differentiating factor is Paul's reference to a yoke. A person who is under a yoke is not a hired servant; he is a slave. In the same way that Christians are permanent slaves of Christ, not merely part-time hired servants, so are slaves to their masters. Christ told His followers: "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light" (Matt. 11:29–30). It is not a part-time yoke.

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012).

2. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

3. Sutton, ch. 4. North, ch. 4.

1. Imputation

The slave is required to count his master as honorable. The Greek word here translated as "count" is used frequently for "rule" or "govern," "ruler" or "governor."

And thou Bethlehem, in the land of Juda, art not the least among the princes of Juda: for out of thee shall come a Governor, that shall rule my people Israel (Matt. 2:6).

But ye shall not be so: but he that is greatest among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that doth serve (Luke 22:26).

Then pleased it the apostles and elders, with the whole church, to send chosen men of their own company to Antioch with Paul and Barnabas; namely, Judas surnamed Barsabas, and Silas, chief men among the brethren (Acts 15:22).

The same word is also translated as "thought" or "count," in the sense of making an evaluation.

Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God (Phil. 2:6).

But what things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ (Phil. 3:7).

Yea doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung, that I may win Christ (Phil. 3:8).

The meaning of the Greek word is tied to authority: the authority to make an evaluation. The person who evaluates anything renders judgment. He evaluates something in terms of standards. He is under authority and law in his capacity as a person in authority who evaluates the situation. He is part of a hierarchy: God > law > man. He who renders judgment is also the object of God's authoritative rendering of judgment. Men are called on by God to render judgment in terms of God's higher, authoritative judgment. Covenant-keepers are supernaturally enabled to do this. "For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him? But we have the mind of Christ" (I Cor. 2:16).⁴

The slave is to render judgment on his master. He is to count him worthy of all honor due to legitimate rulers. How can this be done when a master is evil? The slave should do this because he recognizes that God has placed him in a position of subordination. History is not random; it is providential. The slave is to honor God's hierarchical control over history by honoring his master as legally worthy of honor. The honor in question is the honor associated with obedience. It means "acknowledging one's legally subordinate position in thought, word, and deed." It does not mean that the slave is to imagine that an evil master is any less evil because of his authority over the slave.

The Christian slave is God's designated agent of imputation. He possesses the mind of Christ. Even though he is functionally and judicially subordinate, he is covenantally superior. He imputes on behalf of God. He is required by God to defend the integrity of this lawful imputation by serving his master faithfully. When he does this, he thereby heaps coals of fire on his wicked master's head (Rom. 12:19–21).⁵ He brings negative sanctions on him in eternity by bringing positive sanctions on him in history.

How can someone who is functionally and judicially subordinate be a master in God's eyes? The answer is seen best in Christ on the cross. He was judicially and functionally subordinate to Rome and Israel, but He pronounced judgment. He extended mercy. "Then said Jesus, Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do. And they parted his raiment, and cast lots" (Luke 23:34). Peter later honored Christ's judgment when presenting his covenant lawsuit before Israel. "But ye denied the Holy One and the Just, and desired a murderer to be granted unto you; And killed the Prince of life, whom God hath raised from the dead; whereof we are witnesses. And his name through faith in his name hath made this man strong, whom ye see and know: yea, the faith which is by him hath given him this perfect soundness in the presence of you all. And now, brethren, I wot [know] that through ignorance ye did it, as did also your rulers" (Acts 3:14–17). So, the authority to render judgment on God's behalf comes with the imputation of Christ's righteousness. "And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me; That ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Luke 22:29–30).⁶

4. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 2.

5. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 10.

2. Rendering Honor

What is the meaning of "honor"? The Greek word can mean "price,"⁷ but it generally refers to a position of high esteem. The word is applied to God and Christ.

For Jesus himself testified, that a prophet hath no honour in his own country (John 4:44).

Now unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honour and glory for ever and ever. Amen (I Tim. 1:17).

Who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto; whom no man hath seen, nor can see: to whom be honour and power everlasting. Amen (I Tim. 6:16).

And when those beasts give glory and honour and thanks to him that sat on the throne, who liveth for ever and ever (Rev. 4:9).

In these contexts, the Greek word refers to a hierarchy. He who is at the top of a hierarchy is worthy of honor from those under his authority. So, for a slave to render judgment with respect to a master, he must first count him worthy of obedience. The slave must honor the hierarchy. The slave is a permanent member of this hierarchy. He cannot lawfully quit or run away, as Paul understood when he wrote to Philemon, the owner of an escaped slave, Onesimus. "For perhaps he therefore departed for a season, that thou shouldest receive him for ever" (Phm. 1:15).

Paul teaches here that honor is owed by the slave to the owner. The owner does not owe manumission to the slave. This legal relationship was one-way: from bottom to top. This is a New Testament document. It cannot legitimately be ignored, however disturbing its implications may be for modern Christians.

6. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 51.

7. Matthew 27:6, 9; Acts 4:34; Acts 5:2–3; Acts 19:19.

3. Serving God and Men

This imputation of honor is based on the master's office, not his performance. The slave is under the master's authority. Because the master is worthy of all honor due to legitimate rulers, the slave should serve efficiently. He is required by God to render superior service to the master irrespective of any incentives offered for superior performance. The slave is to regard his work as work for God, even if his master is an evil man. The master benefits even though he does not impute superior value to the slave's work.

The slave may expect the master to regard faithful service as faithful. This expectation implicitly rests on the assumption of God's common grace. Why should a covenant-breaking master evaluate correctly the faithfulness of his slave? Only because God has restrained the master's sin-bent powers of evaluation. It should come as no surprise to a slave that his covenant-breaking master does not appreciate him. The ethical issue is the response of the slave to his master's incorrect evaluation of the value of the slave's services. Paul sets forth the proper response: obedience. This obedience is owed irrespective of the master's powers of evaluation.

This requirement runs counter to human nature, which is fallen. More important, it runs counter to the system of sanctions that governs free economic institutions. It calls on the slave to render something for nothing, i.e., to render faithful service in the absence of direct positive incentives from the master. Paul calls on Christian slaves to do this because they serve a greater Master, who has placed them under a permanent system of vertical hierarchy in history. They cannot leave without permission, so their work is tied to service to the master. To serve God well, slaves must serve their owners well. Their reward will be from God in eternity, and possibly in history. There are positive sanctions, but not always in history.

This verse implies the existence of a system of cause and effect that runs counter to other theories of self-interested human action. The master is to benefit from the work of Christian slaves, even if he is a covenant-breaker. Is this not a situation where the life of the covenant-keeper is expended in order to increase the inheritance of the covenant-breaker? If this is the case, then what of this principle? "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov. 13:22).⁸

8. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs

Obedience to lawful authority is a means of imposing negative eternal sanctions: coals of fire (Rom. 12:19–21). It is also a way of gaining positive sanctions in history. There is common grace.⁹ A faithful testimony through obedience is a testimony to the gospel. A master is rarely so blind that he cannot distinguish faithful service from rebellion. There is common grace in history. The obedient slave testifies to God's grace to the master.

4. Subsidizing Evil

The defender of the free market argues that faithful service will be rewarded. The master buys improved service. But this assumes a world in which slaves respond better when they are treated better. Paul tells slaves to obey, irrespective of sanctions received. Would this practice undermine the good treatment of slaves? It rewards evil, subsidizing bad performance by masters. Does God's law subsidize evil? God's civil law does not, but this requirement does. What is the explanation for this seeming anomaly, i.e., that covenant-keepers are called by God to subsidize evil?

There are at least three reasons. First, this law reduces lawless rebellion and potential bloodshed. It is anti-revolutionary. Social peace is subsidized by the individual slave's obedience. Social peace is a blessing. The implication of this law is that social peace is a superior policy in the extension of God's kingdom than a policy of rebellion against lawful authority. The obedient slave is subsidizing an evil master's bad behavior, but this is an indirect or secondary outcome of his obedience. The slave is directly subsidizing social peace. He is directly subsidizing the biblical principle of lawful hierarchy.

Second, this law rests on a theory of causation in which God defends His people from oppression. God correctly evaluates the value of the slave's service, even if the owner doesn't. God sees. God intervenes in history on behalf of His people. This is the teaching of covenant theology. The wicked master is setting himself up for God's judgment in history.

The wicked, through the pride of his countenance, will not seek after God: God is not in all his thoughts. His ways are always grievous; thy judgments are far above out of his sight: as for all his enemies, he puffeth at them. He hath said in his heart, I shall not be moved: for I shall never be in adversity. His mouth is full of cursing and deceit and fraud: under his tongue is mischief and vanity. He sitteth in the lurking places of the villages: in the secret places doth he murder the innocent: his eyes are privily set against the poor. He lieth in wait secretly as a lion in his den: he lieth in wait to catch the poor: he doth catch the poor, when he draweth him into his net. He croucheth, and humbleth himself, that the poor may fall by his strong ones. He hath said in his heart, God hath forgotten: he hideth his face; he will never see it. Arise, O LORD; O God, lift up thine hand: forget not the humble. Wherefore doth the wicked condemn God? he hath said in his heart, Thou wilt not require it. Thou hast seen it; for thou beholdest mischief and spite, to requite it with thy hand: the poor committeth himself unto thee; thou art the helper of the fatherless. Break thou the arm of the wicked and the evil man: seek out his wickedness till thou find none (Ps. 10:4–15).

(Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 41.

9. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

It is not disobedience on the part of a slave to call upon God in his prayers to act on his behalf. This is what the Israelites did in Egypt (Ex. 2:23). God answered their prayers, though not in the way they expected. He delivered them out of Egypt rather than delivering them inside Egypt or over Egypt.

Third, the slave-subsidized accumulation of wealth by the covenant-breaker will either pass into oblivion through bad decisions by the covenant-breaker or his heirs, or else he or his heirs will become covenant-keepers. “The wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just” (Prov. 13:22b). Christianity teaches dominion through service.¹⁰ In no passage is this principle any clearer than this one.

The same principle of dominion through service undergirds the free market. The difference is, the free market’s hierarchy is not oath-bound. It is horizontal.¹¹ Customers (sellers of money) are supreme, because money is the most marketable commodity. In a free market, competition among entrepreneurs for the money spent by customers transfers wealth to those entrepreneurs who best serve customers, as determined by the customers. In an unfree judicial order, this process takes longer, for the state interferes coercively with this allocation of the entrepreneurs’ wealth by the customers. But the customers’ authority cannot be overcome indefinitely. Producers stay in business by serving customers. To remain in control of his capital, which includes the slave, the slave owner must serve customers efficiently.

10. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 51.

11. Introduction:G:2.

So, by serving a covenant-breaking owner, the faithful slave serves God and also serves customers. To the extent that the covenant-breaker's capital is put to evil uses, to this extent he is dissipating his capital. The covenant-keeping slave can have confidence that his own efforts are not in vain in history. Sooner or later, customers will benefit. The master is a middleman to the extent that he seeks a profit. The economic hierarchy still has customers in authority, irrespective of the legal hierarchy.

B. Unlawful Rebellion

"Let as many servants as are under the yoke count their own masters worthy of all honour, that the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed" (6:1). The Greek word translated here as "blasphemed" is elsewhere translated as "speak evil,"¹² "slanderosly reported" (Rom. 3:8), and "defamed" (I Cor. 4:13). When used with respect to God, the King James Version adopts some variant of "blaspheme." Thus, to speak falsely, knowingly, and maliciously with respect to God is to commit blasphemy. This passage indicates that to speak falsely and maliciously against the doctrine of God is also to commit the sin of blasphemy. This does not mean that committing a theological error is blasphemous. It means that speaking falsely in a way that prejudices the truth is a form of defamation. It is breaking the ninth commandment against false witness, which has a judicial frame of reference.

What is Paul's concern in this passage? He warns Timothy to instruct the church that servants should honor their masters. For slaves to become resentful or rebellious against their owners leads to the defamation of God and His doctrine. How does this happen? By way of a false accusation. Those who hear of such rebellion by Christian servants may conclude that God authorizes this sort of rebellion. God does not authorize it. Paul makes this plain in the next sentence: "And they that have believing masters, let them not despise them, because they are brethren; but rather do them service, because they are faithful and beloved, partakers of the benefit."

A test of true faith for a slave, Paul implies, is faithfulness to the master. In the first sentence, Paul refers to masters in general. In the second sentence, he refers to Christian masters. The master is due respect in both cases. Why? Because of God's name and doctrine, Paul says explicitly. Why God's name and doctrine? Because of the vertical hierarchical nature of all reality, and because God, as the Creator, is the cosmic Owner of the universe. God has placed the slave in his subordinate position.

12. Romans 14:16; I Cor. 10:30; I Peter 4:4, 14; II Peter 2:2, 10, 12; Jude 1:8, 10.

Obedience is a test of faith. The slave occupies a position of authority. He is under the master, but he is over some aspect of the creation. Man as a species is under God but over creation; so is the individual slave. He serves the master by adding to the master's wealth. The master increases his own productivity and output by means of the household division of labor in a vertical hierarchy. What is true for the master is equally true for the slave. The slave is part of this hierarchical system of production: vertically, under the owner; horizontally, under the customers. This in turn is an aspect of dominion. Paul's argument rests on a concept of dominion through subordination.¹³

This view of man's dominion over nature in history is opposed by most views of cause and effect. Most religions hold either to a view of conquest by force (e.g., Islam) or by a concept that dominion is illegitimate and in the long run impossible (e.g., Hinduism, Buddhism). The major exception to these views is the ideology of the free market. Free market economics teaches that service to the customer is the way to wealth. Wealth is the way to dominion over nature. In this sense, free market economics is consistent with Christianity.

The suggestion that a slave should honor his master is repellant to modern humanism. It is also repellant to modern revolutionary ideology. Both views recommend personal liberation by resistance or even open rebellion. Paul's words cannot be reconciled with rebellion. On the contrary, his message here is the opposite of revolution. Jesus Christ proclaimed the opposite of rebellion to captive individuals and captive nations. He recommended productivity through peace, not liberation through violent revolution.

Ye have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth: But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil: but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also (Matt. 5:38–39).¹⁴

But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you; That ye may be the children of your Father

13. Gary North, Inherit the Earth: Biblical Blueprints for Economics (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gninherit>)

14. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 9.

which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans [tax collectors] the same? And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the publicans so? Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect (Matt. 5:44–48).¹⁵

Paul's instructions to Timothy regarding slaves are consistent with Christ's words. Elsewhere, Paul wrote:

Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord. Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good (Rom. 12:19–21).

Here, Paul was citing Solomon:

If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink: For thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head, and the LORD shall reward thee (Prov. 25:21–22).

This strategy of judgment through subordination rests on a presupposition: God is the final Judge. His final judgment will stand. Nothing can overcome it or deflect it. God's judgment is better than any civil government's justice or any individual's judgment. God's people are told to believe this. It is not that they are to ignore evil. Rather, it is that God's remedy for systematic evil is goodness. When an individual lives under a judicial order that promotes slavery, he is to conform until such time that defenders of justice are in a political position to end this institution by law.

15. Ibid., ch. 10.

C. Liberation Through Subordination

Paul fully understood that slavery is a second-best condition. He recommended liberation. “Art thou called being a servant? care not for it: but if thou mayest be made free, use it rather” (I Cor. 7:21).¹⁶ Manumission is always the proper goal of every Christian slave. An owner may decide to let his faithful servant go free as a reward for service above and beyond the call of duty. This is the owner’s decision, but in a world where God is sovereign, manumission is ultimately God’s decision.

1. Liberation from Sin

Biblical liberty begins with liberation from sin. “Then said Jesus to those Jews which believed on him, If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed; And ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free. They answered him, We be Abraham’s seed, and were never in bondage to any man: how sayest thou, Ye shall be made free? Jesus answered them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin” (John 8:31–34). Jesus served God faithfully, even unto death. This is the only judicial basis of every person’s liberation from bondage to sin. Jesus subordinated Himself to the lawful powers of His day. Within three days, He rose from the dead. He then announced to His disciples, “All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth” (Matt. 28:18b).¹⁷ The way to dominion over history is to follow Christ’s example. Paul followed it.

Are they ministers of Christ? (I speak as a fool) I am more; in labours more abundant, in stripes above measure, in prisons more frequent, in deaths oft. Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one. Thrice was I beaten with rods, once was I stoned, thrice I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day I have been in the deep; In journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren; In weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness. Beside those things that are without, that which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the churches (II Cor. 11:23–28).

Paul wrote to the church at Corinth: “Be ye followers of me, even

16. North, Judgment and Dominion, ch. 8.

17. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 48.

as I also am of Christ" (I Cor. 11:1).¹⁸

There was no doubt in Christ's mind regarding the legitimacy of conquest. "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen" (Matt. 28:19–20).¹⁹ There was no doubt in Paul's mind, either. "Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet" (I Cor. 15:24–25).²⁰ What is at issue is the legitimate means of conquest.

Liberation by God is an aspect of Christian conquest. This conquest is self-reinforcing: it liberates individuals, and in doing so, it makes them more effective agents of liberation. This is why Paul recommended to every Christian slave that he accept manumission if it is offered.

It takes faith in the God of the Bible as the God of liberation in order to obey Paul's injunction. The slave must believe that liberation is God's goal, for liberation is an aspect of dominion. To obey with a pure heart, the slave must first accept the fact that the ultimate bondage is bondage to sin as the heir of Adam, God's disinherited son. Every man is under a yoke, either sin's or Christ's. If the covenant-keeper is under another man's yoke, the basis of his liberation in history becomes greater subordination to his master in the name of God. The slave must be willing to become a faithful servant of his master in order to reflect his new bondservant to the supreme Master, God. The Christian slave is legally under a man's yoke, but he is also legally under Christ's yoke. The lawful way of release from man's yoke is faithful service under Christ's yoke. This service must be internal: reckoning honor to the master. This is how Christians are to prevent the blaspheming of God's name.

Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852) was a novel that mobilized anti-slavery opinion in the North in the United States. The hero of the book is Uncle Tom, a faithful slave under the yoke of a moral monster, Simon Legree. Tom is a Christian. He obeys Legree for the sake of Christ.

18. North, Judgment and Dominion, ch. 14.

19. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 48; Kenneth L. Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/GentryGGC>)

20. North, Judgment and Dominion, ch. 16.

Legree despises Tom and Tom's faith. Tom's life ends after a savage whipping by Legree and a pair of black slave trustees. Tom dies with prayers of forgiveness for his tormentors (chapter 40). Over a century later, during the civil rights movement, "Uncle Tom" became a term of opprobrium among black activists. Any black who was not in favor of racial confrontation or even violence was dismissed as an Uncle Tom, a racial stereotype of subordination to white men's political power. The activists whipped their troops into line with this phrase. The anti-Christian and revolutionary character of the civil rights movement by the late 1960s, despite its origin in black Christian circles in the mid-1950s, was testified to by the widespread use of the phrase. A major goal of the leaders of the civil rights revolution was to replace Christianity with humanism. Many of them were clerics. They used the rhetoric of Christianity to further a militantly anti-Christian political agenda.

2. Divine Intervention

He who believes that self-conscious subordination brings dominion for oneself or one's heirs has to adopt a supernatural worldview. This is the worldview of Joseph in Egypt. Joseph's faithful service to Potiphar led to a false accusation against him by Potiphar's wife. He was thrown into prison. There, he took over the administration of the prison. Eventually, he rose to second in command in Egypt—technically under the authority of the Pharaoh, but in fact in charge of Egypt's economy and its political order. This is the correct model for dominion, both personal and corporate.

It takes faith to believe this. It also takes a willingness to suffer unrighteous abuse. Jesus warned His followers: "Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake" (Matt. 5:11). He continued:

Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you; That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same? And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the publicans so? Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect (Matt. 5:43–48).²¹

The belief that subordination to state-sanctioned evil eventually produces dominion is not widespread. Christians in the late Roman Empire believed that they could not cooperate with the state on matters of public liturgy in a polytheistic empire, but they obeyed in everything else. This brought wave after wave of persecution on the church, for the essence of Rome's religion was the worship of the state through the worship of the reigning emperor.²² The result of the church's resistance on liturgy but obedience to everything else was the capture of the empire by the church in the fourth century. By then, Christians had become grudgingly respected by the pagans because of their subordination and their honesty. But this replacement process took almost three centuries before a Christian emperor ascended to the throne. Centuries are too long a time frame for applying a strategy of dominion for most religions, other than those that are in some way influenced by the Bible.

3. *Power Religion vs. Dominion Religion*²³

The lure of the power religion is great. It proclaims a rival system of cause and effect. Power is to be overcome by greater power. Power is seen as the basis of dominion. This worldview rests on an error. Dominion is by example, by productivity, and by service. Dominion is by covenant.²⁴ God rewards this system of cause and effect, and His opponents also come to respect it, which eventually undermines their legitimacy and the social order that is based on the power religion.

The Bible's dominion religion is not opposed to the lawful exercise of civil power on behalf of righteousness. Civil sanctions are legitimate (Rom. 13:1–7).²⁵ But Christ and Paul were addressing people who were political outsiders, people who possessed little or no political authority. These people lived under a hierarchy established by an empire.

21. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 10.

22. R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy (Vallecito, California: Ross House [1971] 1995), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rjroam>)

23. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), Introduction:A, C.

24. Sutton, That You May Prosper.

25. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 11.

*Empire is always the long-term political goal of the power religion.*²⁶ This goal always results in failure. Daniel was clear: the fifth and final empire belongs exclusively to the Holy One (Dan. 2:44–45).

The Bible presents dominion as the result of liberation from sin. Liberation from sin produces an attitude of victory. The victory over sin and death that was revealed in the bodily resurrection of Jesus Christ is supposed to motivate covenant-keepers to obey God. There is life beyond death, victory in history before the end of time (I Cor. 15).²⁷ This new life is attained in history. “He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him” (John 3:36). Therefore, a token of the eternal victory over sin and Satan will also be attained by covenant-keepers in history. This is why the apostles were told by Christ to bring the nations under Christ’s rule (Matt. 28:18–20).²⁸

Within Christian circles, there has always been organized hostility to this message. Pietists embrace the escape religion.²⁹ This worldview separates victory in history from victory in eternity. In place of dominion by subordination, pietism proclaims subordination by subordination. It proclaims subordination as a way of life in history, not for the sake of the transformation of men and society, but for the sake of personal self-discipline. This is the religion of the monastery. But faithful service and self-sacrifice produce dominion even though a monastery’s founder proclaimed the escape religion. This was the experience of medieval monasticism generally. Western European monasteries became centers of production—agriculturally, intellectually, financially, technologically, and even scientifically. The laws of genetics were discovered in 1865 by a monk, Gregor Mendel, who studied peas.

26. Of all wealthy nations on earth, Switzerland is least affected by either the power religion or the escape religion. Its people serve others by supplying banking services and other free market services. The nation remains neutral in international relations. Its men are skilled fighters and well-armed. The Swiss seek to conquer no nation. They seek only to maintain their own political sovereignty.

27. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1992] 1997). (<http://bit.ly/klghshd>)

28. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 48.

29. Rousas John Rushdoony, The Flight from Humanity: A Study of the Effect of Neoplatonism on Christianity (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973). (<http://bit.ly/rjrffh>) ; Gary DeMar and Peter Leithart, The Reduction of Christianity: A Biblical Response to Dave Hunt (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1988). (<http://bit.ly/gdmplreduction>)

D. Covenant-Keeping Masters

Verse 2 refers to households run by covenant-keepers. “And they that have believing masters, let them not despise them, because they are brethren; but rather do them service, because they are faithful and beloved, partakers of the benefit. These things teach and exhort.” This raises the obvious question: Why should a Christian slave despise a Christian master?

The easiest answer is that the master refuses to free the slave. The slave may expect manumission by the owner based on their shared covenant, but the master does not agree. Paul makes it clear that this is not a valid excuse for a resentful attitude. There is no valid excuse mentioned in this or any other epistle from Paul. The owner does not owe his slave manumission. The slave owes the master obedience and honor.

Paul speaks of “partakers of the benefit.” Who partakes of this benefit? Was Paul referring here to the masters or to their servants? The text in the Greek is not straightforward. It has what in English we call an indefinite pronoun reference—in this case, the word “they”: “because they are faithful and beloved, partakers of the benefit.” Someone is faithful and beloved. Does “they” refer to the masters? It seems to. But if it does, then who regards masters as faithful and beloved? Do the servants so regard their masters? Or does God? The latter, I believe, for Paul’s warning is directed to the servants: do not despise masters. The argument is this: because God regards masters well, so should servants.

The servants are said to be partakers of the benefit which they—servants—show to their masters. In what way are they partakers? Because their service strengthens the household, which in turn protects the servants. The household is a confessionally covenantal unit when the master is a Christian, too. This household extends the kingdom of God in history. The slave shares in this blessing. The household extends God’s kingdom because of the presence of a covenant-keeping slave, just as Joseph’s presence in Egypt extended God’s kingdom.

E. Slavery Under the Mosaic Law

There were two broad types of slavery in the Mosaic economy: (1) the enslavement of Hebrews; (2) the enslavement of foreigners. The first category was broken down into three subcategories: (a) slavery for a failure to repay a zero-interest charitable loan (up to seven years, i.e., the year of release: Deut. 15:1–12);³⁰ (b) slavery for failure to repay a commercial loan (up to 49 years, i.e., the jubilee year: Lev. 25:25–28, 39–42);³¹ (c) slavery to raise money to pay the victims of a criminal's actions (implied by the laws governing restitution: Ex. 22:1–9).

Foreigners were not protected by the year of jubilee. They could be enslaved permanently, their children becoming slaves at birth.³²

Both thy bondmen, and thy bondmaids, which thou shalt have, shall be of the heathen that are round about you; of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids. Moreover of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you, which they begat in your land: and they shall be your possession. And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession; they shall be your bondmen for ever: but over your brethren the children of Israel, ye shall not rule one over another with rigour (Lev. 25:44–46).

The nations of the ancient world harvested slaves after a war. God restricted this practice in Mosaic Israel. It was completely forbidden with respect to Canaanites. The Canaanites had to be utterly destroyed: “And thou shalt consume all the people which the LORD thy God shall deliver thee; thine eye shall have no pity upon them: neither shalt thou serve their gods; for that will be a snare unto thee” (Deut. 7:16). It was partially forbidden with respect to conquered nations outside of Canaan. Defeated males had to be exterminated. The females were not to be executed. They were taken as slaves.

When thou comest nigh unto a city to fight against it, then proclaim peace unto it. And it shall be, if it make thee answer of peace, and open unto thee, then it shall be, that all the people that is found therein shall be tributaries unto thee, and they shall serve thee. And if it will make no peace with thee, but will make war against thee, then thou shalt besiege it: And when the LORD thy God hath delivered it into thine hands, thou shalt smite every male thereof with the edge of the sword (Deut. 20:10–13).³³

Tributaries paid taxes. This was the usual meaning of the Hebrew word, the major exception being Solomon's levy in manpower in Israel

30. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 36.

31. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 30.

32. Ibid., ch. 31.

33. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 48.

to build the temple (I Kings 5:13–14). As for serving the Israelites, this could be a reference to slavery, but the context suggests tribute: a tax paid to a conqueror. As for cities that refused to surrender, the entire male population was to be executed. The females could be taken captive (v. 14). In fact, they had to be brought home. To leave them as widows and orphans would have been murder. They were helpless. The execution of the males had destroyed the society's division of labor and the survivors' future. They could lawfully be enslaved or married (Deut. 21:10–13). If Israelites married these women, the women were no longer slaves. If they were subsequently divorced by their husbands, they became free women (v. 14). So, there were no slave offspring born to these captives. Their children would also become free adults.

Slaves in Israel could be imported from outside the land, yet probably not from the military activities of Israel—not unless citizens of cities that surrendered before the battle were subject to removal and enslavement in Israel. Because this threat would have made most men fight harder, refusing to surrender, it is unlikely that enslavement was the authorized form of service. Tribute was.

Then where did Israel's slaves come from originally? These Deuteronomic texts point to the lawful importation of slaves from foreign nations. Slaves that had been born in captivity inside Israel or outside, or people who had been taken captive by a foreign nation in a war, were legitimate for a Hebrew to buy. To buy such slaves was a form of liberation for them—liberation from Satan's dominion outside of Israel. They were placed under God inside a covenant-keeping household. There was one exception to foreign purchase: it was not lawful to buy any victim of a private kidnapping (Ex. 21:16).³⁴

The Mosaic laws governing slavery were aspects of the land laws of Mosaic Israel. They were annulled when the kingdom was transferred to the church (Matt. 21:43). The land lost its holy status in A.D. 70. It also lost its prophetic status. Shiloh had come, as prophesied (Gen. 49:10). He had pronounced judgment on the land, and had then enforced it.³⁵

34. Gary North, Authority and Dominion, Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. ch. 34.

35. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

F. New Testament Revision: Limited Warfare

That Paul did not call for immediate abolition of all private forms of slavery is clear from this text. The question arises: On what legal basis was the child of a slave also a slave for life? On the basis of the judicial death of the father. If a man had been captured during a war, he could lawfully have been executed. He lived only by the mercy of the victors. In this sense, he was judicially dead as a free man. This was also true of his children, born and unborn. If he was then sold into slavery, the legal status of the parent passed to the family's covenant line. An Israelite could lawfully purchase a foreign slave. A similar situation prevailed in the case of the Gibeonites, who tricked the Israelites into granting them a peace treaty. Their deception saved their lives in the land. It also led to their enslavement (Joshua 9). Their heirs were still enslaved in David's day (II Sam. 21).

In contrast, a kidnapped person had not surrendered to a lawful authority. His or her heirs therefore did not lawfully become slaves. What the kidnapper did not lawfully own, he could not lawfully transfer or sell.

Beginning with the advent of Christian emperors, Christian societies have not enforced the Deuteronomic law mandating the extermination of defeated male civilians. Yet there is no explicit New Testament law that annuls Deuteronomy 20:10–13. The New Testament says nothing specific regarding how civilians must be treated during or after a war. Nevertheless, the Mosaic requirement of the extermination of civilian males and also the execution of males who surrender after a war has begun has ended in the New Covenant era. The Christian West has had a doctrine of war that insists that warriors kill warriors, but not defeated male civilians. This is a judicial break from the Mosaic law. What is the basis of this judicial discontinuity?

The laws governing Israel's conquest were land laws, i.e., tied to the land of Israel as a kingdom of priests (Ex. 19:6). The extermination of the Canaanites has never been the model for Christian warfare; neither has the execution of non-Canaanite male civilians after a battle. Why not? Here is one reason: the church is international. The goal of Christian evangelism is to recruit covenantal representatives of Christ in every nation (Matt. 28:18–20). There is no priestly (mediatorial) nation, any more than there is a priestly tribe. Evangelism is no longer to be accomplished through the purchase of captive pagans or the military conquest of pagan nations.

In Paul's day, Rome was still expanding its empire. Slaves were a by-product of these military conquests. Rome became a slave society because of the conquests by its armies. The slave markets followed Rome's armies.³⁶ For a covenant-keeper to buy a slave from this source was not the same as buying from a kidnapper. These conquests had not been part of a private slave-harvesting operation, i.e., kidnapping. It is true that there was a symbiotic relationship between the conquests and the profits for the generals and upper-class members of Roman society from the sale of slaves, but Roman conquests involved occupying territory. Enslavement was an aspect of politics. By the time of Augustus, Rome's supply of slaves from abroad slowed because the empire was at its maximum. Most slaves came from birth to existing slaves.³⁷

By the time Christians gained political control over the empire, it was in its contraction phase. The older program of slave-harvesting had ceased. The church did not oppose slavery, but it did begin to have an effect on the doctrine of war. Mosaic extermination laws were never honored.

G. Abolition: Why the Long Delay?

The question arises: Why did it take over 1700 years from the writing of this epistle until the first rumblings of the abolitionist movement? A second question also arises: Why did it take only a century, 1780–1880, to convince the leaders of the West that slavery is not only immoral, it is a crime that must be suppressed by civil law? In short, why the long delay, followed by a rapid reversal of public opinion? What was the decisive change that led to abolition? Theology? Economics? Moral philosophy?

Bible-believing historians prefer not to ask these questions. The centuries-long blindness of the church regarding slavery embarrasses them. Their hesitancy to consider these questions in public indicates the comprehensive nature of the success of the abolitionist movement. This success was not merely institutional; it was ethical. It now extends to most men's minds in the non-Islamic West. Christians rarely think twice about the theological justification of their retroactive condemnation of private chattel slavery. They make the assumption that 36. Milton Meltzer, Slavery: A World History, 2 vols. (n.p.: Da Capo, 1993), I, pp. 105–10.

37. Ibid., I, p. 132.

“everybody knows this.” But throughout most of human history, hardly anyone knew this. There is a fundamental exegetical problem for abolitionism: no biblical text explicitly abolishes slavery, while many passages condone it. The anti-abolitionists in the church always had the better arguments from scripture, especially by appealing to Leviticus 25:44–46.

It was this realization that drove leading American abolitionists to Unitarianism and, after the Civil War (1861–65), to biblical higher criticism, which swept the English-speaking academic community almost overnight, beginning in 1875–76.³⁸ They perceived that the Bible, if true, did not appear to support the abolitionist cause. So, they denied the truth of the Bible. Other Unitarians had come to this Bible-denying position first, only later adopting abolitionism. William Lloyd Garrison concluded that the Bible must be subjected to the tests of reasonableness, historical confirmation, the facts of science, and man’s intuition. “Truth is older than any parchment,” he affirmed. His radical disciple, Henry Clarke Wright, proclaimed: “The Bible, If Opposed to Self-Evident Truth, is Self-Evident Falsehood.” Charles Stearns said that the Old Testament is a tissue of lies, “no more the work of God than the Koran, or the Book of Mormon.”³⁹

Is the New Testament silent with regard to abolitionism? My answer: not silent, but subdued. I have argued that Christ announced the fulfillment of jubilee liberation, and therefore the release of all slaves in Israel. He uttered these words early in His ministry: “The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, To preach the acceptable year of the Lord” (Luke 4:18–19).⁴⁰ This was the judicial basis of the abolition of permanent servitude in Mosaic Israel.⁴¹ The fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 ended Mosaic servitude as a biblically authorized practice.

The question then arises: What about gentile societies?

38. Gary North, Crossed Fingers: How the Liberals Captured the Presbyterian Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1996), pp. 160–61, 194.

39. Cited by David Brion Davis, The Problem of Slavery in the Age of Revolution, 1770–1823 (Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1975), p. 523.

40. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 6.

41. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 31.

H. Kidnapping

Paul wrote this epistle to a Greek who was ministering to Greeks. Paul did not refer to the jubilee year, which did not exist outside of Israel, and not even inside Israel in Paul's day. He made his case against slavery on the basis of the immorality of kidnapping, as we have seen.⁴²

If it is immoral to be a kidnapper, then it is immoral to buy slaves knowingly from a kidnapper. The existence of a ready market for slaves is what attracts profit-seekers to the crime of kidnapping. By providing the economic incentive, the buyer shares in the kidnapper's crime. Participation in the slave trade at any point is immoral. As surely as being a madam or a pimp for a prostitute is evil, so is spending money for the services rendered. Were there no purchasers, there would be no sellers.

The cause-and-effect relationship between buyers and sellers is not always understood. The initiating factor is the would-be seller's perception of future demand. If the seller does not believe that buyers will pay him for his products, he will not enter into the enterprise. Buyers confirm the sellers' speculation; non-buyers do not. Buyers keep an industry alive. With respect to slavery, the kidnapper was identified by Paul as an evildoer. The buyer was not identified as being equally evil judicially. But, economically speaking, the buyer is the source of the evil's profitability.

Paul does not here oppose the purchase of a slave from a family that owns slaves. The text is specific: kidnapping is prohibited. Paul never told his readers that it is immoral to own a slave. He sent the escaped slave Onesimus back to his owner, Philemon. If Paul had been an abolitionist, Philemon is the epistle in which he had an opportunity to make his case against slavery. He did not suggest anything of the kind. But Paul did ask Philemon to give Onesimus his freedom, i.e., treat him as if he were Paul. He reminded Philemon that he was in Paul's debt. He wrote: "For perhaps he therefore departed for a season, that thou shouldest receive him for ever; Not now as a servant, but above a servant, a brother beloved, specially to me, but how much more unto thee, both in the flesh, and in the Lord? If thou count me therefore a partner, receive him as myself. If he hath wronged thee, or oweth thee ought, put that on mine account; I Paul have written it with mine own hand, I will repay it: albeit I do not say to thee how thou owest unto me even thine own self besides" (Phm. 1:15–19).

42. Chapter 1, section on "Abolition."

Paul also taught that a slave should accept manumission if it is offered. “Art thou called being a servant? care not for it: but if thou mayest be made free, use it rather” (I Cor. 7:21).⁴³ A free man can serve God more effectively than a slave can. He possesses a wider range of choices. He becomes responsible for his own decisions.

So, we find in Paul’s writings a clear acknowledgement that freedom is a benefit compared to servitude. This did not make Paul an abolitionist. It did not even make him unique. Most people throughout history have known that freedom is preferable to slavery. Slavery always has been seen as a curse to be avoided personally. But, also throughout history, free men benefitted from the enslavement of others.

I. Second Things Second

Institutional arrangements that are consistent with the Bible, but which are not mandated by the Bible, develop through time as a result of societies’ adoption of certain legal principles that are found in the Bible. For example, there is no passage in the Bible that explicitly defends the political ideal of democracy or republican civil government. There are certain aspects of political rule that indicate that citizens who are bound by a common faith should exercise authority over their civil rulers (Lev. 4).⁴⁴ Another example: there is a system of appeals courts that perform the task of dealing with difficult cases, but the judicial system adopted recommended by Jethro and adopted by Moses (Ex. 18) was not mandated by the Mosaic law.⁴⁵ Trial by jury is not mentioned anywhere in the Bible. But is there no correlation between these institutional features of modern civil justice and biblical principles of civil justice? This seems unlikely, yet the developments historically could not have been predicted by the judges of Samson’s day or by the early church fathers.

Church members are supposed to exercise judgment regarding the performance and pay of elders. Paul made this point clear in this epistle (5:17–18).⁴⁶ This principle of ecclesiastical authority points to a system of democratic rule for the church. Members should exercise a veto. The same principle can be applied to civil government, even though it is not clear in the Bible that judges should be elected by the

43. North, Judgment and Dominion, ch. 8.

44. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 4.

45. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 19.

46. Chapter 7.

citizenry. Sooner or later, the office of judge evolves into the office of legislator.⁴⁷ This is because the task of officially interpreting the law is the same as writing new laws. Courts necessarily take on this legislative function to some degree. Different societies deal with the threat of judicial tyranny in different ways. They may create separate legislative institutions. They may create rival systems of courts. But, in the Christian West, societies have developed court systems that reflect Jethro's recommended court system.

These institutional developments have taken many centuries. There has been a pattern to these developments in many Christian countries throughout Europe, especially northern Europe. Christian scholars with a mastery of the historical materials, especially legal materials, have been in short supply. Detailed studies of medieval documents is a recent development—within the last 130 years.⁴⁸ Humanism has been the dominant worldview of medieval historians, including legal historians. They have not devoted lifetimes to studying the development of canon law and civil law, comparing both developments to biblical law. So, we have insufficient evidence regarding the relationships among Christianity, biblical law, Europe's tribal legal traditions, and Greek and Roman law. What we do know is that churches have come to accept the late arrival of institutions and traditions that they regard as essentially Christian, yet which cannot be found in the Bible. There is an acceptance of the idea that general biblical principles have produced specific institutional practices that seem to be Christian in their effects.

Conclusion

Paul in this passage sets forth the principle that a slave must honor his master. This makes it clear that Paul was not an abolitionist. He did not call for the abolition of this form of private property among the gentiles. In Philemon, he did ask for an owner to release his slave voluntarily, but there was no call for state action.

The Roman Empire in Paul's era was still supplying hordes of slaves through military conquests. This was not legal for Mosaic Israel, but it was legal for the gentiles. Foreign nations had supplied Israel with its slaves. There had been nothing wrong with this under Mosaic law. Paul did not challenge the Roman Empire's slave policy.

47. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), ch. 10. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

48. Norman F. Cantor, Inventing the Middle Ages: The Lives, Works, and Ideas of the Great Medievalists of the Twentieth Century (New York: Morrow, 1991).

A slave is required to remain with his owner. An owner is not required to free his slaves unless they or their forefathers had been captured illegally. In the case of the West's system of chattel slavery after 1444, all of these slaves had been kidnapped. Their heirs were not lawfully enslaved, according to biblical law, both Old and New Testaments. Paul's teaching does not address this form of servitude. The example of the exodus does: the slaves had a right to escape an illegal, criminal slave system.

When Christianity gained control over the Roman Empire, the rules of warfare began to change. Large-scale military conquests had already ceased. When Christianity penetrated the world through foreign missions and diplomacy, Mosaic warfare—the extermination of civilians in nations that refused to surrender—was seen as no longer either legally binding or morally acceptable. Enslavement was no longer seen as a lawful form of evangelism, as it had been in Mosaic Israel because of the holy status of the land of Israel.

In the nineteenth century, the moral revulsion against slavery in abolitionist circles finally caught up with the biblical reality of slavery. The institution had been annulled in its Mosaic form, with its inter-generational non-Hebraic slavery (Lev. 25:44–46), by Christ's fulfillment of the jubilee year (Luke 4:18–19).⁴⁹ It had been made criminal in the New Testament era in the form of professional kidnapping.

This leaves biblically intact slave harvesting as a legitimate side-effect of war: enslavement rather than execution. This military ultimatum has been abandoned in modern times for many reasons, some military, such as reduced resistance by the enemy, and some economic, such as the profitability of renewed post-war economic trade between the victor nation and the defeated. After World War II, Japan and Germany became far richer through foreign trade than through their wartime military conquests, and the victors got richer by trade than by trying to extract reparations payments—the victors' failed experiment after World War I.

This view of slavery also leaves biblically intact the enslavement of convicted criminals who cannot afford to pay restitution to their victims. To repay the victims, he can lawfully be sold into lifetime slavery. His legal status as a slave does not affect his adult children. The child does not partake in the sins of the parent. "The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers: every man shall be put to death for his own sin" (Deut. 24:16).

49. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 6.

10

GODLY CONTENTMENT

Perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth, supposing that gain is godliness: from such withdraw thyself. But godliness with contentment is great gain. For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out. And having food and raiment let us be therewith content. But they that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all evil: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows. But thou, O man of God, flee these things; and follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness (I Tim. 6:5–11).

The theocentric principle here is God as the sovereign sanctions-bringer: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ God graciously supplies His people with whatever they need for the tasks at hand. He also supplies the tasks at hand, which is also grace.

A. Godliness

The Greek word translated here as “godliness” is eusebia. This Greek word appears more frequently in this epistle than in any other New Testament book. It can be translated as “piety,” but that English word has become somewhat archaic. “Godliness” is more familiar.

1. To Be Like God

What does it mean to be godly? It means to be like God. This cannot mean to be like Him in terms of His omnipotence, omniscience, omnipresence, and His other incommunicable attributes. It means His moral perfection. This is commanded by the Bible, and not just once.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect (Matt. 5:48).

For I am the LORD your God: ye shall therefore sanctify yourselves, and ye shall be holy; for I am holy: neither shall ye defile yourselves with any manner of creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth (Lev. 11:44).

Let your heart therefore be perfect with the LORD our God, to walk in his statutes, and to keep his commandments, as at this day (I Kings 8:61).

And ye shall be holy unto me: for I the LORD am holy, and have severed you from other people, that ye should be mine (Lev. 20:26).

But as he which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation; Because it is written, Be ye holy; for I am holy (I Peter 1:15–16).

Perfection is the standard. Fallen man cannot attain this standard in history. But Christ's perfect humanity is imputed by God to each redeemed person at the time of redemption. God declares the sinner innocent, a judicial declaration based on Christ's moral perfection. Theologians call this transfer of Christ's moral perfection definitive sanctification. This judicial transfer of Christ's perfect humanity becomes the foundation of a life of striving toward perfection, which theologians call progressive sanctification. Both aspects of sanctification appear in one passage.

Yea doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung, that I may win Christ, And be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith: That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death; If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead. Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect: but I follow after, if that I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus (Phil. 3:8–12).

2. John Murray on Sanctification and Law

Sanctification begins with definitive sanctification. I learned this theological principle in a class taught by John Murray at Westminster Seminary in the spring of 1964, which I audited. His tripartite division of sanctification into definitive, progressive, and final undergirds my approach to social theory as well as personal ethics.

Murray writes of sanctification that “it is a fact too frequently overlooked that in the New Testament the most characteristic terms that refer to sanctification are used, not of a process, but of a once-for-all definitive act. . . . When Paul, for example, addresses the believers at Corinth as the church of God, ‘sanctified in Christ Jesus, called to be saints’ (I Cor. 1:2), and later in the same epistle reminds them that they were washed, sanctified, and justified (I Cor. 6:11), it is apparent that he co-ordinated their sanctification with effectual calling, with their identity as saints, with regeneration, and with justification.”² The phrase “effectual calling” means regeneration offered by God’s sovereign grace and applied by God’s sovereign grace.

Sanctification begins with the covenantal death of the sinner: death to sin (Rom. 6:2).³ “And the person who died to sin no longer lives in that sphere. His tie with it has been broken, and he has been translated into another realm.”⁴ Peter also taught the doctrine of definitive death to sin (I Peter 2:24; 4:1–2).⁵ This is the doctrine that “those for whom Christ died vicariously are reckoned as having died in and with Christ, and, as Christ’s death was death to sin once for all (cf. Rom. 6:10), so those dying with him die also to sin.”⁶

To reckon is to count. God counts the now-redeemed person as having died to sin. The redeemed person is identified by God as having been resurrected with Christ.⁷ This judicial participation in Christ’s resurrection is not merely a progressive condition; it is also definitive. “And since Christ himself died once for all and, having risen from the dead, dies no more, it would appear necessary to restrict our death to sin and entrance upon newness of life (after the likeness of Jesus’ resurrection) to the historic past where Jesus died and rose from the

2. Collected Writings of John Murray, 4 vols. (Edinburgh: Banner of Trust, 1977), II, p. 277.

3. Ibid., pp. 278–79.

4. Ibid., p. 279.

5. Ibid., p. 280.

6. Idem.

7. Ibid., p. 287.

dead.”⁸ But this fact does not deny the truth of Romans 8:13. “For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die: but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live.”⁹ Sanctification is also progressive. It will also be final, which will be revealed at the final judgment.¹⁰

Progressive sanctification is the outworking in history of definitive sanctification. It is the result of God’s special (saving) grace to the sinner. It is in no sense independent of grace. It is in no sense the result of man’s autonomous works.

It is in this context of man as made in God’s image that we should discuss godliness. Murray wrote: “. . . likeness to God is the ultimate pattern of sanctification. The reason why God himself is the pattern should be obvious: man is made in the image of God and nothing less than the image of God can define the restoration which redemption contemplates.”¹¹ Sanctification is a matter of being conformed to Christ’s death and resurrection. “When we think of sanctification as being patterned after the image of Christ, we must ask the question: How does it take place? As we think of definitive sanctification, we found already that this basically consists in union with Christ in his death and resurrection. And that simply means that we have been conformed to his death and resurrection.”¹² Then what of progressive sanctification? “To a large extent the progress of sanctification is dependent upon the increasing understanding and appropriation of the implications of that identification with Christ in his death and resurrection. Nothing is more relevant to progressive sanctification than the reckoning of ourselves to be dead to sin and alive to God through Jesus Christ (cf. Rom. 6:11).”¹³ Retroactive reckoning is a lifelong process for covenant-keepers. It is not a one-time event.

This process of reckoning (counting, imputing) is not in any sense a denial of God’s law. On the contrary, Murray said, this process affirms God’s law. God’s law and God’s perfection are of one piece.

The necessity of revelation defining the respects in which likeness to God prescribes the norm of sanctification, shows how consonant with the ultimate principle are the other considerations, that the law of God, the revealed will of God, and the example of our Lord are the

8. Ibid., p. 289.

9. Ibid., p. 295.

10. Ibid., pp. 299–302; chap. 25.

11. Ibid., p. 306.

12. Ibid., p. 310.

13. Ibid., p. 311.

criteria and patterns according to which sanctification proceeds. The law of God is the transcript of God's perfection; it is God's perfection coming to expression for the regulation of thought and conduct consonant with his holiness. As thus defined, the law of God guards the distinction of which we have spoken, because the law of God is the revealed will of God for us; it regulated our thought and behaviour in ways consonant with his perfection. And this is why every depreciation of the law of God as the pattern in terms of which sanctification is fashioned invariably leads to the adoption of patterns which impinge upon the unique prerogatives of God in the transcendent and inimitable glory that belongs to him. There is one lawgiver. This belongs to the uniqueness in respect of which the attempt to be like God is blasphemy, and shows that whenever we do not appreciate the limitations prescribed by law, it is because we have failed to guard the differentiation that is correlative with the demand for likeness.¹⁴

This means that the imputation of Adam's sin¹⁵ is overcome in history by the imputation of Christ's perfect humanity to disinherited sons of Adam. Murray discussed this transformation in relation to individual redemption and personal ethics. I extend this analysis to corporate entities: the sanctification of societies. The Great Commission applies to society as well as to souls.¹⁶

3. The Imitation of Christ

A godly man seeks to imitate God's moral character. Man is made in God's image, but because man is fallen, he reflects Satan, too. Man is to strive to be godly in order to reflect God better.

A man cannot become God. A man is always a creature. But a man can seek to imitate Christ's perfect humanity as a model of perfection. Paul wrote: "Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ" (1 Cor. 11:1).¹⁷ Men inescapably must conform themselves to one of two models: Adam or Christ. Paul told the members of the church in Rome to avoid conforming themselves to the fallen world's model. "And be not conformed to this world: but be ye transformed by the renewing of

14. Ibid., pp. 306–7.

15. John Murray, The Imputation of Adam's Sin (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, [1959] 1979).

16. Kenneth L. Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/GentryGGC>)

17. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 14.

your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God" (Rom. 12:2).¹⁸ The Greek word for "conform" implies "fashioning oneself." "As obedient children, not fashioning yourselves according to the former lusts in your ignorance: But as he which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation; Because it is written, Be ye holy; for I am holy" (I Peter 1:14–16).

In this passage, two goals are listed: riches and godliness. Paul contrasts the two. In this, he follows Christ's distinction between God and mammon. "No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon" (Matt. 6:24).¹⁹ Christ described the conflict between belief and unbelief, covenant-keeping and covenant-breaking, in terms of rival religions. One is the religion of God. The other is the religion of mammon. The context of His discussion was treasure. "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal" (Matt. 6:19–20).²⁰

Paul begins this section by describing an error: "supposing that gain is godliness" (v. 5). The Greek word for "gain" appears in the New Testament only in verses 5 and 6. It refers to acquiring things. It implies an increase.

This verse introduces a difficult issue of interpretation. The issue is the covenantal issue of sanctions. Specifically, it is the covenantal issue of predictable visible sanctions in history.

4. Visible Covenantal Sanctions

With respect to the corporate national covenant under the Mosaic covenant, Moses declared that there is a predictable relationship between corporate covenant-keeping and corporate success (Lev. 27:3–13; Deut. 28:1–14). This includes economic success.

If ye walk in my statutes, and keep my commandments, and do them;
Then I will give you rain in due season, and the land shall yield her increase, and the trees of the field shall yield their fruit. And your

18. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 8.

19. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 14.

20. Ibid., ch. 13.

threshing shall reach unto the vintage, and the vintage shall reach unto the sowing time: and ye shall eat your bread to the full, and dwell in your land safely (Lev. 26:3–5).²¹

Blessed shall be the fruit of thy body, and the fruit of thy ground, and the fruit of thy cattle, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks of thy sheep. Blessed shall be thy basket and thy store (Deut. 28:4–5).²²

And the LORD shall make thee plenteous in goods, in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy ground, in the land which the LORD swore unto thy fathers to give thee. The LORD shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his season, and to bless all the work of thine hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow (Deut. 28:11–12).²³

The moral issue here is corporate obedience to God's biblical law, i.e., walking in His statutes. Conformity corporately to God's law will produce corporate blessings, Moses said (Deut. 29).²⁴ There can be cases of poverty within the group, but, statistically speaking, there will be an increase in per capita wealth as a result of obedience.

Blessings are intended to reinforce covenant-keepers' faith in God's covenant, Moses wrote. "But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he swore unto thy fathers, as it is this day" (Deut. 8:18).²⁵ These visible corporate blessings are supposed to build up men's faith in God as the sovereign sanctions-bringer. History is not random. Success is not random. The Bible teaches that covenant-keepers can safely regard God's covenantal sanctions as reliable. Obedience to God's law brings external, visible blessings.

This was not salvation by works. The Old Testament did not teach salvation by works. "Behold, his soul which is lifted up is not upright in him: but the just shall live by his faith" (Hab. 2:4). Then how were law and grace related? In the same way they are related in the New Covenant. There is a fundamental biblical principle: grace precedes law. God showed grace to Adam—the unmerited gift of life—before He laid

21. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 32.

22. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [199] 2012), ch. 69.

23. Ibid., ch. 70.

24. Ibid., ch. 71.

25. Ibid., ch. 22.

down the law to Adam, both positive (Gen. 2:15) and negative (Gen. 2:17). He clothed Adam (Gen. 3:21) before He drove Adam out of the garden (Gen. 3:24). He delivered the Israelites from Egypt (Ex. 13–14) before He gave them the law (Ex. 20–23).²⁶ Grace precedes law. Therefore, we should regard positive sanctions for obedience to God's biblical law as the outworking of the grace of law. Men do not earn grace. Men also do not earn blessings irrespective of grace. Men respond in history to grace, either as covenant-keepers or covenant-breakers.

5. From Blessing to Presumption

Paul warns here against supposing that gain is godliness. He is establishing the context for his next point: "But godliness with contentment is great gain." What is this context? The error of concluding from the existence of visible benefits that the basis of these benefits is godliness.

Most people make a common assumption: "I deserve the good things that happen to me." Good times are considered normal. They do not catch people's attention. When bad times come, there is far greater readiness for a person to search for the hidden cause than when good times prevail. People ask themselves: "What did I do wrong?" Successful people are not equally caught up in self-diagnosis: "What did I do right?" They assume that their success is the result of their godliness, or at least their basic goodness.

Paul warns against making the first assumption, i.e., "gain is godliness." Jesus warned against making the second assumption: "loss is unrighteousness." "And as Jesus passed by, he saw a man which was blind from his birth. And his disciples asked him, saying, Master, who did sin, this man, or his parents, that he was born blind? Jesus answered, Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents: but that the works of God should be made manifest in him" (John 9:1–3).

The covenant-keeper should begin his study of covenantal cause and effect with the cause, not the effect. What should interest him most is the obedience that brings positive sanctions, or the disobedience that brings negative sanctions. If he begins his study with the sanctions, he may become misled regarding the cause. This was David's error. He could not understand why covenant-breakers prospered. Psalm 73 is the consummate biblical example of the prosperity of evil-doers.²⁷

26. North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Parts 2, 3.

For I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked. For there are no bands in their death: but their strength is firm. They are not in trouble as other men; neither are they plagued like other men. Therefore pride compasseth them about as a chain; violence covereth them as a garment. Their eyes stand out with fatness: they have more than heart could wish. They are corrupt, and speak wickedly concerning oppression: they speak loftily. They set their mouth against the heavens, and their tongue walketh through the earth (Ps. 73:3–9).

David then admitted that he had made a great mistake.

When I thought to know this, it was too painful for me; Until I went into the sanctuary of God; then understood I their end. Surely thou didst set them in slippery places: thou castedst them down into destruction. How are they brought into desolation, as in a moment! they are utterly consumed with terrors. As a dream when one awaketh; so, O Lord, when thou awakest, thou shalt despise their image (Ps. 73:16–20).

Solomon extended this theme. There is ethical cause and effect in history, but it takes time for this relationship to be manifested publicly.

Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil. Though a sinner do evil an hundred times, and his days be prolonged, yet surely I know that it shall be well with them that fear God, which fear before him: But it shall not be well with the wicked, neither shall he prolong his days, which are as a shadow; because he feareth not before God (Eccl. 8:11–13).²⁸

Sinners can prosper for a time. So, the correct assumption is this: more than one cause can produce gain. Similarly, more than one cause can produce loss. The covenantal relationship between ethics and temporal results is not unbreakable.

Obedience to God is the goal. Positive sanctions are the result. Men are supposed to focus on the goal of obedience to God, not the goal of positive sanctions from God. Covenant-keeping is far more important than external blessings, both in history and eternity. To honor

27. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 17.

28. Gary North, Autonomy and Stagnation: An Economic Commentary on Ecclesiastes (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 30.

God through obedience is more important than to gain blessings. God is more important than man.

The ability to obey God's law is itself a blessing. "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: Not of works, lest any man should boast. For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them" (Eph. 2:8–10). The grace to obey God is a more valuable asset than the temporal wealth that obedience brings.

Paul says here that it is a great error to begin with the assumption that the presence of personal gain is sufficient evidence of God's favor. Paul does not deny that covenant-keeping produces gain. Rather, he is warning against making the convenient assumption that gain is produced only by covenant-keeping, i.e., godliness.

Paul does not reject Moses' teaching regarding the predictability between corporate covenant-breaking and corporate negative sanctions. This predictability remains statistically reliable, in a way similar to the connection between unsafe driving habits and an increased number of auto accidents. It sometimes takes a long time for the predictable relationship between behavior and results to become evident. Consider the Egyptians of the exodus generation. Their leader had long prospered by oppressing the Israelites. He would prosper no longer, nor would they.

With respect to individuals, predictability is less than in the case of corporate associations. This is analogous to insurance. What is statistically predictable for a group is not predictable for any particular individual who is part of the group. God may have a special purpose for an individual, e.g., the blind man healed by Jesus.

The covenant-breaker has a tendency to presume his own godliness as the basis of his gain. He is self-deceived. The visibly successful covenant-breaker who presumes his own godliness is destitute of the truth, Paul says.

6. Translators' Insertions

There is widespread agreement among modern translators that the Greek text is insufficient to convey the meaning of this passage. They add words to supply meaning. I disagree with this decision in this instance. So does the Alfred Marshall/J. B. Phillips Interlinear Greek-English Testament (Bagster, 1958), which is governed by the structure of the Greek text: “supposing gain to be the piety.” I have accepted the Greek text as sufficient here. Paul is saying that those who make serious errors (vv. 4–5) also make this one: “Gain, in and of itself, is piety.” Paul is not challenging the Mosaic viewpoint, namely, that corporate piety produces corporate gain. He is challenging men with corrupt minds who erroneously conclude that personal gain is equated with personal piety, i.e., that the existence of the former implies the existence of the latter.

Modern translators add three words: “a means of.” The New American Standard reads: “suppose that godliness is a means of gain.” This is also how the Revised Standard Version translates the text. The New International Version reads: “godliness is a means to financial gain.” The New English Bible takes even greater liberties: “religion should yield dividends.” The little-known translation by Charles Williams reads: “religion is only a means of great gain.”²⁹ The least faithful to the text is J. B. Phillips: “hope to make some profit out of the Christian religion.”³⁰ (Deprived of the Greek text on same page, Phillips could be quite imaginative.) This approach to the text misses Paul’s point. Paul is not arguing that godliness is not a means of gain. Moses taught that corporate godliness is indeed a means of corporate gain. Paul is arguing against concluding from the existence of personal gain that one’s piety or godliness is proven, i.e., that gain is godliness.

B. Contentment

“But godliness with contentment is great gain” (v. 6). This statement contrasts with the previous erroneous assumption: “gain is godliness.” The Greek word for “contentment” appears twice in the New Testament, here and in II Corinthians 9:8: “And God is able to make all grace abound toward you; that ye, always having all sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work.” The root Greek word appears only once: “Not that I speak in respect of want: for I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content” (Phil. 4:11).³¹

Contentment with one’s external circumstances is mandated by

29. Charles B. Williams, The New Testament: A Private Translation in the Language of the People (Chicago: Moody, 1960), p. 468.

30. J. B. Phillips, The New Testament in Modern English (New York: Macmillan, 1959), p. 454.

31. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 23.

Paul. But contentment in well-doing is forbidden. "And let us not be weary in well doing: for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not" (Gal. 6:9). "But ye, brethren, be not weary in well doing" (II Thes. 3:13). "Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain" (I Cor. 9:24). We can always do better. The question is: In what does doing better consist? Economics or ethics?

The worshipper of mammon selects the former answer: economics. He strives to do better economically. The error is best seen in Christ's warning, "For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" (Mark 8:36).³² In English literature, the most familiar representatives of this striving are Jacob Marley, before he became a ghost, and Ebenezer Scrooge, before his three spirit visitors arrived.³³

1. Godliness Plus Contentment

Paul says here that the person who attains godliness has attained great gain, but only if godliness is accompanied with contentment. This raises a question regarding the completeness of godliness. If a person has godliness without contentment, then does he have godliness? The text indicates that he does. How else could Paul speak of contentment in addition to godliness, if contentment is somehow included in his definition of godliness? Paul is therefore saying that there are degrees of godliness. Some godly people are not content with their condition. They may be plagued with unfulfilled desires or doubts. Paul reminds such people that they must seek contentment with godliness.

Does Paul really dismiss everything else? Almost everything except food and clothing (v. 8). Godliness encompasses the broadest range of Christian living and service to God. To this, covenant-keepers should add contentment—satisfaction with their lives. There are no other things that are worth pursuing at the expense of godliness and contentment. “For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out. And having food and raiment let us be therewith content” (vv. 7–8). Birth to death encompasses a man’s life. What matters, Paul is saying, is not what a person accumulates for use here on earth. If a person dies penniless but righteous, he has not departed from anything of value in the world to come. He cannot take anything with him anyway. Post-funeral question: “How much did he leave behind?” Answer: “All of it!”

32. Gary North, Trust and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Mark and John (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 11.

33. Charles Dickens' story, "A Christmas Carol," is a tale of secular redemption, or moralism. Moralism is self-redemption, and is as useless as mammon worship in the quest for salvation. Moralism is progressive sanctification without definitive sanctification. It is thwarted by original sin. "Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned" (Rom. 5:12). "For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. 6:23).

Does this mean that there is total discontinuity between this life and the next? On the contrary, there is predictable continuity. Christ said: “Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal: For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also” (Matt. 6:19–21).³⁴ This continuity is based on a temporal transfer of capital: from this world to the next. We save in this world—forego the temporally beneficial use of an asset—in order to gain riches beyond the grave. This exchange of temporal assets for eternal assets takes place only in history. This exchange must be made on the basis of faith. “Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen” (Heb. 11:1).

2. Bounded by History

Paul here is not speaking of the treasure that is laid up in heaven during one’s life on earth. He is speaking only of earth-bound assets. We do not take treasure from history into eternity. We forego treasure in history in order to accumulate wealth in eternity. Christ taught that this exchange is made before death, not at death. “Sell that [which] ye have, and give alms; provide yourselves bags which wax not old, a treasure in the heavens that faileth not, where no thief approacheth, neither moth corrupteth. For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also” (Luke 12:33–34).³⁵

Next, Paul offers supplemental information. “And having food and raiment let us be therewith content” (v. 8). These assets are basic to contentment. Food and clothing keep us alive. They are means of life.

34. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 13.

35. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 26.

If you are dying because you lack these economic assets, then you have a legitimate reason to be discontented, despite your godliness. So, “godliness, plus” means godliness, plus food and clothing.

Paul does not mention housing. I conclude from this omission that he must be talking about assets owned. Food and clothing are owned. There is also a need for shelter to sustain life, at least in winter and in bad climates. But shelter need not be owned in order for it to provide life and comfort. Shelter can be rented. Jesus owned no shelter. “And Jesus said unto him, Foxes have holes, and birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head” (Luke 9:58).³⁶ But Jesus did not lack anything significant. He had friends who provided Him with temporary shelter.

Paul is saying here that all of life on earth is temporary. Temporal existence is temporary. So, covenant-keepers should not be discontented with their lack of ownership of anything besides food, which they consume rapidly, and clothing, which they consume less rapidly. The fact that a man does not own much of anything should be no more disturbing than the fact that he does not own time; he merely leases it temporarily. In fact, his lack of goods should be much less disturbing to him than his lack of time. “But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then whose shall those things be, which thou hast provided?” (Luke 12:20).³⁷

Is Paul saying here that the lifestyle of a well-fed homeless person should be sufficient to provide a godly man with contentment? Yes. Put another way, a godly man should not seek anything to give him contentment beyond that which is provided by food and clothing. If he is homeless for God, he should be content.

C. Discontent

This is a radical view of the relationship between a man’s external condition and his internal condition. Most people are discontented about many things. Their external conditions produce internal pain. Paul is saying clearly that a covenant-keeper has no legitimate excuse for this pain. The problem is not in the external environment; the problem is a person’s lack of faith. The discontented person thinks that his life is being thwarted by circumstances. Paul is saying that circumstances are not what is thwarting a covenant-keeper’s life. He said this elsewhere in no uncertain terms with respect to his own circumstances. I quoted this earlier. Once is not enough. The message meets resistance.

36. Ibid., ch. 19.

37. Ibid., ch. 24.

Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one. Thrice was I beaten with rods, once was I stoned, thrice I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day I have been in the deep; In journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren; In weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness. Beside those things that are without, that which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the churches. Who is weak, and I am not weak? who is offended, and I burn not? If I must needs glory, I will glory of the things which concern mine infirmities. The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is blessed for evermore, knoweth that I lie not (II Cor. 11:24–31).

Was Paul saying that all of this pain was great gain? Yes. He was contented with his condition. “Not that I speak in respect of want: for I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content” (Phil. 4:11). These external circumstances were all aspects of his mission. He was getting his work done. Pain was the price of getting it done. Everything that is worth doing has a price, beginning with the price that Christ paid on the cross. Men prefer lower prices to higher prices, but in a cursed world (Gen. 3:17–19), it is foolish to complain about the existence of scarcity, i.e., prices that must be paid. Prices specify economic trade-offs that must be made in human action.

This passage stands as a condemnation of most men throughout history. The limits of legitimate discontent—no food, no clothing—are very narrow. This is another way of saying that most men’s faith in God is very limited. They do not trust God to provide them with the capital they need for the tasks at hand. They also have a higher assessment of what they deserve in life than is appropriate for fallen man. They deserve death. “But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die” (Gen. 2:17). Life itself is grace: an unmerited gift from God.

D. Civilization and Its Discontents

If everyone sought nothing more than food and clothing, could there be modern civilization? The personal drive that is required in a cursed world to discover, finance, and build, thereby progressively overcome the curse of scarcity, would be absent if no one desired to gain anything more than food and clothing. Is Paul calling for primitivism? Is he calling for a collapse of the division of labor and the resulting collapse of society? If we take his words literally, the answer is yes. So, we would be wise to look more closely at what he says.

Paul was a teacher. To finance a teaching career requires income-producing capital of one's own or payment from others. It also requires leisure for students to attend lectures and do the required reading. Capital, fee-paying students, third-party donations, and leisure are not zero-price resources. Therefore, for an evangelist to do his work requires more than food and clothing. It requires the social division of labor.

1. Capital and Thrift

Society requires capital. This means that it requires thrift. Thrift involves the sacrifice of present consumption for the sake of future consumption. Thrift occurs because people look ahead to the possibility of gain. This gain is more than personal godliness. It is also more than food and clothing.

It takes thrift—the sacrifice of present consumption—to achieve influence for God. This thrift is a matter of time devoted to spiritual exercises or study. Time is forfeited money. Time is an asset that has a price, namely, whatever the time-allocator could have earned through an alternative investment of his time. Time is the most precious of all human resources, for it is the only non-renewable resource that has no substitute.

Thrift is necessary for economic growth. Economic growth is necessary for the extension of God's kingdom in history. Without capital, there would be no book publishing, no e-mail, no radio, no television, or any of the other tools by which evangelists deliver the good news of Jesus Christ. There would also be no church buildings, no air conditioning, no indoor plumbing, no parking lots, and no mortgages.

All of these things are earth-bound. We are beneficiaries of them after we arrive, and our testaments leave them to our heirs after we have departed. Paul is correct about arrival and departure: these earth-bound assets are irrelevant to us. But, in between, they make a tremendous difference. They make a tremendous difference for personal godliness. They do make a difference for the effects of personal godliness. Jesus and the apostles occasionally delivered the good news to several thousand people at one time. A televangelist may deliver the good news to several million viewers, and do it again the following week. Tools extend our influence. They make us more productive. They enable us to achieve more than we could have achieved without them.

Wealth is not distributed equally. Some people are more productive than others. Some people possess capital in the broadest sense; others do not. Some people have more food than they need for life. Others face starvation.

2. Economic Growth

The history of Western civilization over the last quarter of a millennium has been the story of sustained economic growth. This began when the Industrial Revolution began. It was paralleled by the Agricultural Revolution. As the output of farmers grew, the price of food fell. More people could move to cities. They had to move; economic competition was too stiff in agriculture. In 1750, about 90% of Europeans and Americans worked in agriculture. In modern America, about 2% of the population works on the farms, and perhaps another 10% works in various agricultural support services. A similar expansion of output took place in clothing, as wool was replaced by cotton. Cotton is easier to wash than wool. It can be mass produced. So, in the areas of food and clothing, increasing output brought cheaper food, more varieties of food, cheaper clothing, and more varieties of clothing to the common man in the West. Now this process is spreading to Asia.

Pareto's law tells us that 20% of the population will own 80% of the capital.³⁸ The rich will benefit first from the expansion of output. Yet rich people cannot consume significantly more of the basics than poor people do. If they eat too much, they get fat. Then they must spend more on dieting and exercise than they do on food. The major differences between the lifestyle of the very rich and the middle class are these: the ability of the rich to hire full-time servants; the amount of square footage they occupy at home; and their ability to quit working in the marketplace at any time and not change their lifestyle.

Rich people do not need to consume so large a percentage of their income as poor people do. So, they invest. This raises output even more. The way to sell this expanded output is by lowering prices. This makes poorer people wealthier. There is a trickle-down effect in capitalism. Over centuries, this trickle-down effect makes poor people vastly richer than poor people were two centuries earlier. Think of the world in 1800. It would barely be recognizable to us. We would starve if we were transported back in time and asked to make a living. We would be useless to most employers. But a farmer in 1500 would have recognized most of the implements of a farm in 1800. Not in 1900. Surely, not in 2000.

38. Richard Koch, The 80/20 Principle: The Secret to Success by Achieving More With Less (New York: Dell, 1999).

If we had to move back in time, it would be very difficult for us to learn how to become productive. Children took years to learn how to become productive in a society without much capital. But if a man from 1500 were brought into today's world, he could learn the basics fairly rapidly. Work on an assembly line can be learned fast. So can the skills of washing windows or mowing lawns, for which there is always demand. He would adjust and be able to earn enough money to feed and clothe himself within days—maybe hours. A cot in a garden shed, a few used blankets, bulk rice and beans bought at Sam's Club, with vegetables grown in a few square feet of pots, and a trip to the Good Will or Salvation Army to buy used clothes would give him a worker's lifestyle by the standards of 1500 or even 1800. Add running hot and cold water and electric lights. Then consider dentistry. Would he go back? I doubt it. Give him two years, and he would be looking for a better job and complaining about no health insurance benefits. The question is: Would he be ready to move in with his girl friend without marrying her? If so, he would have completed the transition into the twenty-first century.

The story of a stone-age California Indian, named Ishi ("man") by anthropologist A. L. Kroeber, indicates just how fast primitive people can adjust to a world of enormous capital. Near starvation, he wandered into the town of Oroville in 1911. He was the last member of his tribe—or, possibly, a mixed-blood Indian in a tribe that had already died out, the Yahis.³⁹ He had been living just as tribe members had lived thousands of years earlier. He was brought to the University of California, Berkeley. He lived in the University's anthropology museum. He made arrowheads and other implements for the museum. He also learned how to ride the trolley. Flipping on an electric light was no more difficult for him than it was for anyone else. He adjusted to everything except the sight of large crowds at the beach. He died of tuberculosis in 1916.⁴⁰ Today, medical care would have saved his life. In contrast, a modern urban dweller, transported to the environment Ishi had lived in, would starve, just as Ishi almost did.

39. News Release (Feb. 5, 1996), University of California, Berkeley.

Capitalism has made food and clothing available to everyone in the West. Now it is making both available to the masses of Asia. Starvation is disappearing, except in sub-Saharan Africa, which remains despotic, demon-possessed, and anti-free market. But the price of this extension of food and clothing to the poorest people in society is the creation of vast pools of capital owned by an elite. Someone has to own it. Someone must make decisions as to how it should be used. Ownership is a social responsibility.⁴¹ The free market is an institutional structure that imposes costs of misuse on owners, and defines “misuse” in terms of what customers want. Customers make their bids for the output of capital, raw materials, and labor. Those owners of capital who ignore what the highest-bidding customers have bid must forfeit income and wealth.

Capitalism has removed what Paul identified as legitimate causes of discontent: a lack of food and a lack of clothing. Without capitalism, there would be far fewer people and a larger percentage of legitimately discontented people.

Then there is the issue of inter-generational continuity. “A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children’s children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just” (Prov. 13:22). Inheritance is an aspect of righteousness, this proverb says. A good man leaves an inheritance. Did Paul reject this verse? Has the New Covenant abandoned the capitalist implications of the Old Covenant? “And Abram was very rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold” (Gen. 13:2).

The hermeneutical issue here is covenantal continuity. Does this passage break with the Old Covenant? Or was Paul trying to persuade Timothy of a concept distinct from the interrelated economic concepts of thrift, capital, wealth, inheritance, and dominion? To answer these two questions correctly, we must first consider the theoretical issue of why people act economically.

40. Theodora Kroeber, Ishi in Two Worlds (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1961).

41. Gary North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 28. (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>)

3. Discontentment: Micro and Macro

Ludwig von Mises began his epistemologically deductive economic theory with the observation that men act. He then asked: Why do they act? His answer was that men wish to exchange their present circumstances for a different set of circumstances. Mises saw human action as a constant exchange of conditions. Men seek to improve their conditions, he said. Mises began his economic theory with the axiom of human action, which he explained by means of the corollary of discontentment. Discontentment is the essence of the human condition, Mises taught.

We call contentment or satisfaction that state of a human being which does not and cannot result in any action. Acting man is eager to substitute a more satisfactory state of affairs for a less satisfactory. His mind imagines conditions which suit him better, and his action aims at bringing about this desired state. The incentive that impels a man to act is always some uneasiness. A man perfectly content with the state of his affairs would have no incentive to change things. He would have neither wishes nor desires; he would be perfectly happy. He would not act; he would simply live free from care.⁴²

Paul is not talking about this kind of micro-discontentment: the exchange of a marginal quantity of one good for a marginal quantity of another. These exchanges are basic to life. We do not attain something for nothing except by God's grace. Paul is talking about macro-discontentment: the exchange of one lifestyle for another. He is talking about a man's attitude toward the conditions of his life that appear to be improvable only through the power of autonomous man, or impersonal fate, or impersonal chance, or some occult force. The discontented man sees his present condition as not worthwhile in the cosmic scheme of things or in his own personal scheme of things. He has judged his present condition, and has found it beneath him—beneath his dignity, his capabilities, his vision, or his well-deserved status. He is discontented because he does not believe that God's grace establishes his present condition. He thinks he can improve on God's grace.

The issue facing everyone is this: "What is my assigned task? What does God want me to do?" This is the continuing dilemma in every person's history. God commands perfection. God provides grace so that a covenant-keeper can make progress toward attaining the perfect humanity of Christ. This process begins with the judicial transfer of Christ's perfection to the covenant-keeper. Grace precedes law. Then, in full possession of salvation, the covenant-keeper begins to work it out. "Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling" (Phil. 2:12).⁴³

42. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), p. 13. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

Paul is implying here, though not saying explicitly, that God provides the covenant-keeper with whatever is required in order for him to accomplish his assigned task. God may provide the capital in advance. He may provide it on the job. The point is, He does provide it. Grace precedes law. Godliness with contentment requires that we perceive that the available supply of resources will be provided by God to enable us to complete the task at hand. The main problem is to assess correctly the task at hand, not to accumulate the capital necessary to complete it. If we do not know what the task at hand is, sin will lead us to attempt to accumulate more capital than is necessary to complete the task on schedule—God's schedule.

This leads us to Paul's next point: the pursuit of riches.

E. The Pursuit of Riches

Paul moves from a brief reference to the minimal capital required for godly contentment—food and clothing (v. 8)—to a consideration of the pursuit of riches.

But they that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all evil: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows (vv. 9–10).

The Greek words that begin this section, hoi boulomenoi, mean "those who will to be" or "desire to be."⁴⁴ Paul is speaking of seekers after riches, not people who are already rich. He speaks of the rich later in the chapter (vv. 17–19).⁴⁵ He says that those who seek to be rich are in serious risk of moral destruction. He lists a series of moral evils. In the Greek text, these are: temptation, snare, foolishness, injury, lusts, drowning, ruin, and destruction. The reference to drowning is graphic. This Greek word appears in the New Testament in one other place: "And they beckoned unto their partners, which were in the other ship, that they should come and help them. And they came, and filled both the ships, so that they began to sink" (Luke 5:7).

43. North, Ethics and Dominion, ch. 20.

44. William F. Arndt and F. Wilbur Gingrich (eds.), A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, by Walter Bauer, 2nd ed. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979), p. 146.

45. Chapter 10.

1. Covetousness

In the world of direct-response marketing, it is widely accepted by advertising copy writers that there are only two basic motivations for purchasing financial services: greed and fear. Greed is the more powerful appeal. Paul understood this dual motivation. He counters greed with fear. So great is the power of greed that Paul identifies it as a root of all evil. In the original Greek, the article "the" does not appear. The introductory part of this verse is better translated, "For a root of all evils is the love of money."⁴⁶ The Greek word translated as "love of money" is philarguria. It means "love of silver." Elsewhere, a closely related Greek word, philarguros, is translated as "covetous." "And the Pharisees also, who were covetous, heard all these things: and they derided him" (Luke 16:14). "For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy" (II Tim. 3:2). Its opposite, aphilarguros, means "not covetous." "Not given to wine, no striker, not greedy of filthy lucre; but patient, not a brawler, not covetous" (I Tim. 3:3). "Let your conversation be without covetousness; and be content with such things as ye have: for he hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee" (Heb. 13:5). The sense of "money" is present in the word, for it refers to silver. Its meaning extends beyond the love of money to greed in general.

Paul speaks of people who "coveted after" money. The Greek word translated as "coveted" means "to desire." "This is a true saying, If a man desire the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work" (I Tim. 3:1). "But now they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God: for he hath prepared for them a city" (Heb. 11:16). When it says they have erred from the faith it means "wandered away." They were sidetracked, in other words. They have also pierced themselves with pain, Paul says. These are self-inflicted wounds. This is graphic language. Paul is saying that God-fearing people have been deflected from the true faith and have injured themselves, all for the love of money. He is not speaking here of covenant-keepers in general. He has in mind specific people.

46. Marshall and Phillips, Interlinear Greek-English New Testament, p. 832.

2. God or Mammon

Paul offers no reason for the conflict between Christian faith and the pursuit of riches. He does not have to. Christ made this conflict a matter of fundamental distinctions. “No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon” (Matt. 6:24).⁴⁷

Christ had said that the issue is service. God demands service from all men. Mammon does, too. God is a personal being. Mammon is not. Mammon is a principle of action, a way of life. It is this-worldly. It is the great god More. It is man’s insatiable desire to heap up more treasure in history. It is fallen man’s illusion that what matters most is one’s legacy in history. It is also the error that gain is godliness. The religion of mammon in action is best seen in Christ’s parable of the barn-builder.

And he spake a parable unto them, saying, The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully: And he thought within himself, saying, What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits? And he said, This will I do: I will pull down my barns, and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods. And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry. But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then whose shall those things be, which thou hast provided? So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God (Luke 12:16–21).⁴⁸

Later in this chapter, Paul returns to this theme of being rich toward God (vv. 17–19). Christ told His listeners that God provides the capital necessary to fulfill the tasks at hand.

And he said unto his disciples, Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat; neither for the body, what ye shall put on. The life is more than meat, and the body is more than raiment. Consider the ravens: for they neither sow nor reap; which neither have storehouse nor barn; and God feedeth them: how much more are ye better than the fowls? And which of you with taking thought can add to his stature one cubit? If ye then be not able to do that thing which is least, why take ye thought for the rest? Consider the lilies how they grow: they toil not, they spin not; and yet I say unto you, that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. If then God so clothe the grass, which is to day in the field, and to morrow is cast into the oven; how much more will he clothe you, O ye of little faith? And seek not ye what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink, neither be ye of doubtful mind. For all these things do the nations of the world seek after: and your Father knoweth that ye have need of these things. But rather seek ye the kingdom of God; and all these things shall be added unto you. Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom. Sell that ye have, and give alms; provide yourselves bags which wax not old, a treasure in the heavens that faileth not, where no thief approacheth, neither moth corrupteth. For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also (Luke 12:22–34).

47. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 14.

48. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 25.

Christ was establishing a system of missionary finances.⁴⁹ He who would be a faithful missionary must not worry about funding. There are few missionaries who adopt this method of financing. China Inland Mission did, today called OMF International. Denominational foreign mission boards never do. There are few Christians who pursue the life of the missionary.

There are many who pursue riches. Christ made it as clear as possible that the attainment of true riches involves two things: trust in God regarding the availability of capital in history, and trust in the preservation of one's accumulated treasure in eternity.

This is the theological frame of reference for Paul's discussion of riches in this chapter. His discussion was an extension of what Solomon had taught a thousand years earlier.

He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver; nor he that loveth abundance with increase: this is also vanity. When goods increase, they are increased that eat them: and what good is there to the owners thereof, saving the beholding of them with their eyes? The sleep of a labouring man is sweet, whether he eat little or much: but the abundance of the rich will not suffer him to sleep. There is a sore evil which I have seen under the sun, namely, riches kept for the owners thereof to their hurt. But those riches perish by evil travail: and he begetteth a son, and there is nothing in his hand. As he came forth of his mother's womb, naked shall he return to go as he came, and shall take nothing of his labour, which he may carry away in his hand (Eccl. 5:10–15).

49. Ibid., ch. 25.

We bring nothing into this world, Solomon said,⁵⁰ and we shall take nothing out of it. Paul repeated this insight. Christ had also taken this doctrine and had amplified it. He showed that there is a way to store up riches in heaven, to be appropriated beyond the grave. This gave legitimate hope to men who recognized the truth of Solomon's warning:

If a man beget an hundred children, and live many years, so that the days of his years be many, and his soul be not filled with good, and also that he have no burial; I say, that an untimely birth [stillborn] is better than he. For he cometh in with vanity, and departeth in darkness, and his name shall be covered with darkness. Moreover he hath not seen the sun, nor known any thing: this hath more rest than the other. Yea, though he live a thousand years twice told, yet hath he seen no good: do not all go to one place (Eccl. 6:3–6)?

The grave swallows up all men equally, Solomon taught. Their end is the same. Lacking further revelation, the Old Covenant was imprecise regarding eternity. Christ taught that eternity will not be the same for all mankind. There is judgment and meaning beyond this world. What a man does in the realm of history establishes his post-resurrection legacy to himself. The covenant-keeper therefore should act consistently in history with what he believes about eternity. He has faith in continuity: charitable giving in this life produces wealth for eternity. Doing with less in history means mansions in eternity. Christ said: "Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also" (John 14:1–3).

Paul in this passage accepts the accuracy of Solomon's teaching regarding riches and their burden. He also extends Christ's warning that mammon is the essence of the alternative religious worldview to orthodoxy. In this brief section, Paul encapsulates the teaching of Solomon and Christ on the dangers of wealth.

50. North, Autonomy and Stagnation, ch. 3.

3. Andrew Carnegie

Andrew Carnegie built the greatest steel company in history. When he sold it on New Year's Day, 1901, to investors who had just created United States Steel, J. P. Morgan, the banker who had put together the transaction, told him, "Mr. Carnegie, I want to congratulate you on being the richest man in the world." Carnegie's share of the sale gained him $300 million in bonds that paid five percent per annum. In today's money, $300 million would be in the range of $7 billion.⁵¹ In 1901, there was no income tax.

Over the next two decades, he gave away 90% of his money. There is nothing like this story in the annals of modern capitalism.

In 1868, at the age of 33, he was earning $50,000 a year, the equivalent of well over a million after-tax dollars today. Two decades earlier, he had been a newly arrived immigrant pauper teenager who had to support his family. He had a gift for making money. In 1868, he wrote a memorandum to himself. It was discovered by his estate's executors half a century later. It had been preserved in a box of mementos. It included these observations.

Man must have an idol—the amassing of wealth is one of the worst species of idolatry—no idol more debasing than the worship of money. Whatever I engage in I must push inordinately; therefore should I be careful to choose that life which will be the most elevating in character. To continue much longer overwhelmed by business cares and with most of my thoughts wholly upon the way to make more money in the shortest time, must degrade me beyond hope of permanent recovery. I will resign business at thirty-five, but during the ensuing two years I wish to spend the afternoons in receiving instruction and in reading systematically.⁵²

For the next three decades, he pursued money instead. He built a company that served the world of industry well. Carnegie Steel found ways to cut costs and lower the price of steel. It produced fine products at low prices. This incessant competition led his competitors to put up the money and agree to the enormous debt to buy Carnegie Steel in 1901, in what turned out to be a vain hope of reducing competition. The free market continued to bring forth new competitors.

51. In 2012, median household income in the United States was around $50,000.

52. Quoted in Robert L. Heilbroner, "Carnegie & Rockefeller" (1960); reprinted in A Sense of History: The Best Writing from the Pages of American Heritage (New York: Smithmark, [1985] 1995), p. 431.

Carnegie then gave away most of his money, and in doing so, he became, along with the Rockefellers, father and son, the key builder of the world of non-profit, tax-exempt foundations, most of which have promoted the secular humanist vision that is sometimes called the New World Order. His anti-Christian outlook, which he had brought as a youth from Scotland, never left him. It passed into the non-profit foundations that he left behind. His bureaucratic heirs used his money to reshape the modern world along liberal humanist lines. In building his fortune, he was a social benefactor. In giving it away, he became arguably the most destructive private citizen in American history.

He had recognized as a young man the corrupting effects of the pursuit of great wealth. He resolved to break the habit. He failed. The pursuit of wealth ensnared him, even though he recognized the idolatrous nature of the pursuit, even though he recognized its appeal to man's base nature. Yet he benefitted the masses by the output of his soul-desiccating fixation on the accumulation of personal wealth.

He did not need any more money in 1868. He saw where he was headed. He told himself that he would not fall into the trap. But he did. His memorandum condemned his entrepreneurship posthumously. And yet, and yet . . . had he not succumbed to the siren call of riches, millions of steel users would have paid higher prices, or perhaps could not have purchased items at all because of their expense or even their non-existence. By lowering prices, he made it possible for manufacturers to find new ways to use steel to produce consumer goods. The producers did this because they could sell their output to customers. From an economic point of view, customers shouted to Carnegie for over three decades, "Serve us! Serve us! We will make you rich if you serve us." He did, and they did. He built an industrial monument to his own eternal condition: a steel plant's fiery furnace.

F. Unpursued Riches

Moses waxed eloquent about the corporate blessings of God. But how were men in the Old Covenant expected to attain such external blessings if they did not actively pursue them?

The answer should be obvious: covenant-keepers are to pursue righteousness. One result of righteousness is wealth. Jesus affirmed this relationship. "Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? (For after all these things do the Gentiles seek) for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you" (Matt. 6:31–33).⁵³ The phrase, "all these things," must not be spiritualized away.

The question is one of priorities. Man's top priority should be righteousness or godliness. Wealth is given to God's people in order to reward them for good service. Wealth is a success indicator. It announces: "This is working. Do it again." It is also given to them as a capital base for further dominion. Finally, it is given to confirm the predictability and reliability of the covenant. "But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day" (Deut. 8:18).⁵⁴

A dilemma has appeared: success indicators that deflect men from their original goal. Put in modern terminology, this is the dilemma that Max Weber called substantive rationalism vs. formal rationalism. It can also be described as ethics vs. efficiency. Here is an example. We tell a student to study hard, so that he can become well educated. We then set up a system of sanctions: grades. We find that some students "study for the test." They study in order to pass a test, not to master the material. And a few of them will cheat. The formal positive sanction—a high grade—competes with the substantive goal: education.

In every system of sanctions, we find this dualism. The sanctions may deflect men from their original goal. The Bible speaks of this dualism with respect to obedience. Do we obey the letter of the law or the spirit of the law? Paul wrote:

Forasmuch as ye are manifestly declared to be the epistle of Christ ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not in tables of stone, but in fleshy tables of the heart. And such trust have we through Christ to God-ward: Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to think any thing as of ourselves; but our sufficiency is of God; Who also hath made us able ministers of the new testament; not of the letter, but of the spirit: for the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life. But if the ministration of death, written and engraven in stones, was glorious, so that the children of Israel could not stedfastly behold the face of Moses for the glory of his countenance; which glory was to be done away: How shall not the ministration of the spirit be rather glorious? (II Cor. 3:3–8).

53. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 15.

54. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 22.

The spirit of free enterprise is “serve the customer.” The letter of free enterprise is “make a profit.” If a business does not make a profit, it cannot serve the customer for long. But the focus of concern for business owners and their hired managers shifts from long-run service to the customer to short-term profits. This is the same type of dilemma that faces the student who wants to go to graduate school: he must get high grades, year by year. He can gain the long-term goal only by way of a series of short-term successes.

Paul does not tell Timothy to avoid serving people well. He tells him not to pursue riches. The goal is always service. However men measure successful ecclesiastical service—souls won, marriages saved, churches built, sermons preached, etc.—there will always be a numerical indicator of success. This indicator cannot include all of the aspects of godly service. It is merely a representative figure. Every accounting system has numbers. Every rating system has objective standards. These do not tell the whole story, but they tell that portion of the story for which performance is usually rewarded. So, some people—perhaps most people—perform in terms of the system of rewards and punishments, i.e., sanctions.

Paul warns Timothy not to be beguiled by the reward of money. Timothy is not to pursue riches. This lure is too strong for most men to resist. Men shape their job performance and even their lives in terms of a reward that is inherently temporal. The pursuit of riches is therefore a snare.

It is also a false god offering a false hope. Pareto’s 80-20 law always reasserts itself. About 80% of the wealth will be owned by 20% of the population in any society. Furthermore, among all societies, 20% of them will own 80% of the world’s wealth. Those people who pursue riches are pursuing a goal that has always been closed to the vast majority. They are sacrificing their lives on an altar of statistical futility.

Conclusion

The pursuit of riches is a spiritually dangerous pursuit. Far better, Paul advises, to pursue godliness. After a man attains godliness, his next goal should be contentment. This is defined simply by Paul: satisfaction with food and clothing. A covenant-keeper who has food and clothing should be content.

This is a hard doctrine to accept. The cares of this world grow up and threaten to strangle us. Jesus warned: “He also that received seed among the thorns is he that heareth the word; and the care of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, choke the word, and he becometh unfruitful" (Matt. 13:22).⁵⁵ The more wealth we have, the larger our number of options, and the more cares and responsibilities we have. Or, as Solomon put it: "When goods increase, they are increased that eat them" (Eccl. 5:11).⁵⁶ A large table attracts many diners.

Paul cautions against pursuing wealth. But he offers different advice for those who have already attained wealth, as we shall see in the next chapter.

55. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 28.

56. Gary North, Autonomy and Stagnation, ch. 19.

11

THE UNCERTAINTY OF RICHES

Instruct those who are rich in this present world not to be conceited or to fix their hope on the uncertainty of riches, but on God, who richly supplies us with all things to enjoy. Instruct them to do good, to be rich in good works, to be generous and ready to share, storing up for themselves the treasure of a good foundation for the future, so that they may take hold of that which is life indeed (1 Tim. 6:17–19, NASB).

The theocentric focus of this passage is God’s trustworthiness. This is a matter of service: hierarchy.¹ We serve that which we trust. God’s trustworthiness is contrasted with the uncertainty of riches. Paul implicitly tells men to ask themselves: “In what should I trust?” That which is trustworthy is that which one serves faithfully in thankfulness of past support and expectation of future support. In human affairs, support is two-way: the division of labor. Not so in the relationship between God and His creation. God is not dependent on anything else.

A. Laying Up Treasure

Paul tells Timothy to instruct² rich people. Timothy is to present a message regarding their special moral obligations to others. Why should rich people be singled out? Because their wealth is accompanied by unique moral risks and obligations. The biblical principle here is this: from him to whom much has been given, much is expected (Luke 12:48).³

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. The Greek word can also be translated “command.”

1. Laying Up Assets

I began this chapter with the text in the New American Standard Bible. This is the first time in 39 years that I have begun a chapter in this commentary series with anything but a citation from the King James Version. This is because the King James translators missed the point of this text. Paul recommends here that rich people lay up, meaning to accumulate assets. He is not referring here to the accumulation of invisible wealth to be personally appropriated beyond the grave. He speaks here of laying up a good foundation in history. The King James translators wrote: "Laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life" (v. 19). The Greek text does not convey the sense of "against." The Greek text does not contrast history—the time of laying up—with final judgment. The Greek word translated "against" is eis, meaning (among many things) "to" or "for." In this context, it means "for the future."⁴ The Greek word translated as "eternal," ontose, is the word for "real" or "true." The New American Standard Bible translates the passage more closely to the original Greek: "Storing up for themselves the treasure of a good foundation for the future, so that they may take hold of that which is life indeed."

We take hold of eternal life while we are in history. John the Baptist said: "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him" (John 3:36). He who trusts Christ in history attains eternal salvation in history. He who refuses to trust Christ in history seals his doom for eternity. A person in inescapably takes hold of one or the other of these eternal conditions. There is no third option.

Question: "Why should a self-interested rich man be generous to others?" Answer: "To lay up a good foundation for the future." The Greek word for "future" does not refer exclusively to eternity. The Greek word translated as "time to come" is mello, which refers to the future in general. This need not be eternity, although this Greek word occasionally appears in the context of eternity. "And whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him: but whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come" (Matt. 12:32). The contrast Matthew 12:32 is explicit: this world (aion) vs. the world to come. This is not the contrast in I Timothy 6:19. The word mello refers to history, as in the following cases: “After these things the Lord appointed other seventy also, and sent them two and two before his face into every city and place, whither he himself would come” (Luke 10:1). “When Jesus therefore perceived that they would come and take him by force, to make him a king, he departed again into a mountain himself alone” (John 6:15). “Who seeing Peter and John about to go into the temple asked an alms” (Acts 3:3). Laying hold of true life is the same process as working out one’s salvation (Phil. 2:12). It is a matter of progressive sanctification.⁵

4. William F. Arndt and F. Wilbur Gingrich (eds.), A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, by Walter Bauer, 2nd ed. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979), p. 228 (2b).

2. The Uncertainty of Time

Timothy’s message is in the form of a commandment: do not trust in the uncertainty of riches. The Greek text says: “uncertainty of riches,” not “uncertain riches.” The King James Version has it wrong: “Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not highminded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy” (v. 17). The Greek text does not imply that some kinds of riches are uncertain, while other kinds of riches are certain. It implies that riches in general are uncertain. Paul has to be speaking here of riches in history, for Christ taught that riches in eternity are certain.

Why is uncertainty associated with riches? Because riches are temporally bound. They are part of history. History is subject to a curse because of Adam’s sin (Gen. 3:17–19).⁶ Aspects of this curse include physical decay and death. Man’s environment thwarts his productivity. In addition, God works in history deliberately to create uncertainty for successful people. Hannah’s song of rejoicing announced a great reversal of conditions.

Talk no more so exceeding proudly; let not arrogancy come out of your mouth: for the LORD is a God of knowledge, and by him actions are weighed. The bows of the mighty men are broken, and they that stumbled are girded with strength. They that were full have hired out themselves for bread; and they that were hungry ceased: so that the barren hath born seven; and she that hath many children is waxed feeble. The LORD killeth, and maketh alive: he bringeth down to the grave, and bringeth up. The LORD maketh poor, and maketh rich: he bringeth low, and lifteth up (I Sam. 2:3–7).⁷

5. Chapter 10:A:2.

6. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

Uncertainty is an aspect of all marketable (exchangeable) assets in history. These assets rise and fall in value. They are not trustworthy.

A characteristic feature of earthly riches is their transferability. In contrast, the gift of eternal life is inalienable. It cannot be purchased. It is a free gift of God. “For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord” (Rom. 6:23). Eternal life therefore cannot be sold. Paul knew this when he wrote, “For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh” (Rom. 9:3). This exchange of eternal conditions is not possible. Eternal life is the unique, nontransferable possession of the recipient. Eternal life is certain. Paul insisted on the certainty of God’s grace.

For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, Nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord (Rom. 8:38–39).

Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ: According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love: Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will, To the praise of the glory of his grace, wherein he hath made us accepted in the beloved (Eph. 1:3–6).

Because eternal life is received by grace through faith during history, there is continuity between history and eternity. The same continuity applies to eternal death. The discontinuity between eternal life and eternal death begins in history (John 3:36). Because of the judicial continuity between history and eternity, a covenant-keeper in history can accumulate assets that are immediately put on deposit for him for his use in eternity.

Eternal assets are not subject to uncertainty, for they are located beyond history. This contrast in both the location and the certainty of riches was taught by Christ. “Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal” (Matt. 6:19–20).⁸ Christ referred here to losses that result from physical decay. A moth eats fine clothing. Rust erodes the productivity of tools. In short, things wear out. This is because the world itself is wearing out. The world is under a curse.

7. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 12.

For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope, Because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body (Rom. 8:20–23).⁹

This historical curse is not without grace. No curse in history is ever without grace.¹⁰ By God’s grace, the cosmic erosion process is offset and even overcome in limited areas. Moses reminded the generation of the conquest, “Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell, these forty years” (Deut. 8:4).¹¹ The decay associated with entropy—the disorderly outcome of the second law of thermodynamics—is common, but it is not universal.¹² For example, in a future era before the final judgment, the shortening of men’s life expectancy that took place after Noah’s Flood will be reversed. “There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed” (Isa. 65:20).¹³ We are already seeing this reversal in our day. Except in what used to be the Soviet

8. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 13.

9. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 4.

10. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

11. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 18.

12. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988). (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

13. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 15. Cf. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

Union (1917–1991), average life expectancy—not considering war—steadily increased worldwide during the twentieth century.¹⁴ The distribution of long life, unlike the distribution of marketable wealth, is becoming closer to an egalitarian standard. A typical poor man is far more likely to attain 80 percent of a rich man’s life expectancy than 80 percent of a rich man’s net worth.

Because of the inescapable impermanence of this cursed world, he who devotes his life to accumulating treasure that can be used only in this world is a fool. He ignores both his own mortality and the mortality of this world apart from God’s grace. One more time:

And he spake a parable unto them, saying, The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully: And he thought within himself, saying, What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits? And he said, This will I do: I will pull down my barns, and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods. And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry. But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then whose shall those things be, which thou hast provided? So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God (Luke 12:16–21).¹⁵

This is foolish. “So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God.” This principle of holy giving is Paul’s starting point. The idea of “rich toward God” is the same as “rich in good works.” God does not need our money. We cannot write Him a check. He does not accept credit cards. We are being rich toward God whenever we use our wealth to benefit others, who are made in God’s image (Matt. 25:31–40). We are also rich toward God when we sacrifice a portion of our time and wealth in order to heal His creation as His stewards. Example: “If a bird’s nest chance to be before thee in the way in any tree, or on the ground, whether they be young ones, or eggs, and the dam sitting upon the young, or upon the eggs, thou shalt not take the dam with the young; But thou shalt in any wise let the dam go, and take the young to thee; that it may be well with thee, and that thou mayest prolong thy days” (Deut. 22:6–7).¹⁶

Laying up treasure in eternity is legitimate, Christ taught. He

14. This may not be true in sub-Saharan Africa, where AIDS is a pandemic. Accurate population statistics for sub-Saharan Africa do not exist.

15. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 25.

16. See North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 53.

taught that covenant-keepers should lay up treasure in eternity by distributing treasure charitably in history. They forfeit present wealth in expectation of eternal wealth. This is the economist's definition of thrift: the exchange of present assets in expectation of gaining future assets of greater value. The expected payoff for Christ's recommended exchange comes beyond the grave. The covenant-keeper exchanges assets that are subject to uncertainty for assets that are permanent in value. It takes faith to believe this, for the transfer appears to be exclusively historical: exchanging an uncertain condition (riches) for an even more uncertain condition (fewer riches). This is why the exchange is a test of faith. In whose word does a person trust: man's or Christ's?

Skeptics and would-be humorists use the phrase, "Jesus saves," as if this meant opening a bank savings account. "Jesus saves; Moses invests," is one such phrase. Nevertheless, the idea that Jesus saves in an economic sense is accurate. In fact, men's salvation rests solely on this fact. God Himself exchanged wealth for poverty. He did this in order to exchange poverty in history for wealth in eternity. Paul wrote:

Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus: Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God: But made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name: That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; And that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father. Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling (Phil. 2:5–12).¹⁷

Christ's exchange of eternity for history led to His exaltation in eternity. In His divinity, the Second Person of the Trinity took on humanity by entering into history: the incarnation. This led to His exaltation in eternity in his capacity as perfect man. Christ's exchange of conditions is the sole basis of any person's salvation. Christians by God's grace receive Christ's perfect humanity as a gift in history: definitive sanctification. Christians do not become divine; rather, they attain the moral status of Christ's perfect humanity through their faith in the unique saving work of Christ. Therefore, Paul concluded, covenant-keepers are supposed to work out the salvation that is already theirs: progressive sanctification.¹⁸

17. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 20.

Christ identified physical insecurity—moth, rust, and theft—as the characteristic feature of time-bound treasure. He said that treasure in heaven is not subject to uncertainty. Christ taught that riches are uncertain because of the uncertainty associated with time-bound capital assets. He listed physical uncertainties as examples, but uncertainty is more than physical. It is also economic.

B. Inescapable Future Uncertainties

1. Conditions Change, Wealth Changes

When conditions change, wealth changes. That which had been very valuable before can become worthless. “And there was a great famine in Samaria: and, behold, they besieged it, until an ass’s head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of dove’s dung for five pieces of silver” (II Kings 6:25).¹⁹ “Then Elisha said, Hear ye the word of the LORD; Thus saith the LORD, To morrow about this time shall a measure of fine flour be sold for a shekel, and two measures of barley for a shekel, in the gate of Samaria” (II Kings 7:1). Elisha was forecasting a change in comparative military strength by predicting changes in the array of prices. History is constantly changing. Therefore, wealth is constantly changing.

To understand why wealth changes, it is necessary first to understand cause and effect in both economic value and prices. Changes in prices appear to be the source of economic uncertainty, but this is an illusion based on faulty economic analysis. Prices change because (1) objective external circumstances change, or (2) people’s subjective values change, or (3) the interaction changes between the changing objective external circumstances and people’s changing subjective values.²⁰ Objective prices change in response to changes in people’s subjective assessment of changes in objective conditions. It is through changes in prices that men overcome some of life’s uncertainties. This is why any system of mandatory pricing that is imposed by the civil

18. Chapter 10:A:2.

19. North, Disobedience and Defeat, ch. 26.

20. On modern economics’ theories of subjective value and objective value, see Appendix B.

government increases uncertainty. Price and wage controls, far from being a stabilizing influence, create disorder.

2. The Customer's Final Economic Authority

A major aspect of Christian economics ought to be the doctrine of imputation. With respect to God, imputation means God's declaration of some condition. He declares what the condition is, and this declaration is perfect. There is perfect correspondence between God's subjective declaration and the creation's objective condition. Chapter one of Genesis is the model of imputation: the repetition of the phrase, "it was good."

Modern economic theory (post-1870) begins with the doctrine of each individual's subjective imputation of economic value: methodological individualism and methodological subjectivism. In contrast, Christian economics must build its theory of economic value on the theological foundation of the related doctrines of God's subjective imputation and therefore objective economic value: methodological Trinitarianism and methodological subjectivism/objectivism. Only then can it establish a valid concept of men's imputation of economic value. Men are made in God's image, so a man possesses the ability both to assess and declare an asset's value to him. What distinguishes Christian economist's theory of value from modern humanistic economics' theory of value is the doctrine of God's imputation: an authoritative subjective declaration of an objective condition.

Modern economics has formally adopted a purely subjectivist epistemology. It teaches that economic value is imputed by individual customers who own assets that they are willing to exchange in order to gain the use or ownership of other assets. Individual customers make decisions to buy or not to buy, meaning to exchange or not to exchange. Individual sellers compete against each other to make a sale. Through supply and demand—buyers vs. buyers, sellers vs. sellers—objective prices for scarce economic resources are established in a free market. Competing subjective values produce competing objective bids. The result of these competitive bids is an array of objective prices.

As we have seen in the case of Samaria's array of prices, when objective external conditions change, customers' subjective imputations of economic value also change. This means that their subjective ranking of economic value changes, which means that their objective bids change, which means that objective prices change.

In a high division of labor economy, customers possess money, which is best defined as the most marketable commodity.²¹ Customers impute present value to the array of available products and services. Then, through competition with each other in a free market that is open to all would-be bidders, they establish objective money prices for goods and services.

A free market economy is a gigantic auction. In an auction, the high bid wins unless the auctioneer has previously announced a minimum price, which no high bid reaches. In a free market, the high bid wins unless charity is involved. In most markets most of the time, charity is not involved. The larger the market, the less personal is the relationship between buyer and seller. The less personal the relationship is, the less likelihood that a transaction will contain an element of charity, either for the buyer or the seller.

The observable fact that the high bid wins has been central to economic theory ever since the publication of Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations in 1776. The principle of "high bid wins" is an implication of the assumption of individual self-interest as the dominant factor in economic action. From Smith to the present, individual self-interest has been regarded as the dominant motivational factor in economic action. Without this assumption and without confirmation by the facts of economic life, economics would be a very different social science.²²

Modern economics has argued that customers impute economic value to scarce goods and services, thereby establishing their market value. Suppliers allocate scarce resources so as to maximize their own income (except when charity is involved). They pay close attention to what they believe buyers will pay for the suppliers' output. This is why, ultimately, customers determine economic value.²³

Because customers possess the most marketable commodity, money, they possess final economic authority over pricing. They make competitive bids against each other. These bids, which are based on individual subjective valuations, produce objective prices for specific goods and services.

Sellers announce prices of whatever they offer for sale, but these prices are fiduciary prices, i.e., prices set by sellers so that their invent-

21. Ludwig von Mises, The Theory of Money and Credit, rev. ed. (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1953), pt. I, ch. 1, sec. 2: "The Origin of Money." (<http://bit.ly/MisesTMC>) The first edition was published in 1912.

22. Appendix C:B.

23. Of course, God establishes final value. I am speaking here of value in the market. On God as imputer of economic value, see Appendix B.

ories will be maintained until the expected highest-bidding customers show up and buy. This means that sellers act as economic agents of high-bidding customers. Sellers directly impose demand in the market only in their capacity as people who legally retain ownership of assets. This is sometimes called reservation demand.²⁴ Would-be customers make bids, but some sellers say “no.” Those who say “no” are exercising reservation demand.

What influence does a seller have over pricing? Very little. He can announce a price, but this is not the same as making a sale, any more than an auctioneer establishes the price when he asks for a specific initial bid. When an auctioneer asks, “Do I hear. . . .?” he reveals the nature of the pricing process. The free market is a giant auction. If there is no bid, there is no sale.

Because customers possess the most marketable commodity, money, they are in a much stronger bargaining position than sellers. Because they possess money, they possess far more alternatives than sellers do. An individual buyer faces a much larger audience of competing suppliers (buyers of money) than a seller faces (buyers of specific goods). The highest bidding customers establish final sale prices. Sellers make sales only by agreeing to the prices set by the most competitive buyers.

A seller can legally decide not to sell. By reducing the available supply, his decision to avoid selling affects the market price of competing assets to some degree, but this influence usually is so minimal as to be barely detectable. In a rare case when a seller keeps the asset for personal use by refusing to sell, he thereby becomes the highest-bidding final customer. This may be a major factor in the supply of certain unique forms of labor, such as a star athlete or entertainer, who buys leisure (“free” time)²⁵ by refusing to perform. But the more replaceable a particular service, the less influence over price a supplier possesses.

3. Value Is Uncertain

Economic value is uncertain in a world of unpredictable change. The less predictable the world is, the more uncertain economic value is. This means that temporal riches are uncertain. This is because men

24. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State: A Treatise on Economic Principles, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), p. 253. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardMES>) are not God. They cannot know the future perfectly. They do not know which changes are coming. Their wealth is therefore subject to uncertainty. To trust in riches is to trust in one's ability to forecast the future accurately and also to deal with it profitably. The more a man trusts in his own riches, the more he assumes his possession of God's incommunicable attribute of perfect foreknowledge. No man knows the future perfectly, Paul taught.

25. Time is never free. The cost of a unit of time is the value to the owner of the most important use foregone.

Charity [agápē] never faileth: but whether there be prophecies, they shall fail; whether there be tongues, they shall cease; whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away. For we know in part, and we prophesy in part. But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away. When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child: but when I became a man, I put away childish things. For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known. And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity (I Cor. 13:8–13).

Because perfect foreknowledge is not given to men, a wise man substitutes faith in the outworking of love (charity) for faith in riches. Or, as Paul has already announced to Timothy, "For the love of money is the root of all evil: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows. But thou, O man of God, flee these things; and follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love [agápē], patience, meekness" (6:10–11).²⁶

Paul tells Timothy to tell rich people not to be highminded. This is another word for "proud." The rich man is tempted to trust in his wealth, which ultimately means trust in his own forecasting ability and also his entrepreneurial skills necessary to deal with the future profitably. The rich man may regard himself as beyond the common conditions that afflict humanity, at least those afflictions that are related to wealth rather than common humanity, such as incurable disease. This is another way of saying that a rich man thinks that he can buy his way out of almost any problem. Solutions usually have price tags attached to them, he believes; he believes that he can afford to pay the price to evade most problems. So, he regards himself as above the uncertainties that beset the common man. The rich man trusts in riches, which are of uncertain future value. This is a mistake, Paul teaches.

26. Chapter 10.

C. A Diversified Portfolio

Paul contrasts trust in temporal riches with trust in the living God. Nothing is uncertain to God. Nothing is beyond God's decree: "And all the inhabitants of the earth are reputed as nothing; and he doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth: and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" (Dan. 4:35). Following Christ's teaching, Paul teaches that a rich covenant-keeper should be willing to affirm his trust in God (I Tim. 6:17) by turning loose of a portion of his capital (v. 18). A rich covenant-keeper should turn loose of a portion of his assets (v. 18) in order to take hold of true life (v. 19). This is an economic application of Christ's general principle: "For whosoever will save his life shall lose it: and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it. For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" (Matt. 16:25–26).²⁷

Paul does not here discuss treasure in heaven. He does not argue, as Christ argued, that a covenant-keeper's surrender of economic assets in history is his means of accumulating permanent assets in eternity. Paul speaks of two things: a superior form of trust and additional temporal riches.

Paul says that rich men should be willing to communicate. The meaning of this word has changed since 1611. It means to be generous or to share. The Greek word translated as "communicate" appears only in this verse: koinonikous. A parallel Greek root word, itself related to koinonos, sometimes refers to common ownership. "And all that believed were together, and had all things common" (Acts 2:44). Another related root word refers to a partnership. "If thou count me therefore a partner, receive him as myself" (Phm. 1:17). The idea here is shared corporate life. This implies shared trials and tribulations. The rich man can reduce the tribulations of the poor man by sharing a portion of his wealth with him. The rich man suffers a loss, while the poor man enjoys a gain. This principle of sharing is what Paul taught to the Corinthians.

But this I say, He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully. Every man according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give; not grudgingly, or of necessity: for God loveth a cheerful giver. And God is able to make all grace abound toward you; that ye, always having all sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work: As it is written, He hath dispersed abroad; he hath given to the poor: his righteousness remaineth for ever (II Cor. 9:6–9).

27. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 35.

Sowing bountifully produces a positive sanction: reaping bountifully. Paul reminded the Corinthians of the source of all temporal wealth: God, who “is able to make all grace abound toward you” (v. 8). Paul makes the same identification to Timothy: God, “who giveth us richly all things to enjoy” (v. 17). God provides our capital. God’s inventory of capital is unlimited. Paul speaks here of temporal wealth. He is not comparing temporal wealth with eternal wealth.

It takes faith to believe that there is an open-ended supply of wealth for covenant-keepers in history, despite the fact of scarcity. It takes very great faith. It takes such great faith that very few covenant-keepers believe it—not the poor, who strive to be rich; not the rich, who fear becoming poor. This is why Paul instructs Timothy to deliver the truth about riches to both rich and poor.

Paul warns the rich and the poor not to be deceived by riches. Solomon had delivered a similar message a thousand years earlier. “Remove far from me vanity and lies: give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me: Lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the LORD? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain” (Prov. 30:8–9).²⁸ Solomon, one of the richest men in history, affirmed the desirability of a middle-class income and lifestyle. Middle-class income is a middle path between thievery and pride.

Paul describes this pathway as separating covetousness from pride. Nevertheless, Paul does not recommend middle-class living in this epistle. His words are directed exclusively to the poor and the rich. He is concerned with their souls, not with their income. He does not have in mind Solomon’s prayer. He says to avoid striving after riches, and, for those who have already attained riches, he recommends a systematic reduction of present wealth. He does not recommend a program of giving away wealth as a means of attaining a middle-class life style. He presents a different program: the attainment of greater security in history by abandoning all trust in riches. In no way is this a revision of the Old Covenant. “He that trusteth in his riches shall fall: but the righteous shall flourish as a branch” (Prov. 11:28).²⁹ Paul recommends to rich men and poor men the same distrustful attitude toward riches. Like a dietician who prescribes the same diet for thin people and fat people, so is Paul with respect to riches. There is greater spiritual security in avoiding the quest for riches, he tells the poor man, and greater economic security by giving money away, he tells the rich man.

28. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 86.

29. Ibid., ch. 33.

Riches that are beyond uncertainty are exclusively eternal. Christ made this point clear. Paul is not promising certainty in a world of inherently unpredictable change. But he is promising increased certainty for both the rich and the poor. The rich man normally seeks increased certainty by increasing his riches. So does the poor man. This is a mistake, Paul teaches. Uncertainty of temporal riches is inescapable, for loss-producing changes in history are inevitable. In a world of sin and death, such losses can be life-threatening. The rich man believes that by piling up riches, he can reduce this uncertainty. So does the poor man.

A rich man possesses sufficient wealth to enable him to seek a diversified portfolio of temporal assets that are subject to different types of uncertainty. He diversifies his portfolio on the assumption that when the market price of one asset falls, the market price of another asset may rise. Paul tells the rich man that increased certainty is attained by re-allocating a portion of one's portfolio out of marketable assets and into nonmarketable assets, namely, the blessings of God. These blessings are nonmarketable because (1) would-be buyers do not believe in the existence of such assets, and (2) God would not honor the sale. A claim on God's uncertainty-reducing blessings is established by turning loose of a portion of one's wealth in faith.

This strategy of reducing uncertainty by turning loose of money is available both to rich and poor, although Paul does not say this explicitly regarding the poor. Christ did. Christ gave the example of the poor widow. "And he looked up, and saw the rich men casting their gifts into the treasury. And he saw also a certain poor widow casting in thither two mites. And he said, Of a truth I say unto you, that this poor widow hath cast in more than they all: For all these have of their abundance cast in unto the offerings of God: but she of her penury hath cast in all the living that she had" (Luke 21:1–4).³⁰ The rich men gave away more money than the widow, but what they gave was a small portion of their wealth. The widow did not seek increased security through thrift and capital accumulation. She knew that in her circumstances, faithfulness to God was the only way to security. She could not reasonably expect to accumulate a diversified portfolio large enough to protect her. Faithful giving results in God's protection. She saw clearly what the rich men did not: uncertainty afflicts all marketable riches. She trusted God, whose favor is nonmarketable. The outward manifestation of her trust was her surrender of all of her money, which she knew was insufficient to provide security. Her poverty opened her eyes to the truth about riches: they are uncertain.

30. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 50.

D. Christian Community and Anonymous Charity

Paul teaches here that faithful giving to the poor communicates, i.e., creates community. Wealth transferred to the poor reduces immediate worry by the poor. The Christian community is protected against severe uncertainties because those members with greater wealth use their wealth to relieve the poor members. This is a system of voluntary insurance. Where it differs from an insurance policy is in the absence of any legal obligation. There is no contract. There is no statistical analysis of risk. The community benefits from a reduction in uncertainty despite the fact that uncertainty is not risk, i.e., it cannot be successfully dealt with through insurance contracts. Insurance applies only to classes of events that are governed by known statistical probability, i.e., the law of large numbers. Uncertainty is not part of an insurable class of events.³¹ In any case, the poor cannot afford to buy insurance. For them, risk might as well be uncertainty.

Christians might be tempted to argue that a public example of a charitable rich man today can serve as a model for rich men in the future. His example will be imitated. This in turn should lead to greater trust by the poor in the generosity of the rich. But this is not what Paul teaches. Paul teaches men to trust in God, not in the charity of the rich. Then there is the whole question of becoming an example. Christ specifically warned Christians against becoming a public example of

31. Economists distinguish between uncertainty and risk. Risk can be dealt with through insurance because a particular event is part of a larger class of similar events. Money to insure people against risky events can be pooled in order to reduce the heavy burden of an individual event on any one participant in the pool. In contrast, an uncertain event is beyond statistical analysis. It is not subject to "the law of large numbers." There is no commercial insurance for it. See Frank H. Knight, Risk, Uncertainty and Profit (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1921). (<http://bit.ly/KnightRUP>); Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>) charitable giving.

Take heed that ye do not your alms before men, to be seen of them: otherwise ye have no reward of your Father which is in heaven. Therefore when thou doest thine alms, do not sound a trumpet before thee, as the hypocrites do in the synagogues and in the streets, that they may have glory of men. Verily I say unto you, They have their reward. But when thou doest alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth: That thine alms may be in secret: and thy Father which seeth in secret himself shall reward thee openly (Matt. 6:1–4).³²

The covenant-keeping poor are supposed to trust in God, not in the covenant-keeping charitable rich. Given the existence of widespread resistance by the rich to Paul's teaching on charitable giving, this is a wise policy on the part of the poor.

Elsewhere, Paul recommended the creation of a community in which no one suffers from the crippling effects of poverty. The context of his remarks was the year-old promise of the Corinthian church to send money to the hard-pressed Jerusalem church.

I speak not by commandment, but by occasion of the forwardness [earnestness] of others, and to prove the sincerity of your love. For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich. And herein I give my advice: for this is expedient for you, who have begun before, not only to do, but also to be forward [have begun] a year ago. Now therefore perform the doing of it; that as there was a readiness to will, so there may be a performance also out of that which ye have. For if there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not. For I mean not that other men be eased, and ye burdened: But by an equality, that now at this time your abundance may be a supply for their want, that their abundance also may be a supply for your want: that there may be equality: As it is written, He that had gathered much had nothing over; and he that had gathered little had no lack (II Cor. 8:8–15).³³

In support of his view, Paul cited Exodus 16: the first appearance of the manna in the wilderness. What was manna?

32. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 11.

33. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 5, 6.

And when the dew that lay was gone up, behold, upon the face of the wilderness there lay a small round thing, as small as the hoar frost on the ground. And when the children of Israel saw it, they said one to another, It is manna: for they wist not what it was. And Moses said unto them, This is the bread which the LORD hath given you to eat. This is the thing which the LORD hath commanded, Gather of it every man according to his eating, an omer for every man, according to the number of your persons; take ye every man for them which are in his tents. And the children of Israel did so, and gathered, some more, some less. And when they did mete it with an omer, he that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack; they gathered every man according to his eating (Ex. 16:14–18).

God gave the Israelites free food, so that they would learn to trust Him in times of crisis. The predictability of the manna's miraculous daily appearance, except on the sabbath, was designed to produce confidence in God. The double portion of manna on the day before the sabbath (v. 22) was a weekly miracle that was also supposed to produce confidence in God. The miracle of the manna had an element of continuity (five days) and an element of discontinuity (double portion on day six, followed by no manna), both of which were to increase the Israelites' trust in God.³⁴

Paul sought to persuade the Corinthians that the church international is the equivalent of manna. This principle of reliable aid from God was applied by Paul to the comparative wealth of the church in Corinth vs. the church in Jerusalem. The comparative wealth of the members of the two congregations established a moral obligation on the part of the Corinthians. This was not an intra-congregational comparison, but an inter-congregational comparison. By implication, this moral obligation can become intra-congregational, but Paul did not formally draw this conclusion.

By giving money quietly to his local congregation and also to charitable organizations, the rich man can avoid the public display of charitable giving that Christ warned against. He can retain his anonymity. At the same time, the poor are assisted. The poor can then better escape the lust for riches that afflicts poor people who see no way out of their many uncertainties other than gaining wealth. They can more confidently trust in God. Their faith can be placed in the Christian community, not just in near-miraculous interventions by God into their circumstances.

34. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 18.

The continuity of faith-based community is preferable to the discontinuity of miracles. This was equally true under Moses. The primary goal of the manna was to create faith in God, but the manna ceased when the Israelites entered the Promised Land. “And the manna ceased on the morrow after they had eaten of the old corn of the land; neither had the children of Israel manna any more; but they did eat of the fruit of the land of Canaan that year” (Josh. 5:12). So it is to be in the New Covenant: the substitution of covenant community for miracles.

This strategy of relying on community over miracles is not always applicable to foreign missions. In extensively occult cultural environments, the discontinuity of miracles is sometimes necessary to deal with entrenched demonism. Metaphorically speaking, the Christians’ serpents must publicly destroy the magicians’ serpents. The Christian foreign missionary may need to discipline himself to rely on what appears to be uncertain financing as a means of strengthening his faith in God in an uncertain environment. This has been the approach to financing by the OMF International, which used to be called the China Inland Mission, founded by Hudson Taylor in the late nineteenth century. There is no guaranteed salary to the OMF missionary in the field.

E. Harnessing Greed

Paul stresses in this passage the importance of charitable giving: “That they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate.” There is a positive sanction promised to the giver: “storing up for themselves the treasure of a good foundation for the future, so that they make take hold of that which is life indeed” (NASB). There is temporal self-interest. Christ had said the same thing with respect to eternal self-interest. “But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal” (Matt. 6:20).³⁵

What is missing in the New Testament is the customer-service perspective of Adam Smith and the right-wing Enlightenment’s tradition of economic analysis. We do not find any indication in the New Testament that by serving customers efficiently, a producer can get rich. This was Smith’s revolutionary insight: through capital accumu- lation, a businessman serves his own self-interest, as well as his employees' self-interest and customers' self-interest.

35. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 13.

The Old Testament is clear that corporate covenantal obedience to God produces corporate economic success. Personal obedience to God includes charity (Deut. 15:1–10).³⁶ The covenant-keeper must work hard (Prov. 6:6–11). He should not seek to get rich (Prov. 30:8–9).³⁷ Riches may come, as they came to Abraham, but becoming wealthy is not a biblical goal. In fact, in Western ethical theory generally, from classical Greek philosophy to the Enlightenment, the quest for personal riches was regarded as an affliction of a morally flawed character.

There is one hint in the Bible that a man's accumulation of capital is a means for him to serve others by giving them employment. This is Jesus' parable of the farmer and the hired hourly workers (Matt. 20:1–16). In this parable, the highest wage per hour went to those few workers who were hired in the final hour of the day (v. 9). But the parable relies on the assumption of the employer's charity, not his employees' productivity. It is a parable about God's grace to those who do not deserve His favor.³⁸ It is not a parable about how to run a profitable farm. It is not about capital accumulation, workers' productivity, and competitive wages. It is about charity to the able-bodied poor. This is work-related charity, not output-dependent remuneration.

Smith's explanation of customer service as a means of wealth accumulation in The Wealth of Nations had nothing to do with charity and everything to do with mutual self-interest. In what has become a classic statement of voluntary exchange, Smith wrote:

But man has almost constant occasion for the help of his brethren, and it is in vain for him to expect it from their benevolence only. He will be more likely to prevail if he can interest their self-love in his favour, and show them that it is for their own advantage to do for him what he requires of them. Whoever offers to another a bargain of any kind, proposes to do this. Give me that which I want, and you shall have this which you want, is the meaning of every such offer; and it is in this manner that we obtain from one another the far greater part of those good offices which we stand in need of. It is not from the benevolence of the butcher, the brewer, or the baker that we expect our dinner, but from their regard to their own interest. We address ourselves, not to their humanity but to their self-love, and never talk

36. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 36.

37. North, Wisdom and Dominion, ch. 85.

38. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 40.

to them of our own necessities but of their advantages.³⁹

Smith's observation about how men gain their goals through gaining the self-interested cooperation of others stands as a turning point in economic theory—indeed, a turning point in social theory in general. But, as we shall see, it was not original with Smith. The innovator was Bernard Mandeville.⁴⁰ But because Smith framed the motivational process positively, in terms of production, unlike Mandeville, who focused on consumption, he launched an intellectual revolution, as over-worked as that word is. As surely as Charles Darwin's idea of the biological evolution of a species through the undesigned, impersonal natural selection of individual members of a species launched an intellectual revolution, so did Smith's idea of an increase in national wealth through undesigned, self-interested voluntary exchanges of individuals.⁴¹

In Appendix C, I go into greater detail regarding Smith's economics and the social theory of the eighteenth-century Scottish Enlightenment. When the Soviet Union collapsed in December 1991, this event left the methodological legacy of Smith's economics and the right-wing Enlightenment's social theory as the dominant worldview in the West, with the socialist remnant fighting a rear-guard action from inside the environmentalism movement.⁴² Marxism's failed experiment in Russia took down the nineteenth century's socialist intellectual legacy. Adam Smith won by default intellectually and also by capitalism's enormous economic output. The fact of the non-Communist world's systemic compound economic growth could no longer be swept under the socialists' tattered rug, which by 1989 had too many holes.

39. Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations (1776), Book I, Ch. 2.

40. Appendix C:C.

41. Darwin's insight was an extension of Smith's: from the idea of an unplanned but orderly national economy to the idea of unplanned but orderly biological evolution. See F. A. Hayek, New Studies in Philosophy, Politics, Economics and the History of Ideas (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978), pp. 264–65. This is an essay on the influence of Bernard Mandeville's famous poem and his commentary, Fable of the Bees.

42. The best example of this transition was the career of deposed Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev, who immediately after the collapse of the Soviet Union raised millions of dollars in the West to start an environmentalist "think tank," Green Cross International. On its Web home page, we read: "We need a new system of values, a system of the organic unity between mankind and nature and the ethic of global responsibility.—Mikhail Gorbachev." The organization is located in the high-rent Presidio district of San Francisco. The Presidio had been an American military base during Gorbachev's reign as Soviet dictator.

The Scottish Enlightenment was a Unitarian alternative to the worldview of seventeenth-century Scottish Presbyterianism, with its system of local congregations, where initiative lay, held in check by a hierarchical system of appellate church courts. The Scottish Enlightenment was a self-conscious attempt to remove from social theory all traces of the predestinating God of Scottish Calvinism. This was an intellectual war against Calvinism's doctrines of God's absolute decree, sovereignty, and providence. The Scottish Enlightenment always had an atheistic element, beginning with David Hume's skepticism, and this implicit atheism became dominant methodologically with Smith's successors in the nineteenth century. Indeed, it became dominant in The Wealth of Nations, which no longer relied on the Unitarian moralism that had undergirded his book, The Theory of Moral Sentiments (1759). In The Wealth of Nations, the free market's sanctions of profit and loss, held in check by the coercive sanctions of a limited civil government, replaced the sanctions of God's final judgment as explanations of economic causation. Sentiment was replaced by self-interest.

F. A Christian Reconstruction of Economic Theory

Until the publication of Rushdoony's Institutes of Biblical Law (1973), Christian social theory had always been derivative. Christian scholars had always imported one or another humanistic worldview, baptizing it with convenient Christian phrases. This procedure began with the early church's apologists, who treated Greek philosophy, especially Platonic thought, as if it were a precursor of Christianity, as if Greek philosophy were true as far as it went, but missing certain clarifying theological insights. In late medieval Christianity, the church's major philosophers substituted Aristotle for Plato. In modern times, there have been a few attempts by socially conservative Roman Catholic laymen to invent a whitewashed version of the late-medieval world's guild-based local economies, but academic economists have steadfastly avoided such exercises in nostalgia. It was Rushdoony's insight that in order to develop an explicitly biblical social theory, it is necessary to return to the Mosaic law, which means theonomy, which means theocracy, which means embarrassment among one's peers.

This question must be dealt with by anyone who attempts to reconstruct economic theory along biblical lines: "Does the Bible indicate that individual self-interest is the correct starting point for economic theory?” If the answer is “no,” then isn’t any attempt to make individual self-interest the starting point for Christian economics an importation from the right-wing Enlightenment?

The Bible does not begin with the doctrine of each person’s self-interest. It begins with the doctrine of creation (Gen. 1). The fundamental economic principle is this: *God owns the world on the basis of His creation of the world.*⁴³ He delegates to individuals a temporary authority to administer some aspects of the creation on His behalf. This is the creation mandate, or as I call it, the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:26–28).⁴⁴ The starting point for Christian economics is the doctrine of ownership: God’s original ownership⁴⁵ and individual man’s delegated ownership.⁴⁶

Every person is an individual steward of a specified portion of God’s resources. Each of us will be called to account on judgment day to give an account of his stewardship of God’s resources (Matt. 25:14–30).⁴⁷ This would imply methodological individualism, except for one fact: mankind as a species has been given authority over the world as a functioning system, so there is also corporate responsibility. There are both individual and corporate responsibility: ownership by the many, and ownership by the one. This reflects God’s original ownership, for God is a Trinity: three persons, one God. Each of the persons of the Trinity has His own function and responsibilities in relation to the creation. This is the Protestant theologians’ doctrine of the economical Trinity. There is hierarchy within the economical Trinity: Father > Son > Holy Ghost. Yet they are equal in being: the doctrine of the ontological Trinity. Men also share in an analogous equality of being. Paul preached to the Athenians:

God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands; Neither is worshipped with men’s hands, as though he needed any thing, seeing he giveth to all life, and breath, and all things; And hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation; That they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him, and find him, though he be not far from

43. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 1.

44. Ibid., chaps. 3, 4.

45. Gary North, Inherit the Earth: Biblical Blueprints for Economics (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 1.(<http://bit.ly/gnininherit>)

46. Ibid., ch. 2.

47. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 47.

every one of us (Acts 17:24–27).

Whenever Christian economics begins with the doctrine of God's original ownership of the creation, the most fundamental economic law is this: "Thou shalt not steal."⁴⁸ Put another way, "But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die" (Gen. 2:17). The commandment against theft establishes private ownership: a legal boundary placed around objects. Private property began in the garden of Eden, when God identified one tree as inviolable. Man's rebellion began with a transgression of a private property boundary.⁴⁹

God imposes a system of dual sanctions in His system of delegated private ownership: profit and loss.⁵⁰ Individual self-interest is not the starting point for Christian economic theory, but it is a component of such a theory, as the parable of the talents indicates (Matt. 25:14–30).⁵¹ Apart from each person's individual self-interest, God's promise of heaven and His warning of hell would not motivate a listener to repent (Matt. 25:31–46). The self-interest of subordinates is the primary means for a manager to gain their voluntary cooperation. Similarly, without profit and loss, customers would lose both their carrot and their stick, which they use to persuade producers to provide what customers wish to buy at prices that they are willing to pay.

Contrary to the Scottish Enlightenment, the free market's economic sanctions are not evolutionary. They are covenantal. They are part of God's curse of Adam and His grace through Christ. A humanistic economist does not recognize the covenantal nature of economic sanctions. He regards them as beyond supernatural design, merely part of a system of evolved rules of conduct. He is incorrect. God has built economic sanctions into His system of biblical law (Lev. 26; Deut. 28). In the long run, corporate obedience to God's biblical law-order will produce higher-than-average positive economic sanctions, which in turn expand corporate wealth. But this predictable outcome must be taken on faith before it can be implemented and thereafter verified statistically. Grace precedes law. Obedience to God's law does produce greater wealth, which is supposed to reinforce men's faith in God's covenant. "But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his coven-

48. North, Inherit the Earth, ch. 3.

49. Chapter 9.

50. Ibid., ch. 4.

51. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 47.

ant which he swore unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:18).⁵²

Paul in this passage does not deny the legitimacy of individual self-interest. On the contrary, he invokes it: “Laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come.” His point is that self-interest should not be devoid of covenantal understanding. The single-minded pursuit of positive economic sanctions is self-destructive, but this fact does not negate the legitimacy of positive economic sanctions and their pursuit. What is significant, Paul says, is a man’s goal governing his quest for positive economic sanctions, “that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate.”

What the modern academic defenders of Christian socialism or Christian Keynesianism refuse to acknowledge is that nowhere in the New Testament or the Mosaic law are negative ecclesiastical or civil sanctions imposed on someone who refuses to be open-handed to the poor. Biblical texts recommend open-handedness, but the negative sanctions for rejecting this advice are always imposed by God, not by open-membership public covenantal institutions: church or state. The defenders of Christian socialism or interventionism insist that the Bible’s texts that recommend charity can and should be used to justify endowing the state with the authority to impose violence against those people who resist the politicians’ confiscation of their wealth in the name of assisting the poor.

Policies of political confiscation are adopted by democratically elected politicians in order to purchase votes from those constituents to whom they promise a portion of the plunder. This distribution takes place only after the bureaucrats who administer these programs are paid their share. Defenders of Christian socialism or interventionism who would not tolerate for a moment the suggestion of the biblical right of a church’s officers to impose negative sanctions on members who refuse to tithe to the local church, let alone refuse to surrender half of their income to the church, rail against my view of the confiscatory state, which is Samuel’s.

And he said, This will be the manner of the king that shall reign over you: He will take your sons, and appoint them for himself, for his chariots, and to be his horsemen; and some shall run before his chariots. And he will appoint him captains over thousands, and captains over fifties; and will set them to ear his ground, and to reap his harvest, and to make his instruments of war, and instruments of his chariots. And he will take your daughters to be confectionaries, and to be cooks, and to be bakers. And he will take your fields, and your vineyards, and your oliveyards, even the best of them, and give them to his servants. And he will take the tenth of your seed, and of your vineyards, and give to his officers, and to his servants. And he will take your menservants, and your maidservants, and your goodliest young men, and your asses, and put them to his work. He will take the tenth of your sheep: and ye shall be his servants. And ye shall cry out in that day because of your king which ye shall have chosen you; and the LORD will not hear you in that day (1 Sam. 8:11–18).⁵³

52. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 22.

In the opinion of the Christian socialist or economic interventionist, biblically legitimate charity grows out of the barrel of a gun. The effective mobilization of charity, he believes, is lawfully determined by that organized political group which persuades a majority of voters to hand over the state's gun to the group's elected representatives. As Professor Hay has succinctly presented the case, "The citizens may all agree, to a greater or lesser extent, that no one should be allowed to go without the basic necessities of life. But individuals are not willing to shoulder the burden of caring for the poor unless they know that the burden of caring for the poor will be shared out among all those with sufficient substance to help. So an element of coercion may be entirely acceptable."⁵⁴ I would add, entirely acceptable especially to those voters who are on the receiving end of the loot. In short, Hay was necessarily insisting that God's commandment against theft will eventually have to be amended by Christian voters: "Thou shalt not steal, except by majority vote."

Conclusion

Paul viewed riches as tools that can be put to God's service through charitable giving. He warned against the spiritual pitfalls associated with the pursuit of riches. For those who have already attained riches, he recommended generosity. Wealth is to be put at the service of the poor. The means of service is charity, according to this passage.

Paul did not say that charity is the only form of economic service. He also did not mention service through economic production. Eco-

53. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 14.

54. Donald Hay, Economics Today: A Christian Critique (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1989), p. 89.

conomic production directly serves those people who are part of the production system. Men seek to improve their temporal circumstances by exchanging the output of their labor and capital. This method of service does not solve the other problem: the empty hand. Those who have nothing to exchange are outcasts of the system of production.

Paul in this passage tells Timothy to tell the rich that they should open their filled hands to those with empty hands. This is a test of the rich man's faith in God. The alternative is for the rich to exercise faith in the uncertainty of riches. Rich men must serve God or mammon. The same choice faces the poor. They can pursue wealth, or they can trust in God. They must serve God or mammon. The answer to the question, "Whom do you serve?" is found in the answer to the question: "Whom do you trust for your protection?"

There have been occasional attempts to integrate charity as an analytic category into economic theory, but these attempts have failed. Free market economic theory ever since Adam Smith has been based on the assumption that individuals act to improve their circumstances. They seek to exchange an existing set of circumstances for what they hope will be a more pleasing set. This assumption regarding human action has made possible an enormous volume of economic analysis, some of it more realistic than others. But no one has discovered a logically consistent theory of economic action that relies primarily, or even secondarily, on the assumption that charity is a fundamental category of human action. Remove from economic analysis the assumption that people usually act in a self-interested way, and modern economic theory collapses. Remove from economic analysis the assumption that people are occasionally charitable, and virtually all of the analytical system remains.

This insight by free market economists regarding human action is consistent with the principle of the tithe: God claims for His local church only 10% of a person's net income. Whatever individuals give away voluntarily beyond this minimal percentage is a matter of conscience. The principle of the tithe tells us that the system of stewardship that has been established by God relies on individual self-interest as the primary economic motivator. The question is: How will the individual allocate his income—spending, saving, and giving? There is no question, biblically speaking, that as far as the covenantally normal operation of the economy is concerned, God is satisfied with the tithe. The state should be satisfied with even less (I Sam. 8:17). How individuals allocate the remaining 80+ percent is up to them as owners. "Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? Is thine eye evil, because I am good?" (Matt. 20:15).⁵⁵ This response by the land owner, who in the parable represents God, greatly upsets defenders of the modern interventionist state. Their eyes are indeed evil. The Scottish Enlightenment was closer to the Bible on economic principles than are Christian defenders of the modern interventionist state. To promote coercion by state bureaucrats as an alternative to Adam Smith's economics is not a Bible-based solution to the problem of mankind's assertion of autonomy. We must go to the Bible in search of the solution, not to the writings of John Maynard Keynes⁵⁶ and his disciples, who are part of the problem.

No economically productive society has withstood the lure of riches, not even the most rigorous of Western medieval monasteries, which repeatedly became rich because of the self-sacrifice and high rates of investment by the monks. Thrift and hard work produce high output, which in turn produces high income. This is why Western monastic orders became the targets of spiritual reformers every few centuries. None of these calls to return to the ideal of poverty survived the long-term growth effects of income above expenses. The corporate ideal of poverty, when accompanied by thrift and hard work, invariably produces wealth, which over time affects the original goal of sacrificial poverty.

Paul does not tell Timothy to tell rich people in the church to impoverish themselves. He tells Timothy to tell them to lay up in store for themselves a good foundation for the future. How are the covenant-keeping rich supposed to do this? By being open-handed with the poor. Paul does not suggest or even imply that charitable giving is a one-time event that is designed to make poor men out of rich men. He says that covenant-keeping rich men inescapably must put their trust somewhere, either in God or in the uncertainty of riches. He calls on them to exercise faith in the God who created the world, and who sustains it by His providence. He calls on them to demonstrate their covenantal subordination to the God of the cosmos by obeying God's law to be generous. There will be a positive sanction in history for such obedience: a good foundation in the future.

55. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 40.

56. On Keynes' background, see Richard Deacon [Donald McCormick], The Cambridge Apostles: A History of Cambridge University's Elite Intellectual Secret Society (New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1986). McCormick was an expert in the history of the West's twentieth-century secret service organizations, i.e., spying.

Then what of rich men who are covenant-breakers? Paul never said. Adam Smith did. They should remain socially productive through profit-seeking activities to satisfy customer demand at prices that customers are willing and able to pay. So far, no one has offered a better recommendation.

CONCLUSION

As I besought thee to abide still at Ephesus, when I went into Macedonia, that thou mightest charge some that they teach no other doctrine, Neither give heed to fables and endless genealogies, which minister questions, rather than godly edifying which is in faith: so do (I Tim. 1:3–4).

The primary theme of Paul's first epistle to Timothy is ecclesiastical hierarchy. This larger theme necessarily involves the reciprocal themes of leadership and subordination.

Paul raises the issue of hierarchy in his command to Timothy to challenge false teachers in the church at Ephesus. He transfers to Timothy the authority to speak on Paul's behalf in stamping out a heresy in the church at Ephesus. This command is based on the doctrine of representation. Paul, as an apostle, represents Christ judicially. Timothy represents Paul judicially.

A. The Judaizers

What was this heresy? The heresy of the Judaizers. The Judaizers taught that gentile Christians had to follow the priestly laws of the Mosaic covenant, as interpreted by the rabbis. They brought genealogies into the church, as if genealogies had anything to do with holiness. Paul opposed members of this faction.

Paul then offers a definition of orthodoxy, which he calls sound doctrine, or as the Greek text puts it, healthful teaching. He states clearly that the gospel and certain Mosaic civil statutes go together.

But we know that the law is good, if a man use it lawfully; Knowing this, that the law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners, for unholy and profane, for murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, for man-slayers, For whoremongers, for them that defile themselves with mankind, for menstealers, for liars, for perjured persons, and if there be any other thing that is contrary to sound doctrine; According to the glorious gospel of the blessed God, which was committed to my trust (I Tim. 1:8–11).

I know of no stronger New Testament evidence for the continuing validity of the Mosaic civil law in the New Covenant era. First, Paul says that to argue that these laws do not still apply is “contrary to sound doctrine.” Second, these laws are not made for righteous men. They are made for unrighteous men, i.e., criminals and would-be criminals.

These laws are still valid, Paul says, yet they were Mosaic civil laws. The institutional church does not exercise jurisdiction over unrighteous men, who are not in covenant with the church. This was equally true under the Mosaic covenant. To these laws were attached specified civil sanctions. The judicial rule still holds: no sanctions—no law. These sanctions must therefore be applied to unrighteous men who have violated these laws. These men are outside the church covenant. These laws therefore must be enforced by some institution other than the church. There is only one covenantal institution that possesses this authority: civil government.¹

Paul in this passage defends theonomy. The Christian who rejects this conclusion should offer an alternative explanation of this passage. Silence is not an argument. It was not in 1818, either.

B. The Lure of Subordination Through Neutrality

In 1818, the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America (PCUSA) also refused to regard this passage as either theologically or judicially binding. The church upheld the de-frocking in 1815 of Virginia pastor George Bourne, who had cited I Timothy 1:10 against manstealing as evidence that Southern slave-holding was a sin. The politically correct position of the South’s slaveholding leadership became dominant ecclesiastically in Old School Presbyterianism, North and South, 1818–1861. Only the Civil War (1861–65) persuaded the Old School in the North to adopt abolitionism, not on the basis of the Bible, but as a political necessity. Only the military defeat of the South in 1865 persuaded the Old School in the South to accept, retroactively, the moral legitimacy of abolitionism.²

Old School Presbyterianism was led intellectually by Princeton Theological Seminary, the most academically influential conservative

1. Chapter 1.

2. Appendix D.

Protestant seminary in the world during the nineteenth century. Old School theologians argued that slavery and abolitionism were adiaphora—things irrelevant to the Bible and Christianity. Thus, the Old School rejected the abolitionist implications of Bourne's position. A decade later, New England Unitarians took up Bourne's conclusion, but without mentioning Bourne, and converted it into a moral and political cause. By 1865, a handful of New England Unitarians had become the politically dominant ecclesiastical faction in Congress. The Old School Presbyterians, by maintaining their peace with the South's Calvinists by consenting to Bourne's de-frocking, turned their collective backs on the dominant American political and ethical issue, 1820–1865, and thereby handed over political power and legitimacy to the Unitarians. The Old School's attempt to stay religiously neutral on the most important issue of their day led to the de-legitimizing of the Old School after 1865 and its defeat, issue by issue, decade by decade, after 1870. It disappeared in the 1930s.³

Neutrality looks enticing for a while: a way to avoid controversy. But, sooner or later, a reliance on neutrality undermines any movement that tries to justify doing nothing to stop some acknowledged public evil, thereby transferring influence to those who are committed to doing something. Neutrality is a myth. "He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth abroad" (Matt. 12:30). The same criticism applies to the concept of political pluralism.⁴

Paul is not neutral in this epistle. He affirms specific civil laws of the Mosaic Covenant as binding theologically in the New Covenant era. He defines theological orthodoxy—sound doctrine—in terms of this affirmation. Non-theonomists prefer to avoid commenting on either Paul's affirmation of Mosaic civil laws or his definition of sound doctrine. They prefer to categorize Paul's use of these Mosaic civil laws as moral laws.⁵ This approach raises a crucial question: Laws enforced by which covenantal institution, church or state? It also raises another crucial question: Which sanctions?

3. Gary North, Crossed Fingers: How the Liberals Captured the Presbyterian Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1996).

4. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

5. William Hendriksen, New Testament Commentary: Exposition of the Pastoral Epistles (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, 1957), pp. 67–69.

C. Implications Beyond Ecclesiology

Paul's letter to Timothy focuses on ecclesiology, but its principles cannot be contained inside the four walls of the local church. These are general covenantal principles, so they find applications in the other covenantal institutions: family and state.

1. Political Authority

When Christians pray for rulers, they are involved in peace-keeping. Their prayers on behalf of civil rulers produce results that may be contrary to what civil rulers are planning for the church. These plans are then overruled by God. "The king's heart is in the hand of the LORD, as the rivers of water: he turneth it whithersoever he will" (Prov. 21:1).

Intercessory prayer places civil rulers under God's positive historical sanctions. God responds to intercessory prayer by providing peace for His church. This cause-and-effect relationship rests on a hierarchy: God over state. This hierarchy is manifested in the form of positive sanctions—peace and quiet—for the church and for covenant-keepers generally. The church is under the threat of civil sanctions, but intercessory prayer overturns what appears initially to be a covenant-breaker's preferred hierarchy: state over church.⁶

2. Against the Welfare State

Paul teaches that only a few widows are entitled to permanent financial support from the church: those over age 60 whose descendants refuse to support them, and who were married only once.⁷ Paul limits support from the church to this narrow a category of "widow indeed."

There is no New Testament case for allowing the state to extract wealth from one group of voters in order to transfer it to another group, merely because members of the first group are richer than members of the second group. If it is illegitimate for the church to use wealth collected from voluntary members in order to support permanently widows who are under age 60, or widows who were married more than once, then it is surely illegitimate for covenant-breakers to use the threat of violence to extract wealth from covenant-keepers in order to support impoverished covenant-breakers.

6. Chapter 2.

7. Chapter 6.

When Professor Hay wrote the following, he should have offered support from some biblical text: "The citizens may all agree, to a greater or lesser extent, that no one should be allowed to go without the basic necessities of life. But individuals are not willing to shoulder the burden of caring for the poor unless they know that the burden of caring for the poor will be shared out among all those with sufficient substance to help. So an element of coercion may be entirely acceptable."⁸ A theological assertion with such far-sweeping political implications requires biblical support. But Christian scholars who make such sweeping generalizations as this one rarely supply such support. They import conclusions from the world of early twentieth-century humanist welfare economics, and they baptize these imported conclusions with a few biblical-sounding phrases. They need to provide textual exegesis in support of these imported conclusions.

3. Democracy and Liberty

Consider Paul's doctrine that some elders—but not all—are worthy of financial support (I Tim. 5:17–18).⁹ This view of deserving performance inevitably raises the institutional question of who is responsible for making this judgment. The answer is clear: the individual member, whose donations support the church. The democratic implication of this position should be obvious. Each adult church member has the right to "vote with his feet" when the local church's hierarchy refuses to honor his assessment when he votes with his purse. The economic sanctions of money, either donated or retained, are lawfully in the hands of the laity, whose productivity supports the church.

The Roman Catholic Church's model of geographically based parish church membership was replaced in Northern Europe by the rise of Protestant sects. The democratic ideal rose to prominence in both church and state in Protestant nations. The Protestant concept of the legitimate authority of a church member to decide how much he should pay, and for which services, spread into politics in the mid-seventeenth century. In England, the debate over political sovereignty during the combined civil war and Protectorate era (1642–59) raised the issue of property ownership and the franchise. The Protestant church subsequently set the pattern for the modern democratic state:

8. Donald Hay, Economics Today: A Christian Critique (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1989), p. 89.

9. Chapter 7.

the authority of the member over his purse. He can lawfully put his membership where his heart is. He can also lawfully put his money where his heart is.

The problem comes when he seeks through coercive political action to put your money where his heart is. Christians have been as beguiled by the lure of welfare state politics as non-Christians. They have believed that it is legitimate for the state to extract money on threat of violence if the money is used for broadly defined humanitarian purposes. They have believed in the modern world's version of the eighth commandment: "Thou shalt not steal, except by majority vote." This was the great fear of Henry Ireton, Oliver Cromwell's son-in-law, at the Putney Debates of the New Model Army in 1647.¹⁰ He believed that by extending the franchise to men without property, those with property would thereby extend to those without property the power to vote themselves a portion of the wealth of those who own property. Yet this is what is done in every local Protestant church in which all adult members have the vote. The tithing members are usually outnumbered by non-tithing members, yet all members vote. The democratic Protestant churches have set the standard for democratic politics. Those members who do not pay a tithe establish institutional spending priorities for those who do pay the tithe.

4. Slavery and Non-Violent Reform

Paul makes it clear that slaves are to honor their owners, even when those owners are covenant-breakers.¹¹ While a slave is to accept liberation when offered by the owner (I Cor. 7:21),¹² he is not to run away or otherwise defy his owner. The superiority of freedom to slavery places responsibility on Christian owners to free their slaves. It also places responsibility on the civil government to punish all infractions of the Mosaic laws governing slavery.¹³

England freed its slaves without bloodshed. This was possible because (1) Christians were the primary abolitionists, and they possessed moral legitimacy; (2) slavery was confined to regions of the empire outside of Great Britain; (3) the Industrial Revolution in Great Britain

10. A. S. P. Woodhouse (ed.), Puritans and Liberty, 3rd ed. (University of Chicago Press, 1951).

11. Chapter 8.

12. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion, ch. 8.

13. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 36.

was urban and based on legally free labor. The United States government went to war because (1) hot-heads in South Carolina seceded before President Lincoln was inaugurated, thus beginning the secession movement; (2) Lincoln wanted to collect national tariffs, and South Carolinians asserted sovereignty over this tax base; (3) Christians in the South defended a morally wicked system of slave breeding by organized fornication, and did so by invoking the Bible.¹⁴ They forgot: God is not mocked.

There is no doubt that Paul accepted slavery as an institution. He regarded it as less desirable than freedom. He offered no theory of natural slavery. He did not invoke the Mosaic law in his acceptance of slavery among the gentiles. He offered a theology of subordination. Slavery is a condition to test the faith of covenant-keeping slaves and their owners. Paul regarded subordination as a means of dominion: dominion over personal sin and resentment, dominion over discontent, dominion over poverty, and ultimately dominion over slavery. The gospel liberates sinners from the bondage of sin, and this is the redemptive starting point for all successful, culture-wide liberation.

And I will walk at liberty: for I seek thy precepts (Ps. 119:45).

And that because of false brethren unawares brought in, who came in privily to spy out our liberty which we have in Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage: To whom we gave place by subjection, no, not for an hour; that the truth of the gospel might continue with you (Gal. 2:4–5).

But whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed. If any man among you seem to be religious, and bridleth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain (James 1:25–26).

According to Paul's theology, personal liberty does not begin with an act of violence. It begins with an act of principled submission to God. This submission is not to be based on a theology of personal quietism. It is to be based on confidence in the future, faith that in the long run, law-abiding service to God and men produces dominion. This is the faith that Moses announced to the Israelites.

And it shall come to pass, when all these things are come upon thee, the blessing and the curse, which I have set before thee, and thou shalt call them to mind among all the nations, whither the LORD thy God hath driven thee, And shalt return unto the LORD thy God, and shalt obey his voice according to all that I command thee this day, thou and thy children, with all thine heart, and with all thy soul; That then the LORD thy God will turn thy captivity, and have compassion upon thee, and will return and gather thee from all the nations, whither the LORD thy God hath scattered thee. If any of thine be driven out unto the outmost parts of heaven, from thence will the LORD thy God gather thee, and from thence will he fetch thee: And the LORD thy God will bring thee into the land which thy fathers possessed, and thou shalt possess it; and he will do thee good, and multiply thee above thy fathers. And the LORD thy God will circumcise thine heart, and the heart of thy seed, to love the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, that thou mayest live (Deut. 30:1–6).

14. Appendix D.

The Mosaic civil laws that legitimized the permanent, inter-generational enslavement of foreigners (Lev. 25:44–46) were part of the Mosaic land laws, which were abolished forever in A.D. 70, with the final replacement of Old Covenant Israel with the church.¹⁵

The Mosaic civil laws governing a master's treatment of his slaves remain in force. To assert that slavery remains authorized by the New Testament, but without the Mosaic civil laws that restrained the owners' mistreatment of slaves, is to assert a form of tyranny. On the other hand, to ignore Paul's acceptance of slavery makes universal abolitionism exegetically impossible to defend biblically. Orthodox New Testament abolitionism, were it to revive, would call for the eradication of all forms of inter-generational slavery, and also any form of non-criminal permanent servitude that is not protected by the Mosaic laws governing the treatment of slaves.

A widely held assumption has been that abolitionism, 1800–1885, eliminated slavery in the West. This is a false assumption. Abolitionism eliminated private chattel slavery, which was replaced in the twentieth century by civilian concentration camps (Britain's Boer War in South Africa) and slave labor camps (Fascist and Communist). Slavery as an ideal was appropriated by messianic civil governments, which made slavery a state monopoly.

15. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 31.

5. Contentment and Christian Reconstruction

Paul's warning against discontent rests on the doctrine of the absolute sovereignty of God. God's decree is sovereign. A person's condition is not random. It is part of the providence of God. Neither wealth nor poverty, neither health nor sickness, is outside the comprehensive providence of God. It takes faith to accept this. This is why "godliness with contentment is great gain" (I Tim. 6:6). A covenant-keeper who has been given the gift of contentment has received a highly valuable gift.¹⁶

Then what of the discontent associated with creativity and dedication? What of Paul's command? "Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life, whereunto thou art also called, and hast professed a good profession before many witnesses" (I Tim. 6:12). "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith" (II Tim. 4:7). How does someone contentedly fight? The answer: patiently. "Wherefore seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, Looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith; who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God" (Heb. 12:1–2). Patience, too, is a gift of God. It is a great gift.

But that on the good ground are they, which in an honest and good heart, having heard the word, keep it, and bring forth fruit with patience (Luke 8:15).

Or despisest thou the riches of his goodness and forbearance and longsuffering; not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance? But after thy hardness and impenitent heart treasurest up unto thyself wrath against the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God; Who will render to every man according to his deeds: To them who by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory and honour and immortality, eternal life (Rom. 2:4–7).

But in all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses (II Cor. 6:4).

Here we have the biblical alternative to discontent: patience. This is what should keep righteous men moving forward steadily. Patience is a steady working toward a goal. It is dedication that relies heavily on confidence in the future, not discontent with the present. Godly patience is based on faith in God's providence. This is not a providence of Christian cultural stalemate, let alone defeat. It is a providence of cultural victory in history for covenant-keepers.

16. Chapter 10.

Discontent is spiritually dangerous because it implies that God is somehow not in charge. It also implies that historical conditions are stacked against the covenant-keeper. The cross testifies against such a supposition. What looked like a defeat was the basis of Christ's victory. The cross and resurrection took place in history. So did Christ's ascension. This is why all forms of eschatology that imply or boldly state that Christian victory does not involve the extension of redemption and its effects to all of history have not come to grips with the historicity of cross-resurrection-ascension. It was not merely Christ's spirit that rose from the dead, but His body also. The fulfillment of Christ's bodily resurrection in history (I Cor. 15:3, 13–17), involves God's turning Christ's enemies into Christ's footstools in history. Until this happens, the end of history cannot take place. Amillennialism therefore cannot be true, for it denies the hierarchy of Christendom's victory in history.

For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith, all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted, which did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all (I Cor. 15:25–28).¹⁷

Christian contentment is not supposed to lead to personal quietism or mysticism: a theology of escape from, or acceptance of, things as they are. It is not supposed to produce some version of principled lethargy. Biblically, contentment means the acceptance of the present order as a starting point for positive change.

This process of contentment is analogous to sanctification's three stages: definitive, progressive, and final. A covenant-keeper is content with the present because Christ's future, visible, institutional victory over His enemies in history has been announced in advance. Definitive victory is behind us temporally, for the resurrection and ascension of Christ were in history. Christendom's victory, not its defeat, is being presently worked out historically. Perseverance will result in final victory, both individually and culturally.

17. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 16.

This view of patience and contentment is obviously postmillennial. Eschatologies of guaranteed cultural, political, and economic defeat for the gospel in history have a tendency to motivate covenant-keepers to withdraw from “hopeless” battles, which are just about all of the battles outside of the prayer closet and the local church. This is why there are so many trivial battles inside local churches. They are the only battles that most Christians think they can win, mainly by forced exclusion of the losers. Pietism and quietism are far more likely when covenant-keepers see their efforts to transform social sins as doomed from the start.

Pessimillennial covenant-keepers are tempted to adopt a theology of souls-only redemption, and therefore souls-only evangelism. They deny that Christ’s redemption can or even should be comprehensive in history.¹⁸ They are willing to compromise with theories of epistemological or political neutrality, so that they can escape any responsibility for transforming culture or politics or economics in the name of Christ by means of biblical law. They adopt humanism’s theory of political pluralism as the only reasonable hope in a world of guaranteed eschatological defeat for the gospel. They adopt a stalemate mentality.¹⁹ They seek to avoid the discontent associated with an eschatology of assured cultural defeat in history by defining Christian victory so narrowly—internally, personally, familistically—that they can live emotionally with the prospects of this comprehensive cultural defeat.²⁰ They voluntarily and philosophically turn the state over to covenant-breakers and covenant-breaking philosophies with the assertion that God would have it so. Problem: God does not want it so.²¹ God will not have it so.²²

18. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C. (<http://bit.ly/gn-world>)

19. Gary North, Backward, Christian Soldiers? An Action Manual for Christian Reconstruction (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), ch. 11. (<http://bit.ly/fnsoldiers>)

20. A representative example of this re-definition of the meaning and extent of gospel victory is the book by David J. Engelsma, a theologian in the Protestant Reformed Church, Christ’s Spiritual Kingdom: A Defense of Reformed Amillennialism (Redlands, California: Reformed Witness, 2001).

21. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/GentryGGC>)

22. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1992] 1997). (<http://bit.ly/>)

D. Dominion Through Service

1. Following and Leading

This epistle calls covenant-keepers to victory through both their exercise of leadership and their subordination. This seemingly contradictory strategy rests on a presupposition: we learn how to lead by learning first how to follow. Put militarily, men begin as recruits, then trainees, then either as low-level “grunts” or their equivalent in the officer corps, second lieutenants. A wise second lieutenant makes it clear early to his top sergeant that he plans to back up the sergeant’s decisions in public. He lets his sergeant know that he is well aware of his own inexperience. The sergeant knows more about the eccentricities of the first lieutenant and the captain than the second lieutenant does. Similarly, a wise church officer had better be familiar with the chain of command when he first begins to lead.

Paul tells Timothy, “Let no man despise thy youth; but be thou an example of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity” (I Tim. 4:12). Leaders must lead. But, he also warns him, “Rebuke not an elder, but intreat him as a father; and the younger men as brethren” (I Tim. 5:1). In short, treat your sergeants with respect.

God has established a strategy of dominion. It involves subordination. Even leadership involves service. This is what the world cannot understand. Jesus taught this principle of leadership.

Ye know that they which are accounted to rule over the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and their great ones exercise authority upon them. But so shall it not be among you: but whosoever will be great among you, shall be your minister: And whosoever of you will be the chiefest, shall be servant of all. For even the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many (Mark 10:42b–45).

The world sees personal and institutional liberation in terms of the capture of the existing instruments of power. In contrast, Jesus and Paul saw liberation as the transfer of one’s subordination to sin to the yoke righteousness, from mammon to Christ. There is never an escape from subordination; there is only a transfer of allegiance.

No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon (Matt. 6:24).²³

Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light (Matt. 11:28–30).²⁴

2. The New Testament vs. the Scottish Enlightenment

What distinguishes the New Testament's economic analysis from modern free market economic theory is this: rival views of the role of wealth as motivation. The New Testament denies that the pursuit of personal wealth is legitimate if it is an autonomous pursuit, i.e., wealth pursued for its own sake.²⁵ The Scottish Enlightenment offered the pursuit of wealth as morally harmless and socially beneficial, whenever this pursuit takes place in a social order based on private property.

Adam Smith's argument that gaining more wealth is a seller's motivation for providing greater customer service is not inconsistent with Christianity; indeed, it is the application of the Bible's service principle to economics. But there is no doubt that this insight cannot be found in the New Testament. The Scottish Enlightenment placed individual self-interest above service to the other person as the prime motivator in economic life. The New Testament does not disagree with the accuracy of the observation; it does disagree with the legitimacy of individual self-interest as a person's primary motivation.²⁶

The insight regarding the seller's self-interested customer service is the most important insight in both the history of economic thought and economic history. It stands as the basis of the unprecedented expansion of economic wealth, 1750–2012. The New Testament clearly warns against this motivation, which is the service of mammon. The free market social order harnesses man's mammon-driven motivation, directing it toward service to customers, whether covenant-keepers or covenant-breakers, but there is no doubt that the lasting academic legacy of the Scottish Enlightenment's social and economic theory is to dispense with all discussions of supernaturally revealed morality or higher service to God. Academic free market theory substitutes imper-

23. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch 14.

24. Ibid. ch. 25.

25. Chapter 10.

26. Appendix C.

sonal, undesigned social evolution for God's providential control over history.

The Bible tells us to serve others. Positive sanctions will come as a result. Adam Smith said that the positive sanction is greater wealth. The New Testament does not teach this. It also does not deny it. It does warn men that service is primary; God's blessings, whether eternal or temporal, are secondary. Adam Smith, in The Theory of Moral Sentiments (1759), said that this form of service is an important aspect of human motivation. In The Wealth of Nations, he stressed self-interested service. In this book, he generally ignored charitable service. His intellectual successors have never regarded The Theory of Moral Sentiments as contributing anything of analytical interest that is not found also in The Wealth of Nations.

Christ warned men to get their priorities straight.²⁷ He warned men to serve others primarily for God's sake, not for their own sake. Therefore, any attempt to substitute temporal sanctions, either positive or negative, as one's top priority, rather than service to God through service to men, is a form of the worship of mammon.

Civil government is not supposed to coerce men into the worship of God over mammon. While political pluralists would agree with this political principle, they rarely agree with the economic implication of this principle.

The Bible does not authorize the use of state power to extract wealth from mammon-worshippers on behalf of God's causes. The commandment against theft includes the forcible extraction of wealth from members of one political group solely to increase the income of another group. This prohibition includes the transfer of wealth from the rich to the poor, or, what in fact takes place, from the rich to the middle class in the name of the poor.

Forcible wealth transfers necessarily must invoke the politics of mammon: economic salvation (healing). Christian socialism is baptized mammonism. It substitutes power for voluntarism in the name of charity. Socialism is mammonism as surely as capitalism is, but is far more dangerous to both liberty and economic growth. The dividing theological issue is what a society's goals and means are: the kingdom of God vs. the kingdom of man.

27. North, Priorities and Dominion.

Conclusion

Hierarchy is the basis of long-term biblical dominion. This mandates subordination: subordination first to God, and then subordination to others. It is through subordination that men gain authority, including authority over others. This principle is supposed to be the basis of rulership in the church. It should also be the basis of economic practice.

A vertical hierarchical structure governs all covenantal institutions: church, state, and family. There is a vertical hierarchy of lawful authority. A person grows in grace through lawful subordination to covenantal authorities.

Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God: and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation. For rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. Wilt thou then not be afraid of the power? do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same: For he is the minister of God to thee for good. But if thou do that which is evil, be afraid; for he beareth not the sword in vain: for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil. Wherefore ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath, but also for conscience sake (Rom. 13:1–5).²⁸

There is also horizontal hierarchy, such as showing grace to covenant-breakers. This form of hierarchy is less apparent in covenantal institutions. Covenantal horizontal service creates dependence on God, but not legal subordination to the church. The covenant-keeper serves those outside the faith as a way of testifying to God's grace. This service can result in the beneficiary's eternal destruction: negative sanctions.

Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord. Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head (Rom. 12:19–20).²⁹

On the other hand, horizontal covenantal service can bring salvation: positive sanctions.

28. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 11.

299. Ibid., ch. 10.

Give none offence, neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, nor to the church of God: Even as I please all men in all things, not seeking mine own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be saved (I Cor. 10:32–33).

What the New Testament does not teach, but which undergirds free market theory, is the fact that non-covenantal horizontal service to customers is the basis of income for producers. The pursuit of money by sellers matches the pursuit of benefits by customers. Both the seller and the customer must seek to please the person on the other side of the potential transaction. But in God's economy, service is a self-authenticating goal. One's motive for service must not rest on the hope of direct, personal temporal profit. Nevertheless, we should expect profit. God's sanctions in this world are not random.

Appendix A

DIVORCE AND REMARRIAGE

We come now to a unified judicial issue that has two aspects: divorce and remarriage. Let me make myself as clear as I can: this is one topic. Any exegesis that attempts to consider divorce and remarriage as separate judicial issues must abandon both the Mosaic law and Christ's teaching on this two-fold but judicially unified subject.

This topic has divided Christian theologians ever since the very early church. Whenever we find a topic in the Bible that is universal in scope, both geographically and chronologically, but which has not yet been resolved by the church, we can be sure that there is a long-term debate regarding the proper principle of biblical interpretation and its application to specific texts, i.e., a debate over hermeneutics. In this case, the debate is over rival judicial interpretations.

The principle of judicial interpretation that I have adopted is victim's rights.¹

A. Six Primary Texts

There are six defining texts that deal with divorce and/or remarriage: three in the Mosaic law and three in the gospels. Only four of these texts receive much attention by commentators.

Here are the three Mosaic texts, in the order of their familiarity:

When a man hath taken a wife, and married her, and it come to pass that she find no favour in his eyes, because he hath found some uncleanness in her: then let him write her a bill of divorcement, and give it in her hand, and send her out of his house. And when she is departed out of his house, she may go and be another man's wife. And if the latter husband hate her, and write her a bill of divorce-

1. Gary North, Victim's Rights: The Biblical View of Civil Justice (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnvictim>) See also Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012) Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), Appendix M.

ment, and giveth it in her hand, and sendeth her out of his house; or if the latter husband die, which took her to be his wife; Her former husband, which sent her away, may not take her again to be his wife, after that she is defiled; for that is abomination before the LORD: and thou shalt not cause the land to sin, which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance (Deut. 24:1–4).

If any man take a wife, and go in unto her, and hate her, And give occasions of speech against her, and bring up an evil name upon her, and say, I took this woman, and when I came to her, I found her not a maid: Then shall the father of the damsel, and her mother, take and bring forth the tokens of the damsel's virginity unto the elders of the city in the gate: And the damsel's father shall say unto the elders, I gave my daughter unto this man to wife, and he hateth her; And, lo, he hath given occasions of speech against her, saying, I found not thy daughter a maid; and yet these are the tokens of my daughter's virginity. And they shall spread the cloth before the elders of the city. And the elders of that city shall take that man and chastise him; And they shall amerce him in an hundred shekels of silver, and give them unto the father of the damsel, because he hath brought up an evil name upon a virgin of Israel: and she shall be his wife; he may not put her away all his days. But if this thing be true, and the tokens of virginity be not found for the damsel: Then they shall bring out the damsel to the door of her father's house, and the men of her city shall stone her with stones that she die: because she hath wrought folly in Israel, to play the whore in her father's house: so shalt thou put evil away from among you (Deut. 22:13–21).

When thou goest forth to war against thine enemies, and the LORD thy God hath delivered them into thine hands, and thou hast taken them captive, And seest among the captives a beautiful woman, and hast a desire unto her, that thou wouldest have her to thy wife; Then thou shalt bring her home to thine house; and she shall shave her head, and pare her nails; And she shall put the raiment of her captivity from off her, and shall remain in thine house, and bewail her father and her mother a full month: and after that thou shalt go in unto her, and be her husband, and she shall be thy wife. And it shall be, if thou have no delight in her, then thou shalt let her go whither she will; but thou shalt not sell her at all for money, thou shalt not make merchandise of her, because thou hast humbled her (Deut. 21:10–14).

Here are the three New Testament texts, in order of their familiarity:

It hath been said, Whosoever shall put away his wife, let him give her a writing of divorcement: But I say unto you, That whosoever shall put away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery: and whosoever shall marry her that is divorced committeth adultery (Matt. 5:31–32).

The Pharisees also came unto him, tempting him, and saying unto him, Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause? And he answered and said unto them, Have ye not read, that he which made them at the beginning made them male and female, And said, For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife: and they twain shall be one flesh? Wherefore they are no more twain, but one flesh. What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder. They say unto him, Why did Moses then command to give a writing of divorcement, and to put her away? He saith unto them, Moses because of the hardness of your hearts suffered you to put away your wives: but from the beginning it was not so. And I say unto you, Whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery: and whoso marrieth her which is put away doth commit adultery. His disciples say unto him, If the case of the man be so with his wife, it is not good to marry. But he said unto them, All men cannot receive this saying, save they to whom it is given. For there are some eunuchs, which were so born from their mother's womb: and there are some eunuchs, which were made eunuchs of men: and there be eunuchs, which have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake. He that is able to receive it, let him receive it (Matt. 19:3–12).

And the Pharisees came to him, and asked him, Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife? tempting him. And he answered and said unto them, What did Moses command you? And they said, Moses suffered to write a bill of divorcement, and to put her away. And Jesus answered and said unto them, For the hardness of your heart he wrote you this precept. But from the beginning of the creation God made them male and female. For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and cleave to his wife; And they twain shall be one flesh: so then they are no more twain, but one flesh. What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder. And in the house his disciples asked him again of the same matter. And he saith unto them, Whosoever shall put away his wife, and marry another, committeth adultery against her. And if a woman shall put away her husband, and be married to another, she committeth adultery (Mark 10:2–12).

B. Divorce and Remarriage in the Old Testament

There were three legal avenues available to a Hebrew man to gain a lawful divorce under the Mosaic covenant: a bill of divorce, divorce by execution, and the divorce of a war bride. There was one legal avenue for a woman to achieve a divorce: divorce by execution.

1. Bill of Divorce

The bill of divorce was grounded in a two-fold factor: a wife's loss of favor in her husband's eyes because of her uncleanness. "When a man hath taken a wife, and married her, and it come to pass that she find no favour in his eyes, because he hath found some uncleanness in her: then let him write her a bill of divorcement, and give it in her hand, and send her out of his house. And when she is departed out of his house, she may go and be another man's wife" (Deut. 24:1–2).

The bill of divorce did not have to be confirmed by any court in order to be lawful. It was available only to husbands. A husband could secure a divorce on his own authority, i.e., on his word alone. A woman could gain a divorce only by the intervention of a civil court to convict her husband of a capital crime. On this issue, there was no equality before the law. The wife had less protection.

The text is specific: there had to be uncleanness. The exegetical problem is this: "uncleanness" is not defined in this text or in any other. It is described in other passages, but none of them seems to apply well to this passage. The Hebrew word translated here as "uncleanness" is more frequently translated "nakedness" in the King James Version. It sometimes refers to sexual sin, but it is more comprehensive than this. In Ezekiel, the word is used for national apostasy. Ezekiel brought a covenant lawsuit against Israel with these words:

Wherefore, O harlot, hear the word of the LORD: Thus saith the Lord GOD; Because thy filthiness was poured out, and thy nakedness discovered through thy whoredoms with thy lovers, and with all the idols of thy abominations, and by the blood of thy children, which thou didst give unto them; Behold, therefore I will gather all thy lovers, with whom thou hast taken pleasure, and all them that thou hast loved, with all them that thou hast hated; I will even gather them round about against thee, and will discover thy nakedness unto them, that they may see all thy nakedness. And I will judge thee, as women that break wedlock and shed blood are judged; and I will give thee blood in fury and jealousy (Ezek. 16:35–38).

This degree of rebellion would have been a capital crime. A man could gain a divorce by execution if his wife committed any capital crime, if he could prove this infraction in a civil court. Rushdoony lists these crimes as capital crimes for women: unchastity before marriage (Deut. 22:21), adultery after marriage (Deut. 22:22–23; Lev. 20:10), prostitution by a priest's daughter (Lev. 21:9), bestiality (Lev. 20:16; 18:23), wizardry or witchcraft (Ex. 22:18; Lev. 20:27), transgressing the covenant (Deut. 17:2–5), and incest (Lev. 20:11–12, 14).² Furthermore, a woman could have her husband executed for 19 infractions.³ In this sense, there was no equality before the law. The wife had greater protection.

If “uncleanness” referred exclusively to a crime, let alone a capital crime, how was it lawful for a husband, acting on his own authority, to send his wife away if she had committed a crime? In such a case, he would have been sending a criminal into the community, perhaps even to marry again. The Mosaic law was so hostile to such an act of knowing mercy that it mandated that parents bring a rebellious adult son before the magistrates and demand his execution (Deut. 21:18–21).⁴ So, it is inconceivable that “nakedness” in this instance referred to a crime, let alone a capital crime.

Another judicial problem is the unilateral nature of the bill of divorce. There is no indication in the text that any court had to approve it before it became legally binding on the dismissed wife. She had no judicial appeal available to her. Her husband possessed a God-given authority over her to divorce her, and no human institution could lawfully reverse his judgment.

There was another possible avenue for gaining a divorce: the vow of jealousy. This legal procedure did not take place in a civil court. In order to be granted a divorce by execution, a husband had to prove in a civil court that his wife had committed adultery. Sometimes he could not prove this for lack of evidence, but he was nevertheless suspicious. This is why there was the vow of jealousy. This was the only law in the Mosaic law that was to be judged in terms of a miracle: the direct intervention of a supernatural force in the presence of a priest. The passage is not familiar to most readers (Num. 5:12–31). It is the longest single law in the Bible, unless we consider the laws of leprosy to be a single law (Lev. 13, 14).⁵ If she was found guilty of adultery, she was not to be executed; she was instead visibly cursed by the swelling of her body (v. 27). Then she was to become a curse among the people (v. 27). This, clearly, was grounds for a divorce, but it was not grounds for her execution, presumably because the evidence was based on a miracle. It testified against her, but not to the extent of mandating her execution. There were no witnesses. Adultery was a capital crime under the Mosaic law. “And the man that committeth adultery with another man’s wife, even he that committeth adultery with his neighbour’s wife, the adulterer and the adulteress shall surely be put to death” (Lev. 20:10). This had to be proven in a civil court. The ordeal of jealousy was tried in an ecclesiastical court.

2. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 402.

3. Idem.

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 50.

Deuteronomy 24:1–4, however, does not refer to any court of law, nor does it mention any right of a woman to gain a legal divorce by execution. It refers only to a husband who writes a writ of divorce. It was this Mosaic law that the Pharisees cited in their questioning of Jesus.

I argued in Tools of Dominion that some of the Mosaic law’s capital crimes did not automatically require execution. The victim had the right to show mercy.⁶ So, it might be argued that a husband wrote a bill of divorce instead of having his wife executed. But there is an overwhelming argument against this interpretation of Deuteronomy 24:1–4: Jesus told the Pharisees that Moses had given Israel this law because of the hardness of men’s hearts. It was not given because of the softness of their hearts, i.e., their mercifulness. So, whatever the contextual meaning of “uncleanness”—we are not told what this was—it did not refer to a crime defined by a capital crime statute.

The wife had lost favor in the eyes (evaluation) of her husband. What was the meaning of favor? The Hebrew word means what it does in English. Someone finds favor in another person’s assessment.

But the LORD was with Joseph, and shewed him mercy, and gave him favour in the sight of the keeper of the prison (Gen. 39:21).

And I will give this people favour in the sight of the Egyptians: and it shall come to pass, that, when ye go, ye shall not go empty (Ex. 3:21).

Then she said, Let me find favour in thy sight, my lord; for that thou hast comforted me, and for that thou hast spoken friendly unto thine

5. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 9.

6. North, Authority and Dominion, Appendix M:K.

handmaid, though I be not like unto one of thine handmaidens (Ruth 2:13).

The justification for divorcing her was her uncleanness. Either this uncleanness could not be proven in a civil court, or else this uncleanness was insufficient to justify her execution. Whatever it was, the infraction was so minor judicially that Jesus said that God had given Hebrew men this way of divorce because of their hard hearts. His implication was obvious: the men should have overlooked the infraction.

I see no other way around the following interpretation of this law: the bill of divorce was given to protect wives. Jesus' insistence that this law was God's condescension to hardhearted husbands means that it was not designed to protect husbands. Their hardheartedness was the greater infraction in God's eyes, not the wives' uncleanness. The Mosaic law was less rigorous in dealing with the sins and crimes of women. There were fewer capital crimes for women, as Rushdoony points out. God's toleration under the Mosaic law included non-criminal uncleanness. Their husbands should have been patient with them, but they weren't. Therefore, had there been no legal way for a husband to remove his wife from his presence, his hardheartedness would have made her life miserable. This Mosaic law offered a way for a wife to escape from her husband's mean spirit, so that she could marry someone else. He wrote her a bill of divorce on his own authority. He did not consult a court. This was unquestionably legal.

A woman had no comparable option with respect to a husband who was unclean in her eyes. The law says nothing about her right to write him a bill of divorce. But if his infraction was one of the 19 capital crimes, she could relieve herself of his presence, and keep all of his assets, too.

Was she guilty of a major sin? The context indicates that she was not. A divorced wife could remarry (Deut. 24:2). In contrast, a wife who had secretly committed fornication prior to the marriage had to be executed. "Then they shall bring out the damsel to the door of her father's house, and the men of her city shall stone her with stones that she die: because she hath wrought folly in Israel, to play the whore in her father's house: so shalt thou put evil away from among you" (Deut. 22:21). The phrase, "so shalt thou put evil away from among you," was familiar to the Israelites.

The hands of the witnesses shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterward the hands of all the people. So thou shalt put the evil away from among you (Deut. 17:7).

And the man that will do presumptuously, and will not hearken unto the priest that standeth to minister there before the LORD thy God, or unto the judge, even that man shall die: and thou shalt put away the evil from Israel (Deut. 17:12).

And the judges shall make diligent inquisition: and, behold, if the witness be a false witness, and hath testified falsely against his brother; Then shall ye do unto him, as he had thought to have done unto his brother: so shalt thou put the evil away from among you. And those which remain shall hear, and fear, and shall henceforth commit no more any such evil among you (Deut. 19:18–20).

If a woman had committed a capital offense, she was to be executed, assuming that her spouse asked this sanction of the court. If he extended mercy, she was to be considered covenantally dead, and therefore ineligible for remarriage. The same was true for a man who committed a capital offense. There were more capital crimes for men than for women. So, to argue that uncleanness in the context of divorce was a capital crime, despite the fact that a husband did not have to bring his wife before a civil court, is to argue that God subsidized evil by means of the bill of divorce: she could lawfully remarry. Instead of putting away evil in the land, a husband merely put away his wife, making her available for someone else. God allowed another man to enjoy life with a sinner who supposedly deserved execution. The Mosaic law would therefore have subsidized a capital criminal. This makes no sense, biblically speaking.

I recognize an exegetical problem at this point. The Hebrew word for “uncleanness” elsewhere indicates a major infraction—indeed, a capital crime. But if, in the context of Deuteronomy 24, it also has this meaning, then a civil court had to be convened to try the case. Divorce by execution would have been mandatory. Only her husband, as her victim, had the legal right to show mercy to the convicted wife and her partner. The court did not possess this right. But this line of reasoning was cut short by Jesus, who made it plain that this law was not given by Moses for the sake of husbands’ mercifulness, but rather for their hardheartedness. If we accept Jesus’ explanation, we cannot accept “uncleanness” in this context as a capital crime. The civil government had no authority in this instance.

Jesus’ disciples understood the limit that this law had placed on wives, and also the burden that Jesus’ revision would place on husbands. Jesus said, "And I say unto you, Whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery: and whoso marrieth her which is put away doth commit adultery. His disciples say unto him, If the case of the man be so with his wife, it is not good to marry" (Matt. 19:9–10).

The Mosaic law of divorce by writ was a two-edged sword. It favored husbands in the sense that it was only available to husbands: no equality before the law. But it favored wives in the sense of providing a way for a wife of a hardhearted man to get out of the marriage and find a more tolerant husband. Jesus announced the judicial termination of this inequality before the law. A wife could get rid of her husband, He said. This thought shocked His disciples, who obviously approved of inequality before the law in this instance. Their shock testifies to the radical break with the Mosaic law that Jesus' teaching on divorce and remarriage represented. He was teaching that turnabout is fair play, that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. "His disciples say unto him, If the case of the man be so with his wife, it is not good to marry" (Matt. 19:10). Jesus did not soften the blow—a blow to 14 centuries of unilateral leeway for dissatisfied Israelite husbands. "But he said unto them, All men cannot receive this saying, save they to whom it is given" (v. 11).

2. Divorce by Execution

The second passage, Deuteronomy 22:13–21, is straightforward. This was divorce by execution. It involved evidence, or lack thereof, for the wife: tokens of virginity. The punishment was death for the convicted wife or an economic fine paid to the father for the husband's false testimony. Notice also that the convicted husband was never allowed to divorce his wife (v. 19). This did not give her a license to commit a capital crime. God's law does not subsidize evil. If she committed a capital crime, he could rid himself of her through execution by a civil court.

3. Divorce of a War Bride

The third passage is not well known. The law of warfare required the Israelites to execute all the males of any nation outside of Canaan that refused corporately to surrender before a war broke out (Deut. 20:13). The females were to be spared (v. 14). It was lawful for an Israelite to marry one of these captive women (Deut. 21:13). If a man married such a woman, and then grew tired of her for any reason, he could divorce her (v. 14). She then went free. She could not be sold (v. 14). This was because she was no longer a slave. Her adoption into his family through marriage had liberated her from her slave status. A divorce could not place her back into slave status. It was easy to divorce a former captive. Her husband had to prove nothing.

4. Victim's Rights

A husband faced two major negative institutional sanctions for divorcing his wife: the loss of the use of the divorced wife's dowry for family investing and the loss of his children.

The dowry was hers, not his. Rebekah's dowry was hers, not Isaac's. Abraham through his servant had given her the dowry. "And the servant brought forth jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment, and gave them to Rebekah: he gave also to her brother and to her mother precious things" (Gen. 24:53). This implies that a wife divorced by writ took out of the marriage the wealth that she had brought into it from her family, for no court of law had convicted her of any crime. Wealth was familistic under the Mosaic tribal system (Num. 36:6–9).⁷ By adopting her into his family, her husband had gained the use of her wealth. As a now-disinherited wife, he could no longer lay claim to her family's wealth. He had to return it to her, which might not have been easy if it had been used to purchase an illiquid asset,⁸ such as a long-term lease of land. She would have been entitled to the return of assets of equal value, including liquidity, to the assets she had brought in. However, if the woman was a concubine—a married woman without a dowry—she received nothing.

Which parent gained legal authority over the children? There is no written law governing this matter. The one biblical example that we have is the pre-Mosaic case of Hagar and Ishmael. Abraham sent both of them away. But this had been Sarah's command: she did not want Ishmael to inherit (Gen. 21:12–13). So, this example—the mother who received the children—is authoritative only by default.

A stronger case rests on the principle of victim's rights. Because the wife had not been convicted by a court, she was the victimized

7. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 22.

8. A perfectly liquid asset is defined as an asset that can be exchanged for money without advertising costs, delay, or offering a discount to the buyer. Money is commonly defined as the most liquid asset.

party. Her husband's word had unilaterally ended her marriage. Also, Jesus identified the husbands as hardhearted. He spoke on God's behalf. I interpret this law accordingly. So, the wife would have been entitled to take the children with her if she chose to, which she probably did. The husband bore a risk for unilaterally divorcing her: the loss of their children. This would have been an incentive for him to overlook her infraction, which he was morally supposed to do anyway.

C. The Theology of New Testament Divorce

The New Testament's doctrine of divorce begins with God's lawful divorce of Old Covenant Israel. Jesus brought a covenant lawsuit against Israel, a faithless wife. Israel had pursued false gods ever since the days of the judges (Jud. 2:12–13). Jesus charged Israel with long-term covenant-breaking. Israel had also been a murderous nation, Jesus said, and would prove itself murderous after His departure.

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! because ye build the tombs of the prophets, and garnish the sepulchres of the righteous, And say, If we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets. Wherefore ye be witnesses unto yourselves, that ye are the children of them which killed the prophets. Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers. Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell? Wherefore, behold, I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes: and some of them ye shall kill and crucify; and some of them shall ye scourge in your synagogues, and persecute them from city to city: That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel unto the blood of Zacharias son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar. Verily I say unto you, All these things shall come upon this generation. O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! Behold, your house is left unto you desolate (Matt. 23:29–38).

Divorce is a covenantal act in response to a covenant-breaking act. What kind of act? Let us begin our discussion with a consideration of capital crimes.

A person who is married to someone who has committed a capital crime is to be delivered from the marriage by the execution of the criminal spouse by the civil government. This is divorce by execution.

Conviction for having committed a capital crime, as defined by the Mosaic law, would have led to the execution of the perpetrator. This would have released the spouse from any further legal obligation to the deceased spouse. This judicial release would also have transferred the assets of the deceased criminal the spouse. The now-released spouse then had the right to remarry.

We see this system best in the ministry of Jesus. His ministry involved corporate condemnation. Israel, Jesus said, had repeatedly committed murder. God would soon deliver Himself from His marriage to Old Covenant Israel by means of a public divorce. This would be followed by Israel's execution.

The crucifixion of Jesus was Israel's consummate act of murder. Jesus had foretold it.

Hear another parable: There was a certain householder, which planted a vineyard, and hedged it round about, and digged a winepress in it, and built a tower, and let it out to husbandmen, and went into a far country: And when the time of the fruit drew near, he sent his servants to the husbandmen, that they might receive the fruits of it. And the husbandmen took his servants, and beat one, and killed another, and stoned another. Again, he sent other servants more than the first: and they did unto them likewise. But last of all he sent unto them his son, saying, They will reverence my son. But when the husbandmen saw the son, they said among themselves, This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and let us seize on his inheritance. And they caught him, and cast him out of the vineyard, and slew him. When the lord therefore of the vineyard cometh, what will he do unto those husbandmen? They say unto him, He will miserably destroy those wicked men, and will let out his vineyard unto other husbandmen, which shall render him the fruits in their seasons. Jesus saith unto them, Did ye never read in the scriptures, The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner: this is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes? Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof. And whosoever shall fall on this stone shall be broken: but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder. And when the chief priests and Pharisees had heard his parables, they perceived that he spake of them. But when they sought to lay hands on him, they feared the multitude, because they took him for a prophet (Matt. 21:33–46).⁹

9. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 43.

God's transfer of His kingdom from Old Covenant Israel to the institutional church was grounded judicially in the biblical principle of divorce by execution. God did not divorce Old Covenant Israel merely by writing a bill of divorcement and sending her away, the way that Joseph was ready to deal with Mary (Matt. 1:19). Instead, God executed Old Covenant Israel in A.D. 70, when Jerusalem was destroyed by Rome.¹⁰ This was done in a judicial context. Israel had been warned. Jesus brought a covenant lawsuit against Israel that constituted God's public announcement: "Guilty as charged." The proof of Israel's guilt, Jesus announced, would be His own execution at the hands of Israel. The parable said that Israel would kill the son of the land owner, who had come as the agent of his father to secure a rendering of accounts from the husbandmen. The land owner would then retaliate. "He will miserably destroy those wicked men, and will let out his vineyard unto other husbandmen, which shall render him the fruits in their seasons" (v. 41). This would terminate the Holy Land. Its status as holy—set apart by God—would be removed. The kingdom, which was Old Covenant Israel's inheritance, would then go to the church. "The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (v. 43).

National Israel countered Jesus' covenant lawsuit against the nation by bringing a covenant lawsuit against Him, and then by securing His execution. This fulfilled part of Jesus' prophecy, namely, the execution of the son.

There was another part of this prophecy: Israel's murder of a new generation of prophets.

Wherefore, behold, I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes: and some of them ye shall kill and crucify; and some of them shall ye scourge in your synagogues, and persecute them from city to city: That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel unto the blood of Zacharias son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar. Verily I say unto you, All these things shall come upon this generation (Matt. 23:34–36).

Israel's subsequent actions after Jesus had delivered this prophecy-lawsuit confirmed that Israel had been the object of His lawsuit. They executed Stephen (Acts 7). This was a prelude to mass persecution of the church. "And Saul was consenting unto his death. And at that time there was a great persecution against the church which was at Jerusalem; and they were all scattered abroad throughout the regions of Judaea and Samaria, except the apostles" (Acts 8:1). This was sufficient evidence to warrant God's covenantal divorce of Israel.

10. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

The first public announcement of the transfer of God's kingdom to the church came early in the Book of Acts. Peter announced this transfer in his first presentation of the covenant lawsuit against Israel. First, he described the church members' speaking in tongues as the fulfillment of Joel's prophecy. "But this is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel" (Acts 2:16).¹¹ Second, he identified Israel's capital crime. "Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus, whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ" (Acts 2:36). In his second presentation, Peter announced that there is only one way to salvation. "Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved" (Acts 4:12). This meant that Israel was now lawfully divorced.

Execution was delayed until Jesus' prophecy of Israel's persecution of the next group of prophets—agents of the church—was fulfilled. Final judgment came for Israel in A.D. 70. This event fulfilled Jesus' prophecy, "Verily I say unto you, All these things shall come upon this generation. O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! Behold, your house is left unto you desolate" (Matt. 23:36–38).

While it was lawful for a man under the Mosaic law to divorce his wife for infractions other than capital crimes, Jesus made it plain that this loose view of marriage had not been God's standard originally. "He saith unto them, Moses because of the hardness of your hearts suffered you to put away your wives: but from the beginning it was not so" (Matt. 19:8). This passage does not refer to the practice of polygamy, but it is associated judicially with Peter's covenant lawsuit against Old Covenant Israel. Peter's lawsuit rested on two judicial principles: (1) God's divorce of convicted Israel; (2) the identification of the church as God's only bride. This was why he mandated baptism. "Then Peter said unto them, Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call" (Acts 2:38–39). Baptism replaced circumcision as the New Covenant's mark of adoption into the kingdom of God, i.e., membership in the bride of Christ.¹²

11. Peter said that the church was founded by the fulfillment of an Old Testament prophecy. This text refutes the claim by conventional dispensationalists that no Old Testament prophecy was fulfilled in the New Testament era of the church. The dispensationalists' theory of the church era as a "great parenthesis," unknown to the Old Testament, is refuted by this verse. This fact was recognized by J. C. O'Hair and Cornelius Stam in the 1940s, who jointly developed ultradispensationalism: the church as the work of Paul's evangelism, not Peter's. What Peter founded in Acts 8 was not the church, Stam taught. Stam, Things That Differ: The Fundamentals of Dispensationalism (Stephens Point, Wisconsin: Worsalla, 1951).

This is the New Testament's application of the Mosaic law's principle of divorce by execution. But what of sins or crimes that are less heinous than capital crimes? What is the New Testament's view of their effect on the marriage covenant? To answer this, we must first understand Jesus' view of divorce and remarriage.

D. Jesus vs. the Mosaic Law of Remarriage

Jesus annulled the Deuteronomic law of divorce and remarriage. He replaced it with another law. He did so in three passages. We have already read these, but review is useful.

It hath been said, Whosoever shall put away his wife, let him give her a writing of divorcement: But I say unto you, That whosoever shall put away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery: and whosoever shall marry her that is divorced committeth adultery (Matt. 5:31–32).

The Pharisees also came unto him, tempting him, and saying unto him, Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause? And he answered and said unto them, Have ye not read, that he which made them at the beginning made them male and female, And said,

12. We must distinguish between participation in Christ's bride and being Christ's bride. Roman Catholic historian Leon Podles includes a chapter on what he calls bridal mysticism. Beginning in the twelfth century, this tradition within the Roman Catholic Church has confused Christ's love of the church as His bride with a concept not taught in the Bible, Christ's love of the individual Christian as His bride. He presents a strong case for bridal mysticism as an important factor in the feminization of the Roman Church. A heterosexual man cannot easily relate to the idea of being loved individually by Christ as a husband loves his bride. Mystical women, on the other hand, have responded positively to this imagery. Leon J. Podles, The Church Impotent: The Feminization of Christianity (Dallas, Texas: Spence, 1999), chaps. 6, 7.

For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife: and they twain shall be one flesh? Wherefore they are no more twain, but one flesh. What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder. They say unto him, Why did Moses then command to give a writing of divorcement, and to put her away? He saith unto them, Moses because of the hardness of your hearts suffered you to put away your wives: but from the beginning it was not so. And I say unto you, Whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery: and whoso marrieth her which is put away doth commit adultery (Matt. 19:3–9).

And in the house his disciples asked him again of the same matter. And he saith unto them, Whosoever shall put away his wife, and marry another, committeth adultery against her. And if a woman shall put away her husband, and be married to another, she committeth adultery (Mark 10:10–12).

1. Matthew 5:31–32

Rushdoony's exposition of Matthew 5:32 is correct regarding the meaning of the Greek word translated as "fornication." It is not the Greek word for "adultery." It connotes sins more general than copulation.¹³ But Rushdoony was incorrect regarding Deuteronomy 24:1–2. He interpreted Jesus' words as a condemnation of the Jewish theologians for having made a rigorous Deuteronomic law more lax. "Jesus then proceeded to reaffirm Deuteronomy 24:1–4."¹⁴ Also, "the law concerning marriage and divorce remains one throughout Scripture. The cultural particulars as reflected in the law can and do change, but the law itself does not."¹⁵ This is incorrect, both here and as a general principle of interpretation.

Rushdoony argued that this Deuteronomic law was rigorous, while the rabbis loosened it dramatically. He cited Alfred Edersheim's comments on how lax the divorce laws were in the teachings of the rabbis in Jesus' day.¹⁶ But this divorce law was lax in Moses' day, too. It granted a greater degree of unilateral authority to husbands than what had prevailed prior to Moses, as well as what is mandatory today. This was what Rushdoony denied. He never dealt with the central judicial issue

13. Rushdoony, Institutes, pp. 406–11.

14. Ibid., p. 410.

15. Ibid., p. 414.

16. Alfred Edersheim, The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, 2 vols. (New York: Longmans, Green, 1897), II, p. 332–33; in Rushdoony, ibid., p. 409–10.

in the Pharisees' challenge to Jesus: the bill of divorce. This divorce action was administered unilaterally by the husband. There is no hint in the text of Deuteronomy that any court had to approve this unilateral divorce or that any court could override it. This laxness, Jesus said, was allowed by the Mosaic law because of the hardness of the husbands' hearts.

Rushdoony did not acknowledge the sharp judicial discontinuity that the New Covenant has established in the law of divorce and remarriage, a discontinuity that the disciples immediately recognized. He denied that Jesus had changed the Mosaic law of divorce and remarriage. It is difficult to understand how he could have ignored the obvious. Jesus did change this two-part law. As we shall see, He equalized the divorce law for husbands and wives. He also changed the law regarding the remarriage of a divorce-initiating marriage partner, who cannot lawfully remarry under the New Covenant. Jesus called such remarriage adulterous.

Rushdoony was also incorrect about the reason for any change in any Mosaic law, which he said was cultural. Many Mosaic laws have been changed, not just their cultural setting. When Jesus' death and resurrection definitively terminated all covenantal aspects of the tribes, the Promised Land, and the Levitical priesthood, this necessarily also terminated much of the Mosaic legislation, which was tied to these three aspects of the Mosaic Covenant.

On what judicial basis did Jesus do this? As the new high priest. The New Covenant annulled the Levitical priesthood and restored the Melchizedekal (Heb. 7). Jesus is the high priest, the epistle to the Hebrews says, even though He was born into the tribe of Judah, not priestly Levi.

2. Matthew 19:3–9

Here, Jesus made other modifications. In this revision of the Mosaic law, He identified as adulterous any marriage between a man and a lawfully divorced wife (v. 9). Under the Mosaic law, a unilaterally divorced wife could lawfully remarry anyone except a priest, as we shall see.

In this passage, Jesus added another restriction: no remarriage is lawful for a man who has unilaterally divorced his wife. "And I say unto you, Whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery" (v. 9a). In this example, a man has divorced his wife for something other than fornication. He therefore may not lawfully remarry. This means that the divorce was lawful, just as it was in Deuteronomy 24:1. What is unlawful is his remarriage.

Jesus was responding here to the laxity of the Mosaic law. Jesus tightened it. Adultery was a capital crime under the Mosaic law. Jesus did not annul the penal sanction for adultery: execution. No other New Testament passage annulled it, either. Therefore, because Jesus here defined as adulterous any remarriage by the initiator following a unilateral divorce, a divorced wife can bring lawful charges against her ex-husband and his new wife. She can demand their execution. This was not true under the Mosaic Covenant.

3. Mark 10:10–12

This is the crucial New Testament passage on divorce and remarriage, yet it is the one least known. “And in the house his disciples asked him again of the same matter. And he saith unto them, Whosoever shall put away his wife, and marry another, committeth adultery against her. And if a woman shall put away her husband, and be married to another, she committeth adultery.” Here, Jesus radically altered the Mosaic law of divorce. Under the Mosaic law, only a husband had the right of unilateral divorce by means of a written document. Under the New Covenant, the wife also has the right to secure a unilateral divorce by writ.

Why the judicial change? The text does not say, but there is an obvious answer: baptism. Both males and females are adopted into the family of God’s church through baptism. “For as many of you as have been baptized into Jesus have put on Jesus. There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Jesus Christ” (Gal. 3:27–28). Baptism has established the principle of gender equality before the law. Women were not baptized in the Old Covenant, so in the area of divorce and remarriage, there had not been equality before the law.

Jesus applied the remarriage law equally to husbands and wives. “And he saith unto them, Whosoever shall put away his wife, and marry another, committeth adultery against her. And if a woman shall put away her husband, and be married to another, she committeth adultery” (vv. 11–12). Both parties have the right of unilateral divorce, and both are forbidden to remarry. If the divorcing partner leaves a spouse for anything but a sexual crime in the broadest sense (“fornication”), he or she cannot not lawfully remarry.

Christians should uphold three judicial positions on divorce and remarriage. First, adultery remains a capital crime in the New Covenant. No New Testament law has changed this Mosaic Covenant civil sanction. Second, Jesus identified as adulterous the remarriage of a divorcing spouse who did not prove in a civil or ecclesiastical court that the now-divorced spouse had committed fornication. Third, the victim—the unconvicted divorced spouse—can demand anything up to the death penalty for an ex-spouse who remarries. This would also include the execution of the new spouse. Under such a threat, the number of available partners for people who had initiated a no-trial divorce would be highly restricted.

Did Jesus authorize divorce for anything other than fornication in the broadest sense, i.e., committing a capital crime? I see no way around it: He did. A person who initiates what we today call a no-fault divorce cannot lawfully remarry, according to Jesus. Nevertheless, Jesus did not say that a person may not initiate a divorce. He mentioned no negative sanction for obtaining a no-trial divorce, nor is there any implication that a negative sanction should be imposed, other than the loss of the children, as implied by the Mosaic Covenant. But in the New Covenant, a wife can initiate the divorce, so she must pay the price of losing her children, just as the divorcing husband did in the Mosaic Testament. What requires a negative civil sanction is an adulterous remarriage. Conclusion: the New Testament authorizes unilateral no-trial divorce and deadly fault remarriage for the initiator. A person can lawfully get out of a misery-inducing marriage, but only at the price of permanently single status. The divorced spouse can lawfully remarry. There is a judicial distinction between the initiator and the victim. The unilaterally divorced spouse must be presumed innocent if the divorce was not a matter of a court-proven sin.

Again, let me reaffirm my original assertion, namely, that divorce and remarriage are a judicial unit in the Bible. The laws of divorce cannot legitimately be considered apart from the laws of remarriage, and vice versa. This was true of Deuteronomy 24:1–4, and it is equally true of Jesus’ reformulation of the laws of divorce and remarriage. Any critic of my view of the legitimacy of unilateral no-trial divorce under the New Testament who does not also discuss my insistence on the capital sanction for the remarriage of the initiator of a no-trial divorce is an intellectual cheat and a charlatan. (I say this, frankly, because so many critics of theonomy have been intellectual cheats and charlatans.)¹⁷

My interpretation represents a major break with traditional Bible commentators. I have not come to this conclusion because I wish to compromise with my divorce-prone era. I have rarely been one to compromise with much of anything in my era. I have come to this conclusion regarding no-trial divorce because I see no textually based way around it. Jesus did not place a “no remarriage” restriction on all divorced people. He placed a “no remarriage” restriction on all those who initiate and secure a no-trial divorce—the same kind of divorce that Moses authorized in Deuteronomy 24:1–4. In Deuteronomy 24:2, a wife who had been divorced by her husband had the right to remarry. She had been the victim. She had not been proven guilty of a capital crime in a court of law. She had been unilaterally divorced. Her husband had obtained a no-trial divorce, i.e., no fault on her part had been proven in a court.

Jesus tightened this law in two ways. First, He forbade the divorcing spouse to remarry, on threat of execution and excommunication for adultery. Second, He opened the legal door for wives to initiate a no-trial divorce. In the New Covenant era, husbands must also toe the line, not just wives. Husbands must bear the risk of getting booted unilaterally. The hardness of hearts, Jesus thereby has announced, is no longer limited to men. It is now extended to women. But He placed a negative sanction against hardhearted initiators of a no-trial divorce: a permanent ban on their remarriage. This form of hardheartedness has a high price in the New Covenant.

What about soft hearts of covenant-keepers? The covenant-keeper who believes that his or her calling, testimony, or dominion is being thwarted by a spouse has the right to break the marriage vow and adopt a life of celibacy. The divorced spouse receives authority over the children. The divorced spouse receives a joint share of the marriage’s assets. The divorced spouse is free to remarry. The divorced spouse also possesses authority to bring formal charges against the ex-spouse, should the ex-spouse remarry. But there is a lawful escape from a bad marriage: celibacy.

Because of baptism’s replacement of circumcision, all women have been elevated to equality with men judicially, with one exception: a right to hold any office in the church that authorizes them to speak in church. They are not allowed to speak in church worship services.¹⁸ This otherwise extensive equality applies beyond ecclesiastical law. It applies across the range of the kingdom of God, which includes civil government and family government. Nowhere is the New Covenant's extension of equality before the law more clearly seen than in the law of divorce and remarriage. The implication for divorce and remarriage is that both parties possess equal judicial authority to initiate a no-trial divorce, and both suffer the same penalty for remarriage.

17. Yes, I know: scholars are not supposed to say such things. As to who laid down this rule, nobody knows, but it surely helps intellectual cheats and charlatans.

E. Victim's Rights and No-Trial Divorce

The judicial principle of victim's rights is the governing principle of biblical law. This principle rests on the identification of God as the victim of sin and crime, from the rebellion of Adam (Gen. 3) to the final rebellion of Satan (Rev. 20:9–10). A victim has the right to press charges, just as God presses charges from the garden of Eden until the final judgment (Rev. 20:14–15). A victim also has the legal right to show mercy by not pressing charges, just as Jesus did. “And when they were come to the place, which is called Calvary, there they crucified him, and the malefactors, one on the right hand, and the other on the left. Then said Jesus, Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do. And they parted his raiment, and cast lots” (Luke 23:33–34).

Covenant-keepers should always ask in any judicial dispute: “Who is the victim?” The victim of a unilateral divorce under the Mosaic law was the wife. We know this because of what Jesus told the Pharisees. “Moses because of the hardness of your hearts suffered you to put away your wives: but from the beginning it was not so” (Matt. 19:8). The divorced wife's status as a victim was why she had the right to marry again under the Mosaic law. She had not been condemned by a civil court. She had not been found guilty of a capital crime. Her husband had not attained divorce by execution.

An innocent party should not be penalized judicially by either church or state. The New Testament's laws governing divorce are also governed by the principle of victim's rights. A victimized spouse should not be penalized by either church or state.

The modern world rarely imposes the negative sanction required by the Bible in the case of capital crimes: execution. Sometimes a biblical capital crime is not regarded by the state as a crime, e.g., blasphemy. This places the spouses of capital criminals at a great disadvantage. Many churches teach that innocent spouses must remain legally bound for life to these covenant-breakers. The legal solution to this problem is for both church and state to regard the criminal spouse as covenantally dead. With respect to the marital bond, the legal status of being covenantally deceased due to a conviction for having committed a capital crime should be the judicial equivalent of physical death. The innocent spouse should gain control over all of the family's property and also the children, just as if the criminal were literally dead. The state should enforce this transfer.

18. “Let your women keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law. And if they will learn any thing, let them ask their husbands at home: for it is a shame for women to speak in the church” (I Cor. 14:34–35).

Jesus did not sentence unilaterally divorced wives to the single life, nor did He sentence unilaterally divorced husbands to a life without marriage. The initiator comes under the restriction, not the victim. Jesus made it clear that there are valid grounds for divorce. The key word is "except." Jesus said, "And I say unto you, Whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery: and whoso marrieth her which is put away doth commit adultery" (Matt. 19:9).

It is not adulterous for the victim to remarry after a court has put away a spouse for fornication, which is not the same as adultery. This is true whether the victimized spouse is male or female. The victim has rights. The victim is not to suffer because of the fornicator. Just because one spouse commits fornication, there is no obligation for the other spouse to remain with the sinner, or to remain single forever because of the victim's legal separation from the sinner, whose sin had broken the marriage covenant.¹⁹

Consider Jesus' words: "Whosoever shall put away his wife, and marry another, committeth adultery against her. And if a woman shall put away her husband, and be married to another, she committeth adultery" (Mark 10:11b–12). Here, He offered no exception based on fornication. He did not need to; He had already offered it elsewhere. He was not speaking here of deadly fault divorce, i.e., divorce based on the spouse's commission of a capital crime or sexual deviation. He was speaking here of no-trial divorce. The spouse who initiated a no-trial divorce did not do so on the basis of court-convicted fornication by the now-divorced partner. To argue that Jesus was condemning every partner who initiates a divorce, even when the divorced spouse is a court-convicted fornicator, is to argue that a victimized spouse can never lawfully remarry after the divorce is granted by the authorities. This violates the principle of victim's rights.

19. Ray R. Sutton, Second Chance: Biblical Blueprints for Divorce and Remarriage (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/resecond>)

Who is prohibited from remarrying? Five kinds of people. First, a spouse who is lawfully executed for having committed a capital crime. Second, a spouse who has been convicted of having committed such a crime, but who has been shown mercy by the victim. The victim has the right to tell the civil court, "No remarriage; otherwise, execute." Third, a spouse who has committed what the Bible identifies as a capital crime, but which the legally responsible civil court refuses to acknowledge is a capital crime. The innocent marriage partner then divorces the criminal. The civil court should prohibit the lawfully divorced criminal from remarrying. If the civil court refuses to enforce this, then a church court should excommunicate any convicted spouse upon remarriage, assuming that the church has not already excommunicated the person for having committed the crime. The victim is then allowed to remarry. Fourth, a person who has committed sexual infractions that may not be capital crimes, but which have broken the marriage in the opinion of the victimized spouse. An addiction to pornography would qualify, or constant demands for the partner to perform sexual acts that the partner regards as deviant, where the court agrees. Fifth, a spouse who has initiated a no-trial divorce.

The Protestant church has long regarded desertion as valid legal grounds for divorce. This is the correct conclusion, but for the wrong reason. The deserter has initiated a no-trial divorce. Civil and ecclesiastical authorities should formally identify desertion as a unilateral no-trial divorce. The deserter must not be allowed to remarry. The deserted spouse should be allowed to remarry.

The spouse who wishes to be identified as the victim of a no-trial divorce should be allowed by law to oppose the divorce. This will not save the marriage, but it establishes the divorce as unilateral. If both parties agree to the no-fault divorce, then neither should be allowed to remarry. This is why a deserted spouse should protest to a court.

What about child-support payments? If the deserter is employed, he or she owes child support until the child reaches adulthood at age 20 (Ex. 30:14) or else marries, whichever event takes place first. The deserted spouse is a legal victim, in the same way that the divorced wife in the Mosaic Covenant was a legal victim. The economic burden of support should fall on the deserter. If the deserter is the wife, she owes payment. If she remarries, she has committed adultery. Her ex-husband should be allowed to demand her execution and her new husband's execution. But, as a matter of mercy, he may prefer to extract child-support payments from the wife and her new husband. If she quits her job, her new husband must take over the obligation.

What about the distribution of property? Assets should be divided according to whoever owned which assets before the marriage. In a legal system which establishes jointly owned property, which I think is the New Testament's norm—baptism's equality applied to capital—the deserted party should automatically receive half of the couple's assets.

What about alimony? The deserted party should receive half of the after-tax earned income generated by the deserter until such time as the deserted party remarries. This protects the deserted party. It also makes the deserter less capable of finding another spouse. Of course, if the state enforces capital punishment for the deserter's remarriage, this sanction should be sufficient to scare away a new partner.

If there are no sanctions, there is no law. The death penalty for the remarriage of the initiator of a no-trial divorce should always be an option for the divorced spouse to require. The New Testament's authorization of no-trial divorces must be accompanied by the civil sanction for adultery: the execution of both remarriage partners.

F. Continuity and Discontinuity in Biblical Law

On what judicial basis did Jesus annul the Mosaic laws of divorce and remarriage? On the basis of a change in the priesthood. Here is the New Testament's principle of judicial revision: "For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law" (Heb. 7:12). "So also Jesus glorified not himself to be made an high priest; but he that said unto him, Thou art my Son, to day have I begotten thee. As he saith also in another place, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec" (Heb. 5:5–6). Jesus, as both the son of God and the eternal high priest, possessed the God-given authority to change the Mosaic law.

The Mosaic law as a system died and was buried with Jesus. In this sense, those who argue for the complete annulment of the Mosaic law are correct. This took place at the crucifixion and burial of Jesus. Its visible sign was the top-to-bottom tearing of the curtain that separated the holy of holies from the world.

Jesus, when he had cried again with a loud voice, yielded up the ghost. And, behold, the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom; and the earth did quake, and the rocks rent; And the graves were opened; and many bodies of the saints which slept arose, And came out of the graves after his resurrection, and went into the holy city, and appeared unto many (Matt. 27:50–53).

What the defenders of total judicial discontinuity ignore is the judicial implication of bodily resurrection, which began, not with Jesus' resurrection, but with the resurrections of the saints around Jerusalem. This was a public declaration by God the Father that death is no longer universal in its authority. The ultimate sanction of God's law was no longer universal from that point forward. This raises a crucial point: there is no law without a sanction. When the sanction changes, the law also changes. Death had always been the Old Covenant law's representative sanction. "But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die" (Gen. 2:17). This resurrection of saints revealed a definitive break with the Old Covenant's legal order, including its sanctions.

Jesus proclaimed the permanence of the Mosaic law as a system. His death culminated with the perfect fulfillment of the law that He spoke about in Matthew 5:17–19. Immediately after His death, there was a complete discontinuity with the Old Covenant and its legal order: resurrection from the dead of corpses buried near Jerusalem. This mass resurrection announced the end of the Old Covenant, for it announced the definitive end of the older law's sanction: death.

Yet death still reigns. The form of the old sanction is with us still. Yet the legal order which originally imposed death was publicly overturned by the resurrection of the saints, and then confirmed by the resurrection of Christ. There is a legal order that still imposes the sanction of death. Conclusion: a new legal order was resurrected with Jesus, one which re-imposed the old sanction. There was a break with the Old Covenant law (discontinuity), yet there has been a re-imposition of law (continuity). Then in what way was there a meaningful discontinuity? By the permanent annulment of most of the Mosaic statutes. Not resurrected with Jesus Christ were the Mosaic land laws,²⁰ which pertained to Israel's geography, and the seed laws,²¹ which regulated Israel's tribal system. Also annulled were the laws of cleanliness and diet, which were associated with the priestly laws, sometimes called ceremonial laws.²² Resurrected with Christ were the cross-boundary laws,²³ sometimes called moral laws. These moral laws retain their binding nature, but are now laws of life as a result of the resurrection.

20. North, Boundaries and Dominion, Conclusion:C:1(a).

21. Ibid., Conclusion:C:1(b).

Death still reigns, which means that God's law still reigns. The old sanction is with us still because the old man in Adam is with us still. But there have been substantive changes in the legal order. There has been a radical discontinuity with the Mosaic law—as radical as the mass resurrection of dead bodies.

As surely as Jesus Christ's resurrected body was fundamentally different from the body that had been crucified, so is the law of God. The disciples did not recognize who He was on the road to Emmaus (Luke 24:16). Soon thereafter, He appeared without warning. "And as they thus spake, Jesus himself stood in the midst of them, and saith unto them, Peace be unto you. But they were terrified and affrighted, and supposed that they had seen a spirit" (Luke 24:36–37). Yet He looked the same. "Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself: handle me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have. And when he had thus spoken, he shewed them his hands and his feet" (Luke 24:39–40). His body had both continuity and discontinuity with history. As surely as Jesus still was recognizably Jesus after the meeting on the road to Emmaus, so is the law of God recognizable today. Jesus was still Jesus. The law is still the law. Yet there have been changes.

This same analysis also applies to redeemed men. There has been a definitive break with the old man of sin, Adam's doomed heir. "Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life" (Rom. 6:4). Yet these spiritually resurrected men look the same as they did before. There has been a definitive break with the old man, as surely as there has been a definitive break with the Old Covenant. What is true of redeemed men is also true of redeemed Mosaic laws. It is not that the law now gives life. It is that redemption's new life quickens the law. Definitive sanctification—God's transfer to each redeemed person of all of Jesus' moral perfection at the time of his redemption—produces progressive sanctification in history and final sanctification in eternity: victory over sin and death.²⁴

22. Ibid., Conclusion:C:2.

23. Ibid., Conclusion:C:3.

24. Chapter 10:A:1.

My analysis of the continuity and discontinuity in biblical law puts me in conflict with Greg Bahnsen's discussion of theonomy. I see a much greater discontinuity between the Mosaic laws of divorce and remarriage than he did. He, like Rushdoony, denied any discontinuity at all in the marriage laws. Therefore, I also see a problem in arguing for the continuity of the whole of biblical law. I see a fundamental judicial break at the resurrection, which was manifested by the public removal of the sanction of death.

G. A Critique of Bahnsen's Interpretation

Bahnsen agreed with Rushdoony's interpretation of the meaning of the bill of divorce, namely, that Jesus was challenging the views of the Pharisees, who were lax. Both men argued that Jesus was calling the Pharisees back to the Mosaic law. This argument, as I have shown, cannot be sustained logically or exegetically. Because Bahnsen rarely made logical errors—at least none that normal mortals could detect—I conclude that this error was theologically driven. He was so persuaded of the theological necessity of sustaining continuity of the Mosaic law in Matthew 5 that he refused to admit the obvious, namely, that Jesus annulled, repudiated, and generally smashed into smithereens the Mosaic law of divorce by bill of divorce.

Bahnsen wrote, "When we turn to the antithesis on divorce we again find no grounds for asserting that Jesus breaks with the outlook of God's inspired word."²⁵ Technically, this is correct, for Jesus Himself is God's inspired word (John 1:1). But this has nothing to do with the relevant theological issues of this text. The theological question for all schools of orthodox Christian interpretation is this: Which outlook of God's inspired word, revealed when? That is, does the continuity of God's outlook demand a continuity of laws? If it does, then there is no judicial discontinuity, and therefore no escape from every jot and tittle of the Mosaic law, including the priestly laws—a position that Bahnsen explicitly denied.²⁶

The primary theological issue for theonomists that is raised by Matthew 5:31–32 and 19:3–9 is whether Jesus broke with the Mosaic law on the twin issues of divorce by bill of divorcement and the divorced wife's lawful remarriage. This is the heart of the matter, hermeneutically speaking. Bahnsen not only refused to acknowledge this, he did his rhetorical best to deflect the reader's attention from the judicially related issues. He did not do this often, so when we find him doing it, we should pay close attention. Whenever we find Bahnsen deflecting the reader's attention away from an obvious theological issue raised by some text, focusing instead on other issues, we should assume that he was having a text-related problem with his hermeneutic. He never had any problem with logic.

25. Greg L. Bahnsen, Theonomy in Christian Ethics, 3rd ed. (Nacogdoches, Texas: Covenant Media Press, 2002), p. 99.

26. See Bahnsen's Preface to the Second Edition, p. xxiv.

1. Bahnsen and Rushdoony

Bahnsen adopted the same line of reasoning that Rushdoony did. He cited Rushdoony on the judicial issue of fornication as grounds for divorce: an essay that had been published in the never-completed Encyclopedia of Christianity (1972).²⁷ Bahnsen added this footnote after the first draft of the manuscript had been completed. We know this because he finished the first draft no later than the fall of 1971, at the age of 23. (How intelligent does that make you feel?) Rushdoony wrote the Foreword in October, 1971.²⁸ Publication was delayed by a combination of factors: a publisher who let the manuscript sit on his desk for over a year, and a typesetter who took over four years to typeset it.

Bahnsen wrote: "While some have alleged to find a repudiation of Older Testament morality here, in actuality it was the hardhearted and distorted interpretation put forward by the Pharisees that Jesus re-proved, not the law itself."²⁹ This was also Rushdoony's argument. The Pharisees were indeed hardhearted, but this was not the moral issue in Matthew 19:3–9. Jesus told the Pharisees what the moral issue was: Israelite men had been hardhearted from the beginning of the nation at Sinai, and God had written the Mosaic law to fit their moral condition. Hardhearted or not, no Israelite husband had broken God's revealed law by unilaterally divorcing his wife, presenting her with a bill of divorce, after she had lost favor in his eyes because of her uncleanness. Jesus ended this marital option for hardhearted, covenant-keeping men—not men in "an unregenerate state (Deut. 10:16)," as Bahnsen claimed.³⁰

Bahnsen continued: "It might be suggested that, while Jesus did not in any way relax the law, nevertheless He altered it by abrogating

27. Ibid., p. 111, footnote 34.

28. Ibid., pp. xi–xiv.

29. Idem.

30. Ibid., p. 104.

the alleged permissiveness of the Older Testament with respect to divorce.³¹ Not only might it be suggested, I am suggesting it. "The supposition is that by strengthening the law He contradicted the attitude of Moses."³² Jesus did not contradict the attitude of Moses, but He surely announced the end of God's toleration of hardhearted Israelite husbands, whose forefathers had vexed Moses for four decades.

"It is helpful to study the passages from Matthew 5 and 19 in connection with each other." This can indeed be helpful, but not all those who study these two passages reach the same conclusion. "Jesus there redressed this scribal abuse of Deuteronomy 24 and confirms the original teaching by God's holy law."³³ This is true regarding the original teaching of God's holy law, but it is not true with respect to the teaching of Deuteronomy 24:1–4, in which God softened His original law for the sake of Israelites' hard hearts. This was how Jesus explained the law of the bill of divorcement, and Bahnsen owed it to his readers to adjust the application of his judicial hermeneutic to this text.

At this point, we find Bahnsen using a debater's technique to deflect the reader's attention. I do not recall any other example comparable to it in his exegetical materials. "While Jesus stressed the hallowed nature of the marriage covenant, the scribes were more interested in the 'bill of divorcement' (which the Mosaic law mentioned only in passing) and the exception to God's creation ordinance."³⁴ Mentioned only in passing? The theonomic hermeneutic, more than any hermeneutic in the history of the church, has no judicial use for the concept of "mentioned only in passing." The bill of divorcement was there in the Mosaic law. The scribes quoted the text accurately to Jesus. The disciples also understood the magnitude of the change that Jesus was demanding by abolishing that divorce option. It shocked them. It stupefied them. "If the case of the man be so with his wife, it is not good to marry" (Matt. 19:10).

Bahnsen wrote: "From the very beginning God's law had taken a strict view of marriage."³⁵ This is what Jesus taught: "from the beginning it was not so" (Matt. 19:8b). Jesus was reimposing on covenant-keepers what had been God's original view, but which the Mosaic law had suspended as a legal requirement. Jesus was making it as plain

31. Ibid., pp. 99–100.

32. Ibid., p. 100.

33. Idem.

34. Ibid., pp. 100–1.

35. Ibid., p. 102.

as possible that the Mosaic law had been, in this instance, a temporary weakening of the original preference of God, and God would now require church and state to return to the law's original view. The New Testament's texts regarding divorce are clear. Jesus annulled, i.e., repudiated, a section of the Mosaic law: the bill of divorcement and the right of both of the ex-partners to remarry—and, as we shall see, the husband's right to be married to two women at the same time.

The Pharisees extracted from Jesus a public affirmation which, as they had hoped, repudiated a section of the Mosaic law. The issue textually is not whether He had repudiated the unbreakable nature of the Mosaic law. He did indeed break with the Mosaic law at this point. The decisive issue was His authority to do this. The primary public judicial issue of His entire ministry was point two of the biblical covenant model: authority. The Jews kept asking him: "By what authority do you break with the Mosaic law and not deserve judgment?" The Gospel of John makes this aspect of the confrontation clearer than the synoptic gospels do. The issue of authority came to the forefront because of point three: biblical law. It would be settled by point four: sanctions. Whose sanctions would prove determinative: the crucifixion or Jesus' judgment? Israel received a preliminary answer in A.D. 70.³⁶

2. Continuity and Intrusion

Bahnsen interpreted Matthew 5:17–19 as a defense of the continuity of God's moral law. I, too, hold this view. But, in Jesus' declaration regarding the bill of divorcement, He made it plain to His contemporaries that the Mosaic law contained an "intrusion," as Meredith Kline calls such judicial events, that was in fact a deviation from the original moral law of God. This is the implication of Jesus' phrase, "the hardness of your hearts." Jesus restored the original intent of the moral law of God by tightening the judicial categories governing divorce and remarriage. The disciples were as shocked at this revocation of the Mosaic law as the Pharisees were appalled . . . and no doubt pleased.

Bahnsen categorically denied such a view of the Mosaic law of divorce. Most important strategically, he did not comment on remarriage.

Thus far we have noted that a lax attitude toward divorce is not found in Jesus or the Older Testament but in the doctrine of the

36. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987).

Pharisees, that the Pharisees distorted the law (through inaccurate emphasis, quotation, and interpretation), that Jesus appealed to the Older Testament to substantiate His moral evaluation of divorce, and that He refuted any insinuation to the effect that He contravened one portion of the Older Testament by appealing to another portion.³⁷

Compare Bahnsen's argument, which denied any contrast between Jesus' view and the text of Deuteronomy 24:1–4, with Jesus' words of comparison.

And he answered and said unto them, Have ye not read, that he which made them at the beginning made them male and female, And said, For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife: and they twain shall be one flesh? Wherefore they are no more twain, but one flesh. What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder. They say unto him, Why did Moses then command to give a writing of divorcement, and to put her away? He saith unto them, Moses because of the hardness of your hearts suffered you to put away your wives: but from the beginning it was not so.

The key words are these: from the beginning it was not so.

Bahnsen refused to refer to the fact that a wife divorced by means of a bill of divorcement has the right to remarry. The judicial scope of this law cannot legitimately be confined to a consideration of the husband's means of divorce. It must extend to the lawful remarriage of a divorced wife. Bahnsen confined his discussion only to divorce. Here is the problem exegetically with his judicial approach. The sin of uncleanness was not a civil crime under the Mosaic law, although it was a moral infraction of some kind, though the Deuteronomic text does not say what it was. Therefore, the civil government could neither apply the capital sanction to her nor prevent the divorce from taking place. Neither could the church. Most important, another Israelite could lawfully marry her.

The law of Deuteronomy 24:1–4 dealt with a different judicial question entirely: a remarriage of the original partners after the second husband divorced her. This was illegal. Conclusion: it was easy for a man to obtain a divorce under the Mosaic law—so easy, that the Mosaic law dealt with a possible event relating to such a trial-free divorce: the future remarriage of the divorced partners. This, not the divorce or the wife's first remarriage, was illegal.

37. Bahnsen, Theonomy, p. 105.

The issue of lawful remarriage raises this crucial theological question: Did the Mosaic law subsidize criminal behavior? This was a crucial issue—judicially central to Deuteronomy 24—that Bahnsen refused to deal with. If the answer is no, then the woman's infraction was not a crime. Her uncleanness was surely minor when compared to adultery, bestiality, and other sexual crimes that required the death penalty. On the other hand, if the answer is yes, then theonomy's hermeneutic is in deep trouble. I would go so far as to say that it would be unsalvageable. It would make God the author of a new commandment: "Go, thou, and sin some more."

3. Judicial Maturation

In Matthew 5:31–32 and 19:3–9, Jesus established a fundamental judicial principle that should have been understood by the Pharisees: God's revealed law matured over time, from Adam to Jesus. The Mosaic law introduced an element of moral laxity—an intrusion—which Jesus identified specifically. Jesus introduced a more rigorous moral order for God's New Testament covenant people. This moral tightening affected the civil law.

A concept of maturing civil law was nothing new in Jesus' day. For example, there had been a Mosaic inheritance law governing rural land that had been distributed to the conquest generation (Lev. 25:10).³⁸ When God removed the Israelites from the land during the exile, the Israelites broke continuity with the Mosaic law governing the jubilee year and rural land ownership. The jubilee law of inheritance was replaced by a new law that opened landed inheritance to gentiles residing in Israel at the time of the return. "So shall ye divide this land unto you according to the tribes of Israel. And it shall come to pass, that ye shall divide it by lot for an inheritance unto you, and to the strangers that sojourn among you, which shall beget children among you: and they shall be unto you as born in the country among the children of Israel; they shall have inheritance with you among the tribes of Israel" (Ezek. 47:21–22). There was family discontinuity of inheritance because there had been a discontinuity of family dominion in the land during the exile. The gentile caretakers of the land were not to be evicted. Thus, there was both continuity (dominion over land) and discontinuity (tribal family title). Dominion had its reward: inheritance.

38. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 25.

Antinomians from Jesus' day until mine have argued that Jesus loosened or even repudiated the Mosaic law. He made it a lighter burden. He did, indeed, by strengthening His people by sending the Holy Spirit. Furthermore, biblical law for the redeemed strengthens them in their tasks of dominion, beginning with self-government. It was not that Jesus took away the heavy moral weights of God's biblical law. He added new weights, but He strengthened our lifting power. Bahnsen agreed with this view of empowering by the Holy Spirit.³⁹ But still he would not admit that, in the midst of his foundational hermeneutical passage, Matthew 5, Jesus introduced a view of divorce and remarriage that repudiated a Mosaic civil statute.

Why do I use the analogy of maturation? Because this was Paul's language. He compared certain details—the weak and beggarly elements (Gal. 4:9)—of the Mosaic law's authority over the Christian with the household tutors' authority over a minor son. This authority has ceased.

Now I say, That the heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be lord of all; But is under tutors and governors until the time appointed of the father. Even so we, when we were children, were in bondage under the elements of the world: But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, To redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father. Wherefore thou art no more a servant, but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God through Jesus (Gal. 4:1–7).

The Mosaic law unquestionably contained weak and beggarly elements. Bahnsen limited this phrase to the ceremonial law.⁴⁰ I do not. One of these weak and beggarly laws was the law of divorce by writ and the divorcer's right of remarriage, which was not ceremonial.

Bahnsen acknowledged discontinuity in the law, for he wrote in this section that "No word of God can be turned back except by divine

39. "Only the Holy Spirit of God can bring power to obey to the sinner, and that the Holy Spirit was received not by law-works but by faith" ([II Cor.] 3:2). Bahnsen, Theonomy, p. 134. "Because of the weakness of sinful human nature the law could not overcome sin's power, but in the believer the power of the Holy Spirit frees him from the power of sin unto death, thereby enabling him to accomplish what the law demands ([Rom.] 8:14)." Ibid., p. 136.

40. Greg L. Bahnsen, No Other Standard: Theonomy and Its Critics (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991), pp. 87–88. (<http://bit.ly/gbnos>) authority,"⁴¹ but for some reason, he resisted what I find an obvious revision of the Mosaic law, a revision that shocked the disciples because of its far-reaching implications for men's authority in marriage. This was no minor revision, they believed. I agree with them.

Why did Bahnsen resist judicial discontinuity at this point, yet not at others? I cannot ask him, but I can make an informed guess. The analytical and exegetical heart of his Th.M. thesis, as with the heart of Theonomy in Christian Ethics, was his exegesis of Matthew 5:17–19. He defended a jot-and-tittle continuity in terms of the meaning of the Greek word, plero-oh. What is the meaning of this word? Bahnsen said it means "to fulfill."⁴² But there can be many meanings here: end to, replace, supplement, obey, enforce, and confirm. Bahnsen offered a page of footnotes to cite examples.⁴³ He adopted "confirm" as the preferred translation.⁴⁴

In an appendix added after the original manuscript had been sent to the publisher, Bahnsen attacked Meredith G. Kline's book, The Structure of Biblical Authority (1972), in which Kline argued for a complete discontinuity between the Mosaic civil sanctions and the New Testament's silence regarding civil sanctions. In that book, Kline referred to a "revision which does not destroy but fulfills." Bahnsen went on the attack.

To "fulfill" a legal statute by altering it certainly does not conform to any of the usual senses of the word "fulfill"; to substitute one piece of legislation for another and then call this "fulfillment" amounts to making "fulfill" a substitute for "abrogate."⁴⁵

If Matthew 5:31–32 and Matthew 19:3–9 are a moral unit, which they are, then Jesus did to at least one Mosaic statute what Kline said that He did to all of the Mosaic penal sanctions: He fulfilled the whole of the Mosaic law, yet He abrogated a Mosaic statute. Bahnsen could not admit this without rewriting his book. He had based his entire judicial hermeneutic on the definition of "fulfill" as "establish," "confirm," or "ratify."⁴⁶ To provide a consistent, all-encompassing definition of "fulfill" in Matthew 5 that included "abrogate" in Mat-

41. Bahnsen, Theonomy, p. 116.

42. Ibid., p. 54.

43. Ibid., p. 55n.

44. Ibid., pp. 57 (citing Geerhardus Vos), 67 (along with "restore"), 70 (along with "establish"), 71–74, 87–88, 91, 94–95, 99, 103, 110, 120, 123, 141, 145, 154, 183–84.

45. Ibid., p. 555.

46. Ibid., ch. 2, especially pages 72–73.

thew 19 was too much for him in 1971. His hermeneutic needed additional work.⁴⁷ But he did not revise it over the next quarter century. He did not modify in any way his explanation of Matthew 5:17–19. He wrote in 1991, “It has sometimes been insinuated or explicitly charged by the critics of theonomic ethics that the position has been changed over the years—and changed so often or dramatically that we just cannot tell what theonomic ethics represents anymore. Such criticism is easier to speak than to substantiate. Indeed, it is simply a fabrication. And I should know. The essentials (and virtually all of the detailed argumentation) of the theonomic position have not been reversed, modified or changed in any significant way whatsoever.”⁴⁸

The idea of “confirm” is not far-fetched, but it is not the normal translation of plero-oh, which usually is translated as “fulfill.” The meaning of “fulfill” seems closer to the idea of completing than confirming. It means “bringing to a close.” It does not necessarily mean “abrogate.” A process may be multi-stage. This depends on context.

The word is often eschatological in intent. This is not to say that eschatology is separated from ethics. Far be it from a theonomic post-millennialist to make that conclusion! But eschatology can refer to Christ’s fulfilling both the ethical and liturgical requirements of the Mosaic law. The crucial question relates to the question of the timing of the fulfillment. What fulfills the Mosaic law? When was the Mosaic Law fulfilled, or when will it be fulfilled?

4. The Meaning of “Until”

Bahnsen could not escape dealing with a crucial phrase—indeed, the crucial phrase—for his apologetic. Verse 18 reads: “For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled.” As a defender of complete,

47. The development of a hermeneutic for covenant theology is still a pressing need for theonomists, as it is for non-theonomists, just as a reconciliation of systematic theology and biblical theology is a pressing need for every school of biblical interpretation. Somewhere out there in the misty no-man’s land in between Bahnsen and Jordan, we must seek both coherence and fruitfulness, just as we must seek both goals in the no-man’s land in between Charles Hodge and Geerhardus Vos. Bahnsen and Hodge stood on the solid but rocky ground of integrated systems, where it is always hard plowing, and the soil is historically thin. Jordan, like Vos, has always preferred to work in the luxuriant swamp, where, within a few months, everything is covered by the kudzu of multiperspectivalism. As for me, I prefer to do my plowing in the misty middle distance, using Sutton’s five-pointed plow. I cannot always see where I am going, but a crop comes in every year—sometimes several times a year.

48. Bahnsen, No Other Standard, p. 27.

unbreakable judicial continuity, Bahnsen concentrated on the use of the word, “until,” but only in the first clause: “till heaven and earth pass.” The problem that he faced, and never successfully dealt with exegetically, was judicial discontinuity. He acknowledged the existence of discontinuities. He even referred to some of the New Testament’s changes as radical.

What has been said above is simply that the presumption should be that an Old Testament law is binding in the New Testament. This does not in any way preclude or reject many radical differences between the Old and New Testaments. Changes do indeed come through the course of redemptive history, so that there certainly are exceptions to the general continuity that characterizes the relation between Old and New Covenants. God has the right to make alterations for the New Age. In the transition to this New Age we observe that advances are made over the Old Covenant, with some laws laid aside and some laws observed in a new fashion.⁴⁹

Here is a judicial hermeneutic that is accepted by most Christians. The heresies are in the details. So is orthodoxy.

The fact is, most of the Mosaic law was annulled—abrogated, if you prefer—by the New Testament. If we read the Book of Leviticus, we find that little of it is still binding, for it deals with the ceremonial law, or what I call priestly law. It also deals with Israel’s land laws and seed laws: inheritance. These tribal laws no longer are in force. I have already referred to this with regard to Ezekiel’s abrogation of the jubilee law of family inheritance.

How can the Bible-affirming commentator justify both Matthew 5:19 and the abrogation of most of the Mosaic law by the New Covenant? Only by developing a theological system that accounts for both the continuity and discontinuity of the jots and tittles. The alternative is to adopt some form of liberal theology that affirms contradictions in the Bible, or mistakes in the ministry of prophets, from Moses to Jesus.

Jesus provided the solution to this dilemma in the second part of verse 18: “until all be fulfilled.” The key word is “until.” This word establishes a temporal limit. For example, “And from the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force. For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John” (Matt. 11:12–13). The central question for Bahnsen’s version of theonomy is this: To what law-abrogating event does Matthew 5:18's temporal limit apply? There are three viable choices: the final judgment, the fall of Jerusalem, and the death of Jesus. The text reads: "For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled."

49. Greg L. Bahnsen, By This Standard: The Authority of God’s Law Today (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1985), p. 4. (<http://bit.ly/gnbt>)

Bahnsen insisted on the first application of "until," i.e., "till heaven and earth pass." He extended the time reference until the end of time: the final judgment.⁵⁰ "Every detail of God's law has abiding validity from the time of Christ's advent to the time of His return (i.e., the passing away of heaven and earth)."⁵¹ But this does not solve the exegetical problem of changes in the law, i.e., abrogation of most Mosaic laws, beginning with the ceremonial laws. Bahnsen insisted that there was a discontinuity with respect to the Mosaic ceremonial law. "The distinction must be drawn between ceremonial and moral laws, and one must recognize that the former's manner of observation is today altered."⁵² The Epistle to the Hebrews offers no alternative conclusion for an orthodox Christian commentator.

5. Abiding Validity

There had been major discontinuities in the Mosaic civil law before Christ's advent. An important one was the succession of the high priest. Bahnsen says that succession was from father to son, citing Nehemiah 12:10–11.⁵³ It is an odd passage to cite: "And Jeshua begat Joiakim, Joiakim also begat Eliashib, and Eliashib begat Joiada, And Joiada begat Jonathan, and Jonathan begat Jaddua." Also, the document is post-exilic. There is nothing in the Mosaic law that specifies that this office was hereditary. In fact, there is almost nothing in the Mosaic law regarding the duties of the high priest. Leviticus 21:10–15 is the main section, which establishes ritual boundaries around him. What the Mosaic law did specify was that at his death, every protected resident of a city of refuge could lawfully return home without threat from the blood avenger (Num. 35:25–28).⁵⁴ The death of the high priest meant liberation for the man convicted of accidental manslaughter.

50. Bahnsen, Theonomy, pp. 79–80.

51. Ibid., p. 311.

52. Ibid., p. 210.

53. Ibid., p. 397.

54. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 21.

In Paul's day, this office was held on a rotating basis. Speaking of Caiaphas, the gospel of John reads: "And this spake he not of himself: but being high priest that year, he prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation" (John 11:51). His father-in-law, Annas, sometimes held the office (Acts 4:6). So, the likelihood that a high priest would die in office was remote. A very old man or very sick man would not be appointed. Thus, the law governing cities of refuge would have been undermined. Under gentile rulers, it is unlikely that the system survived the Israelites' return to the land.

Bahnsen's problem was always this: How can we account for any judicial discontinuity at all? He did not solve this problem over the next quarter century. He needed to provide a definition and explanation of his phrase, abiding validity, as in: "Every detail of God's law has abiding validity from the time of Christ's advent to the time of His return (i.e., the passing away of heaven and earth)."⁵⁵ This was the title of Chapter 2: "The Abiding Validity of the Law in Exhaustive Detail." Yet he never defined the phrase, either logically or exegetically. His definition and explanation needed to be consistent with the thesis of jot-and-tittle continuity that he presented in Chapter 2. This was the most important chapter he ever wrote. It was the fulcrum of his life's work, including his enormous output of personal letters written in defense of theonomy. If "abiding" means "to remain constant over time, including today," then what does "validity" mean? This is the word that he never defined. He spent all of his effort in defending "abiding," and virtually none on "validity." I ask: In what way is everything that has abided—which he says is everything—also valid? What, in fact, has abided? Many things have not abided, such as the details of the ceremonial law. Then in what way is some aspect of the annulled ceremonial law still valid? This is the central issue of his hermeneutical system, yet he never addressed it directly.

I must admit that about half the time, I do not understand what James Jordan is writing about, and most of what I do understand I forget within an hour. I have always had the same problem with the writings of Geerhardus Vos. Vos and Jordan are involved in an academically arcane quest to discover in obscure biblical texts, and texts that the rest of us really did not imagine were all that obscure, the continuity of non-obvious authoritative meaning, including the meaning of symbols. Bahnsen rarely quoted Vos and was hostile to what Jordan calls "interpretative maximalism," yet what biblical theology is really all about is a search for continuity in the face of what appears to be textual discontinuity. In the negative aspect of their apologetic task, biblical theologians counter humanistic higher critics of the Bible, who substitute a theory of late-date scribal forgeries for a theory of divine inspiration.⁵⁶

55. Bahnsen, Theonomy, p. 311.

Jesus said that something remained constant (Matt. 5:17–19). What, exactly, did He have in mind? Bahnsen never made this clear. Some Mosaic laws were annulled long before Jesus Christ's advent. Which ones? Bahnsen did not mention these. Some laws were annulled by Jesus' teaching. Which ones? (One of them was the law of divorce by writ and remarriage.) Bahnsen did not mention these. After Christ's resurrection, other laws were changed. Which laws? Ceremonial laws, Bahnsen admitted. I would add land laws and seed laws. Then how can judicial continuity be true, from Moses through the prophets to the crucifixion, and from the resurrection to today? For all of its detail and logic, Theonomy in Christian Ethics does not deal explicitly with this crucial hermeneutical problem by discussing the discontinuities in terms of some underlying judicial continuity. Was there some other form of continuity? If so, does this imply that the jots and tittles have not been constant judicially, but only symbolically or in some other way? Bahnsen argued for jot-and-tittle judicial continuity, yet he also admitted ceremonial discontinuity. He never reconciled the two positions, either logically or exegetically. Yet this is the hermeneutical problem for Bahnsen's thesis, as well as for every system of Christian ethics that begins with Matthew 5, as all of them should.

He needed to explain this phrase: in passing. It appeared in the context of his discussion of the issue of divorce and remarriage, which he discussed only in terms of divorce. Bahnsen wrote: "While Jesus stressed the hallowed nature of the marriage covenant, the scribes were more interested in the 'bill of divorcement' (which the Mosaic law mentioned only in passing) and the exception to God's creation ordinance."⁵⁷ Here is the hermeneutical problem: there is no room for "in passing" in Bahnsen's apologetic in Chapter 2, i.e., no change of either a jot or a tittle. He also needed to explain a Mosaic law that was an exception to God's creation ordinance: divorce by writ. How is such an intrusion ethically possible? What principle of interpretation permits such an intrusion? Is it consistent with the principle of interpretation

56. North, Boundaries and Dominion, Appendix H.

57. Bahnsen, Theonomy, pp. 100–1.

governing Chapter 2?

6. The Crucifixion and Judicial Fulfillment

The theological solution to the exegetical dilemma of Matthew 5:17–19 is found in verse 18: the second use of “until.” Jesus’ words announced the imminence of His personal fulfillment of the Mosaic law, and therefore its complete, unreserved annulment at the moment of its fulfillment: His death. Jesus was not looking to the passing of heaven and earth as the temporal boundary of the Mosaic law, i.e., the temporal application of “until.” He was instead looking to His own death, which would be the temporal limit of His subjection to the Mosaic law and its ultimate sanction, death. The continuity of no jot or tittle was guaranteed after this perfect fulfillment.

After His resurrection, lots of jots and tittles of the Mosaic law remained in the grave, judicially speaking. From the wrapping of His body in swaddling clothes until the wrapping of His body in a death shawl, Jesus kept the Mosaic law perfectly. But He also taught against it as a permanently binding principle, i.e., binding on His followers beyond His resurrection. Like the element of death that Jesus’ body had been subjected to, so were what Paul called “the weak and beggarly elements” of the Mosaic law (Gal. 4:9).

Bahnsen was aware of this approach to solving the problem of judicial discontinuity, which is ultimately the discontinuity of the two covenants. He resorted to grammar to counter this argument. He said that the word “until” applies in the second phrase to the Greek word for “all”: panta. It is neuter; Nomos (law) is masculine. He said that “all” does not refer to the law.⁵⁸ Worse; he did not offer any suggestion as to what panta referred, if not the law. On this thin strand of reasoning, he rested his entire case for theonomy.

He rejected the suggestion of W. D. Davies—which is my view—that “until all be fulfilled” refers to Jesus’ death on the cross. Bahnsen rejected several other similar suggestions, all referring to Jesus’ work on earth. He dismissed them all with these words: “Nothing in the context of Matthew 5:18 warrants the introduction of speculative meaning; . . .”⁵⁹ This is a debater’s tactic when the debater runs into trouble. Of course the theological dilemma does not have its origin in the text of Matthew 5:18. It has its origin in case after case in which Jesus announced a change in the Mosaic law. It is found in Paul's phrase, "weak and beggarly elements."

58. Ibid., p. 80.

59. Idem.

Bahnsen dismissed the explanation of "until" as applying to Jesus' ministry with a favorite pejorative word of a theologian who faces an interpretation that he rejects: "eisegesis" (to read into). "All these variations only demonstrate the inevitable results of eisegesis—or the exegesis of one's theological scheme in the name of exegeting a biblical text. . . ." ⁶⁰ Problem: when two texts in the same document say completely different things, we have only two conclusions available: (1) the document in which the texts appear is inconsistent, or (2) there is a broader explanation that reconciles the two texts. This reconciliation is called, in Christian circles, a theological scheme. In short, theological schemes are inescapable concepts. It is never a question of "theological schemes vs. no theological schemes." It is always a question of which theological scheme to adopt.

Chapter 2 of Theonomy in Christian Ethics is probably the most thoroughgoing presentation of covenantal judicial continuity in the history of the church. But its logic does not offer any way to explain the obvious discontinuity between the Mosaic Covenant, which was part of the Old Covenant, and the New Covenant. The jots and tittles of most of the Mosaic law-order are gone for good. The church has always insisted on this. The texts of the New Testament also insist on this. Bahnsen's explanation of Matthew 5:17–19 is incomplete. His discussions of judicial discontinuities between the covenants, whether in Theonomy in Christian Ethics or in subsequent works, were not reconciled with his apologetic/hermeneutic of jot-and-tittle continuity in Chapter 2. He insisted that Jesus taught that this continuity would last until judgment day. But it did not last through the Gospel of Matthew. "They say unto him, Why did Moses then command to give a writing of divorcement, and to put her away? He saith unto them, Moses because of the hardness of your hearts suffered you to put away your wives: but from the beginning it was not so. And I say unto you, Whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery: and whoso marrieth her which is put away doth commit adultery" (Matt. 19:7–9).

I realize that this is a very brief response to Bahnsen's long defense of theonomy. But it is a response based on an unresolved dilemma within Theonomy in Christian Ethics: the book's admitted exceptions to what can be called jot-and-tittle continuity. These discontinuities never received a sufficient hermeneutical explanation in terms of judicial continuity, which is verbally absolute in Matthew 5:19. "Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven: but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven." There is a missing piece in Bahnsen's hermeneutic. This missing piece is an explanation of the temporal limit on the Mosaic law, a limit based on the second application of "until," not the first. When Jesus fulfilled the entire Mosaic law by going to the cross as an innocent man, and therefore as an acceptable sacrifice to God, He buried the Mosaic law-order forever. What was resurrected with Him was the New Covenant's law-order. Unlike the Old Covenant, this one is written in the heart of every Christian (Heb. 8:6–10): conscience. This law-order, like the Old Covenant's law-order, is a tool of dominion.

60. Idem.

Among the weak and beggarly elements of the now-interred Mosaic law are the laws governing divorce and remarriage through unilateral writ. Jesus was clear about the hardness of the hearts of Israelite husbands. His annulment of the law of divorce by writ was an implication of the new hearts of the redeemed, male and female. When Jesus extended to wives the right of divorce by writ, He removed the original justification of these writs: the hardness of men's hearts—not, by the way, women's hearts. He gave to women the legal authority that Joseph had possessed over Mary: the right, in justice, to put her away privately for her presumed uncleanness, but without appealing to a civil or ecclesiastical court. This would have been an act of mercy on Joseph's part, had the Holy Ghost not been the cause of her pregnancy. But, to make sure that future acts of similar mercy are truly acts of mercy rather than acts of spite, or worse, acts of concealed lust for a future replacement spouse, Jesus also imposed a new restriction: the prohibition against any future marriage by the writer of the writ.

There is no example in the New Testament that is stronger in contrasting the New Testament's version of theonomy with the Mosaic law. Jesus made it clear in Mark 10:2–12 that Deuteronomy 24:1–4 was an intrusion in the development of theonomy. It represented neither the pre-Mosaic legal standard, which was morally higher, nor the New Testament standard, which is morally higher. This statute was a judicial discontinuity that had been based on a moral flaw among Israelite husbands. Therefore, a biblically sound hermeneutic for theonomy must recognize the existence of at least one Mosaic law as a judicial intrusion. This hermeneutic must be formulated in such a way that this specific intrusion is dealt with consistently by the general principle of judicial interpretation. This means, to put it starkly, that whatever Jesus meant by the unchanging validity of every jot and tittle of the Mosaic law (Matt. 5:18), this statute is no longer to be enforced. This is a hermeneutical challenge to every school of biblical interpretation that affirms the infallibility of Scripture.

H. Monogamy and Sanctions Against Remarriage

We now return to the issue of polygamy in the New Covenant.⁶¹ Jesus established a principle of biblical justice in the area of divorce and remarriage: gender equality before the law. This principle also governed the Mosaic law in most cases. "One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you" (Ex. 12:49).⁶² An exception was the law of unilateral divorce. Only husbands had possessed this right. What had been authorized solely to husbands by Moses under the Old Covenant has been extended to wives by Jesus under the New Covenant.

By not announcing the annulment of divorce by execution for adultery, Jesus hermeneutically implied the continuing authority of the Mosaic civil sanction: the legal status of adultery for any subsequent marriage by a spouse who initiates a no-trial divorce. Neither a husband nor a wife who initiates a no-trial divorce is ever allowed to remarry. Jesus made this clear. "And in the house his disciples asked him again of the same matter. And he saith unto them, Whosoever shall put away his wife, and marry another, committeth adultery against her. And if a woman shall put away her husband, and be married to another, she committeth adultery" (Mark 10:10–12).

Under the Mosaic law, gender inequality was basic to the law of divorce and remarriage. Not so in the New Covenant. If this argument is accurate, then a conclusion necessarily follows: polygamy is illegal. The husband in the Old Covenant could have multiple wives. The Mosaic law governing the inheritance left by a deceased polygamous father (Deut. 21:15–17) appears immediately following the law governing the divorce of a captive wife (Deut. 21:10–14). A polygamous man could divorce one wife, yet still retain the benefits of an existing marriage.

61. Chapter 3.

62. North, Authority and Dominion, Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 14.

When Jesus announced the same negative sanction—no remarriage—for those who initiate a no-trial divorce, He established judicial equality for husbands and wives. In order for judicial inequality not to resurface in the biblical law of divorce and remarriage, neither the husband nor the wife should suffer less from the sanction. If a husband has two or more wives, and he divorces one of them, he has a major advantage over a wife who initiates a no-trial divorce, but who can never lawfully remarry. There are only two ways to establish judicial equality under such marital conditions: either criminalize polygamy or legalize polyandry.

There have been very few societies in history that have legalized polyandry. A wife with multiple husbands creates confusion: confusion regarding which children belong to which man, and confusion regarding which husband she must obey. A wife is required by God to serve her husband as his subordinate. This removes polyandry as a legal option. But if polyandry is not an option, then neither is polygamy. To argue otherwise is to argue for sexual inequality with respect to the prohibition against remarriage by the initiators of no-trial divorce.

Conclusion

I have come to the conclusion that no-trial divorce was authorized by Jesus, though only in the legal context of deadly fault remarriage. The reason why I regard the person who initiates a no-trial divorce as being prohibited from remarrying is because I uphold the principle of victim's rights. If innocent spouses are not to be penalized for the sins of their marriage partners, then there must be some way for the innocent partner to gain a lawful divorce apart from any negative legal sanctions. There are three ways: divorce by execution, divorce for the partner's fornication, and divorce because the other partner has deserted. As I wrote earlier, divorce by desertion is in fact a no-trial unilateral divorce. The innocent spouse is allowed to remarry, but the initiator is not.

Jesus explicitly prohibited remarriage for a spouse who initiates a divorce. So, He had to have two kinds of divorce in mind: trial and no-trial. This difference is marked by the word, "except." "And I say unto you, Whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery: and whoso marrieth her which is put away doth commit adultery.”

God authorized no-trial divorce for men in Deuteronomy 24:1. He did this because of the hardness of the Israelite males’ hearts. What Jesus did was to extend this right of no-trial divorce to wives. He also took away the right of remarriage from anyone who initiates and gains a no-trial divorce.

Jesus annulled the Mosaic laws of divorce and remarriage. He equalized the law of no-trial divorce, husband vs. wife. Either party, not just the husband, now has the legal right to initiate a no-trial divorce. No court can lawfully overrule this decision.

Jesus also tightened the law of remarriage by prohibiting the remarriage of the partner who initiates and gains a no-trial divorce. Jesus identified such remarriage as adulterous. He did not annul the Mosaic law of adultery, which included the death penalty, imposed at the discretion of the victimized spouse.

This gender equalization of both the authorization of no-trial divorce and the penalty against remarriage implies that polygamy is prohibited in the New Testament era. A divorcing husband who has multiple wives will not suffer so much as a divorcing wife will suffer from the prohibition against remarriage. If the threat of this negative sanction is to be equal, sexually speaking, then the legal condition must be equal. This legal condition is monogamy.

Those Christians who proclaim “no divorce allowed” necessarily deny the principle of victim’s rights. The victimized ex-spouse is thereby penalized by the sinner. The victim is nevertheless required to live with the sinner.

Those who proclaim “divorce, but no remarriage” also necessarily deny the principle of victim’s rights. The victimized spouse is thereby penalized by the sinner. The victim is not allowed to remarry.

The New Testament allows no-trial divorce, but only under the assumption of the civil government’s enforcement of deadly fault remarriage for the divorce’s initiator. These closely related civil laws are grounded on the principle of victim’s rights.

This analysis of no-trial divorce does not annul the Mosaic principle of divorce by execution. It also does not abandon the theonomic principle that the judicial content of Mosaic laws and sanctions still prevails under the New Covenant unless the New Testament has annulled or revised them, either explicitly or by implication. When Jesus defined as adulterous any remarriage by the initiator of a no-trial divorce, He identified such remarriage as a capital crime. This places both remarriage partners at the mercy of the divorced spouse: victim's rights.

In the case of divorce and remarriage, both the annulment and the revision of the Mosaic law governing no-trial divorce are explicit in the New Testament. In the case of the ban on polygamy, the annulment of the Mosaic law is implicit: an application of the New Testament's law prohibiting the remarriage of a divorce-initiating spouse after a no-trial divorce. The New Testament's legal principle of gender equality before the law makes polygamy illegal. This principle applies to the civil law governing divorce as well as ecclesiastical law.

If I am incorrect in my reasoning in this essay, then it is imperative for Christian theologians to present a New Testament case for the church's prohibition of polygamy for men who are not church officers. It is also imperative that they find justification for civil laws against polygamy. An explicit prohibition appears nowhere in the New Testament, except for church officers—a fact that theologians and ethicists prefer to ignore.

Did Jesus annul a Mosaic law? Yes. On whose authority? His own, as high priest. With a change in the priesthood comes a change in God's law (Heb. 7:12). This did not satisfy the Jews. They had Him crucified by the Romans. By doing this, they brought an end to the Old Covenant order. This was the fulfillment of the Mosaic law, the definitive passing away of heaven and earth: the Old Covenant. His resurrection confirmed this passing away. So did His ascension, when, as high priest, He passed into the heavens (Heb. 4:14). The progressive passing away of heaven and earth took place in the era of the apostles: the last days (Acts 2:16–20). The final passing away of heaven and earth took place at the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70: the days of vengeance (Luke 21:20–28).⁶³ The unitary, integrated system of jots and tittles that constituted the Mosaic law passed away. The priestly Mosaic laws, the tribal land laws of inheritance, and the tribal seed laws of inheritance ended, which included the bill of divorcement.

63. Chilton, Days of Vengeance.

Appendix B

ECONOMIC VALUE AND IMPUTATION

And God saw every thing that he had made, and, behold, it was very good. And the evening and the morning were the sixth day (Gen. 1:31).

A. Value and Price

An enduring question of economic theory is this: “How is price related to value?” Prices are objective: so much of this buys so much of that. But is economic value also objective? Competing answers to this question have divided economists from the beginning of the discipline. This is why the question is enduring. Humanistic economists cannot answer it. This is because the question of value and price is an application of a larger philosophical question, which is also unanswerable by humanism: the subject-object relationship.

To clarify the nature of the problem of value theory in economics, I employ an analogy based on another application of value theory. A wife asks: “Do you love me?” Her husband dutifully answers: “Of course I do.” She presses the issue: “How much do you love me?” He answers: “A lot.” She continues: “Do you love me more than you used to love your ex-girlfriend?” He replies: “Yes, I do.” So far, we are still in the realm of subjective value.

She presses the issue. “You used to be wild about her. I remember. You don’t act very wild about me. Do you love me more now than you loved her back then?” This raises the question of the permanence of value scales over time. The problem is, these scales of value change. Also, we forget what they were, and how intensely they registered with us. A truth-telling husband may reply: “I just don’t remember.” Or he may say, “I love you more now than I loved her back then,” mentally defining “love” to make the statement true. But how can he be sure what he felt back then? His memory has faded, along with his passion.

This is the philosophical problem of subjective valuation through time. No one possesses a permanent subjective value scale that measures changes in one's temporal subjective value scale—no one except Jesus Christ. As we shall see, His value scale is what makes the epistemological difference in the theory of economic value.

Next, she moves to objective value. “Exactly how much more do you love me than you used to love her?” Now he faces a dilemma, both personal and epistemological. She has moved from a consideration of his subjective scale of values to an objective measure of subjective value. Here is his epistemological dilemma: there is no objective measure of subjective value. A subjective value scale is ordinal—first, second, third—rather than cardinal, i.e., “exactly this much more.” Subjective values are ranked, not measured.¹

A wise husband with a knowledge of the Bible might try to end the discussion by saying, “I love you more than rubies.” Solomon said something like this. “Who can find a virtuous woman? for her price is far above rubies” (Prov. 31:10). But even Solomon did not say exactly how much above rubies her price is.

Solomon was very wise.

Economists are not equally wise. They have embroiled their discipline with epistemological questions of objective vs. subjective value. They have raised questions that they cannot answer.

B. Economic Value Theory in Humanistic Economics

Ever since the subjectivist epistemological revolution of economics in the early 1870s, economists have developed a widely shared explanation for how economic value changes. This explanation rests on men's subjective imputation of economic value. The modern economist's approach to the problem of economic value begins with a presupposition based on introspection: “Every rational person has an individual scale of values by which he evaluates his specific, constantly changing circumstances.” This scale is hierarchical: first, second, third, etc. It is also subject to change. This hierarchical value scale enables a man to evaluate—impute value to—scarce resources² at any point in time. He compares the usefulness of various scarce resources in terms of his personal scale of values. Then he decides to buy, keep, or sell specific assets. He seeks to improve his circumstances by offering to exchange assets that he owns for assets that he desires to rent, own, or re-sell. The competing bids of owners and would-be owners establish objective prices in the market place. This bidding process, says the modern economist, is how men's subjective values become objective prices.

1. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State: A Treatise on Economic Principles, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), ch. 1:5:A. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardMES>)

2. A scarce resource is defined as follows: at zero price, there is greater demand for it than supply.

What distinguishes modern economic theory (post-1870) from pre-modern economic theory is the modern economist's formal denial of the existence of objective value. This formal assertion of pure subjectivism is an example of an entire profession's self-delusion. One or another theory of objective value is sneaked into economics through an epistemological back door.

One example of the reappearance of objective value theory is the supposedly scientific justification for the establishment of any social policy through civil government. Policy-makers must decide on the appropriateness of a specific policy on the basis of a law's supposed benefits and costs to certain groups within society. Some members of some groups will win; others will lose. Economists insist that they can help policy-makers make this decision by providing a scientific cost-benefit analysis. This assertion is logically inconsistent with subjectivism's epistemology. If economic value is exclusively subjective, then there is no way to calculate group benefits and costs. There is no way, in other words, to make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility.³ The validity of a phrase such as Jeremy Bentham's "greatest good for the greatest number" rests on at least three assumptions: (1) the existence of aggregate objective value; (2) the policy-maker's ability to discover this aggregate objective value; and (3) the policy-maker's ability to design legislative programs that will maximize aggregate objective value. Economists formally begin with a theory of exclusively subjective individual valuation, but whenever they seek to assess the comparative outcomes of one social policy vs. another, they necessarily must adopt an informal theory of aggregate objective valuation.⁴ Only

3. Lionel Robbins, An Essay on the Nature and Significance of Economic Science, rev. ed. (London: Macmillan, 1935), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/RobbinsEcon>) rarely are they even aware of this subtle reintroduction of objective value theory. They do not offer any epistemological justification for this shift. In short, economists initially assume that they can do what their epistemology says cannot be done, and then they refuse to admit either to themselves or to other policy-makers what they have done.

4. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 012) ch. 5; North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), Appendix M.: "The Epistemological Problem of Social Cost." This appendix became The Coase Theorem: A Study in Epistemology (Tyler,

Another example of objective value theory in operation is the construction of a price index. A price index is believed to measure price changes over time. The index aggregates specific price changes. This enables the economist to observe rates of change in what he calls "the price level." This is a convenient fiction in the theoretical world of subjectivist epistemology. An engineer can measure the water level in a bathtub, but a commodity's price is not physical, unlike a drop of water. There is no bathtub of commodity prices. A price index is a subjective mental construct that is believed by policy-makers and most economists to convey objectively useful information about changes in specific objective prices. The price index is based on statistical samples of reported prices of supposedly representative goods and services. This statistical index is a substitute for all prices, the number of which approaches infinity as a limit.

A price index is constructed on the basis of an economist's subjective weighing of the subjective evaluations (scientifically unknowable) by "customers in general" (scientifically unknowable) of the prices of a sample group of commodities and services (a "basket of goods"). Even the term "weighing" is artificial: we do not literally weigh value. To assign a "weight" to a commodity is a subjective assessment of comparative subjective importance for customers. I ask: Which specific groups of customers are most representative of all customers? Are these groups of customers representative permanently? Do their tastes change over time? Does any unchanging "basket of goods" retain the same importance to these representative customers if their tastes change over time? If it doesn't retain the same importance, then how can an earlier basket of goods be compared with a later basket? None of these questions can be answered scientifically apart from the presupposition of measurable value. But there is no objective measure of subjective value, according to modern economic theory.

Economists rarely discuss these obvious discrepancies from the profession's nearly universal assumption of subjective value theory.⁵

Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1992). Coase never responded. As of 2012, he is still writing at age 101.

5. I say "nearly universal" because Marxist economists still officially adhere to ob-

When they do offer a theory that is said to overcome the subjective-objective dualism of economic value theory, the vast majority of their colleagues ignore them. Those few economists who do not ignore them probably disagree with them. Humanistic economists are as trapped by the subject-object dualism of all humanist thought as are the members of every other academic discipline.

C. Economic Value Theory in Christian Economics

Christian economics must view the individual's subjective imputation of economic value as analogical to God's imputation of value. The best example in the Bible of this process of divine imputation is Genesis 1, where God announces at the end of each day that His work is good. He announces subjectively that which is objectively true. There is perfect correspondence between subjective value and objective value in the correspondence between God's objective work and His subjective imputation. In the triune God of the Bible is the reconciliation of the subject-object dualism. What God does originally and creatively, man does analogically and re-creatively.⁶ Each individual does this either as a covenant-keeper or a covenant-breaker.

God does not choose between this or that scarce economic resource. Nothing is scarce for God. But God does establish standards of economic value for decision-makers. God tells men what is valuable and what is not. "For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" (Mark 8:36).

Because of sin, covenant-breakers do not adopt God's mandated standard of economic value as their own. They impute high value to that which is not highly valuable, and vice versa. Men in their rebellion against God substitute covenant-breaking individual subjective scales of economic value for the unitary, objective scale of economic value that God has established for mankind corporately and also for individuals. Covenant-breaking men reject God's values. God warns them: "For my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the LORD" (Isa. 55:8). The proper response is King David's: "Shew me thy ways, O LORD; teach me thy paths. Lead me in thy truth, and teach me: for thou art the God of my salvation; on thee do I wait all the day" (Ps. 25:4-5). "I thought on my ways, and turned my jective value theory, i.e., Marx's labor theory of value.

6. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 5.

feet unto thy testimonies. I made haste, and delayed not to keep thy commandments" (Ps. 119:59–60).

Covenant-breakers seek to legislate objective reality on the basis of their own authority by means of their subjective imputations of subjective value. Every covenant-breaker is a self-proclaimed autonomous evaluator who seeks to impose his own subjective values. Among covenant-breakers, there is no common scale of economic value, either subjective or objective, except for the one that they have stolen from God, in whose image they are made, and from whose constant testimony against them they cannot escape. Men's presumed autonomy leads to theories of ethical and aesthetic relativism. It also leads to conflicts over values, which include economic value.

There is no unitary humanistic scale of economic value that can serve as either the basis of, or a measure of, objective economic value. God alone provides the definitive scale of objective economic value that can serve men as a consistent epistemological and ethical basis of their subjective economic valuations. It is God, and only God, who establishes objective economic value. He is the absolutely sovereign Creator and Sustainer of the world. He is therefore the absolutely sovereign subjective Imputer of economic value. In the triune God of the Bible alone is a consistent solution to humanism's subject-object dualism, and therefore also the dualism of subjective and objective economic value.

Conclusion

Value theory is both subjective and objective. Economists prior to 1870 emphasized objective value. Economists after 1870 (Marxists excepted) have emphasized subjective value. But economists sneak an element of objective value back into their theories.⁷ On the one hand, they deny that it is possible for an economist or anyone else to make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. On the other hand, every economist must assume that such comparisons are valid in order to construct price indexes or to make policy recommendations. There is no way logically for economists to explain objective value in terms of subjective value, or vice versa; nevertheless, they speak, write, and act as though their theory of autonomous acting man did allow this, even though in theory, they admit that it doesn't.

7. An exception was Israel Kirzner, who retained his commitment to pure subjectivism. I recall no case where he made a policy recommendation.

Christian economics offers a solution to the subject-object anti-nomy of all humanistic economics: God's subjective imputation of value to His objectively valuable creation. Man is made in God's image. Man therefore possesses the ability and the responsibility to impute economic value to aspects of God's creation. Each imputation will not match God's, but the standard is Jesus Christ's imputation in His nature as perfect humanity. "But we have the mind of Christ" (I Cor. 2:16b). Each covenant-keeper's progressive sanctification leads him closer to this performance standard.

Appendix C

ADAM SMITH'S THEORY OF ECONOMIC CAUSATION

For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out. And having food and raiment let us be therewith content. But they that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all evil: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows. But thou, O man of God, flee these things; and follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness (I Tim. 6:7–11).

Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not highminded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy; That they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate; Laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life (I Tim. 6:17–19).

A. The God of Moralism

In his first published book, The Theory of Moral Sentiments (1759), Adam Smith was careful not to deny either the benefits or the impulse of charitable giving. He devoted the final chapter of the book to a consideration “of universal Benevolence.” But his analysis of charity rested entirely on his unitarian theology, which is no longer in favor among economists. I call it unitarian because his god was not the God of redemption through faith in Christ. His god was a god of moralism.

The eighteenth-century Scottish Enlightenment was developed by members of Scotland’s Presbyterian Church, but they were liberals, rightfully called latitudinarians.¹ Two of the movement’s founders were sons of Presbyterian ministers: Gershom Carmichael (1672–1729) and Francis Hutcheson (1694–1746), the two predecessors of Adam Smith as professors of moral philosophy at Glasgow University. Carmichael's father had been exiled from Scotland for heresy.² Another founder of the Scottish Enlightenment was the philosopher, David Hume. He was a philosophical skeptic, but he did maintain membership in the church, although he came close to being excommunicated.³

1. Murray N. Rothbard, Economic Thought Before Adam Smith: An Austrian Perspective on the History of Economic Thought, 2 vols. (Brookfield, Vermont: Edward El-

When Smith was awarded the chair in moral philosophy at Glasgow in 1752, he was required to affirm his commitment to the Westminster Confession of Faith (1647), the most detailed and rigorous Calvinistic confession in history. Yet there is no trace of Calvin's theology in anything that Smith wrote. Smith's concept of God was indistinguishable from unitarianism's doctrine of god: a god who does not bring negative sanctions in history, a god of universal benevolence. He called on all men to believe in this god. In 1759, he wrote,

This universal benevolence, how noble and generous soever, can be the source of no solid happiness to any man who is not thoroughly convinced that all the inhabitants of the universe, the meanest as well as the greatest, are under the immediate care and protection of that great, benevolent, and all-wise Being, who directs all the movements of nature; and who is determined, by his own unalterable perfections, to maintain in it, at all times, the greatest possible quantity of happiness. To this universal benevolence, on the contrary, the very suspicion of a fatherless world, must be the most melancholy of all reflections; from the thought that all the unknown regions of infinite and incomprehensible space may be filled with nothing but endless misery and wretchedness. All the splendour of the highest prosperity can never enlighten the gloom with which so dreadful an idea must necessarily over-shadow the imagination; nor, in a wise and virtuous man, can all the sorrow of the most afflicting adversity ever dry up the joy which necessarily springs from the habitual and thorough conviction of the truth of the contrary system.⁴

The existence of such a god is basic to the preservation of benevolence among men. Smith insisted that it must not be left to men to extend systematic benevolence on their own authority. God must preserve benevolence among fallen men, even as Newton had hypothesized God's direct intervention in maintaining the orbits of the planets gar, 1995), I, pp. 423–25, 440.

2. Ibid., I, p. 417.

3. Ibid., I, p. 425.

4. Theory of Moral Sentiments, VI:III:III.

in order to preserve their order—a suggestion that Leibniz challenged in private correspondence during Newton's lifetime, and which Newton's followers abandoned entirely after his death in 1727. Smith ended the book with a warning against trusting in the benevolence of men.

The administration of the great system of the universe, however, the care of the universal happiness of all rational and sensible beings, is the business of God and not of man. To man is allotted a much humbler department, but one much more suitable to the weakness of his powers, and to the narrowness of his comprehension; the care of his own happiness, of that of his family, his friends, his country: that he is occupied in contemplating the more sublime, can never be an excuse for his neglecting the more humble department; and he must not expose himself to the charge which Avidius Cassius is said to have brought, perhaps unjustly, against Marcus Antoninus; that while he employed himself in philosophical speculations, and contemplated the prosperity of the universe, he neglected that of the Roman empire. The most sublime speculation of the contemplative philosopher can scarce compensate the neglect of the smallest active duty.⁵

Smith knew, just as Paul had known, that men's decisions are not usually governed by the impulse of charity. This fact of economic life had led social theorists for millennia to the same conclusion: a society that relies on that which is abnormal to govern its day-to-day operations is a society that will not survive with its institutions intact. No society has ever survived whose institutions have rested on the assumption of the widespread impulse of charity. Monasteries have come the closest to this ideal, but they always operate in terms of tight hierarchical systems of control over their members. St. Benedict is famous for his Rule (c. 530), not for his order's charity. Of the Rule's 73 chapters, most deal with discipline, and the chapter that deals with the distribution of goods (34) is careful to speak of the required sanctions.

Whether All Should Receive in Equal Measure What Is Necessary

It is written, "Distribution was made to everyone according as he had need" (Acts 4:35). We do not say by this that respect should be had for persons (God forbid), but regard for infirmities. Let him who hath need of less thank God and not give way to sadness, but let him who hath need of more, humble himself for his infirmity, and not be elated for the indulgence shown him; and thus all the members will be at peace.

5. Smith, Theory of Moral Sentiments, VI:III:III.

Above all, let not the evil of murmuring appear in the least word or sign for any reason whatever. If anyone be found guilty herein, let him be placed under very severe discipline.⁶

When departing from the economic motivation of personal self-interest and its inescapable result, economic inequality, he who proposes an alternative social arrangement had better be ready to accept the fact that the organization's officials must impose "very severe discipline."

Theologically speaking, the supreme act of charity in history was Jesus Christ's personal sacrifice of Himself on behalf of the world, which hated Him or else knew nothing about Him. Had He not been willing to do this, then on the day of Adam's rebellion, mankind would have perished.⁷ He also died on behalf of His covenant people. "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends" (John 15:13). This was surely an abnormal act of self-sacrifice, but it remains the supreme normative model for His followers. When that which is personally normative is also socially abnormal, then it is an unreliable standard of government for the masses of humanity.

Smith believed that benevolence in human affairs is dependent generally on God, not men. In the next phase of his intellectual career, he abandoned any reliance on benevolence at all, for deism's god disappeared from Smith's analysis. He offered a new view of social order, one that need not rely on a god or individual benevolence in order to produce an inherently benevolent society. In short, out of selfishness, benevolence.

B. Smith's Conceptual Revolution

In The Wealth of Nations (1776), Smith reconstructed economic theory by forthrightly admitting what men have known from the beginning, namely, that individual self-interest is a far more widely distributed motivation than individual self-sacrifice, at least outside the immediate family unit and associations necessarily based on self-sacrifice on behalf of the larger entity, such as the church and the military.

6. The Holy Rule of St. Benedict, trans. Rev. Boniface Verhuysen, OSB (Achison, Kansas: St. Benedict's Abbey, 1949), ch. 34.

7. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/gndcrg>)

Smith's main contribution to economic theory was his cogent and consistent explanation of the national economy in terms of voluntary acts of individual exchange. He explained the unplanned but orderly macro economy as a product of individually planned micro economies: individuals, families, and firms. In short, out of many, one.

Smith's primary goal for his book was to explain the corporate wealth of nations and why this wealth varied, nation to nation. He offered an explanation based on methodological individualism. He taught that individual self-interest in a myriad of voluntary transactions is the source of the growing corporate wealth of nations. The wealth of nations is the undesigned outcome of the wealth of individuals.

Smith's methodological individualism differs fundamentally from the Bible's principle of methodological covenantalism. The Mosaic law presents its various discussions of the wealth of individuals in terms of the wealth of the nation or the covenanted corporate group to which the individuals in question belong. The economic sanctions of wealth and poverty are predictable in terms of a group's adherence to the specifics of biblical law, but not in terms of personal obedience. Nevertheless, Paul teaches that the work of the law is written on all men's hearts (Rom. 2:15).⁸ In this sense, there is individualism. But it is not an autonomous form of individualism that is devoid of judicial, covenantal links to other men. The Bible does not teach that, on an individual basis, adherence to God's law predictably produces wealth. It does teach that when large numbers of people obey the work of the law in their hearts, their nation will prosper, which includes most residents. What Smith said is produced by the division of labor—greater wealth for men and nations—the Mosaic law said is true of the effects of covenant-keeping. Smith traced wealth to widespread economic exchange. The Mosaic law traced it to widespread individual obedience to God's law.

Smith's concern with the wealth of nations remains the central issue of most debates over economic policy today. The attainment of sustained economic growth and the avoidance of short-term economic contractions ("recessions") are the central economic issues in modern politics. These issues are also central to what we might call economic apologetics. In this sense, politicians and economists continue the inquiry begun by Moses in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28 into the causes of corporate blessings and cursings. They merely secularize the terms.⁹ But, from the point of view of economic theory, Smith's definition of economics as the science of national wealth no longer serves as the foundation of economic analysis. The history of economic thought since Smith has been a series of alternative definitions of the scope and method of economic science: social welfare,¹⁰ individual wealth maximization (avarice),¹¹ exchange,¹² money and economic measurement,¹³ resource allocation,¹⁴ and purposeful individual action¹⁵—all in a world of scarcity.

8. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 4.

In Smith's analysis, poor people whose economic output is not in demand by customers at prevailing prices are not direct participants in the free market's self-interested system of voluntary exchange. But, as national wealth increases, it is plausible to assume that the poor will benefit, too. There will be more charity, more instruments of healing, and additional charitable institutions to deal with the afflictions of the poor. The danger in making this assumption is that the pursuit of wealth may hinder men's sacrificial impulse. The desires unleashed by rising personal income may overwhelm the wealth owner's impulse to sacrifice, just as an addictive drug overwhelms the addict's priorities. To these negative results of the free market economy, Paul speaks clearly. The rich must be exhorted to act sacrificially. While it is formally true that the value of each additional unit of revenue will be used by its recipient to satisfy a desire that is lower on his scale of values, this scale of values is not fixed through time. It is likely to be affected by the increase in income. Tastes change as men grow richer. Self-sacrifice may be pushed further down on a person's scale of values. In terms of his earlier priorities, sacrificial giving may have been higher on his value scale, but wealth has changed his priorities. Other things have not remained equal.

Capitalism has opened up the possibility of attaining great wealth to more people than any other social system ever has. Capitalism's defenders have proclaimed a humanistic and nearly universal gospel of

9. Robert H. Nelson, Economics as Religion: from Samuelson to Chicago and Beyond (University Park, Pennsylvania: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2001).

10. Israel M. Kirzner, The Economic Point of View (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1960), pp. 43–50. (<http://bit.ly/KirznerEPV>)

11. Ibid., ch. 3.

12. Ibid., ch. 4.

13. Ibid., ch. 5.

14. Ibid., ch. 6.

15. Ibid., ch. 7.

wealth, and in so doing, they have lowered a traditional psychological barrier against personal wealth-seeking. Paul's warning against the negative moral consequences of the personal quest for great wealth has been drowned out by Smith's vision of universal riches through the division of labor and the private ownership of the means of production. Capitalism has mass produced opportunities to get rich, making these opportunities available to hundreds of millions of people who would never have believed that such wealth was available to the common man. It has mass produced these dreams by lowering the barriers to dreaming: legal, psychological, moral, and geographical.

According to Smith, the primary impulse for service to people outside of the family is personal self-interest: the quest for income through trade. The pursuit of money is a universal motivation. Capitalism institutionalizes this universal motivation, and makes it service-oriented. Capitalism harnesses and re-channels what Paul identified as a morally dangerous impulse. Capitalism generates positive temporal benefits by means of a negative spiritual impulse. Capitalism has produced a transformation in moral theory and practice.

The most consistent development of Smith's analytical principle of individual self-interest is found in the writings of a novelist, Ayn Rand.¹⁶ She wrote a non-fiction book, The Virtue of Selfishness (1976). One of her disciples is economist George Reisman. He referred to the benevolent nature of capitalism.¹⁷ The results are benevolent even though the system rests on individual selfishness. Capitalism "promotes human life and well-being and does so for everyone."¹⁸ In short, out of evil, good.

C. Mandeville's Fable of the Bees

This implausible moral transformation was promoted by Bernard Mandeville in his anonymous 1705 poem, The Grumbling Hive: or, Knaves Turn'd Honest. Mandeville, an immigrant to England from Holland, offered an analogy of human society as a bee hive. The poem pointed out that personal motives and private actions that are socially condemned as selfish produce socially beneficial results. For instance, 16. The Fountainhead and Atlas Shrugged are her two major novels.

17. George Reisman, Capitalism: A Treatise on Economics (Ottawa, Illinois: Jameson Books, 1999), index: "Capitalism: benevolent nature of."

18. Reisman, "Some Fundamental Insights into the Benevolent Nature of Capitalism" (Oct. 25, 2002), published by the Ludwig von Mises institute. This essay is posted at <http://tinyurl.com/377zr>.

fickleness in dress and fashion creates jobs for those who satisfy ever-changing tastes. But for Adam Smith and all who have followed his lead, the crucial observation had to do with the cause of economic growth.

Thus Vice nursed Ingenuity,
Which joined with Time, and Industry
Had carried Life's Conveniencies,
Its real Pleasures, Comforts, Ease,
To such a Height, the very Poor
Lived better than the Rich before
(lines 197–202)

The original poem attracted little attention. In 1714, Mandeville republished it anonymously, this time with extensive commentary. He called it The Fable of the Bees, which was subtitled, Private Vices, Publick Benefits. It sold well enough to go into a second printing that year. In the second printing, he added this subtitle: Several Discourses, to demonstrate, that Human Frailties, . . . may be turned to the Advantage of the Civil Society, and made to supply the Place of Moral Virtues. In 1723, there was another edition. Because of a highly controversial chapter added toward the end, "An Essay on Charity and Charity Schools," the book became notorious overnight. He opposed charity schools for the poor. The book became so notorious that some of the leading thinkers of the century wrote books against it, including Bishop Berkeley and Francis Hutcheson.

F. A. Hayek regarded this book as the turning point in the history of social theory because of its influence on David Hume, and, through Hume, on Scottish moral philosophy. He said the subtitle of the second 1714 edition is the key. "What I believe he wants to say by this is precisely what Josiah Tucker expressed more clearly 40 years later when he wrote that 'that universal mover in human nature, SELF-LOVE, may receive such direction in this case (as in all others) as to promote the public interest by those efforts it shall make towards pursuing its own'."¹⁹

19. He cited Tucker, The Elements of Commerce and Theory of Taxes (1755), in R. L. Schuyler (ed.), Josiah Tucker, a Selection from his Economic and Political Writings (New York: Columbia University Press, 1931), p. 92. Hayek, "Lecture on a master mind," delivered to the British Academy (23 March 1966); reprinted in Hayek, New Studies, p. 259. The essay appears as "Dr. Bernard Mandeville." It is reprinted in The Collected Works of F. A. Hayek, 19 vols. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991), III, p. 90.

There were editions in 1724 and 1725. In 1728, he added a second volume of commentary. Hayek noted: "By that time, however, he had become a bogey man, a name with which to frighten the godly and respectable, an author whom one might read in secret to enjoy a paradox, but whom everybody knew to be a moral monster by whose ideas one must not be infected. Yet almost everyone read him and few escaped infection."²⁰ Hayek added in a footnote: "There is perhaps no other comparable work of which one can be equally confident that all contemporary writers in the field knew it, whether they explicitly refer to it or not." Yet today, Mandeville's two volumes are little known and read only by academic specialists.²¹ Be thankful that you are not one of them.

Prior to Mandeville, selfishness had been seen as a vice. Virtue had been seen as obedience to righteous moral commands. This outlook was basic to classical political philosophy and also to the Renaissance, Machiavelli excepted. It was also basic to the outlook of early eighteenth-century republican political theory.²² Mandeville rejected this outlook. He defined virtue as acts motivated apart from personal self-interest. This was a denial of the Bible's system of covenantal ethics, which proclaims that acting in conformity to God's law brings positive sanctions. Then, having defined virtue so rigorously, Mandeville denied that it could ever be found in human nature. All virtuous acts are in fact acts of disguised self-interest and even self-deception.²³ Hayek commented: "By treating as vicious everything done for selfish purposes, and admitting as virtuous only what was done in order to obey moral commands, he had little difficulty in showing that we owed most benefits of society to what on such a rigoristic standard must be called vicious. This was no new discovery but as old almost as any reflection on these problems. . . . Yet by making his starting-point the particular moral contrast between the selfishness of the motives and the benefits which the resulting actions conferred on others, Mandev-

20. Ibid., pp. 251–52; Collected Works, III, p. 82.

21. The two volumes, which Oxford University Press published in 1924, were reprinted in 1988 by the Liberty Fund, which publishes classics in conservative and libertarian social and economic theory.

22. Thomas A. Horne, The Social Thought of Bernard Mandeville: Virtue and Commerce in Eighteenth-Century England (New York: Columbia University Press, 1978), pp. 5–6, 54–55, 96; E. J. Hundert, The Enlightenment's Fable: Bernard Mandeville and the Discovery of Society (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1994), pp. 9–10.

23. F. B. Kaye, "Introduction," Bernard Mandeville, Fable of the Bees (Oxford: At the Clarendon Press, 1924), I, pp. xlvi–lxiv.

ille saddled himself with an incubus of which neither he nor his successors to the present day could ever quite free themselves.”²⁴

Hayek, as a defender of social evolutionism,²⁵ saw Mandeville’s main contribution as the precursor of his own theory of the spontaneous social order. Mandeville, like Hayek, was interested in why undesigned social institutions are able to channel private vices (e.g., producers’ greed) into public benefits (e.g., consumers’ goods). In the words of that other Scottish rationalist, Adam Ferguson, repeatedly quoted by Hayek, Mandeville discussed the results of human action but not of human design.²⁶ This was also the main focus of Hayek’s intellectual career after the publication of his Constitution of Liberty (1960). This extended to his final book, The Fatal Conceit, which was published in 1988, when he was 89 years old. “What Mandeville was concerned with was that institutions which man had not deliberately made—though it is the task of the legislator to improve them—bring it about that the divergent interests of the individuals are reconciled.”²⁷ The so-called harmony of interests is neither designed nor innate in society, Hayek argued. Rather, this harmony evolves under certain institutions, but not under others, i.e. socialism.

Hayek pointed out that the Scottish Enlightenment’s social theorists were social Darwinists a century before Darwin. They explained the origin of social order (the one) as the result of unplanned interactions between undesigned, evolutionary social institutions and individual decision-making (the many). A century later, Darwin applied this same worldview to biological evolution: the process of an impersonal, undesigned natural selection of survivors who possess environment-favored but unplanned biological characteristics. We know that Darwin read Adam Smith, though apparently not Wealth of Nations.²⁸ The public scandal that Darwin created after 1859 was an extension of the original public scandal that Mandeville created in 1723. Both men offered explanations for perceived order without invoking the tradi-

24. Hayek, New Studies, pp. 252–53; Collected Works, III, p. 83.

25. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), Appendix B. See especially Hayek, The Fatal Conceit: The Errors of Socialism (1988), vol. III of The Collected Works of F. A. Hayek (Chicago University of Chicago Press). He attempted in this book to avoid using the word “social” (p. 109), but he could not avoid the concept.

26. Hayek, New Studies, p. 264; Collected Works, III, p. 96. This is from Ferguson’s book, An Essay on the History of Civil Society (1767), p. 187.

27. Hayek, New Studies, p. 260; Collected Works, III, p. 91.

28. Hayek, Fatal Conceit, p. 24.

tional theological argument from design.²⁹

D. Smith Extended Mandeville's Insight

Smith's teacher Francis Hutcheson was repelled by the moral implications of Mandeville's poem and book. Hutcheson was a proponent of Shaftesbury's moralism.³⁰ Shaftesbury was Mandeville's primary target, as he said repeatedly. Hutcheson wanted a society based on morality. Mandeville said this is impossible. Any attempt to do this is destructive of wealth in large nations. Pride, the love of luxury, and spending make a nation great.³¹ Hutcheson was appalled. So was Smith, who favored thrift and production. But this merely pushed the moral dilemma back one step. The person who is industrious in order to sell a luxury good has as his goal a sale. This requires a buyer. The motivation of the two participants is the same: individual self-interest. To make a purchase, the buyer must possess money or some other asset. So, from the point of view of the free market, the sovereign customer's desire for a luxury good at a competitive price is the reason for the producer's industriousness. Yes, Mandeville was a proto-Keynesian—a demand-side economist—as Rothbard points out,³² and, far more important, as Keynes pointed out.³³ But this does not change the nature of his revolutionary insight: the transformation of individual self-interest into public benefits.

In his book, The Virtue of Prosperity, Dinesh D'Sousa commented on the debate between Mandeville and Smith, which I regard as a debate between demand-side economics (Mandeville) and supply-side economics (Smith).

Adam Smith, for example, roundly denounced Mandeville's views as "wholly pernicious." Smith was no fan of sloth and extravagance, as Mandeville was. At the same time he agreed with Mandeville that the traditional vices of selfishness and greed were the indispensable foundations of a commercially prosperous society. So he replaced Mandeville's notion of "vice" with the more palatable term "interest." Then he argued, much along the lines of Mandeville, that self-interested motives, operating through the framework of a free market,

29. Hayek, New Studies, p. 265; Collected Works, III, p. 97.

30. Alasdair MacIntyre, Whose Justice? Which Rationality? (Notre Dame, Indiana: Notre Dame University Press, 1988), pp. 268–69.

31. Mandeville, Fable, I, pp. 181–91, 229.

32. Rothbard, Economic Thought Before Adam Smith, I, pp. 421–22.

33. John Maynard Keynes, The General Theory of Employment, Interest and Money (New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, [1936]), pp. 359–62.

would produce socially beneficial consequences. In fact, Mandeville's concept that the pursuit of private gain leads to public welfare is the central premise of The Wealth of Nations, and economist Gary Becker told me that he regards it as "the most important idea in the social sciences in two and a half centuries."³⁴

Smith adopted Mandeville's fundamental idea, namely, that the pursuit of individual self-interest produces social benefits, especially national wealth, as unintended consequences. Individual self-interest within the framework of the free –"natural"–market was seen as reconciling the one and the many in society, considered as an economic unit. Smith reconstructed economic theory with this concept. He did not agree with Mandeville's emphasis on consumption as the source of public benefits. Smith emphasized production. But, because Smith identified consumption as the goal of all production,³⁵ he could not avoid becoming an extension of Mandeville. The enduring legacy of The Wealth of Nations is Smith's argument that the pursuit of individual self-interest in an unplanned free market system of voluntary exchange is the means of attaining greater national wealth. Three Nobel Prize-winning economists have agreed that this was Smith's enduring legacy: Becker, George Stigler, and Hayek, all of whom taught at the University of Chicago. Stigler put it this way in 1976, the 200th anniversary year of the publication of Wealth of Nations: "Smith had one overwhelmingly important triumph: he put into the center of economics the systematic analysis of the behavior of individuals pursuing their own self-interest under the conditions of competition."³⁶ Hayek put it somewhat differently in that same anniversary year: "The recognition that a man's efforts will benefit more people, and on the whole satisfy greater needs, when he lets himself be guided by the abstract signals of prices rather than by perceived needs, and that by this method we can best overcome our constitutional ignorance of most of the particular facts, and can make the fullest use of the knowledge of concrete circumstances widely dispersed among millions of individuals, is the great achievement of Adam Smith."³⁷

34. Dinesh D'Sousa, The Virtue of Prosperity: Finding Values in an Age of Techno-Affluence (New York: Free Press, 2000), pp. 177–78.

35. "Consumption is the sole end and purpose of all production. . . ." Smith, Wealth of Nations, Book IV, Chapter VIII, p. 625.

36. George Stigler, "The Successes and Failures of Professor Smith," Journal of Political Economy, 84 (December, 1976), p. 1201; cited in Mark Skousen, The Making of Modern Economics (Armonk, New York: Sharpe, 2001), p. 20.

37. Hayek, "Adam Smith's Message in Today's Language" (1976), in Hayek, New

Modern economists, in their desire to create a social science, have adopted the same myth of ethical neutrality that natural scientists have officially adopted. Economists speak of efficiency, not morality. But Smith's system had moral implications. It identified greater national wealth as a goal of deliberate political policy. He was arguing against the interventionist economics of mercantilism. His analysis offered solutions to two perennial philosophical problems, from the Greeks to the Enlightenment: (1) out of many, one; (2) out of greed, benefits. As Milton Mayer has written: "Adam Smith did not believe that man was good. But he did not trouble himself to assert that man was bad. Man was—well, what we have always known him to be. His nature is evident through the whole of history. His motivation is self-interest, and that social system is best which turns that motivation to the best account. . . . If Smith was right, there would not be a New Man. There would be nothing new. Man's ingenuity would merely have adjusted him better to his environment."³⁸

E. The New Man in Christ

This raises a question for Christian theology: What of the "new man" in Jesus Christ, i.e., regeneration? Paul wrote: "Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new" (II Cor. 5:17). What difference does regeneration make in social theory? From Mandeville to Mises, from Smith to Stigler, the answer of economists has been the same: none. They all use Ockham's razor to shave God out of their theories and equations. The evolutionist's cosmos, whether astronomical, biological, or social, is without design. There is no transcendence in the evolutionist's cosmos. There is only immanence: man, who has become god by default.

Free market capitalism as a social and legal system offers economic incentives to the masses of men to serve each other in a society-wide quest for individual wealth. Capitalism's success rests on the widespread acceptance of the formal goal of increased personal wealth, which is usually denominated by money. Capitalism has reduced poverty as no rival social system ever has. How? By legitimizing and institutionalizing the pursuit of self-interest, which is judicially indistinguishable from greed. The reduction of poverty has been the most universally accepted social objective in man's history, and also a universally accepted personal goal, monks excepted.

Studies, p. 269; Collected Works, III, p. 121.

38. Milton Mayer, "The New Man," The Great Ideas Today: 1966 (Chicago: Encyclopedia Britannica, 1966), pp. 134–35.

Paul knew, just as Jesus knew, that the personal goal of attaining temporal riches has always had more devotees than the personal goal of helping the poor. Free market capitalism accepts men as they are. It does not call for or expect men's regeneration by God's grace. Customers do not pay producers to change their minds regarding the benefits of getting rich or ignoring charity. Knowingly or not, customers use the producers' desire to get richer as their means of enticing producers to ever-greater levels of customer-satisfying service. In short, capitalism harnesses individual greed. Capitalism has therefore served the public interest, as evaluated by self-interested customers. Capitalism has reduced poverty as never before in history, but it has also sanctioned greed, luring hundreds of millions of men into paths of unrighteousness—not unrighteousness in production (cheating), but unrighteousness in kingdom priorities. It is not that capitalism necessarily reduces the level of charitable giving, but it has unquestionably relegated charity to the shadows, both institutionally and theoretically. As surely as The Wealth of Nations put The Theory of Moral Sentiments in its shadow, so has it also put the New Testament's teaching on riches and charity in its shadow. This, despite the fact that Smith was revising the seventh edition of The Theory of Moral Sentiments in the year of his death, 1790.³⁹ He ended his life's work trying to refute Mandeville's philosophical anarchism,⁴⁰ in the name of sympathy.⁴¹ Yet his successors in nineteenth-century political economy and twentieth-century economics were far more sympathetic to Mandeville's view of human motivation than Smith's. Self-interest, not sympathy, became both the bedrock epistemological and ethical foundation of free market economic thought.

Men's desire to get richer, when coupled with the judicial enforcement of private ownership and private contracts, has become the most powerful explanatory device of economic theory. Capitalism's only widely accepted rival worldview—State central planning—has used the language of ethics and charity as a cover for the expansion of the political power of elite planners over the masses.⁴² The invariable economic results of the command economy has been slower economic growth, at best, and mass starvation at worst. The political result has been the establishment of massive bureaucracy, sometimes leading to genocide.⁴³

39. E. G. West, "Introduction," Adam Smith, The Theory of Moral Sentiments (Indianapolis, Indiana: LibertyClassics, 1976), p. 20.

40. Kaye, "Introduction," Fable, I, pp. lviii–lix.

41. Smith, Theory of Moral Sentiments, VII: IV.

Under free market capitalism, the ethical motivation of service to others is subordinated both operationally and theoretically to the individual's quest for greater wealth. In the famous passage in Wealth of Nations that refers to the invisible hand, Smith wrote of the businessman that "he intends only his own gain, and he is in this, as in so many other cases, led by an invisible hand to promote an end which was no part of his intention. Nor is it always the worse for society that it was no part of it. By pursuing his own interest he frequently promotes that of the society more effectually than when he really intends to promote it. I have never known much good done by those who affected to trade for the public good."⁴⁴ Business charity is an afterthought—and, very often, it is little more than a public relations technique.⁴⁵ The right hand not only knows what the left hand is doing, it hires a full-time publicist to call the public's attention to what it is doing. In the final analysis, the accountant's profit-and-loss statement and balance sheet dominate the world of business. In the eminently practical science of accounting, form dominates substance. Its premier law is "by the numbers!" Nevertheless, the result of free market capitalism has been the creation of unprecedented wealth for hundreds of millions of people. Pareto's law of 20-80 income/wealth distribution has not been significantly altered by any modern society,⁴⁶ but total wealth has grown in the capitalist West for over two centuries. One estimate is that the growth rate has been 2.8% per annum.⁴⁷ If someone had invested $1,000 in 1750 at 2.8%, and then re-invested the earnings tax-free, the value of the capital in 2005 would be $1,143,521. This is more than a 1,000-fold increase in wealth.

42. F. A. Hayek, The Road to Serfdom (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1944).

43. Stéphane Courtois, et al., The Black Book of Communism: Crimes, Terror, Repression (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1999).

44. Smith, Wealth of Nations, IV:II, p. 423.

45. This was one of Mandeville's arguments. Fable, I, p. 309.

46. Vilfredo Pareto (1848–1923), an Italian sociologist-economist in Switzerland, discovered that 20% of a nation's population gained 80% of its income, in every European nation he studied in the late nineteenth century. Pareto, Cours d'Economie Politique, vol. 2 (Lausanne, 1897), pp. 370–72.

47. Walt W. Rostow, The World Economy: History & Prospect (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1978), p. 48.

What is said here of capitalism's sanctions of profit and loss also applies to every system of positive sanctions. Means and ends can easily be reversed in the plans of purposeful individuals. When men pursue the positive sanctions produced by righteousness rather than pursuing righteousness for God's sake, they fall into the same spiritual trap as the man who pursues riches by means of serving customers. Consider the student who studies to get good grades rather than mastering the material. This substitution of sanctions for substance is not an effective argument against grades in education. Consider the artist who violates his aesthetic standards in order to make a sale to a private art collector with poor taste. This is not an effective argument for tax-funded art. The substitution of formal institutional sanctions in place of personal performance standards is common to every institutional arrangement.

Nevertheless, free market capitalism is uniquely dangerous spiritually, for its underlying motivational force is man's desire for riches. The science of economics has been self-consciously constructed on the assumption of the pursuit of personal wealth as the supreme motivator. The performance of the free market social order also rests on this human motivation. The desire for money is the most universal form of sanctions-seeking—so universal that Christ identified it as Christianity's rival religion: mammon.⁴⁸ This is the religion of the great god More. Money is the most marketable commodity. It is the most representative form of all of the substitutes for God's saving grace that this world has to offer.

Christianity does not praise greed. On the contrary, it identifies greed as a great moral evil. Yet, in practice, as Mayer observed, "The Christianization of the Western world did not inhibit man's materialistic drive (or his materialistic devotion)."⁴⁹ But by the end of the twentieth century, it was becoming clear that humanism and materialism had replaced Christianity in Western Europe.

The Wealth of Nations was the most important document presenting the right-wing Enlightenment's social worldview, which was evolutionary. The book appeared after Jean Jacques Rousseau's Social Contract (1762), which was the left-wing Enlightenment's premier statement. The underlying model for Smith was Scottish Presbyterianism, with its congregational locus of initiation and its bottom-up appeals court system. The underlying model for Rousseau was the Jesuit order, with its top-down chain of command. Rousseau presented the case for the all-encompassing state. Smith presented the case for the near autonomy of the free market.

48. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 14; North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 38.

49. Mayer, "The New Man," Great Ideas Today: 1966, p. 144.

Rousseau offered a theory of the General Will, the disembodied and hypothetical will of the people as a collective entity. He did not offer an explanation for how state officials can speak accurately on behalf of the General Will. He offered no economic theory. Smith rested his case for the unplanned economic order squarely on acting individuals, whose voluntary exchanges are registered by means of prices, and whose motivations can be understood by the entrepreneur through introspection. Objective prices reflect objective conditions of supply and demand. Suppliers and customers are enabled by the price system to work out mutually agreeable transactions.

With the collapse of the Soviet Union in December of 1991, the intellectual heirs of Rousseau have been left high and dry. Socialism's ideal of central planning is out of favor within the Western intelligentsia today, not because of economic analysis, which remains unpopular and barely understood by most intellectuals, but on the basis of the visible loss of power suffered by Communism's bureaucratic tyrants. This loss of power was the result of the Communists' loss of faith in Marxism-Leninism and the Communist economy's failure to produce wealth for the Communist Party's elite. Communism's leaders recognized at the 1980 Moscow Olympics that upper-middle-class Westerners had a higher standard of living than the top three percent of the Russian population: members of the Communist Party. High-ranking members of the Communist Party in 1991 decided to privatize the economy by transferring the ownership of the Communist Party's liquid capital to themselves. To justify this massive theft of the Party's assets, the Party's senior officers simultaneously reformed the entire Soviet economy, formally abandoning Communism, thereby establishing the legitimacy of private property and voluntary exchange. The Communist Party's apparatus disappeared in 1991, and so did its money.⁵⁰ Western commentators know nothing of this clandestine transfer of Party assets, but they do know that the Party officially committed suicide on August 23, 1991,⁵¹ and also that the Russian economy was subsequently privatized.

50. The story of the Party's disappearing funds was related to me by Anthony Easton, an American businessman who had long-term contacts with top Soviet leaders before and after 1991.

F. Kingdoms in Conflict

Adam Smith's insight that societies can grow rich as a result of the individual's pursuit of self-interest within the context of a private property order is found in only three closely related texts in the Bible. They all have to do with money-lending.

For the LORD thy God blesseth thee, as he promised thee: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow; and thou shalt reign over many nations, but they shall not reign over thee (Deut. 16:6).⁵²

The LORD shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his season, and to bless all the work of thine hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow. And the LORD shall make thee the head, and not the tail; and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath; if that thou hearken unto the commandments of the LORD thy God, which I command thee this day, to observe and to do them (Deut. 28:12–13).⁵³

The stranger that is within thee shall get up above thee very high; and thou shalt come down very low. He shall lend to thee, and thou shalt not lend to him: he shall be the head, and thou shalt be the tail (Deut. 28:43–44).⁵⁴

Here, lenders are winners, and borrowers are losers. The context of the first and second passages is economic growth: God's visible, corporate blessing. The God-honoring society becomes rich and powerful, and its money-lenders do, too. They lend to covenant-breakers. The idea that both parties are beneficiaries of the transaction is not present in these passages.

Free market economic theory argues that voluntary transactions benefit both parties in terms of their goals. The Bible regards this outlook as short-sighted. The Bible looks at the longer-run implications of 51. Michael Dobbs, Down With Big Brother: The Fall of the Soviet Empire (New York: Knopf, 1997), p. 417.

52. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 37.

53. Ibid., ch. 69.

54. Ibid., ch. 70.

voluntary transactions. It does not accept the epistemological principle of the moral equality of all goals. It teaches a rival view: that which fosters an increase in capital leads to dominion, and is therefore preferable. That which sacrifices future income growth and influence on the altar of present consumption is a curse.⁵⁵ Corporate economic growth is seen as a benefit.

There are winners and losers in these passages. The fact that both parties gain their goals through exchange testifies to the fact that the lender has better long-run priorities than the borrower. The dividing issue here is long-term dominion vs. immediate gratification. Both the lender and the borrower get what they want, but what the lender wants is better because he is future-oriented.

1. Kingdoms and Eschatology

A related aspect of Christian righteousness is future-orientation regarding eternity. In the seventeenth century, Scottish Presbyterians began to proclaim optimism regarding the transformational effects of the kingdom of God in history. This is made clear in Answer 191 of the Larger Catechism (1647) regarding the meaning of the Lord's Prayer.

Q191: What do we pray for in the second petition?

A191: In the second petition (which is, Thy kingdom come,) acknowledging ourselves and all mankind to be by nature under the dominion of sin and Satan, we pray, that the kingdom of sin and Satan may be destroyed, the gospel propagated throughout the world, the Jews called, the fulness of the Gentiles brought in; the church furnished with all gospel officers and ordinances, purged from corruption, countenanced and maintained by the civil magistrate: that the ordinances of Christ may be purely dispensed, and made effectual to the converting of those that are yet in their sins, and the confirming, comforting, and building up of those that are already converted: that Christ would rule in our hearts here, and hasten the time of his second coming, and our reigning with him forever: and that he would be pleased so to exercise the kingdom of his power in all the world, as may best conduce to these ends.

This is a postmillennial vision: "We pray, that the kingdom of sin and Satan may be destroyed, the gospel propagated throughout the world, the Jews called, the fulness of the Gentiles brought in." It assumes a literal fulfillment of Romans 11.⁵⁶ For the first time in Western history, we find a systematic theological application of Moses' doctrine of the long-term compound growth of righteousness in history (Deut. 28:1–14).⁵⁷ The West had not taken this doctrine literally prior to Scottish Presbyterianism, although there were some elements of postmillennial thinking in Calvin's writings.⁵⁸

55. Consumption is not utterly evil, for we must consume in order to live. But consumption without thrift is a moral evil except in a dire emergency (Prov. 13:22).

Postmillennialism has a crucial implication for economic theory: the possibility of compound economic growth as a product—a positive corporate sanction—of the extension of Christian righteousness in society. The possibility of irreversible compound economic growth was a unique underlying assumption of The Wealth of Nations. The preference for thrift over consumption for the sake of the capitalization of God's kingdom in history was an aspect of this outlook regarding the future. Smith secularized this economic implication of postmillennialism.

Christian postmillennialism stands in stark contrast to the social evolutionism of the Scottish Enlightenment. The Scottish Enlightenment teaches that all social institutions that sustain human life are undesigned. They have come into existence as a result of historical circumstances. They are a combination of purposeful individual activities in the context of impersonal chance and impersonal natural law. Free market institutions are said to provide liberty and productivity, at least for today, but this could change at any time, depending on changes in circumstances: the environment, men's future-orientation, religious commitments, war, invasion, plague, and a host of other factors. In such a view, there is nothing predestined about progress. There is not even any agreed-upon definition of progress.

The only purpose in this Darwinian universe is life. Hayek wrote in his last book, as a heading: "Life Has No Purpose But Itself."⁵⁹ There is no meaning for history, other than species survival. This goal changes, depending on which species is on top. There is no moral order based on supernaturally revealed moral standards.⁶⁰ There are only rules of

56. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 8.

57. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 69.

58. On this point, see Greg L. Bahnsen, "The Prima Facie Acceptance of Postmillennialism," Journal of Christian Reconstruction, III (Winter 1976–77), pp. 69–76. I argue that there were both amillennial and postmillennial arguments in Calvin's writings: "The Economic Thought of Luther and Calvin," ibid., II (Summer 1975), pp. 102–6.

59. Hayek, Fatal Conceit, p. 133.

60. Ibid., p. 73.

conduct⁶¹ provided by an undesigned, self-organizing,⁶² impersonal series of interdependent institutions. There are no predictable laws of evolution or historical development.⁶³ We can deal successfully with the unknown only by trusting in its impersonal operations. "For in fact we are able to bring about an ordering of the unknown only by causing it to order itself."⁶⁴ We must all do our duty, or at least we should—a duty defined by ourselves in terms of rules that have established by no one in particular for no long-run purpose other than the mere biological survival of the species. This, too, may pass. Hayek concluded:

In any case, our desires and wishes are largely irrelevant. Whether we desire further increases of production and population or not, we must—merely to maintain existing numbers and wealth, and to protect them as best we can against calamity—strive after what, under favorable conditions, will come to lead, at least for some time, and in many places. to further increases.⁶⁵

This is a social philosophy based on individual self-interest as both the foundation of economic analysis and the supreme motivating factor of human action, yet it ultimately is a philosophy of collective survival. With respect to an individual's voluntary adherence to the undesigned institutional rules of conduct that keep most people alive,⁶⁶ Hayek wrote: "For these practices do not preserve particular lives but rather increase the chances (or prospects or probabilities) of the group."⁶⁷

Hayek invoked the traditional authority provided by supernatural religion as an explanation for the origin of modern institutions.

We owe it partly to mystical and religious beliefs, and, I believe, particularly to the main monotheistic ones, that beneficial traditions have been preserved and transmitted at least long enough to enable those groups following them to grow, and to have the opportunity to spread by natural or cultural selection.⁶⁸

Yet Hayek abandoned such faith personally.⁶⁹ Why should men

61. Ibid., p. 12.

62. Ibid., p. 9.

63. Ibid., p. 26.

64. Ibid., p. 83.

65. Ibid., p. 134.

66. Ibid., p. 133.

67. Ibid., p. 131.

68. Ibid., p. 136.

69. Ibid., pp. 56, 139.

who share this humanist faith sacrifice to defend such a worldview? Try to persuade individuals who have adopted this dualistic philosophy of individual self-interest, undesigned institutions, impersonal rules of conduct, and devoid of supernatural morality or support, to lay down their lives in defense of this philosophy of life, especially after they have grown soft from the luxuries that the free market produces. Try to recruit an army with this philosophy when a nation is under attack. As a social philosophy for a world where organized corporate bloodshed often determines national survival, right-wing Enlightenment thought is surely a weak reed to lean on.

2. Kingdoms and Capital

Kingdoms must be funded. They require capital. In the case of money-lending, we see dominion through the economic subordination of borrowers. In this instance, subordination is anti-dominion. The presumption here is that the debtor is present-oriented, which implies his subordination to sin. The borrower is, in Mises' terms, a high time-preference individual.⁷⁰ This leads to his progressive subordination to future-oriented, low time-preference lenders.⁷¹

The Bible offers a major challenge to Smith's assumption that the goal of all production is consumption. Smith wrote: "Consumption is the sole end and purpose of all production. . . ."⁷² The Bible does not teach this doctrine. On the contrary, it teaches that a major goal of production is the extension of the kingdom of God in history. One goal of production is dominion, which comes at the expense of personal consumption. Dominion is financed through a refusal to consume: thrift. The long-term accumulation of capital is a means of dominion. This dominion is achieved through inheritance. "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov. 13:22).⁷³

The Bible teaches that kingdom-extension should be a motivation greater than personal self-interest. The covenant-keeper is supposed to lend; the covenant-breaker is supposed to borrow. There is no com-

70. On time-preference, see Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. 18:2. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

71. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 37.

72. Smith, Wealth of Nations, IV:VIII, p. 625.

73. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 41.

pulsion, but God's kingdom is extended through trade. The covenant-breaker consumes; the covenant-keeper invests. Capital should be regarded primarily as a tool of greater future dominion, not as a means of greater future consumption. This is why borrowing to finance one's education or to build a business is legitimate. The debt is not for consumption. Conclusion: the more capital that one possesses, the higher the percentage that should be allocated for dominion. Consumption remains low; production constantly increases. The super-rich have little choice but to honor this principle. Their capital compounds faster than they can spend the money it produces.

Murray Rothbard rejected Smith's theory of productive vs. unproductive labor. He explained it as a product of Smith's Calvinism.⁷⁴ This is a strange argument to come from the first historian of economic thought to discuss in detail the theological liberalism of Smith and the other Scottish Enlightenment figures. Smith distinguished conceptually between labor aimed at the production of capital goods vs. labor aimed at the immediate satisfaction of customer demand. Analytically, the distinction is fallacious in a system of economics which teaches that consumption is the sole end of production. But, as a recommendation of deferred gratification over immediate consumption, this conceptual distinction is revealing. Smith, despite his theological liberalism, did indeed reveal a trace of Calvinism. Rothbard writes, "It is Calvinism that scorns man's consumption and pleasure, and stresses the importance of labour virtually for its own sake." This is rhetoric, not argument. Calvinism scorns sin. It praises righteousness. Calvinism praises work as an alternative to sin. "The devil loves idle hands." Calvinism also understands that productive work produces happiness. "Busy hands are happy hands." Calvin wrote of the curse of the ground: "And yet the asperity of this punishment also is mitigated by the clemency of God, because something of the enjoyment is blended with the labours of men, lest they should be altogether ungrateful. . . ."⁷⁵ Work is a positive good in itself.

3. Kingdoms and Exchange

It is hardly intuitive to go from an exposition of the passages on money-lending to a conclusion that self-interested exchange within a

74. Rothbard, Economic Thought Before Adam Smith, p. 457.

75. John Calvin, Commentaries on the First Book of Moses Called Genesis, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, [1563] 1979), I, p. 174.

private property society leads to greater wealth for all, or almost all. This was not a notion familiar to seventeenth-century mercantilists, nor was it familiar to generations of moral theorists who preceded them. The traditional view of exchange was that the one party to the exchange profits at the expense of the other. This was a false application of a true principle: one spiritual kingdom profits at the expense of the other.

The two supernatural kingdoms are in conflict in history. One area of this conflict is economic growth. One kingdom grows in influence at the expense of the other. In this sense, it is true that the winner wins at the expense of the loser. But it is also true that individuals achieve their goals through voluntary exchange. This seeming contradiction is resolved by an understanding of eschatology: the meek— meek before God—will inherit the earth. The members of each kingdom purchase what they want most, and they do so less expensively because of voluntary exchanges with each other. One society is more present-oriented than another. The members of each society achieve their goals less expensively through voluntary exchange across borders.

If the war is between kingdoms, then the mercantilists were right in this sense: one kingdom advances at the expense of the other. Where they were wrong was in seeing state-regulated international trade as a way to build up one political kingdom and weaken rival kingdoms by exporting goods and importing gold. Smith demolished that argument. Wealth is a much broader category than gold. But the mercantilists could have countered Smith by substituting money-lending for imported gold, assuming that the money would not be confiscated by the borrowers through default. A society that runs an international accounts surplus is pursuing a dominion policy. But for this to be true, the accounts surplus must be the result of voluntary exchange, not rigged markets, hidden subsidies, and other forms of state intervention.

The biblical position is that voluntary exchange weakens Satan's kingdom and strengthens God's kingdom whenever the members of the two kingdoms are working consistently towards their respective goals in terms of their rival presuppositions, laws, and sanctions. Ethically self-conscious covenant-keepers win in history, and ethically self-conscious covenant-breakers lose. (This assessment assumes the truth of postmillennialism.)⁷⁶ Lenin supposedly said that the Communists would hang the capitalists with the rope that the capitalists would sell to them. He was correct in his assessment of the conflict between two social orders. He was incorrect with respect to the one that possessed the covenantal means of victory. His did not.

76. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1992] 1997). (<http://bit.ly/>

G. Self-Interest and National Wealth

In the Bible, there are repeated calls for self-sacrificing service. There are repeated calls to show charity to the poor. The Mosaic law identified a connection between charity and personal economic success. "Beware that there be not a thought in thy wicked heart, saying, The seventh year, the year of release, is at hand; and thine eye be evil against thy poor brother, and thou givest him nought; and he cry unto the LORD against thee, and it be sin unto thee. Thou shalt surely give him, and thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him: because that for this thing the LORD thy God shall bless thee in all thy works, and in all that thou putteth thine hand unto" (Deut. 15:9–10). But there is no indication in the Bible that by allowing the free reign of personal self-interest, a society creates a system through which the vast mass of humanity can get rich over time. This long-unperceived relationship between personal self-interest and national wealth is what Mandeville saw in 1705, Smith saw in 1776, and what capitalism has accomplished since 1776.

Mandeville offered this insight with regard to customer demand ("vices") and the demand for labor ("public benefits"). Then Smith took the relationship back one step to the producer's motivation (greed), which leads him to seek to increase output inexpensively (efficiency). Theologians and social theorists who relied exclusively on the Bible for information about economics had not perceived a cause-and-effect relationship between individual self-interest and national wealth. They had at best seen the Mosaic law's cause-and-effect relationship between covenantal corporate blessings and individual economic blessings. Smith's methodological individualism led him to argue for economic causality that begins with individual self-interest. So does the Mosaic law. Smith argued that voluntary trade accomplishes the feat. The Mosaic law argued that corporate covenant-keeping accomplishes it. Smith told men to become efficient. Moses told them to become righteous. Smith's saw the free market as natural, the "natural system of liberty." The Bible sees the natural man as sinful and self-destructive (Prov. 8:36).

In a roundabout way, the Bible does promote individual service to customers as the road to personal wealth. The model is as follows: (1) service to others, including honest dealing, which produces (2) God's blessings, including wealth, for the entire society, which produces (3) individual wealth. Smith restructured this model: (1) service to others, including honest dealing, which produces (2) individual wealth, which produces (3) wealth for the entire society. God and His personal sanctions were not part of Smith's analytical model in The Wealth of Nations. Smith's theory of economic sanctions is personal, in the sense of purposeful, with respect to a society's self-interested individuals, but it is impersonal with respect to a nation. His individualist methodology and its theory of collective impersonalism were both aspects of the Scottish Enlightenment. In the words of that other Adam, Ferguson, society is the result of human action, but not human design.

The Scottish Enlightenment's theorists did not limit their discussion of the spontaneous order to economics. They also included language, social institutions, and legal institutions. Ronald Hamowy summarizes their position and its underlying motivation. "The theory, simply put, holds that the social arrangements under which we live are of such a high order of complexity that they invariably take their form not from deliberate calculation, but as the unintended consequences of countless individual actions, many of which may be the result of instinct and habit. This theory thus provides an explanation of the origin of complex structures without the need to posit the existence of a directing intelligence."⁷⁷

Smith explained the wealth of nations in terms of the wealth of individuals. Wealth was seen by Smith as a universally acknowledged benefit. Few would argue with him today. Economic growth is indeed perceived as a benefit, "other things being equal." Only a handful of radical ecologists⁷⁸ and zero-growth economists reject the goal of increasing per capita wealth.

What places Smith's system in opposition to the Bible is its cosmic impersonalism. God is analytically irrelevant in The Wealth of Nations. Smith explained the wealth of nations as the impersonal result of individuals' competition in the free market, rather than as the result of

77. Ronald Hamowy, The Scottish Enlightenment and the Theory of Spontaneous Order (Carbondale, Illinois: Southern Illinois University Press for the Journal of the History of Philosophy, 1987), p. 3.

78. They call themselves "deep ecologists."

God's covenantal system of cause and effect. He substituted the accountant's profit-and-loss statement and balance sheet for the common grace of God: the grace of covenant law.

Years ago, I wrote an essay on the parable of the good Samaritan (Luke 10:33–35). The good Samaritan, unlike the priest and the Levite, showed mercy to a beaten man at the side of the road. He washed his wounds and placed him on his donkey. He took him to an inn, and told the inn-keeper that he would pay for the man's care until he got well. I noted that nobody ever talks about the inn-keeper and his motivation. The parable rests on an assumption: there are inn-keepers out there who are ready and willing to assist good Samaritans as paid agents of mercy. Their motivation is not mercy; it is income. The work of the world's good Samaritans is made easier by inn-keepers.⁷⁹

The division of labor in society must be governed by some system of cause and effect. There is always a system of sanctions. Economists eventually are forced to deal with the question of sanctions. (1) "Which sanctions provide the greatest incentive to cooperate with others?" (2) "Which system of ownership best incorporates these sanctions?" These are basic questions of economics. The answer to the first question is "profit and loss." The answer to the second is clear: "free market capitalism." This was the conclusion of Scholastic theologians in the Middle Ages. It was the answer of the Jesuit scholars at the School of Salamanca in the sixteenth century.⁸⁰ It was the answer of Adam Smith. But, in Smith's system, these sanctions are applied by customers through an autonomous free market. These sanctions supposedly operate irrespective of the participants' personal ethics or cosmic law. This was not his argument in The Theory of Moral Sentiments, which relied on the doctrine of God's providence in promoting the harmony of interests, but it was his analytical framework in The Wealth of Nations. I agree with the great historian of economic thought, Jacob Viner. The two books are quite different. Anyone seeking to reconcile them will fail, just as Smith failed in the last year of his life, when he revised the former.⁸¹

79. See North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 21.

80. Alejandro Chafuen, Christians for Freedom: Late Scholastic Economics (San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 1986). Jesus Huerta de Soto, "Juan de Mariana: The Influence of the Spanish Scholastics," in Randall G. Holcombe (ed.), 15 Great Austrian Economists (Auburn, Alabama: Ludwig von Mises Institute, 1999), ch. 1.

81. Jacob Viner, "Adam Smith and Laissez Faire" (1927), in Viner, The Long View and the Short: Studies in Economic Theory and Policy (Glencoe, Illinois: Free Press, 1958), pp. 220–22, 224–26, 229–31.

Conclusion

Self-interest is basic to biblical law, which is why there are covenant sanctions. It is basic to Jesus' theory of God's final judgment (Matt. 25).

There can be no social theory that has no system of sanctions. Economic theory since Adam Smith has rested heavily on a theory of market-imposed sanctions: profit and loss. Socialists have denied the legitimacy of these sanctions, preferring instead the state's imposition of violence as the best way to shape the economy's output and consumption patterns. The personal will of central planners is substituted for the impersonal competitive pressures of the free market. The result is always slow economic growth and the loss of liberty.

By the final decade of the twentieth century, the academic defenders of the generally unhampered free market faced intellectual competition mainly from defenders of a semi-regulated free market. Both groups rested the case for economic growth on the profit-seeking self-interest of individuals.

The Bible does not deny that self-interest is the primary motivation of most men most of the time. It also does not call for state interference with this motivation, just so long as the resulting actions are peaceful and not fraudulent or inherently immoral. But the Bible warns men not to trust in the uncertain temporal riches that are the product of all of those self-interested actions by profit-seeking men.

The Bible does not teach that the self-interested pursuit of wealth will somehow make a nation poorer, assuming that immoral behavior is penalized by civil law. Instead, the Bible warns against great wealth, whether personal or corporate, that is not the product of the grace-empowered, self-interested obedience of covenant-keepers to God's biblical laws. The Bible does not mention the possibility that the self-interested pursuit of personal wealth in the context of private ownership is the indispensable key to attaining an increase of national wealth. This insight was Bernard Mandeville's, which Smith amplified. The Bible does not deny this possibility, but it does not suggest it or recommend it.

Smith secularized economic theory by substituting the idea of an autonomous, impersonal free market economy for the covenantal providence of God. He sacrificed on the altar of human autonomy the idea of God's providential social order. The other Scottish Enlightenment theorists agreed with him. Only David Hume, skeptic that he was, believed that the perceived social order, as with all perceived order, is merely an unproven assumption of the human mind. But Hume was nevertheless a defender of free trade. He used economic arguments to defend his position, a quarter century before his friend Adam Smith wrote The Wealth of Nations.⁸²

Smith's economic analysis is humanistic, but at least it is neither socialism nor Keynesianism, both of which are equally humanistic, and which expand the power of the state, confiscate private property on a massive scale, and place responsibility for men's economic futures into the hands of self-interested economic planners who possess the monopolistic power of the state to impose their system of economic sanctions. Better to trust the self-interested motivation of the butcher, the brewer, and the baker for our dinner than to trust self-interested tenured state bureaucrats who are protected by Civil Service laws against being fired. Better to rely a businessman who prefers to say "yes" to every request to buy something, and who then scurries around to find a way to deliver, than to ask a bureaucrat to be allowed to do something, who automatically says "no" because it is less controversial to retreat later from "no" to "yes" than it is to retreat from "yes" to "no." No bureaucrat ever gets fired for initially saying "no."

The Bible affirms the legitimacy of private ownership. It mandates civil penalties on convicted thieves. It does not sanction or recommend state-mandated programs of wealth-redistribution. The Mosaic law established a legal order in which individual self-interest will flourish. The Mosaic law also promised increased corporate wealth for widespread corporate obedience to God's law. The New Testament does not abrogate the Mosaic law's system of private ownership, nor does it elevate the state into an agency of charity.

When it comes to a consideration of individual motivation, both Testaments warn against the desire to become rich. Both Testaments regard personal riches with suspicion, and morally legitimate only as the result of God's blessings, with Abraham as the model. "And Abram was very rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold" (Gen. 13:2). In short, the Bible promotes service to others, including economic service, as morally mandatory, but it does not recommend service to others as a way for the individual to get rich. On the other hand, it does recommend charity and honest dealing (weights and measures) as marks of obedience to God's law. Widespread obedience to God's law is the basis of corporate wealth, and therefore also individual wealth. The correct goal is the extension of God's kingdom in history, not personal wealth. The positive sanction is personal wealth, but this sanction is not the goal. It is only the means. Dominion in history by covenant-keepers under God is the biblically correct goal.

82. David Hume, "Of the Balance of Trade" (1752).

Scottish Enlightenment theorists—Hume excepted—invoked a deistic god as a theoretical backdrop for nature, but this god supposedly plays no role in directing the development of society. There is no supernatural invisible hand, only social evolution, which is as blind as Darwin's natural selection was said to be a century later. There is no cosmic process in nature or history, according to the Enlightenment's Scots. There are only individual purposes in a competitive social order. Individual dominion is by service, but this is profit-seeking service in a free market. As for national dominion, according to the Scots, this has more to do with the legal order, the creativity of individuals, and the productivity of the land, all within the international division of labor, than it does with the plans of a monarch and his subordinate supernatural agents. Individual production is for individual final consumption, not individual final judgment at the corporate resurrection.

The Bible teaches design by God, the providence of God, and absolute predestination by God. It teaches cosmic personalism.⁸³ It also teaches absolute individual responsibility, for it teaches final judgment. The Bible teaches covenantalism, not individualism or collectivism. It teaches the Trinity, which implies the equal ultimacy of the one and the many. Covenants apply to individuals and societies because covenants are established by one God in three persons. God judges societies and individuals in history. "I will overturn, overturn, overturn, it: and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is; and I will give it him" (Ezek. 21:27). It is possible to get one out of many through voluntary contracts (Mises) only because it is possible to get one out of many through voluntary covenants (Moses).

83. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 1.

Appendix D

SLAVERY AS A CAUSE OF THE AMERICAN CIVIL WAR

Was the American war, 1861–1865, a civil war? Was it a war of Southern secession? Was it a war of Northern aggression? I answer: yes. It was a civil war because it was a war over the collection and distribution of taxes. The state is all about taxation: a monopoly over violence that is funded by the compulsory collection of revenues. Who receives what portion of these revenues, and who pays what portion, are the continuing twin themes of politics down through the ages. It was a civil war because contending parties went to war over this judicial issue: the right to collect tariffs. It was no accident that the first shots of the war were artillery shells fired by the state of South Carolina onto an island in Charleston Harbor. This island was the place where the United States government had a military base for the enforcement of the collection of tariffs in the Port of Charleston. This was the largest port on the South's eastern coast. The other major Southern port was New Orleans.

A. Tariffs

Abraham Lincoln was determined that these sales taxes on imported goods would be collected by, and distributed by, the United States government. The state of South Carolina disputed this claim militarily, beginning on April 12, 1861, at 4:30 a.m.

Tariffs were more than a symbol of national sovereignty. They were the lifeblood of the U.S. Government's redistribution of wealth. Charles Adams' book, When in the Course of Human Events (2000), on the role of tariff collection as Lincoln's motivation to resist South Carolina's secession, has certainly added long-neglected information to this ancient debate over the cause(s) of that war. But this motivation does not explain why the other Southern states joined with South Carolina's government in declaring secession. To the extent that the war was a war of Southern secession, it had a motive more compelling psychologically than the sovereign right of the South to collect tariffs.

Nevertheless, there is no question that the South regarded tariffs differently from the outlook of Whigs and Republicans in the North. The Confederate Constitution of 1861 specifically limited tariffs and export fees to revenue-generating devices for the national government.¹ Tariffs by law were not to be used to aid private industry.² The South's tariff rates were much lower than what the U.S. government had imposed.³ Despite the North's naval blockade, in 1863, customs duties brought in almost a million dollars to the Confederate Treasury.⁴ Compared to the overall cost of the war, this revenue was minimal.

When men go to war and fight a war, they seek the moral high ground. Lincoln did not go to war officially, and especially rhetorically, for the defense of the collection of tariffs. The South did not go to war to defend its right to collect tariffs and impose export duties. Then why did the South secede? Why were Southern leaders prepared to lead the region into a war? They knew that Lincoln could not mobilize the North to fight and die for the collection of tariffs. Then why was the South prepared to fight? Why did the South believe that the North was willing to fight?

B. John Brown's Raid

John Brown's 1859 raid at Harpers Ferry, Virginia (later West Virginia) sent shock waves through the South. The raid led to the forma-

1. Article I, Section 10, Clause 2 specified that revenues generated by tariffs, except for each state's costs of collection, belonged to the national government. (<http://bit.ly/ConfedCon10-2>)

2. Article I, Section 8, Clause 1 stated: "nor shall any duties or taxes on importations from foreign nations be laid to promote or foster any branch of industry; and all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the Confederate States." Clause 3 stated: "neither this, nor any other clause contained in the Constitution, shall ever be construed to delegate the power to Congress to appropriate money for any internal improvement intended to facilitate commerce; except for the purpose of furnishing lights, beacons, and buoys, and other aids to navigation upon the coasts, and the improvement of harbors and the removing of obstructions in river navigation; in all which cases such duties shall be laid on the navigation facilitated thereby as may be necessary to pay the costs and expenses thereof." Idem

3. Robert A. McGuire and T. Norman Van Cott, "The Confederate Constitution, Tariffs, and the Laffer Relationship," Economic Inquiry, XL (July 2002), pp. 428–38.

4. Report of the Secretary of the Treasury (Dec. 7, 1863). (<http://bit.ly/Confed-Treas1863>)

tion of Southern militias.

Brown was a murderer. Three years earlier, on May 24, 1856, he and his four sons had hacked five unarmed men to death outside their homes in Kansas, all in the name of abolitionism. None of the five owned slaves, but they supported slavery. Brown was funded by a group of Unitarian ministers, known in retrospect as the Secret Six. The best study of this group and its funding of Brown is Otto Scott's book, The Secret Six (1979).

Scott once told me that in his manuscript, he inserted the word "Rev." in front of the names of those Secret Six members who were ordained. When the page proofs were sent back from Times Books, the book publishing arm of the New York Times, the word "Rev." had been removed. Scott re-inserted it into the page proofs, but the editor refused to allow this. When Scott got his author's copy of the book, the offending but revealing "Rev." was still missing. (Scott later bought back all copies of the book from Times Books.)

Scott's book has another revelation about the raid and its effects. This may be the most important observation in the book. Scott, as a lifelong journalist, contends that the Northern press was almost universally favorable to Brown. The Northern press created the legend of Brown as a near-messianic liberator. This, Scott believes, was the American press' first foray into domestic revolution as a messianic movement. It marks the turning point in American journalism, when the press discovered its power to shape events.

The South perceived the Northern press' response as a harbinger of Federally imposed abolitionism. If the North was ready to condone a private citizen's self-conscious attempt to foment a bloody uprising of slaves in the South, then the abolitionist movement had moved over the edge. From that point on, the South prepared for an escalation of violence from northern abolitionists.

The United States government under President James Buchanan did send troops to Harpers Ferry to quell the mini-revolution—troops led by Col. Robert E. Lee. But the election of Lincoln in 1860 was seen by most of the South's leaders as the end of toleration of the South's way of life, which rested on "the peculiar institution." They correctly saw that the North's constitutional compromise in 1787 over the issue of private chattel slavery, as well as the subsequent legislative compromises of 1820 and 1850, were about to be superseded politically. Slavery would be prohibited by law in the western territories. Incoming western states would be formed from these slave-free territories.

The South would steadily lose its near-equality of representation in Congress. The Republican Party's platform in 1860 declared:

8. That the normal condition of all the territory of the United States is that of freedom; That as our Republican fathers, when they had abolished slavery in all our national territory, ordained that "no person should be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law," it becomes our duty, by legislation, whenever such legislation is necessary, to maintain this provision of the Constitution against all attempts to violate it; and we deny the authority of Congress, of a territorial legislature, or of any individuals, to give legal existence to Slavery in any Territory of the United States.

The South was correct in its assessment of the future of the politics of abolitionism. The Republican Party had the votes in 1860, and its anti-slavery agenda would surely shape America's political future. Slavery by 1860 was doomed politically in the United States. Congress would no longer allow the extension of slavery westward. Neither, for that matter, would rainfall. East Texas was the far edge of slavery. The political majority of the nation would become ever more anti-slavery as each new state entered the Union. Congress would eventually do what Parliament had done in 1833: abolish slavery. The only question was whether slave owners would be paid, as British West Indies slave owners had been paid. The South seceded to forestall this development, as their leaders said repeatedly.⁵ Southern leaders created the Confederacy to maintain slavery. The Old South died when that call to moral action brought General Sherman to Georgia.

The North was dragged into the war by Lincoln's decision to use military force to suppress secession. Lincoln had a messianic view of the Union. His rhetoric repeatedly revealed this commitment. Tariffs were the primary source of income for the Union, and he was determined to preserve the Union and the tariff as well. The two were an indissoluble unity in Lincoln's mind: Union and tariff. His rhetoric invoked the Union, not the tariff. But in his inaugural address of 1861, he made it clear that he was willing to fight to collect the tariff:

In doing this there needs to be no bloodshed or violence, and there shall be none unless it be forced upon the national authority. The power confided to me will be used to hold, occupy, and possess the property and places belonging to the Government and to collect the duties and imposts; but beyond what may be necessary for these objects, there will be no invasion, no using of force against or among the people anywhere.

5. See below, "Official Declarations in the South."

Two days earlier, President James Buchanan had signed a new law that more than doubled the tariff rate—15% to 37%—and extended it to many new items. A month later, South Carolina fired on Ft. Sumter. But South Carolina had already seceded by the time the new tariff act was passed and signed into law.

It was the greatest tragedy in American history that John Brown succeeded in transforming a moral and political issue that might have been settled peacefully into a secessionist movement in the South, which in turn brought on the Civil War. Brown's career, more than any man's career in American history, supports the truth of an institutional principle that professional agitator Saul Alinsky, a century later, used to shape his own career: "The action is the reaction."

Brown laid down his life for a cause: abolitionism. In his final address to the court (Nov. 2, 1859), he insisted that he never wanted to hurt anyone, or commit treason, "or incite slaves to rebellion." His murderous career in Kansas testified against him. So did the fact that Harpers Ferry was the location of the United States Armory and Arsenal, which his gang of 22 men had seized. He was tried and convicted for this crime and the deaths that ensued. Brown wanted a revolutionary purging of the South in order to extirpate slavery. He got what he wanted because the South reacted on cue, as if choreographed. When Lincoln was elected the next year, the secessionists took the step that brought down the wrath of Lincoln on their heads. The War of Northern Aggression transformed Lincoln from a tax collector into the abolitionist that Southerners had always claimed that he was, even though he wasn't. Brown-Lincoln-Secession-Aggression: the action was the reaction—a chain reaction. It cost the lives of at least 620,000 soldiers.

The Secret Six collected a huge pay-off from their financial investments in John Brown. One of them, Rev. Thomas Wentworth Higginson (1823–1911), became a colonel in the Union Army, a major literary figure, and, in 1905, signed the "Call" that led to the founding of the Intercollegiate Socialist Society, along with novelists Upton Sinclair and Jack London, and defense lawyer Clarence Darrow.⁶

6. R. J. Rushdoony, The Nature of the American System (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, [1965] 2000), p. 19. (<http://bit.ly/rjrnas>)

C. Official Declarations in the South

The North did not go to war to suppress slavery, but the South did go to war to defend slavery. Had abolitionism not been the hottest political issue in the Northern press in 1859–60, the election of Lincoln would not have resulted in secession.

The crucial motivating issue for Southern politicians in 1860–61 was the defense of slavery. While this truth became politically incorrect in the South after 1865, the South's representatives made their position clear in 1860–61. Major declarations regarding the cause of the war were published by the seceding states. Here are some examples: Mississippi, Texas, Kentucky, Louisiana, and South Carolina.

[Mississippi] Our position is thoroughly identified with the institution of slavery—the greatest material interest of the world. Its labor supplies the product which constitutes by far the largest and most important portions of commerce of the earth. These products are peculiar to the climate verging on the tropical regions, and by an imperious law of nature, none but the black race can bear exposure to the tropical sun. These products have become necessities of the world, and a blow at slavery is a blow at commerce and civilization. That blow has been long aimed at the institution, and was at the point of reaching its consummation. There was no choice left us but submission to the mandates of abolition, or a dissolution of the Union, whose principles had been subverted to work out our ruin.⁷

[Texas] Texas abandoned her separate national existence and consented to become one of the Confederate States to promote her welfare, insure domestic tranquillity and secure more substantially the blessings of peace and liberty to her people. She was received into the confederacy with her own constitution under the guarantee of the federal constitution and the compact of annexation, that she should enjoy these blessings. She was received as a commonwealth holding, maintaining and protecting the institution known as negro slavery—the servitude of the African to the white race within her limits—a relation that had existed from the first settlement of her wilderness by the white race, and which her people intended should exist in all future time. Her institutions and geographical position established the strongest ties between her and other slave-holding States of the confederacy. Those ties have been strengthened by association. But what has been the course of the government of the United States, and of the people and authorities of the nonslavehold-

7. For this statement, plus statements from South Carolina and Georgia, see: <http://bit.ly/ConfedSecessDocs>

ing States, since our connection with them? . . .

In all the non-slave-holding States, in violation of that good faith and comity which should exist between entirely distinct nations, the people have formed themselves into a great sectional party, now strong enough in numbers to control the affairs of each of those States, based upon the unnatural feeling of hostility to these Southern States and their beneficent and patriarchal system of African slavery, proclaiming the debasing doctrine of the equality of all men, irrespective of race or color—a doctrine at war with nature, in opposition to the experience of mankind, and in violation of the plainest revelations of the Divine Law. (A declaration of the causes which impel the State of Texas to secede from the Federal Union, Feb. 2, 1861.)⁸

The Governor of Kentucky, on December 28, 1860, wrote this defense of slavery, although the the state legislature in November had pledged neutrality:

The rights of African slavery in the United States and the relations of the Federal Government to it, as an institution in the States and Territories, most assuredly demand at this time explicit definition and final recognition by the North. The slave-holding States are now impelled by the very highest law of self-preservation to demand that this settlement should be concluded upon such a basis as shall not only conserve the institution in localities where it is now recognized, but secure its expansion, under no other restrictions than those which the laws of nature may throw around it. That unnecessary conflict between free labor and slave labor, but recently inaugurated by the Republican party as an element in our political struggles, must end, and the influence of soil, of climate, and local interests left unaided and unrestricted save by constitutional limitations to control the extension of slavery over the public domain. The war upon our social institutions and their guaranteed immunities waged through the Northern press, religious and secular, and now threatened to be conducted by a dominant political organization through the agency of State Legislatures and the Federal Government must be ended. Our safety, our honor, and our self-preservation alike demand that our interests be placed beyond the reach of further assault.⁹

George Williamson, a Commissioner of the State of Louisiana, de-

8. Texas Ordinance of Secession (Feb. 2, 1861). (<http://bit.ly/TexasSecession>)

9. Transcribed and proofed from The War of the Rebellion: A Compilation of the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies, Series IV, vol. I, pp. 11–15. See also: <http://civilwarcauses.org/magoffin.htm>.

livered this message to fellow delegates in Austin, Texas, at a joint state meeting to consider secession.

The people of the slaveholding States are bound together by the same necessity and determination to preserve African slavery. The isolation of any one of them from the others would make her a theatre for abolition emissaries from the North and from Europe. Her existence would be one of constant peril to herself and of imminent danger to other neighboring slave-holding communities. . . . Her interests are identical with Texas and the seceding States. With them she will at present co-operate, hoping and believing in his own good time God will awaken the people of the border States to the vanity of asking for, or depending upon, guarantees or compromises wrung from a people whose consciences are too sublimated to be bound by that sacred compact, the constitution of the late United States. That constitution the Southern States have never violated, and taking it as the basis of our new government we hope to form a slave-holding confederacy that will secure to us and our remotest posterity the great blessings its authors designed in the Federal Union. With the social balance wheel of slavery to regulate its machinery, we may fondly indulge the hope that our Southern government will be perpetual.¹⁰

Was secession primarily a matter of commerce? Charles Adams, who has spent his career studying the evil effects of taxes, said that it was. None of the South's spokesmen of the era agreed with him, except in the sense of commerce in slaves. Was secession a battle over the tariff? This issue was addressed by former Congressman Lawrence Keitt during South Carolina's debate over secession, on December 22, 1860. Keitt had become legendary in South Carolina four years earlier, when he had physically intervened to keep anyone from coming to the defense of Senator Sumner of Massachusetts, while South Carolina's Congressman Preston Brooks was beating Sumner's head with a cane, crippling him, after Sumner had delivered an anti-slavery speech on the floor of the Senate.¹¹ Brooks and Keitt were both censured by the

10. Address of George Williamson, Commissioner from Louisiana, written Feb. 11, 1861, and presented to the Texas Secession Convention 9 Mar 1861, from E. W. Winkler (ed.), Journal of the Secession Convention of Texas, pp. 120–123. See <http://civilwarcauses.org/gwill.htm>

11. The Charleston, South Carolina Mercury (May 28, 1856), gleefully reported the event. “. . . Mr. KEITT was at the remotest corner of the room, with the President's desk intervening; so he did not even see the beginning of the attack. Hearing the blows of the cane and the cries of SUMNER, he hurried to the spot, and found Senator FOSTER, of Connecticut, and an officer of the Senate, attempting to grasp BROOKS,

House of Representatives, resigned, and were immediately re-elected. They returned to Congress. Keitt died at the battle of Cold Harbor in 1864. He did not die for the cause of tariff reform.

But the Tariff is not the question which brought the people up to their present attitude. We are to give a summary of our causes to the world, but mainly to the other Southern States, whose co-action we wish, and we must not make a fight on the Tariff question.¹²

His cause was the defense of slavery. The previous January 25, he had addressed his fellow Congressman:

African slavery is the corner-stone of the industrial, social, and political fabric of the South; and whatever wars against it, wars against her very existence. Strike down the institution of African slavery and you reduce the South to depopulation and barbarism. . . . The anti-slavery party contend that slavery is wrong in itself, and the Government is a consolidated national democracy. We of the South contend that slavery is right, and that this is a confederate Republic of sovereign States.¹³

On December 24, 1860, South Carolina's legislature issued its defense of secession, becoming the first state to secede. There was not one word about the tariff. There was this regarding slavery:

We affirm that these ends for which this Government was instituted have been defeated, and the Government itself has been made destructive of them by the action of the non-slaveholding States. Those States have assume the right of deciding upon the propriety of our domestic institutions; and have denied the rights of property established in fifteen of the States and recognized by the Constitution; they have denounced as sinful the institution of slavery; they have permitted open establishment among them of societies, whose avowed object is to disturb the peace and to eloign the property of the citizens of other States. They have encouraged and assisted thousands of our slaves to leave their homes; and those who remain, have when he threw himself between them, and ordered them back at their personal risk. They immediately desisted, and BROOKS flogged SUMNER without any interference. . . . The whole South sustains BROOKS, and a large part of the North also. All feel that it is time for freedom of speech and freedom of the cudgel to go together." (Transcribed from the Charleston, South Carolina, Mercury, 28 May 1856, by T. Lloyd Benson.) (<http://bit.ly/KeittBrooks>)

12. S.C. Secession Declaration Debate (Transcribed by Ben Barnhill, Furman University from the Charleston, South Carolina, Courier, Dec. 22, 1860.) (<http://bit.ly/KeittReason>)

13. Congressional Globe. (<http://civilwarcauses.org/quotes.htm>)

been incited by emissaries, books and pictures to servile insurrection.¹⁴

After 1865, all leading Southerners except Rev. Robert L. Dabney, the South's leading Presbyterian theologian and a former aid to Stonewall Jackson, reversed themselves publicly, claiming that slavery had not been the cause of secession. The cause had been a defense of state's rights or some other Constitutional justification.¹⁵ A kind of selective regional amnesia took place in the South. What had been regarded as high moral ground in 1861 had become the lowest moral ground in 1865.

The looming defeat of the Confederacy after the fall of Atlanta in September of 1864 had begun to shake the confidence of some Southern ministers. They began to express doubts from the pulpit regarding the legitimacy of slavery.¹⁶ It is always a tragedy when a Christian society learns its theology by losing to an enemy on a military battlefield. The South changed its theology,¹⁷ its social ethics,¹⁸ and its politics¹⁹ because of General William Tecumseh Sherman's victory in Atlanta. Without that victory, Lincoln would have lost the Presidential election of November, 1864, and the North probably would have come to terms with the South's secession. But Sherman won, and then Lincoln authorized his bloody march to the sea, where the Union troops made war on the civilian population—a ghastly revision of Western military tradition that was extended by the wars of the twentieth century.

After General Lee's surrender at Appomattox Court House in April, 1865, the high moral ground of abolitionism became the North's justification for Reconstruction and the political suppression of Southern culture. The South's Christian leaders subsequently defended the Confederacy as the preserver of Christian civilization against Unitarian aggression. But the pre-war defense of slavery as the primary cause

14. Confederate States of America Declaration of the Immediate Causes Which Induce and Justify the Secession of South Carolina from the Federal Union (Adopted December 24, 1860). (<http://bit.ly/ConfedDeclaration>)

15. The classic post-war statement was written by the lawyer, Alexander H. Stephens, who served as Vice President of the Confederacy before he quit in disgust: A Constitutional View of the Late War Between the States, 2 vols. (1867, 1870).

16. Richard E. Beringer, et al., Why the South Lost the Civil War (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1986), ch. 16.

17. The South's leadership in 1860 was Calvinistic: Presbyterian and Episcopalian. In 1890, it was fundamentalist.

18. Its view of slavery.

19. From gentility to populism and racism. C. Vann Woodward, The Strange Career of Jim Crow (New York: Oxford University Press, 1955).

of the South's secession was forgotten in the South. So was the fact that abolitionism had not been the primary cause of the North's aggression.

The Northern press had proclaimed abolitionism as the high moral ground. The South had taken the Northern press at its word—its flood of words. Lincoln was willing in 1860 to allow eddies of the moral tide of abolitionism to push his canoe down the rapids of Presidential politics, but abolitionism was a means to an end for him. His end was getting elected. This was not high moral ground, but it is surely a major part of the American political tradition, then as now.

D. The Confederate Constitution (1861)

So vital was the issue of slavery that the Constitution of the Confederate States of America (March 11, 1861), devoted considerable space to the defense of slavery.

ARTICLE IV

Sec. 2. (1) The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States; and shall have the right of transit and sojourn in any State of this Confederacy, with their slaves and other property; and the right of property in said slaves shall not be thereby impaired. . . .

(3) No slave or other person held to service or labor in any State or Territory of the Confederate States, under the laws thereof, escaping or lawfully carried into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor; but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such slave belongs, or to whom such service or labor may be due.

Sec. 3. (1)

(3) The Confederate States may acquire new territory; and Congress shall have power to legislate and provide governments for the inhabitants of all territory belonging to the Confederate States, lying without the limits of the several States; and may permit them, at such times, and in such manner as it may by law provide, to form States to be admitted into the Confederacy. In all such territory the institution of negro slavery, as it now exists in the Confederate States, shall be recognized and protected by Congress and by the Territorial government; and the inhabitants of the several Confederate States and Territories shall have the right to take to such Territory any slaves lawfully held by them in any of the States or Territories of the Confederate States.

So vital was domestic slave breeding as an economic factor in the South's plantation economy that the Constitution dealt with the need to maintain a closed market for slave breeders. It did so by extending the 1808 prohibition against imported African slaves, which showed deference to England's anti-slavery efforts, and also by authorizing Congress to prohibit the import of slaves from non-African sources.

Article

Sec. 9. (1) The importation of negroes of the African race from any foreign country other than the slaveholding States or Territories of the United States of America, is hereby forbidden; and Congress is required to pass such laws as shall effectually prevent the same.

(2) Congress shall also have power to prohibit the introduction of slaves from any State not a member of, or Territory not belonging to, this Confederacy.²⁰

Robert H. Smith, who represented Alabama in framing the Constitution, and whose name appears on it, made clear in 1861 what the central issue was.

We have dissolved the late Union chiefly because of the negro quarrel. Now, is there any man who wished to reproduce that strife among ourselves? And yet does not he, who wished the slave trade left for the action of Congress, see that he proposed to open a Pandora's box among us and to cause our political arena again to resound with this discussion. Had we left the question unsettled, we should, in my opinion, have sown broadcast the seeds of discord and death in our Constitution. I congratulate the country that the strife has been put to rest forever, and that American slavery is to stand before the world as it is, and on its own merits. We have now placed our domestic institution, and secured its rights unmistakably, in the Constitution; we have sought by no euphony to hide its name—we have called our negroes "slaves," and we have recognized and protected them as persons and our rights to them as property.²¹

20. Constitution of the Confederate States of America (March 11, 1861) (<http://bit.ly/ConfedConstitution>)

21. Hon. Robert H. Smith, An Address to the Citizens of Alabama on the Constitution and Laws of the Confederate States of America (Mobile, 1861), p. 19; cited in Marshall L. DeRosa, The Confederate Constitution of 1861: An Inquiry into American Constitutionalism (Columbia, Missouri: University of Missouri Press, 1991), p. 66.

The word “tariff” does not appear in the Constitution. There was a prohibition on export taxes imposed by any state, unless Congress voted by two-thirds to authorize this (Art. I, Sec. 9, subsec. 7.)

The space devoted to slavery, when compared to the space devoted to tariffs in the foundational document of the Confederacy, makes clear what the central cause of secession was: the defense of slavery. It was Sherman’s victory in Atlanta in the fall of 1864 that began to shift retroactively the South’s apologetic for secession from slavery to state’s rights and tariff reduction.

The evidence is overwhelming: the respected public defenders of the South’s act of secession placed the preservation of chattel slavery at the top of their list of justifications. Remove this one factor, and there would not have been secession.

E. Southern Slavery and the Family

From the beginning of African chattel slavery in the late seventeenth century, Southern slave owners sold their slaves to other slave owners. They bred slaves for personal use and for sale. This was what slave owners in the Roman Empire had done in the era of Augustus, after the importation of slaves declined because of the absence of new wars of empire.

The South’s professional slave breeders received a domestic monopoly when the United States government and the British Navy both began to enforce the law against the importation of slaves. After 1808, the year that the importation of slaves was made illegal in the United States, the only legal source of slaves was the domestic slave economy.

Southern states did not recognize the marriage of slaves as a legally binding covenant that had to be defended in civil courts. Arnold Sio summarized the legal situation:

Legal marriage meant, in conjunction with the rule that the child follow the condition of the mother, that the offspring of slaves had no legal father, whether the father was slave or free. The duration of the union between slaves depended on the interests of the master or those of the slaves. The union was subject at any time to being dissolved by the sale of one or both of the slaves. The children of these “contubernial relationships,” as they were termed, had no legal protection against separation from their parents. In the law there was no such thing as fornication or adultery among slaves. A slave could not be charged with adultery, and a male slave had no legal recourse against another slave, free Negro, or white person for intercourse with his "wife." Nor could the slave present this abuse as evidence in his defense in a criminal charge of assault and battery, or murder.²²

In 1853, a North Carolina Supreme Court justice wrote that "our law requires no solemnity or form in regard to the marriage of slaves, and whether they 'take up' with each other by express permission of their owners, or from a mere impulse of nature, in obedience to the command 'multiply and replenish the earth,' cannot, in the contemplation of the law, make any sort of difference."²³

Slave owners actively encouraged their slaves' sexual unions. Owners for generations harvested crops of slaves. Owners broke up families by selling slave family members "down the river." Slave-breeding became a major source of income for slave owners in the eastern seaboard regions of the South after 1807, where the soil had become depleted and agricultural output had declined. They sold slaves into the deep South, where the soil was far more productive for cotton growing.²⁴

Slave breeding involved the legalization of fornication among slaves in order to provide additional plantation income. The American South's cotton-exporting economy rested on fornication among slaves. The South's plantation economy after 1807 became dependent on slave breeding rather than open conquest by kidnappers chieftains in West Africa. Slave breeding was economically productive. Slaves multiplied in the South, unlike the West Indies, where slaves did not achieve their own biological replacement rate. For as long as the land in the deep South remained productive, there would be a market for the slaves bred on plantations in the poor-soil Piedmont districts in the eastern South.

Socially, the South unofficially adopted the legalization of adultery: white male slave owners and black female slaves. Neither slave husbands/fathers and their victimized wives/daughters nor white wives had any legal recourse in either church courts or civil courts. The color of American slaves and their heirs lightened through the generations,

22. Arnold A. Sio, "Interpretations of Slavery," Comparative Studies in Society and History, VII (April 1965); reprinted in Allen Weinstein and Frank Otto Gatell (eds.), American Negro Slavery: A Modern Reader (New York: Oxford University Press, 1968), p. 315.

23. Cited in Herbert G. Gutman, The Black Family in Slavery and Freedom, 1750–1925 (New York: Pantheon, 1976), p. 52.

24. Alfred H. Conrad and John R. Meyer, "The Economics of Slavery in the Antebellum South," Journal of Economic History (1958); reprinted in Hugh G. J. Aitken (ed.), Did Slavery Pay? (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1971).

making them stand out visibly in a group of Africans. This was not the result of widespread inter-racial marriage, which was illegal in the South until the second half of the twentieth century, a change that came as a result of Northern politics and court decisions.

After 1660, with the steady replacement of white indentured servitude by permanent black slavery, the South's social order within the upper classes was based on the selective legalization of rape and adultery. By ignoring the rape-adultery-seduction-fornication aspects of the denial of marriage to slaves, the Christian South simultaneously undermined the white family and prevented the formation of slave families. The ideal of the family as a covenantal institution to be protected by church courts and civil courts was never accepted in the South for slave owners or their slaves.

This was not admitted by the South's theologians in 1860, and it is also not mentioned by the retroactive defenders of Antebellum South today. This conspiracy of silence is now over three centuries old. The South's plantation society was a white patriarchy that put white women on a pedestal. Then the patriarchs and their unmarried sons spent nights in the slave quarters. Wives, firmly secured to their pedestals, were expected to stay as silent as statues about this arrangement, which they did. Mary Chesnut, the wife of Confederate General (and former U.S. Senator) James Chesnut of South Carolina, observed in her diary:

This only I see: like the patriarchs of old our men live all in one house with their wives & their concubines, & the Mulattoes one sees in every family exactly resemble the white children—& every lady tells you who is the father of all the Mulatto children in every body's household, but those in her own, she seems to think drop from the clouds or pretends so to think.²⁵

The South had no appeals court system, civil or ecclesiastical, that was willing to deal with the seduction or rape of black slave women by white males of the owner's family. The South's laws did not authorize marriage among slaves, yet sexual cohabitation was encouraged by slave owners to produce a continuing crop of future slaves. Southern slavery was an economic system self-consciously built on economically profitable bastardy.

25. C. Vann Woodward and Elisabeth Muhlenfeld (eds.), The Private Mary Chesnut: The Unpublished Civil War Diaries (New York: Oxford University Press, 1984), p. 42.

Southern slavery was institutionalized fornication for the blacks and institutionalized adultery for the whites. The South's civil codes turned a blind eye to the fornication aspect, and winked its other eye at the adultery aspect. On the issue of the integrity of the family, the South's civil codes shook the region's collective fist in the face of God for almost two centuries, daring God to do something about it. God replied, 1861–77. Southerners should have seen what would happen.

Yet they say, The LORD shall not see, neither shall the God of Jacob regard it. Understand, ye brutish among the people: and ye fools, when will ye be wise? He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? he that formed the eye, shall he not see? He that chastiseth the heathen, shall not he correct? he that teacheth man knowledge, shall not he know? (Ps. 94:7–10).

I Timothy 6:1–5²⁶ was used by Dabney to challenge the spirit of abolitionism.²⁷ He understood correctly that this passage places the burden of proof on Christian abolitionists. Dabney's critique of abolitionism in general did nothing prove that slavery, as practiced by the South, was in any way validated by the Bible. There were also civil laws in some Southern states against teaching a slave to read, even if this instruction was given so that the slave could read the Bible. That Paul allowed slavery makes the case for abolitionism difficult, but it does not make the case against Southern slavery diffirverse, anti-Christian, anti-family, but economically profitable until the North won the war in 1865. Then it was gone with the wind.

F. The Origin of Abolitionism

With respect to the moral legitimacy of private chattel slavery, Christian commentators have offered very few suggestions regarding the millennia-long misreading—now almost universally regarded as a misreading—of the biblical texts. The vast majority of America's Protestant Bible commentators since at least 1865 have reversed the older opinion regarding the legitimacy of slavery, but seemingly not on the basis of a careful reconsideration of the relevant biblical texts. This reversal subjects them to a series of uncomfortable accusations: (1) the abolitionist movement undermined the Bible's standards, and therefore should still be opposed; slavery should be legalized; (2) the Bible is morally wrong; (3) situational ethics can and should govern Christianity and civilization. With respect to the case against abolitionism, Christian commentators who have called for complete abolition have been on the defensive exegetically for two centuries.

26. Chapter 8.

27. Robert L. Dabney, A Defense of Virginia [And Through Her, of the South] (Harrisonburg, Virginia: Sprinkle, [1867] 1977), p. 186. The book was written during the Civil War but published two years after the war ended, when almost no one else with any influence was willing to defend slavery retroactively.

In the early nineteenth century, when the abolitionist movement became an international phenomenon in the West, Christians who defended the legitimacy of slavery could and did appeal to First Timothy 6:1–2. If slavery is inherently immoral, they asked, why did Paul tell Christian slaves to obey their masters? Why didn't he tell Christian masters to free their slaves?

For seventeen centuries after Paul wrote these words, no Christian church formally called for the abolition of slavery. Then, in the second half of the eighteenth century, the Society of Friends (Quakers) began to question slave ownership among its members. This escalated rapidly to the Friends' call for state-mandated abolition. Before the century was over, evangelical Protestants in England had taken up the cause of abolition. John Newton, a former slave ship captain—before and after his conversion to Christ in 1748—became a pastor and a writer of hymns, most famously, Amazing Grace. Late in his pastoral career, in the early 1780's, he became an abolitionist. Newton influenced a member of Parliament, William Wilberforce (1759–1833), his old friend, to become a political reformer. Wilberforce publicly took up the abolitionist cause by introducing a bill to indict the slave trade in 1788. In 1833, less than a week before Wilberforce died, slavery in the British Empire was abolished by the British Parliament as the result of Wilberforce's efforts for over four decades. By the 1880's, slavery had universally been abolished by law (and the British Navy) in the West. An institution that had been acceptable in almost every society in history was abandoned in the West in a little over one hundred years. Nevertheless, within half a century of the abolition of slavery in Brazil, private chattel servitude was replaced by state slavery in the Soviet Union and Nazi Germany. The concentration camp replaced the slaves' hut.

Prior to the late eighteenth century, Christian defenders of slavery did not devote much time or effort to a philosophical defense of the institution. Slavery seemed secure, the legacy of a long tradition across the globe. It seemed almost as natural as the family—indeed, an extension of the family. Throughout the Christian tradition, a few theologians had written about the negative effects of slavery on slaves. Among free men, slavery had always been seen as a curse to be avoided personally. Presumably, slaves—who rarely left written records—would have agreed. But no organized group within the church had attempted to mobilize a campaign against slavery. This was equally true in Judaism and Islam. I have already surveyed this story in a lengthy chapter in Tools of Dominion.²⁸

G. Abolitionism as a Protestant Religious Movement

Unitarians were the major intellectual spokesmen for the American abolitionist movement after 1830, but the movement's shock troops were raised up by Northern evangelists, such as the Tappan brothers.²⁹ Abolitionism was not at the forefront of the national revival known as the Second Great Awakening, 1800–1850, but it became a recurring issue beneath the surface after 1820. As time went on, it appeared sporadically on the surface.

Prior to the second half of the eighteenth century, there had been no concerted, organized effort by abolitionists in recorded history. Slavery was an accepted institution with an ancient history. Christians, Jews, and Moslems—"people of the Book"—all agreed: slavery had been authorized by the Old Testament. This authorization had not been changed in their respective commentaries on the Old Testament: the New Testament, the Talmud, and the Koran.

The reversal of opinion in Christianity and Judaism, 1750–1880, was unprecedented. The historian David Brion Davis has devoted his distinguished career to a study of the idea of slavery. He has commented on the extraordinary change in public opinion that took place in the West, 1770–1880.

As late as the 1770s, when the Quaker initiative finally led to a rash of militant antislavery publications on both sides of the Atlantic, no realistic leader could seriously contemplate the abolition of New World slavery—except, on the analogy with European slavery and serfdom, over a span of centuries. Yet in 1808, only thirty-five years after a delegation of British Quakers had failed to persuade the Lord of Trade to allow Virginia to levy a prohibitive tax on further slave

28. Gary North, Tools of Dominion: The Case Laws of Exodus (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/gntools>)

29. Bertram Wyatt-Brown, Lewis Tappan and the Evangelical War Against Slavery (Cleveland, Ohio: Case Western Reserve University, 1969).

imports, Britain outlawed the African slave trade. Twenty-six years later, Britain emancipated some 780,000 colonial slaves, paying 20 million pounds compensation to their supposed owners. Only ninety years separated the first, cautious moves of the Philadelphia Quakers from the emancipation edicts of France and Denmark (1848), which left Brazil, Cuba, Surinam, and the southern United States as the only important slaveholding societies in the New World. It was barely a century after the founding of the London Society for Effecting the Abolition of the Slave Trade (1787), sixty-one years after the final abolition of slavery in New York State (1827), that Brazil freed the last black slaves in the New World. . . . From any historical perspective, this was a stupendous transformation. . . . From the distance of the late twentieth century, however, the progress of emancipation from the 1780s to the 1880s is one of the most extraordinary events in history.³⁰

It is unlikely that the South could have preserved slavery, given the tidal shift in public opinion. The South in 1860 clung fiercely to an institution that was still flourishing economically, but which could not easily spread west of Edgewood, Texas.³¹ The inevitable soil depletion associated with mono-crop cotton farming meant a falling rate of return for slave owners and slave breeders. When the soil became depleted, as had happened in the Piedmont, so did the economic output of slavery. This is why Piedmont's slave owners had become commercial slave breeders.

The South's social order was built on an institution that could not have survived either economically or socially, as the next two decades proved in the West. The South's leaders openly defined the Southern way of life in terms of the economic superiority of slavery, as well as its moral legitimacy. The hard-liners who led the South in 1860 could not see that their moral defense of an economically doomed institution was equally doomed. They preferred to secede in the name of their right to preserve a moral abomination. The South chose a course of action in 1860–61 that turned out to be political suicide, rather than voluntarily surrender an institution that everyone in the South except 30. David Brion Davis, Slavery and Human Progress (New York: Oxford University Press, 1984), p. 108.

31. Look at a map. Edgewood is a few miles east of Dallas. As you drive toward Dallas, the trees that had stretched from the Atlantic to Edgewood begin to thin out. Rain and soil conditions west of Edgewood are not conducive to cotton farming. Then look north. You find prairie. Slavery was not easily enforceable on the farms of the prairie, and surely would not have been enforceable after McCormick's reaper appeared, expanding the size of farms and reducing the number of farmers.

Robert Dabney turned from in retroactive disgust no later than May, 1865.

The South in 1864–65 learned social ethics from William Tecumseh Sherman. He was a savage teacher.

Conclusion

It was not clear Constitutionally in 1860 whether a state legally could secede. James Madison and the Federalists of 1787 were careful never to discuss publicly this aspect of the Constitution. Had they publicly adopted Lincoln's no-secession position, the Constitution would never have been ratified. In 1861, the right of secession was still an open issue in Constitutional theory.

It was a civil war from the beginning because it was a war to control the government's tax revenues. South Carolina demanded the right to collect tariffs at the Port of Charleston. The rest of the South then joined with South Carolina to divvy up the tax revenues from all of the ports, and escape the whiskey tax, too.

Lincoln would not allow this. He went to war for two reasons: his commitment to the idea of the Union, which he repeated publicly over and over, and his commitment to collect the tariff, which he rarely mentioned in public. Most historians have neglected the second issue.

The sovereign right to collect tariffs was no one's high moral ground, North or South. Neither side admitted that tariff-collection was Lincoln's immediate motivation to send U.S. Navy ships to Charleston. Both sides regarded this issue—the issue that made that war a true civil war—as too trivial for the purpose of mobilizing the troops to fight and die for.

Remove chattel slavery from the list of causes of the war of 1861–65, and it is just about inconceivable that the war would have begun. Southern states seceded in 1861 in order to escape what their leaders perceived would be the likely political effects of the North's abolitionist movement after Lincoln's election. But the flash point for the South was John Brown's raid at Harpers Ferry in 1859. The Northern press was solidly behind Brown, presenting him as a martyr. Lincoln's election in 1860 confirmed the South's worst fears.

England had settled the moral issue of slavery without war, but few slave owners had lived in England. They lived in the West Indies. They had been part of an economic interest, but were not an integral part of the nation. They did not have the military ability to threaten secession.

So, they accepted Parliament's manumission money. In the United States, however, slave owners had been among the primary framers of the Constitution. The South was a major voting bloc. The chief Constitutional issue in 1860—the right of a state to secede—had always been disputed by scholars and politicians. This legal issue was settled once, though not necessarily for all, on the battlefield—or, more precisely, approximately 10,400 battlefields. It took the lives of 620,000 combatants to settle it. John Brown won the Civil War his way. The action was the reaction.

ETHICS AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON THE EPISTLES

Other Books by Gary North

- An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)
 Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)
An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)
 Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)
 None Dare Call It Witchcraft (1976)
 Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)
 Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)
 Government by Emergency (1983)
 Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)
75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)
 Coined Freedom (1984)
 Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)
 Honest Money (1986)
 Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)
Dominion and Common Grace (1987)
 Inherit the Earth (1987)
 Liberating Planet Earth (1987)
 Healer of the Nations (1987)
 The Pirate Economy (1987)
Is the World Running Down? (1988)
 When Justice Is Aborted (1989)
 Political Polytheism (1989)
 Judeo-Christian Tradition (1990)
 The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)
 Victim's Rights (1990)
Millennialism and Social Theory (1990)
 Westminster's Confession (1991)
Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar
 The Coase Theorem (1992)
 Salvation Through Inflation (1993)
 Rapture Fever (1993)
 Tithing and the Church (1994)
 Baptized Patriarchalism (1995)
 Crossed Fingers (1996)
 The Covenantal Tithe (2011)
 Mises on Money (2012)

ETHICS AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON THE EPISTLES

GARY NORTH

Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles

Copyright © Gary North, 2012

??? Edition

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

This book is dedicated to
Jim and Judith Andruss
Who were present at the beginning

TABLE OF CONTENTS

| | |
|---|-----|
| Preface | ix |
| Introduction | 1 |
| 1. Ethical Cause and Effect (II Cor. 5:10) | 3 |
| 2. Nonmarketable Riches (II Cor. 6:10) | 5 |
| 3. Unequal Yoking (II Cor. 6:14) | 14 |
| 4. Grace and Economic Sacrifice (II Cor. 8:1–4) | 19 |
| 5. From Poverty to Riches (II Cor. 8:9) | 26 |
| 6. Mutual Aid through Mutual Confession (II Cor. 8:13–15) | 33 |
| 7. Persuasive Fund-Raising (II Cor. 9:3–5) | 42 |
| 8. The Covenantal Prosperity Gospel (II Cor. 9:6) | 48 |
| 9. Charity: Voluntarism vs. Compulsion (II Cor. 9:7–12) | 61 |
| 10. Financial Independence (II Cor. 12:16–18) | 69 |
| 11. Charity and the Kingdom (Gal. 2:9–10) | 71 |
| 12. The Right of Contract (Gal. 3:15) | 80 |
| 13. Pie in the Sky By and By (Gal. 6:7–10) | 87 |
| 14. Maturity Through Cooperation (Eph. 4:14–16) | 94 |
| 15. New Covenant Repentance (Eph. 4:28) | 99 |
| 16. Legislated Covetousness (Eph. 5:3–5) | 105 |
| 17. Economic Predictability (Eph. 6:8) | 112 |
| 18. Production Trumps Consumption (Phil. 1:21) | 120 |
| 19. Self-Interest and Envy (Phil. 2:4) | 126 |
| 20. The Dominion Procedure (Phil. 2:5–12) | 135 |
| 21. Progress and Prize (Phil. 3:14) | 140 |
| 22. The Entrepreneur's Edge (Phil. 4:6–7) | 148 |
| 23. Contentment Without Complacency (Phil. 4:11–13) | 155 |
| 24. Supernatural Capital (Col. 1:29) | 162 |
| 25. A Supernatural Perspective (Col. 3:1–2) | 166 |
| 26. The Reward of the Inheritance (Col. 3:17, 23–25) | 170 |
| 27. Taking Care of Business (I Thes. 4:11–12) | 176 |
| 28. Against the Welfare State (II Thes. 3:10–12) | 180 |
| 29. The Christian Tithe (Heb. 2:17–3:1) | 183 |
| 30. A Question of Trust (Heb. 13:5–6) | 190 |

| | |
|---|-----|
| 31. Charity as Sacrifice (Heb. 13:14–16) | 197 |
| 32. Below-Cost Wisdom (James 1:5–8) | 205 |
| 33. Money and Status (James 1:9–11) | 211 |
| 34. Property and Common Grace (James 1:17) | 255 |
| 35. Clothes Do Not Make the Covenant Man (James 2:1–7) .. | 221 |
| 36. The Origin of War (James 4:1–3) | 228 |
| 37. Affirming God's Sovereignty (James 4:13–15) | 235 |
| 38. Corrupt Riches (James 5:1–6) | 239 |
| 39. Ladies' Fashions (I Peter 3:1–6) | 246 |
| 40. The Wisdom of a Donkey (II Peter 2:14–16) | 252 |
| 41. Two Forms of Wealth (Rev. 3:17–18) | 256 |
| 42. Reversal of Fortune (Rev. 18:15–18) | 261 |
| 43. The Final Inheritance (Rev. 21:7) | 265 |
| Conclusion | 270 |
| Appendix—Eschatology and Social Theory | 280 |

PREFACE

And it shall come to pass, if thou shalt hearken diligently unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to observe and to do all his commandments which I command thee this day, that the LORD thy God will set thee on high above all nations of the earth: And all these blessings shall come on thee, and overtake thee, if thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God (Deut. 28:1–2).

But it shall come to pass, if thou wilt not hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to observe to do all his commandments and his statutes which I command thee this day; that all these curses shall come upon thee, and overtake thee (Deut. 28:15).

A. Ethical Causation

The Bible teaches that we live in a world of ethical cause and effect. This was first revealed to man in Genesis 2. “And the LORD God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die” (Gen. 2:16–17). It is therefore also the teaching of biblical covenant theology.

God governs mankind by means of five covenants: dominion, family, individual, civil, and ecclesiastical.¹ Point three of the biblical covenant²—ethics—is enforced by point four: sanctions.³ Whatever we think, say, and do has inescapable implications for our inheritance in eternity. “For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, so that each one may receive what is due for what he has done in the

1. Acronym DFISC: dominion, family, individual, state, church.

2. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

3. Ibid., ch. 4.

body, whether good or evil" (II Cor. 5:10).⁴

Biblical ethics governs individual cause and effect, beginning with Adam. What about corporate cause and effect? What about the family? Yes? We are agreed. What about in the church? Yes? We are agreed. What about in the state? All of a sudden, a chill runs down the spines of modern Christians. "The state? You mean civil government? Is it governed by an explicitly biblical system of ethical cause and effect? Maybe not. Probably not. I don't know. Let's talk about something else."

This raises a crucial question for economics. In all but pure anarchistic theories of economics, civil government plays a role in economic practice and theory. The state enforces contracts. It punishes theft. It prohibits fraud. The state is a covenantal institution. If the state, as a covenantal institution, is not governed by biblical law, then how can economics be biblical?

As is true of all social theory, all forms of economic theory are structured by a five-point model, which reflects the biblical covenant. In every economy, as in every theory of economics, there is a sovereign source of law and order. There is a system of hierarchical accountability. There are laws of human action. There is a system of sanctions: rewards and penalties. Finally, there is a system of inheritance. Put simply:

Who's in charge here?
To whom do I report?
What are the rules?
What do I get if I obey (disobey)?
Does this outfit have a future?

B. Humanism's Economic Theory

I have said that all economic theory is structured by a five-point model. This includes humanist economics.

First, modern humanistic economic theory designates two sources of sovereignty: autonomous man and autonomous nature. All economic value is said to arise from land and labor. Both of these factors of production are scarce, i.e., at zero price, there is greater demand than supply.

Second, there is a system of accountability. There is some final agency that imposes sanctions. In economic theory and practice, there are two representative authorities: the free market and the civil government. With the exception of a handful of anarchistic economists, who deny the legitimacy of the state, all economies are seen as a mixture of market and state. In a free market social order, the primary agency of law enforcement is the market itself. For a socialistic economy, the state's central planning agency specifies sanctions, and the police enforce them.

4. Chapter 1.

Third, there is a system of laws. People's economic behavior in specific instances is predictable only because there are broad patterns of human behavior. Economists search for these predictable patterns of behavior. These patterns are referred to as laws of economics.

Fourth, every economy has a system of institutional sanctions that enhances or retards these patterns of behavior. Free market economists believe that the most powerful sanctions are profits and losses. Socialists rely on political and bureaucratic decrees, which they believe should supersede market processes. Socialist systems offer bonuses, promotions, and demotions.

Fifth, there is inheritance. The free market system is based on the survival of the efficient. For the socialist, inheritance is by government allocation: service to the sovereign People by way of meeting of centrally planned quotas and standards.

The key to all free market economic theories is the idea of endogenous change. The primary factors that direct individual and corporate change are inherent in the free market social and legal order. The free market is nearly autonomous in the sense of self-reinforcing and self-adjusting. It is system of positive and negative feedback.

The socialist economy is exogenous. It relies on the intervention of the state, which is governed by standards different from the free market, to direct the economic process.

C. Biblical Economic Theory

The Old Testament offered a covenantal system of economics. A sovereign Creator God (Gen. 1)⁵ has delegated responsibility to mankind to administer the creation (Gen. 1:26–28).⁶ The system had ethical laws: the Mosaic law. Success or failure for individuals and society come from obedience or disobedience to Bible-revealed laws (Deut.

5. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1.

6. Ibid., chaps. 3, 4.

28).⁷ Inheritance was by obedience. “The righteous shall inherit the land, and dwell therein for ever” (Ps. 37:29).

The question arises: Does the Mosaic covenant’s structure still govern New Testament economic theory? This is the issue of hermeneutics: biblical interpretation. Every system of theology has a hermeneutic, either self-consciously adopted or naively assumed.

This commentary rests on a specific hermeneutic: a Mosaic law is innocent until proven guilty. Unless a New Testament principle denies a Mosaic law, it is obligatory today. The most common hermeneutic today is different: every Mosaic law that has not been explicitly affirmed by the New Testament is defunct. Here is the covenantal debate: continuity vs. discontinuity. On what basis should Christians decide which Mosaic laws continue into the New Testament and which do not? By what principle of interpretation?

D. Economic Cause and Effect

The Mosaic law taught that there is ethical cause and effect in history. While there are discrepancies in individual situations between what a person experiences in history and what he will experience in eternity, the Bible teaches that with respect to covenantal corporate sanctions, what we see in history reflects what will take place in eternity. A society that breaks biblical laws cannot prosper for long. It may prosper for a generation or two, but at some point, God brings negative corporate sanctions against the society. It no longer can expand its covenant-breaking kingdom.

Psalms 73 teaches that, for a time, covenant-breakers are capable of prospering. “And they say, How doth God know? and is there knowledge in the most High? Behold, these are the ungodly, who prosper in the world; they increase in riches” (vv. 11–12). But this prosperity is a trap. It places covenant-breaking individuals on a slippery slope. “When I thought to know this, it was too painful for me; Until I went into the sanctuary of God; then understood I their end. Surely thou didst set them in slippery places: thou castedst them down into destruction. How are they brought into desolation, as in a moment! they are utterly consumed with terrors” (vv. 16–19). The psalmist came to the conclusion that it is a mistake to believe that covenant-breaking is productive in the long run.⁸

7. ????, ch. 68.

8. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms

The primary question that this commentary raises is this: Do the New Testament epistles teach a doctrine of covenantal continuity with the Mosaic law in the area of economics? I conclude that the answer is yes. Now I must prove this to your satisfaction.

Will you listen to me? Will you believe me?

E. Hearing and Believing

Paul wrote, “So then faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God: (Rom. 10:17). The power of hearing was far greater in Paul’s era than in ours. Today, we sit and read. That was not true in Paul’s era.

You need to know something that was crucial to Paul’s era, which is not crucial in ours. It is this:

INPAULSERAWRITINGHADNOSPACESORPUNCTUATIONPA-
PYRUSWAEXPENSIVESOWRITERSDIDNOTWASTESPACEON-
SPACESBETWEENLETTERSORPUNCTUATIONMARK-
SALSOALLLETTERSWERECAPITALIZED

Got that? Once you understand this, things become clearer. But, you say, you do not understand it. To understand it, you need this:

In Paul’s era, writing had no spaces or punctuation. Papyrus was expensive, so writers did not waste space on spaces between letters or punctuation marks. Also, all letters were capitalized.

The introduction of spaces between letters began about a thousand years ago, in the medieval era.⁹ In an often cited passage in Augustine’s autobiographical Confessions, we read silently of how impressed he was with Bishop Ambrose’s ability to read silently. “Now, as he read, his eyes glanced over the pages and his heart searched out the sense, but his voice and tongue were silent.” This practice was so odd that Augustine searched for a logical explanation. “Perhaps he was fearful lest, if the author he was studying should express himself vaguely, some doubtful and attentive hearer would ask him to expound it or discuss some of the more abstruse questions, so that he could not get over as much material as he wished, if his time was occupied with others. And even a truer reason for his reading to himself might have been the care for preserving his voice, which was very easily weakened. Whatever his motive was in so doing, it was doubtless, in such a man, a good one.”¹⁰

(Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 17.

9. Matthew Carmody, “Thought and Language (Part 1),” Richmond Journal of Philosophy, XI (2005), p. 2. See also Alberto Manguel, A History of Reading (New York: Viking, 1996), ch. 2.

It was not that Augustine could not read silently.

So I quickly returned to the bench where Alypius was sitting, for there I had put down the apostle’s book when I had left there. I snatched it up, opened it, and in silence read the paragraph on which my eyes first fell: “Not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying, but put on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make no provision for the flesh to fulfill the lusts thereof.”¹¹

Silent reading was so difficult that very few literate people did it. Literate people read by reading aloud. When they heard their own voices, they mentally inserted spaces between words and punctuation marks. So, the epistles were meant to be read aloud. When we speak of “readers,” we really mean “listeners.” A literate person read the epistles aloud, even when he was alone.

The fact that you can read this book silently and in private is part of one of the greatest social transformations in history. It has had two stages. The first stage was the printing press. The second stage was the World Wide Web.

F. Other Epistles

There are three other epistles besides the ones I cover in this book. I have written commentaries on all of them: Romans,¹² First Corinthians,¹³ and First Timothy.¹⁴ They contain more economic material than we find in the epistles that followed.

While the book of Revelation is not generally classified as an epistle, it was an epistle. It was the epistle. There are more commentaries and more debates over the book of Revelation than any other epistle. But there is not much economic material in it. Nevertheless it contains the verse that describes the culmination of all economic the-

10. The Confessions of St. Augustine, VI:III.

11. Ibid., VIII:XII

12. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012).

13. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012).

14. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012).

ory. “He that overcometh shall inherit all things; and I will be his God, and he shall be my son” (Rev. 21:7).¹⁵ This will end the curse of the earth: “But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die. And the LORD God said, It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him an help meet for him” (Gen. 2:17–18).¹⁶ But it will not end economics. There will still be scarcity in the culmination of the New Heaven and the New Earth, after the final judgment and resurrection, just as there was in Eden before the Fall.¹⁷

15. Chapter 43.

16. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

17. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), pp. 124–28. (<http://bit.ly/gn-world>)

INTRODUCTION

The LORD shall command the blessing upon thee in thy storehouses, and in all that thou settest thine hand unto; and he shall bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee. The LORD shall establish thee an holy people unto himself, as he hath sworn unto thee, if thou shalt keep the commandments of the LORD thy God, and walk in his ways (Deut. 28:8–9).

The theocentric issue here is corporate sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

Moses said that wealth in a covenant-keeping society is based on obedience to the laws of the covenant. Has this system of cause and effect changed in the New Testament? Is there some other lawful way to wealth for covenant-keepers? Jesus taught that there is not. “Give, and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your bosom. For with the same measure that ye mete withal it shall be measured to you again” (Luke 6:38).² This is the biblical principle of sowing and reaping. This principle was taught in the Old Testament.

Sow to yourselves in righteousness, reap in mercy; break up your fallow ground: for it is time to seek the LORD, till he come and rain righteousness upon you. Ye have plowed wickedness, ye have reaped iniquity; ye have eaten the fruit of lies: because thou didst trust in thy way, in the multitude of thy mighty men (Hosea 10:12–13).

There is a rival view of the origin of wealth: the survival of the fittest. This Darwinian biological principle was applied to society by right-wing social Darwinists in the late nineteenth century.³ They con-

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 11.

3. The two most noted defenders of this view were Herbert Spencer, who coined

cluded that the free market is valid because it is in conformity with this Darwinian principle. Successful individuals triumph by getting rich. Left-wing social Darwinists objected. They rejected the individualistic concept of survival. They focused on the collective: mankind. They argued that, because elite representatives of modern man as a species now understand the scientific principles of progress, the state can plan the economy so as to make it more efficient and productive⁴. Mankind as a species gains control over nature. In neither version of social Darwinism did biblical ethics play any role.

The authors of the epistles of the New Testament appealed to ethics as the basis of wealth. Specifically, they invoked Mosaic laws to defend their concept of economic success. They did not limit their commentaries to the individual Christian believer. They applied the principle of ethical sowing and economic reaping to society. Their concept of the biblical covenant extended beyond personal ethics and personal success. In this sense, they were consistent with Moses and the Old Covenant prophets.

Christian economics must begin with God's revelation of Himself through the Bible. We need biblical revelation to assess accurately economic cause and effect. The prophetic books and the epistles call men to repent. They promise blessings for repentance and cursings for disobedience. These blessings and cursings are historical. They are also both individual and social.

There is no radical discontinuity between the system of economic causation presented in the Old Testament and the system presented in the New Testament. The authors of the epistles recognized the authority of the Old Covenant and repeatedly invoked it. This commentary is a defense of this principle of biblical interpretation.

the phrase "survival of the fittest," and William Graham Sumner.

4. The most systematic defender of this view was Lester Frank Ward. Cf. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), Appendix A. Ward opposed the free market Darwinists and Christians with equal contempt.

1

ETHICAL CAUSE AND EFFECT

For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, so that each one may receive what is due for what he has done in the body, whether good or evil (II Cor. 5:10).

The theocentric principle undergirding this passage is point four of the biblical covenant: sanctions.¹

A. The Final Judgment

This passage focuses on the final judgment. As such, it is the archetype for all passages relating to sanctions. What will occur at the end of time serves as an ethical model for what should occur in history. The doctrine of final judgment undergirds the biblical covenantal concept of sanctions.

There are three covenantal institutions, meaning institutions established by a public oath before God: church, family, and state. Each of the three covenantal institutions has both positive and negative sanctions. In each of them, sanctions are imposed by the person officially sanctioned by the organization's officers to impose sanctions. This person represents the organization: point two of the biblical covenant.² For the individual covenant, God directly brings sanctions, in history as well as eternity. This was true of the dominion covenant.

There will be a final judgment. This final judgment will be perfect in its assessment of each individual's thoughts, words, and deeds. Justice will be meted out perfectly: there will be absolute consistency between individual history and individual eternity. Covenant-breakers will be rewarded according to their deeds, and covenant-keepers will be rewarded according to their deeds. Covenant-breakers will be subject exclusively to negative sanctions,³ while covenant-keepers will be subject exclusively to positive sanctions.⁴ This is because of the grace of God in the lives of covenant-keepers, because Christ bore all of the negative penalties at the cross. But this does not in any way deny the ethical cause-and-effect system that is described in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. Those who deny that the ethical cause-and-effect system of Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28 extends into the New Testament have a moral obligation to defend this position exegetically. They rarely do. They merely assume it.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Ibid., ch. 2.

Conclusion

This is the shortest chapter I have written in some 31 volumes of commentaries on the economics of the Bible. I hope you will remember its thesis, which is crucial for both biblical social and biblical economic theory.

3. "And that servant, which knew his lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more" (Luke 12:47–48). Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

4. "If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire" (I Cor. 3:14–15). Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 3.

2

NONMARKETABLE RICHES

Although saddened, we are always glad; we seem poor, but we make many people rich; we seem to have nothing, yet we really possess everything (II Cor. 6:10).

The theocentric issue of wealth and poverty is the issue of sanctions in history: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. The Scent of Death

This verse appears in a section of the epistle in which Paul uses a series of contrasts in order to make a point. He is trying to get across to his listeners that the Christian life, if lived consistently, comes under negative sanctions. Critics of Christianity eventually become critics of those who speak on behalf of Christianity. There is no escape from criticism when a Christian lives and speaks consistently with what he believes. The reason for this, according to Paul, is that covenant-breakers recognize the threat to them that Christianity represents. He calls it the scent of death. Yet this same scent is a scent of life to covenant-keepers. “For we are unto God a sweet savour of Christ, in them that are saved, and in them that perish: To the one we are the savour of death unto death; and to the other the savour of life unto life. And who is sufficient for these things?” (II Cor. 2:15–16). So, the same lifestyle produces widely varying responses in different people. The Christian’s critics are consistent. So are his advocates. Each group’s evaluations are consistent with its own presuppositions. The result is positive and negative at the same time, in response to the same words and deeds. Here is Paul’s summary.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

We are honored and disgraced; we are insulted and praised. We are treated as liars, yet we speak the truth; as unknown, yet we are known by all; as though we were dead, but, as you see, we live on. Although punished, we are not killed; although saddened, we are always glad; we seem poor, but we make many people rich; we seem to have nothing, yet we really possess everything (vv. 8–10).

He begins the list with the contrast between honor and disgrace. He does not begin with finances. Then he moves to the issues of obscurity and fame. Then he moves to functional life and death. He speaks of being punished, but he insists that he has not been killed. The negative sanctions were severe, but they were not sufficiently severe to silence him or stop his ministry.

With this as background, we come to Paul's statement regarding sadness and happiness: "although saddened, we are always glad." How can someone be both at the same time? Because there is gladness in sadness. The supreme aspect in history of this is the cross. It began as sadness but ended in joy—for Christ above all, but also for the disciples. Paul can see the joyful results of the negative sanctions that produce sadness.

B. Wealth: Marketable and Nonmarketable

1. Two Kinds of Wealth and Poverty

Then he comes to the theme of wealth and poverty. Paul seems to be poor, but he has made other people rich. He seems to possess nothing, yet he insists that he has everything. It should be clear that he is not talking about marketable wealth. He is burdened by poverty, but this poverty does not slow him down or discourage him. Somehow, he overcomes poverty, and in doing so, he assists others in their quest for riches. But does he mean marketable riches? Given the nature of the contrasts in this passage, it is clear that he is talking about spiritual riches: things that are worth having, but which are not marketable. A person cannot buy them for money. He can buy counterfeits, but not the real things.

These nonmarketable riches are valuable assets. They are worth pursuing. But, whenever attained, they remain nonmarketable. The individual who attains them cannot go into the marketplace and offer to sell them in exchange for other assets. These riches are real, but they are not marketable.

What kinds of riches does he have in mind? In other passages, he described the benefits of saving faith in history. These benefits do not exclude financial success, but financial success is not mandatory for those who would like to achieve these benefits. "But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance: against such there is no law" (Gal. 5:22–23). These, he contrasted with the works of the flesh.

Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these; adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, Idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies Envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings, and such like: of the which I tell you before, as I have also told you in time past, that they which do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God (Gal. 5:19–21).

Again, the crucial issue is this: the riches he has accumulated are not marketable. They are not bought and sold with money, favors, goods, or other services. The contrast is between marketable benefits and nonmarketable benefits.

2. Benefits in History

Paul is consistent in his assertion that there are benefits to be attained in history. He is not talking about what is commonly referred to as pie in the sky by and by. His focus is earthly. As surely as the negative sanctions that critics have imposed on him are historical, so are the benefits that he describes by using the language of marketable wealth. The contrast is not between time and eternity; the contrast is between marketable riches and non-marketable riches.

People search after these nonmarketable riches. Men commonly want to be regarded as honorable. They know that they cannot purchase honor. In fact, the very suggestion that honor could be purchased with money or other forms of wealth is ludicrous. The essence of honor is the fact that a person cannot be bought off with money or other forms of marketable wealth. A man seeks honor and wants to avoid disgrace.

Paul's critics have sought to disgrace him. The critics have not sought to steal his money. They have sought to steal his reputation. They perceive that what he possesses of great value is a good reputation. This good reputation strengthens him, and it strengthens his cause. They have sought to undermine his cause by undermining his legitimate claim to honor.

It would be naive to believe that wealth, meaning marketable wealth, is superior to such characteristics or benefits in life as honor and a good reputation. A man should also want to be known as truthful. If he lies in order to gain greater wealth, he has violated the law of God. Yet it is not just the Israelites who understand this relationship price of honor: not surrendering it for less valuable goods. The whole world recognizes this.

One aspect of honor is a commitment to truth-telling. The man does not want to be perceived as someone who lies for the sake of marketable goods, including money. A man who surrenders his honor or surrenders his reputation as a truth-teller for the sake of increased marketable wealth is regarded in most cultures as someone who has traded something of great value for something of lesser value. To use Jesus' language, this is someone who has sold the pearl of great price for money. The essence of wisdom is to buy the pearl with all of your money. "Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchant man, seeking goodly pearls: Who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had, and bought it" (Matt. 13:45–46).² Jesus' point was not that money can buy this pearl of great price. His point was that nothing, including money, is worth holding onto in preference to God's kingdom. Money was His representative asset. If something can be purchased with money, the kingdom is not for sale in exchange for it.

3. The Pursuit of Riches

Paul is warning against the pursuit of riches that are marketable at the expense of riches that are not marketable. He is saying that people who imitate him with respect to truth-telling and honest dealing will receive wealth. This wealth cannot be purchased with money or marketable goods. Yet it is legitimate wealth, and it is preferable wealth.

It would be a mistake to argue that Paul insists here that marketable wealth and nonmarketable wealth are inherently in opposition to each other. He is seeking by this letter to gain donations from the church at Corinth for the support of the Jerusalem church. He does not criticize materialistic wealth. If it were not for the fact that the Corinthian church had great marketable wealth, because its members were wealthy, the church could not make a sizable donation to the Jerusalem church. Nowhere in his epistle does he criticize the Corinthians for possessing great marketable wealth. He criticizes them for hanging onto their wealth so tightly that Christians who were suffering would be forced to suffer more than was necessary. Given the great wealth of the Corinthian church, and given the fact that the members of the church could afford to make a substantial donation of money for the support of the Jerusalem church, the church should give generously.

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 31.

4. Marketable Wealth: A Tool

Paul understood that marketable wealth is a tool. It is a tool of relief. It is a tool of evangelism. It is a tool that can be used to extend the kingdom of God in history in a way that without such wealth, the task of kingdom-building would be more difficult. Marketable wealth is like a lever. You can move resistant barriers by means of a lever. Paul nowhere recommends that people not make good use of their marketable wealth; on the contrary, he advises them that they make good use of it.

He understood that, in the familiar phrase, "There is more where this came from." There is more marketable wealth available to successful people; therefore, they should not begrudge others a share of that wealth when others are suffering through no fault of their own.

5. The Welfare State

Paul does not call on the civil government to support the Jerusalem church. He calls on another church to support a distant church. He in no way suggests that the Jerusalem church had some sort of a legal claim on the marketable wealth of the Corinthian church. He does say that the Corinthian church should fulfill its promise, made months earlier, that it would support the Jerusalem church.

Paul is saying here that individuals who are wealthy in terms of marketable goods are in a position to help those who are also wealthy, though in need of marketable goods. The two forms of wealth are different. He did not say that the Corinthian church possessed greater wealth of significance than the Jerusalem church did. He implied that the Macedonian church, which had considerably less marketable wealth at its disposal than the Corinthian church did, was in possession of greater quantities of the nonmarketable wealth which Paul insisted, and Jesus insisted, is the preferable form of wealth.

Jesus said that the way to build up wealth in the realm beyond the grave is to sacrifice marketable wealth in the present (Matt. 6:19–21).³ Paul does not say this here. Paul here is appealing to the consciences of the members of the Corinthian church, but he does not promise them extra blessings in the world beyond the grave as payment for their charitable giving. On the contrary, Paul tells them of benefits in history: possessing the kind of wealth that the Macedonian church possessed. This is also the same kind of wealth that he possesses. This wealth sustains him in the midst of a world of critics who deny that he possesses any of these forms of nonmarketable wealth.

C. No Call to Poverty

1. A System of Temporal Rewards

Paul does not come to them in the name of sacrifice as a goal in itself. He does not claim that giving up some of their wealth is a good thing in and of itself. He is saying rather that to surrender the marketable wealth which they had promised earlier to surrender will produce rewards in history. He is not talking about rewards of greater quantities of marketable wealth. He assumes that they have access to additional marketable wealth. This was a wealthy church. People who have the ability to make money also have the ability to make more money. Take away their money, let them loose in a strange city, and a year later, or two years later, these people will have accumulated wealth. Paul does not tell them to become poorer in marketable goods. He tells them to become rich in nonmarketable wealth.

He is not calling them to a life of poverty. Ministers who raise money for charitable causes have no commitment to the ideal of poverty. The whole point of their fund-raising is that they are attempting to reduce poverty. The means of reducing this poverty belongs to the person who has accumulated marketable wealth. Paul is not saying that wealth-making is a demonic ability. He is saying only that, if this is the only ability that a person possesses, then he is poor indeed. Such a person has cut himself off from the nonmarketable riches of this world. These riches are worth pursuing, for if they were not worth pursuing, Paul would not brag to them that he had accumulated such wealth by means of his ministry.

3. Ibid., ch. 13.

2. Nonmarketable Wealth and Poverty

This passage contrasts nonmarketable wealth and nonmarketable poverty. He has been called a liar; he has been called disgraceful. His name has been sullied. While this might have negative implications for his accumulation of marketable wealth, the fact that he has no marketable wealth indicates that his concern with these false accusations had nothing to do with his concern over the affairs of his business. He did not say that these critics were making it more difficult for him to work as a tentmaker (Acts 18:3).⁴ There is no suggestion that his concern about these false accusations was a concern over the status of his marketable wealth or his ability to gain additional marketable wealth. The contrast is between marketable wealth and nonmarketable poverty.

He realizes that by proclaiming the gospel faithfully, this will simultaneously gain him both nonmarketable wealth and nonmarketable poverty. In some circles, he will have a good reputation. In other circles, he will have a bad reputation. As Americans say, "it comes with the territory." He did not seek to refute those who accused him of being a liar. He simply went on about his work. He had no illusions about being able to reduce the number of false accusations against him, other than by surrendering his commitment to spreading the gospel. He was not willing to pay that price. The price that he was unwilling to pay was not the forfeiture of marketable wealth by refusing to compromise. The price that he was unwilling to pay was to achieve nonmarketable wealth by compromising.

3. Fund-Raising

The primary goal of Second Corinthians was to raise money for the Jerusalem church. In no way was its goal to criticize the possession of marketable wealth. The issue was this: what the members of the church, acting through the church, would do with their marketable wealth. Would they hang onto it, as if there were no possibility of a continuing stream of marketable wealth? Or would they generously transfer a portion of their marketable wealth to those who were in need of marketable wealth?

Paul reminds them in this epistle of what they had promised before. He seems to be aware of the fact that some members of the church have decided that they had been overly generous before. They had concluded: "It is time to become more realistic." Paul points to the fact that if they are consistent in their faith, they should expect to accumulate nonmarketable wealth and also nonmarketable poverty. Their good reputation in some circles will be cause for others to spread false rumors about their activities. They cannot escape from the dual sanctions that are applied by rival kingdoms to the same action. This is a war to the death. We should not expect to be good soldiers and also escape the dangers of the battlefield.

4. Gary North, Sacrifice and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Acts, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 9.

So, while this epistle is about the use of marketable wealth, it is primarily about the accumulation of nonmarketable wealth and the simultaneous accumulation of nonmarketable poverty. The two go together. This is what had happened in Paul's life. He had those who praised him, and he had those who criticized him. Yet he was the same man.

D. Imputation

The theological issue here is imputation. One group imputed good motives to his actions; the other group imputed evil motives to his actions. One group claimed that he did good things; the other group claimed that he did evil things. There is no way to escape the imputation of evil if you are doing objective good for the kingdom of God. This is why Paul makes this series of contrasts.

Then how can we sort it out? If the same act produces positive and negative sanctions, as well as positive and negative imputations, is all of life chaos? Is it all meaningless? Paul's point was that he knew that he was doing the right thing. He did not rely on other people to provide a positive assessment of his ministry. "For not he that commendeth himself is approved, but whom the Lord commendeth" (II Cor. 10:18).

It is God's imputation that matters, not anyone else's. So, it should be the goal of the covenant-keeper to make imputations that are consistent with God's imputations. Paul reminds the reader of this fact when he says that he is rich. If he is rich, on what basis is he rich? He is rich because of the objective character of his words and deeds, but more to the point, he is rich because of God's imputation of success to him. God had done this with Jesus. He had said, "This is my beloved son in whom I am well pleased" (Matt. 3:17; 17:5). Paul was confident that God, in His mercy, had called him to a ministry. Paul had faithfully performed this ministry, and therefore he was in possession of riches. These riches did not arrive from the good judgments of covenant-keepers. They arrived from the imputation by God concerning Paul's success as a minister of the gospel.

Conclusion

Wealth is more than marketable wealth. Far more important is nonmarketable wealth. This, Paul possessed. He also was the target of false accusations. Call this nonmarketable poverty. It did not make him poorer in marketable riches. It did hinder the work of his ministry. But the value of his ministry in God's eyes was what mattered to Paul. God's imputation counted. The critics' imputations did not.

3

UNEQUAL YOKING

Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness? (II Cor. 6:14)

The theocentric issue here was yoking by covenantal oath: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Covenantal Bonds

This passage is used by critics of confessionally mixed marriages. A covenant-keeper should not marry a covenant-breaker. To do so compromises the productivity of the marriage. Marriage is to be in terms of the husband's calling before God. He takes a wife to assist him in his work, by which he extends the kingdom of God in history. If he takes a wife who does not share his view of God, man, law, sanctions, and the future, he compromises his work.

The text does not say that it is wrong to work with people who do not share your confession. You are not to be unequally yoked with them. That is, if you hold the hammer, it is legitimate to invite others to become nails in the arrangement. Another way to put it, if you are in control of the direction in which the bus is driving, then it is fine to invite on board others who will sit in the back of the bus and pay for the trip. To deny this would be to deny the division of labor. But they must not be in a decision-making capacity.

A family is not such an association. The members are legally bonded to each other. A common confession should be the judicial foundation of the bond.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

The same is true of a church. If you join a church in which covenant-breakers have control over the affairs of the church, or over the affairs of the denomination, then this prohibition would apply. You must not covenant yourself with unbelievers who will work against your interests as a covenant-keeper. You join the church in order to be a participant in a joint venture. This joint venture is dependent upon the shared confession of all of the members. Do not submit yourself judicially to church discipline that is not conducted in terms of the Bible. Do not submit to people who do not subject themselves to the biblical standards that govern the institutional church.

This raises the question of civil government. In most nations today, the civil constitution, whether written or unwritten, is not formally committed to the God of the Bible. In many cases, it explicitly rejects any such commitment. For example, the United States Constitution in Article VI, Section 3 explicitly prohibits test oaths as a requirement to hold Federal office. That is, no one can be required to affirm any religious confession in order to serve as an officer in the United States government. The Supreme Court has extended this to include all civil governments in the United States. In 1961, in the case Torcasso v. Watkins, the Supreme Court declared that the lowest civil office in the land, notary public,² may not be screened by the requirement of a religious oath. This decision completed the secularization of all levels of civil government in the United States. It took from 1788 to 1961 to achieve this goal. As I have shown in my book on the United States Constitution, this was the goal of the leading members of the Constitutional convention in 1787.³

Christians are unequally yoked together with non-Christians as citizens of the United States. Few Christians in the United States are aware of their theological dilemma. The only Protestant church that I am aware of that understands this issue is the Reformed Church of North America, better known as the Covenanters. It is a small Calvinistic denomination. It has always opposed the fact that the United States Constitution is not self-consciously grounded in a Trinitarian confession. Almost no one has heard of this group, and those outside the group who have heard of it regard it as a curiosity.

2. This person signs his name and stamps a document to affirm that he saw another person with identification sign a document.

3. Gary North, Conspiracy in Philadelphia: The Origins of the United States Constitution (Harrisonburg, Virginia: Dominion Educational Ministries, Inc., 2001). (<http://bit.ly/Constitution1787>)

B. Fellowship

The King James translators translated the Greek word as “fellowship.” The Greek word originally meant much the same as this English word means. It means “participation in a group.” But if we are to take the word literally, then participation in a business, or a voluntary association, or a charitable organization, or even an organization such as Alcoholics Anonymous would be prohibited. Again, this would mean forsaking the world. Jesus said that we are in the world, but not of the world (John 17:15–16). If we are in the world, then we are necessarily participants in many organizations that are in no way organized in terms of a Trinitarian confession.

Paul is speaking of membership in covenantal institutions. He is not speaking of the economic division of labor. He was well aware that Christians were in a minority in the Roman Empire. There was no way that they could cut themselves off from participation in the market economy without becoming some kind of isolated sect living in the wilderness. There is no indication that Paul or any other apostle held such a view of the Christian life. So, Paul in this passage is not concerned with participation in the economic division of labor.

C. Yokes and Fellowships

To be yoked means that you are in a permanent oath-bound legal alliance with someone else. In the Mosaic law, it was illegal to yoke together an ox and a donkey to pull a plow (Deut. 22:10).⁴ The two animals are different. They work in different ways. But it was more than their mere inefficiency that motivated God to prohibit this unequal yoking. This unequal yoking was representative of unequal yoking—a permanent bind—between covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers. That is, it was representative of a marriage based on rival confessions, a church based on rival confessions, and a civil government based on rival confessions.

The story presented in the Bible from Genesis 3 to Revelation 22 is the story of competing kingdoms. The kingdom of God and the kingdom of Satan are constantly battling for control in history. Covenant-breakers and covenant-keepers can make temporary truces, but they must not make permanent covenantal treaties. This is why Israelites were forbidden to marry Canaanites. God warned them that such marriages would lead inevitably to theological compromise by covenant-keepers (Ex. 34:14–16). Covenant-keepers would be at a disadvantage in such marriages. This proved to be the case during the era of the judges (Judg. 3:5–7). The consummate representative case of a violation of this principle was Solomon's marriage to 700 women. Many of them were covenant-breakers. They brought idols into his household. He learned to worship those idols (I Kings 11:4). God had said this would happen (Deut. 17:17), and it happened to the wisest man in history. He was wise in his exercise of judgment of other people's disputes, but he was utterly blind to the effects of unequal yoking in marriage.

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 54.

When an individual joins in a permanent business partnership with someone of a rival confession, he violates the principle set forth by Paul in this passage. There will be conflict between the partners. The debts of one partner become the legal debts of the other. If one partner goes bankrupt, the creditors can demand payment from the other partner until he has no more assets. If partnerships were alone legal as joint ventures, this would dramatically limit the division of labor.

Then what of a limited-liability corporation? It is treated by the courts as a legal individual. It survives the death of any participant. Individuals invest in the corporation. If the corporation prospers, they prosper. The corporation has limited liability. It can be sued, but the individuals who have invested in it cannot be sued. In this sense, it is an economic mirror of a church. A church can be sued in a civil court, but members of the church cannot be sued for any supposed violations of the law conducted by officers of the church. Without this legal protection, there would be neither churches nor large-scale businesses. Legal liability is crucial for the success of both institutions.

Is investing in a corporation the equivalent of being unequally yoked? It is not. You are not yoked as a member of a corporation. You can sell your shares of ownership. There are organized exchanges set up expressly for buying and selling shares of corporations. There is no unequal yoking because there is no yoking at all. A corporation is not a fellowship.

The economy is not a fellowship. It is a voluntary legal arrangement in which people cooperate with each other for limited goals. They cooperate in production, and they sometimes cooperate when they buy as a group. This is the case with a buyers' cooperative. Usually, however, people act as customers as individuals in the marketplace. Each transaction is separate from the others. A person has legal authority to buy or not buy. Similarly, in a free market social order, the seller has the right to sell or not sell to a would-be customer of the product or service. There is no fellowship.

In certain kinds of production, employees do develop camaraderie. In this sense, they resemble a fellowship. But the arrangement is based on the quest for money. It is not self-consciously based on the idea of extending one of the two kingdoms.

This is not true of certain kinds of businesses. A house of prostitution is dedicated to the extinction of the kingdom of God. These organizations do take on the characteristics of a fellowship. In the case of criminal conspiracies, they are very often established and governed in terms of an oath. Covenant-keepers are not to participate in such rival oath-bound organizations, either as buyers or sellers. Paul's words in this passage apply to membership in such organizations. But such organizations do not characterize the vast majority of companies that produce goods and services for purchase in a market arrangement.

Conclusion

The prohibition against being unequally yoked refers to a joint venture in which the participants are bound legally. They are bound by law in a legal arrangement that is not grounded in the confession of a covenant-keeper. This does not refer to transitory arrangements such as buying and selling, where there is no oath involved. There is at most a promise to pay.

4

GRACE AND ECONOMIC SACRIFICE

Moreover, brethren, we do you to wit [know] of the grace of God bestowed on the churches of Macedonia; How that in a great trial of affliction the abundance of their joy and their deep poverty abounded unto the riches of their liberality. For to their power, I bear record, yea, and beyond their power they were willing of themselves; Praying us with much intreaty that we would receive the gift, and take upon us the fellowship of the ministering to the saints (II Cor. 8:1–4).

The theocentric issue here was sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Grace and Generosity

In this epistle, Paul reminds the Corinthians of their promise to make a donation to relieve members of the church in Jerusalem. In this passage, he points to the extreme generosity of the churches in Macedonia. He says that God has shown grace to them: “the grace of God bestowed on the churches of Macedonia.” The manifestation of this grace is their generosity. He points out that the churches in Macedonia are poor. Their generosity was great in relation to their poverty. It was not just that they gave generously; it was that they gave beyond what could have been expected of them, “beyond their power they were willing of themselves.”

1. Manifested Grace

Paul makes a point: God’s grace to them has been manifested in their generosity. This indicates that generosity is something special. It takes the grace of God to motivate men to give beyond what others would normally consider to be a reasonable percentage of their wealth. People do not normally give generously. In this case, their generosity was so great in relation to their poverty that Paul singles out their generosity as evidence of the grace of God in their lives. This was abnormal generosity, meaning supernatural generosity.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

Jesus said that when we give generously in history, we lay up treasure in eternity. "Sell that ye have, and give alms; provide yourselves bags which wax not old, a treasure in the heavens that faileth not, where no thief approacheth, neither moth corrupteth. For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also" (Luke 12:33–34).² Nevertheless, it is very difficult for men to believe that, by giving generously, they are accumulating great wealth for themselves individually in the world beyond the grave. Men believe in what they can see and touch. They cannot see the world beyond the grave. They can see money.

Money is a powerful lure. Jesus said that there are two gods competing for the allegiance of men: the God of the Bible and Mammon (Matt. 6:24). Mammon is the god who promises to reward men who seek this goal: "more for me in history."³ This god has many followers. He is easier to believe in than the God of the Bible. He offers near-term rewards. He does not offer pie in the sky by and by.

Paul is pointing out that the members of the churches of Macedonia are faithful servants of Christ. The proof of this is the disparity between what they gave and what they own. They do not own much, but they gave much. This is a manifestation of faith, which is in turn a manifestation of God's grace.

Paul does not say that the Macedonians' poverty is a sign of God's grace. Rather, it is the disparity between what they gave and what they own that is the sign of God's grace. There is nothing in the writings of Paul to indicate that poverty is a recommended lifestyle for pursuit by covenant-keeping individuals. There is no indication that poverty as such is to be regarded as a blessing of God. But there is no question that the Macedonians' generosity was regarded by Paul as a manifestation of the grace of God.

2. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012) ch. 26.

3. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 14.

2. Manifested Trust

Such generosity testifies to an individual's confidence that God will protect him. He puts his faith in God rather than Mammon. This faith is history-centered. People amass wealth in order to protect themselves from the unpredictable and unforeseen problems and even calamities of life. They trust in marketable wealth to serve as their protection. They may also trust in God. Where grace is evident, Paul implies, individuals trust in God and not in Mammon. They trust in God rather than in their own possessions. That which is visible, meaning their possessions, is not the focus of their confidence. Their confidence lodges in the God of the Bible, who intervenes in history in order to uphold his people.

The people of the Jerusalem church were trusting in the churches to which Paul made an appeal for support. They trusted in God by way of gentile churches, by way of the apostle Paul. They trusted in God, but they also trusted in history. They trusted in history because they understood that God is completely in control of history. It was not that they trusted a God who promised to deliver them directly. He did not promise this. They trusted a God who calls His people to show generosity. This God raised up the apostle Paul to make the appeal on behalf of the Jerusalem church. But this system of cause and effect is nevertheless dependent on God's grace. This is why Paul points to the generosity of the Macedonians as being a mark of supernatural grace.

Paul is preparing the Corinthians for a specific appeal. He is about to ask them to show great generosity to those in distress in Jerusalem. The Corinthian church is a wealthy church. If the Corinthians give as generously as the Macedonians had given, Paul will be able to raise a considerable amount of money for the support of the church in Jerusalem. He is pointing out that the generosity of the Macedonians manifests the grace of God in their lives. By implication, a comparably generous donation would indicate that the grace of God is active in the lives of the Corinthian church's members.

The Corinthian church was in a position to give a considerable donation, even though the members would not have to sacrifice a great deal. Paul is implying that this would not be a manifestation of grace in their lives to the extent that it was evident in the lives of Macedonian church members. It was not the size of the Macedonians' offering that impressed Paul. It was the size of the offering in comparison to the poverty of the members. The disparity was the mark of grace, not the amount given.

B. Marketable Wealth: Objective and Subjective

From an economic standpoint, this argument points to the reality of objective wealth. The members of the Macedonian churches were poor. They had less wealth than the members of the Corinthian church. Paul is making interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. He is saying that the Macedonians had given more. Jesus had done the same thing in describing the generosity of the widow who put two small coins in the treasury (Luke 21:2–4).⁴ She had given all that she possessed. Rich men around her gave far more money, objectively speaking, but in relationship to their wealth, their gifts were minimal. Compared to the gift of the two small coins by the widow, these men's gifts were unimpressive.

1. Positional Wealth

Both Jesus and Paul had a concept of marketable wealth that was simultaneously objective and subjective. Marketable wealth was viewed by Paul as objective in terms of the amount of money offered by the donors. It was also subjective in relation to the comparative wealth of the members. Paul took into consideration both the objective wealth and the subjective wealth of the two congregations. Objectively, the Macedonians had not given as much as Paul soon indicated that the Corinthians had promised to give. Subjectively, however, the gift of the Macedonians was much greater. It was so great that Paul says that the disparity between their poverty and the generosity was a visible mark of the grace of God in their lives.

If Paul had in mind only objective marketable wealth, he would not have emphasized the magnitude of the Macedonians' gift. That gift was objectively less than what he expected the Corinthians to give. The Corinthians would gain no favor from God just because they might give a slightly larger sum than the Macedonians gave.

On the other hand, if Paul had in mind only subjective marketable wealth, the Corinthians would not have been in a position to judge the intensity of the generosity of the Macedonians. There is no way that anyone can measure the value of anything in the mind of another individual. He cannot even measure the value of anything in his own mind.

4. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 50.

He cannot say, accurately, that something is objectively worth exactly this much more than something else. He can only say that it is greater or lesser; he cannot say how much greater or how much less. There is no objective standard of value. Nevertheless, Paul expected his listeners to understand that the objective poverty of the Macedonians in relationship to the objective wealth of the Corinthians was meaningful. It was meaningful in terms of the disparity between the size of the gift in relationship to the objective wealth of the givers.

2. Dualism in Economic Theory

Economic theory ever since the 1870s has been self-consciously divided between the concept of objective value and subjective value. This is a manifestation of a general subject-object dualism in all humanist thought. In the field of economics, this dualism manifests itself most often in the discussion of personal wealth. Is wealth primarily objective or subjective? Prior to the 1870s, most economists believed that wealth is objective. After the 1870s, economists increasingly believed that wealth is subjective. The problem is, neither side can do without the other side's concept of wealth. If marketable wealth were exclusively objective, there would be a way to measure it. Economists could then explain objective prices in terms of objectively valued inputs. But the classical economists could never find a measuring rod that links value and price. Instead, they invoked supply and demand, which are the products of human action. Human action is subjectively based.

Defenders of purely subjective value theory constantly import the conclusions of objective value theory. They draw conclusions that are logical only if economists can make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. But economists cannot do this. There is no objective way to measure subjective utility.⁵ Economists make value judgment when making policy recommendations to governments. If there were absolutely no way to make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility, economists could not logically and scientifically make policy recommendations.⁶ When the civil government does one thing, it cannot do another. When a policy benefits one group of citizens, it costs another group additional taxes, but without equal benefits. Economists must decide which benefits to which groups are most consistent with the general good of the people. But “the general good” is an objective category. Economists can make such conclusions scientifically only on the assumption that economists can make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. They can somehow conclude that one group will be subjectively better off, while another group will be subjectively worse off, but the civil government should implement the policy anyway. When they speak of a group being better off or worse off, they mean better off or worse off subjectively. The members of these groups will perceive themselves to be better off or worse off. But decision-makers cannot make such assessments scientifically if value is exclusively subjective. In order to make such judgments, there must be objective values and subjective values. There must be objective ways to decide which policy a government should pursue. The economist concludes that a society will objectively be better off by following a particular policy rather than another; so, the subjective economists import objective value theory back into their system.

5. Lionel Robbins, The Nature and Significance of Economic Science (New York: Macmillan, 1932), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/RobbinsEcon>)

6. Robbins admitted this in 1938 when Roy Harrod called this fact to his attention. He backed away from his universal rejection of the idea of the possibility of making interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 5.

Paul says that the Macedonians have given generously from the point of view of subjective value theory. They did not give objectively as much as the Corinthians were likely to give if they took Paul’s recommendation. What matters most, Paul says, is the subjective sacrifice that the Macedonians had made. This was why their sacrifice was evidence of God’s grace in their lives. The magnitude of God’s grace was visible in the magnitude of the discrepancy between their poverty and their generosity. Their poverty was objective; their donation was objective. Yet what matters most, Paul points out, is the subjective magnitude of their sacrifice. It was abnormal. It was therefore a manifestation of the grace of God in their lives.

Conclusion

The grace of God was manifested in the disparity between the Macedonian church members’ objective poverty and the objective size of their donation. This disparity was subjective. It pointed to a sacrifice. This level of sacrifice was abnormal, Paul believed. It was supernatural.

His argument rested on a two-fold theory of economic value. Economic value is objective. It can be measured. Yet it cannot be measured solely objectively. The Macedonians did not give objectively more wealth than Paul expected the Corinthians to give, but they gave great wealth subjectively. Paul compared what they owned with what they gave. He expected his listeners to understand the subjective magnitude of the gift. This was what counted in assessing the gift's value in God's eyes.

5

FROM POVERTY TO RICHES

For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich (II Cor. 8:9).

The theocentric issue here was hierarchy: point two of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Service and Success

This passage uses the language of economics in order to explain the New Testament doctrine of the incarnation. Elsewhere, Paul described the incarnation in non-economic terms. He spoke in terms of status.

Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus: Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God: But made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name: That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; And that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father (Phil. 2:5–11).²

This passage presents a correct pattern for victory by covenant-keepers. Humility and service lead to exaltation by God. In Christ's

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. Chapter 20.

case, the ultimate humiliation of the cross was the means of His definitive exaltation, already completed, whereby God has “given him a name which is above every name.” It will lead to final exaltation, when “at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; And that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.”

B. Poverty and Wealth

Because Paul is attempting to convince the members of the Corinthian church to give generously, he goes to the heart of the matter by way of economics. He is presenting a case for charity. He is moving his listeners toward a conclusion. He plans to convince his listeners to do what they had promised to do, namely, make a generous donation to the Jerusalem church.

He describes the ministry of the Second Person of the Trinity, meaning the birth, life, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ in history, in terms of a fall in class. It was also a fall in social status, but we usually discuss economic classifications in terms of class, which in an economic classification. The Second Person of the Trinity abandoned His high place in heaven in order that He might take on human flesh. This was an enormous step down. It was a step down in terms of social status, but it was also a step down in terms of economic class. He went from the ultimate upper-class Being in the universe to a lower-class being. He became a carpenter. This is not a high class or a high status position. This is a tradesmen. It is not the lowest class among human occupations, but compared with being God, it surely is a step down. Even if there had been a Carpenters Union, it would have been a step down.

Paul describes this step down in terms of wealth and poverty. As the Creator of the universe,³ the Second Person of the Trinity was rich. His station in heaven indicated this enormous wealth. He was in charge of all creation. Nevertheless, because of the doctrine of the economic Trinity, theologians also discuss a hierarchy within the Trinity. There is equality of being, but there is a hierarchy of service.

Jesus Christ, as the incarnation of the Second Person of the Trin-

3. “For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him: And he is before all things, and by him all things consist” (Col. 1:16–17).

ity, is a servant. Paul presents His lower-class position as marked by poverty. He stepped down from great wealth to poverty. "Though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor." Why did He do this? Paul says that He did this in order to make His followers wealthy. "That ye through his poverty might be rich." Paul does not say that his followers will become the equivalent of financial tycoons, but he does say that they are made wealthy by the sacrifice of Christ on their behalf. So, the language of wealth and poverty in this instance refers to the local status of saved and lost. It was the willingness of the Second Person of the Trinity to step down from His high position to be born of a woman. This act illustrates the degree of sacrifice on the part of the Second Person of the Trinity on behalf of His people.

Paul adopts the language of wealth and poverty in order to drive home a point: the benefits of becoming a follower of Jesus Christ are vastly greater than monetary returns. Jesus was clear about this. He warned people that it would be a foolish bargain to accept the entire world as payment for one's soul (Matt. 16:26).⁴ So, Paul is not really talking about monetary gains. He is talking about the difference between salvation and damnation. The magnitude of the difference between salvation and damnation is analogous to the difference between occupying the throne of the universe as the Creator of the universe and becoming a carpenter. The move from heaven to earth is comparable to the move from saved to lost. The story of mankind is twofold. It begins with the transition from grace to wrath in Genesis 3, and extends to Revelation 22, which is the story of the transition from wrath to grace. In order to enable man to make the transition from wrath to grace, the Second Person of the Trinity was born of a woman in order to make His transition from grace to wrath at Calvary on behalf of covenant-keepers.

Paul is not suggesting that the Corinthian church, on behalf of its members, can purchase salvation for them by the expenditure of money in the form of a donation to the Jerusalem church. Such a suggestion would have been antithetical to everything he believed about the free offer of grace to man. He was making a point: Jesus Christ has paid the penalty for the sins of men. In order to do this, the Second Person of the Trinity had to step down from the throne of heaven to the occupation of a carpenter. He did that out of love. He did it as

4. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 35.

5. Judicial representation: point two of the biblical covenant.

God's mandatory means of grace. Grace is defined as a gift to someone who does not deserve it. Jesus Christ suffered the wrath of God in order that He might bring His people from wrath to grace. The magnitude of His sacrifice was so great that men cannot comprehend it. Nevertheless, they have some vague idea of how great this sacrifice was. It began with the transition from heaven to earth.

C. Motivation to Sacrifice

Paul is calling the members of the Corinthian church to give sacrificially to the Jerusalem church. Earlier in this chapter, Paul described the degree of sacrifice displayed by the churches in Macedonia.⁶ Here, he speaks of an even greater model for sacrifice: the sacrifice of the Second Person of the Trinity in moving from heaven to earth. Both sacrifices were a matter of grace. The Macedonian churches did not have to give to the Jerusalem church. Neither did the Second Person of the Trinity have to sacrifice His place in heaven on behalf of His followers. Both sacrifices were made on behalf of others.

1. Jesus as the Model

Jesus Christ offers the model for all mankind. His is a model of sacrifice. Jesus was the ultimate servant. He asked nothing for Himself; He sacrificed everything on behalf of others. This model was the model used by the churches in Macedonia. This model should also be the model used by the church at Corinth. Paul is arguing on the basis of historical examples. The incarnation was historical. The recent generosity of the churches in Macedonia was another testimony of the application of the principle of sacrificial service to the realm of the church. Such service is expected by God of His people. Such service is voluntary, in the sense that the incarnation was voluntary.

The plan of salvation rests on the work of Christ in laying down His life for His friends (John 15:3). The work of salvation therefore rests on a concept of self-sacrifice. Christ's is the ultimate self-sacrifice in history. We are to be imitators of Christ (I Cor. 11:1).⁷ Paul argues here that the Macedonian churches were imitators of Christ. So should the Corinthian church become.

Jesus Christ did not undergo the negative sanctions of God for

6. Chapter 4.

7. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary of First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2912), ch. 14.

their own sake. There is no indication in the Bible that suffering is a legitimate goal for its own sake. Nothing is a legitimate goal for its own sake. Nothing is autonomous. Everything that builds the kingdom of God in history and eternity is a legitimate goal, but not for the sake of the participants; rather, it is for the sake of God primarily. We live in a theocentric universe. We sacrifice on behalf of God. This is self-sacrifice on our part. It is the model that Jesus lived.

This is not to say that those who sacrifice for the sake of the kingdom are not beneficiaries of the sacrifice. They are beneficiaries. As participants in the kingdom of God, they benefit from its extension. But the focus of the sacrifice should always be theocentric. God is first; His followers are not. Jesus Christ died to satisfy the requirements of God on behalf of His people, but it was God's judicial requirements, not the needs of His people, which were central to the plan of salvation.

The Second Person of the Trinity experienced poverty in the broadest sense so that He might make wealthy, also in the broadest sense, all those who are covenantally committed to Him. The language of poverty here is the language of self-sacrifice. It is not the language of final ends. The language indicates that the goal of self-sacrifice is wealth: wealth for God, wealth for covenant-keepers, and wealth for all those who conform themselves to the external laws of God. This position is the exact opposite of the ethics of the German philosopher, Immanuel Kant. Kant's position was all ethics must be based purely on self-sacrifice, with no reward for the one who sacrifices.⁸ This is completely opposed to what Paul is teaching here. Paul is teaching that Christ died on behalf of His people in order that they might become wealthy in the broadest sense.

2. Self-Sacrifice vs. Poverty

Paul is calling on the church at Corinth to sacrifice on behalf of the Jerusalem church. He does not call on them to make this sacrifice so that they might remain in poverty. He does not want the Jerusalem church to remain in poverty; neither does he want the Corinthian church to fall into poverty. There is nothing in the Bible that suggests that covenant-keepers have some kind of moral obligation to pursue poverty. The proper question is: On whose behalf is poverty or wealth to be pursued?

8. Immanuel Kant, "The Lawgiver," Lectures on Ethics (New York: Harper, [1780?] 1963), p. 52. Cf. "Reward and Punishment," p. 57.

Poverty is a motivation to achieve wealth. Wealth is a means of service. The Jerusalem church was poor. Paul is taking a collection so that the Jerusalem church will be less poor. He is not taking a collection to make the Jerusalem church even poorer. The goal of self-sacrifice is to extend the kingdom of God in history and eternity. This is a benefit to God, to covenant-keepers, and, at least in history, to covenant-breakers, who learn by the example of covenant-keepers to obey biblical law. There are benefits for obedience. There are benefits for self-sacrifice. The historical benefit is wealth. This is not simply financial wealth, but wealth in its broadest sense.

Jesus Christ did not die on behalf of the ideal of poverty. He died on behalf of the ideal of wealth. Biblical wealth is theocentric wealth. It is wealth that is built up through covenantal faithfulness. It is wealth that is to be put to profitable service for the kingdom of God. It is not wealth for its own sake; it is wealth for God's sake primarily, covenant-keepers' sake secondarily, and for the world generally.⁹

3. Kingdom Expansion

Paul is reminding the Corinthian church that self-sacrifice is a means of kingdom expansion. It is not self-sacrifice in order to attain poverty; it is self-sacrifice in order to attain wealth in the broadest sense. Such wealth can be experienced in economic poverty. This was Paul's point with respect to the Macedonian churches. They were poor economically, and they became even poorer economically by means of their sacrificial gifts on behalf of the Jerusalem church. Yet, Paul insists, this is a form of wealth. Why should economic poverty be a form of wealth? Because it is part of a specific historical process. It is sacrifice on behalf of the kingdom of God. This is what extends the kingdom of God in history.

Those who participate at one stage, perhaps an early stage, in the expansion of the kingdom of God participate as beneficiaries of the grace of God. They possess limited economic resources. These resources are suitable for making investments in the kingdom of God; they are a form of capital. They build up the productivity of others who are members of the kingdom of God. As the others' productivity increases, the kingdom extends its influence culturally. Jesus said that such a sacrifice lays up wealth in the world beyond the grave (Matt. 6:19–21).¹⁰ But Moses said in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28 that the growth of the kingdom of God involves the growth of personal wealth. So, sacrifice on behalf of the kingdom of God is self-serving to the extent that the growth of the kingdom of God will benefit all of its members in history and eternity. In the long run, these benefits will be widespread. This was the teaching of Isaiah in chapter 65.¹¹ Even in the short run, the benefits are real. They are future-oriented. They involve the concept of inheritance. They are the kind of sacrifice that a parent makes on behalf of his children. The donors may be poorer in the present, but they will be richer in the future.

9. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcgr>)

This is the concept of kingdom development in history. The early participants will benefit in the world beyond the grave. But they also benefit as people who are legitimately confident that their spiritual, confessional heirs will extend the work of the kingdom across the face of the earth. The early financiers of the kingdom's growth become the founders. They know that the efforts of the church in particular and Christian civilization in general to extend the kingdom of God in history will benefit their spiritual heirs. They look forward to this success, which is the meaning of wealth in the broadest sense, and they rejoice.

Conclusion

Paul is trying to persuade members of the Corinthian church that their celebration of joy can be comparable to the celebration of joy already experienced by members of the Macedonian churches. "How that in a great trial of affliction the abundance of their joy and their deep poverty abounded unto the riches of their liberality" (II Cor. 8:2). The means to this joy is sacrificial giving. He motivates them by an appeal to joy: the joy experienced by the Macedonians, not the joy to be experienced by members of the Jerusalem church. Conclusion: it is better to give than to receive (Acts 20:35).¹²

10. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 13.

11. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 15.

12. Gary North, Sacrifice and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Acts, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 10.

6

MUTUAL AID THROUGH MUTUAL CONFESSION

For I mean not that other men be eased, and ye burdened: But by an equality, that now at this time your abundance may be a supply for their want, that their abundance also may be a supply for your want: that there may be equality: As it is written, He that had gathered much had nothing over; and he that had gathered little had no lack (II Cor. 8:13–15).

The theocentric issue here was causality: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Insurance and Reciprocity

This passage is a defense of a system of crisis insurance. Paul says that the abundance of the Corinthian church can be used to assist the impoverished Jerusalem church. He says that this is a temporary situation. He says specifically that in the future, the Jerusalem church may be in a position to help the Corinthian church. There is no suggestion by Paul, here or in any other passage, regarding the establishment of a permanent wealth-redistribution program. Paul does not indicate that this is anything but a temporary solution to a temporary problem.

We cannot predict all of the calamities that may face us. In Paul's day, there was no system of organized insurance. Insurance was an invention of the Christian West. When it became known that mathematics can be applied to categories of events, due to the principle of the law of large numbers, Western civilization developed one of the greatest of all inventions: insurance.² Individuals can be assembled together to pool their resources in order to create a fund that can be used to relieve any of the members of the group when a specified disaster strikes.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

From the beginning of man's history, the family served as a means of insuring against individual calamity. Tribal units also developed unscientific programs of mutual assistance. Paul says that the church international is to serve as an insurance function comparable to what tribes and clans serve in underdeveloped societies today. The church is to serve as an organization for mutual assistance. If one church falls into poverty, other churches are expected to intervene to help members of the afflicted church deal with the short-term crisis. This is what an insurance policy is designed to do. The difference is this: there is no confession of faith with respect to an insurance policy. There is no family connection, no tribal connection, and if there is a national connection, it is only because of the laws regulating the sale of insurance in each nation.

Paul's letter indicates that he believed that the church should serve an insurance agency. It should provide limited protection against unforeseen calamities. His letter indicates that he understood that the roles could be reversed at any time. The Corinthian church might fall into poverty, and the Jerusalem church might grow out of poverty. Their positions would be reversed, and the weaker party in the present might become the stronger party in the future. Life is filled with ups and downs, and this includes the institutional church. The fact that individual congregations do not experience the same crisis at the same time makes possible a program of joint insurance.

B. Equality and Inequality

This passage in no way is a call for economic equality. The Bible nowhere calls for economic equality. The Bible in both Testaments teaches the doctrine of the great reversal. Covenant-breakers will be brought low, while covenant-keepers will be raised up. There is nothing about equality in this relationship. This reversal was taught by Moses (Deut. 28:13, 43–44), and it was taught most eloquently in what we call the Magnificat of Mary (Luke 1:51–53).³

2. Peter L. Bernstein, Against the Gods: The Remarkable Story of Risk (New York: Wiley, 1998).

3. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012)), ch. 1.

There will never be equality between heaven and hell. There will never be equality between the New Heavens and a New Earth (II Peter 3:13) on the one hand, and the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14) on the other. But modern man wants to believe that there is no heaven, there is no hell, there will not be a New Heavens and a New Earth, and there will not be a lake of fire. He is appalled by the Bible's doctrine of eternal inequality between covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers. Modern man wants to believe that he is autonomous from God. He does not want to live in a cosmos in which God eternally rewards covenant-keepers and punishes covenant-breakers.

1. Christian Socialists

There are Christian political activists who are committed to the socialist ideal—never yet implemented in history—of economic equality. The doctrine of equality is not taught in Scripture. Jesus taught the doctrine of hell. This is a place of torment—torture is more accurate—in which those who do not believe that Jesus died for their sins are subjected to fire. Jesus taught this in Luke 16.⁴ The residents of hell remain there until the final judgment and resurrection. At the resurrection, their souls are reunited with their bodies. Then they, along with hell, are dumped into the lake of fire for eternity (Rev. 20:14–15). There is no escape. This is pure retribution: without grace.

Compared to this, poverty is a great joy. Yet Christian socialists worry constantly about poverty. For reasons of political tactics, they do not refer to themselves as advocates of socialism. As with socialists in the past, they call themselves advocates of “economic democracy.” Economic democracy is a political system in which two wolves and a sheep vote on what to have for dinner.

Christian socialists teach that the Bible demands equality economically between covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers. They demand political coercion by the state to achieve this. They want the state to raise the incomes of unproductive covenant-breakers to equality with productive covenant-keepers. Yet there is no equality in the universe, not even in hell (Luke 12:47–48).⁵ Under Christian socialism, covenant-breakers are not said to be given even a hint of warning that God hates them and has a terrifying plan for their life. They have been told by Christian socialists that they morally deserve economic equality with covenant-keepers. Then, without warning, they are ushered into a world in which there will never be equality—not in hell, not in the lake of fire—with covenant-keepers. The advocates of Christian socialism preach total discontinuity: morally obligatory equality in history irrespective of performance, and eternal inequality in hell and the lake of fire. This implication bothers them. So, they avoid all mention of hell and the lake of fire.

4. Ibid., ch. 40.

5. Ibid., ch. 28.

All sanctions in history rest on the ultimate sanctions: the New Heaven and New Earth vs. the lake of fire. This final condition is reflected prior to the general resurrection in the difference between heaven and hell. Yet Christian socialists, who do not publicly deny the existence of eternal sanctions, publicly deny the moral legitimacy of economic sanctions in history: wealth vs. poverty.

The Christian socialist might respond as follows: “When covenant-breakers get rich through the free market, they also have no warning of the terrible wrath to come.” But they do have a warning. Jesus told His disciples that it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God (Matt. 19:24).⁶ The church is required to preach this. But the modern church, which is generally silent on economic theory, is hampered when dealing with a poor person who believes that he has a moral right to a his “fair share” of the wealth of a successful person, a position which the Bible does not teach. Worse, he is systematically misinformed by Christian socialists that he does possess such a moral right, which should be made by civil law a valid legal claim, according to the Bible. The church is silent. Christian socialists are loud.

Christian socialists insist that they are not socialists. They argue that they do not advocate the state’s ownership of the means of production, so by definition they are not socialists. This is deliberately misleading. Germany’s national socialists, better known as the Nazis, also did not call for state ownership of the means of production. They called for state control over production and income. The Nazi Party’s name under Hitler was the National Socialist German Workers’ Party. The American political Left has long favored fascist/national socialist economics.⁷

6. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 38.

7. Jonah Goldberg, Liberal Fascism: The Secret History of the American Left, from Mussolini to the Politics of Meaning (New York: Doubleday, 2008).

2. Egalitarianism vs. Pareto's Law

Economic egalitarians believe in coercive redistribution of wealth by the state. They affirm that it is a moral imperative that every society should strive towards equal ownership of economic assets, or something close to this. A few of the extreme egalitarians preach that no nation should have greater wealth than another nation. This is such a difficult sell to voters in rich nations that almost nobody ever comes out forthrightly in favor of this position. But this position is implied as soon as someone says that the civil government should use the power of the sword to take money from one group and transfer it to another group. If this is morally mandatory inside a nation's borders, then it is morally mandatory across borders. All that is missing is a central government over all nations to compel the redistribution, a development close to the hearts of most egalitarians.

The doctrine of economic equality is utopian. No society has ever achieved economic equality, and none ever can. The Trinity itself is structured in terms of a hierarchy of service. Why should Christians expect equality within human society? Fathers have greater authority within the household than wives. Parents have greater authority within the household than children. Why should we expect equality outside of the family? Every covenantal institution has a hierarchy. Every human institution has a hierarchy. Hierarchy is point two of the biblical covenant model.⁸

The Swiss sociologist/economist, Vilfredo Pareto, published his findings in 1897 regarding wealth distribution in European nations. In every nation he examined, approximately the same distribution of investment capital existed. About 20% of the population owned 80% of the capital. No society studied since the time of Pareto has been found to deviate significantly from this 20/80 distribution pattern. The 20/80 law applies to realms far beyond economics. In instance after instance, 20% of the employees produce 80% of the profits. About 20% of a clientele produces 80% of the complaints. About 20% of the same clientele—but different members—produce 80% of the profits for the company. Over and over, the 20/80 principle is found to be operational.⁹

We do not know why this is true. Economists tend to ignore it because they cannot explain it. But the fact remains: every industrial society that has been studied retains a level of economic inequality that is at least 20/80. In some cases, there may be even greater inequality. This fact stands as a lasting testimony against all those who claim that society should be marked by equal shares of wealth. They do not have a single example to serve as a model.

8. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 2.

9. Richard Koch, The 80/20 Principle (New York: Doubleday, 1998).

No matter how many reforms are enacted, no matter how many revisions of the tax code the politicians make, every society retains the 20/80 distribution of capital. Every egalitarian social reformer and economic reformer is morally obligated to provide an explanation as to why every known industrial society is structured in terms of the 20/80 distribution. Until the causes of this strange but universal fact can be identified, no system of reform is likely to change the pattern. If we do not know what has caused the alleged problem, we are unlikely to be able to solve it, no matter what we do.

The utopians who demand economic equality are not impressed by Pareto's law of distribution. Either they have never heard of it, or if they have heard of it, they deny that it is relevant. They still call for political programs of coercive wealth distribution. They are promoting a policy that leads to the net reduction of wealth. Some of these reformers are motivated by envy more than jealousy. Envy is not like jealousy, which is motivated by the desire to get something that someone else owns. Envy is the desire to tear down the other person, irrespective of whether the envious person is benefited by the loss. He does not care deeply about wealth redistribution. What he cares about deeply is pulling down the wealthy.¹⁰

Anyone who comes in the name of wealth redistribution as a means of achieving greater economic equality, and who does not also provide an explanation for the Pareto distribution, is driven by a combination of envy and ignorance. If he does not systematically show how his proposed political reform will deal with the long-term, universal problem of Pareto inequality, the reformer is simply attempting to tear down the rich for the sake of tearing down the rich. He has no program of reform that predictably will lead to greater economic equality. He only has a program that will make life miserable for existing rich people.

The result of this reform will be a transfer of wealth to a new elite, who will benefit from the Pareto distribution of wealth. This always happens. There are no exceptions. Every reform that has ever been imposed in the name of achieving greater economic equality has substituted one elite for another. The rules by which people get rich and stay rich may be changed according to civil law. What is never changed is the 20/80 distribution of capital.

10. Helmut Schoeck, Envy: A Theory of Social Behavior (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, [1966] 1969). Reprinted by LibertyClassics, Indianapolis.

C. Manna from Heaven

Paul cites Moses' language regarding the manna. Moses wrote: "And when they did mete it with an omer, he that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack; they gathered every man according to his eating" (Ex. 16:18).¹¹ Paul writes: "As it is written, He that had gathered much had nothing over; and he that had gathered little had no lack."

In the wilderness decades, manna appeared overnight six days a week. Those who gathered the manna had all they could eat, so that no one went hungry. That event was a miracle. This miracle ended when the people of Israel crossed the border into Canaan (Josh. 5:12). It never reappeared.

No one could accumulate wealth by means of the manna, since the manna rotted overnight (Ex. 16:20), except the night before the sabbath (Ex. 16:22). The system did not allow capital accumulation. God provided a second miracle—rotting—to make impossible the buying and selling of manna in an attempt to increase one's wealth.

Paul quotes Moses, not in the name of establishing economic equality, but in the name of taking care of a crisis. The crisis faced by the people of Israel in the wilderness was that there were too many of them for the wilderness to support. So, God provided a miracle to keep them alive. It cost Him nothing to do this. No politician stuck a gun in God's belly and said, "Fork over the manna, God. My constituents wants it. We have the votes." Yet this is exactly what all reformers who call for state redistribution of wealth would do to the wealthy. These reformers want to elect politicians who will use the coercive power of civil government to extract wealth from one group of citizens in the name of another group of citizens.

The appeal for state-enforced wealth redistribution is done in the name of righteousness and morality. It all involves the same practice: having a policeman with a badge and a gun demand that certain individuals fork over their money, and if they refuse, the man with the badge pulls out his gun and threatens them with prosecution. Yet Christian reformers come before other Christian citizens and claim that this passage justifies guns in people's bellies.

11. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 18.

D. Both Altruism and Self-Interest

Paul appeals to the Corinthians based on their self-interest. It is not simply that they are to be self-sacrificing. It is that they are supposed to understand that there can be great reversals in this life. The bad times that have fallen upon the Jerusalem church may someday fall upon the Corinthian church. The good times that are characteristic of the Corinthian church may sometime be characteristic of the Jerusalem church. At that point, the Corinthian church will want to get aid from the Jerusalem church.

Paul here establishes the principle of voluntarism. He says there are positive sanctions associated with the program of giving that he recommends. He believed in self-sacrifice, and he also believed in self-interest. He appeals here to the ethically motivated goal of people with wealth to help people of a similar confession, who have fallen on hard times. He points out that this motivation was characteristic of the Macedonian churches. But he does not leave it at this. He makes plain the benefits of participating in such a program of interchurch assistance. This is a mutual benefit organization. The church is to help its members. Members include poor people who are part of the Church international. People across the borders and across cultures are members. This is why the kind of giving that is represented in Paul's letter is not tied to borders. It is tied to confession of faith. Confession of faith counts for more than ethnic origin or national borders.

Paul appeals to the altruism of members of the Corinthian church. He simultaneously appeals to their self-interest. This is the dual characteristic appeal of all covenant-keeping religion. Christ came to earth to sacrifice His life on behalf of His people. This is the greatest act of altruism in history. Yet on the basis of this act of altruism, God the Father gave to Christ the definitive position of exaltation. God has promised that there will be public acknowledgment by the whole earth of Christ's exaltation. Every knee will bow. This is true because Christ humbled himself and submitted to the cross (Phil. 2:8–12).¹² If Jesus Christ was rewarded for an act of supreme self-sacrifice, why would any covenant-keeper argue that acts of altruism, when conducted in terms of God's covenantal social order, will not also lead to positive rewards, both in time and in eternity?

12. Chapter 20.

E. Misusing the Text

This passage is misinterpreted by Christian defenders of the welfare state. These people come in the name of Christ and call for a system of coercive wealth redistribution by the state. Yet Paul never made any such appeal to a civil magistrate. He never suggested that civil government is responsible for wealth redistribution.

What applies to a voluntary institution such as the church does not apply to a coercive institution such as the state. No one has to join a church. Everyone inside a geographical boundary is governed by one or more civil governments. The judicial rules governing one institution are not the same as the rules governing the other institution. The fact that Paul appealed to the Corinthians to give money to aid the Jerusalem church during a temporary crisis had nothing to do with the call by economic reformers to empower the state to permanently extract wealth from one group of individuals and transfer this wealth to another group of individuals, minus 50% for handling.

There is nothing in the New Testament that suggests that civil government is a legitimate agency for the support of the poor. Those Christian political activists who insist that the modern welfare state was foreseen by the Bible's authors, let alone advocated by them, are involved in a program of self-conscious, willful deception. They are trying to deceive laymen who are unfamiliar with their Bibles, whose name is legion.

Conclusion

Paul encouraged the Corinthian church to abide by its promise to send aid to the Jerusalem church. He gave two reasons. First, they could someday find themselves in a tight position. The Jerusalem church might be there to help. This is an argument from self-interest. Second, there is joy in altruism. The Macedonian churches are examples. This also is self-interest.

He called on them to volunteer to help. This was not a call for government compulsion. It was not a call for permanent transfers of wealth for as long as the per member income of the Jerusalem church was lower than the per member income of the Corinthian church. He was raising money to meet a one-time emergency.

PERSUASIVE FUND-RAISING

Yet have I sent the brethren, lest our boasting of you should be in vain in this behalf; that, as I said, ye may be ready: Lest haply [it happen] if they of Macedonia come with me, and find you unprepared, we (that we say not, ye) should be ashamed in this same confident boasting. Therefore I thought it necessary to exhort the brethren, that they would go before unto you, and make up beforehand your bounty, whereof ye had notice before, that the same might be ready, as a matter of bounty, and not as of covetousness (II Cor. 9:3–5).

The theocentric issue here was sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Pledges as Vows

Paul has been using a series of arguments leading up to his request that the Corinthian church provide the money which it had promised to donate to the Jerusalem church before Paul had journeyed to Macedonia. It is apparent from the structure and tone of his letter that he had learned that the Corinthian church was beginning to hesitate on its commitment. He was persuaded that they needed to be persuaded in order for him to be able to return to the Jerusalem church with the money which the Corinthian church had promised to provide.

This has become a familiar story in the history of fund-raising. A church organizes a special service relating to some church fund-raising project. If the person who is doing the presentation is effective, he can raise a great deal of promised money. But, no matter how persuasive he is, the church will not collect as much money as it received in promises immediately after his presentation. This same phenomenon operates in television fund-raising programs. An organization pays to rent television time for a telethon. In the studio, the organization has rows of people sitting behind telephones, ready to talk with people who call in to promise to make a donation. The organization keeps announcing during the broadcast that promises of gifts, called pledges, are coming in. The total amount of money promised continues to rise. The problem comes in subsequent months, when the people who had promised to make the donations discover other uses for their money. The organizations rarely collect as much money as callers had promised. Only the use of credit cards can overcome this. The person on the telephone asks for the caller's credit card information. The money is immediately transferred from the caller's bank account to the organization's.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

Paul is concerned that this is about to happen to him. He says that he had told the churches in Macedonia about the generous offer of support that had been made by the Corinthian church. On this basis, he implies, the Macedonian church members had dug deep into their purses and donated a substantial amount of money in comparison to their wealth.² Paul is about to return to Corinth, and he suspects that what he had told the Macedonian churches is not going to become a reality.

Here, Paul reminds the Corinthians of their promise. In doing so, he is humiliating them. He is subtle in his presentation, but he is using the technique of humiliation and embarrassment in order to gain the donation which the church had promised earlier. He does not hesitate to remind them of their promise. He is not saying explicitly that they are vow-breakers and liars; he is only reminding them in a gentle sort of way that they are in the process of becoming vow-breakers and liars.

B. A Fund-Raising Letter

Second Corinthians is a fund-raising letter. It is probably the earliest example of a fund-raising letter. He uses logic. He uses emotion. He adopts gentle language rather than direct accusative language. He creates a document that has as its goal a specific action step. That action step is for the church to provide the money that it promised him on a previous journey.

Paul tells them that he has sent other individuals ahead of him in order to remind them of their obligation. This indicates how seriously he regarded his problem. He was concerned about the condition of the Jerusalem church. He knew that this church needed a large donation. If the Corinthian church did not fulfill its commitment, the donation would be substantially smaller. Paul is doing everything he can as a logician and as a motivator to persuade the leaders of the Corinthian church to persuade the members of the church to hand over the money. He believed that he must send what would today be called advance men. These are people who go to an organization to pre-sell the organization on making a purchase. In this case, Paul was sending them to re-sell the church on fulfilling its commitment.

2. Chapter 5.

He says that he does not wish to find them unprepared. He does not wish to be ashamed of them. He thinks the church is not going to donate the money that it had promised. Chapters 8 and 9 are masterful examples of how to persuade people to hand over money. To view these two chapters as anything besides fund-raising passages would be naive. Expositors have always explained the passage in terms of his goal, clearly stated, that he expects the church to come up with the money.

It is crucial that we understand the nature of his appeal. He is acting as a fund-raiser for an organization based on voluntarism. No adult head of household had been compelled to join the church. Slaves may have been forced to join, but it is unlikely that Paul is addressing his fund-raiser to slaves.

C. Paul's Use of Rhetoric

In making sure that he maximizes his return from this letter, Paul uses rhetoric. He uses emotion. He does not come out and say explicitly what he obviously believes about them: they do not intend to fulfill their commitment. Instead, he makes reference to their previous verbal commitment. He talks about the great generosity of the churches in Macedonia. He points out that these churches were poor churches when compared with the wealth possessed by members of the Corinthian church. This appeals to their sense of guilt or shame. It is not logical in the sense of a series of propositions. He is not trying to win a formal debate. He is trying to get as much money out of them as he can with this letter.

His opening sentence in this chapter is rhetorical. It is a deliberate untruth which is designed to be recognized as meaning its opposite.

He says that it is superfluous that he write this letter. “For as touching the ministering to the saints, it is superfluous for me to write to you” (II Cor. 9:1). Yet in chapters 8 and 9, it is clear that he regards this letter as mandatory to get the church to fulfill its commitment with respect to the donation. If this letter were really superfluous, he would not be devoting space to the issue of the donation. He would talk about other matters. Yet what he talks about in chapters 8 and 9 is money. So, when he says the letter is superfluous, he is conveying rhetorically that it is not superfluous. In this sense, rhetoric is not always logical. It is nevertheless persuasive.

D. Voluntarism, Not Coercion

Paul seeks to persuade individuals to provide charity on a voluntary basis. His letter makes no sense on any other supposition. There is no coercion implied anywhere in the letter. Church leaders did not have the authority to compel church members to fund this charitable operation. There is no trace anywhere in the letter of an appeal to members of the congregation who may have been civil magistrates. There is not a hint that the civil government is in any way responsible for funding a relief effort on behalf of the church in Jerusalem.

This fact should serve as a warning to self-professed Christian social activists, who are in fact political activists, who claim that these two chapters offer evidence supporting the concept that the civil government is responsible before God to provide money for relief efforts helping the poor. There is no such concept found in the New Testament. There is no suggestion in Christ’s teachings or Paul’s teachings or the teaching of any writer in the New Testament that civil government has any role whatsoever in providing economic relief to the poor.

The voluntary nature of the Corinthians’ relief effort is obvious. Unfortunately, that which is obvious to anybody who reads the text without a prior bias in favor of the welfare state is not obvious at all to promoters of the welfare state. They appeal to this passage as if it were justification for a concept of civil government that is based on the principle of coercive wealth redistribution. Such a view of civil government presents the government as a savior. This savior can heal. It heals, not by its word of faith, but by its word of warning. Any taxpayer who resists the demand of the tax collector will be prosecuted.

Because democratic socialist politicians regard civil government as an agency of plunder, they search for an ethical justification for what is in fact a scheme to buy votes with other people's money. Christian political activists provide anti-Christian politicians with what they claim is biblical evidence in favor of the welfare state. They ignore the context of this epistle. They ignore the fact that Paul is using logic and rhetoric to persuade his readers and listeners to provide funding for the Jerusalem church. He uses persuasion because he cannot use coercion. He does not appeal to the institution in society that exercises legal coercion: the civil government.

Defenders of the welfare state refuse to accept the obvious implications of this portion of Paul's epistle. Clearly, Paul understood that his fund-raising was based on voluntarism. Welfare state advocates refuse to discuss this aspect of the epistle. Instead, they appeal to certain words taken out of context, especially "equality." They reinterpret this passage as if it were a command for Christians to organize politically in order to pressure politicians to get into the national treasury and provide money to certain groups of poor people. These groups are the active constituents of the political party to which the Christian political activists belong. They are support troops in a political campaign to gather sufficient votes to elect politicians who will use the civil government as an agency of plunder. They use the plight of the poor as a logical and especially rhetorical justification for the use of money collected by the state and administered by a huge army of bureaucrats who cannot be fired by any politician.

Christian defenders of the welfare state never discuss this issue. They never provide evidence that the bulk of the funds raised through political coercion actually winds up in the hands of individual poor people. This is because the bulk of the money does not wind up in the hands of individual poor people; it winds up in the hands of full-time bureaucrats who administer the funds. It also winds up in the bank accounts of private welfare agencies that are not run by poor people.

None of this matters to the Christian defenders of the welfare state, because every welfare state operates in this manner. In their view, the only way to help the poor effectively is to implement programs that are based on political coercion in the name of the poor. All other programs are dismissed as secondary or peripheral in the communities where poor people live. They never discuss the fact that one of the main reasons why these other agencies are peripheral is the fact that the government for so many decades has intervened in order to support poor people directly or indirectly. Voluntary welfare agencies gain funds by appealing to people who have already surrendered 40% or more of their income to the collection agencies of various state, local, and national governments. Voluntary agencies must be funded by the leftovers. It is not surprising, then, that these organizations are underfunded. They are underfunded because the tax collectors have done their work effectively.

Conclusion

Paul pressured the Corinthian church to perform its obligation and provide the full donation promised by its leaders before he went to Macedonia to raise funds. He said that he had sent representatives to consult with the church's leadership, so that there will be no misunderstanding of what the church owes. He used rhetoric to persuade them to do what they had promised to do.

This is an appropriate approach when dealing with a voluntary organization that is under no legal obligation to do anything. There is no binding contract. There is only a promise made to God through Paul. This is a serious obligation, but it is not legally enforceable in any civil court. Only a church council might be able to deal with it, but the details of the obligation might be a matter of hearsay. So, there was no institutional way to resolve this. Paul therefore relied on logic and rhetoric: tools of persuasion.

There was no element of compulsion involved. This is why it is completely illegitimate to invoke this letter as somehow justifying the use of civil government as an agency of coercive wealth redistribution.

8

THE COVENANTAL PROSPERITY GOSPEL

But this I say, He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully (II Cor. 9:6).

The theocentric issue here is sanctions: causality. This is point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Sowing and Reaping

Paul begins with a biblical principle: we will reap what we sow. He applies this principle to a special situation: charitable giving. He uses this principle to convince the church at Corinth to fulfill its original commitment to make a donation to the Jerusalem church. He says that if a person sows sparingly, he will reap sparingly.

In the Old Testament passages that established this relationship between reaping and sowing, the focus was on ethics. If a society is evil, the results of people's actions will be negative. Hosea taught this.

Sow to yourselves in righteousness, reap in mercy; break up your fallow ground: for it is time to seek the LORD, till he come and rain righteousness upon you. Ye have plowed wickedness, ye have reaped iniquity; ye have eaten the fruit of lies: because thou didst trust in thy way, in the multitude of thy mighty men (Hosea 10:12–13).

Micah taught this.

Thou shalt sow, but thou shalt not reap; thou shalt tread the olives, but thou shalt not anoint thee with oil; and sweet wine, but shalt not drink wine. For the statutes of Omri are kept, and all the works of the house of Ahab, and ye walk in their counsels; that I should make thee a desolation, and the inhabitants thereof an hissing: therefore ye shall bear the reproach of my people (Micah 6:15–16).²

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

The statutes of Omri were laws opposed to Mosaic laws. The works of the house of Ahab, Omri's son (I Kings 16:28), were evil. Jeremiah taught this.

The spoilers are come upon all high places through the wilderness: for the sword of the LORD shall devour from the one end of the land even to the other end of the land: no flesh shall have peace. They have sown wheat, but shall reap thorns: they have put themselves to pain, but shall not profit: and they shall be ashamed of your revenues because of the fierce anger of the LORD (Jer. 12:12–13).³

There are few passages in the Old Testament where the application of this system of causation is explicitly individual. The author of the Proverbs wrote: "He that soweth iniquity shall reap vanity: and the rod of his anger shall fail" (Prov. 22:8). But any theory of individual causation is rare in the Bible. The Bible focuses on people as members of covenantal associations: churches, civil governments, and families. Isolated acts of evil in a righteous society are not likely to be economically productive. Similarly, isolated acts of righteousness in an evil society are unlikely to be economically productive. Ahab's servant Obadiah hid a hundred prophets in a cave and fed them (I Kings 18:4). He risked his life (v. 18). They ate bread and water. He did not charge a market-clearing price for these services.

There is a predictable cause-and-effect relationship between ethics and income. Members of a covenantal group that acts righteously can legitimately expect positive sanctions in this life. Members of groups that act in an unrighteous manner should expect negative sanctions in this life. We do not live in a universe governed by impersonal law. We also do not live in a universe governed by randomness. We live in a created universe. This universe reflects cosmic personalism.⁴

B. Charitable Giving

Paul extends the Old Testament principle of ethical cause and

2. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 28.

3. Ibid., ch. 16.

4. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1.

effect to include charitable giving. It is not simply that if a covenantal group treats others lawfully, its members will prosper in the long run. Paul says that if we go out of our way to extend blessings to someone in need through no ethical fault of his own, we can legitimately expect blessings in our lives. It is not enough that we do not commit evil acts; it is that we should commit righteous acts. People usually do not use the verb “commit” in relation to righteous acts. They use some other word, such as “perform.” They speak of sins of omission and sins of commission. Paul is speaking here about a righteous act of commission: charity. It is a positive act with the goal of benefiting people in temporary need. But charity has another goal: positive sanctions in history.

A covenant-breaker may not believe in a universe that is established in terms of ethical cause and effect. The psalmist spoke of covenant-breakers as committing evil self-consciously, on the assumption that God does see, or if He does see, He will not do anything about it. “They slay the widow and the stranger, and murder the fatherless. Yet they say, The LORD shall not see, neither shall the God of Jacob regard it. Understand, ye brutish among the people: and ye fools, when will ye be wise? He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? he that formed the eye, shall he not see? He that chastiseth the heathen, shall not he correct? he that teacheth man knowledge, shall not he know?” (Ps. 94:6–10). Such people are blind to the nature of cause and effect in God’s created universe. They do not understand that the universe reflects the ethical standards of the Creator.⁵ God has revealed in the Bible and in general revelation the ethical cause-and-effect system governing both nature and the social order.⁶

Paul reminds the Corinthian church that this ethical cause-and-effect structure of the universe applies to acts of righteousness, not just a refusal to commit acts of unrighteousness. Just as a farmer sows seeds actively, so should covenant-keepers actively sow righteousness. The farmer sows seeds in the expectation of a crop. Paul tells the Corinthian church that it should do the same.

C. Free Market Economic Theory

What Paul says of charitable giving, free market economists apply

5. Point three of the biblical covenant order is ethics: Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 3.

6. Point four: ibid., ch. 4.

to acts of thrift. Free market economists sing the praises of rising production per capita. Capital provides the tools that we need in order to increase our economic output. Free market economists recommend thrift, which is said to be the basis of increasing supply of capital per capita. They see the benefits of saving. They understand that as people sow more, they will reap more. Mises wrote: "There is but one means available to improve the material conditions of mankind: to accelerate the growth of capital accumulated as against the growth in population. The greater the amount of capital invested per head of the worker, the more and better the goods can be produced and consumed."⁷

Free market economists focus their attention on thrift rather than charitable giving. Rare is the free market economist who devotes a subsection of a chapter to the economic benefits associated with charitable giving. He may admit that charity is good for the recipients, and he may say that it is good for the self-esteem of the donors. But he does not spend more than a paragraph or two on the causal relationship between charitable giving and increased production per capita in society at large. He does not believe in such a relationship. He does not think there is any verifiable analytical relationship between charitable giving and subsequent income that is comparable to the statistically verifiable relationship among thrift, capital, output, and income.

The free market economist affirms methodological individualism. He readily admits that increased thrift by an individual is likely to lead to increased future income for this individual. He is well aware of the relationship between increased saving, increased capital investment, and increased output per capita. He assumes that in any competitive free market society, increased saving leads to increased output and therefore increased income. But the kind of sacrifice that is involved in thrift is not seen by a free market economist as being comparable to the kind of sacrifice involved in charitable giving. He sees increased thrift as an extension of the principle of private ownership of the means of production. The individual is investing in his own future. He retains ownership of the capital that he purchases by means of his thrift. He is the legal owner of any future stream of income that may be generated by the capital that his thrift has enabled him to purchase.

In the case of charitable giving, ownership of the money is transferred to the recipient. The free market economist does not believe that the individual who gives away money will predictably receive economic benefits proportional to the return on the same investment (ROI) from thrift. He limits any gain to personal self-esteem. He does not see the gain in terms of increased production in the society at large, production which will enable the donor to gain rewards personally that are proportional to the degree of sacrifice involved in the charitable gift.

7. Ludwig von Mises, The Anti-Capitalist Mentality (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1956), p. 5. (<http://bit.ly/MisesAnti>)

He argues that if society A gives 10% to the poor and does not save, while society B saves 10% and does not give to the poor, society B will become richer over time. He does not consider the possibility that a society that does not give to the poor is unlikely to experience a high rate of saving for four consecutive generations.

D. Methodological Covenantalism

1. Charity and Thrift

Paul is not arguing in terms of the worldview of modern free market economics. He does not begin with the assumption of methodological individualism. He begins with the assumption of methodological covenantalism. He regards the universe as totally controlled by a totally sovereign God (Rom. 9:1–17; Eph. 1). God has recommended charitable giving as a way of economic success. Because God is completely in control of cause and effect in the universe, He has established economic laws in terms of His recommended system of ethics. This system of ethics establishes predictable covenantal relationships between reaping and sowing. So, an individual or organization that gives economic support to people who are in need because of circumstances beyond their control will prosper over time. In God's universe, charitable giving has the same effect in the long run as thrift. Despite the fact that the donor transfers ownership of the money or goods to someone else, and despite the fact that he loses all legal claim to any future stream of income generated by the person who is assisted by the donation, the organization or individual who makes the donation will find, in the long run, that economic benefits flow back, as if he had never transferred ownership to a third party.

Methodological covenantalism views cause and effect as both individual and corporate. God governs the flow of all income streams. He never surrenders ownership of these income streams. He merely delegates the use of capital to men as His stewards. So, because God is absolutely sovereign over history, He can guarantee to covenant-keepers that they will increase the likelihood of an increasing flow of income over time as a result of their charitable giving.

The humanistic free market economist does not believe in methodological covenantalism. So, he sees the transfer of ownership of an asset to a third party as making the donor economically poorer. This is the price the donor pays for his increase in self-esteem. The free market economist does not see that there is a predictable relationship between donating money in the present and receiving a flow of income in the future as a result of this donation. He is a methodological individualist. He sees private ownership as either individual or corporate, in the sense that individuals participate legally in a profit-seeking corporate structure, and thereby possess legal claims to a portion of any future income which flows to the corporate structure.

2. Enforceable Contracts

For the methodological individualist, everything is determined by contracts. The operation of the economy is therefore determined by the enforcement of legal claims. All lawful contracts, to be contracts, must be enforceable in a human court. There are no other courts.

For the methodological covenantalist, everything is determined by covenants. The operation of the economy is therefore determined by the enforcement of legal claims. The legal foundation of such enforcement begins with God. Covenant theology is theocentric. All legal claims are governed by a representative model: God's ownership of creation and therefore also ownership of the legal claims He has established, based on His office as Creator. All human contracts are established under God, as are all legal claims. Some are enforced directly by God. Others are enforced indirectly by God through His sovereign decree over history's participants. Others are enforced in human courts.

Paul tells the Corinthian church in this passage that those who sow sparingly will reap sparingly. Paul is operating in terms of an assumption. This assumption is clear to the methodological covenantalist, but it is unclear to the methodological individualist. This assumption is as follows: in God's cause-and-effect universe, charity establishes a predictable presumption on future income. This is enforced by God in history, directly and indirectly. It is not enforced by a human court.

3. God's Ownership

God's original ownership was established by His office as Creator.

But there is a subordinate form of God's ownership. This was established by His supreme act of grace: the incarnation, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ. This subordinate form of ownership occurs with every extension of grace by God. All grace establishes a legal liability.

And that servant, which knew his lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more (Luke 12:47–48).⁸

God has established a legal claim on all future income streams. He has granted grace, beginning with Adam and Eve. This established its enforceable legal claim by God. This legal claim is not limited to eternity. It is also binding in history. This is why the extension of the kingdom of God in history is a manifestation of God's enforcement of His legal claims on the total output of all recipients of His grace.

The principle of an economic return to charitable giving begins with God's charity toward mankind: a gift not deserved by the recipients. God's cosmic charity reinforces His original legal claim on the whole world. It is through the extension of the kingdom of God in history that covenant-keepers participate in the enforcement of God's legal claim on the whole world. This is why the doctrine of economic growth, the doctrine of postmillennialism, and the doctrine of the triumph of the kingdom of God in history are inter-related. They originate in a biblical system of covenantal cause and effect.

E. Two Versions of the Prosperity Gospel

Passages such as this sowing/reaping passage are used by promoters of what is sometimes called the gospel of prosperity, which gives confidence to listeners that sacrifices made in the present will produce positive benefits in the future. This assessment of economic cause and effect is accurate.

1. Greater Harvest

Paul tells the church at Corinth that it can legitimately expect a greater harvest because of its charitable gift to the Jerusalem church. It can expect a lesser harvest if this charitable gift is minimal. This is the covenantal view of the prosperity gospel. When this view of economic cause and effect is understood in terms of the extension of the kingdom of God in history, postmillennial eschatology,⁹ and covenantal cause and effect, the prosperity gospel is accurate.

8. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia; Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 28.

This system of causation applies corporately. It is not applied to institutionally autonomous individuals. To the extent that the prosperity gospel is applied only to individuals, it falls into the error of methodological individualism. It limits God's comprehensive claim on all streams of income that are generated by the recipients of His grace, both special grace and common grace. It therefore limits the grace of God. It limits the extension of God's kingdom in history.

The problem with the prosperity gospel is not that it proclaims a system of ethical cause and effect in the field of economics. It is not that it teaches that he who sows abundantly will reap abundantly. Both are explicitly taught in the Bible. But this is taught in the Bible in terms of methodological covenantalism. It is taught within the context of God's extension of His kingdom in history.

2. Eschatology

Because most theologians and pastors today are either premillennial or amillennial, they oppose the gospel of prosperity in all forms. They oppose it with respect to individuals. This is because their eschatological systems deny the possibility of a postmillennial extension of God's kingdom in history in which individuals will participate. Because of their eschatology, they are even more hostile to methodological covenantalism, with its system of ethical cause and effect,¹⁰ than they are to the individualistic gospel of prosperity. The individualistic gospel of prosperity becomes their whipping boy, when in fact what they really oppose is the doctrine of corporate cause and effect with respect to the kingdom of God. Meredith G. Kline defended this viewpoint authoritatively in one academic sentence.

And meanwhile it [the common grace order] must run its course within the uncertainties of the mutually conditioning principles of

9. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1992] 1997). (<http://bit.ly/klghshd>)

10. Point 4 of the biblical covenant model: Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 4.

common grace and common curse, prosperity and adversity being experienced in a manner largely unpredictable because of the inscrutable sovereignty of the divine will that dispenses them in mysterious ways.¹¹

This is a defense of covenantal unpredictability in history. He and the theologians who share his view of social causation in history—the overwhelming majority—do not believe that God’s kingdom will expand in history into every area of life, transforming the entire civilization as leaven transforms dough, i.e., the transformation described by Jesus. “Another parable spake he unto them; The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took, and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened” (Matt. 13:33).¹² In contrast to Paul’s explicit statement, they believe that covenant-keepers who sow abundantly will reap sparingly. Even more important, they believe that Christian institutions that sow abundantly will reap sparingly. This outlook is explicit in amillennialism, and it is implicit in premillennialism, because premillennialism teaches that Jesus will return to establish an earthly kingdom at a time in history in which covenant-breakers have extended almost complete control over the face of the earth.¹³

Sometimes people ask this question: “Does eschatology really matter?” It surely matters in the area of economic theory. Those who believe in amillennialism and premillennialism are much more likely to adopt the principle of humanistic free market economists: methodological individualism. They see cause and effect in much the same way that the atheistic free market economist sees it. They do not deny the fact that increased thrift is likely to produce increased income in the future. Most of them probably affirm this principle. They are not socialists. But when they come to this passage in Paul, they seek ways to avoid affirming it. They do not acknowledge that this principle of causation teaches that Christian individuals and Christian institutions that increase their level of charitable giving will receive, in a predictable way, increased income, increased influence, and increased power in society. They shudder at such a concept. They shudder because such a concept openly refutes both premillennialism and amillennialism, both

11. Meredith G. Kline, “Comments on an Old-New Error,” Westminster Theological Journal, XLI (Fall 1978), p. 184. This essay is a critique of Greg L. Bahnsen’s view of theonomy.

12. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 30.

13. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), chaps. 4–6. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>) of which preach the eventual cultural defeat of Christianity. So, they defend their eschatological positions against the economic framework of methodological covenantalism, which Paul explicitly affirms in this passage. They find other ways to explain this passage.

Some expositors may affirm the truth of what Paul is saying in this passage, but then they refuse to extend it to society at large. They refuse to comment on the obvious implication of this passage: if churches will increase their charitable giving, they will grow in influence, membership, and dedication of their members. Churches will reap the harvest that their commitment to charitable giving assures them.

Paul's affirmation of the predictability between sowing and reaping is an affirmation of postmillennialism to the extent that churches and church members believe what Paul teaches here, and then respond accordingly. The amillennialist and the premillennialist, if they are consistent, must argue that what Paul says here will never take place in history. This is because most Christians will not believe Paul, most churches will not believe him, and few will follow his recommendation. In other words, they are implicitly arguing that the church of Jesus Christ does not benefit in history from increasing knowledge of God's word. They are implicitly arguing that the more that covenant-keepers learn about what God's word teaches, the less they are willing to believe it, obey it, and enforce it. The more that the church of Jesus Christ benefits from the intervention of the Holy Spirit as both teacher and comforter, the less the church is willing to follow what God commands.

This is a radical condemnation of the entire church, including the local congregations in which the pastors preach. Yet pastors know that if they keep coming back over and over and over to their congregations, accusing them of not believing what God says, accusing them of not obeying God's laws, they will be fired. They do not want to be fired. So, they preach against any form of covenant theology that undergirds Paul's statement in this passage. They preach that, over time, as the church becomes more faithful to God's word, it becomes weaker and more of a victim. In other words, they preach that history will progressively testify against the truth of what Paul and teaches explicitly in this passage.

Eschatology matters.

3. Name It and Claim It

Eschatology does not matter in cases where pastors are theologically inconsistent. Pastors who preach the Arminian, charismatic version of the prosperity gospel, known by detractors as “name it and claim it,” are generally adherents of traditional Scofield dispensationalism.¹⁴ They do not perceive the theological inconsistency of their position. They do not preach very often on eschatology, but they avoid affirming postmillennialism.

There is a reason for this. They are not covenant theologians. They do not believe in God’s comprehensive redemption of all fallen institutions.¹⁵ They are methodological individualists. So, they preach individual prosperity through obedience to God’s law of charity, even though they deny—if pushed—that this applies to institutions. They affirm the invisible economic success of an elite of Christian believers who follow their version of the prosperity gospel, yet simultaneously affirm the eschatologically inevitable growing corruption of churches and Christian institutions in general. God will not comprehensively redeem society, they say.

There is a major theological problem with this view of economic cause and effect. Paul addressed his message to a local congregation. This was a corporate body formed by verbal covenant and marked by baptism and the Lord’s Supper. Paul did not promise prosperity to individuals in the Corinthian church, as distinguished from individuals as church members. The Corinthian church had promised as an institution to make the donation. It was therefore responsible before God.

The prosperity gospel of dispensational, charismatic, Arminian fundamentalism has this crucial problem: the promise of prosperity in the Old Testament was corporate. Advocates of the prosperity gospel of individualism make the same mistake made by Eliphaz in dealing with Job.

Remember, I pray thee, who ever perished, being innocent? or where were the righteous cut off? Even as I have seen, they that plow iniquity, and sow wickedness, reap the same. By the blast of God they perish, and by the breath of his nostrils are they consumed (Job 4:7–9).

14. The Scofield Reference Bible (New York: Oxford University Press, 1909).

15. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C: “Comprehensive Redemption. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>). Kenneth L. Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/GentryGGC>)

He applied this assessment to Job. He was wrong. Job had been a righteous man. He came under God's negative sanctions by way of Satan through no moral fault of his own (Job 1). All of his children had been killed through no moral fault of their own. The prosperity preachers have always sided with Eliphaz, identifying physically afflicted Christians as people of little faith. The Book of Job stands as a visible judge against these preachers. So does the life of Paul.

Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one. Thrice was I beaten with rods, once was I stoned, thrice I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day I have been in the deep; In journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren; In weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness (II Cor. 11:24–27).

F. Charity and Thrift

There is little evidence—I know of none—which indicates that a society that gives only to charities and saves nothing will grow economically. There is lots of evidence that a society characterized by great generosity is also characterized by great thrift and economic growth.

The first great example of this in human history were monastic orders in Western Europe. Their members took vows of poverty. Some orders also produced goods for the market. The Cistercians are an example. These institutions were characterized by high savings, careful attention to production, and high profits. The lifestyles of the members improved to such an extent that they were richer than those in the surrounding communities. The monasteries grew wealthy. There were repeated periods of reform of these orders, in order to restore the original ideal of poverty.

When the discipline of thrift is widespread, the parallel disciplines associated with thrift are widespread. People live on a fraction of their income. They give away a higher portion of their income than the common man does, and they invest more, too. The Methodists are good examples, from the mid-eighteenth century to the late nineteenth century. So are the Quakers in the same era.

The Bible does not teach that generous people receive direct grants of wealth by God. It says only that there is a positive correlation between generosity and visible, measurable success. That this economic success comes from thrift, innovation, entrepreneurship, hard work, and price competition in no way challenges the idea that success comes from generosity.

Conclusion

Paul told the church at Corinth that “he which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully.” This applies to individuals. It also applies to groups. The group that Paul said it would apply to was a local church.

There is a predictable cause-and-effect relationship between ethics and outcomes. Evil produces losses; righteousness produces profits. A little righteousness produces a little extra income. A lot of righteousness will produce a lot of extra income.

This system of causation applies to both individuals and associations. There are theologians who deny that this system of causation exists because it would lead in history to the triumph of God’s kingdom institutionally. This thought is antithetical to their eschatologies of civilizational defeat for Christianity. There are others who promote this system with respect to individuals, but not for the church specifically and Christian civilization in general.

Whenever covenant theology affirms both the authority of biblical law and a predictable system of sanctions, it affirms the reality of Paul’s words in the lives of individuals and the lives of associations. The system of ethical causation applies both to the one and the many. It therefore testifies to the Trinity, who is both one and many.

9

CHARITY: VOLUNTARISM VS. COMPULSION

Every man according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give; not grudgingly, or of necessity: for God loveth a cheerful giver. And God is able to make all grace abound toward you; that ye, always having all sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work: (As it is written, He hath dispersed abroad; he hath given to the poor: his righteousness remaineth for ever. Now he that ministereth seed to the sower both minister bread for your food, and multiply your seed sown, and increase the fruits of your righteousness;) Being enriched in every thing to all bountifulness, which causeth through us thanksgiving to God. For the administration of this service not only supplieth the want of the saints, but is abundant also by many thanksgivings unto God (II Cor. 9:7–12).

The theocentric issue here was causation: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. The Charitable Person

The phrase, “the Lord loves a cheerful giver,” has come down to English-speaking peoples through the generations in all of its King James Version antiquarian splendor. This principle of giving undergirds the Bible’s doctrine of voluntarism. Paul’s language could not be any clearer. He is asking the Corinthian church to appeal to its members to dig deep into their purses and provide assistance for the Jerusalem church. He makes it clear that this donation is completely voluntary.

Paul does not say anywhere in his epistles that civil government has an obligation to use the power of the sword to extract wealth from one group of residents in order to fund the lifestyles of other groups of residence. He relies exclusively on the ideal of voluntarism. Here, he explicitly rejects any suggestion that compulsion is legitimate in raising money to fund people in need, no matter how desperate they may appear to be. He appeals to the church, not to civil government, for the provision of aid to the Jerusalem church. He regards the principle of voluntarism with respect to charity as the biblical standard of charity.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

He points out to the Corinthians that God has shown grace towards them in the past. They have sufficiency in all things. He reminds them that this prior grace has enabled them to abound in every good work. There is always a price tag associated with the grace of God. Jesus Christ paid this price at Calvary. But this does not mean that the recipients of grace have no responsibilities associated with extending the kingdom of God. The Great Commission is clear in this regard. "And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen" (Matt. 28:18–20).²

Jesus was explicit about this debt relationship. He said that those who have received greater benefits are more responsible for the use of these assets than a person who has received less grace. There is cause and effect in the social order. When someone receives a benefit, he becomes more responsible before God for the use of this asset (Luke 14:47–48).³

Paul here describes the model of the charitable man. He is someone who has dispersed wealth abroad. He has given to the poor. "He hath dispersed abroad; he hath given to the poor: his righteousness remaineth for ever." He is speaking of God. Specifically, he is speaking of Jesus Christ, who is the ultimate model for the charitable man.

2. Kenneth L. Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/GentryGGC>). Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 48.

3. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

B. The Charitable Church

Paul reminds them that God is the source of the benefits enjoyed by the Corinthian church. God ministers, meaning He provides. “Now he that ministereth seed to the sower both minister bread for your food, and multiply your seed sown, and increase the fruits of your righteousness.” This is the imagery of the farmer who sows seed in order to reap a harvest. This is how Jesus described evangelism (John 4:35–36). It is a program of harvesting. God is clearly the source of the harvest. He is sovereign over all such matters. So, when he provides seed for the harvest, he makes Christians responsible for the sowing of this seed.

Paul reminds them that the church is responsible for the administration of whatever it has received from God. Paul says they have corporate responsibilities relating to the administration of the wealth which has been handed over to the church by its members.

An aspect of the grace of God is His provision of wealth. The Corinthian church had sufficiency. “Sufficiency” meant then what it means today. An individual possesses resources that enable him to carry out his assignment. As a steward, the individual or the institution must not waste resources. The resources must be put to good use, according to what God has in mind regarding the use of these resources.

Chapters 8 and 9 of this epistle are devoted to the topic of funds to be raised by the church, as previously promised, in order that the Jerusalem church might not suffer. This voluntarism indicates that churches in one geographical area have responsibilities toward churches in other geographical areas. The local institutional church acts as a steward of God’s resources. This stewardship is personal. The leaders of the church are supposed to understand that the church is not a neutral institution. Its goal is to extend the kingdom of God, through hierarchical leadership and discipline. It must preach the Bible, offer the sacraments and defend them judicially, and extend the gospel across geographical boundaries through time. One local congregation is supposed to assist other congregations, meaning across borders and cultural divisions.

This concept of an international church is basic to the extension of the church through evangelism. Members of the congregation give money to the congregation, whose leaders in turn pay for evangelists to go on the road. This is an act of future-orientation.

C. Charity vs. Compulsion

Paul says that the Lord loves a cheerful giver. He does not say that the church should use its influence to wheedle financial support from unhappy givers. Even less does he suggest that the church should threaten resisting members with church sanctions if they refuse to donate. Compulsion is foreign to this fund-raising letter. Because Paul believed in voluntarism, he wrote this letter.

The difference between the New Testament's principle of voluntary giving and the modern world's principle of charity through coercive taxation is absolute. There is no way to reconcile the two positions. If we accept one, we must reject the other. Either the poor are to be taken care of by means of voluntary contributions from people with assets of their own to give, or else they must be taken care of by civil government bureaucrats who spend taxpayers' money on projects funded by the politicians.

Money confiscated by the state cannot be used by voluntary institutions to extend charity unless these institutions are used by politicians and bureaucrats to distribute the confiscated funds. These institutions then become extensions of the politics of plunder. They become institutionally dependent on repeated acts of plunder. The flow of funds encourages them to add staff and programs. This creates institutional dependency.

The modern welfare state in the United States is so adamant that its programs are not a form of charity that it has created a word to describe its programs: entitlements. An entitlement is owed. The state specifically owes funding to the recipients of its tax money. The Soviet Union was so committed to this view that it made illegal all forms of private charity. It wanted the poor (and everyone else) to be totally dependent on the state. One post-Soviet critic of the Soviet Union's policy of state-funded charity identified the fundamental issue: the destruction of community. "The paternalistic nature of the Soviet state welfare system and its persistent disregard and suppression of any forms of charitable activities developed by institutions other than the state significantly discredited the whole concept of charity, voluntarism and community organizing and suppressed civic initiatives."⁴

The nature of the state monopoly over charity was understood

4. Svetlana V. Kupryashkina, Women and Voluntary Activities in Ukraine: A Historic Outlook and a View On Soviet State Paternalism (Ukraine: Center for Women's Studies). (<http://bit.ly/SovietCharity>)

well by one of the founders of the Soviet Union, who became its most famous victim: Lev Bronstein, better known as Leon Trotsky. He fell victim to Josef Djughishvili, better known as Stalin, who sent a man to Mexico City to murder him with a pickaxe. During Trotsky's exile, he wrote The Revolution Betrayed (1936). In Chapter 11, he made this observation: "In a country where the sole employer is the state, this means death by slow starvation. The old principle: who does not work shall not eat, has been replaced with a new one: who does not obey shall not eat." He did not bother to mention the source of this traditional saying. It was the Apostle Paul. "For even when we were with you, this we commanded you, that if any would not work, neither should he eat" (II Thes. 3:10).⁵ Perhaps he did not know its origin. He may have been citing Article 12 of the 1936 Constitution of the USSR, referred to as Stalin's Constitution. Article 12 reads:

In the U.S.S.R. work is a duty and a matter of honor for every able-bodied citizen, in accordance with the principle: "He who does not work, neither shall he eat."

Stalin knew exactly where this concept came from. He had begun his career as a seminarian.

D. The Politics of Guilt and Pity

This phrase is the title of a collection of essays by R. J. Rushdoony. In a chapter titled, "The Biblical Doctrine of Charity," he presented the case for private charity and against the welfare state. He made this crucial point.

Charity has as its purpose the strengthening of society and its protection. Its purpose is to unify people of a common faith and to enable the unfortunate both to care for themselves and to maintain their participation in the life of a godly commonwealth.⁶

In contrast is the politics of the welfare state. The welfare state does not call for a common confession. It does not assess the causes of a person's poverty. It is impersonal. It is "by the numbers," as civil law must be in order to place the bureaucrats under law.

A godly man has pity on a victim of circumstances beyond the victim's control, Rushdoony wrote.

5. Chapter 27.

6. R. J. Rushdoony, Politics of Guilt and Pity (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1970] 1995), p. 67. (<http://bit.ly/rjrpgogap>)

Pity means literally “loving kindness,” “to be gracious.” This attitude of pity, on God’s part, is never promiscuous but always selective, and, according to Scripture, it is to be selective on man’s part also. . . no pity must be shown to evil.⁷

This is in contrast the false charity of the welfare state, which is by law unselective. False charity imposes no confession of faith, no commitment to ethics, no other requirement than (maybe) for the recipient to make a pro-forma effort to look for a job.

False charity hates joy, luxury, and abundance in every form and has a levelling demand: it denies the person’s right to use his property and wealth in terms of his own conscience. The “rights” of the poor to a man’s wealth exceed his own rights and wishes. Success becomes a crime to be atoned for by a required share-the-wealth program.⁸

False charity rests on a concept of guilt for one’s success and legislated pity for the unsuccessful—a universal category—rather than resting on pity for those poor who fell on hard times due to no fault of their own.

The welfare state is a sham. It is a puppet show to manipulate gullible voters. It is run by professional activists who are paid by donors to promote the politics of plunder in the name of the poor. It is the great game of bait and switch.⁹ It is legislated in the name of the poor on behalf of the middle class at the expense of the rich.

E. In the Name of the Poor

Politicians use the welfare state’s principle of coercion of one group in order to benefit another group. They do this because they are competing in the marketplace for votes. The currency of the realm in politics is votes. Politicians understand the currency of their realm. They understand it far better than occasional voters or non-voters do. They ask: “Which groups offer more votes?” They ask: “What can I vote for while in office that will gain me more votes at the next election, net, than my votes in office will cost me?”

In 1850, just before he died, the French essayist and politician Frédéric Bastiat published a little book, The Law. In a section titled

7. Ibid., p. 65.

8. Ibid., p. 69.

9. This refers to a practice of advertising a low-price good that you do not possess, and then persuading someone who has come to the store to buy it that he should buy a higher-price item.

“Property and Plunder,” he described the motivation undergirding the modern welfare state. The motivation is plunder.

Man can live and satisfy his wants only by ceaseless labor; by the ceaseless application of his faculties to natural resources. This process is the origin of property.

But it is also true that a man may live and satisfy his wants by seizing and consuming the products of the labor of others. This process is the origin of plunder.

Now since man is naturally inclined to avoid pain—and since labor is pain in itself—it follows that men will resort to plunder whenever plunder is easier than work. History shows this quite clearly. And under these conditions, neither religion nor morality can stop it.

When, then, does plunder stop? It stops when it becomes more painful and more dangerous than labor.

It is evident, then, that the proper purpose of law is to use the power of its collective force to stop this fatal tendency to plunder instead of to work. All the measures of the law should protect property and punish plunder.

But, generally, the law is made by one man or one class of men. And since law cannot operate without the sanction and support of a dominating force, this force must be entrusted to those who make the laws.

This fact, combined with the fatal tendency that exists in the heart of man to satisfy his wants with the least possible effort, explains the almost universal perversion of the law. Thus it is easy to understand how law, instead of checking injustice, becomes the invincible weapon of injustice. It is easy to understand why the law is used by the legislator to destroy in varying degrees among the rest of the people, their personal independence by slavery, their liberty by oppression, and their property by plunder. This is done for the benefit of the person who makes the law, and in proportion to the power that he holds.

By promising to take money from a tiny elite of voters, who do not have a lot of votes, and transferring this money to a broad base of poor people, politicians can conceal what they are really doing. They are taxing the rich and the upper middle classes in order to provide money to spend on programs that are approved by the rich and middle classes. Only a fraction of the money appropriated for welfare projects ever gets to poor people. Much of the money is absorbed by the bureaucrats who administer the welfare programs. The poor do receive some money, but always as people who are led to understand that they benefit only because of the politicians and the bureaucrats. They realize early that they are in a subservient position, and that all talk of legal entitlements is political fluff. They know that at any time, the government can cut them off. They know that if times get tight economically, politicians will seek to transfer money openly to groups of voters who have more clout than the poor do.

The poor tend not to vote. The middle classes and elderly people who receive government pensions have far more votes than the poor have, and they vote in much larger percentages. They are in control politically. They want welfare, and they are willing to accept welfare programs when the justification of the welfare apparatus is to help the poor. Academic studies reveal that most of the money taken by the government is allocated to programs that are used mainly by the middle class. College tuitions are a good example. The children of poor people do not attend college in large numbers. The children of the middle class do.

Conclusion

Paul said in this passage that God expects charity, but He expects it to be voluntary. More than this: He expects it to arise out of cheerfulness. The giver should understand that God has blessed him, and that giving freely is a proper response.

This outlook is utterly foreign to all aspects of the modern welfare state, which is based on coercion. Political coercion is used to extract wealth and therefore influence from private citizens. In the name of helping the poor, politicians seek votes from the non-poor. The politicians use a sense of guilt and pity in the voters to manipulate them. The voters elect the guilt-manipulators, and then demand that the state provide even greater allocations of plunder to support their interests.

10

FINANCIAL INDEPENDENCE

But be it so, I did not burden you: nevertheless, being crafty, I caught you with guile. Did I make a gain of you by any of them whom I sent unto you? I desired Titus, and with him I sent a brother. Did Titus make a gain of you? walked we not in the same spirit? walked we not in the same steps? (II Cor. 12:16–18).

The theocentric issue here was grace: an unearned gift. This is point four of the biblical covenant.¹

Paul is attempting to raise money for the Jerusalem church. Here, he tells the leaders at Corinth that he has never asked for financial support for himself, nor has Titus. This positioning was important. He was coming on behalf of another church. He was not being paid to do this. He does not say that the Jerusalem church did not pay him, but it is implied, because he accepted no money from Corinth. He is independent of any church's support.

This makes his plea for funds that much more powerful. He works on behalf of others. The church at Corinth knows that the Jerusalem church will get all of the money it raises for that church. Their contributions will go further.

Paul also had the advantage of being independent of the churches he served. They could not alter the content of his preaching by threatening him with the removal of financial support. He was a tentmaker by profession (Acts 18:3).² This source of income made him financially independent of churches.

Being financially independent of those to whom you bring a message places you in a special category. Either someone supports you who wants this message proclaimed, or else you believe in it so strongly that you are willing to forego time and money in order to proclaim it. The second category possesses greater authority. You are not in this for the money. You are not an agent of another special-interest group. You are a person in a position to do something else with your life, but you choose to sacrifice. The listener thinks, "What is so important about this message that this person sacrifices the income he could earn if he sold his services to a third party?"

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Gary North, Sacrifice and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Acts, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 8.

Paul possessed such authority. Because his income came from a competitive market that had nothing to do with the gospel, he was in a position to proclaim his message, without theological compromise, on a "take it or leave it" basis. He did not earn a living by selling his services to a third party with a hidden agenda. He was no earthly person's agent.

When you bring any message that asks people to change their minds and then their ways, you strengthen your hand by being financially independent. Such independence is widely regarded as success. The person either has wealth or else the skills necessary to support himself. These are both goals that dependent people would like to possess.

Conclusion

Paul reminds the Corinthian church that he is not dependent on them for his funding. He is independent. This increases his reliability. He was raising money. This positioning as an independent agent served to validate his authority as someone who was dedicated to his ministry of service.

11

CHARITY AND THE KINGDOM

And when James, Cephas, and John, who seemed to be pillars, perceived the grace that was given unto me, they gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship; that we should go unto the heathen, and they unto the circumcision. Only they would that we should remember the poor; the same which I also was forward to do (Gal. 2:9–10).

The theocentric issue here was charity, or grace (charis): point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Shared Vision

Paul says that the other apostles told him that the only requirement that they had for his ministry was that he emphasize giving to the poor. He says that this had always been his intention, so that in no sense was this requirement by the other apostles a limitation on his ministry.

Surely chapters 8 and 9 of his second epistle to the Corinthians indicate the extent to which Paul was committed to the idea that Christians should be generous with whatever wealth they possess.² It is Christians' responsibility, as members of a local congregation, to participate in charitable activities organized by their congregation. He stressed this with respect to the Corinthians, but it is clear from this passage that he regarded this as a general principle to be applied by Christians across borders. He understood that this is a universal obligation.

The emphasis on charity in the epistles is obvious to anyone who has spent much time reading the epistles. The authors were committed to charitable activities. These activities are not limited to charity from one Christian to another. Certainly, this is where charity is supposed to begin. But charity is also to be shown to people outside the household of faith. "And let us not be weary in well doing: for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not. As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith" (Gal. 6:9–10).³ This made Christianity unique in its day. There had been a similar emphasis in Mosaic religion, but it is at the forefront in Christianity. Other major religions of the Roman Empire had no similar emphasis.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Chapters 4–9.

B. God's Kingdom Made Visible

The importance of charity for the life of the church has to do mainly with the visible extension of the kingdom of God in history. Charitable activities catch the attention of the recipients of the charity. They also catch the attention of outsiders to the faith, who are impressed by the fact that members of the church are generous to fellow members and also to people outside the church.

Charity is widely respected. Every society understands the extent to which there must be charitable activities for the sake of the social order. It impresses members of every society when they see that members of a particular organization are specially faithful to this requirement, which is a universally recognized benefit.

1. Social Insurance

Giving generously is not simply a matter of public relations. It is also a matter of making certain that individuals within the fellowship do not live in constant fear of the possibility that some unforeseen disaster will strike their family. The fact that members of the congregation give generously is a form of social insurance. Every fellowship has this kind of informal insurance, but the church has been public in its commitment to the necessity of such forms of insurance. God does not want his people to live in fear. When people live in fear, they are hesitant to take risks. They are hesitant to launch new projects. They hoard resources, including money. They try to compensate for the unknown.

God tells people that when they are part of His covenant, He does care for them. He tells them not be overly concerned about the potential catastrophes that can strike any family without warning. He reminds them that they do not live in a universe of cosmic impersonalism. On the contrary, they live in a society and a universe in which God's cosmic personalism is the foundation of all existence.⁴ His providence, rather than randomness or fate, governs the universe.

3. Chapter 13.

2. Positive Confession

Charity is an outworking of this confession of faith. When God tells His people that they should be generous to those who have fallen into need through no fault of their own, those who are committed to the God of the Bible act confidently when they give away a portion of their wealth to victims of unforeseen circumstances. They testify to their faith in the providential hand of God. They testify to their confidence that God is on their side. He will make certain that they are provided with whatever they really need. David wrote: "I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread" (Ps. 37:25).⁵

One of the ways in which covenant-keepers gain this confidence is that they see that members of the church who fall on hard times through no fault of their own do receive support from other members of the church. So, the benefit of charity is twofold. First, it convinces people to discipline themselves by giving away money, while ignoring the fear that without money, they will be helpless in a time of crisis. Second, the fact that they give the money to other members of the congregation reminds them that there is an institutional basis for confidence that God will provide for them in a time of crisis.

Therefore, giving away money to people in need is a good discipline of the faith. It testifies to people's confidence in the God of the Bible. It also testifies to their confidence in the good judgment of fellow Christians, who are willing to give money, either individually or through the church, to people who have fallen on hard times. Giving away money is a self-reinforcing spiritual exercise. God does not need the money. He says we do not need the money when we rely entirely on him.

4. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1.

5. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 6.

3. Wealth as a Tool

It is not that God opposes the accumulation of wealth. In the Old Testament, we have repeated cases in which God revealed to the people through Moses that wealth is a legitimate goal in history, for it is a tool. All tools are a form of capital. But the biblical goal of wealth is to be seen in terms of the expansion of the kingdom of God in history. It is not to be seen in terms of the expansion of one's own autonomous influence over the affairs of men. In fact, God told Israel, the sin of autonomy is the great rejection of God's covenant. "And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth. But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day" (Deut. 8:17–18).⁶ God threatens negative sanctions against any society in which such a view of cause and effect is dominant (vv. 19–20).⁷

C. Moral Responsibility

Paul tells the Galatians that his goal has always been to encourage the churches he has founded to be generous. This reminds the Galatians that they, too, have a moral responsibility to be generous with the assets that members entrust to the leaders of the congregation. This emphasis makes it clear that it is not the building of great cathedrals that most impresses God. It is generosity in the face of hard times.

On the other hand, there is no suggestion that it is immoral for churches to build acceptable and even magnificent houses of worship. Surely, Solomon's temple was a magnificent house of worship. A major problem with the people of the Old Covenant was that they short-changed God continually. They did not sacrifice for the sake of the temple. In the post-exile era, they refused to build the temple for over 12 years. The prophets came to them to warn them that this was a sin. They had built their own houses, but they had not built God's house.⁸

This means that critics of the church, who insist that all of the church's money should be given to the poor, have not understood the nature of biblical religion. Biblical religion is to be in public places. It is a good thing when congregations can afford to build a place of worship

6. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 22.

7. Ibid. ch. 23.

8. Ezra 4:24; Zechariah 4:9.

for members. Members have got to pay for this construction. This means that the religion of St. Francis of Assisi, if applied to the church as a whole, is heretical to the core. It is one thing for a particular religious order within a large denomination to take members into the order only when they make vows of poverty. When it is understood that such vows are made within the confines of a relatively small organization within a much larger organization, the goal of poverty is legitimate. But, when the goal of poverty or the ideal of poverty is said to apply to the entire church, this doctrine is inherently heretical and must be opposed.

D. Thrift or Gift?

The question arises in economic theory as to whether it is better to save 10% than give away 10%. If the local church gives away 10% of its income above the tithe paid to the denomination, and it raises this money exclusively from its local members, the members will not be able to save the money which they have given to the church or given to some other charitable institution. Charitable money is sometimes spent immediately. There is an immediate need to be met, and any income from donors is spent on that immediate need. But charitable organizations need buildings. They also need capital of various kinds. Charity has to be rational. There is a time to give, and there is a time to build.

1. Tools of Production

When someone saves money in order to invest in capital equipment, he makes available tools for individuals to use to increase their productivity. This is the old lesson about whether to give a fish to an individual or teach him how to fish. If you give him the fish, he will be hungry in a couple of hours; if you teach him to fish, and if there are fish readily available, he will be able to feed himself, and even feed others. So, this dilemma is not a new concept. Men have always had a decision as to which is better: giving away money or investing money.

Without capital investment, societies remain in extreme poverty. But Jesus did not talk about capital investment as the basis of permanently reducing poverty. There is a reason for this. Jesus never talked about reducing poverty permanently. On the contrary, He told His disciples of the poor would always be with them (Matt. 26:11). Jesus was not committed to economic growth above all the other goals of society.

This distinguished Him from modern economists, whether Keynesian, supply-side, limited government, or Marxist. Modern economists all make the same basic assumption: the premier goal of society is the increase in per capita economic output. There is nothing even remotely Christian about this priority.

2. Economic Growth as the #1 Social Goal

This is probably the central practical area of conflict between Christian economics and humanist economics. The central theological issue is identifying the source of economic growth. Biblical religion teaches that the source of economic growth is God. Societies that conform themselves to the laws that have been revealed by God in the Bible and also in nature experience economic growth. This is taught in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. Jesus taught that the primary mark of success is ethics, not economic growth. On the other hand, the Mosaic law taught that economic success comes from ethical conformity to God's law. So, the two views are not in contradiction to each other. On the contrary, two views are complementary to each other in biblical religion.

So, if it is a question of giving 10% or investing 10%, there is no universal rule. After a person has paid his obligatory tithe to his local congregation,⁹ he is free either to give or to invest. It is his judgment call, and God holds him responsible for making the correct judgment. But there is no text of Scripture that says that it is better to give than to invest. It does say that it is better to give than to receive (Acts 20:35).¹⁰ This is a different issue. If a person invests solely to receive more in the future, then he is violating the fundamental principle that Jesus set forth. Paul cites Jesus as saying that it is better to give than to receive. Paul is the only source of this quotation in the New Testament (Acts 20:35).¹¹ This idea was dear to Paul's heart. But he did not say that it is better to give than to invest. Nor did Jesus.

The question is this: For what purpose do you invest? If the primary goal of your investment is to increase your wealth, and the primary goal of your wealth is to extend the kingdom of God in history, then, in some cases, and in fact most cases, it is better to invest than to give. If you invest, at some point in the future you will have a great deal more wealth which you can then give. If your goal is the expansion of charity, then the most important single means of this expansion is the expansion of your stream of income.

9. Chapter 29. See also Gary North, The Covenantal Tithe (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2011), ch. 7.

10. Gary North, Sacrifice and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Acts, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 9.

11. Ibid., ch. 10.

3. God or Mammon

It is, once again, a question of God versus Mammon. Mammon is the God that proclaims, on behalf of its followers, “more for me in history.” Jesus said that this is the major rival to the religion of orthodoxy. “No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon” (Matt. 6:24).¹² Mammon is the other great god of history. Man wants to worship himself. The best way to worship himself is to worship gods that promise to reward man with ever-increasing wealth, allowing man to use this wealth exclusively for the satisfaction of his own desires. Such autonomy is never taught in the Bible. The opposite is taught. One may never use wealth exclusively for the satisfaction of his own desires. God’s kingdom comes first, while individual hopes and dreams come second (Matt. 6:33).¹³

E. Fame

The commitment to charitable giving is a way for an individual to discipline himself to trust in the God of the Bible to uphold him in all things, and to provide all things that are necessary for him in his ministry of extending the kingdom of God in history. God does promises this. His people are to believe this. The way that they show themselves and others that they do believe this is to give away substantial amounts of their wealth. As they gain ever more wealth, they should be giving away an increasing percentage of this wealth. The only justification for not giving away wealth is that they are accumulating a substantial amount of capital to be given away later.

Most extremely rich people fully understand this principle, and for the most part they adhere to it. They may not do this for the sake of God, but they do it for the sake of their own reputation and for the sake of the beneficiaries of their charitable activities. In the United States, very rich people in almost all circumstances establish charitable foundations. They give away substantial portions of their wealth to the foundation, usually in the form of shares of ownership in the companies which they founded, with the dividends to be used to fund the poor or else used to benefit activities that the free market will not fund because there are not sufficient profitable opportunities.

12. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five bid., ch. 14.

13. Ibid., ch. 15.

The rich usually put their names on their foundations. This is a way of achieving a kind of ersatz immortality. They expect to be remembered as being generous supporters of charitable activities. They want a good reputation, and good reputations are imputed by the general public or else by specific groups of people. So, in order to gain fame, they sacrifice wealth. When their fortunes are large enough, they get out of the fortune-building game and get into the fame-building game.

Jesus made it clear that this is an improper goal of charity.

Take heed that ye do not your alms before men, to be seen of them: otherwise ye have no reward of your Father which is in heaven. Therefore when thou doest thine alms, do not sound a trumpet before thee, as the hypocrites do in the synagogues and in the streets, that they may have glory of men. Verily I say unto you, They have their reward. But when thou doest alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth: That thine alms may be in secret: and thy Father which seeth in secret himself shall reward thee openly (Matt. 6:1–4).¹⁴

He did not say that it is illegitimate for an individual to seek imitators of his activities as a generous donor to causes that cannot be supported by the expectation of profit. There is no doubt that it is a benefit to the poor for successful donors to find imitators who will also become successful donors. This is greatest legitimate reason for seeking publicity in circles where wealthy people operate: to gain imitators. If a person who gives away a great deal of money does this entirely anonymously, he is not in a position to go to his peers and encourage them to set up charitable organizations that will let them put their money in causes to which they are committed. This is why Jesus warned that the right hand should not know what the left hand is doing. This has to do with the general public. One is not to seek the applause of the masses. But one is to set an example for other individuals who are in a similar position to start their own charities. This way, there will be more charity and more effective charity. There should be spe- cialization in giving wealth away, just as there must be specialization in producing services for the free market.

14. Ibid., ch. 11.

Paul had a reputation, well deserved, for encouraging charity. He did not gain this reputation anonymously. He became known as a promoter of charity. This is exactly what his peers, the other apostles, expected him to do. He did not do this for the sake of his own personal fame.

Conclusion

John Wesley in his famous Sermon 50, “The Use of Money,” advised that his followers gain all they could, save all they could, and give all they could. This was excellent advice. His followers took his advice, and within a hundred years, some of the poorest people in Great Britain had become middle-class citizens. Methodists kept getting wealthier. So did the Quakers. This was because they gained all they could, saved that all they could, and gave all they could.

This outlook is a direct application of the combined message of Moses and Paul. Visible success is normative (Deut. 28:1–14).¹⁵ Charitable generosity is also normative. There must be a fusion of both goals. In neither goal is autonomy normative. Beware, Moses told Israel as a nation, lest “thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth. But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:17–18).¹⁶

15. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

16. Ibid., ch. 22.

12

THE RIGHT OF CONTRACT

Brethren, I speak after the manner of men; Though it be but a man's covenant, yet if it be confirmed, no man disannulleth, or addeth thereto (Gal. 3:15).

Contracts are made between judicial equals. They are therefore about promises. Promises are analogous to oaths: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

Paul in this passage refers to man-made covenants. The Greek word for covenant in this verse is the same in every instance in the New Testament. There is no separate Greek word in the New Testament for a contract as distinguished from a covenant.

A. Invoking God's Name

A covenant in the Old Testament was established between God and man. It also could be established among a group of individuals, but always under God's judicial authority. A covenant was not the equivalent of a business contract. It was a binding vow which was enforceable by God if any participant in the covenant broke the terms of the covenant. The five covenants in the Bible are these: dominion, family, individual, state, and church. These are all established by an oath taken to God.

A contract does not have the same degree of judicial participation on the part of God. A contract does not invoke the direct negative sanctions of God, should one of the participants fail to abide by the terms of the contract. A vow has much greater authority than a contract. In the book of Numbers, chapter 30, we read the laws governing a vow made under God. The Bible is clear: do not make a vow to God that you do not fulfill.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

The Bible also says that a person who swears to something must fulfill what he is sworn to, even when this involves loss to him. “He that sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not” (Ps. 15:4b). The great example of this in the era of the Mosaic covenant was the covenant made between the rulers of Israel and the representatives of Gibeon. The Gibeonites lied to the Israelites, telling them that they had journeyed from a far country. They successfully deceived the Israelites. When the Israelites discovered that the Gibeonites had deceived them, they went before God to ask what should be done. Joshua informed them that they must abide by their covenant with Gibeon. They had given their word (Josh. 9). The Gibeonites remained as subordinate residents in the land of Israel from that time on.²

A covenant is established by an oath before God. A contract in the modern world can be established by a verbal agreement, but in most cases it is established by a written agreement. Parties to the contract sign a contract, thereby affirming that they will abide by the terms of the contract.

B. Contracts and Cooperation

Contracts increase cooperation among individuals. People want to make plans. To help them complete their plans, they go to other individuals and agree to pay them in some way for cooperation. When the other individuals agree to the exchange, the people on each side of the contract become dependent on the people on the other side of the contract. They make plans on the assumption that all parties to the contract will fulfill their obligations. This increases the division of labor. It therefore increases output per unit of resource input. Specialization increases people’s productivity. They work at what they do best. Contracts enable individuals to join together to fulfill certain goals. Because of the division of labor, all of the parties to the contract expect to be made better off after the completion of the terms of the contract.

The goal of the contract is to increase human cooperation. The contract spells out in detail what each party to the contract is required to perform. This is simply an extension of the right of each individual to do whatever he wants with whatever he owns. In this case, individuals decide that they want to cooperate with each other in order to attain certain goals. Each individual voluntarily surrenders the unilateral right to change the terms of the contract during the period of the contract. We say that a man's word is his bond. A contract is the bond. It spells out exactly what his word means. It takes words to specify the word. This is why we say that a man's word is his bond. We do not say "bond" with respect to simply one word, other than yes or no. It is a collective noun that refers to a promise. A contract is a promise to perform certain acts. It is this promise which enables us to extend our work as individuals. We specialize in whatever we do best, and we gain the cooperation of others, who we hope will also perform better because they are specializing in the things that they do best. This is the biblical principle that two are better than one (Eccl. 4:9).³

2. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 7:B:2.

The biblical covenant serves as a model for the biblical contract. The contract does not have the same judicial authority as a covenant. This is because it is not sworn before God, and it does not call down God's negative sanctions, should one or more of the parties to the contract not fulfill the terms of the contract. But there is no question that the contract resembles a covenant. Individuals agree to cooperate. They agree to fulfill certain obligations. There are negative sanctions associated with the refusal or even the inability of one of the parties to fulfill the terms of the contract. These negative sanctions increase the likelihood that all parties to a contract will perform what they have promised to perform. When there are negative sanctions against breaking the terms of the contract, there is greater likelihood that all parties to the contract will fulfill its terms. When all parties to a contract fulfill its terms, this makes possible the increased output that was expected by all parties as a result of the increased division of labor.

Every society with an advanced division of labor has an advanced legal structure that deals with making contracts, enforcing contracts, and providing restitution to the victims of broken contracts. Contract law in the modern world is a highly developed subdiscipline of the legal profession. The huge increase in the number of lawyers in the modern world has come as a result of the vast expansion of contracts in society. This, in turn, has come as a result of the extension of the private property social order.

3. Gary North, Autonomy and Stagnation: An Economic Commentary on Ecclesiastes (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 14.

C. Private Property

The private property social order rests on this principle: owners of property have the legal right to dispose of their property, use their property, and allocate their property without interference by the civil government or other people. People have a right to do what they want with that which they own. This is affirmed explicitly by Jesus His parable of the landowner who goes out several times in one day and hires workers at an agreed-upon wage. When he is later criticized by workers who agreed early in the morning to work for a specific wage, because he later made the same contract with people who worked fewer hours for the same wage, he asks rhetorically: “Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? Is thine eye evil, because I am good?” (Matt. 20:15). This parable was designed to illustrate the sovereignty of God in electing individuals and groups to salvation. Does not God have the right to do whatever He wants with whatever he owns? Similarly, does not an owner possess this same right?⁴

Paul in this passage affirms the legitimacy of contracts. He says that once a contract is agreed to, individual parties to the contract do not have the authority to change the terms of the contract. This means that they do not have the authority unilaterally to change the terms of the contract. He also is saying that people who are not parties to the contract do not have the right to alter the terms of the contract. He is saying, in other words, that the parties who established the terms of a contract are immune from interference by others who might seek to alter the terms of the contract. This is a strong defense of the right of contract. This is therefore a strong defense of the right of private property.

He is saying that, in terms of God’s revelation to man, contracts are inviolable if they do not break the law. This does not mean that the civil government does not have the right to keep Murder, Incorporated from fulfilling the terms of an agreement made with the Mafia. In other words, private property rights are not sacred. In a fallen world, there are no sacred contracts. There is no absolute right to private property. This is because all property belongs to God as the Creator, and therefore individuals and organizations, who hold their property as stewards of God, do not possess autonomy from God. They have never been authorized by God to do whatever they want with whatever they own. But they do possess extensive rights, meaning extensive legal immunity from outside interference, to make binding agreements with each other relating to the use of their resources. This means that they have the right to cooperate with each other to attain whatever short-run goals or long-term goals that are made less expensive because of a contract.

4. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 40.

D. Contracts and Promises

Paul introduces this defense of contracts as a defense of promises. The specific promise that he is referring to was the promise of God to Abraham that He would raise up seed for Abraham. Paul makes the unique argument, which would not have been made under the Old Covenant, that seed in this case was singular. Normally, the word is plural. It has to do with multiple seeds. Paul said that this was not the case in God's promise to Abraham. God was referring specifically to a single seed, Jesus Christ. This seed is the heir to the Abrahamic promise. This is a crucial argument in the book of Galatians. The fact that Paul would invoke the authority of contracts in his attempt to persuade the readers and listeners of the messianic authority of Jesus Christ as the sole heir to the Abrahamic promise, indicates just how seriously he took the biblical idea of the sovereignty of human covenants, by which he meant contracts that are not established by a self-maledictory oath before God.

The centrality of the covenant in Christian theology points to the centrality of the contract in Christian economics. The right to covenant with God is the supreme right of all individuals. There is no right more important than this one. This is another way of saying that, in the providence of God, no one can interfere with the right of God to make a covenant with any individual He chooses. Once that covenant is established, no outside agent has the right, or has the ability, to break that covenant. Paul specifically teaches this in Romans 8. "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword?" (Rom. 8:35).

Contracts are subordinate to covenants. This is another way of saying that economics is subordinate to covenantal institutions. We live in a theocentric world, not an anthropocentric world. God is sovereign; man is not. Covenants possess unique sovereign authority. Contracts possess legitimate authority, but not the degree of authority possessed by a covenant. This is why civil government does have legitimate authority over the content of contracts. If a contract violates a civil law, and this civil law is established self-consciously as an aspect of biblical law, then the state has the right to interfere with the free market. But civil law must be consistent with biblical law in order for civil law to have ultimate legitimacy over the right of individuals to contract with each other.

This is not to say that there is a right of rebellion against lawfully constituted civil government. It is to say that civil government must be progressively shaped in terms of biblical law. The more consistently it is shaped in terms of biblical law, the less that the civil government will interfere with the right of private contract. This means that unless judges and legislators can find specific authorization in the Bible for a civil law, the authority of this law is provisional, limited to time and place. Individuals have a right to work legally to overturn all laws that do not conform to biblical law. They must be obedient citizens, but they must do whatever they can peacefully do to make certain that the law is overturned, either by the courts or by the legislature.

The New Testament's concept of contract is that individuals do not possess the legal authority to interfere with other individuals who have made a contract. That contract is binding. A civil government may interfere, but individuals do not possess this authority. The binding nature of a voluntary contract is extreme, according to Mosaic law, and also according to Paul in this passage. This means that the right to private property is equally extreme, according to Mosaic law, and also according to Paul in this passage.

E. The Social Gospel

This is a bitter pill to swallow for Christian socialists. Those who defend the old socialist gospel, known as the Social Gospel, are clearly in rebellion against Paul's clear statement of the right to private contract. These critics of the free market invoke the right of individuals to change the civil law. This is a legitimate invocation. But then they deny the Mosaic law's authorization of the right to use one's property however one wants to use it. This same right was affirmed by Jesus in His parable of the landowner who hired the laborers.

The defenders of the Social Gospel are in rebellion against both biblical law and the moral authority of individuals who make contracts with each other to fulfill their goals. They do not want the civil government to enforce biblical law. They also do not want the civil government to let individuals have the right of voluntary contract. What they want is for the state to interfere with the right of contract, so as to coercively extract wealth from one group and transfer this wealth to another group. There is nothing in the Old Testament or the New Testament that would authorize this coercive wealth redistribution.

These people have adopted the ideal of socialism. They have adopted the idea that central economic planners have greater wisdom than individual decision-makers. They have also adopted the idea that central economic planners have a superior moral authority to allocate private property for purposes favored by those who possess political power.

The free market ideas of Adam Smith and his followers have not been grounded explicitly on either the Old Testament or the New Testament. In this sense, they rest on an insecure epistemological foundation. But the outlook of Adam Smith and his followers regarding the division of labor, the right of contract, and the legitimacy of private property is consistent with what the Old Testament and the New Testament teach. The socialist ideas of the promoters of the Social Gospel are in open opposition to what the Old Testament and New Testament teach. The defenders of the Social Gospel criticize Adam Smith and his followers because they were not Christians. Far more damaging is the fact that the defenders of the Social Gospel are advocating ideas that are explicitly anti-biblical. It is better to adopt the ideas of covenant-breakers who explicitly are in conformity to the ideas of the Bible than it is to adopt the ideas of covenant-keepers that are contrary to the ideas of the Bible. The biblical content of the ideas is of greater importance than the theological confession of the promoters of the ideas.

Conclusion

A contract is an agreement. People agree to cooperate with each other in order to attain specific goals. Paul affirms the right of men to make contracts with each other. He denies that anyone may lawfully change the terms of a contract unilaterally. This is an affirmation of private property. It is also a denial of the socialist ideal of the Social Gospel.

13

PIE IN THE SKY BY AND BY

Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting. And let us not be weary in well doing: for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not. As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith (Gal. 6:7–10).

Sowing and reaping are about causation: sanctions, which is point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Ethical Causation

Paul returns to his theme of sowing and reaping.² He insists that what we sow is what we will reap. In other words, there is cause and effect between what we do and what we receive as a result of our actions.

A fundamental principle of biblical economics is that there is a predictable relationship between righteousness and positive sanctions. There is also a predictable relationship between sin and negative sanctions. Christians freely admit this with respect to the relationship between what men do in history and what they will receive in eternity. Critics of Christianity dismiss this teaching as “pie in the sky, by and by.” They do not believe that there will be an afterlife, so they do not believe that what men do in history will have any bearing on eternity. Paul’s theology is opposed to this skepticism.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. “But this I say, He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully” (II Cor. 9:6). See Chapter 8.

In Leviticus 26³ and Deuteronomy 28,⁴ Moses said that this cause-and-effect relationship between righteousness and positive sanctions, and between sin and negative sanctions, applies in history. Christian theologians have been hesitant to argue that this cause-and-effect relationship under the Mosaic law, which applied to national Israel, necessarily has extended into the New Covenant. Very few of them say that it has not extended; they just do their best to avoid commenting on these passages with respect to the New Covenant.

If these two chapters no longer apply, then there is no basis for either biblical social theory or biblical economic theory. If there is no uniquely biblical definition of ethics, and no uniquely biblical definition of rewards and losses in history, and if there is no predictable relationship between righteousness and benefits, and between sin and negative sanctions, then Christians must look to humanism or other religions to provide the foundations of social theory and economics. Every social theory and every economic theory has a system relating actions and consequences. If there were no predictable relationship between human actions and social or economic consequences, society would be incoherent. We could not accurately forecast the results of our actions.

What is unique about biblical social theory and biblical economic theory is that the cause-and-effect relationship is based on ethics. Specifically, it is based on biblical ethics. More to the point, it is based on the concept of biblical law and visible, measurable consequences in history. This is why biblical social theory is dependent on some version of theonomy.⁵ If a theologian categorically denies that there is any predictable relationship between obeying the Bible-revealed laws of God and positive sanctions, he is simultaneously denying an explicitly biblical Christian social theory. If he were correct, then a Christian logically would have to abandon anything uniquely biblical as the basis of social theory. Most theologians do not wish to say this openly, but this is the inescapable implication of their theological position.

3. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), chaps. 33–35.

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), chaps. 69, 70.

5. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973); Greg L. Bahnsen, Theonomy in Christian Ethics, 3rd ed. (Nacogdoches, Texas: Covenant Media Press, 2002); Greg L. Bahnsen, By This Standard: The Authority of God's Law Today (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1985). (<http://bit.ly/gbby>). Greg L. Bahnsen, No Other Standard: Theonomy and Its Critics (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991). (<http://bit.ly/gnnos>)

B. Reaping and Sowing

With this as background, let us consider Paul's warning. He says categorically that we will reap what we sow. In other words, there is a predictable cause-and-effect relationship between what we do and what happens to us later. The question is this: Is Paul speaking of history, or is he speaking only of the relationship between history and eternal consequences?

He is speaking of the relationship between history and eternity. He speaks of sowing to the spirit and sowing to the flesh. Sowing to the flesh reaps corruption. This does not necessarily mean that it reaps negative sanctions in history. In his first letter to the Corinthians, he spoke of the inheritance in eternity as being incorruptible, in contrast to inheritance in history, which is corruptible. He contrasted the incorruption of eternity with the corruption of mortality.

So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption: It is sown in dishonour; it is raised in glory: it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power: It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body (I Cor. 15:42–44).

Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption (I Cor. 15:50).

For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory (I Cor. 15:53–54).

He was not speaking here of ethics. He was speaking of physical death and resurrection life.⁶

So, in this passage, when he says that if we sow to the flesh, we shall reap corruption, he means that the consequences of our actions will be limited to history. In contrast, when we sow to the spirit, we reap life everlasting. This does not mean that we earn our salvation. Paul is too clear on this point throughout his epistles for him to promote any doctrine of works-related salvation. So, what is he talking about?

6. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 16.

When he says that we will reap life everlasting, he is talking about the good life: benefits that are incorruptible. They are incorruptible because they are not temporal. This is what Jesus was speaking of when He said that he who lays up treasure on earth will not reap treasure in heaven (Matt. 6:19–21).⁷ There is a trade-off between treasure in history and treasure in eternity. The way to store up treasure in eternity is to sacrifice treasure in the present. This is the relationship that Paul is speaking of here. This is indeed pie in the sky by and by. Jesus spoke of the trade-off in terms of serving Mammon versus serving God (Matt. 6:24–25).⁸ You cannot serve both.

When Paul speaks of sowing to the spirit, he is speaking about the practice of planting in the present to reap a harvest in eternity. It is as if a farmer takes valuable seeds and plants them in a field, but not plant to reap a harvest in this field. He plants rather to reap a harvest in eternity. He sacrifices in the present for the sake of greater rewards in eternity. He sacrifices possession of risk-bound capital in history for risk-free benefits in eternity. If you want to avoid risk, Jesus said, lay up treasure in heaven. Paul is saying the same thing.

C. Well Doing

He says not to be weary in well doing. Why not? Because in due season, we shall reap. There is predictability between our hard work today and our reward later. When he speaks of due season, he does not specify whether he means history or eternity. In his previous reference, which contrasted spirit and flesh, the accent seems to be on work performed in history, meaning work burdened by mortality, in contrast to rewards in eternity. It is possible that when he says “due season,” he is referring to history. His language does not make clear his frame of reference.

Paul recognized that men get weary in their labors. The most wearying of work is work that appears to be fruitless. When a person labors long and hard in order to achieve a goal, yet the goal seems out of reach, he may be tempted to abandon the project.

Men may deceive themselves by saying, “I must do this because the work is its own reward.” Work done for work’s sake alone is wasted. This is the sin of autonomy. Work is to be done for the sake of God’s

7. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 13.

8. Ibid., ch. 14.

kingdom, both in history and eternity.

To become weary in doing good is common. The good that men do may not be immediately visible. It may seem fruitless. Work that does not produce rewards is wearying. Men must be self-disciplined to continue. Paul says not to grow weary. This is not some form of instruction in self-help. He is not proclaiming the power of positive thinking. The context of his encouragement is the kingdom of God. Work done to expand the kingdom is productive. It is worth doing, not for its own sake, but for the sake of God. He repeated his encouragement elsewhere. “But ye, brethren, be not weary in well doing” (II Thes. 3:13).

D. With Charity to All

He says that Christians should do good to all men, especially those of the household of faith. This means that charity begins with the household of faith, but it does not end there. Christians are to be generous to people who are suffering through no fault of their own, who are not members of the church. This is a way of testifying that Christians are committed to the affairs of this world. They are attempting to make things better for people outside the covenant who are unlikely to come to their aid, should they fall into difficulty. This is consistent with Jesus’ warning that when rich people give large feasts, they should invite the poor to attend, even though the poor are not in a position to reciprocate the favor (Luke 14:12–14).⁹

Jesus is the model in this regard. He healed the sick irrespective of their confession of faith. He healed a Samaritan (Luke 17:16). He healed the Greek woman. He told her that he began his healing with the Jews, but He did not deny her the healing which she requested (Mark 7:26–27). This is consistent with Christian charity in general.

E. Self-Interest

Paul raises the issue of motivation. He appeals directly to the self-interest of his readers and listeners. They are to do well by doing good. What is unique about his appeal to self-interest is that it is not limited to benefits in history. His focus is on eternity. He speaks about corruption, not in the sense of evil, but in the sense of mortality. He reminds people that when they sow in order to gain benefits only in history, they limit their rewards. They use up their capital in history, when they could extend their accumulation of capital in eternity. This is bad investing, Jesus said, and Paul affirms Jesus' teaching.

9. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 34.

It would be possible to build a system of Christian economics based on the contrast between mortality and eternity. Self-interest does apply to eternity. But it is unlikely that this cause-and-effect relationship would motivate a sufficiently large number of people to enable economists to make accurate predictions regarding people's behavior based on people's attitude toward eternity. Jesus and Paul both had to teach Christians to believe in the benefits of accumulating rewards in the world beyond the grave. The economist would say that if the founders of Christianity had to warn Christians to allocate resources in the present for the sake of rewards in eternity, then there probably is no way to make accurate predictions about people's actions regarding their allocation decisions in the present. The economist says that if the reward does not take place in history, the sacrifice is unlikely to take place in history. The economist self-consciously focuses on corruption: mortality. He talks about risk-reward ratios as they apply to human history.

F. Biblical Economic Theory

If we were to rely exclusively on the epistles of Paul and the other apostles, and ignore Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28, any attempt to construct a systematically biblical economic theory would be an exercise in futility. The overwhelming majority of people, including the overwhelming majority of Christians, make their decisions primarily in terms of sacrifices made in the present for rewards to be gained before they or their heirs die. If there is no predictability in history based on uniquely biblical cause and effect, then Christians must look elsewhere for guidance in understanding economic causation. This is why the rejection of theonomy as a principle of biblical interpretation leads inevitably to the secularization of social theory.

Most Christian scholars are trained by humanists in secular universities. These humanists operate in terms of a view of cause and effect in history. While they admit that people may be influenced by considerations of eternity, their innate atheism colors their analysis, so that they argue that predictable cause and effect, meaning scientific cause and effect, occurs exclusively in history. This outlook shapes the thinking of almost all Christian scholars in academia. In order to maintain their commitment to the worldviews that they were taught in graduate school, and which they accepted, they must deny that Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28 have any relevance whatsoever in the New Testament era.

They are supported almost unanimously by Christian theologians in every denomination. This has been the position on Christian social theory from the days of the early church. Christian theologians have looked to Greek philosophy and Roman law as the foundations of Christian social and economic analysis. This bias in favor of secular humanism has been a constant in the church from the days of the earliest Christian apologists.¹⁰

This is why there has been no attempt in history to build a consistent Christian theory of economics or a consistent social theory based on the final authority of God's revelation of Himself and His creation as found in the Bible. To adopt such a view is to reject all rival theories of social and economic causation. It is to reject the wisdom of Greece and the laws of Rome. It means making a systematic break with Renaissance humanism. It means denying many of the truths of the Enlightenment, whether we are speaking about the right-wing Enlightenment of Scotland or the left-wing Enlightenment of France. It means breaking with secular humanism.

Conclusion

Paul again assures his readers that there is a fixed relationship between sowing and reaping. This system of causation establishes a correspondence between sacrifices made in history and rewards gained in eternity.

Paul does not deny Leviticus 26 or Deuteronomy 28. He does not deny the existence of an ethical cause-and-effect relationship between acts in history and results in history. In other passages, he affirms this relationship. But in this passage, his language indicates that he is talking about sacrifices made for the sake of the Spirit in history which produce positive sanctions in eternity.

10. Cornelius Van Til, A Christian Theory of Knowledge (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1969), ch. 4.

14

MATURITY THROUGH COOPERATION

That we henceforth be no more children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive; But speaking the truth in love, may grow up into him in all things, which is the head, even Christ: From whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love (Eph. 4:14–16).

The body has a head: Jesus Christ. This is hierarchy: point two of the biblical covenant.¹

A. The Church's Unity

Paul returns to a theme which he had covered in Romans 12 and First Corinthians 12: the division of labor in the church.² Here, he identifies Christ as being the head of the church. Christ provides the unity necessary to coordinate the individual actions of each of the members of the church.

This brings up a continuing theme in the history of human thought: the one and the many. Is a system primarily diverse, or is it primarily unified? The answer, based on the doctrine of the Trinity, is that all systems are governed by both principles. With respect to the Trinity, theologians have called this the equal ultimacy of the one and the many. The three persons of the Trinity are individuals. Yet, at the same time, they are one God. Analogously, in the creation, things are simultaneously unified and diverse. They are both one and many.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 9; Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 15.

Paul writes that Jesus Christ, as the head of the church, provides unity for the church. The church cannot exist apart from Jesus Christ. The head of the church possesses authority over the church. The church is a unity, because it is the bride of Christ (Rev. 21:2, 9). It is a unity because it is the body of Christ (Rom. 12:5, I Cor. 12:2, 27). The Bible uses both descriptions, although in different contexts.

Individuals are members of the church and bring their skills to the church. They are productive in their own spheres of responsibility outside the church. God expects them to pay 10% to the local church on the increase of their activities and their capital.³ But this unity extends beyond the principle of the tithe. It extends to the testimony of the church as a whole to the pagan community as a whole, and to individuals within the pagan community. People see members of the church as representing the church. This is a correct assumption; members do represent the church. Yet, at the same time, there are many representatives, and they possess many skills and many different personality traits. The church is a unity before God, yet it is also a plurality in terms of the skills and dreams that are brought into play by the members of the church. Each member works in his own way, according to his understanding of the gospel. Yet, at the same time, God regards the church as an institution that represents him in history. It has a corporate testimony as well as the individual testimonies of its members.

B. Growth

Paul says that Christians should grow. Here he is speaking of growth in the sense of maturity. With all of the members in effect pooling their talents and commitments to the work of the gospel, they become representatives of the church of Christ. The church benefits from the individual advancement of the careers and callings of each of its members. As they advance in responsibility and performance, this enables the church to extend its mission.

The maturity of the individual is achieved through participation in the church. "From whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love." In the broadest sense of the kingdom of God, the church is merely one participant. There are other confessional institutions that should be marked by a Trinitarian confession of faith. But the church is the central institution, for it is the body of Christ, and it is the repository of the two sacraments. The Lord's supper and baptism are available only through the institutional church. This is where God manifests his presence in history. The sacraments are ecclesiastical institutions, and God is specially present judicially at the time of the administration of these two sacraments.

3. Gary North, The Covenantal Tithe (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2011).

There is interaction between the one and the many. There is interaction between each member and the institutional church. There is also interaction among the individuals who make up the individual church. All of this is described by Paul as a single process. It is the process economists call the division of labor.

C. Economic Theory

In economic theory, one of the recurring theoretical problems is the reconciliation of the one and the many. Adam Smith made famous the principle of market unification when he called it the invisible hand.

By preferring the support of domestic to that of foreign industry, he intends only his own security; and by directing that industry in such a manner as its produce may be of the greatest value, he intends only his own gain, and he is in this, as in many other cases, led by an invisible hand to promote an end which was no part of his intention. Nor is it always the worse for the society that it was no part of it. By pursuing his own interest he frequently promotes that of the society more effectually than when he really intends to promote it.⁴

This is a convenient metaphor, but it does not really describe the nature of the unity that is generated by voluntary exchange in a private property social order. The market process does not impose an exogenous unity, which is what a hand provides. A hand implies both purpose and power. Rather, the free market imposes an endogenous unity—purposeless.⁵ The unity produced by the free market is a result of a

4. Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations (1776, Caanan edition), p. 423.

5. A similar analogy is implied by the word "selection" in Charles Darwin's phrase, "natural selection." It, too, implies purpose. Darwin rejected cosmic purpose. He strove to gain for biological process the same impersonalism and lack of design that plurality of purposeful individual decisions. Smith taught that unity is achieved through competitive market bidding. It is the free bidding of buyers and sellers—sellers versus sellers, buyers versus buyers—that produces an array of prices at any moment in the marketplace. The reconciliation of millions of individual plans of action is achieved through the profit-and-loss system, which is based on a money economy, which is the result of the division of labor.

Economists debate over the ways that individual decisions produce a single market order. Most economists believe that the civil government is one means of achieving unity within the marketplace. A few economists, most notably Murray Rothbard, deny that any civil government is necessary, and that civil government distorts the outcome of what would have been a unified social order based on open competition. Socialists believe that there must be an extensive civil government in order to produce unity within the marketplace. Yet, both theoretically and in practice, the centralization of economic planning leads to chaos.⁶ So, economists come to no agreed-upon conclusion regarding the reconciliation of the one and the many through market competition.

D. A Trinitarian Solution

The world reflects the Creator, Paul taught elsewhere. “For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse” (Rom. 1:20).⁷ He is one

Adam Smith and other Scottish Enlightenment social evolutionists had achieved for human institutions. In the words of Adam Ferguson, institutions are “the result of human action, but not the execution of human design.” Quoted by F. A. Hayek, “The Results of Human Action but not of Human Design” (1967), in Hayek, Studies in Philosophy, Politics and Economics (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1967), p. 96n. Darwin was aware of the problem of his terminology. In Chapter 4 of The Origin of Species, on natural selection, he wrote: “It has been said that I speak of natural selection as an active power or Deity; but who objects to an author speaking of the attraction of gravity as ruling the movements of the planets? Every one knows what is meant and is implied by such metaphorical expressions; and they are almost necessary for brevity. So again it is difficult to avoid personifying the word Nature; but I mean by nature, only the aggregate action and product of many natural laws, and by laws the sequence of events as ascertained by us. With a little familiarity such superficial objections will be forgotten.”

6. Ludwig von Mises, “Economic Calculation in the Socialist Commonwealth” (1920), in F. A. Hayek, Collectivist Economic Planning (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul 1935). (<http://mises.org/pdf/econcalc.pdf>) and many. The creation is one and many.

7. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 1.

The market process leads to a reconciliation of individual plans.⁸ This reconciliation is achieved under the absolute sovereignty of God. The unity of His decree is the ground of all individual decisions. Subordinately, Jesus, as the head of the church, is the ground of the unity of the church. Yet Jesus is also the ground of unity in creation. Paul wrote of Jesus,

In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins: Who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of every creature: For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him: And he is before all things, and by him all things consist. And he is the head of the body, the church: who is the beginning, the firstborn from the dead; that in all things he might have the preeminence (Col. 1:14–18).

This leaves nothing to chance. So, the market process is not autonomous. Nothing is autonomous. The free market does not generate its own unity out of its own diversity. Nothing generates its own unity out of its own diversity. God, through His sovereign decree, is Lord over both unity and diversity.

Conclusion

Paul writes of the institutional church as a body fitly joined together. Its members constitute both its diversity and its unity. This is the meaning of “fit together.” Paul’s goal: that the members, “speaking the truth in love, may grow up into him in all things, which is the head, even Christ.” This is the process of progressive sanctification. This process, “according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love.” This is the process of spiritual growth through the division of labor.

8. F. A. Hayek, “The Use of Knowledge in Society” (1945), in Hayek, Individualism and Economic Order (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/HayekIAEO>) Gerald P. O’Driscoll, Economics as a Coordination Problem: The Contributions of Friedrich A. Hayek (Kansas City, Kansas: Sheed Andrews and McMeel, 1977); Israel M. Kirzner, The meaning of market process: Essays in the development of modern Austrian economics (New York: Routledge, 1992).

15

NEW COVENANT REPENTANCE

Let him that stole steal no more: but rather let him labour, working with his hands the thing which is good, that he may have to give to him that needeth (Eph. 4:28).

This is a law: point three of the biblical covenant.¹

A Career Change

Paul says that the thief must cease stealing. There is nothing unique about this view of theft. In every culture, there are laws against theft.

The laws governing theft and restitution that appear in Exodus 21 establish that the thief owed the victim double restitution. “If the theft be certainly found in his hand alive, whether it be ox, or ass, or sheep; he shall restore double” (Ex. 22:4).² In some cases, he owed the victim fourfold or fivefold restitution. “If a man shall steal an ox, or a sheep, and kill it, or sell it; he shall restore five oxen for an ox, and four sheep for a sheep” (Ex. 22:1).³

Paul does not mention the Mosaic law in this passage. He does not speak about the victims of theft. He directs his concern toward the thief. He speaks about a change of occupation which must accompany a change of heart. The thief has decided that he must give up his former occupation. Paul tells him to substitute a new form of labor. In his previous occupation, the thief presumably used his hands as tools of his profession. The crime of embezzlement did exist. There could be theft by changing figures. Jesus used the story of an embezzler to illustrate the craftiness of covenant-breakers (Luke 16:1–7).⁴ The embezzler used his ability to write to steal from his master. But most thieves in Paul's day were not literate. Paul is arguing that the tools that the thief had used in order to commit his crimes must now be put to productive use. In the past, he used his hands as tools of evil. Now, because he has a new attitude toward the law of God, he has repented of his evil. To repent means to turn around.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 43.

3. Idem.

B. Broad Restitution

In turning around from his former occupation, Paul says, the thief must not substitute leisure for work. He is to continue to work. Even more important, he is to work so productively that he has a surplus after expenditures. This surplus is to be used for charitable purposes.

This means that the thief must become thrifty; but, instead of setting aside money for himself or his family, he is to make certain that he sets aside money to be used to assist others, who are in need. Before, his activities had placed others in need. Now, in contrast, his activities are to reduce the needs of other people. He is to have an open hand, in contrast to his secret hand in his older occupation.

The concept of repentance is comprehensive. "Repentance" means "to turn away." The repentance described here is not merely turning away from imposing losses on others, but rather benefiting others who have experienced loss. Before, the thief had a surplus of income, which he used to benefit himself. Now, he is to generate surplus income, which he will use to benefit others. This is a complete reversal. It is not just that he ceases to impose losses on others; it is that he becomes a beneficiary of others, not out of stolen goods, but out of surplus income beyond his expenditures. He is not to become Robin Hood, stealing from the rich and giving to the poor (minus 50% for handling).

This is a form of restitution very different from what was required by the Mosaic law. The Mosaic law required restitution from the thief to the victims of his crime. Paul is saying that, under the New Covenant, the thief is required to pay restitution beyond that which was required by the Mosaic law. Paul here does not deny that the requirements of the Mosaic law are still in force. He says that something in addition is required. The thief must be ready to be a beneficiary to those who have fallen on hard times through no fault of their own. He had been a liability to those around him when he was a thief. He now must become a beneficiary to those around him in his capacity as a man who works with his hands. Before, those around him bore the risk of being victimized by him. They had no legal claim against him after his conviction. Only his victims would have had a legal claim against him, according to the Mosaic law. Paul is saying that, in the same sense that people around him lived in a world of greater risk because of his presence among them, those around him now will live in a world of reduced risk because of his presence among them.

4. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 38.

Paul's concept of restitution is broader than the concept of restitution presented in the Mosaic law. It is not that Paul is arguing for reduced restitution because Jesus is merciful. He is calling for an increased degree of restitution because Jesus is merciful. Jesus is merciful to victims who did not possess a legal claim against a thief under the Mosaic law: statistical victims. The thief who had increased the risk of theft to those around him is now told by Paul to decrease the risk of poverty to those around him. He had been a social liability before. He is to become a social beneficiary now.

C. Greater Legal Rigor

This indicates that the New Covenant is not less rigorous judicially than the Old Covenant. It is more rigorous. The Mosaic Covenant established rules governing the enforcement of civil law. It required restitution to victims. Paul is not announcing a change of this law. He is also not announcing a new rule that must govern the administration of civil justice. He is acting as an apostle to establish the moral obligation on the part of former thieves to go beyond the law of restitution which is found in the Mosaic law. He tells them that they are to extend mercy.

The Mosaic law, as it applied to civil government, did not require mercy. The Mosaic law required justice. Paying restitution to victims had nothing to do with mercy to his victims. It had to do with justice. The thief was required to repay what he had stolen, plus equal restitution, which would compensate the victim for the loss and also serve as a deterrent to additional theft. Paul is not directing his epistle to the civil government. He is directing his epistle to thieves who may be in the congregation at Ephesus.

What he is saying here relates to the conscience of the former thief. He is not establishing a new rule for the enforcement of either civil law or ecclesiastical law. He is announcing a new law for the guilty individual. The former thief is to exercise the discipline of self-government. He is to apply the principle of restitution to members of the society around him. He had been a liability to society before. He is now to be a beneficiary to society.

This is a complete reversal of his covenantal position in society. It is not a partial reversal of his older way of life. It is the complete reversal of his older way of life. It is not simply that the thief from now on serves God merely by not becoming a liability to those around him. It is that he is to become a beneficiary to those around him. This is the meaning of repentance in the New Covenant.

This indicates that the ethical standards of the New Covenant are more rigorous than the ethical standards of the Old Covenant. Jesus placed a greater moral burden on covenant-keepers than Moses did. It is not merely that the thief is to go and sin no more; it is that he is to go, not sin, and do good. He had been an agent of illegitimate negative sanctions in society. He is now to become an agent of legitimate positive sanctions in society. The Mosaic law was designed to reduce the level of sin in society. The gospel of Jesus Christ is designed to increase the level of righteousness in society. This is why almost none of the New Testament is directed toward civil government. Civil government is an agency of justice. It enforces the law by imposing negative sanctions. It is not to become an agency of positive sanctions. The Mosaic law set forth the standards for civil government.

D. Civil Law

The New Covenant sets forth the standards of self-government. To a limited extent, the New Covenant deals with church government, but it is virtually silent on the issue of civil government. The clearest statement regarding civil government was made by John the Baptist. "Then came also publicans⁵ to be baptized, and said unto him, Master, what shall we do? And he said unto them, Exact no more than that which is appointed you. And the soldiers likewise demanded of him, saying, And what shall we do? And he said unto them, Do violence to no man, neither accuse any falsely; and be content with your wages" (Luke 3:12–14).⁶ He spoke as an Old Testament prophet, not a New

5. Tax collectors.

6. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 2:B.

Testament prophet.

Anyone who would seek to establish laws governing civil government that are based entirely and exclusively on the New Testament finds that there are few such guidelines. He finds that the New Testament, by itself, provides very little in the way of judicial content, which is necessary for restricting the scope of civil government. This is why it is mandatory that we go back to the Mosaic law in our search for judicial principles that govern civil government. The person who denies the New Testament legitimacy of the Mosaic laws governing civil government is of necessity throwing us on the tender mercies of covenant-breakers, who seek to impose alternative concepts of civil justice for those found in the Mosaic law.

What appears to be a neutral affirmation of New Testament principles of righteousness, when combined with the denial of the continuing legitimacy of Mosaic laws governing civil government, is a highly unneutral affirmation of secular doctrines of civil law, civil justice, and civil authority. Whenever this affirmation is not in favor of what passes for neutral secular legislation, it becomes a justification for rival views of law based on a rival god. This is why any attempt to deny the Mosaic law as it applies to civil government, and to limit Christianity's role in affirming New Testament principles of civil law, is inescapably an attempt to substitute anti-biblical concepts of civil law. There is no neutrality. There is no neutral civil law. Either civil law is based on biblical revelation, which means the Mosaic law, or else it is based on something other than biblical revelation, which means an anti-biblical concept of civil law.

Conclusion

Paul's instruction for the former thief relates to selfgovernment, not civil government or ecclesiastical government. To the extent that the former thief is the head of a household, it applies to family government. But the thief is the head of the household, so we are still discussing the issue of self-government. Paul is not denying the legitimacy of the Mosaic law's system of restitution to victims. Rather, he is adding a new law: the law of repentance, which involves restitution to non-victims of the original acts of theft. The thief had been a liability to the society around him, including those who did not become his victims, but who, statistically speaking, lived at greater risk because of his presence among them. Now, the thief becomes a beneficiary to the society around him, including those who will never become his victims, but who, statistically speaking, live at reduced risk because of his presence among them.

16

LEGISLATED COVETOUSNESS

But fornication, and all uncleanness, or covetousness, let it not be once named among you, as becometh saints; Neither filthiness, nor foolish talking, nor jesting, which are not convenient: but rather giving of thanks. This ye know, that no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God (Eph. 5:3–5).

This is a matter of inheritance and disinheritance: point five of the biblical covenant.¹

A Adultery and Idolatry

Paul links the two. Idolatry is point two of the biblical covenant: hierarchy.²

In the Ten Commandments, the seventh commandment is the second in the second list of five: the priestly section. It parallels the Second Commandment against idolatry.³

Paul links adultery and the tenth commandment against covetousness. The commandment against covetousness specifies that one of the objects that must never be coveted is your neighbor's wife. That should be obvious enough. Paul in this case broadens the prohibition. He says that sexual immorality in general, which need not always be associated with adultery, is in the same category as covetousness generally. Covetousness is closely associated with sexual immorality.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

2. Ibid., ch. 2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 22.

3. Ibid., ch. 27.

In traditional societies, at least among men, sexual immorality that is not associated with adultery, meaning consensual sex between unmarried adults, is not regarded as being an infraction on the same scale as adultery. Still, most societies regard sexual immorality as a much greater infraction than covetousness. Paul here equates them. They are so serious that he says specifically that people who are sexually impure are in danger of eternal judgment: exclusion from the kingdom of God.

He says that this is also true of an idolater. Historically, Christianity and Judaism have regarded idolatry as a major sin. Idolatry was not to be tolerated under the Mosaic law. It was a capital crime for covenant-keepers to indulge in idolatry (Deut. 17:1–5).

Paul links sexual impurity, covetousness, and idolatry in this passage.⁴ He places them on an equal status in terms of the negative sanction that God threatens to impose on those who indulge in any of these three sins or practices. Covetousness is not a public act. Idolatry can be a public act. Sexual immorality may or may not be a public act. Yet all three are equated by Paul. Paul says that anyone who indulges his taste for any of these three sins risks being regarded as a son of Adam. Such a person is not part of the inheritance of adopted sons.

Paul speaks of sexual impurity and covetousness in the same sentence. Then he equates covetousness and idolatry. What do they have in common? They are all based on faith in something for nothing.

B. Covetousness: Something for Nothing

Covetousness is an economic sin. It is a mental lusting after another person's possessions. Why is this prohibited? Because the individual who indulges in this form of lust is implicitly saying that what he has received from God is insufficient to reward him for his many positive characteristics. Someone else has attained a certain level of wealth. The person who is covetous looks on this other person's achievements, and he compares those achievements with his own. He concludes that there has been a mistake or outright unfairness on the part of God. God has rewarded someone else far beyond that person's productivity.

The covetous person is not simply complaining that society is unfair. He is complaining that God is unfair. He looks at the blessings that God has showered upon someone else, and he concludes that he is equally deserving, and really even more deserving.

He does not understand the tight relationship between possessions

4. See also Colossians 3:5.

and responsibility (Luke 12:47–48).⁵ He looks on the other person's possessions, and he thinks to himself: "I would like to own what that person owns," but he does not think at the same time, "I would like to have added to me the same degree of responsibility with which the other person's possessions have burdened him."

People want possessions without paying the price of possessions. This price is not simply a monetary price. It is also a price involving personal responsibility for the continued ownership of the asset. There are always people bidding to gain possession of the asset. This is why the asset commands a price. Every time an individual refuses to sell or lease an asset, he is forfeiting whatever benefits the bidders presented to him. He is accepting responsibility for allocating private property. There is no escape from this responsibility. Yet most covetous people do not perceive that with possessions come responsibility.

So, the covetous person is really in search of a free lunch. He is in search of something for nothing. He wants the benefits, but he does not want the liabilities. He thinks that he should be permitted to live as if there were no relationship between ownership and responsibility. He may understand that others are under a tight administration by God, who imposes appropriate responsibility for every advantage, but he thinks that he should not be burdened by this relationship. He seeks to live in a world in which he is not under the curse of Adam. His world should not have thorns and thistles. He resents the fact that it does have thorns and thistles. So, he lusts after a world which does not exist. He seeks a world in which he can escape from Adam's burdens. There is no such world. This infuriates him.

C. Idolatry: Something for Nothing

Men seek many ways to achieve the false goal of living in the post-Fall world without the post-Fall curses. Idolatry is one of the ways that they seek this escape. They worship a false god, because they believe that this god will deliver them from the curses under which all men live because of the sin of Adam. The God of the Bible offers deliverance at a price. The price was paid by Jesus Christ at Calvary. This is not something for nothing. Free grace was not free for Christ.

A token price is also paid by each person, because of the inescapable increase of personal responsibility that accompanies all of the blessings of God.

5. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

And that servant, which knew his lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more (Luke 12:47–48).

“For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more.” This raises a major theological question. If there is increasing responsibility along with God's blessings in history, does this establish additional liability? The text in Luke says yes. Then what can pay for this additional liability? More grace. God's grace meets every liability. While grace accompanies the increased responsibilities, there is no question that the responsibilities do increase. Again, Jesus was very clear on this point.⁶ This indicates that grace and responsibility are upward spirals. God's grace is added in history progressively, enabling covenant-keepers to meet their responsibilities. This positive feedback process confirms the covenant. This was explicitly taught by Moses: “But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:18).⁷

Men cannot escape this system of compounding responsibility. So, if they deny God's grace, they find themselves in a dilemma. They cannot fulfill their escalating responsibilities by their own power. They want the blessings, but not the responsibilities. One way to escape this burden is to turn to idols. Idols promise that men can meet their obligations by their own works, most frequently the performance of religious rituals or the recitation of formulas. By these formulas, men seek power over nature and history, which are the two great idols for mankind.⁸ They seek something—blessings—for nothing much. They seek rewards at below-market prices.

6. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 28.

7. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 22.

8. Herbert Schlossberg, Idols for Destruction: Christian Faith and Its Confrontation with American Society (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, [1983] 1993), p. 11.

D. Sexual Immorality: Something for Nothing

Paul links covetousness, idolatry, and sexual immorality. Why sexual immorality? All cases of sexual immorality are a desire to attain something for nothing. They are a desire to attain satisfaction at a lower price than God has explicitly established for mankind. It is the desire to gain access to another person's body, but without being burdened by any judicial, covenantal responsibilities with respect to that person. This is one more case of the quest for a free lunch.

Prostitution is the most glaring example of this quest for a low-cost lunch. The individual seeking the other person's sexual accommodation must pay a price, but the price is a one-time price for a one-night stand. It does not involve any continuing responsibility for the care of the other person. It also denies that one of the parties—the male—is in any way responsible for children who may result from the sexual activity. This is another example of men seeking to gain something for nothing. Males are usually purchasers in these relationships.

Paul says that all three practices, all of which involve the quest of something for nothing, are crimes so heinous that God threatens to close the door to His kingdom because the sinner refuses to repent. Paul's language is inescapable: the person who practices covetousness, sexual impurity, or idolatry has marked himself as someone who is the heir of the Adamic covenant and outside the covenant of Jesus Christ. He is in the natural family of man; he is not in the adopted family of man.

E. The Social Gospel: Something for Nothing

Every political movement that is based on covetousness is therefore in opposition to the kingdom of God in Christ. It says that some people in society have not been given their just desserts. If the reason for their supposed lack of access to justice is the fact that the civil government has not actively redistributed wealth, which was achieved legally through individual initiative and capital, then this is a form of covetousness. The complaint against the social order is that it has not adopted legislation or court decisions that interfere with the free exercise of privately owned property. This is the working out of covetousness through collective political action. It says that the prevailing allocation of wealth in response to personal productivity and thrift is somehow illegitimate. This is an accusation against the social order.

Only those practices that are inherently immoral and are explicitly prohibited by the Mosaic law or else by some New Testament principle of civil government—rare—are legitimate objects of negative civil sanctions. When the reformer comes in the name of social justice, and calls for the civil government to interfere with the free market's allocation of scarce resources, he had better be certain that his specific call for reform is found in the Mosaic law. If it is not, it is simply another attempt to legislate the morality of idols. It is another attempt of man to set himself up as the sovereign agent who supervises the allocation of rewards and punishments in history, while ignoring the written law of God, which include the explicit negative sanctions required by the Mosaic law.

Paul said that covetousness is a capital crime in the eyes of God. It is not a capital crime for civil government, but it is a capital crime for the final judgment. The negative sanction is eternal punishment. Thus, when men call on the civil government to interfere with the allocation of private property, they had better be sure that the reform of the civil government which they are advocating is either explicitly demanded by the Mosaic law or implicitly required by one of the statutes of the Mosaic law.

Today's advocates of the Social Gospel, which is not a social but a statist gospel, know that what they are advocating has nothing to do with the Mosaic law. They also know that they are explicitly calling for a rejection of specific statutes of the Mosaic law. This is why they adamantly declare that they are defending principles of Christianity, while simultaneously denying the authority of Mosaic civil laws regarding property. They know the Mosaic law is opposed to the statist interference with the free market which they are calling for. They understand fully that they are taking a stand against Bible-revealed laws regarding the defense of the eighth Commandment: "Thou shalt not steal." They are organizing politically to impose the covetousness prohibited by the tenth commandment. They do this all in the name of Jesus.

Do not join with them in their call for legislated covetousness.

F. Disinheritance: Nothing for Something

Covenant-breakers seek the inheritance promised to covenant-keepers. They want to believe that they can gain this inheritance without repentance, without a substitutionary atonement, and without honoring biblical law. The result in eternity is hell (Luke 16), followed by the resurrection, the final judgment, and the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14–15). They get nothing for something. They get worse than nothing. They get eternal torment.

The attempt of Satan to inherit through Adam's subordination will be exposed as a failed attempt. But, before this final revelation, Satan's kingdom will be undermined in history. Covenant-breakers, who are idolators and adulterers, will be progressively disinherited. Their disinheritance in eternity will not catch them by surprise. They will have history to testify to them: the replacement of Satan's rule by Christ's, a manifestation of Christ's bodily resurrection and ascension in history. That replacement was definitive: the empty tomb and the ascension. It will be manifested progressively, and will be manifested finally.

Conclusion

Men seek something for nothing. This is another way of satiating that they seek a below-market price. They are willing to pay something; they are unwilling to pay everything. They agree to pay for something, but they want a discount. They want extras thrown in for nothing.

This quest applies to sexual goals, economic goals, and cosmic goals. They expect to be served: by prostitutes, neighbors, and idols. They expect others to bear part of the costs of supplying them with what they want.

In politics, we see this is the politics of plunder. Members of voting blocs insist that they are not getting their fair share. Others are said to owe them part of their unfair shares. The power of the state is invoked to secure their fair share. This is the politics of the fair share.⁹

The Social Gospel in 1900 was an aspect of America's Progressive movement, a political movement devoted to using the state to redistribute power and money. Today, the Social Gospel has been re-packaged in order to appeal to evangelical voters. The message is the same.¹⁰ The state is to redistribute wealth and power for the sake of the poor. These programs will be administered by formally educated, middle-class people, who will decide, case by case, who has met the program's standards to receive the benefits, and who has not. It is Robin Hood in action.

9. Gary North, "The Politics of the Fair Share," The Freeman (Nov. 1993). (<http://bit.ly/FairSharePolitics>)

10. Joel McDurmon, God Versus Socialism: A Biblical Critique of the New Social Gospel (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2009).

ECONOMIC PREDICTABILITY

Knowing that whatsoever good thing any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free (Eph. 6:8).

This had to do with the predictability of sanctions, point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. An Ethically Predictable World

There is an ethical cause-and-effect relationship between the positive sanctions that a person bestows on others and the positive sanctions that God eventually bestows on the bestower. I know of no clearer statement in the Bible regarding the positive correlation between good deeds done in history and rewards from God.

Paul is asserting the ultimate predictability of the universe. He is saying that the universe is fair, because God is fair. I am using universe in the broadest sense, which includes the creation that will exist beyond the grave. Although history is marred by sin and the covenantal effects of sin, the ultimate ethical nature of all creation will be manifested at the final judgment. We do not live in an ethically random universe.

Paul does not say, nor does he imply, that the positive sanctions in history that God applies to generous people will perfectly match, on a one-to-one basis, the generosity shown by these people. History is marred by sin, and sin disrupts the ethical predictability of the universe. God shows mercy to sinners for a time. Negative sanctions are delayed. There is general predictability, but there is not perfect predictability. Generous people can nevertheless be confident that their generosity will be rewarded by God.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

Jesus was adamant about this. He said specifically that we must lay up treasure in heaven. "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal: For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also" (Matt. 6:19–21).²

The means by which we lay up treasure in heaven include showing sacrificial generosity to those who are in need through no fault of their own. This was Jesus' point: that which we give away in history will be returned to us beyond history, if not in history. There is continuity between time and eternity. This continuity is based on the absolute sovereignty of God, the hierarchical nature of covenantal reality, the ethical perfection of the law of God, and the predictability of God's sanctions.

The humanist philosopher Immanuel Kant rejected this conception of the universe. He also rejected this conception of ethics. He said specifically that any good deed which is performed on the assumption that it will be repaid in the future is not a moral deed.³ He thereby denied the ethical system of cause and effect that Paul announces here and which Jesus taught. He denied it in terms of the legitimacy of its motivation, and he denied it in terms of its concept of a sovereign God who rules over history and eternity.

B. Hierarchical Authority

Paul is drawing conclusions regarding the proper administration of authority in history. He rests his conclusions on his concept of hierarchical authority and predictable sanctions in both history and eternity. He grounds his concept of covenantal hierarchical authority on the fundamental hierarchical authority of God's sovereignty over history and eternity. Paul is arguing, on the basis of a specific conception of God's relationship with the creation, and especially with mankind, that human authority must manifest the predictability of God's sanctions. Men are to rule over other men, who were placed under their authority by God, in terms of a confident expectation that God will treat them as they treat others.

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 13.

3. Immanuel Kant, "The Lawgiver," Lectures on Ethics (New York: Harper, [1780?] 1963), p. 52. Cf. "Reward and Punishment," p. 57.

This is an application of the biblical principle of sowing and reaping. We reap what we sow.⁴ We are therefore to act in a just fashion with our subordinates. We show our obedience to God by being generous to those under our authority and even those not under our authority. In the case of our subordinates, they can predict our responses because we are predictable on a regular basis. We can predict the God's responses for the same reason. God is predictable. The universe is not random. The universe is not impersonal.

C. The Meaning of "Same"

Paul speaks of receiving the same: "Knowing that whatsoever good thing any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free" (Eph. 6:8). This raises the question of relative wealth and relative sacrifice. Jesus gave the example of rich men who gave away a little wealth in terms of their total assets. He compared this with a widow who gave away two small coins. He said that she gave away more.

And he looked up, and saw the rich men casting their gifts into the treasury. And he saw also a certain poor widow casting in thither two mites. And he said, Of a truth I say unto you, that this poor widow hath cast in more than they all: For all these have of their abundance cast in unto the offerings of God: but she of her penury hath cast in all the living that she had (Luke 21:1–4).⁵

When Paul speaks of the same, he has in mind the level of sacrifice, not the market value of that which was given away. The rich men and the widow will be rewarded appropriately. She will not remain poor after the equivalent of what she gave away is restored to her.

This means that God judges men based on His ability to compare degrees of sacrifice. He can assess comparative sacrifice. Economists refer to this as comparing interpersonal subjective utility. God makes interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility, although there is no way for economists to do this on a scientific basis.⁶ Christian economics acknowledges God's ability to do this.

4. Chapters 8, 13.

5. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 50.

6. Lionel Robbins, The Nature and Significance of Economic Science (London: Macmillan. 1932), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/RobbinsEcon>) Cf. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 5.

D. Economic Predictability

In our economic dealings with others, the same sort of predictability should prevail. We should be fair dealers with those not under our authority. Paul uses examples from within the family hierarchy as models of doing good: to those below us and to those above us. But Paul's instruction is not limited to hierarchy. "Knowing that whatsoever good thing any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free" (Eph. 6:8). There is a four-way system of responsibility: upward, downward, inward, and outward. Paul's words also apply to outward relationships.

The benefits of doing good to those outside the hierarchy are acknowledged by economists as applying in reciprocal situations. A body of literature has built up regarding the game strategy of tit for tat.⁷ This strategy involves negative sanctions. It also requires repeat dealings. Paul is not limiting his discussion to repeat transactions and repeat bargaining. He is saying that God has in mind positive sanctions in general, not just reciprocal business relationships. He is not limiting his discussion to exchange.

Tit for tat assumes that we do good to our friends and evil to our enemies, who reciprocate. The latter scenario leads to the economy of feuding: extensive negative sanctions. Jesus taught otherwise.

Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you; That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same? And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the publicans so? Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect (Matt. 5:43–48).⁸

This is a uniquely Christian worldview. Humanist economics has no concept of a world that operates under a sovereign God who keeps a ledger and tallies up a lifetime of good deeds. Paul's perspective as-

7. This was developed as a theory of cooperation by Anatol Rapoport in 1984.

8. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 10.

sumes the existence of a fixed scale of economic value that applies across time borders. God assesses the degree of sacrifice made on behalf of others, and He rewards these acts according to this sacrifice. There is justice based on a fixed ethical system. There is no equality of eternal rewards (I Cor. 3:15–17).⁹

E. Family Hierarchy

The context of this passage is the hierarchical relationship that we find in every covenantal institution;¹⁰ in this case, the family.

1. Fathers and Children

Paul begins with the hierarchical relationship between parents and children. Children are told to obey parents. “Children, obey your parents in the Lord: for this is right” (v. 1). There will be positive sanctions. “Honour thy father and mother; (which is the first commandment with promise;) That it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long on the earth” (vv. 2–3). Paul here invokes the promise of the fifth commandment (Ex. 20:12).¹¹ This clearly is an affirmation of the judicial continuity between the Mosaic covenant and the New Covenant.

Paul then warns fathers not to impose negative sanctions to such a degree that the children are tempted to rebel. “And, ye fathers, provoke not your children to wrath: but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord” (v. 4). Children are required to obey their parents, but parents are supposed to exercise good judgment by not provoking their children to wrath.

2. Slaves

Then Paul turns his attention to slavery. Slaves¹² in a household are expected by God to obey their masters. Their masters exercise legitimate authority over them. Slaves are subordinates in a household that provides them with the basics of life. They receive food, shelter, 9. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch.

10. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 2.

11. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 25.

12. The Greek word for both slave and servant is the same: doulos.

clothing, and even medical care from the family. Paul warns slaves that they should continue to serve their masters faithfully. "Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of your heart, as unto Christ" (v. 5). Paul's explanation for telling slaves to be good servants is that they are servants of Christ; they are doing the will of God in order to please God. They should not be working as men-pleasers, Paul says. "Not with eyeservice, as menpleasers; but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart" (v. 6).

This does not mean that slaves should not please their masters. The point that Paul is making is that covenantal existence is hierarchical. The slave pleases God by pleasing the person God has placed over him. "With good will doing service, as to the Lord, and not to men" (v. 7). God is represented by the master; by pleasing the master as a representative of God, the slave pleases God. This system of representation is inherent in all existence. The universe is covenantal. Hierarchies exist in all covenantal institutions, and in all other institutions. So, the individual who pleases a superior in the name of Christ is pleasing Christ.

Paul takes very seriously the hierarchical structure of the family. He tells the masters to be good disciplinarians. "And, ye masters, do the same things unto them, forbearing threatening: knowing that your Master also is in heaven; neither is there respect of persons with him" (v. 9). This is what he had previously told fathers. He reminds masters that their master is in heaven. In other words, they are under authority, just as their servants are under authority.

God is not a respecter of persons, Paul says. This is a fundamental principle of biblical justice. It is first announced in the Mosaic law (Deut. 10:17). God is not a respecter of persons, so judges must hand down judgments without respect to persons. They are to imitate God, because they are made in God's image. They are also occupying positions of hierarchical responsibility. This applies to civil judges. It applies to fathers. It applies to masters.

F. Sanctions

In this system of hierarchical authority, there are sanctions. There cannot be hierarchical authority apart from sanctions. There are positive sanctions and negative sanctions, just as there are heaven and hell. The threat facing rulers is that they can impose inappropriate negative sanctions. Paul tells children to obey their parents. He tells servants to obey their masters. Children and servants thereby bless their superiors with positive sanctions. In this sense, sanctions are a two-way street. Children and slaves are not to impose negative sanctions on their superiors by resisting authority or by producing substandard performance. At the same time, parents and masters are to impose negative sanctions prudently, taking care not to impose greater negative sanctions that are appropriate for the nature of the infractions. In other words, the punishment must fit the infraction.

In this system of sanctions, God is the supreme sanctions-bringer. Paul says that people who do good in history will receive positive sanctions from God. These sanctions will be appropriate to the nature of the good which men have shown to others. This is analogous to the principle of civil law that the punishment should fit the crime. In this case, God's positive sanctions will fit the degree of sacrifice shown by the generous person. Generous people are reminded that God is a faithful judge, and that they can legitimately expect to be rewarded in terms of the benefits which they had passed on to others.

The system of cause and effect in history is a system of hierarchical sanctions. The sanctions are imposed (negative) or bestowed (positive) by a superior authority. God will bless generous people with appropriate rewards that will be in terms of the recipients' generosity to others. This will remind us that the universe is not random; cause and effect are not impersonal. Cause and effect, as a unified system, is grounded in ethics. The person who obeys God and who is generous toward others can legitimately expect to be rewarded in a predictable fashion, just as surely as a convicted criminal can expect negative sanctions from a righteous judge.

This is not a system of works-salvation. It is a system of grace. Grace is shown by God to all those under his authority.¹³ Grace is therefore to be shown by rulers to all those under their authority. The grace of God involves negative sanctions against sin. Similarly, the grace shown by generous people to those under their authority must also involve negative sanctions for rebellious behavior. This protects victims. There can be no system of justice in history without hierarchy, ethical standards, and both positive and negative sanctions.

13. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

Conclusion

There are predictable sanctions in life. The good things that a covenant-keeper does will return to him in forms appropriate to his degree of sacrifice. He benefits from this increase in positive sanctions. This of course assumes that the bad things do not return to him. Adam's sin has placed all men in the negative sanctions category. For covenant-keepers, all of the bad things were paid for by Christ. "But God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:8). These bad things do not return to those for whom Christ died.

Paul teaches that we live in a world in which causes and effects are both ethical and related perfectly. They are not related perfectly in history. This is of little concern, or should be, to covenant-keepers. The comprehensive nature of ethical cause and effect moves Christian economics from a consideration of tit for tat to a consideration of the providential administration of economic causality.

PRODUCTION TRUMPS CONSUMPTION

For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain (Phil. 1:21).

Life and death are aspects of sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Welcoming Death

I contend that this is the most widely quoted passage in the Bible that virtually no one in good health and under age 100 applies to himself. When the physician announces to his patient, “You’re terminal,” the patient does not rejoice. This is why the physician does not say, “You’re terminal.” He says, “You would be wise to get your affairs in order.”

Paul applies his statement literally to his own situation.

For I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ; which is far better: Nevertheless to abide in the flesh is more needful for you. And having this confidence, I know that I shall abide and continue with you all for your furtherance and joy of faith; That your rejoicing may be more abundant in Jesus Christ for me by my coming to you again (Phil. 1:23–26).

Paul in this passage presents one of the most remarkable testimonies in the history of man. Here is a statement that is very difficult for most people to believe, including those who claim to be believers in the epistles of Paul. He states that it is his preference to die in the near future and thereby be present with Christ. He says that he is willing to stay alive for the sake of his work. His work benefits other people. He sees the importance of his work as being greater than his personal desire to exit the temporal world.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

There is an old saying: "Everybody wants to go to heaven, but nobody wants to die." Paul's statement is in stark contrast to the familiar aphorism. Most people nod in agreement when they hear the message of the aphorism. When they hear the words of Paul in this passage, they find it very difficult to believe that anyone could rationally hold such a position. Yet, from the logic of Christian theology, every covenant-keeper ought to want to go to heaven. This affirms what Paul affirms: no covenant-keeper should resist the advent of death. Yet the vast majority of covenant-keepers do what they can to resist the advent of death.

B. Humanist Economic Thought

Paul's statement is in stark contrast to the economics of humanism. Humanist economics self-consciously limits itself to a consideration of the temporal world. While Austrian School economists do admit that economics should consider the individual goals of people who seek to improve their condition, no matter how they define this improvement, the assumption of the Austrian School economists, as with all other economists, is that profits and losses apply only in history. Why this should be true from a theoretical standpoint is never made clear. The concept that "every man has his price" is always applied to the realm of time, yet it is obvious that men make decisions to take risks in this life, especially during wartime, but also on behalf of others, that cannot be explained by the concept that every man has his price.

Paul is not denying that there is a system of ethical cause and effect in the world. He repeatedly affirms that such a system is sovereign. What he denies here is that this system of cause and effect is relevant only to the temporal world. Paul says he believes that the positive sanctions of being in the presence of Christ outweigh the negative sanction of his own death.

The humanistic economist has difficulty in dealing with such a concept of profit and loss. Paul's system of profit and loss cannot be handled by double-entry bookkeeping. The economist finds it very difficult to elucidate an economic theory which is predicated on the idea that both profit and loss apply both to history and the realm beyond the grave.

Economists assume that the vast majority of people do not agree with Paul's assessment of two-realm applicability of the twin concepts of profit and loss. They assume that the vast majority of individuals have as their focus of concern the realm of time. They would argue that so few people have adopted Paul's extended concept of profit and loss that his view can be dismissed out of hand. To adopt it would be to increase the likelihood that we, as forecasters, will not be able to predict the outcome of specific economic policies.

Some economists believe that the test of any economic theory is the ability of economists who have adopted the theory to make accurate predictions about the future.² If a theory of human action leads to incorrect predictions of human action, then the pragmatic defender of economic theory concludes that the theory is useless and therefore expendable. The cost of retaining such a theory is the loss of precision in forecasting that the theory produces. The cost is too high.

C. Profit and Loss

It is true that it is difficult to elucidate a general economic theory when so few people assess the realm of time in the way that Paul does. Paul dismisses the benefits of time when compared to the benefits of eternity. So did Jesus. Christianity is notable by its commitment to a concept of profit and loss that applies to the realm beyond the grave. The famous statement of Jesus regarding the exchange of one's soul for the sake of the world is indicative of the commitment of Christianity to a concept of economics that incorporates the world beyond the grave. "For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" (Matt. 16:26).³

It goes beyond this. The concept of profit and loss in the New Testament begins with the dual concepts of heaven and hell. The two realms beyond the grave establish the criteria for the single realm of time. Heaven and hell are the models for profit and loss. Profit and loss in time merely reflect the far more relevant locus of existence: eternity. Paul is so convinced of the relevance of profit in eternity that he dis-

2. The most famous economist who held this view was Milton Friedman. "The Methodology of Positive Economics," in Essays of Positive Economics (Chicago: University of Chicago, 1953), ch. 1. For my critique of Friedman's position, see Gary North, "Economics: From Reason to Intuition," in North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1976).

3. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 35.

counts the benefits of time. He is committed to time only insofar as time enables him to remain a servant of the church. He is committed to time because he is convinced that he brings something of benefit to the church, which could not be easily replaced. He recognizes his own importance for the life of the church, and he regards this as the only relevant justification for his life.

D. Production, not Consumption

His attitude regarding the benefits he offers to the church is not limited to his office as an apostle. He is setting forth a standard that all Christians should adopt. They should be committed to life on earth. This commitment should not be based on the benefits of consumption but rather the benefits of production. Paul is saying that he is committed to life on earth because he is productive for the sake of the kingdom of God. He defines his productivity in terms of his contribution to the work of other people. He does not see life on earth as the primary area of consumption. He sees heaven in terms of positive sanctions. He sees eternal positive sanctions as greatly outweighing the positive sanctions of life on earth.

Obviously, the positive sanctions of heaven outweigh the negative sanctions of life, but Paul does not compare the positive sanctions of heaven with some kind of net income statement for history. He is saying that the greatest benefit that he can have by remaining alive is that he remains a benefit to God's church. He sees this benefit in terms of production, not consumption.

If he were simply laying up treasure in heaven by remaining a good servant on earth,⁴ we could say that he evaluated the present net value of whatever he would inherit beyond the grave. He applied the prevailing rate of interest to that future stream of income, and he concluded that it is better to stay alive. This surely is not the picture we get from his language in this passage. On the contrary, he is not talking about rewards, other than to be in the presence of Christ in the world beyond the grave. That is the only reward that he refers to. So great is that reward, he tells us, that it is better than life on earth.

This indicates that history is primarily a realm of production

4. "But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal: For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also" (Matt. 6:20–21). Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 13.

rather than a realm of consumption. If we want increased consumption, Paul tells us, the best way to get it is to die. The positive sanctions in the realm beyond the grave are so great compared to the best sanctions available in history that the lure of life on earth did not affect Paul at all. The lure of life on earth is the lure of kingdom-oriented production, not personal consumption.

Paul's description of serving others indicates that service, rather than consumption, is the central benefit of life. He wants to stay alive because he wants to work. He does not want to work for the sake of the economic rewards associated with labor. He wants to work because he perceives that the primary meaning of his life is what he can do to extend the kingdom of God in history. He wants to be part of the division of labor that is the church of Jesus Christ.

He tells his readers that he wants to be of service to them. In this sense, he imitates Christ. Christ came into history specifically to serve God the Father by serving the church. He lowered himself to enter into history in order to transform history.

Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus: Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God: But made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name: That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; And that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father (Phil. 2:5–11).⁵

The Second Person of the Trinity knew in advance of His incarnation that He would be elevated in the future as a result of his subordination to the burdens of time. God raised Jesus to an elevated status in response to His faithful service as the Redeemer.

Paul could therefore legitimately expect to be rewarded as a result of his service. He says that God rewards those who serve others.⁶ But he does not speak of heaven in terms of extra rewards that he could legitimately expect as a result of his extended time on earth. He speaks only of being in the presence of Christ; this is the great reward.

5. Chapter 20.

6. "And God is able to make all grace abound toward you; that ye, always having all sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work" (II Cor. 9:8). See Chapter 8.

This attitude of a servant is the standard for all covenant-keepers, a standard that God has revealed in the New Testament. Paul is faithful to this standard to the point of saying in public that he would rather be dead than alive in time; he would prefer to be alive in the presence of Christ rather than be alive on earth. For covenant-keepers, the transition of death, however impressive as the negative sanction which God imposed on Adam and Eve, is still preferable to life. It is the transition point to a better world. Grieving relatives or friends comfort the immediate family members of a recently deceased individual by saying that the deceased individual is in a better world. Paul said this of himself before he died.

Conclusion

Paul's statement points to the realm of history as a realm of production more than consumption. Consumption should be deferred for the sake of greater consumption. This principle begins with the ultimate consumption: life beyond the grave. It then extends backward to time. The time for net consumption—if at all—is the realm beyond the grave. The time for net production is history. The testimony of God in Genesis 1:26–28—the dominion covenant⁷—is that production will trump consumption in eternity. But neither production nor consumption will labor under a curse.

Paul has low time-preference. He was future-oriented. He did not value the present far higher than the distant future. Any society that adopts his view of rewards and the future will be marked by low interest rates, high rates of investment, and high rates of economic growth.

7. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary of Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

SELF-INTEREST AND ENVY

Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others (Phil. 2:4).

The English Standard Version translates this as follows: “Let each of you look not only to his own interests, but also to the interests of others.” This is close to the meaning of the original Greek. The word “things” conjures up an image of physical objects. This is not what Paul is getting at. This has to do with stewardship: point two of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Limiting Self-Interest

His statement strikes at the very heart of modern economic analysis. Modern economic analysis derives from Adam Smith’s analytical revolution in 1776. He placed individual self-interest at the heart of his economic analysis. In his famous statement regarding a person’s desire to gain the assistance of the butcher and the baker, Smith insisted that the individual must look to the interests of those from whom he expects to receive assistance. They are self-interested actors. If we wish to gain their cooperation, we must offer something of value to them. All modern free-market economic analysis begins here. Christian economics does not. Paul’s passage here reveals why not.

B. On Behalf of Others

Paul tells us that we are to look to the interests of others as well as our own interests. He does not say that we are not to place any weight whatsoever on our own personal self-interest. He says only that we are to look to the interests of others. We must be willing to put their interests ahead of our own in some cases. The adult who runs into a flaming building to save a child manifests this attitude.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

1. Self-Sacrifice

Parents do this with respect to their children. If they do not, society regards them as deviant, and should. We are also supposed to do this with respect to the interests of our parents. So important is this principle that one of the Ten Commandments is devoted to it.²

Paul takes this principle of self-sacrifice one step beyond. He extends it out of the realm of the family into the realm of society. He is not talking merely of the institutional church. There is no indication that he put any confessional boundaries on his statement. This does not mean that a covenant-keeper is supposed to be consumed with guilt because he has not sent enough money to support a distant non-Christian in a pagan nation 10,000 miles away. Paul is talking about the day-by-day interaction that people have with others in their community. He is talking about our relationship with those people whose interests we can know well enough to compare with our own. He is saying that we are not to be exclusively self-centered. Instead, we are to take Christ's example as our own. The Second Person of the Trinity descended from the realm of eternity into the realm of history for the sake of serving as the Redeemer (Phil. 2:5–12).³ If we take this example seriously, we must give consideration to the interests of those around us, comparing them with our concerns about our own situation. This places the emphasis on service.

We cannot readily serve another person tomorrow if we impoverish ourselves today. Paul is not talking about self-sacrifice to the point of impoverishment. He is talking about using our assets as tools of dominion in God's kingdom. This requires that we take into consideration the effects of our actions on others. We are not to look solely at the benefits that will accrue to us because of a particular action. We are to consider carefully the effects of our actions on other people.

2. "Honour thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee" (Ex. 20:12). Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 25.

3. Chapter 20.

2. John Gill's Exegesis

In his commentary on this passage, the eighteenth-century Baptist theologian and pastor John Gill got to the point . . . and then abandons it. His printed commentary is in six fat volumes, in two columns of small print. Fortunately, it has been made available to the general public in digital form. It is included in the excellent Bible search program, e-Sword.

Look, not every man on his own things, Not but that a man should take care of his worldly affairs, and look well unto them, and provide things honest in the sight of all men, for himself and his family, otherwise he would be worse than an infidel; but he is not to seek his own private advantage, and prefer it to a public good; accordingly the Syriac version reads it, "neither let anyone be careful of himself, but also everyone of his neighbour"; and the Arabic version thus, "and let none of you look to that which conduces to himself alone, but let everyone of you look to those things which may conduce to his friend;

Gill was a man who despised the use of periods. His faithful companion was the semicolon.

Here, he made the traditional contrast in the history of Western ethics between the person who seeks his own private advantage in preference to the public good. It was this perspective that was challenged forcefully in 1705 in the poem by the dentist, Bernard Mandeville: The Grumbling Hive. He extended his comments in two large volumes in 1714: The Fable of the Bees. The subtitle was: Private Vices, Publick Benefits. Mandeville argued that, in pursuing their self-interest, bees in a hive benefit the hive. This argument scandalized Christian theologians and social thinkers throughout the eighteenth century.⁴

Officially, Adam Smith followed the teaching of his predecessor and teacher, Francis Hutcheson, who was intensely hostile to Mandeville. Yet it is clear in Smith's masterpiece, The Wealth of Nations, that he had adopted Mandeville's analytic worldview: public good as the result of self-interest. His book was a defense of Mandeville's worldview, except that Smith emphasized production, whereas Mandeville emphasized consumption, thereby setting the standard for John

4. F. A. Hayek, "Dr Bernard Mandeville" (1967), in Hayek, New Studies in Philosophy, Politics, Economics and the History of Ideas (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978), p. 252.

Maynard Keynes over two centuries later.⁵ But the main point was the same in both the Fable of the Bees and Wealth of Nations: self-interested individual action is the foundation of the prosperity of a society. An individual can pursue his self-interest, yet know that at the same time he is benefiting others in society. This worldview unleashed self-interest as never before in the history of man. It also unleashed economic growth as never before in the history of man.

Gill continued his comments after his semicolon. He moved the discussion from society to the spirit. This has been the knee-jerk tendency of Bible commentators for two millennia. They cannot bring themselves to apply their exegesis to the day-to-day world of politics, economics, and education. They flee to pietism's realm of the soul. This surrenders history to the humanists, who are happy (initially at least) to surrender the spiritual realm in exchange for history. Gill continued his sentence:

but this respects spiritual things, and spiritual gifts: a Christian should not seek his own honour and applause, and to have his own will, and a point in a church carried his own way, but should consult the honour of Christ, the good of others, and the peace of the church; he should not look upon his own gifts, he may look upon them, and ascribe them to the grace of God, and make use of them to his glory, but not to admire them, or himself for them, and pride himself in them, and lift up himself above others, neglecting and taking no notice of the superior abilities of others:

As Gill presented the case, Paul was writing against spiritual envy. But Paul's words give no hint of this. They extend far beyond the narrow confines of the church and Christian community. Gill continued his sentence:

but every man also on the things of others; not on their worldly things, busying himself with other men's matters, and which he has nothing to do with, but on the sentiments and reasons of others; which he should well weigh and consider, and if they outdo and overbalance his own, should yield unto them; he should take notice of the superior gifts of others, and own and acknowledge them; which is the way to submit to one another in the fear of God, and to promote truth, friendship, and love.

Gill's analysis can be interpreted as recommending an assessment of other church members' motivations. This recommendation is consistent with Paul's concern. It is also consistent with Smith's. The difference is that Paul was concerned with the kingdom of God, whereas Smith was recommending a self-interested strategy based on manipulation and bargaining. The primary focus of concern for both Paul in this passage and Smith in Wealth of Nations was economics, not spiritual development within the institutional church.

5. John Maynard Keynes, The General Theory of Employment, Interest, and Money (New York: Macmillan, 1936), p. 361.

What was not a concern of either Paul or Smith was spiritual envy, as Gill would have it. In the passage following this verse, Paul discusses the incarnation. God went from the spiritual realm of eternity into history. He "made himself of no reputation took upon in the form of a servant and was made in the likeness of men" (v. 7). The whole point of Paul's message here is that the incarnation brought eternity into history. The context reveals that he is writing, not about the spiritual realm, as distinguished from the realm of history. This passage is about the incarnation of the Second Person of the Trinity in human form: Jesus Christ. Paul says that "he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross" (v. 8). What could be more intensely physical than the cross?

Gill's contemporary, Matthew Henry, was far closer to Paul's message. "A selfish spirit is destructive of Christian love. We must be concerned not only for our own credit, and ease, and safety, but for those of others also; and rejoice in the prosperity of others as truly as in our own. We must love our neighbour as ourselves, and make his case our own."

B. Paul vs. Envy

Paul is not speaking here about matters of faith and repentance. He is also not speaking about our neighbors' spiritual condition. He is talking about "keeping up with the Joneses." We should not make the attempt. We should rejoice when the Joneses improve their economic condition. Even if the Joneses can now move out of the neighborhood to a nicer neighborhood, we should rejoice.

Paul is providing one of the most powerful statements against the sin of envy that is found anywhere in the history of man. He is telling covenant-keepers that they should be happy to see others improve their condition, and they should go out of their way to help others do this. This is anti-envy. This is not tearing down an individual merely because the fact that he is above us bothers us. This is elevating an individual so that he can enjoy the blessings of life. This is a way to fulfill Christ's affirmation that He came to provide life and to provide it more abundantly (John 10:10). We are to implement this in our communities and in our relationships with other people. In doing so, we testify against any trace of envy in our relationships with others.

1. Beyond Individual Self-Interest

From the point of view of economic analysis, Paul's statement undermines the methodology of humanistic free market economics. He moves analysis from individual self-interest to social interest.

He does not say that we are not to pursue our self-interest. He is also not denying that our self-interest is consistent with the improvement of the conditions of those around us. We should therefore be concerned that our actions further the goals and aspirations of those who deal with us. This is a free market principle. Free market economists stress that voluntary exchange should be based, and is based, on the expectation of mutual benefit. This is a denial of what is known as the Montaigne fallacy: the idea that one person benefits economically only at the expense of another person.⁶ Economists call such a social setting a zero-sum game.

But Paul is saying more than this. He is warning people that they should actively be concerned with the welfare of those around them. He is pointing out that there are decisions that individuals can make in their own self-interest that can harm other people. Christians should avoid such practices. I do not think he is talking about theft, fraud, and other means of criminal assault. He is speaking about voluntary transactions which those in the church at Philippi might indulge in. What kinds of practices does he have in mind?

The most important one is envy. Eliminating that sin from consideration, there could be an unwillingness to intervene to help a person in a crisis. The person is suffering from circumstances that are no fault of his own. A covenant-keeper is told by Paul to intervene to help the person, even though there may not be any way for the person to repay a covenant-keeper. This may not be a matter of voluntary exchange. Jesus said this with respect to inviting poor people to feasts (Luke

6. On Montaigne's fallacy, see Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), p. 660. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>) Cf. Helmut Schoeck, Envy: A Theory of Social Behavior (New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, [1966] 1970), pp. 42, 166, 175, 309, 360.

14:12–14).⁷ The parable of the good Samaritan also conveys this truth (Luke 10:30–36).⁸

The importance of this principle is hard to overstate. Rich people hide their wealth from those who are poorer than they are; so, they rarely cooperate with poor people. Envy undermines social cooperation.⁹ Few people understand that when someone else becomes richer, that person becomes a better person to trade with.

2. Economic Development

It is common for citizens of a rich nation to resent the fact that foreign nations are catching up economically. They especially resent the fact that some nations are surpassing them economically. It should be obvious that it is an advantage for everybody if a foreign nation gets richer, assuming that it gets rich through voluntary trade and production. Rich people do business with rich people. They do not do business with people in a slum. Similarly, residents of rich nations trade with residents of rich nations.

Consider the argument of people who believe that the gospel of Christ improves other people's work habits. They say that when the gospel goes into a backward society, husbands sober up, work more productively, take care of their families, and generally become better heads of households. Those who believe that this is an advantage usually say that the gospel makes people richer. This is the case in most instances in Third World countries.

Now, let us take this argument one step beyond. Is it a good thing for Third World nations to get richer, if the reason why they are getting richer is that they are conforming themselves to specific ethical standards of the Mosaic law? Do they steal less? Do they commit adultery less? If so, why shouldn't we expect those individuals, and the societies in which they live, to get richer? Moses said that they will get richer (Deut. 28:1–14).¹⁰

Why should any covenant-keeper in nation A be envious of the success of individuals in nation B? Even if nation B is getting rich by comparison, why should that disturb citizens of nation A? It means

7. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 34.

8. Ibid., ch. 21.

9. Schoeck, Envy, pp. 46, 290ff.

10. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

that there are richer people across the border to trade with; so, their increased productivity can become an advantage. Yet there is a latent hostility to individuals and nations that overtake formerly rich individuals and nations. Their success is resented. This is envy.

The goal of the kingdom of God is to extend the rule of Christ's dominion across the face of the earth. The more wealth that a covenant-keeper possesses, the greater is his ability to extend the kingdom of God in history. A Christian in one country should not be envious of a Christian in another country, merely because that country is increasing its per capita wealth by becoming more obedient to the moral and legal standards presented in the Mosaic law. Would it be sensible for Christians in a rich country to cease funding all foreign missions, on the assumption that foreign missions will increase the per capita wealth of the country where the missionaries go? To ask it in this way indicates the preposterous nature of envy toward other nations, yet envy is widespread, even within Christian circles. It is as if Christians did not believe that the spreading of the gospel will produce increased per capita wealth in the societies where the missionaries are successful. It is as if they really do not want the missionaries to be successful.

The answer to this is Paul's injunction: we must care for the interests of others even as we care for our own self-interest.

Conclusion

This passage undermines the starting point of all modern free market economic theory, which begins with the assumption of self-interest as the primary economic motivation. While economists like to think of the discipline of economics as value-free, it is in fact value-laden. It begins with autonomous man, the individual. His goals are primary to him. He seeks his ends by persuading others to cooperate with him. He is interested in others as Dale Carnegie described and recommended in How to Win Friends and Influence People: as means to his ends.

Paul challenges this starting point. To the extent that people are following Christ, he says, they will be seriously concerned with the goals and efforts of others. As a tool of analysis to explain how people choose courses of actions as market participants, the assumption of individual self-interest produces plausible explanations of people's motivation and the outcome of their actions. But to the degree that people covenant with Christ, their motivation and behavior will take on characteristics more associated with family members' relations with each other. Their actions will become less predictable in the marketplace. The fundamental allocation rule of the free market, "high bid wins," does not apply as predictably as before.

THE DOMINION PROCEDURE

Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus: Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God: But made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name: That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; And that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father. Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling (Phil. 2:5–12).

This referred to obedience, point two of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Subordination to Exaltation

This passage is important for Christian economics because it sets forth the procedure for dominion, based on Christ's dominion: incarnation, obedience, death, resurrection, and ascension to the right hand of God. This is the procedure of subordination leading to exaltation. I regard this as the most important New Testament passage on the procedure for dominion.

This is also the most important single text in the New Testament on the incarnation of Jesus Christ. Paul says that Christ was equal with God prior to the incarnation. Christ thought it not robbery to be equal with God. That is to say, His was not an attempt to steal the nature of

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

God. He was equal to God as a part of God. The Trinity is not taught here, but the divinity of Christ is taught here.

Paul says that Christ moved from heaven to earth, from eternity to time. Christ “made himself of no reputation and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men” (v. 7). Paul goes on to say that in doing this, Christ humbled Himself. That is, He became totally subordinate in His perfect humanity to His divinity. Paul does not put it this way, but theologians who have attempted to explain what Paul is saying have adopted language along these lines. Paul goes on to say that Christ “was obedient unto death, even the death of the cross.” This was dual subordination: subordination to man and subordination to God.

Because Jesus Christ subordinated Himself, even to the death of the cross, God has exalted Him. God has raised him up. Paul is not speaking of the physical resurrection. He is speaking about Christ’s office. He says that God has given Him a name which is above every name. The result of this exaltation is that at the name of Jesus, “every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth” (v. 10).

Jesus Christ started as God and ended as the exalted ruler to whom all men will bow. In between, He humbled Himself and subjected to Himself to the humiliation of the cross. So, Christ’s pattern is rulership to stewardship, and stewardship back to rulership. Paul says that we are to imitate Christ in this regard. We begin as ethically fallen stewards. We are to subordinate ourselves to others, just as Christ subordinated Himself to the cross on behalf of men.

This is a matter of covenantal hierarchy. As covenant-keepers, Christians must acknowledge that they are subordinate to God. During their lives, they are subordinate to some men. But the long-term implication of their faithful subordination points to their exaltation. This may take place in history, but it will surely take place in eternity. Exaltation is the final condition of covenant-keepers.

B. Stewardship

This passage deals with the theology of stewardship. Stewardship is a form of subordination. The steward is not the owner of the assets he oversees. He has a responsibility to the owner for the careful administration of all of the assets that had been entrusted to him. He must give an account of his stewardship. This is not taught explicitly in this passage, but it is taught in other New Testament passages.

This passage contains the most forthright presentation of the degree of Christ's subordination to man. It reveals the contrast between what Christ was before the incarnation and what Christ is after the ascension (Acts 1:9). God has raised Him up physically. This is a testimony to the degree to which God has raised Him up covenantally. Christ is the head of the church (Eph. 5:23).

The resurrection and the ascension testify to the reality of the exaltation of Jesus Christ in heaven. Heaven is the model; the resurrection and the ascension are representative of the procedure. Christ's authority in history was guaranteed by the resurrection. He told the disciples in the Great Commission that all power had been transferred to Him. "And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth" (Matt. 28:18–20).² This was manifested symbolically by the ascension.

Paul tells readers and listeners that they are responsible before God for working out their salvation with fear and trembling (v. 12). What is the meaning of this? Christians are in a situation analogous to the situation Jesus Christ was in during his earthly ministry. This was His period of subordination; it is also our period of subordination. Jesus said that the apostles would judge the 12 tribes of Israel. "And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me; That ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Luke 22:29–30).³ Paul said that the church will judge the angels. "Know ye not that we shall judge angels? how much more things that pertain to this life" (I Cor. 6:3)?⁴ But these acts of judgment are beyond history. In the present, the church is in a position of subordination. It is required to move toward dominion. This is the requirement of the Great Commission. We are to preach the gospel to all men, as the procedure to bring all mankind under the authority of Jesus Christ. We are to do this on the basis of Christ's command that we should disciple the nations. This is comprehensive

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 48. Kenneth L. Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/GentryGGC>)

3. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012) ch. 51.

4. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 6.

dominion.⁵

C. Our Salvation

When Paul says that we are to work out our salvation with fear and trembling, he is assuredly not saying that we are to work hard in order to attain salvation. He specifically says that we are to work out our salvation. This indicates that his listeners had already made the transition from death to life. This is taught specifically in John 3. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him" (v. 36). When covenant-keepers work out their salvation with fear and trembling, they are working out that which is already theirs. Salvation has been transferred to them definitively. They are to work it out progressively. They will see the culmination of their lives' efforts at the final judgment. So, salvation is definitive, progressive, and final. When Paul says that we are to work out our salvation, he means we are to work out the salvation which is ours.

He did not teach works religion. He did teach the doctrine of sanctification. Sanctification is the process of applying biblical principles to specific actions and situations. Sanctification is also definitive, progressive, and final. We are to work out the implications of Christ's moral perfection, which is transferred to us at the moment of salvation.⁶

This is the model for dominion. We have been granted definitively the inheritance. This is the inheritance of the whole world.⁷ But we are not authorized by God to go out and claim this inheritance through force of arms or legal declaration. We are to subdue the earth through the steady implementation of the ethical principles set forth in the Mosaic law and the New Testament. Three centuries ago, this self-discipline was called casuistry. It meant the application of general moral principles to specific situations. Christian casuistry faded after 1700.⁸ It was replaced by a secular form of casuistry, in which general legal and ethical principles of the Enlightenment were used to restructure the social boundaries of Western civilization.

5. Gentry, Greatness of the Great Commission.

6. John Murray, "Sanctification," in The Collected Works of John Murray, 4 vols. (London: Banner of Truth Trust, 1981), vol. 2.

7. Psalms 25:13; 37:9, 11, 22; Matthew 5:5.

8. Kenneth E. Kirk, Conscience and Its Problems: An Introduction to Casuistry (Philadelphia: WJK, [1927] 1999), Pt. IV, ch. 6.

As we subdue ourselves through self-government under biblical law, through empowerment by the Holy Spirit, we extend the kingdom of God inward. But, because we are in the world, we must extend the kingdom of God outward. We extend it to all things that are under our authority. We are under God; we are over nature. We are betwixt and between. We are representatives of God before nature, and we are representatives of nature before God. We are therefore mediators of the kingdom of God.

This is the structure of biblical authority. This is how Christians are supposed to fulfill the terms of the original dominion covenant between God and Adam. We are also to fulfill the terms of the Great Commission. The Great Commission provides our marching orders.

Working out the implications of our salvation means that we are simultaneously working out the Great Commission. When we bring ourselves under God's rule, we are necessarily extending our own rule over His creation. Self-government under biblical law is the basis of Christian dominion in history.

Conclusion

Hierarchy is basic to all existence. Man exercises dominion over the creation as a steward under God. History is a testing period in which men demonstrate their ability to extend the kingdom of God. The final judgment elevates some men and curses others in terms of their performance, as the parable of the talents reveals (Matt. 25:14–30).⁹

Jesus served as the second Adam. "And so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit" (I Cor. 15:45). He, like Adam, was subordinate in history. He, unlike Adam, did not forfeit His inheritance through sin (Rom. 5). Through His inheritance, covenant-keepers also inherit. They are supposed to imitate Paul. "Brethren, be followers together of me, and mark them which walk so as ye have us for an ensample" (Phil. 3:17). "Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ" (I Cor. 11:1).¹⁰

Dominion is through subordination. It leads to exaltation. It is all by God's grace.

9. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 47.

10. North, Judgment and Dominion, ch. 14.

21

PROGRESS AND PRIZE

I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus (Phil. 3:14).

This issue was sanctions, point four of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. Self-Improvement

Paul speaks here of his motivation for constant self-improvement. He has as his mark a prize. It is a prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. Presumably, this means that Jesus' ministry is the model that Paul uses to assess the success or failure in his own efforts. The theologian would say that Christ's perfect humanity is the standard.

The problem here is perfection. Paul uses the word "perfection" in this passage in two ways. First, there is perfection in the sense of no flaws. It is the sense of perfection announced here: "Be perfect, even as your father in heaven is perfect" (Matt. 5:48). We are called by God to be perfect. But we are not perfect. Paul denies that he is perfect. He has not attained perfection.

Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect: but I follow after, if that I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus. Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended: but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus (Phil. 3:12–14).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

All attempts at perfection will fail in history. The doctrine of original sin guarantees this. James wrote: "For whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all" (James 2:10). So, Paul speaks here of perfection in a second sense: great accomplishments by self-disciplined covenant-keepers.

Let us therefore, as many as be perfect, be thus minded: and if in any thing ye be otherwise minded, God shall reveal even this unto you. Nevertheless, whereto we have already attained, let us walk by the same rule, let us mind the same thing. Brethren, be followers together of me, and mark them which walk so as ye have us for an ensample (Phil. 3:15–17).

In two places in other epistles, Paul speaks of perfection in the sense of maturity.

Howbeit we speak wisdom among them that are perfect: yet not the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world, that come to nought (I Cor. 2:6).

Epaphras, who is one of you, a servant of Christ, saluteth you, always labouring fervently for you in prayers, that ye may stand perfect and complete in all the will of God (Col. 4:12).

B. Sanctification

Here we have an application of the doctrine of sanctification.² There are three aspects of sanctification. First, there is definitive sanctification. This is perfection. This is the moral perfection of Jesus Christ. It is imputed by God's grace to covenant-keepers. There is nothing lacking in Christ's perfection.

Second, there is progressive sanctification. This is the product of self-discipline under God's law. The individual covenant-keeper uses God's law as a standard for decision-making in this life. The individual steadily improves his ability to apply God's perfect moral standards to his decision-making. This is the art of casuistry: the application of general moral principles to specific cases. Progressive sanctification marks the individual who strives through his life to imitate Christ. This is what Paul means when he speaks of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. He presses toward the mark. He has not attained the perfection of Jesus Christ. He does not expect to attain it. But he uses it as a standard as he presses toward it.

2. John Murray, "Sanctification," in The Collected Writings of John Murray, 4 vols. (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth, 1980), vol. 2.

Third there is final sanctification. This comes at the end of an individual's life. This is the final judgment of the individual by God. He assesses the extent to which the individual has approached the standard of perfection of Jesus Christ. This means that there are various degrees of performance. There are winners and losers in the process of sanctification. Some people produce only wood, hay, and stubble. Other people produce gold. Wood, hay, and stubble do not survive the fiery test of final judgment. Nevertheless, the individual covenant-keeper does enter heaven.

According to the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise masterbuilder, I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon. For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ. Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire (I Cor. 3:10–15).³

When Paul speaks of pressing toward the high calling of God in Jesus Christ, he is talking about self-discipline under God's law. Progressive sanctification is the working out of one's own salvation. Salvation is granted by God. It is not earned by the recipient of God's grace. It was earned by Jesus Christ in His earthly ministry. His perfection is imputed judicially to the covenant-keeper. This is entirely an act of God's grace. This is definitive sanctification. So, in one sense the individual already possesses perfection. In another sense, he does not possess it. There is progress in sanctification.

This passage is one of the two most prominent passages in which Paul speaks of this process of personal sanctification. In another passage, possibly more famous, he speaks of running the good race. "Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain. And every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible. I therefore so run, not as uncertainly; so fight I, not as one that beateth the air" (I Cor. 9:24–26).

3. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 3.

This doctrine of progressive sanctification applies to the individual covenant-keeper. Paul does not say it here, but Deuteronomy 28:1–14 teaches that it applies socially as well. Moses and the prophets insisted that the same process of progressive sanctification applies to covenantal institutions. There is progressive sanctification for collective groups. This is why the prophets came before the people of Israel and Judah and reminded them that the entire nation faced the external sanctions of God. The Israelites faced the famous trio of war, famine, and plague. To this was added captivity. Nevertheless, the prophets also said that, after the period of captivity, the nation would be restored to the land. God would still deal with them as covenantal people by dealing with them in a corporate sense: the people of God.

Paul sets forth here his personal example for our covenant-keeping: the process of progressive personal sanctification. This is an affirmation of the possibility of personal progress in history. It is not just a possibility; it is a moral imperative. Because it is a moral imperative for individuals, it is also a moral imperative for the covenantal corporate institutions to which covenant-keepers belong. It is a moral imperative for families, churches, and civil governments.

C. Moses on Progress

Moses in Deuteronomy 28:1–14 set forth the biblical doctrine of social progress.⁴ This progress in history is tied to biblical law. Moses said that there can be progress in history because of the blessings of God in response to men's faithful adherence to His law. This passage was the most comprehensive assertion of the idea of progress in the ancient world.

Paul was aware of the Mosaic idea of progress. He was equally aware that progress individually is dependent upon adherence to a fixed standard of ethics: biblical law. Elsewhere, Paul used the Mosaic law to list those sins that mark covenant-breaking.

Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived: neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind, Nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God (I Cor. 6:9–10).⁵

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

5. North, Judgment and Dominion, ch. 7.

Knowing this, that the law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners, for unholy and profane, for murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, for manslayers, For whoremongers, for them that defile themselves with mankind, for menstealers, for liars, for perjured persons, and if there be any other thing that is contrary to sound doctrine (I Tim. 1:9–10).⁶

He calls upon his readers and listeners to press on to the mark of the high calling of God in Jesus Christ. In other words, he calls on his listeners and readers to follow a program of personal progress in history. This is a testimony to the importance of history. This is a high calling. It is a standard that calls forth covenantally faithful responses. In every area of his life, a covenant-keeper is to pursue the mark of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. In no area of his life is he not to pursue this standard.

Paul calls the individual to comprehensive sanctification. He is speaking of progressive sanctification, but he is also speaking of definitive sanctification, which is the gift of God to covenant-keepers. In other passages, he speaks of the final judgment.⁷ This is where the standard that was established by Jesus Christ's ministry in history is used by God to assess the performance of individual covenant-keepers.

D. Biblical Social Theory

Paul does not speak here of corporate progressive sanctification. Moses never spoke of final judgment. So, it is the combination of the Old Testament and the New Testament which makes it possible for covenant-keepers to develop a comprehensive social theory that is explicitly biblical. It is the doctrine of God's imposition of covenantal positive sanctions in response to covenantal faithfulness that makes possible the doctrine of progress. It is God's covenantal faithfulness in rewarding individuals' covenantal faithfulness that testifies to the existence of His covenant. "And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth. But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day" (Deut. 8:17–18).⁸ It is therefore imperative that

6. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), p. 45.

7. Romans 2:3; 2:5; 14:10; I Cor. 15:24, II Corinthians 5:10.

8. North, Inheritance and Dominion, chaps. 21, 22.

covenant-keepers believe that God will predictably reward covenant-keeping, and will also predictably punish covenant-breaking. God does this with individuals; God does this with covenantal institutions: family, church, and state.

Theologians have argued for centuries that there is a possibility of progressive sanctification for the individual covenant-keeper. They have also argued that there is a possibility of progressive sanctification for the church. This is why theologians work to improve confessions of faith. They believe that the creeds of the early church were accurate, but they were incomplete. They were necessary, but not sufficient. Theologians believe that there has been progress in confessional clarity and rigor.

Pastors affirm that there can be progress in family government. Pastors counsel husbands, wives, and children in an attempt to put them back on track. This is another way of saying that they are put on track to pursue the mark of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

Then, without explanation, theologians and pastors draw the line at civil government. They insist that there is no explicitly biblical standard for civil government. They insist that there are no uniquely biblical criteria by which God evaluates the progress of civil government in history. They insist that God does not judge civil governments in terms of Bible-revealed law, by which He judges individuals, churches, and families. Somehow, God does not establish and reveal laws governing civil government, even though He has established and has revealed laws regarding self-government, church government, and family government. Although churches, families, and civil governments are regarded by covenant theologians as covenantal institutions, the theologians, other than the theonomists, argue that biblical law applies only to the covenants of the family and the church. Theologians do not explain why this is the case. They simply assume it in this, the era of democracy.⁹

What is said here of individual progress applies also to all the other areas of life. It is clear from Deuteronomy 28:1–14 that there is progress in society, because God faithfully and predictably rewards covenant-keeping with blessings. In Deuteronomy 28:15–68, Moses announced that God faithfully and predictably burdens covenant-breaking with negative sanctions. So, over time, covenant-keepers get richer, while covenant-breakers get poorer by comparison. In a biblical social order, covenant-breakers can get rich and extend their riches to succeeding generations only by adhering to the legal standards that God has revealed in his Bible, standards which govern individuals, families, churches, and civil governments. Only to the extent that covenant-breakers become imitation covenant-keepers can they continue to progress in history.¹⁰

9. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/polpol>)

The problem is, the overwhelming majority of theologians, pastors, and Christian social commentators have rejected the Mosaic law, and they have also rejected Deuteronomy 28. So, they have no uniquely biblical doctrine of progress for society as a whole. Their theology testifies against any such concept of long-term progress. So, when they look back at the history of Western civilization, they cannot explain the existence of progress, especially compound economic growth and technological development that appeared around 1750.

Because they do not believe that there are biblical standards governing compound growth, they explain compound growth (if they explain it at all) in terms of society's adherence to laws other than biblical law. This puts them in the position of affirming the productivity of Enlightenment humanism. It is not simply that Scottish Enlightenment humanists, because of their Christian background, imported the conclusions of biblical law and baptized them in the name of man's autonomous reason. Enlightenment humanists have gained access to common standards of law, which are supposedly available to covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers alike. They have applied these universal standards to society's institutions. Theologians become adherents of an idea that the humanists dearly love: the idea of judicial and moral neutrality.

It should not be surprising that humanists, who seek to break what they regard as the strangle hold of Christianity on Western civilization, should adopt such a view of autonomous civil law. It should be very surprising that the overwhelming majority of Christians social thinkers, theologians, and pastors have also adopted the same theory of natural law that Enlightenment humanists adopted and maintained until Darwin's theory of evolution destroyed their faith in natural law.¹¹ But this is an old, old story. The early Church fathers adopted Greek rationalism as the standard of ethics and logic, rather than biblical revelation.¹²

10. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcg>)

11. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), Appendix A.

Conclusion

If we are to establish Christian economics, we must discover an explicitly biblical standard of success and failure, of right and wrong, of progress and retrogression. We must go to the Bible in search of the standards which we seek to apply in these specific institutions that govern society. This is what Christian social thinkers, Christian political scientists, Christian economists, Christian educators, Christian sociologists, Christian psychologists, and Christian theologians generally have denied is legitimate ever since the early decades of the Enlightenment in the late seventeenth century.

12. Cornelius Van Til, A Christian Theory of Knowledge (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1969), ch. 4.

22

THE ENTREPRENEUR'S EDGE

Be careful for nothing; but in every thing by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus (Phil. 4:6–7).

This passage had to do with answers to prayer: causality. This is point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Full of Care

This is one of the most optimistic passages in the Bible. It is also among the most difficult to apply personally. Christians know that they should apply it, but they find that it is almost impossible to apply on a systematic basis. It is probably even more difficult to do this than it is to lose weight and keep it off for five years. In short, it is very difficult.

Paul is instructing people regarding cause and effect in this world. He does not deny that there are crises that strike an individual in which the typical response is anxiety. People are prone to worry. Jesus repeatedly warned His followers about this.

Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment (Matt. 6:25)?²

Which of you by taking thought can add one cubit unto his stature

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 14.

(Matt. 6:27)?

And why take ye thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin (Matt. 6:28).

Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed (Matt. 6:31)?

Take therefore no thought for the morrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof (Matt. 6:34).

The Greek word translated as “thought” is used by Paul here. The translators used “careful.” Modern usage has changed. Being careful means taking care. This is not the meaning of the Greek word. A better translation would be “full of care.” We are to be full of care about nothing. This does not mean not to take care. Because we are not full of care, we are supposed to be able to take even better care.

Paul says “in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving”—meaning thanksgiving in advance—“let your requests be made known under God.” We are to be so confident about the outcome of our prayers that we are told to rejoice in advance regarding the outcome. This is an extreme form of confidence regarding the future and regarding God’s absolute sovereignty over the affairs of this life.

B. Sovereignty and Confidence

The main reason why covenant-keepers are not supposed to worry about the future is because God is in control of the future. Paul asserts this passionately in Romans 9. He tells us in Romans 8 that all things work together for good to those who love God and are called according to his purpose” (Rom. 8:28).³ So, because God is in control of all things, and because He has providentially determined that all things work for the benefit of His people, worry is a form of denial. It either denies that God is completely in control of all events, or else it denies that all things work together for the benefit of covenant-keepers. It does not matter which of these premises the individual denies. He is challenging what Paul specifically teaches about God.

With respect to God’s being in complete control over everything, Paul’s words in Romans 9 are the strongest that can be found in the

3. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012, ch. 6.

Bible.

For this is the word of promise, At this time will I come, and Sarah shall have a son. And not only this; but when Rebecca also had conceived by one, even by our father Isaac; (For the children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of him that calleth;) It was said unto her, The elder shall serve the younger. As it is written, Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated. What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid. For he saith to Moses, I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion. So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy. For the scripture saith unto Pharaoh, Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might shew my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth. Thou wilt say then unto me, Why doth he yet find fault? For who hath resisted his will? Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour? What if God, willing to shew his wrath, and to make his power known, endured with much longsuffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction: And that he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, which he had afore prepared unto glory, Even us, whom he hath called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles (Rom. 9:9–24)?

With respect to all things working together for the good of covenant-keepers, Romans 8 is probably the strongest statement found in the Bible. “And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose (v. 28). So, combining Romans 8 and Romans 9, we are led inescapably to a conclusion: the world is not a threat to covenant-keepers. If we number ourselves among covenant-keepers, then to worry about the future is a practical rejection of our confidence in the truth of what Paul taught about sovereignty of God and the sanctions of God.

Paul draws the proper conclusion from this passage. He says that we are not to be anxious about the future. When we are obedient to the standard, which is a standard of ethics, Paul says that the peace of God, which passes all understanding, will keep our hearts and minds through Christ Jesus. This is an affirmation regarding the peace of God. The peace of God is in stark contrast to the anxiety of man. People say that they are desirous of attaining peace of mind. Yet, in actual practice, people do worry about the future. People who worry about the future do not have peace of mind.

“The peace of God which passes understanding” is a phrase which is widespread in the United States. It is a phrase out of the New Testament that has been adopted by people who probably do not understand the theology of the New Testament. But they believe that the ideal in this life is the attainment of such peace that it passes human understanding. They acknowledge that such peace is available from God, but probably from nothing else. Why? Because men do not believe in a universe that is simultaneously autonomous from God and favorable to them. If it is autonomous, then it is impersonal. It shows no favor to anyone or anything. People worry about the fact that the universe, if not stacked against them, is surely not stacked for them. This is not what Paul teaches here. The common man who hears this phrase wants to appropriate it for himself, but he lacks the theological doctrines that alone would enable him to be legitimately confident that it is possible to attain the peace of God which passes understanding.

C. Entrepreneurship and Confidence

This passage is important for economic theory. Economic theory rests on a conception of man, the decision-maker. Men live in a universe of scarcity (Gen. 3:17–19).⁴ That is to say, at zero price, there is more demand for most goods than there is supply of them. Men must therefore labor to overcome the limits of economic scarcity. Men must decide how to allocate the goods they own, which include physical labor and mental labor, in their attempt to better their condition.

If Paul is correct about not being full of care about the future, then those individuals who have not only accepted the truth of this doctrine but who have systematically applied it in their psychological lives, have a great advantage over those who do not believe it, and also those who do believe it but who have not learned to apply it in their lives. People who are optimistic about the future are more likely to become entrepreneurs. Entrepreneurs are those people who forecast the future state of affairs and then make plans to meet those new conditions at the lowest possible price. They profit from the difference between (1) what they pay for the goods and services that they use to produce additional goods and services for that future market and (2) the selling price of their final products. If they buy low and sell high, they gain an entrepreneurial profit.

4. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

Someone who believes that the world is not stacked against him, but is actually stacked in his favor, is more likely to invest time, resources, and emotional energy in projects that are aimed at meeting customer demand in the future. An individual who is not afraid of the future is more likely to overcome the almost universal barrier to entry against entrepreneurship: fear of failure. The fear of failure paralyzes people, so they refuse to buy low. They are afraid to buy low because they really do not believe that they will find themselves in a position where they can sell high. So, wanting to avoid the embarrassment and economic loss of not being able to sell high, they refuse to buy low. They do not buy at all.

Optimism is an important element in the psychological makeup of a successful entrepreneur. Optimism overcomes the fear of failure. Even when entrepreneurs fail, they have a tendency to try again. They are confident enough about the future so that they conclude that their immediate failure is simply a steppingstone to future success. They do not regard failure as some kind of cosmic testimony against them, their plans, and their abilities. They regard failure much in the same way that a smart student regards an error on a midterm examination. It is a motivation for the student to study harder and thereby get a higher grade on the final examination.

Whenever someone is presented with an opportunity to invest in something that the salesman says will produce an above-market rate of return, the first thing that the prospective investor should ask himself is this: "What is the barrier to entry?" If there is no barrier to entry, then other investors will see the opportunity, make the investment, and lower the rate of return. If lots of investors are going into the producer goods markets in order to buy the goods to sell at a higher price later, the price of consumer goods will rise because of competition, and the price of future producer goods will fall because of competition. Competition acts to raise producer prices and reduce consumer prices. This reduces entrepreneurial profit.

So, the successful entrepreneur rejoices in the fact that his potential competitors have a fear of failure. This is the barrier to entry that offers him the opportunity to invest in something that will produce an above-market rate of return.

Paul's advice, when taken seriously, grants to covenant-keepers an advantage in every competitive market. They can act in confidence. They can plan for success in the future because they are not afraid of the future. They are convinced that God has already chosen them to be recipients of the special grace of faith in Jesus Christ. Because God has granted them the unique special grace of salvation, they should have much less fear about the future. If God has granted them the unique gift of salvation, surely He is not opposed to them. Surely, he is not laying traps for them.

When these same people understand that their entrepreneurial ventures in overcoming the uncertainties of this life are to be aimed at extending the kingdom of God in history, they have an additional competitive advantage. Not only is the world not stacked against them, God is in favor of what they are doing, because their goal is to extend His kingdom in history. God tells people to build His kingdom. This means that they must take steps in the present in order to increase their output. They need to increase their output and to invest more wisely, so that they will not waste resources, including the precious, irreplaceable resource of their time, in order to extend the kingdom of God at the expense of the kingdom of Satan.

The entrepreneur should pray with the same fervency that Jesus said that a demanding widow who seeks justice from an unjust judge who refuses to hear her case should persist. She keeps coming back to the judge to ask that he settle her case (Luke 18:1–6).⁵ Entrepreneurs should be masters of fervent prayer. They should see this spiritual discipline as granting them a competitive advantage against those entrepreneurs who do not believe in God, who do not believe that God answers prayer, and who do not believe that God has sovereignly stacked the deck in favor of them.

Conclusion

Whenever Paul's words are taken seriously, and whenever covenant-keepers self-consciously discipline their emotions to accept the truth of what Paul says here, the church of Jesus Christ is granted an enormous advantage over all rival kingdoms. The church is then filled with individuals who are confident about the future, because they are confident that God is absolutely sovereign over the future, and that He has predestined the universe so as to benefit all those who are covenantally bound to Him. When men believe that the universe is totally personal, and the person in charge of the universe is the God of the Bible—the God to whom they are committed covenantally—they legitimately can apply Paul's words here to their lives. When they do, setbacks are not a threat to them, and when setbacks occur, covenant-keepers shrug them off and continue in their endeavors. This is how the kingdom of God is supposed to be extended in history.

5. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 42.

23

CONTENTMENT WITHOUT COMPLACENCY

Not that I speak in respect of want: for I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content. I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound: every where and in all things I am instructed both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need. I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me (Phil. 4:11–13).

This passage dealt with sanctions: results in history.¹

A. Contentment

This passage is an extension of Paul's previous warning against fear. "Be careful for nothing; but in every thing by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4:6–7).² Because fear regarding the future is a form of rebellion against God, then a person should learn to be content with whatever the future brings. This is what Paul asserts in this verse.

Paul from time to time was in great need. He says elsewhere that he had suffered on many occasions for the sake of the gospel (I Cor. 11:24–26). It is difficult for us to understand how he could be content in a time of great suffering and persecution. Yet this is what he says is his constant mental condition. Whatever takes place is acceptable to him. No matter what kinds of difficulties he faces, he is content.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Chapter 22.

This is a hard saying. This epistle is full of hard sayings. People from time to time find themselves in situations in which they are discontented. The idea of contentment in the face of a personal disaster is difficult to accept. Is Paul fully rational? In what sense does he assert that he is content in every situation? Does he mean that when he is in a difficult situation, he does not pray to be delivered out of this situation? In another passage, he says that we must pray without ceasing. “Rejoice evermore. Pray without ceasing. In every thing give thanks: for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you” (I Thes. 5:16–18). In this passage, these seeming contradictory goals appear: rejoicing, prayer, thankfulness. What about prayer? Jesus taught regarding prayer that an individual should be like a widow who seeks justice from an unjust judge. She continually harasses him until he renders judgment. Jesus was teaching that an individual should ask for something repeatedly when he prays to God (Luke 18:1–6).³ How is it that a person who is fully content with his circumstances should spend time nagging God for deliverance?

B. The Doctrine of Predestination

To make sense of these apparently conflicting teachings about prayer and contentment, we have to think through the implications of what Paul’s doctrine of predestination is. In Romans 9 and Ephesians 1, Paul taught a comprehensive doctrine of God’s predestination of all things in history. When a person accepts the doctrine of predestination, and when he also accepts Paul’s doctrine that all things happen for the good of those who love God and who are called according to his purpose (Rom. 8:28),⁴ he begins to come to grips with Paul’s doctrine of contentment. Contentment is the acceptance of the idea that God is completely in charge of all things. God arranges all things to benefit those who are covenantally committed to Him. This being the case, it would be inconsistent to be discontented in the sense of regarding history as somehow hostile to covenant-keepers, or at least indifferent to covenant-keepers. Paul asserts the opposite. God is always interested in covenant-keepers and their work. He favors them in everything that happens to them.

If God is completely in charge of all things, and if all things work together for good for covenant-keepers, then covenant-keepers should be content with whatever happens to them. This does not mean that they should be satisfied with conditions whenever these conditions can be changed to conform more closely to the outcome that God has revealed as His preference. God through Moses announced that covenant-keeping societies will experience the blessings of God (Deut. 28:1–14).⁵ When covenant-keepers find themselves in a condition in which they are not experiencing the kinds of blessings listed in Deuteronomy 28:1–14, they should pray that they be delivered out of the circumstances which are contrary to the blessings presented in this passage. They should pray and work so as to call forth the blessings of God.

3. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 42.

4. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

The blessings may be delayed for many reasons. One of the reasons is simply that God wishes to find out how committed His people are to achieving the extension of the kingdom of God in history. There is widespread resistance to God's kingdom. There was also widespread resistance to Christ's ministry. This is normal. But it is not normative. The goal is to overcome this resistance.

C. Complacency

When Paul says that he is content, he does not mean that he is complacent about his surroundings. He would rather see covenant-keepers in authority than covenant-breakers. He would rather see the blessings of God on covenantally faithful societies than see the persecution of covenantally faithful societies. But he is not discontented in the sense that he believes that the world is structured so as to bring negative sanctions against widespread covenant-keeping, and to bring positive sanctions for widespread covenant-breaking.

The Psalmist declared that he had been confused and dismayed by the fact that evil men prospered, and righteous men did not (Ps. 73). But, later in the psalm, he concluded that the good times that evil men experience serve as a slippery slope for them. It confirms them in the evil that they do. At some point, God will bring negative sanctions against evil-doing and evildoers. So, the fact that, for a time, covenant-breakers prosper and covenant-keepers suffer should not discourage us.⁶

Paul is saying that he is content with good times and bad, with

5. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 68.

6. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 17.

blessings and with cursings, because his work is governed by the presupposition that God is in charge of everything, and that He works all things so that good becomes the inheritance of covenant-keepers. *The universe is stacked against covenant-breakers, and it is stacked in favor of covenant-keepers. The universe is not impersonal.*⁷ It is the creation of God, and this God is providentially sovereign. He works out all things according to his decree. This gives Paul comfort in good times and bad. He can be content with the sovereignty of God, even though he would prefer to receive blessings rather than cursings. What never occurs to him is to imagine that God in some way is being thwarted by His creation. That idea would lead to enormous discontent. It would lead to a concept of a god who is incapable of bringing to pass every aspect of his decree on time, as scheduled. It would lead to a concept of a god who is not completely clear about the outcome of his decree and his intervention in history.

D. Dissatisfaction and Economic Theory

Ludwig von Mises constructed his economic system on the ostensibly universal principle of human action. He said that action is always an exchange of one set of conditions in the expectation of achieving a better set of conditions. He wrote: "Action is an attempt to substitute a more satisfactory state of affairs for a less satisfactory one. We call such a willfully induced alteration an exchange. A less desirable condition is bartered for a more desirable."⁸ He extended this insight for hundreds of pages. The bedrock presupposition of his economic theory is that men are dissatisfied with their present conditions, and so they seek to attain more preferable conditions through a series of exchanges.

There is nothing in the writings of the Apostle Paul that indicate that Mises' conception of an exchange of conditions is inaccurate. Paul presented the extension of the kingdom of God in history as taking place at the expense of the kingdom of Satan: a zero-sum contest. Paul's concept of history is one in which covenant-keepers, through covenantal faithfulness and hard work, endeavor to exchange one set of conditions for a better set of conditions. The first set of conditions is characterized by a world in which there is widespread coven-

7. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1.

8. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), p. 97. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

ant-breaking. The second set of conditions is characterized by a world in which covenant-keeping is dominant in every area of life.

Paul believed in comprehensive redemption.⁹ He believed that the life, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ in history were the foundations of a comprehensive program of evangelism. Evangelism brings the good news of Christ's deliverance from death unto life. Evangelism is based on dissatisfaction regarding the effects of sin in every area of life. So, while it is legitimate to speak of dissatisfaction regarding present conditions, Paul would say that it is illegitimate to be discontented with the prevailing conditions. Such discontentment with existing conditions is accompanied by an attitude of despair, or resentment, regarding the sovereignty of God in its present outworking in history.

For Paul, discontentment meant that a person believes that his present circumstances are somehow unjust. A person resents the injustice of it all. This is ultimately an attitude of rebellion against God. It is an attitude grounded on the assumption that a human being is better qualified to assess the good or evil of particular circumstances without reference to the sovereignty of God. Such discontentment is a mark of self-proclaimed autonomy. This was Job's complaint against God.¹⁰ Paul was hostile to any assertion of human autonomy.

Economic theory should not begin with the presupposition of human autonomy. It should begin with the presupposition of the absolute sovereignty of God: first in creation, then in providence. Whenever economic theory begins with this presupposition, an economist can more accurately assess the likely outcomes of covenant-keeping and covenant-breaking. He can assess the results of economic behavior in terms of a system of cause and effect.

In contrast to the covenant-keeper is the covenant-breaker. The covenant-breaker sees the universe as stacked against him, or governed by impersonal forces, or dependent upon the unpredictable favor of Lady Luck, or in bondage to impersonal fate. When he looks around him, even when things are going well, he cannot safely trust the universe. He sees it either as uncaring regarding him and mankind or else hostile. No matter how successful he has been so far, he lives in a world of uncertainty. This uncertainty exists within a framework of cosmic impersonalism. Cosmic forces can turn against him at any time for an unpredictable reason. So, a man is tempted severely by the lure of discontent. He may think he can buy his way out of discontentment. This is an illusion. The universe cannot be bought off. The person who does not believe in complete cosmic personalism may believe that there are forces in the universe that can be harnessed temporarily, or placated temporarily, but he ultimately believes that the universe is either indifferent to him or against him. He has no legitimate reason for confidence in any belief that the universe is personal and also favorable to his efforts to extend his own kingdom in history.

9. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), Appendix C. (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

10. Gary North, Predictability and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Job (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

The faithful covenant-keeper is in a better position psychologically to take entrepreneurial risks than the covenant-breaker. The covenant-keeper believes that his attempt to extend the kingdom of God in history, by way of covenantal faithfulness to biblical law, will be pleasing to God, and in the long run will lead to success. Success is defined as one's participation in the extension of the kingdom of God in history. Paul believed in this kind of contentment. It is not a naive contentment. It is not the contentment of Dr. Pangloss. It is not a belief that this world cannot be improved because it is already perfect. Even Adam would not have made that false assumption. While the world was ethically perfect, it was incomplete. He had an assignment to dress and guard the garden. History is always an arena of competition between good and evil. It is arena in which covenant-keepers seek to extend the kingdom of God in history, and covenant-breakers seek to resist and overcome any such extension.

Conclusion

Christian economics must begin with the concept of an absolutely sovereign God whose word does not return to Him void.¹¹ This outlook produces contentment. With this as a presupposition, covenant-keepers can work to extend the kingdom of God in history. They should pursue profits rather than losses. They should pursue health rather than sickness. They should pursue riches rather than poverty. But these riches must always be seen in terms of performance in a personal universe that is governed by the law of God. Riches in this perspective are covenantal blessings for faithfulness to covenantal law. Riches are not to be pursued for their own sake; they are to be pursued as success indicators of the most efficient procedures for the extension of the kingdom of God in history.

11. "So shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth: it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it" (Isa. 55:11).

It is not a sign of discontentment that a covenant-keeper pursues profits rather than losses, health rather than sickness, riches rather than poverty. He is not resentful against God for losses, sickness, or poverty. He sees room for improvement. We must distinguish between (1) contentment regarding the prevailing level of blessings and curses and (2) complacency with this level. The first is mandatory; the second is prohibited. Discontentment indicates resentment against God for the prevailing conditions. Complacency indicates an acceptance of the prevailing conditions, on the assumption that these conditions cannot be improved by covenant-keeping. Both attitudes indicate rebellion against God.

The correct attitude is contentment in the sense of confidence in opportunities to improve conditions. This should have characterized Adam in the garden. Instead, Adam became discontented. He saw the prevailing conditions as evidence of God's malevolence in not allowing him low-cost access to the knowledge of good and evil. He saw his environment as hostile to his self-realization. He was prohibited from exchanging one set of conditions for another.

Exchanging conditions is legitimate. The desire to exchange conditions is inherent in the dominion covenant: to exercise dominion as God's agent. The deciding covenantal questions are these: (1) In whose name? (2) By whose authority? (3) By what standard? (4) By which sanctions? (5) To what end?

24

SUPERNATURAL CAPITAL

Whereunto I also labour, striving according to his working, which worketh in me mightily (Col. 1:29).

This referred to dependence on God: hierarchy, point two of the biblical covenant.¹

A. The Source of Strength

This verse reinforces Paul's statement: "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me" (Phil. 4:13).² This is an affirmation that his labor is not in vain. He affirms that he works hard. He struggles in his efforts. He attributes the energy he possesses to the work of Christ in his life. He says that Christ works through him.

This is a remarkable affirmation. He is saying that the resurrected Christ, sitting at the right hand of God the Father (Col. 3:1),³ is actively intervening in his life to strengthen him, so that he can achieve his assigned tasks in history. He knows that he is an apostle (Col. 1:1). He knows that he has been specially called by Christ to serve Him (Acts 9:3–7). He sees himself as a servant who has been assigned tasks in life that must be fulfilled as a matter of faithful stewardship. The problem is this: he does not have sufficient strength within himself to complete the work that has been assigned to him by God. He says here that Christ works within him. This is an affirmation of divine intervention in his life.

This is a powerful testimony regarding a person's work in history.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. Chapter 23.

3. Chapter 25.

Paul is saying that he receives divine intervention in order to enable him to continue the struggle of his work. This is an affirmation of the legitimacy of his work. Otherwise, why would God intervene in Paul's life to enable him to achieve his tasks? Paul is arguing here that God supports him specially in his life's work. This gives meaning to his life's work.

B. Confidence

A covenant-keeper can call upon God to intervene directly into his own life in order to strengthen him in the fulfillment of his life's work. He can confidently accept work assignments from God that would otherwise be beyond his ability, power, and tenacity to fulfill. Because Paul was able to call upon God to intervene directly to strengthen him in his work, he was in a position to accept tasks that would normally would have been closed to him. He had greater courage in attempting a great deal because he believed that God directly intervened in his life to enable him to fulfill his tasks.

This moves the question of embarking on new projects back to the fundamental question: "What does God expect me to do?" Once an individual believes that he has insight into the nature of the task which God has assigned to him, he is then required to count the costs. Jesus made this clear in Luke 14:28–30.⁴ Here, Paul is saying that to count the costs correctly, the covenant-keeper must assess the cost-reduction factor of God's direct intervention in his life to strengthen him in his work. For the covenant-breaker, a similar task might prove to be beyond his ability to complete. He is not in a position to go before God and ask that God intervene in his life to strengthen him in order that he can fulfill his work. God specially intervened in Paul's life because Paul was doing the work of the kingdom. God respected this work, and He strengthened Paul in his efforts.

The covenant-breaker may believe that he has this kind of support, but it would be illegitimate for him to apply Paul's words in this verse to his own situation. He is not a covenantkeeper. He is not working to extend the kingdom of God in history. He is not working as a self-conscious servant of God, specially called by God, regenerated by God, and assigned specific tasks that are appropriate to his abilities. On the contrary, he is working at cross-purposes to God. He should not expect divine intervention to enable him to fulfill his work effectively.

4. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 35.

Because God intervenes in the lives of covenant-keepers to enable them to complete their life's work, God strengthens the hand of His followers. He enables them to achieve greater results than they would otherwise have been able to achieve on their own authority. God provides additional capital in the form of direct intervention to strengthen covenant-keepers in their fulfillment of their God-assigned responsibilities. He provides working capital, which in this case is capital for working, to those who are covenantally committed to Him. He is therefore making it possible for His followers to achieve more in history than can be achieved by those who oppose His kingdom. He is granting favorable terms of trade to His followers. They are enabled to achieve greater things in history, and therefore achieve greater positive sanctions in both history and eternity, than if they had been covenant-breakers.

C. A Tilted Battlefield

This passage indicates that God has tilted the battlefield in favor of covenant-keepers and therefore in favor of His own kingdom. This is not neutral competition between adherents of two equal deities. It is competition between the Creator and the created. It is competition between God and Satan, and therefore it is competition between those covenanted to God vs. those covenanted to Satan. In this competition, God has granted to covenant-keepers what covenant-breakers would call unfair advantages.

Because of modern eschatology, both premillennial and amillennial, most Christians believe that God has favored covenant-breakers in history. They believe that the church of Jesus Christ will be unsuccessful in preaching the gospel in all the world. They believe that the gospel message will not be accepted, ever, by the vast majority of people who hear it. They believe that even when people believe the message, they are unable to implement it in their own lives in a consistent way. They believe that covenant-keepers will be unable historically to extend the kingdom of God, as required by God. They believe, in short, that God has tilted the battlefield against them. They believe that the outcome of competition between covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers is inevitably going to favor covenant-breakers at the expense of covenant-keepers.⁵

5. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Chris-

When this outlook is widespread, covenant-keepers fear to accept greater responsibility, because they do not believe that they are competent to bear this responsibility. They do not believe that God directly intervenes in their lives to strengthen them in a supernatural way, so that they will be enabled to fulfill their specific assignments in history. Christians believe that those who are covenanted to Satan receive special advantages, presumably from Satan, but ultimately from God through Satan. They believe that no matter what God does to call people to serve Him and to extend His kingdom in history, He has stacked the deck in history against them. He has foreordained the defeat of his institutional church in history. Amillennialists state this explicitly. Premillennialists argue that it will take the direct intervention of Jesus Christ, returning to the earth, presumably with His angels, in order to subdue covenant-breakers and extend His kingdom in history. They do not believe that God has empowered covenant-keepers to extend the kingdom of God successfully in history on their own. Christians supposedly will require the direct physical presence of Jesus Christ in history in order for them to be able to fulfill their responsibilities in history.

Paul's statement here makes it clear that there is already direct supernatural intervention in the lives of covenant-keepers. There is no suggestion here, or anywhere else in Paul's epistles, that Jesus Christ must return in a perfect body, accompanied by angels, in order to replace covenant-breakers and therefore extend His kingdom in history. Such direct physical intervention in the processes of history, overcoming the processes of history by a supernatural discontinuity, is unnecessary if we believe Paul's words in this passage.

Conclusion

Paul affirms that God intervenes in his life to strengthen him in his work. Such an affirmation announces that God has reduced the cost of production for His people. When costs are reduced, there will be greater output. The specific cost reduction here is labor cost. God intervenes to subsidize His people in their efforts to extend God's kingdom in history. He has created an unlevel playing field, and He has assigned the advantage to His people. There is no neutrality here. There is surely no bias against His kingdom.

A SUPERNATURAL PERSPECTIVE

If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth (Col. 3:1–2).

The issue here was hierarchy: point two of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Hierarchy of Values

This passage refers to setting personal goals. To set goals, a person must have an initial perspective about what is important in this world. He must have a hierarchy of values.² He then assesses the resources available to him and prepares an allocation of assets according to this hierarchy of values.

Paul says that covenant-keepers have been raised up, analogous to Christ's resurrection and His ascension. "Even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ, (by grace ye are saved;) And hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus" (Eph. 2:5–6). He speaks here of Christ as sitting at the right hand of God. This refers to His ascension, not just His resurrection. God raised Christ up bodily at the resurrection, and He did this again at the ascension (Acts 1:9). This was a manifestation of God's supernatural power over temporal causality. It was also a demonstration of the special position of Jesus Christ in the decree of God. Paul is saying that covenant-keepers possess an analogous position to Christ's in the eyes of God. They have been raised up. They have not yet been bodily raised up, but he says elsewhere that this will take place at the end of time.³ Covenant-keepers have been raised up spiritually and judicially, just as Christ was raised up spiritually and judicially.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. Gary North, The Five Pillars of Biblical Success (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2008), ch. 2.

B. The Ascension as the Model

Paul is pointing to Christ's ascension as the model for Christian living. The ascension delivered Jesus Christ bodily into the presence of God. He now sits at the right hand of God, a position of great judicial authority. Paul is saying that, covenantally speaking, covenant-keepers have been raised up in a similar way. Because Christ is in heaven, sitting at the right hand of God the Father, covenant-keepers are supposed to keep their attention focused on Christ in His capacity as the ascended Son of God. In other words, they are to look to their Redeemer, who was raised up by God to sit at His right hand, and conclude that they possess analogous authority in history. They have been specially selected by God for resurrection and ascension. They are therefore to focus their attention on this final condition, rather than focusing their attention on the things of this world.

From the point of view of the covenant-keeper, the things of this world are tools for the construction of the kingdom of God in history. This extension of the kingdom of God in history, through time and across the face of the earth, is the temporal manifestation of the ascension of Christ to the right hand of God. He has been raised up; His disciples are to extend His kingdom outward. God has raised Christ up as a mark of his victory over the earth. God now calls His people to extend the kingdom of God throughout all the earth, throughout all of history, as a manifestation of the authority and power of Christ over the affairs of this world.

C. Things Above

When Paul says that we must think about things that are above, he is talking about three things. First, he is talking about the hope of each covenant-keeper that he will be brought into the judicial presence of God in heaven at the time of his death. Second, the covenant-keeper is to have hope that he will be resurrected from the dead and elevated into the skies. This is a manifestation of Christ's power over death.

3. I Corinthians 15:12–14, 35–44, 49–52.

The dead shall be raised first.⁴ But our goal is to return to earth after the final judgment to extend God's kingdom physically once again. This is the new heavens and a new earth in their final manifestation (Rev. 21:1). Third, the covenant-keeper is to focus on things above, because this is where the seat of judicial authority resides. Christ sits at the right hand of God; therefore, He possesses power over the affairs of this world. To the extent that covenant-keepers act faithfully according to the laws of God in history, they manifest Christ's rule over the cosmos. What they do in a small scale, Christ does on a large scale.

So, they must focus on things above, which means that they must focus on the source of their authority. They must not think about the fact that they are temporal and under the authority of covenant-breakers. Instead, they are to think of themselves as stewards of God, who operate under God's authority. This is an affirmation of victory. To the extent that covenant-keepers keep their minds focused on whatever is above, they gain greater optimism concerning their lifetime tasks. If Christ is sitting at the right hand of God the Father, and if they have been resurrected and have ascended spiritually and judicially in the presence of God, then they possess power in history. They can work out their salvation in fear and trembling,⁵ in the confidence that God, as the sovereign over all creation, is favorable to their efforts.

By focusing their attention on things above, they can better apply their attention to things below. They begin with thoughts about the implications of Christ's ascension to the right hand of God. They can keep in better perspective the meaning of their efforts in history to extend the kingdom of God. Confident that they participate judicially and covenantally in the victory of the ascended Christ over history, they gain greater confidence about their efforts in history. Because Christ was victorious over death in history, and ascended to the right hand of God in history, then history is under the authority of Christ. Therefore, in allocating resources, including time, to the task of subduing the earth for the glory of God, the covenant-keeper is in a position to assess the importance of his own actions. His actions attain meaning by way of their connection to the resurrection and the bodily ascension of Christ to the right hand of God.

4. "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first: Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord" (I Thes. 4:16–17).

5. Chapter 20.

When men understand that their efforts are not bounded by time, they gain greater confidence regarding the effects of their efforts in time. Because their efforts are assessed in terms of a hierarchy in which Jesus Christ is sitting at the right hand of God the Father, their efforts take on much greater meaning. Their efforts are not limited to effects in history. Their efforts' meaning extends to eternity. This gives covenant-keepers a psychological advantage over covenant-breakers. Covenant-keepers have confidence that Christ, who sits at the right hand of God, favors their efforts. Because they focus on Christ's position at the right hand of God, they can subsequently focus their attention on historical matters from the perspective of the sovereignty of God over history. The God who raised up Jesus bodily and then raised Him to heaven is in charge of the affairs of this world. So, covenant-keepers can act in confidence, knowing that the enforcement of God's law in history resides in heaven.

Conclusion

The hierarchy of values begins with a hierarchy of authority. The hierarchy of authority that Paul describes here is cosmic authority. Covenant-keepers can have confidence that they are being backed up by someone like themselves. That person descended into history, overcame death, and was raised to a realm outside of history. Jesus Christ was in history, but He was not of history. We are therefore, covenantally speaking, also in history, but not of history. We gain our authority from above history. This elevates our goals, whenever our goals are elevated, above the affairs of this world. This is why Paul says to focus on things that are above. In doing so, we appropriate for ourselves a level of motivation that covenant-breakers do not legitimately possess.

THE REWARD OF THE INHERITANCE

And whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God and the Father by him (Col. 3:17).

And whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord, and not unto men; Knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance: for ye serve the Lord Christ. But he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons (Col. 3:23–25).

The issue here was sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Hierarchical Service

Paul directs his commands to Christians in general. The context of these passages is hierarchical service. Children are to serve their parents (v. 20); servants are to serve their masters (v. 22). He tells servants not to act as pleasers of men, but to act as pleasers of God (v. 22).

1. Ownership and Stewardship

He then tells the servant to work heartily. If a servant is to work with enthusiasm in the household of another man, then how much more should we work heartily when we are not servants in another man's household?

In terms of free market economic theory, every asset owner is a servant of customers. Customers set final prices. They also establish the number of units which are sold at each price. Customers are in possession of the most marketable commodity, money, so they possess authority over the goals of production. Sellers seek the most marketable commodity in exchange for their goods and services. By their decision to buy or not to buy, customers determine which sellers of goods and services prosper, and which do not.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

There is no escape from the concept of ownership as a social function.² When we own an asset, we are responsible for the administration of this asset. There are prospective buyers and prospective renters who bid against each other in order to gain control over our assets. This is why our assets command a price. So, Paul's rule regarding the attitude of enthusiasm regarding production applies to all labor. All labor is directed toward the satisfaction of someone.

2. Thanks to God

His language regarding our words and our actions indicates that we owe God thanks. Why should we owe God thanks for our words and deeds? Because God is the Creator. As the Creator, He is entitled to thanks. In this perspective, life is a benefit. We act in life through word and deed. We are supposed to demonstrate our subordination to God by giving thanks for the opportunities which God has provided for us to serve Him. This is the correct attitude of servants toward masters. God is the supreme Master, so servants give Him thanks for the opportunity to serve.

This emphasis on service is central to the gospel of Jesus Christ. Jesus entered into history, leaving a position of supreme authority and majesty, taking on the form of a servant (Phil. 2:5–6).³ He did this for the sake of those whom He served: God and mankind. He is the intermediary between God and mankind. Some people He saves from their sins (special grace), while others He allows to continue in life, even though they do not deserve to (common grace).⁴

The servant is a steward. A steward does not own the tools of production. He makes use of tools of production, but the tools are owned by someone else: his master. His work assignment is imposed by his master. He appears to serve his master, but Paul says that every servant should regard his service as directly under God. The servant is not to be a man-pleaser; he is to be a God-pleaser.

2. Gary North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 333. (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>)

3. Chapter 20.

4. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of your heart, as unto Christ; Not with eyeservice, as menpleasers; but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart; With good will doing service, as to the Lord, and not to men: Knowing that whatsoever good thing any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free (Eph. 6:5–8).

This does not mean that the master is not entitled to faithful service. As a representative of God in history, he is entitled to faithful service precisely because he is a representative of God. An individual demonstrates his commitment to enthusiastic service of God by serving his master enthusiastically. He is not to do this for the sake of pleasing his master; he is to do this because he owes such service to God, his maker. Paul elsewhere said that the Lord loves a cheerful giver (II Cor. 9:7).⁵ Paul says here that the Lord loves a cheerful servant. In each case, the goal is service to God.

B. Inheritance

Paul promises the faithful and enthusiastic servant that he will receive a reward from God. This establishes a fundamental principle of ethics. Obedience has its reward. This reward is not autonomous. It is not that we are to be obedient for obedience's sake. We are to be obedient for God's sake. It is God who imposes sanctions in history and eternity. So, Paul says, we can be certain of our appropriate reward for enthusiastic service. He calls this "the reward of the inheritance" (v. 24). This raises the issue of sonship. The son is adopted into the family of God, by the grace of God, as a sign of God's love for the adopted son. This adopted son is entitled to full inheritance. Paul says that the reward of faith serves as the inheritance.

Does Paul mean that the foundation of the inheritance is enthusiastic work? Yes. The question is: Who is the faithful servant who has enthusiastically served God? The answer is Jesus Christ. On the basis of His enthusiastic service to God, Jesus inherited the world (Matt. 28:18–20).⁶ As the Redeemer, which in the Mosaic covenant was the office of kinsman-redeemer, Jesus Christ transfers a share of the inheritance to each covenant-keeper. This transfer is based on grace. Yet Paul says that the transfer of the inheritance is based on service. So, to be consistent, we must say that the ability to serve faithfully and enthusiastically is a form of grace. James tells us that every good gift comes from heaven (James 1:17).⁷ Surely, the ability to serve God faithfully is a gift from heaven. It is not natural to man. Paul elsewhere wrote that the natural man does not receive the things of the Spirit (I Cor. 2:14).

5. Chapter 9.

6. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 48.

There is a promise of reward for enthusiastic service. This promise may not be fulfilled by each master. Paul tells servants not to serve as men-pleasers, but to serve God faithfully, for it is God who will hand out the reward of the inheritance. This inheritance is what a faithful servant wants as his reward. He wants to be part of the family. Paul tells him that he is part of the family of God. One mark of his membership in the family is his enthusiastic service.

Paul then goes on to speak of negative sanctions. These sanctions are imposed for wrongs committed by covenant-keepers. They are also wrongs committed by covenant-breakers. These are negative sanctions that are applied to disobedience. Paul quotes the Mosaic law⁸ when he says that there is no respect of persons (v. 25). This means that God does not look at who you are; He looks at what you have done. He assesses⁹ what you have done in terms of His law.¹⁰ Every covenant has a system of ethics. God applies a specific system of ethics to the words and deeds of every individual. He then pronounces judgment. Paul says that the person who goes wrong should expect to come under the negative sanctions of God.

Does this mean that individuals can lose their salvation? Paul insists otherwise.¹¹ Then what does Paul refer to? He is talking about wood, hay, and stubble (I Cor. 3:12).¹² Wood, hay, and stubble are metaphors for unproductive labor. Paul says that covenant-keepers who do not perform well are producers of wood, hay, and stubble. They do not lose their salvation, Paul says (I Cor. 3:15). They do lose any reward that effective and enthusiastic labor would have entitled

7. Chapter 33.

8. Deuteronomy 1:17; 10:17; 16:19.

9. Point four: judgment.

10. Point three: law.

11. "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword?" (Rom. 8:35) "Nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. 8:39).

12. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 3.

men to. So, there is a system of rewards to which men are entitled: positive and negative. There is predictability both in history and eternity between performance and reward.

C. Predictability

The existence of a system of covenantal causation, which is based on ethics, is present in every social order and institution. There are standards of right and wrong; there is a time of judgment; and there are positive and negative sanctions handed out by superiors. The biblical system of covenantal ethics is based on biblical law. The Bible provides us with permanent standards of right and wrong. These standards provide standards of performance in history. So, Paul says, faithful work, meaning faithful service to a master, will produce the appropriate reward from God. He does not say that it will produce an appropriate reward from every master. The fact that a master does not reward faithful service appropriately should not be divisive for a covenant-keeping servant in his household. The reason for this is that the servant is not to be a man-pleaser anyway. The servant is supposed to be a God-pleaser. God is the source of predictable rewards. So, the covenant-keeper who obeys his master for the sake of obedience to Jesus Christ can be sure that in eternity there will be a day of reckoning. He will receive an appropriate reward. Paul says that this is to be a motivational factor in the life of every covenant-keeper.

Wherever this view of ethics is widespread, the predictability of servants increases. This means that masters can depend on their servants to perform effectively the tasks assigned by the masters. This increases the predictability of household service. It also increases the efficiency of production. There is greater predictability, and therefore there is reduced waste. Because men must set aside money to protect themselves against poor performance by their subordinates, the man who hires covenantally faithful servants has a competitive advantage. Because these covenantally faithful servants perform their work enthusiastically and effectively, the master needs to set aside a smaller quantity of money. The money that he would have set aside can then be used for capital expansion in his business.

When covenant-keepers adhere to Paul's command, they become more productive. They become more productive because they are part of an enterprise which is marked by greater productivity. It is probably also marked by greater innovation. Employers can trust employees to perform effectively. Decision-makers at the top are enabled to make decisions regarding the future with less uncertainty. This gives them a competitive advantage in the marketplace. Employees benefit from this, just as the employers do.

In societies where there is widespread distrust, resistance against authority, and cheating based on envy, productivity is reduced. These societies cannot compete effectively against those societies that adhere to Paul's command. God rewards covenantally faithful societies, and He imposes negative sanctions on covenantally unfaithful societies (Deut. 28).¹³ A nation that wishes to grow richer should inculcate behavior that is hostile to acts of envy. An enthusiastic servant is not an envy-driven servant. He is not someone who wishes to tear down his master. Some servant who would do this would fall under Paul's condemnation of wrong behavior.

Conclusion

The reward of the inheritance is the ultimate reward is beyond history: final adoption into the family of God. Those who serve Christ receive this reward. They receive it based on His faithful service to God. He then distributes rewards to those who serve Him faithfully—again, by grace.

Society is based on a predictable relationship between ethics and rewards. Wherever covenant-keepers adhere to Paul's injunction, productivity increases. Output increases. Wealth increases. Senior decision-makers can trust their subordinates to perform without resentment and sabotage. To the degree that they imitate God and allocate rewards based on service, their enterprises are less likely to produce losses.

13. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

TAKING CARE OF BUSINESS

And that ye study to be quiet, and to do your own business, and to work with your own hands, as we commanded you; That ye may walk honestly toward them that are without, and that ye may have lack of nothing (1 Thes. 4:11–12).

The theocentric issue here is ethics: point three of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Mind Your Own Business

Americans have a phrase, “mind your own business.” It reflects an attitude of annoyance toward someone who is interfering with what someone else is doing. The assumption is that the critic has no legitimate authority to tell someone else how to do his work or how to run his life. The phrase applies to life in general, and rarely is the context business.

In this passage, “business” does refer to business. Paul is talking about a person’s occupation. He tells his readers and listeners that they should live quiet lives. They should not be busybodies or annoyances to other people. They should strive in their lives to become effective workers.

He says specifically that people should work with their own hands. This raises a question: Is he recommending manual labor? He was a manual laborer: a tentmaker (Acts 18:3).² This enabled him to avoid asking churches for financial support. It was a means of maintaining his independence. He referred to his financial independence in his letter to the Corinthians. He pointed out that they were not his supporters (II Cor. 12:16–18). He was independent of them and their money.³

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

2. Gary North, Sacrifice and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Acts, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 8.

When he says that people should work with their hands, he has in mind that they labor for a market. He is telling them that the way to gain independence is to work for a living. If they gain their income from buyers of their services or goods, they can continue to earn the income they need.

Paul was well aware that there were occupations in which people do not work with their hands. Why refer to working with your hands? Why not just recommend work? He uses this phrase as a means of condemnation. Basic to Greek civilization was extensive slavery. The city of Athens in the time of Plato was probably one-third slaves.⁴ In Greece and Rome, it was considered socially unacceptable for a man of leisure to indulge in handicrafts. Socrates had been a mason, but he departed from this work to become a man of leisure. A tradesman did the work of slaves. Greek society rested on a hierarchy in which the leading politicians and intellectuals were landowners. They were not tradesmen; they were men of leisure. They might make their money through money-lending. They did not earn a living by getting their hands dirty. Paul tells people to get their hands dirty.

His commitment to manual labor, as a metaphor of work in general, represents a call to service. Through work, an individual can gain the necessities of life. Paul tells them that they should work so that they might lack nothing. He is not telling them that they should pursue luxuries or other marks of great wealth. He tells them that they should lack nothing that would be regarded as a necessity. They should not have as a goal great wealth; they also should not have as a goal public begging. This was also Solomon's advice (Prov. 30:7–9).⁵ They are to remain productive, but their productivity should not be limited by a social bias against manual labor.

B. Honest Dealing With Outsiders

He tells them that they should walk honestly toward those who are without. What does he mean? Does he mean those outside the church, or does he mean those without goods? This refers to those who are

3. Chapter 10.

4. A. H. M. Jones, "Slavery in the Ancient World," Economic History Review, 2nd ser., IX (1956), p. 187.

5. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 84.

outside the church. Jesus said, "Unto you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God: but unto them that are without, all these things are done in parables" (Mark 4:11). Paul wrote: "But them that are without God judgeth. Therefore put away from among yourselves that wicked person" (I Cor. 5:13). Covenant-keepers are to deal honestly with covenant-breakers. In their occupations, covenant-keepers are to be honest toward all customers and prospective customers. If they do this, Paul says, they will lack nothing.

This command, when obeyed, produces hard-working, honest tradesmen who are known for their reliability in economic dealing. They gain a reputation for not cheating people. The risk of being cheated by them is dramatically reduced. This lowers the cost of doing business with them. When you reduce the cost of anything, more of it is demanded. By reducing the risk of being cheated, the Christian businessman increases the market for whatever it is that he sells. His reputation becomes a form of advertising. It therefore becomes a form of capital. The goal is to gain the trust of other people, who will come to rely on the services produced by covenant-keepers. The covenant-keeper is therefore to become a benefit to the community. This is a marketable benefit. Men gain more clients by gaining a reputation for honesty.

Paul is specifically calling people to a life of work. He tells covenant-keepers that they should not seek poverty as a lifestyle. They should not be in a position of not possessing the necessities of life. They should own these goods and services, for this is God's reward for honest dealing and hard work. There is predictability between honesty and profitability. The tradesmen who is honest in his dealings will not lack customers. If he does not lack customers, he does not lack the basic necessities of life. This is what Paul recommends.

C. Peace and Quiet

Paul tells them to be quiet. This does not mean that they should not talk. It means that they should not draw attention to themselves as troublemakers in the community. It means holding your peace. "And they held their peace. And he took him, and healed him, and let him go" (Luke 14:4). "When they heard these things, they held their peace, and glorified God, saying, Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life" (Acts 11:18). Paul wrote to Timothy, "I exhort therefore, that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men; For kings, and for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour” (1 Tim. 2:1–3).⁶

This strategy has an assumption: time is on the side of covenant-keepers. They do not need to revolt. They need to act peacefully, earn their livings, be reputable, and stay out of trouble. This is a strongly anti-revolutionary strategy. Paul studied under Gamaliel (Acts 22:3). Gamaliel gave this advice to the temple officers regarding failed revolts.

For before these days rose up Theudas, boasting himself to be somebody; to whom a number of men, about four hundred, joined themselves: who was slain; and all, as many as obeyed him, were scattered, and brought to nought. After this man rose up Judas of Galilee in the days of the taxing, and drew away much people after him: he also perished; and all, even as many as obeyed him, were dispersed (Acts 5:36–37).

Gamaliel therefore advised that the apostles, as peaceful men, be left alone (v. 38). Paul knew about this. It was an attitude opposed to his at the time (Acts 8:1), but which he espoused later in his career as an apostle. Avoid revolution. Avoid confrontation.

Conclusion

Paul says that covenant-keepers should labor with their hands in honest work. This is the road to plenty. So is quiet. Deal honestly. Give no legitimate cause of complaint by enemies. By avoiding revolution and by productive work, we build the kingdom of God.

6. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 2.

AGAINST THE WELFARE STATE

For even when we were with you, this we commanded you, that if any would not work, neither should he eat. For we hear that there are some which walk among you disorderly, working not at all, but are busybodies. Now them that are such we command and exhort by our Lord Jesus Christ, that with quietness they work, and eat their own bread (II Thes. 3:10–12).

The theocentric issue here was law: point three of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Limits on Church Charity

Paul admonishes the church at Thessalonica that it should impose this rule on members: he who does not work, neither shall he eat.

From the beginning of the church, poor people asked for and received assistance from the church. The office of deacon was created explicitly to take care of the widows who have no means of support (Acts 6:1–4).² But, also from the beginning, Paul set forth stringent rules regarding who was allowed to receive support from the local church, and who was not. He said that no widow who is under age 60 should receive support. He also said that no widow who had been married more than once should receive support (I Tim. 5:3–4).³ He said

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

2. Gary North, Sacrifice and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Acts, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 5.

3. "Let not a widow be taken into the number under threescore years old, having been the wife of one man, Well reported of for good works; if she have brought up children, if she have lodged strangers, if she have washed the saints' feet, if she have relieved the afflicted, if she have diligently followed every good work" (I Tim. 5:9–10). Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, that anyone who does not support a member of his family is worse than an infidel (I Tim. 5:8). All of these admonitions recognized the truth of a fundamental law of economics: at zero price, there is greater demand than supply. If the church supports everyone who comes in the door asking for a handout, the church will soon be impoverished.

Paul says there are limits on eligibility for receiving economic support from the church. He says that anyone who does not work should not eat at the church's expense. We should not assume that he meant that anyone who is a quadriplegic and who therefore cannot work should be allowed to starve. The context of his words make it clear that he is speaking of what we call able-bodied people. These are people who are physically capable of earning a living. They may not be able to earn a middle-class income, but they can earn enough to support themselves. Here is their assignment: "with quietness they work, and eat their own bread."

Paul wrote elsewhere that anyone who has food and clothing has all that he really needs (I Tim. 6:7–8).⁴ It is nice to have more, but it is not guaranteed by anybody or any institution. God does not guarantee it. We are to be content with the basics of life. If what we have will sustain our lives, we should not go looking for handouts from others.

B. The Welfare State

This admonition with respect to who is eligible for financial support from the church is at odds with modern government policy. From the initial legislation establishing the graduated income tax in the early decades of the twentieth century, civil governments have extracted taxes from residents and then transferred the money to the poor. Of course, middle-class employees of the civil government have extracted a large portion of this wealth for administration and handling. But civil governments have come in the name of the poor to the households of the rich and have demanded that the rich forfeit a portion of their income in order that the money can be used to support the poor.

There is nothing in the Mosaic law that would authorize such a transfer of wealth by the coercion of the state. There is nothing in the New Testament that would authorize it. It is clear from this passage that Paul is opposed to a covenant-keeper's asking for financial support from another covenant-keeper, if the first covenant-keeper is capable of earning a living. If it is wrong for an able-bodied church member to receive financial support from the church when he is capable of working, then on what possible biblical basis can anyone make a case for using the coercive power of civil government to extract wealth from one group of citizens to transfer it to another group of citizens, when the recipients are capable of working? None.

2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 7.

4. Ibid., pp. 224–26.

The modern welfare state was created in the name of the poor. It was supported by advocates of what is called the Social Gospel. The Social Gospel promotes political policies of special-interest groups that use the power of the ballot box to force political change. The political change that the Social Gospel recommends is that the coercive power of the state be used to redistribute wealth. This is why Social Gospel advocates are appalled by what Paul writes in this passage. They try to reinterpret his words. Or they say that his words are no longer valid.

There is no escape from this passage. He who does not work, neither shall he eat, meaning neither shall he eat at the church's expense. A person who does not work, but who is capable of working, has neither a moral nor a legal claim on the church's support. But if he has no legal claim on the church, which is a voluntary institution, on what legal basis can anyone invoke the Bible to justify the existence of a legal claim on revenue collected by force from taxpayers? None.

If God wanted the welfare state to intervene to help those who are capable of working, yet refuse to work, then why did He curse the ground because of Adam's sin? Why did He deliberately force men to work in order to eat (Gen. 3:17–19)?⁵ If God did this with Adam, on what biblical bases can anyone legitimately claim that the modern welfare state is justified by the Bible? Why did God impose the curse on the ground, if His true intention was to create an economy in which civil government would use coercion to extract wealth from the rich to give to the poor.

Conclusion

Paul's admonition here protects the church from freeloaders and busybodies. Church leaders should learn to recognize hustlers who come in the name of their poverty and ask for support. Voters should do the same.

5. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

THE CHRISTIAN TITHE

Wherefore in all things it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people. For in that he himself hath suffered being tempted, he is able to succour them that are tempted. Wherefore, holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling, consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus (Heb. 2:17—3:1).

A. The High Priest

The central theme of the Epistle to the Hebrews is Jesus Christ as God's High Priest. He is the High Priest in heaven. "Seeing then that we have a great high priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession" (Heb. 4:14). He is not a Levitical priest. He is a Melchizedek High Priest. "Called of God an high priest after the order of Melchisedec" (Heb. 5:10). This doctrine lays the foundation of the Christian covenantal tithe.

For this Melchisedec, king of Salem, priest of the most high God, who met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings, and blessed him; To whom also Abraham gave a tenth part of all; first being by interpretation King of righteousness, and after that also King of Salem, which is, King of peace (Heb. 7:1–2).

The principle of the tithe was established by Melchizedek. He possessed ecclesiastical authority over Abram. Only when Abram acknowledged this by paying a tithe of his gains that he had made under Melchizedek's jurisdiction (Gen. 14) did God make Abram a household priest by covenant (Gen. 15; 17). The future lower priest tithed to the high priest.

Christians are the heirs of the Israelites as the kingdom of priests. Peter declared:

But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should shew forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light: Which in time past were not a people, but are now the people of God: which had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy (I Peter 2:9–10).

This is John's meaning in Revelation: "... He has made us to be a kingdom, priests to His God and Father—to Him be the glory and the dominion forever and ever. Amen" (Rev. 1:6; NASB).

B. A Kingdom of Priests

The kingdom of priests under the Mosaic law was confessional and sacramental: citizens of Israel by profession of faith and by the sacraments. Here was the profession of faith: "Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God is one LORD: And thou shalt love the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might" (Deut. 6:4–5). The sacraments were circumcision and Passover.

The kingdom of priests under the New Covenant is also confessional and sacramental: citizens of the Israel of God, the church (Gal. 6:16), by profession of faith and by the sacraments. Here is the confession.

That if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation (Rom. 10:9–10).

The sacraments are baptism and the Lord's Supper.

A kingdom of priests is marked by tithing: from lower priests to higher priests. To whom should Christians tithe as members of this kingdom? There are no Levites: a tribe set aside to defend the temple from trespassing and to sacrifice animals to placate God's wrath. There is only the functional-judicial equivalent of the tabernacle-temple, where the High Priest Jesus Christ resides judicially: the institutional church, which administers the sacraments of bread and wine to members of God's royal priesthood, just as Melchizedek did.

C. A Hierarchy of Priestly Tithing

Covenantally, by family representation, Levi paid his tithe through

Abraham to a superior priest.

But he whose descent is not counted from them received tithes of Abraham, and blessed him that had the promises. And without all contradiction the less is blessed of the better. And here men that die receive tithes; but there he receiveth them, of whom it is witnessed that he liveth. And as I may so say, Levi also, who receiveth tithes, payed tithes in Abraham. For he was yet in the loins of his father, when Melchisedec met him. If therefore perfection were by the Levitical priesthood, (for under it the people received the law,) what further need was there that another priest should rise after the order of Melchisedec, and not be called after the order of Aaron? (Heb. 7:6–11).

The new law of the tithe is that Christians must pay their tithes to the local church, as the ecclesiastical representative (point two) of the High Priest. They are under a hierarchy of authority (point two). There is a new law of tithing, for there has been a change in the priesthood: from Levi to Melchizedek. “For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law” (Heb. 7:12).

Christians are priests through Jesus. How? Through adoption. “But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, To redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons” (Gal. 4:4–5). We are priests through adoption into the family of the High Priest. The transfer of the priestly line from Levi to Melchizedek marked the transition from the Old Covenant to the New Covenant. “By so much was Jesus made a surety of a better testament. And they truly were many priests, because they were not suffered to continue by reason of death: But this man, because he continueth ever, hath an unchangeable priesthood” (Heb. 7:22–24).

The lower priest pays a tithe to the higher priest. This is the covenantal structure of the tithe. The Melchizedekan priesthood is the biblical model of the high priest.

The tithe is no longer exclusively agricultural. There is no holy land in Palestine. There are no family farms based on an original inheritance established by the military genocide of Canaan. Holy land now encompasses whatever is made holy—set apart—through ownership by Christians. That which we redeem—buy back—from the kingdom of mammon is made holy: set aside because it is under our lawful jurisdiction. This is our inheritance from God, and it is the inheritance that we leave behind to our heirs. God’s High Priest therefore deserves

His tithe on the net output of this inheritance. This is a matter of godly inheritance.

D. Guilt and Government

By placing a minimum on what men owe, God's Bible-revealed law reduces the burden of guilt. The person who pays his tithe to his local congregation has met his legal obligation to God. If God calls him to give more than a tithe, this request can be regarded as a special obligation, one that is in some way consistent with the special situation of the donor. The situation is not normal. The general obligation has both a floor and a ceiling: a tithe.

The man who sees his obligation as greater than ten percent has some reason to think this. He could be incorrect. If he makes a mistake here, there is no reason for him to worry that he has not done enough for God. A mistake is not a moral infraction. He has met the minimum requirement with his tithe.

The reduction of guilt is important for building men and societies that are innovative. Bearing measurable risk or unmeasurable uncertainty is important in overcoming the limits placed on the creation by God's curse (Genesis 3:17–19).¹ A man who is burdened by guilt has trouble functioning in a balanced manner. He never knows when he will receive negative sanctions for his rebellion. Guilt can produce workaholics, but it can also produce alcoholics. Overcoming guilt is not to be a motivation for extending the kingdom of God in history. Such motivation places too much reliance on the works of men in pleasing God.

Paul's ministry could be interpreted as the work of a man attempting to overcome guilt. "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners; of whom I am chief" (I Timothy 1:15). It would be a mistake to see Paul as guilt-motivated. He continued: "Howbeit for this cause I obtained mercy, that in me first Jesus Christ might shew forth all longsuffering, for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe on him to life everlasting" (I Timothy 1:16). His call into service to God began with God's mercy. That was what had overcome his guilt. His work was a response to this legal condition of judicial innocence. He was first among sinners and first among the redeemed. His life was to serve as a pattern for others similarly redeemed from guilt.

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

To preach the covenantal tithe is to show a way to covenant-keepers to escape from guilt. The tithe places an explicit limit on what covenant-keepers owe God, and through which institution they owe it. It enables them to find an escape from this trap of guilt:

... someone may still ask: “But how much should I give?”

There is no universal answer to that question. All Christians should give something, but there is not a universal amount or percentage required. Each believer must look at their situation in life, their church, and those around them to seek out possible needs. Furthermore, a mindset focused on eternity, and not the moment, will desire to give sacrificially to God’s work on the earth. From some paychecks God may require one hundred percent, from others five percent. Obedience to his leading is key.²

This doctrine of indeterminate economic obligation transfers a load of guilt to the covenant-keeper. Under the Mosaic covenant, God intervened in history through Moses to prohibit the congregation from giving too much in the wilderness, before the tithe was formally instated as a binding legal obligation on Israel.

And they spake unto Moses, saying, The people bring much more than enough for the service of the work, which the LORD commanded to make. And Moses gave commandment, and they caused it to be proclaimed throughout the camp, saying, Let neither man nor woman make any more work for the offering of the sanctuary. So the people were restrained from bringing. For the stuff they had was sufficient for all the work to make it, and too much (Ex. 36:5–7).³

In the post-A.D. 70 New Covenant era, God’s covenantal agents do not lawfully speak with this degree of authority. The Bible does; ordained agents do not. So, if the Bible does not speak authoritatively on the matter of what percentage of their income covenant-keepers owe to God, what is to restrain them in their quest to find peace in their minds regarding what they owe to God? By God’s specially revealed grace, the Bible does set forth this limit. God demands a minimum token payment of ten percent. He who meets this requirement can live

2. David Croteau, “A Biblical and Theological Analysis of Tithing: Toward a Theology of Giving in the New Covenant Era,” a Ph.D. dissertation submitted to the faculty of Southeastern Baptist Theological Seminary (2005), p. 266.

3. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 56.

guilt-free with respect to what he owes to God. Anything beyond this is judicially optional. We should call such optional payments “offerings.”

Paul gave far more than a tithe. He recounted his suffering for the gospel.

Are they ministers of Christ? (I speak as a fool) I am more; in labours more abundant, in stripes above measure, in prisons more frequent, in deaths oft. Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one. Thrice was I beaten with rods, once was I stoned, thrice I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day I have been in the deep; In journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren; In weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness (II Corinthians 11:23–27).

His was not a normal Christian life, but it was consistent with the call to comprehensive sacrifice. “I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service. And be not conformed to this world: but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God” (Romans 12:1–2).⁴

Then why doesn’t God require more than a tithe? Because the tithe is judicially representative. It declares, “I give up ten percent of my net income as a symbol of my subordination.” God has established a symbol of subordination: the tithe. This low percentage is sufficient to eliminate most of those whose faith is not sufficient to identify them as reliable leaders. They do not obey; so, they are not reliable to lead. They refuse to adhere to the terms of the church covenant; so, they should not be allowed to impose ecclesiastical sanctions, which includes voting in church elections. He who does not acknowledge the legitimacy of covenantal sanctions above him should not be allowed to impose covenantal sanctions on those below him. We understand this hierarchical principle in family government and civil government. Many Christians do not understand it in church government.

The problem is, too many pastors are not convinced that God has mandated a tithe for today’s Christians. They do not preach covenantal tithing. Congregations do not use the tithe to differentiate voting members from non-voting communicant members. The result is a weakening of church authority and a reduction of church income. Pastors are reduced to begging their congregations to fund the work of Christ's kingdom. This fosters a mental image of Jesus as a beggar. He is not a beggar. He is the high priest who deserves the tithe.

4. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 8.

Conclusion

The New Covenant tithe is a priestly tithe. The lower priest pays to the higher priest, as was the case under the Melchizedekan priesthood. The debt is owed to God in response to His grace shown to His covenantally faithful people. They have become priests by adoption into God's holy family. They are members of the Melchizedekan priesthood, not the Levitical. With this honor comes an obligation to tithe.

The tithe did not exist before Melchizedek. As the high priest in his family, Abram paid his tithe to this high priest. He was operating in Melchizedek's territory. He owed him a token payment as a way to demonstrate priestly subordination. So do household priests in the New Covenant. They pay to the High Priest, Jesus Christ, by way of His agency of priestly collection: the local congregation. It possesses covenantal authority as the protector of the sacraments.

A QUESTION OF TRUST

Let your conversation be without covetousness; and be content with such things as ye have: for he hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee. So that we may boldly say, The Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me (Heb. 13:5–6).

The theocentric issue here was God as the deliverer: point two of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Covetousness

The author of the epistle to the Hebrews reiterates a point made in other epistles: covenant-keepers must avoid covetousness. He makes another point that we can find in Paul's teachings: we must be content. "Not that I speak in respect of want: for I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content" (Phil. 4:11).² "And having food and raiment let us be therewith content" (I Tim. 6:8).³

The prohibition against covetousness is found in the Ten Commandments.⁴ The tenth Commandment forbids coveting anything which belongs to our neighbor. Covetousness is a form of lust. Men are convinced that they must possess something that belongs to another person. They have no peace in their hearts, because the other person possesses that which they desire. Paul made it clear, and this

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. Chapter 22.

3. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Ppint Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 10.

4. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 30.

epistle makes it clear, that to be covetous is to indulge in sin.⁵

Discontent must be rooted out of our lives. We must be content with the things that we have. This contentment must reflect our belief that God has given us whatever we need to extend His kingdom. There is consistency among what we have received from God, what we have done to extend His kingdom, and what we must do to extend it even more. Contentment applies to whatever we own or make use of. Contentment refers to that which we enjoy for ourselves. To be discontented is to pursue relentlessly a lifestyle that we do not possess. Jesus said that no man can serve two masters: he must serve either God or Mammon (Matt. 6:24). Mammon is the God of self-indulgence. Mammon's theology is simple: "More for me in history."⁶

To guard against Mammon, we must discipline ourselves not to fall into the trap of believing that we do not possess enough wealth to provide ourselves with the lifestyle we believe we deserve. Contentment refers to anything we own for our own use. It also refers to our desire to extend our sphere of influence for the sake of the kingdom of God. The desire to extend the kingdom of God in history is legitimate. Paul refers to this as pressing on to the mark of the high calling of God (Phil. 3:14).⁷ There is nothing here that would tell us that we should be content with respect to our efforts to extend the kingdom of God in history. Paul wrote that we are not to be weary in well doing (Gal. 6:9;⁸ II Thes. 3:13).

B. The Ground of Our Security

The author justifies on this basis his command that we be content the things that we possess: Jesus has said that He will never leave us nor forsake us. This means that our protection is in the hands of Jesus. We should rely on Jesus rather than money as the basis of our protection. This is consistent with Jesus' command to worship God rather than Mammon. If we trust in the work of our hands—the money and goods generated by the work of our hands—we lean on a bruised reed (II Kings 18:21). The creation is not reliable. God is reliable. The author says that we should be able to say, "the Lord is my helper." Here, he cites the twenty-third psalm. Yet if we read the twenty-third psalm,

5. Chapter 23.

6. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 14.

7. Chapter 21.

8. Chapter 13.

David declares that he will be visibly blessed by God in the presence of his enemies. Is this a form of Mammon worship? No. It is merely the desire to be publicly recognized by God for the covenantally faithful performance of one's assignment.

The author also says that we should be able to say, "I will not fear what man shall do to me." David said that he walked through the valley of the shadow of death and feared no evil. This is the same attitude recommended here: an attitude of confidence. This is not self-confidence. This is confidence in the promises of God. This is the correct attitude for a covenant-keeper regarding the predictable positive sanctions of God in response to obedience to the Bible revealed law of God (Deut. 28:1–14).⁹

C. Daily Bread

The author is not introducing new doctrines in this passage. He is restating old doctrines in a succinct way. He gets right to the point. The point is that covetousness and discontent with our position in life are violations of the law of God. God says that man should not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceeds out of the mouth of God (Deut. 8:3). This is the passage which Jesus quoted to Satan in the wilderness, when Satan tempted him to turn stones into bread (Matt. 4:4).¹⁰ Jesus resisted the temptation in the name of God. He appealed to the word of God, which declares a predictable cause-and-effect relationship between covenant-keeping in history and success in history.

It was not the Jesus did not think that bread is a good idea. He resisted the idea that He should use supernatural power to overcome the limits of scarcity. There is a proper procedure for gaining access to our daily bread. One of them is prayer (Matt. 6:11).¹¹ Another is diligent work. We are not to use shortcuts in achieving our economic goals. A shortcut would be a procedure to achieve increased income apart from God's blessing. God is the provider of blessings in this life, James teaches. Every good gift comes from God (James 1:17).¹² There is nothing wrong with asking God to increase our income. There is everything wrong with pursuing increased income apart from God's calling in our lives. God may have great economic blessings to deliver to us in

9. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

10. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 1.

11. Ibid., ch. 12.

12. Chapter 33.

response to our efforts to extend the kingdom of God in history. Such blessings are a form of capital. It takes capital to build a civilization. The kingdom of God is a civilization. It takes capital to build it. Our desire to increase our supply of capital as a means of extending the kingdom of God in history is not only legitimate, it is mandatory. This is the lesson of the parable of the talents. Jesus told the story of a ruler who went into a far country and left his servants in charge of his economic affairs. On his return, he greatly blessed the servant who achieved the highest rate of return on the capital which was entrusted to him. He cursed a steward who earned no increase (Matt. 25:14–30).¹³ The point of the parable is not that it is a good idea to make a lot of money. The point of the parable is to gain a positive rate of return on whatever gifts God has entrusted to you.

This is the difference between serving God and serving Mammon. When you serve God faithfully, you can expect that you will be the recipient of positive sanctions in history. These sanctions serve as a means of confirming God's covenant (Deut. 8:17–19).¹⁴ They are part of the ethical cause-and-effect system that God revealed to Israel through Moses (Deut. 28).¹⁵ This ethical system is predictable. It applies to history. It applies to individuals, and it also applies to covenanted institutions. It applies to churches, families, and civil governments. It applies to businesses.

D. Success Indicators

The mistake that men make is to pursue the success indicators rather than success.¹⁶ They forget what the basis of their success is: faithfulness to the word of God. Jesus did not forget, and He reminded Satan of this principle. The goal is not the money; the goal is expanding the kingdom of God in history. The means the expansion of capital under our individual covenants with God. As stewards, we are to multiply the goods under our jurisdiction. These goods are to be put to effective use of the kingdom of God in history.

13. Ibid., ch. 47.

14. North, Inheritance and Dominion, chaps. 21, 22.

15. Ibid., ch. 69.

16. On the distinction between success and success indicators, see Gary North, The Five Pillars of Biblical Success (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2008), pp. 42–43, 52, 54, 59, 65–66, 106–7, 110–15, 123, 128, 142, 162–64.

1. Mammon

When men worship success indicators, they worship Mammon. This is another way of saying that they worship themselves. They say to themselves, “more for me in history.” They use whatever skills they possess to increase their wealth. They do not pursue wealth in order to testify to covenantal faithfulness of the God of the Bible. Wealth is used to testify to the glory of some other source of blessings in history. Usually, it is used to testify to the creative power of the person who accumulated wealth.

The question is this: Who gets the glory? American Christians sing a hymn, “to God be the glory, great things He hath done.” This is a powerful testimony. It should not simply be the testimony of our singing; it should be the testimony of our lives.

When it is clear to others that a covenant-keeper regards his success as a blessing given by God for the sake of the kingdom, he is not suspected of being a worshiper of Mammon. People understand that he is not pursuing wealth for the sake of accumulating a testimony to his own productivity. He is accumulating wealth in order to put it to effective use for God.

This passage is a condemnation of the practice known in the United States as “keeping up with the Joneses.” Keeping up with the Joneses is a form of covetousness. It is the quest for the lifestyle of someone who is regarded as successful. The lifestyle of the other person may not be the result of a systematic pursuit of the kingdom of God in history. So, when a covenant-keeper seeks to imitate this lifestyle, he is doing so on the wrong footing. He is seeking the success indicator rather than success.

2. Right Hand and Left Hand

The individual is told by Christ that the left hand should not know what the right hand is doing (Matt. 6:3).¹⁷ The context of this warning was charitable giving. Men are not to parade their giving in front of other men. Then how can they present evidence to people around them that they are faithful stewards of God’s resources, and at the same time not use their charitable activities as a testimony to their own efforts to leave behind a reputation?

The classic example of this in American history is Andrew Carnegie. He accumulated the greatest amount of private wealth in the world by 1900, and on January 1, 1901, on the day the twentieth century began, banker J. Pierpont Morgan called Carnegie to tell him that he was now the richest man in the world. Carnegie through Morgan had just sold Carnegie Steel to a group of investors who soon created United States Steel. He then gave away almost all of his wealth. But he did not believe in God. He believed in himself. He put his name on his various foundations. He made sure that the world knew that he was the source of his charitable gifts.

17. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 11.

The other super-rich men of his generation imitated him. John D. Rockefeller created the Rockefeller Foundation and various other Rockefeller charitable organizations. Henry Ford created the Ford Foundation. They put their names on their foundations so that no one would forget who had been the source of the funding. The richest Calvinist who ever lived, J. Howard Pew, did the same thing in the mid-1950s. He was the head of Sun Oil Company. He created the Pew Charitable Trusts.

The right hand should not know what the left hand is doing with respect to charitable donations. It is a mistake in all cases to put your own name on the charitable organization that you establish with your own money. This is a means of testifying to the world regarding your own charitable impulse. The correct goal is to put the money to good use, not to get credit for having done so. The only justification for letting some people know that you are the source of the funding is because you want people with similar wealth to learn the techniques of giving away their wealth effectively. Your peers should know of your generosity as a testimony to them regarding the correct use of great wealth. The general public should not be made aware of the source of the funding.

An obvious way for a rich person to demonstrate that he is not caught in the religion of Mammon is for him to adopt the visible lifestyle of someone considerably less wealthy. Two famous individuals in modern American history who did this were Sam Walton, the founder of Wal-Mart, and Warren Buffett, generally regarded as the most successful investor in history. Both of them lived in comparatively moderate houses, which they did not sell when they became multi-billionaires. Everyone knew they were rich, and people also noted that both men were committed to charity. But the visible proof of their commitment was the fact they did not pursue the trappings of great wealth. They proved that they were committed to their work, rather than to the wealth which their success as entrepreneurs generated.

Conclusion

We are not to covet other people's goods or lifestyles. We are to be content with whatever we own. We are to trust in Jesus as our protector. These warnings have fallen on many deaf ears for two millennia.

Assets that we put to use for God's kingdom are legitimate. The pursuit of these assets is legitimate. They are tools of dominion.

31

CHARITY AS SACRIFICE

For here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come. By him therefore let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips giving thanks to his name. But to do good and to communicate forget not: for with such sacrifices God is well pleased (Heb. 13:14–16).

The theocentric issue here was subordination to God: point two of the biblical covenant.¹

A. A Command

We are told to do good and communicate. The Greek word translated here as “communicate” is elsewhere translated as “contribution” and “distribution.”

For it hath pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia to make a certain contribution for the poor saints which are at Jerusalem (Rom. 15:26).

Whiles by the experiment of this ministration they glorify God for your professed subjection into the gospel of Christ, and for your liberal distribution unto them, and unto all men (II Cor. 9:13).

The author of Hebrews makes an important point here. He identifies charitable giving as a form of sacrifice. He says that this sacrifice is pleasing to God.

The Bible recommends charity. Covenant-keepers are called on by the authors of many biblical texts to use their resources to help the poor. This is not a call to universal charity. It is a call to selective charity.² Poor people who have fallen into hard times through no fault of their own are deserving of consideration. People who have sufficient wealth to meet their basic necessities are asked to give to the poor. This is a call to voluntary action; it is not a matter of ecclesiastical discipline. It is also not a matter of compulsion by the civil government. It is a call to personal sacrifice.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

We are no longer asked to sacrifice animals on an altar. The epistle to the Hebrews conveys this message above all other messages: Jesus Christ is the high priest who served as the sacrificial lamb to placate the wrath of God. He did this once. No additional blood sacrifice is required by God.

The author goes on to say, however, that sacrificial offerings still please God. The form of sacrificial offering that pleases God is charitable giving. This is not a means of atonement. It is a means of helping people who have fallen into hard times through no fault of their own. This is not a call to subsidize indolence or laziness. The author says that God is pleased with this form of sacrifice. Yet this form of sacrifice, no less than the various forms of sacrifice under the Mosaic law, must not itself be lawless. We are not to subsidize evil-doing. The goal is to help those people who have fallen into hard times, so that they can become productive members of society once again.

There is no hint in this passage that charity is to be indiscriminate. There is also no hint that charity is anything except a voluntary decision on the part of someone who possesses assets to transfer a portion of these assets to someone who is in need. This is not a call for universal charity; it is a call for individual charity by covenant-keepers. There is no suggestion that civil government is in any way responsible for establishing programs of charitable giving.

B. Economic Theory and Charity

Economists have been successful in developing a very sophisticated analytical approach to understanding economic affairs by applying the auction principle of high bid wins. This is one of the most powerful analytical strategies ever developed in the social sciences, but it is not a universal principle of human action. It offers no advantage in forecasting economic events when applied to voluntary realms outside the free market system of exchange. Economists do not have analytical tools for explaining charity. Similarly, they have little to say about economic relationships within a family. Economists do not speak of a charitable gift in the way that they speak of a market expenditure. There is no widely agreed-upon, self-correcting institutional arrangement for assessing and rewarding the efficiency of charity. There is for the free market: profit and loss. This is why charity resists economic analysis.

2. Ray R. Sutton, "Whose Conditions for Charity?" in Theonomy: An Informed Response, ed. Gary North (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991), ch. 9. (<http://bit.ly/gntheon>)

Charitable giving is a form of behavior that can be explained in terms of a hierarchy of values.³ Few people place charitable giving as high on their hierarchy of values as they place getting rich. Jesus knew this as well as any modern economist does. The difference is, Jesus warned against this motivation. “For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul” (Matt. 16:26)?⁴ Economists may attempt to perform some kind of economic analysis based on expectations of God’s rewards beyond the grave. This would be a legitimate conceptual approach. Jesus taught that there are such rewards beyond the grave. More than this: Jesus specifically recommended charitable giving in this life so as to accumulate wealth beyond the grave, which is a form of wealth that does not rust and thieves do not break in to steal.⁵ But this passage resists that kind of economic analysis. Here, the author says that the issue is sacrifice. A person sacrifices wealth in this world for the sake of pleasing God. The author does not mention positive sanctions of any kind. All he says is that sacrifice by people with assets does please God.

The economist is always in search of a quid pro quo. He wants to know why someone surrenders wealth to another person. If there is no reciprocity, the economist is baffled. His analytical toolbox is ineffective in explaining why people give assets or time to others. He has a great deal of difficulty in using the principle of high bid wins in explaining the sacrifice on the part of a mother for her child. It would be analytically possible for the economist to explain this in terms of the mother's expectations of a future stream of income: voluntary gifts from an adult child—if the child's spouse agrees. The economist would say that the mother discounts this expected stream of income by a market rate of interest. But such an argument sounds preposterous. To explain a mother's sacrifice for her child in terms of reciprocity is to indulge in academic silliness. This is another way of saying that there are voluntary social institutions in which the market principle of high bid wins either makes no sense or leads to predictions that do not consistently come true.

3. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 25:A.

4. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 35.

5. “Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal” (Matt. 6:19–20). Ibid., ch. 13.

C. Economic Growth and Charity

The economist looks at a person's decision whether to invest 10% of his net worth in his business. This business will enable him to hire additional workers, purchase more raw materials, build a factory, or gain control over something beneficial to the structure of production. The economist says that this expenditure is a benefit to society as a whole. It employs people; it increases the number of choices of customers; and it may provide a profit for the investor. The economist looks at this and thinks: "This makes more sense than giving away 10% of the person's net worth to charity."

In terms of the history of economic growth, this argument is easy to defend. Economists can show that societies that have been characterized by high rates of saving have also been characterized by a rate of economic growth that is higher than the growth rate achieved by societies that are not marked by high rates of saving. Beginning in Great Britain in the mid-eighteenth century, thrift has funded entrepreneurial ventures, which in turn have led to compound economic growth on a scale that has transformed Western civilization.⁶

Someone who studies the economic effects of charity can find nothing comparable to the poverty-reducing effects of a steady investment of wealth in privately owned businesses. He may see that a particular society is characterized by a high rate of charitable giving. There is no way to demonstrate that charitable giving increases society's productivity. Charity does not always provide tools of production.

6. There is a major problem with explaining the lack of growth before 1750, and even before 1800. The most important question in the discipline of economic history (I would say all of history) is this one: What caused the advent of sustained economic growth? So far, the academic world has no answer. Dierdre N. McCloskey, Bourgeois Dignity: Why Economics Can't Explain the Modern World (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2010), chaps. 14–40. We await McCloskey's third volume.

It does sustain life and some degree of comfort for a few people. This benefit relates to income rather than production.

The economist who studies the impact of high rates of thrift generally neglects the fact that a society with high rates of charitable giving has a social safety net. Charity has a “free rider” or spillover effect. It provides a sense of safety for members of a society. They know that failure need not be deadly. In this sense, charitable giving is a form of social capital. It provides a safety net and therefore a sense of confidence within those circles that are most vulnerable to economic setbacks. The economic category of “charity” does not enable an economist to make what appear to be scientific correlations among charitable giving, capital investment, and economic growth. Yet the logic of charitable giving is clear: it is a form of social capital.

When people trust God to intervene in history in order to save them from unexpected disasters, they believe that they can afford to take greater risks in their economic decisions. One way that He intervenes is through the gospel, which recommends charitable giving. People can afford to make investments in higher-risk ventures precisely because they believe that they will not be facing life-and-death consequences if the investment turns sour.

Charitable giving, when it is widespread in a society, reduces fear on the part of the poor. This can lead in some cases to indolence. It can also lead to greater entrepreneurship and greater productivity. It depends upon the moral character of those who regard charitable giving as providing a safety net for their daily lives.

Economists who focus their attention on capital investment as a means of reducing poverty should give attention to the relationship between increased charitable giving and increased capital investment. It is possible that people save more money than they would otherwise have saved because they believe that if they lose their money, they will not die. They do not have to make an all-or-nothing decision: a safe investment vs. poverty. They have a fall-back position. They can then make higher-risk investments that may provide them with income in the future.

The Bible does not teach the doctrine of compound economic growth as the exclusive product of increased per capita investment. The Bible teaches compound economic growth as a positive sanction for obeying biblical laws (Deut. 8:17–18,⁷ 28:1–14⁸). The Bible does not teach that members of societies that want to grow economically should take their money—money that would have been spent for charitable purposes—and invest all of it in the stock market. In contrast, free market economists recommend investing, not charity, because their analytical framework does not offer any reliable conclusions regarding the role of charity in economic growth. They see economic growth as the main solution to poverty in the long run.⁹ In contrast, the Bible focuses on the needs of the poor in the present.

D. Darwinism vs. Charity

William Jennings Bryan was a politically liberal American politician who received the Democratic Party's nomination for President three times.¹⁰ He was also a conservative Presbyterian elder. He opposed Darwinism. The reason why he opposed it had little to do with the details of evolution or the biblical text in Genesis 1. He opposed it because of Darwinism's opposition to Christian ethics—specifically, charity.

Bryan recognized that a ruthless hostility to charity was the dark side of Darwinism. Had Darwin's theory been irrelevant, he said, it would have been harmless. "This hypothesis, however, does incalculable harm. It teaches that Christianity impairs the race physically. That was the first implication at which I revolted. It led me to review the doctrine and reject it entirely."¹¹ He cited the notorious (and morally inescapable) passage in Darwin's Descent of Man (1871): "With savages, the weak in body or mind are soon eliminated; and those that survive commonly exhibit a vigorous state of health. We civilized men, on the other hand, do our utmost to check the process of elimination; we build asylums for the imbecile, the maimed, and the sick; we institute poor-laws; and our medical men exert their utmost skill to save the life of every one to the last moment. There is reason to believe that vaccination has preserved thousands, who from a weak constitution would formerly have succumbed to small-pox. Thus the weak mem-

7. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 21.

8. Ibid., ch. 69.

9. F. A. Harper, "The Greatest Economic Charity," in Mary Sennholz (ed.), On Freedom and Free Enterprise: Essays in Honor of Ludwig von Mises (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1956), ch. 7. (Http://Mises.org/books/freeenterprise.pdf)

10. 1896, 1900, 1908.

11. William Jennings Bryan, In His Image (New York: Revell, 1922), p. 107.

bers of civilised societies propagate their kind. No one who has attended to the breeding of domestic animals will doubt that this must be highly injurious to the race of man.”¹² He could have continued to quote from the passage until the end of the paragraph: “It is surprising how soon a want of care, or care wrongly directed, leads to the degeneration of a domestic race; but excepting in the case of man himself, hardly any one is so ignorant as to allow his worst animals to breed.”¹³ It is significant that Darwin at this point footnoted his cousin Francis Galton’s famous 1865 Macmillan’s magazine article and his book, Hereditary Genius, a defense of scientific human breeding: eugenics.

Darwin in the next paragraph wrote that sympathy, “the noblest part of our nature,” leads men to do these racially debilitating things.¹⁴ Bryan replied: “Can that doctrine be accepted as scientific when its author admits that we cannot apply it ‘without deterioration in the noblest part of our nature’? On the contrary, civilization is measured by the moral revolt against the cruel doctrine developed by Darwin.”¹⁵

Darwin was taken very seriously by many Progressives on the matter of charity. In her book, The Pivot of Civilization (1922), Margaret Sanger criticized the inherent cruelty of charity. She insisted that organized efforts to help the poor are the “surest sign that our civilization has bred, is breeding, and is perpetuating constantly increasing numbers of defectives, delinquents, and dependents.”¹⁶ Such charity must be stopped, she insisted. The fertility of the working class must be regulated in order to reduce the production of “benign imbeciles, who encourage the defective and diseased elements of humanity in their reckless and irresponsible swarming and spawning.”¹⁷ Swarming (like insects), spawning (like fish): here was marvelous zoological rhetoric from the lionized founder of Planned Parenthood. “If we must have welfare, give it to the rich, not the poor,” she concluded.¹⁸ “More children from the fit, less from the unfit: that is the chief issue of birth control.”¹⁹

12. Ibid., pp. 107–108.

13. Charles Darwin, The Descent of Man (New York: Modern Library, [1871] n.d.), p. 501.

14. Ibid., p. 502.

15. Bryan, In His Image, p. 109.

16. Margaret Sanger, The Pivot of Civilization (New York: Brentano’s, 1922), p. 108; cited in Grant, Grand Illusions, p. 27.

17. Sanger, ibid., p. 115; cited in Grant, ibid.

18. Ibid., p. 96; cited in Grant, ibid., p. 28.

19. Sanger, “Birth Control,” Birth Control Review (May 1919); cited in Grant, ibid., p. 27.

Conclusion

The author of Hebrews taught that charitable giving is a form of sacrifice that is pleasing to God. He spends no time on capital investment. He does not discuss charitable giving as a means of adding to social capital. Yet this is one implication of charitable giving. It reduces personal risk, for it takes care of those people who have fallen into hard times through no fault of their own.

The economist who favors the use of tax money to support the poor prefers tax-funded welfare programs to charitable giving. He also prefers this to increased per capita investment. The Bible provides no support for this view. It also does not support a society in which all of the money that would otherwise have gone to charitable purposes be invested in the stock market or some similar institution.

The Bible calls on covenant-keepers to give sacrificially, as a way to please God, to please the church, and to please our fellow men. Charity has positive effects on society as a whole. It decreases fear of the future. This frees up men to become more entrepreneurial. And more charitable.

BELOW-COST WISDOM

If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him. But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering. For he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed. For let not that man think that he shall receive any thing of the Lord. A double minded man is unstable in all his ways (James 1:5–8).

The theocentric issue was two-fold: point two, hierarchy, and point four, sanctions.¹

A. Wisdom Through Prayer

James announces that it is possible to obtain wisdom through prayer. The author of the book of Proverbs says that wisdom is more valuable than gold and silver (Prov. 16:16). It is superior to rubies (Prov. 8:11). “Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom: and with all thy getting get understanding” (Prov. 4:7). Combining these announcements, we legitimately conclude that the most precious of all economic assets is available for free the asking.

This is an astounding assertion. It runs counter to the fundamental assertion of modern economics, namely, that there is no such thing as a free lunch. All of modern economics begins with the assumption of scarcity: at zero price, there is greater demand than supply. James says that, with respect to the most valuable of all scarce resources, scarcity can be overcome through prayer. Prayer takes time. More important, prayer takes faith. James goes on to say that faith is the key ingredient in successful prayer.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), chaps. 2, 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), chaps. 2, 3.

B. Rival Economic Assumptions

Humanistic economics begins with the assumption of scarcity. Humanistic economics does not believe in prayer as a way to overcome scarcity. It does not believe in the existence of a sovereign God who exists outside of the space-time continuum, and who intervenes in history in terms of people's prayers. To affirm such a God is to affirm a limit on the laws of nature. An economist is no more prepared to affirm this than a Darwinian scientist in any other field is prepared to admit it.

In contrast, Christian economics begins with the assumption that God is absolutely sovereign over the creation: point one of the biblical covenant.² Its second point, following the second principle of the biblical covenant, is that there is a hierarchy in creation: God > man > creation. God is sovereign over the creation, and covenant-keeping people are His stewards. They imitate Him as creatures. God created the world by means of wisdom. "The LORD by wisdom hath founded the earth; by understanding hath he established the heavens" (Prov. 3:19). Covenant-keepers re-create when they use wisdom to extend God's kingdom in history. They can gain God's intervention on their behalf by means of prayer. This means that, at bottom, physical scarcity is a relative limiting factor, but it is not an absolute limiting factor. Scarcity can be overcome by a specific form of appeal to God to intervene to overcome the limits of creation.

Humanistic economists are willing to admit that human creativity is a way to re-structure the creation to meet the desires of men. They see creativity in terms of man's sovereignty over nature. But they deny that there is any source of knowledge above man and outside of nature. There is no authoritative source of knowledge or creativity that is outside of the space-time continuum and not subject to it, according to humanism. Some humanistic economists may be sufficiently alert to modern epistemology to understand that Kant's noumenal realm is seen by Kantian philosophers as being a realm outside the space-time continuum, but Kantian philosophers have never identified a bridge between the two realms. The phenomenal realm of scientific causation and the noumenal realm of ethics and freedom are totally separate. Only by such separation can philosophers preserve the ideal of human personality and human freedom from the determinism of scientific cause and effect.³ But this separation necessarily destroys any logical bridge from ethics and freedom back into nature.⁴ So, the consistent Kantian economist sees no hope in prayer as a way to gain relevant knowledge about the scarcity-bound cosmos.

2. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 1. North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 1.

The creation operates under scarcity, but it is possible to overcome these limits by a specific form of appeal to God. God intervenes in history to overcome the limits which the curse on Adam established (Gen. 3:17–19).⁵ This is not to say that scarcity did not exist in the garden of Eden. It did exist. Adam was not omniscient. He could not achieve every goal simultaneously. He therefore had work to do. But scarcity in Eden was not cursed.⁶ It is today. Prayer can overcome the limits of cursed scarcity because it enables the person who prays to gain access to the uniquely valuable asset: wisdom.

Because wisdom is available to covenant-keepers, those covenant-keepers who refuse to take advantage of this offer of what is a below-cost economic resource are hampering their efforts in history. They are not invoking the sovereignty of God through prayer. They are not gaining the wisdom they need at a price they can afford in order to work out their salvation with fear and trembling (Phil. 2:12).⁷ They are not appealing to God to intervene in their lives and provide them with information that is not available at the same price to covenant-break-

3. Richard Kroner, Kant's Weltanschauung (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1914] 1956).

4. Cornelius Van Til returned again and again to the dualism of post-Kantian philosophy. Here is a representative example. "On Kant's view (so largely adopted by subsequent philosophers, be it with modifications) man is utterly free as a citizen of the noumenal realm, the Real world, the world prior to the categorizing process of the mind of man, and utterly determined as a citizen of the phenomenal realm. As a citizen of the noumenal realm he cannot know himself or his fellow man. As soon as he tries to explain himself as free he has to do so by means of the categories of the phenomenal realm. He must explain himself causally and when he explains himself causally then he has explained his freedom out of existence. To be sure, there is the contingency idea which, as already noted, is one constituent element of the world of phenomena. But then when man appeals to this pure contingency in nature for an explanation of his moral freedom, he reduces his freedom to the freedom of pure chance. Thus man seeks to explain himself in terms of nature but this nature is itself explained in terms of a combination of pure fate and pure chance. The result is the purely meaningless and therefore chaos." Van Til, A Christian Theory of Knowledge (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1969), p. 313.

5. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

6. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), pp. 124–26. (<http://bit.ly/gn-world>)

7. Chapter 20.

ers. They are in a position to gain an advantage over covenant-breakers, because they have access to a God who intervenes on behalf of His covenant-keeping people. He is willing to provide the crucial economic asset merely on request.

James says that it is mandatory that the person who prays for divine wisdom believe that God intervenes in history to give His people wisdom on request. Without confidence in the outcome of the prayer, the person who prays is a double-minded person. "For let not that man think that he shall receive any thing of the Lord." James says a double-minded person operates at a disadvantage. He says we must be single-minded in our pursuit of wisdom.

C. Hierarchy of Priorities

Wisdom is crucial in the extension of the kingdom of God in history. Wisdom provides covenant-keepers with a hierarchy of priorities that in turn enables them to allocate scarce economic resources efficiently and ethically. "When wisdom entereth into thine heart, and knowledge is pleasant unto thy soul; Discretion shall preserve thee, understanding shall keep thee: To deliver thee from the way of the evil man, from the man that speaketh froward [fraudulent] things" (Prov. 2:10–12). Because they see how their resources should be allocated in order to extend the kingdom of God on a cost-effective basis, they are supposed to pray to God in order to receive wisdom. Not to do this would be to compete against covenant-breakers on their terms. God does not recommend that His people waste resources in their efforts to extend the kingdom of God in history. Thus, He calls upon covenant-keepers to pray in faith to Him to gain wisdom, just as Solomon prayed to Him to gain wisdom (I Kings 3:9).

When an individual adopts the hierarchy of values and therefore the hierarchy of priorities which God has for his life, and then allocates scarce economic resources to achieve these priorities, he conserves resources. This enables him to achieve priorities that are further down the list of priorities which God has for his life. He is therefore able to achieve more in his life with the resources he possesses. This is the biblical concept of efficiency. He should not waste resources in the vain pursuit of goals which are not on God's list of priorities for him.

Because God is willing to provide wisdom on this low-cost basis, more of it should be demanded. A fundamental law of economics is this: at a lower price, more is demanded. God's offer of wisdom requires that individuals have faith in the sovereignty of God over history, and that He intervenes in history on behalf of covenant-keepers who pray to Him for wisdom. The absence of such faith is a barrier in the pursuit of wisdom. People should surrender their faith in the sovereignty of self-proclaimed autonomous man. They must also abandon their faith in the sovereignty of autonomous nature. They must adopt the fundamental principle of the biblical covenant model: the absolute sovereignty of God. If they refuse to start here, they pray as double-minded people. Double-minded people do not receive their verbal requests.

God wants His people to be single-minded people. That is, He wants them to be confident in their requests to God to intervene on their behalf in history. As they gain greater confidence in this regard, they become more effective servants. They become better able to allocate scarce economic resources in their efforts to extend the kingdom of God in history. They become more efficient. The concept of stability in decisionmaking is based on the concept of the single-minded purpose of covenant-keepers in their quest to extend the kingdom of God in history.

D. Compound Growth

In order to gain wisdom, we need wisdom. Wisdom begins, the Proverbs tell us, with faith in God. “The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom: and the knowledge of the holy is understanding” (Prov. 9:10). The greater an individual’s faith in God, the more wisdom he possesses. It takes wisdom to get wisdom.

In this sense, wisdom is a positive covenant sanction. God gives wealth to individuals and societies in order to confirm His covenant. “But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:18).⁸ This concept of covenant confirmation through positive feedback also applies to wisdom. A double-minded person is an unwise person. Such a person prays for wisdom, but he is unlikely to gain greater wisdom. This is because he lacks the wisdom of confident prayer.

Wisdom is ultimately a gift of God. James affirms later in this passage that all gifts come from God (1:17).⁹ The gift of wisdom comes from God. It is extended in history through prayer. Praying with confidence for greater wisdom results in greater wisdom, which increases the covenant-keeper's confidence in the power of prayer. This is another case of compound growth. It is compound growth of the crucial economic asset: wisdom.

8. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 22.

E. Competition

The author of Proverbs contrasts the fool and the wise man in terms of their attitudes toward wisdom and its benefits. The fool does mischief as if it were a game. "It is as sport to a fool to do mischief: but a man of understanding hath wisdom" (Prov. 10:23). The wise man has an advantage over the fool. He does not pursue mischief. God rewards righteousness in history (Deut. 28:1–14).¹⁰

The fool sees wisdom as too expensive. Its price is righteousness. He will not pay this price. "Wherefore is there a price in the hand of a fool to get wisdom, seeing he hath no heart to it?" (Prov. 17:16). The fool cuts himself off from wisdom. "Speak not in the ears of a fool: for he will despise the wisdom of thy words" (Prov. 23:9).

The covenant-keeper who pursues wisdom therefore has a competitive advantage over the fool. Through prayer, he can gain the knowledge he needs to prosper. He learns how to make decisions based on God's priorities for his life. The fool chooses foolishness, thereby forfeiting his advantage.

This points to the extension of God's kingdom in history. There is compound growth for covenant-keepers. The blessings of the covenant confirm the covenant. These blessings extend God's kingdom. In contrast, the fool squanders his advantages.

Conclusion

Single-minded prayer leads to wisdom. Wisdom gives men an ethical advantage. They can make better judgments. This was Solomon's prayer. "Give therefore thy servant an understanding heart to judge thy people, that I may discern between good and bad: for who is able to judge this thy so great a people?" (I Kings 3:9). Making better judgments means applying God's law to specific circumstances: biblical casuistry. This produces compound growth (Deut. 28:1–14).

9. Chapter 33.

10. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 69.

33

MONEY AND STATUS

Let the brother of low degree rejoice in that he is exalted: But the rich, in that he is made low: because as the flower of the grass he shall pass away. For the sun is no sooner risen with a burning heat, but it withereth the grass, and the flower thereof falleth, and the grace of the fashion of it perisheth: so also shall the rich man fade away in his ways (James 1:9–11).

The theocentric issue here was hierarchy: point two of the biblical covenant.¹

A. No Favor for the Rich

One of the continuing themes in the epistle of James is that the rich tend to be favored by church leaders. He warns the rich not to take themselves or their wealth seriously, and he warns rulers within the congregation not to pay special attention to members of the congregation who are rich.

In this section of the epistle, James speaks of the poor as having been elevated. He speaks of the rich as being at the ragged edge of destruction. He speaks of the rich as grass, which is burned by the sun. A blade of grass does not survive.

James is making a point: the temporal nature of earthly riches. A rich man benefits from his wealth. His wealth should not persuade him that he is ethically superior to the poor man. He is not socially superior to a poor member of the congregation. A poor man may be poor for a specific reason relating to the kingdom of God. A poor man who is a member of the local congregation should regard himself as equal, covenantly speaking, to any rich member. The rich man should take the same attitude regarding the poor man. The issue is covenantal status: either saved or lost. All other issues are secondary or less.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

B. Social Status

In what sense is the brother of low degree an exalted person? James does not say. The implication is that God has exalted every individual who has been granted adoption into the family of God.

In contrast, the rich man is made low. In what sense is he low? As a member of the congregation, he is placed on equal covenantal status with poor members. He is not to be in a position to lord it over them, based on his greater wealth. His social status within the congregation is not different from the social status of everyone else in the congregation. All have been set apart—sanctified—by the grace of God. The rich man is elevated in terms of what he can purchase. He is not elevated with respect to that which cannot be purchased: covenantal status. He has been made a covenant-keeper by the direct intervention of God.

Within the context of the era in which James was writing, the rich man has been made low. He has moved down from the high status that his wealth entitled him to in a covenant-breaking society. He has now joined with others who are considered outside the society around them. He has forfeited some degree of high status because of those with whom he associates. He now associates openly with people who have no money, no social status, and no future within covenant-breaking society. The rich man, by becoming a member of the church, has moved downward socially. He still has his wealth, but his social status is now lower than before. This is the price of adoption.

C. Death Swallows Status

James reminds the rich that they will die. Why was this warning necessary? Everyone knows that he is going to die. This awareness does not distinguish a rich man from the poor around him. All are all subject to death. They are all subject to the sun. The sun dries out the grass and the flower. This desiccation will be the effect of death for every member of the congregation. Rich men will fade away. But rich men have always faded away. Why should James bring up this fact at this point?

He is reminding the rich that their money will not protect them from the legacy of death. Whatever their money has accomplished within the broader community will be forgotten. Every society fades away. All but a handful of people have faded in the memory of the survivors. There is no continuity possible in terms of one's wealth. James is reminding them of this, so that they will not trust in that which is not trustworthy.

The poor man already knows this. He knows that he has no money. He knows that he cannot make much impact in the general society based on his wealth. He suspects that he will fade away in the memories of his descendants. He has no reason to trust in his wealth. He has so little wealth that it will do him no good in any quest for immortality. Immortality is provided only by God, not by society. Immortality is judicially imputed to individuals by God, not imputed by surviving members of a society.

The sun is merciless in its destruction of individual blades of grass. There is no escape from this destruction in history. Yet there is an escape eternally: regeneration. This escape is based on the promise of bodily resurrection. Money cannot buy access to bodily resurrection. Money is useless for this purpose. Rich members of the congregation and poor members of the congregation will both be resurrected to eternal life.

The brother of low degree has been exalted in terms of his eternal state. The brother of a high degree has been made low in terms of his social status within the pagan community. Rich brother and poor brother have equal judicial status within the congregation. Because of this fact, the pagan peers of the rich member have imputed a declining status to him. His money cannot buy him status, because his membership in an outcast organization has compromised his previous high status within the community.

Differentiations of wealth and poverty have no meaningful purpose within the congregation of the saints. This is James' message throughout this epistle. He lays the groundwork here. He says that the poor man has been exalted, and the rich man has been made low, both from the same cause: membership in the church.

The important things of this life money cannot buy. The most important thing of this life that money cannot buy is access to eternal life, which is received in history. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him" (John 3:36). The judicial status of membership in God's family is imputed in history. This judicial status carries across the barrier of death into eternity. The imputation of Christ's perfection, which includes His death, resurrection, and ascension to the right hand of God, becomes a lawful possession of covenant-keepers in general. This is the inheritance that really matters. So, social differentiation based on the possession of money and the things that money can buy is dismissed by James as irrelevant. This puts money in its place. This puts Mammon in his place.

James is dealing with a problem that has plagued the church throughout its history. Church leaders have given favorable status to wealthy people, and they have relegated the poor to the fringes of the church. James' point is that the rich within the church have been relegated to the fringes by the society outside the church. He is saying that all members of the church should be granted equal status based on their membership. This is a form of radical equality.

It is not a form of economic equality. There is no suggestion in this epistle that the rich should give all their goods to members of the church who are poor. There is not to be economic equality within a local congregation. There is not to be economic equality across all congregations. There is equal judicial status with respect to access to the sacraments. This is the supreme equality in life. It implies radical inequality between covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers. The Bible does not teach equality. It teaches radical inequality between saved and lost. This is the inequality that matters most.

Conclusion

James distrusted the rich. He distrusted them because he believes they have an exalted opinion of themselves. He does not share this opinion. The rich man may regard himself as something special. James reminded him that he is no more special than a blade of grass in the hot sun. He will wither, and those around him will wither.

Money is related to temporal life. It is related to flesh and blood. It should not be trusted, James said, any more than grass should trust in itself to avoid the effect of a burning sun on it. Rich men should come to grips with the reality of their own mortality.

PROPERTY AND COMMON GRACE

Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning (James 1:17).

The theocentric issue here is two-fold: hierarchy and sanctions, points two and four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Gifts from God

This verse teaches that all of the benefits that we receive in life come from God. This affirms categorically that God is the source of all economic increase. He is the source of original capital; He is the source of capital's output; He is the source of profitability. There is nothing of benefit that anyone receives that has not come from God.

This position establishes beyond all shadow of a doubt the principle of cosmic personalism.² Free market economists speak of markets as being impersonal. In the sense of market prices as not being the result of systematic manipulation, it is legitimate to speak of markets as impersonal. The common textbook example of an impersonal market is the wheat market. The price of a specific quality of wheat is set by supply and demand. No producer can change the price of wheat; no customer can change the price of wheat. The economist argues that wheat is allocated by personal bids to buy and sell, but that no single bid has any measurable effect on its price. The price is therefore seen as impersonal.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), chaps 2, 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), chaps. 2, 4.

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1.

James does not deny that God operates through social and cosmic forces that cannot be manipulated by individuals. Our universe therefore appears to be impersonal. It is not. This includes the free-market social order. The free-market social order is a benefit that comes from God. So are specific markets. The fact that prices on a particular market are not influenced visibly by the direct intervention of God does not mean that the comprehensive system which delivers our food to us is not part of the overall common grace of God.³ Furthermore, these benefits place the recipients in a position of debt to God. Those who benefit from these social and economic systems act as stewards of God. Those to whom much is given have a greater responsibility than those to whom less is given (Luke 12:47–48).⁴

B. Ownership and Responsibility

Christian economics rests on the doctrine of God's creation of the world out of nothing. It also rests on the idea of God's grant of ownership to Adam as the legal representative of all mankind. This principle of stewardship, meaning hierarchical responsibility, in turn establishes the legitimacy of private property. Stewardship is a four-way system of administration: upward to God, outward to men (who are made in the image of God), downward toward the creation, and inward toward individual achievement. Ownership is never autonomous. It is always covenantal.

1. Free Gifts Are Not Free

By insisting that all good gifts are from God, James affirms the reality of the Bible's concept of stewardship. Property does not come from the civil government; therefore, all socialist economics is incorrect. Property does not come from individual action and original creativity; therefore, all humanistic free market economics is incorrect. All property comes from God. Christian economics begins with the assumption of methodological covenantalism. It does not begin with socialism's principle of methodological holism. It also does not begin with humanistic, free market economics' assumption of methodological individualism.

3. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987).

4. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

James in this passage says that the source of all gifts is God. This passage, when interpreted in terms of other passages relating to the system of stewardship that God established with Adam, enables us to understand the origin of private property. God gives specific people assets of many kinds. These are true gifts. They have been paid for by the sacrifice of Jesus Christ at Calvary. They are not earned by the recipients. However much men pay back to God through their tithes, offerings, and lifelong service to God, all men except Jesus Christ remain in a debt relationship to God (Matt. 18:23–35).⁵ We can speak of free gifts in the sense that the recipients were not entitled to them in any legal or moral sense. Whatever they have received from God is more than they deserve. This is a legitimate meaning of the concept of the free gift. But no free gift, so defined, comes without responsibilities. The responsibilities are to God, but they are also to the creation generally.

2. No Free Lunches

Property is a social institution. It is not held autonomously. It is not held apart from legal and moral liabilities. The fundamental legal and moral liability is to God, who is the source of all gifts. There is also representative liability: liability to those who represent God in history. This includes our neighbors. It includes the created realm itself. God publicly established an ecological covenant with Noah (Gen. 9:1–3).⁶ This covenant was a recapitulation of God's original covenant with Adam, who was assigned the task of dressing and defending the garden of Eden.

When we speak of something as being owed, we speak of a debt. This debt is always to God. The free market economist insists, "There are no free lunches." So does the Christian economist, but he means it in a different way. He is not speaking merely of scarcity. He is speaking of covenantal judicial obligations. There are no gifts from God that are not accompanied by personal responsibility for the covenantally faithful allocation of the gifts. These gifts must be paid for. The ultimate payment for these gifts was made by Jesus Christ at Calvary.

There is also a secondary payment for the gifts: personal obligation before God to allocate the gifts in such a way that they extend the kingdom of God in history. Jesus in His parable of the talents presents

5. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 37.

6. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 19.

this system of responsibility as clearly as anything in the history of economics (Matt. 25:14–30).⁷ Men will be judged by God at the final judgment in terms of their performance in multiplying the gifts of capital that they received from God. There will be a day of reckoning. We correctly see this as a day of accounting.

James begins with the assumption of God's grant of ownership to individuals and also to institutions. Covenant-keepers are not autonomous. They are part of an integrated system of covenantal authority. They have responsibilities to others. By grounding all ownership in God's grant of property rights, James is asserting the authority of the church in history. This is why his epistle continually returns to the theme of wealth and poverty within the church. The church does have legitimate economic responsibilities. Members of the church also have individual responsibilities to the church. There is no trace of autonomy in his epistle.

C. Ownership and Common Grace

James does not say that gifts to covenant-keepers are from God, but gifts to covenant-breakers come from another source. He says that all gifts come from God. This fact reinforces the principle of common grace. God gives gifts to the wheat and also to the tares, all of whom live in the same field (Matt. 13:24–30).⁸ This establishes the judicial principle that covenant-breakers are in debt to God. This means that they owe service to God. They are required by God to extend His kingdom in history. If they refuse to do this, they come under His condemnation. This condemnation extends to history and eternity.

To argue that God's gifts to covenant-breakers do not establish definite legal and moral obligations to God would be to deny the principle that Jesus taught in his parable of the talents. The man who received a talent and buried it came under condemnation at the return of the owner. This is the principle that all men must give an account of their stewardship at the final judgment. But the Bible also speaks of responsibility on earth and in time. There are blessings and cursings on earth and in time (Lev. 26; Deut. 28). The kingdom of God is to be extended on earth and in time. The blessings are received on earth and in time.

Any attempt to use the doctrine of common grace to let covenant-

7. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 47.

8. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 29.

breakers off the hook with respect to the administration of the gifts that they receive from God is an attempt to separate history from eternity. It is an attempt to reduce the responsibility of covenant-breakers to God in history. Because the gifts are received in history, responsibility is established in history. Because the gifts are administered in history, the blessings and cursings that are associated with these gifts are also imposed by God in history. The final judgment is not a total discontinuity from the preliminary judgments that God brings in history.

This verse establishes a fundamental principle of ownership: men do not possess any blessing autonomously. They are not the source of their own blessings. The biblical principle that blessings derive from God establishes the principle of the sovereignty of God over history. The source of blessings in history is the God of a society. James says that God is the source of all blessings in history. Therefore, He is the God of every society in history. Any society that rejects the idea that God is the source of all of its blessings is in rebellion against God. Members of the society can therefore expect the negative sanctions of God in history. God is not mocked.⁹ He visits the iniquity of the fathers on the third and fourth generation (Ex. 20:5).¹⁰ He does not forget.

The biblical doctrine of common grace affirms the principle that all gifts are from God, and therefore all men are responsible to God for the covenantally faithful administration of all of their gifts. The biblical doctrine of common grace rests on a concept of predictable sanctions in history. God as the Redeemer does not treat covenant-breaking societies differently from the way that He treats covenant-keeping societies. Also, God as the Creator does not treat covenant-breaking societies differently from the way that He treats covenant-keeping societies. Any attempt to differentiate God as Creator from God as Redeemer flies in the face of James' principle here, namely, that God is the source of all blessings in history. The moment we accept this principle, we are supposed to accept the parallel principle that more is expected from those who receive much from God than from those who receive less from God (Luke 12:47–48). God is the source of all gifts in his capacity as Creator. This passage in no way indicates that God is the

9. "Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap" (Gal. 6:7).

10. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 22.

source only of gifts to covenant-keepers in his office as Redeemer. There is no source of gifts in history other than God. There is therefore no escape from the covenantal obligations of ownership.

Conclusion

James said that all gifts come from God. This reinforces the biblical principle of stewardship. These gifts establish legal liability and personal responsibility. All men owe everything to God, as the Creator and sustainer of life. They are under a covenant to God.

This verse affirms common grace. God grants gifts to covenant-breakers. Covenant-breakers did not earn the right to these gifts. As recipients, they are under God and in debt to God.

This verse denies man's autonomy. It therefore denies both socialism and libertarianism. Man holds property by covenant, not by grant of state authority, and not by self-creation or self-ownership.

CLOTHES DO NOT MAKE THE COVENANT MAN

My brethren, have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, with respect of persons. For if there come unto your assembly a man with a gold ring, in goodly apparel, and there come in also a poor man in vile raiment; And ye have respect to him that weareth the gay clothing, and say unto him, Sit thou here in a good place; and say to the poor, Stand thou there, or sit here under my footstool: Are ye not then partial in yourselves, and are become judges of evil thoughts? Hearken, my beloved brethren, Hath not God chosen the poor of this world rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to them that love him? But ye have despised the poor. Do not rich men oppress you, and draw you before the judgment seats? Do not they blaspheme that worthy name by the which ye are called? (James 2:1–7)

The theocentric principle here is sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. No Judicial Respect for Persons

Here, James applies a judicial principle from the Mosaic law: no judicial respect for persons. “Thou shalt not wrest judgment; thou shalt not respect persons, neither take a gift: for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous” (Deut. 16:19).² This law governed all of Israel’s judges, civil and ecclesiastical, when they presided over legal cases. A judge was not allowed to bend the law in order to benefit either a rich man or a poor man in a dispute. “Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty: but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour” (Lev. 19:15).³ The Mosaic law had authority over all men living inside the boundaries of Israel. God mandated that His law would be honored rather than individuals.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 40.

B. Discrimination by Class

James takes this principle and applies it to the affairs of the local congregation. This application does not refer to court situations. It refers to social discrimination based on class position. Class in this sense refers to economic position. There are also status differences, such as family name, cultural background, national origin, or racial background. Status distinctions are not under consideration here. The issue here is wealth. One individual has a great wealth; another individual has very little wealth. One individual comes dressed in expensive clothing; the other individual comes dressed in poor clothing. There is a visible distinction between them: the quality of their clothing.

James warns that someone whose assignment is to seat people in the congregation must not seat people according to their wealth. He is not to seat the rich man in what would be perceived as a place of honor. Culturally, these distinctions can be played out in various ways. In some societies, a seat in the front row of the church would be considered an honor. In other societies, people avoid sitting in the front row, preferring to be farther back in the room. But, in most churches through the centuries, there has been preferential seating. James is saying that access to all seats should be on some basis other than perceived wealth. A familiar basis is first come, first served. He who arrives at church earlier is to be taken to whatever seat is available, irrespective of his status.

In modern times, the individual chooses from among empty seats where he will sit. As late as 1900, it was common in Protestant churches to set aside certain rows of pews for annual purchase. A family would pay to have access to a particular pew. Prices varied in terms of perceived value. A person who was willing to spend more for a particular pew believed that he was buying a place of honor. James would have opposed such a pricing system. While it was not the same as having someone in authority guide an individual to a seat of honor, it was unquestionably a way of respecting persons. The difference was, in contrast to the practice in James' day, the churches sold seats of high honor and kept the money. It was an auction system rather than an allocation system based on perceived wealth.

3. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 14.

Both systems promote favoritism for the wealthy. The difference is, the American system of selling pews allowed the church to gain additional revenue immediately. The system in James' day was more indirect. Someone in authority in the local congregation sent down word to whoever was in charge of seating people that rich people were to be given the best seats, however "best" was defined. The church was courting favor with rich members. The church did not profit directly from this discrimination, but there is no question that church leaders expected the church to profit indirectly because of this favoritism.

C. Rich in Faith

James moves the discussion to the issue of faithfulness. He speaks of the poor as rich in faith. He speaks of them as heirs of the kingdom, which is promised to all those who love God. This is the great inheritance in history and eternity. The adopted sons of God are heirs of God. This inheritance is made manifest by membership in the church. Yet, within the church, the seating arrangements revealed differentiation with respect to the inheritance. Rich members were seated in the best seats. However the congregation defined "best seats," the church was testifying to a differentiation of inheritance in eternity.

1. Beyond the Grave

James understood the principle of continuity. There is continuity between covenant-keeping in history and covenantkeeping in eternity. There is continuity based on God's grace in history and eternity. It is a continuity of inheritance. Eternal life is granted in history (John 3:36), yet it is inherited comprehensively only at the final judgment.

By showing respect to persons with respect to seating, rulers of the church were asserting their ability to discern comparative inheritances beyond the grave. James says that poor men are rich in faith. Poor men are inheritors of the kingdom. So, James concludes, differences in outward appearance with respect to clothing count for nothing in evaluating the comparative inheritances in eternity. If this is the case, James concludes, church leaders should not differentiate with respect to seating arrangements.

2. First Come, First Served

James does not tell the person in charge of seating that he should attempt to evaluate comparative inheritances beyond the grave. He is not to show respect for persons. The obvious way to avoid making such judgments is to allow those who arrive first to sit wherever they choose. There is a premium on early arrival rather than money spent on clothing.

James does not specifically cite the principle of first come, first served. But this principle is almost universally implemented whenever access to any scarce resource is not based on either favoritism by the owner or the free market principle of high bid wins. If people are not granted access to property based on competitive bidding in the marketplace, nor based on personal favoritism shown by those who have authority over allocation, then the principle of first come, first served is easy to implement. No one objects. Easy implementation counts for a great deal.

The English Baptist preacher, Charles Spurgeon, who preached in the late nineteenth century, was so popular that the church would fill up rapidly hours before the service. Spurgeon's church adopted the principle of handing out tickets to non-members. If you received a ticket, you were guaranteed access to the sanctuary during the service. This kept people from wasting time by standing in line. Yet, even here, there had to be some rule for gaining access to the tickets, other than high bid wins. That principle could not be the quality of apparel. However access is granted, James' governing principle here is that the allocation of seats should not be based on wealth.

James does not say that poor members of the congregation deserve access to preferred seating based on their poverty. He is not hinting that poor people have a superior claim to privileged seats. He compares poor people in the congregation to heirs of the kingdom. They have been singled out by God to receive the supreme blessing: adoption into the family of God. Their right to access is based on their covenantal position, not their poverty.

D. Rich Oppressors

Not only does he praise poor men as being rich in faith and heirs to the kingdom, he criticizes rich men for oppression. Oppression is specific in the Bible: it has to do with corrupt judgment based on respect shown to persons.⁴ This is the issue he raises here with respect to seating arrangements. He says that rich people oppress church members and drag them before their judgment seats. In other words, rich people misuse the civil courts in order to steal that which, under biblical law, would have belonged to poor men.

James is not speaking here of rich men who belong to the congregation. If that were his concern, he would instruct leaders of the church to bring charges against them. He has in mind the class position of rich members. They share their class position with covenant-breakers who are unjust judges, who seek to oppress the poor. He compares rich people in the congregation with their covenant-breaking peers. He says that people in the church should not favor rich people in general, because rich people in general use the civil courts to oppress poor people in general.

Because leaders in the church were giving access to the preferred seats based on the class position of the wealthy, James reminds them that this class position is based on judicial discrimination outside the church. Rich people are oppressors. He implies that poor people rarely are, not because they are righteous, but because high civil office is not theirs. Therefore, the trappings of wealth should guarantee no one access to preferred seating.

James was hostile to the rich in general. Jesus was also hostile to the rich in general. He said that few of them will enter the kingdom of God (Matt. 19:24).⁵ This is another way of saying that God, in His infinite wisdom, does not often grant special grace to rich people. God discriminates against rich people. James does not say that the church should also discriminate against rich people. He does not say that the church should discriminate at all. He says that the church should honor the principle of the Mosaic law: no respect of persons.

Leaders in the church are not to create social benefits out of nothing, such as preferential seating, and then allocate these benefits to the rich, merely because they are rich. James points out that the rich in general are morally corrupt. So, in allocating access to the best seats based on the quality of a person's apparel, rulers in the church make a serious mistake. They judge the outward man as if money testified to covenantal faithfulness. Jesus said that money testifies against a person's covenant status as an heir to the kingdom of God in history and eternity.

4. North, Authority and Dominion, Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 48.

5. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 38.

James does not tell church leaders to seat people in fine clothing under a footstool. Instead, he tells them to avoid respecting persons. Therefore, no one is to be given preferential seating. The whole concept of preferential seating must collapse whenever this principle of seating is honored. If a poor man in poor clothing has lawful access to preferential seating, then there is no such thing as preferential seating. That was James' goal. What he is criticizing is preference. He understands fully that if access to specific seats is not automatically given to people with wealth, then specific seats will not be identified with superior wealth. Access is more likely to be based on people's willingness to get up early, get ready for church rapidly, and show up at church early. This is not a matter of wealth. It is not a matter of status. It is a matter of punctuality.

James does not say that a man should not spend money on expensive clothing. If a man is rich, he is legally authorized to do whatever he wants with that which he owns. Jesus taught this in His parable of the husbandman who hires people all day long to work in his field, and then pays them the same total wage—a daily wage agreed upon in advance. When those who arrived early and worked all day complained that they were being discriminated against, the husbandman asked two rhetorical questions. "Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? Is thine eye evil, because I am good" (Matt. 20:15)?⁶ This parable was designed to teach the sovereignty of God in electing some to eternal life. God gets to do whatever He wants with whatever is His.

Conclusion

There is a tendency for those in positions of authority to favor those with great wealth. This tendency undermines the legal order, for covenants are established by oath-bound promises rather than economic production. It also undermines the church as an independent covenantal institution. The free market principle of high bid wins has no place in covenantal institutions: church, state, or family.

James warns against a visible manifestation of this anti-covenantal practice: seating members in terms of the marks of class position: clothing. He identifies regenerate poor people as recipients of God's inheritance. He identifies regenerate rich people as social peers of covenant-breaking oppressors. The special grace of regeneration is presumed to link all oath-bound members. The common grace of wealth divides them. Seating in church should reflect special grace—either past, in the case of members, or prospective, in the case of visitors.

6. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 40.

36

THE ORIGIN OF WAR

From whence come wars and fightings among you? come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members? Ye lust, and have not: ye kill, and desire to have, and cannot obtain: ye fight and war, yet ye have not, because ye ask not. Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your lusts (James 4:1–3).

The theocentric issue here was sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. War and Lust

In this passage, James sets forth a universal rule regarding the origin of war: lusts in the hearts of men. He writes this letter to covenant-keepers. If wars come from their hearts, which are set upon the lusts of the flesh, how much more do wars come from this cause in covenant-breaking societies?

Is this passage to be taken literally? If it is taken literally, does this indicate that in local congregations, members were literally killing each other? No. Within the congregations, covenant-keepers were in conflict with each other.

Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not kill; and whosoever shall kill shall be in danger of the judgment: But I say unto you, That whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment: and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council: but whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire (Matt. 5:21–22).

What was the problem? James says that the motivation was the de- sire to gain more benefits than God had granted. This desire, when extended broadly into covenant-breaking society, produces warfare. It produces killings. In earlier eras, tribal warfare and clan warfare were common. In today's society, gang wars are common. Oath-bound criminal societies act as though they were civil governments. They execute opponents. They execute members who break the oath.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

B. Unfulfilled Lusts: Covetousness

James says that men desire to obtain that which God has not provided, and because they do not obtain these things, they are in conflict with each other. He then says that the reason that the recipients of his letter do not gain the things that they want is because they do not ask for these things. The obvious context for this statement is prayer. Covenant-keepers could obtain the things that they pray for, but because they do not pray for these things, they wind up in conflict with other covenant-keepers. This is a strong condemnation of the sin of covetousness within the Christian community.

James throughout this epistle calls the lust for wealth a great evil. He believes that the attention given by all members of the congregation to differences in wealth is a perverse activity. He is hostile to the idea that differences in wealth should motivate people to pursue wealth in an unbounded way. This passage is consistent with what he says elsewhere in the epistle.

James' concern is that covenant-keepers are not keeping wealth in the proper perspective. It has become an idol within the church. If it is an idol within the church, then certainly it is an idol outside the church. If it is an unjustifiable lust within the camp of the faithful, then it is surely an unjustifiable lust outside the camp.

C. The Power of Prayer

Why does he say that covenant-keepers can and should pray for the things that they wish to possess? He has said earlier that someone who prays without confidence that God will answer his prayer is a double-minded person.² He recommends that covenant-keepers pray in expectation that God will give them what they pray for.

This raises a question which has bothered Christians from the days of Jesus. Jesus said the same thing. Jesus said that the prayers of the faithful can move mountains.³ Seek and ye shall find, He said.⁴ Ask, and it shall be opened unto you, He affirmed. Yet we know from experience that our prayers often do not result as we had hoped. The answer is consistently no; when it is not no, it is very often wait patiently and see.

2. Chapter 32.

James is not promising something that Jesus had not promised earlier. He is reaffirming what Jesus said. But, if men do not receive the things that they pray for, how can this reduce the amount of conflict within the congregation? The answer is that men must learn to ask for those things in their lives that they want to possess for the purpose of extending the kingdom of God in history. This is always the focus of wealth within a covenant-keeping society. "But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you" (Matt. 6:33).⁵ This is the promise of the New Testament.

The success indicators of this life are a snare and a delusion, Jesus warned. This is encapsulated in his phrase: "For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul" (Matt. 16:26)?⁶ Jesus' point was this: if men serve Mammon, they cannot serve God.⁷ If men pursue the promise of Mammon—more for me in history—then they will find themselves abandoned by God on the day of judgment. That is because they have spent their lives pursuing the promise of Mammon.

The focus of Jesus' concern was the kingdom of God. This focus does not change in the epistle of James. It is the common focus throughout the New Testament. Wealth was not dismissed as illegitimate by any of the New Testament writers. Wealth is described as a snare and a delusion whenever it is considered apart from the kingdom of God in history. The New Testament's concept of success is the

3. "Then came the disciples to Jesus apart, and said, Why could not we cast him out? And Jesus said unto them, Because of your unbelief: for verily I say unto you, If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place; and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you" (Matt. 17:19–20).

4. "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you" (Matt. 7:7).

5. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 15.

6. Ibid., ch. 35.

7. "No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon" (Matt. 6:24). Ibid., ch. 14.

pursuit of the kingdom of God in history. The very pursuit of the kingdom indicates the transition from wrath to grace. This is the great benefit of regeneration. This is special grace. The New Testament's concept of success is not the attainment of the success indicators of this world. In fact, the pursuit of the success indicators, apart from the pursuit of the kingdom of God, is the essence of the worship of Mammon.

James says specifically that people are not to ask for this. In other words, they ask for the wrong things in life. They pursue success indicators in order that they may increase their consumption. They are attempting to match their income with their lusts. The economist intervenes at this point to point out that the lusts of men are beyond known limits (but not "infinite"). Their ability to fulfill all of their lusts is limited because of scarcity. So, the economist affirms, the pursuit of consumption will always hit limits.

James understood this fundamental principle of economics. The whole idea of lust is that it cannot be satiated. It is that terrible curse: "The more you get, the more you want." This is the essence of addiction. It is the essence of the pursuit of Mammon. This is what the entire New Testament warns against.

It is legitimate to pursue wealth as a tool of dominion. The areas of life that are still not completely reclaimed by the people of God in the name of God by the grace of God are beyond known limits. We do not achieve perfection in history. We are always at war within us against the consequences of sin. In this sense, we have scarce resources and an infinite task. So, there will always be a need in every covenant-keeper's life for more money.

D. Self-Discipline

There is also a need for more self-discipline. Within the context of the New Testament, it is more important to have self-discipline than it is to have money. This was equally true in the Old Testament. Man's primary problem is not economic scarcity; man's primary problem is sin. This problem begins in the human heart. The consequences of this are war and conflict. There is no better, no shorter, no more effective statement of this biblical principle than what we find in this passage.

Self-discipline under God in terms of God's Bible-revealed law is the essence of progressive sanctification. This is what Paul meant when he said that he pressed on toward the high calling of the mark of God (I Cor. 9:24). This is what he meant when he said that he ran the good race (Phil. 3:14).⁸ In running the good race, some people need additional economic resources. Men need the division of labor to help them achieve their goal. “Two are better than one; because they have a good reward for their labour. For if they fall, the one will lift up his fellow: but woe to him that is alone when he falleth; for he hath not another to help him up” (Eccl. 4:9–10).⁹ The basis of the expansion of the division of labor is increased capital per capita. This was Adam Smith’s great insight in Wealth of Nations (1776).

We cannot find a Bible verse that says the following: in order to increase per capita output, society needs increased per capita investment. The Bible does say that private property is to be defended, covetousness is to be avoided, lusts of the flesh are to be spurned, charity is to be practiced extensively, the tithe is to be paid to the local congregation, and one day a week is to be set aside for rest.

What we find in history is that societies that observe these principles are also marked by increased thrift and greater per capita output. This is also true of groups such as monastic orders. The monks of the Middle Ages took vows of poverty, but when they were members of monastic orders that emphasized hard work as a way achieving self-discipline, they became richer than most other members of society. This is because they worked hard, consumed little, sold their goods into a free market, made profits on every sale, and reinvested the profits in the tools of production. So, monastic orders that had been structured in terms of the vows of individual poverty wound up becoming enormously wealthy organizations within medieval society. In this sense, the monastic orders pointed to the modern world. They pointed to the productivity involved in reinvested profits, reduced consumption, and attention to the details of production.

Whenever a society adopts as morally binding the recommendation of James in this passage, it will become richer over time. The attitude that James recommends, which is based on the self-discipline of avoiding covetousness, and the refusal to pursue the lusts of the flesh, over time produces a society marked by greater investment per capita, increased output per capita, and therefore increased wealth and income per capita. This is another way of saying that whenever men honor the ethical terms of God’s three institutional covenants, they find that they are the recipients of positive sanctions. This is what Moses told the generation of the inheritance in the wilderness. He said that God brings positive sanctions in history as a means of confirming his covenant with his people. “But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:18).¹⁰ The problem is, Moses warned, individuals then conclude that the power of their hands gave them their wealth (Deut. 8:17).¹¹ This is an ethical temptation, Moses warned, and the result of it in the long run his rebellion against God. When men revolt against God as a society, God will eventually remove the positive sanctions, and will replace them with negative sanctions (Deut. 8:19–20).¹² This is what he did with the Canaanites. This is what he did to the Egyptians. This is the way the world works.

8. Chapter 21.

9. Gary North, Autonomy and Stagnation: An Economic Commentary on Ecclesiastes (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 14.

E. The Promises of Mammon

Jesus warned men not pursue the promises of Mammon. He warned them that it is their obligation to pursue the promises of God. The promise of God is clear: seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you.

James is applying this principle. He warns men that they are subject to wars and confrontations because they are serving Mammon. He does not identify Mammon, but he identifies the common goals of Mammon, especially the pursuit of individual self-indulgence. This is not to say that the pursuit of individual self-interest, within a general moral framework of private property, personal responsibility, and future-orientation cannot produce increased wealth. This can produce increased wealth, which is why Moses warned that men should not look upon their increased wealth and attribute it to the power of their own hands. The same causes will produce the same effects. Whenever covenant-breakers adopt the attitude of covenant-keepers with respect to thrift, future-orientation, private property, attention to the details of production, and all of the other mental attitudes that we call the Protestant ethic, they will get richer. But this wealth will rebound against them, either in history or in eternity.

10. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 22.

11. Ibid., ch. 21.

12. Ibid., ch. 23.

Conclusion

This passage warns us that conflict begins within. It begins with the desire to own more than is suitable for us as customers. James is not hostile to wealth as such. He is hostile to wealth that is accumulated to serve the lusts of men. When it serves men's desire to consume, it threatens to become addictive. From that addiction comes covetousness, and from covetousness comes conflict and war.

AFFIRMING GOD'S SOVEREIGNTY

Go to now, ye that say, To day or to morrow we will go into such a city, and continue there a year, and buy and sell, and get gain: Whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow. For what is your life? It is even a vapour, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away. For that ye ought to say, If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this, or that (James 4:13–15).

The theocentric issue here was the sovereignty of God: point one of the biblical covenant.¹

A. The Sovereignty of God

This passage is not generally recognized as being a premier passage in defense of the doctrine of the absolute sovereignty of God, yet it is probably more practical in defense of this doctrine than any other passage in the Bible. It is not speaking about some broad theological principle. It is speaking about how we should regard the outcome of our daily activities. James goes so far as to say that an individual should verbally affirm his complete dependence on God for the day-to-day activities of his life. He says that when an individual says that he will do this or that the next day, he should add: “if it is the Lord’s will.”

For someone who converses among covenant-breaking peers, this language is peculiar. For someone outside God’s covenantal community, such an observation or qualification to a simple statement about what a person intends to do the next day, would be regarded as exceptional. We might even say that it would be regarded as eccentric. When someone says that he is going to do this or that the next day, the person he is speaking with does not expect a verbal affirmation of the sovereignty of God. He might expect such a verbal affirmation coming from a soldier whose unit is under fire, who volunteers to get through enemy lines to get a report to headquarters. Under these circumstances, an affirmation that the person expects to achieve his goal, subject to the intervention of God, is plausible. His colleagues in the field can understand why a person would appeal to divine sovereignty as the basis of his ability to get through enemy lines. But it is not considered normal for an individual to make such a qualification regarding whether or not he will go to the store the next day. Yet, in terms of the Bible's explanation of causation, each expectation is equally dependent on the sovereignty of God for its completion.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 1.

B. A Business Trip

James uses as his example a business trip to a distant city. The individual says that he will leave the next day and be gone for a year. He is going there to buy and sell and make a profit. James adds that such an incomplete verbal affirmation of one's plans is not prudent. He says that an individual does not know what is going to happen the next day. Why should someone announce to his compatriots that he is going on an extended journey in order to make a profit? There are too many pitfalls in this life for anyone to make a broad prediction about what he is going to do and achieve over the following year. There are too many variables.

James uses as his example a year-long business trip. Such a trip involves extensive planning. For someone to leave his home for a distant city as part of a business venture is abnormal. Such a journey would be made only by someone who is fully committed to his business. This means departing for a considerable period of time. An individual must make extensive plans in order to achieve success in a project as long term as this one. James says the individual should make it clear to his listeners that such planning is subject to many revisions. This is why he is supposed to affirm the sovereignty of God in discussing his plans.

James does not criticize an individual for making plans to conduct business in a distant location in search of gain. He understands that an individual would not make the distant journey, and pay for lodging and food in a distant city, unless the person had a very big project in mind. This project is expected to generate considerable income. In other sections of his epistle, James is critical of people who possess great wealth. He sees them as oppressors. But he is not critical of the activities by which a businessman seeks wealth. He is well aware of the sacrifices that the businessman must make in order to be successful on the road. He reminds the individual not to be overconfident about his abilities to generate a profit under such circumstances. He calls the individual's attention to the doctrine of the sovereignty of God. God may reward the man's business endeavor. God may choose not to reward it. God may even kill him in the interim.

James does not say that the person might have an accident. He says that an individual cannot know what is going to happen to him, in contrast to God's knowledge of the future. There are no accidents for God.

The typical person is well aware of this. He knows from experience that life is a series of speed bumps and detours. Yet James says that covenant-keepers must offer verbal reminders regarding the problematic character of their immediate plans. So committed should a covenant-keeper be in affirming a universe in which the sovereignty of God is the crucial factor that he should intersperse his everyday language regarding what his plans are with verbal affirmations of the sovereignty of God. James is well aware that such affirmations are not common in daily speech. For someone to add these comments is for him to identify himself as a follower of a religion that believes in the sovereignty of God. Most religions do not believe this.

C. Life Is a Vapor

James speaks of human life as a vapor. "For what is your life? It is even a vapour, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away." Life is short. People come and go. They are intensely important to themselves and somewhat important to those around them. But those around them are vapors, too. Life is a mutual admiration society or a mutual detestation society of vapors.

A vapor has few traces when it appears and none after it departs. Most of what most men do in history leaves no visible traces. The number of people who gain as much as a footnote in history is incredibly small. This may change a little with modern Internet technology. Billions of people will leave traces somewhere in cyberspace. Occasionally, a researcher using a search engine while looking for something completely different may stumble upon a link to a record testifying to a person's existence. He will not click the link except by mistake. He will leave any Web page that does not relate directly to his search or else catch his interest. The fact that there is a digital record of something that a person has done in no way guarantees that the general public will ever acknowledge his existence or be aware of whatever it was that he did. As far as the world is concerned, he was a vapor.

Biblically speaking, covenant-keepers know that everything a man does leaves a permanent record. Jesus said: "But I say unto you, That every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment. For by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned" (Matt. 12:36–37). God is aware of all of it. He imputes meaning to it. He is not surprised by any of it. And He never forgets. So, the fact that other men do not remember what a person did is neither here nor there in the grand sweep of history. God knows exhaustively what everyone has done. This is why God is the cosmic Judge. But, insofar as other men are aware of a person's work in this life, it seems random as to whether or not anyone will remember any of it. This is the meaning of life as a vapor. This is why covenant-keepers are to affirm the power of God to enable them to achieve their goals. God converts vaporous existence into meaningful existence. He puts substance into men's lives.

Conclusion

Small plans are no less dependent on God than big plans. This is the message of this passage. All plans have relevance only insofar as God's plan has relevance. This is the doctrine of the decree of God.

James says that we must take our plans very seriously. Plans are so serious that we are to confirm verbally and publicly that our plans are wholly dependent on God for their completion. They are no less our plans for this dependence. The plans of many are dependent on the plan of the One, who is also many: a Trinity.

A public affirmation of God's control over our daily plans brings us back to Moses' warning. "And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth. But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day" (Deut. 8:17–18).

CORRUPT RICHES

Go to now, ye rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you. Your riches are corrupted, and your garments are motheaten. Your gold and silver is cankered; and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh as it were fire. Ye have heaped treasure together for the last days. Behold, the hire of the labourers who have reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth: and the cries of them which have reaped are entered into the ears of the Lord of sabaoth. Ye have lived in pleasure on the earth, and been wanton; ye have nourished your hearts, as in a day of slaughter. Ye have condemned and killed the just; and he doth not resist you (James 5:1–6).

The theocentric issue here was sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Hostility to the Rich

This passage is by far the most hostile passage in the Bible directed against rich men. It would be difficult to locate any passage in antiquity that is more hostile to the rich than this one.

James is not complaining about rich people who have membership in a local congregation. Such criminal behavior as he describes here violates the Mosaic law, and also violates basic principles of civil justice. What he describes here are acts of theft. Theft can be prosecuted in civil courts. In societies in which such prosecution is not possible, covenant-keeping victims should not resist. James specifically says this in verse six. If there had been someone in a local congregation who practiced such evil, the elders in the congregation would have been authorized to bring formal charges against this member. A congregation filled with such lawbreakers would not survive long.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

James is presenting a warning to rich men in general who might come across a copy of his letter. He was not in a position to know that the printing press would spread to his letter across the face of the earth. This warning was more in the form of a warning to be read to a congregation, so that members who might at some point attain great wealth would be forewarned against the misuse of this wealth. They would have heard this warning more than once, and they would have been likely to respect the law of God in their business ventures.

B. God's Negative Sanctions

This warning is in the form of a promise: the negative sanctions of God. The recipients of his letter were more likely to be relatively poor people than rich people. Rich people have always been a tiny minority in any society. Membership in a voluntary church has rarely appealed to rich people. Certainly in James' day, the rich would have been unlikely to join. There were no social benefits for joining the Christian church in the first century A.D.

James tells rich men to weep and howl for the miseries that will come upon them. Obviously, the typical rich man would not have heard such a message. If he had heard such a message, he would have dismissed it as the ravings of a madman. A rich man would look at his surroundings and then assess his success in terms of these surroundings. He would have concluded that he was doing better than most people. People who attain great wealth usually regard their success as having been justified by their moral character. If their moral character is not the basis of their self-confidence, then their business acumen is. They believe that they possess greater immunity from the tragedies of life than the common person does. But there is no pure immunity, because death takes all men. James indicates that judgment will then come upon them.

His words do not specifically invoke the final judgment. His words do invoke the Bible's correlation between covenant-breaking and negative sanctions (Deut. 28:15–68).² So, he warns them that the positive sanctions of wealth are insufficient to protect them from the inescapable negative sanctions that are coming. These sanctions are governed by a system of causation that rests on ethics, not on business skills. He warns them that their riches are corrupted. He says that their garments are moth-eaten. This obviously is not to be taken literally. He says elsewhere in the epistle that wealthy people dress themselves in fine clothing (James 2:2–3).³ Yet he calls their clothing moth-eaten. This is obviously symbolic of their moral condition.

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

C. Metaphors of Corruption

James uses a series of metaphors. He describes their silver and gold as cankered. In other words, their wealth is afflicted by a form of visible cankers or sores. He speaks of the rust of their gold and silver. This is obviously not literal with respect to gold. It is one of the unique features of gold that it does not rust, yet Jesus had spoken of treasures on earth as being subject to rust (Matt. 6:19–20).⁴ In other words, the very best that wealth offers is vulnerable to decay. This is another way of saying that wealth protects no one against the God of the Bible.

He says the people of great wealth will eat their own flesh. This is peculiar imagery. There is no real-world phenomenon that we know in which a sane man eats his own flesh. James is pointing to the inescapability of the judgment to come. Rich people think they are safe; they are not safe. Their actions indicate that they are self-destructive.

He accuses them of a specific form of fraud. They hold back the wages of laborers. This is a specific infraction of the Mosaic law. The Mosaic law required that every laborer be paid at the end of the working day (Lev. 19:13).⁵ It is theft to delay payment. He says that the defrauded laborers cry out. These cries enter into the ears of God. The specific phrase, Lord of sabaoth, refers to warfare. The God of the Bible is the God of warfare. He brings comprehensive negative sanctions against His enemies. The rich man who has defrauded his laborers are facing a confrontation with the God of battle.

He says that they have lived in pleasure and have been wanton. In other words, they have been debauched. He speaks of them of having fattened their hearts like beasts fattened for a day of slaughter.

They have condemned and killed the just. This is another example of oppression. By referring to condemnation, James invokes the image of a courtroom. These are corrupt judges who have handed down sentences against the just. They have executed righteous people.

3. Chapter 34.

4. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 13.

5. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 13.

D. The Strategy of Nonviolence

The righteous person, James says, has not resisted corrupt judges. The righteous person has maintained the peace.

1. Maintaining the Peace

Maintaining the peace is a basic requirement in the New Testament. Again and again, the New Testament recommends peace rather than violence when dealing with tyranny.

Ye have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth: But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil: but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloke also. And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain. Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away (Matt. 5:38–42).⁶

Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you; That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same? And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the publicans so (Matt. 5:43–47)?⁷

I exhort therefore, that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men; For kings, and for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour (I Tim. 2:1–3).⁸

6. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 9.

7. Ibid., ch. 10.

8. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 2.

2. Replacement, Not Conquest

The New Testament recommends submission to injustice rather than revolution against it. It favors nonviolence. This is not just a temporary tactic; it is a long-term strategy. This is a strategy of replacement. The New Testament's position is replacement, not conquest. With this perspective, Christians in the fourth century captured the Roman Empire. Yet that empire had persecuted them for three centuries.

This is a difficult doctrine to accept, yet it is found throughout the New Testament. Jesus preached to captive people who were under the authority of the Roman Empire. The authors of the epistles wrote to congregations made up of people who were not in positions of leadership in society. The New Testament recognizes that it is suicidal, self-destructive, and selfdefeating for a tiny minority of social outsiders to adopt policies of violent resistance that are associated with revolutionary groups. The Bible is clear that success comes through adherence to biblical law. It does not come through revolutionary violence.

When Gamaliel spoke to the Sanhedrin, he recommended that the Sanhedrin not punish Peter and the disciples. He said that there had been previous revolutionaries in Israel, and they and their work had come to nothing.

For before these days rose up Theudas, boasting himself to be somebody; to whom a number of men, about four hundred, joined themselves: who was slain; and all, as many as obeyed him, were scattered, and brought to nought. After this man rose up Judas of Galilee in the days of the taxing, and drew away much people after him: he also perished; and all, even as many as obeyed him, were dispersed (Acts 5:36–37).

He recommended that the Sanhedrin leave them alone. The implication was, if these people turned to violence, the Roman authorities would crush them. If they did not turn to violence, and limited their efforts to private persuasion and public preaching, then it was the best policy to let them alone and see whether God rewarded them or not. He persuaded the Sanhedrin on that occasion.

The apostles and the authors of the epistles fully understood that this strategy of submission, prayer, and cooperation was Jesus' strategy of long-term dominion. They adhered to this strategy in their writings. It is a difficult strategy to accept unless you have a concept of an absolutely sovereign God who brings negative sanctions against lawbreakers who use their authority to oppress innocent people. James was an advocate of exactly this kind of God. He believed that God is absolutely sovereign over all things. This is why he tells his listeners and readers not to speak of their plans without invoking the name of God as the source of hope in their achievement of their plans.⁹

E. Comforting the Victims

By addressing the sins of rich oppressors in his letter, James is giving comfort to the victims of oppression. He is telling them that the God they worship is a God of negative sanctions, a God of justice, and a God of war. This God of violence is on the side of righteous people who adopt a strategy of nonviolence. The God of conquest comes to the aid of his people when they adopt a policy of submission.

When James condemns rich oppressors, he is encouraging their poor victims. He is saying that the God of the Bible is not blind, nor is He impotent. The God of the Bible is the God of warfare, and He will bring negative sanctions against people who appear to be immune from the common cares of this life. He uses language which points to the moral nakedness of those who achieved great wealth by means of corruption. He is making it clear that corruption, while in the short run can produce great wealth, will at the produce impoverishment and destruction. Those who gained their wealth through immoral acts and fraud have achieved in their high places at a price that is far higher than they understand. This price should be avoided at all costs. Covenant-keepers should not fall into the trap of believing that earthly success that is achieved through moral corruption is anything worth pursuing.

His letter serves as an inoculation against evil within the camp of the faithful. Those who grow rich as covenant-keepers will not do so by following the self-destructive path way of the corrupt rich people condemned by James in this passage.

Conclusion

James condemns the oppressing rich in no uncertain terms. They have gained their wealth through injustice. They are thieves. They are men to condemn the just and execute them. These are the leaders of society in James' day. He does not spare them verbally because God will not spare them eternally.

9. Chapter 36.

39

LADIES' FASHIONS

Likewise, ye wives, be in subjection to your own husbands; that, if any obey not the word, they also may without the word be won by the conversation of the wives; While they behold your chaste conversation coupled with fear. Whose adorning let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel; But let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price. For after this manner in the old time the holy women also, who trusted in God, adorned themselves, being in subjection unto their own husbands: Even as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him lord: whose daughters ye are, as long as ye do well, and are not afraid with any amazement (1 Peter 3:1–6).

The theocentric issue here was sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Gold Jewelry

Peter's words are inescapable: women are not supposed to wear gold jewelry. There is no qualification here. There is no indication that this language is symbolic of anything else. His language is straightforward. The apostle Paul said the same thing. "In like manner also, that women adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety; not with broided hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly array; But (which becometh women professing godliness) with good works" (1 Tim. 2:9–10).

It was not just gold jewelry that bothered the apostles. It was fine clothing in general. It was any outward display of wealth which is made solely to demonstrate the possession of wealth.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

That these words have almost never been believed or obeyed by rich women in the history of the church goes without saying. Pastors who get involved in disputes over women's fashions are tilting against the ultimate windmill in the church. Pastors can preach against all kinds of sins, preferably those that are common in other congregations and other social circles. But when a pastor begins to preach about women's fashions, he is skating on dangerously thin ice. He is also going to have no effect whatsoever in the congregation.

B. Testimonies to Wealth

Displays of wealth are basic to the possession of wealth. People want to dress in such a way that distinguishes them from people who are not equally successful. The laws of some Grecian cities, the Roman Republic, Medieval Europe, Islamic societies, and other societies had laws against displays of great wealth in clothing. These laws were especially applied to people wearing clothing appropriate to people of high status. These laws were called sumptuary laws. They were attempts by the civil government, meaning successful politicians whose allies had money, to make certain that poor people could not use their money to purchase the outward symbols of economic success.

These laws were widely disobeyed. What destroyed them entirely, all over the world, was free market capitalism. The earliest economic successes in mass production in the late eighteenth century were associated with textiles. New processes of production, including looms and steam power, enabled the mass production of cotton clothing. The quality of clothing increased over time, and the price of the clothing decreased, which led to far better apparel being available to relatively poor people. As this process continued, it became more and more difficult for rich people to distinguish themselves from poor people in terms of their clothing. Poor people could afford to buy much better lines of clothing. Customers began to imitate the styles of the wealthy.

After that, social pressures and class tradition determined what kind of clothing people wore. There was pressure from people in lower classes not to accept people in the same class who wore clothing appropriate to more successful individuals. Peer pressure was directed against those who were "putting on airs." Laws that penalized people who wore clothing more appropriate to wealthier people were either removed from the statute books or ignored. There is no trace of them in modern society, but there still is considerable peer pressure against individuals within a particular economic class to dress in the clothing associated with wealthier classes.

There is a tradition among American fundamentalist circles, especially those associated with relatively poor people, for women not to wear makeup. Women are pressured by their peers not to put on makeup of any kind, although occasionally lipstick is permitted. This has nothing to do with the concern of Paul and Peter. Their concern was with the pursuit of the externals associated with wealth. They were concerned that individuals would waste economic resources on vanity. The cost of buying gold jewelry and fine clothing was very great. Only the very rich could afford such fashion. An individual who pursued fashion who did not have a great deal of money was forced to tie up a very high percentage of his wealth in clothing and jewelry. In order to call a halt to this practice, Peter and Paul laid down the law: covenant-keeping women are not supposed to wear gold jewelry.

This law is still in force. Anyone who argues that this law no longer applies because circumstances have changed is saying that New Testament laws are relative to circumstances. He is saying that situation ethics prevails, that cultural issues can overturn the explicit revelation of God in the Bible.

The issue that Paul and Peter raised was the issue of the use of wealth for outward displays. They did not specifically apply this principle to housing, but the implication is the same. We are to buy our houses in the same way that we buy our clothes. We are to buy them in terms of our occupations and our callings before God. A house should reflect our status in life. So should our clothing. It would be silly for a person who did manual labor to go to work in a suit that is more appropriate for a banker. Men understand this. In our work, we have uniforms. These uniforms testify to the nature of our work. A person who wears clothing appropriate to another occupation is regarded as strange. There is nothing illegal about wearing a three-piece suit when you are digging a ditch; there is something wasteful about it. Such clothing is inefficient on the job.

C. Leveling Down

In modern times, we have seen the abandonment of clothing that was once associated with upper-class occupations. This began in the 1950s in the United States. Within three decades, many upper-class professions were marked by much more casual clothing. The necktie faded into oblivion. By the latter part of the twentieth century, casual clothing had become common at church. Neither men nor women dressed in their Sunday best. The concept of “Sunday best” disappeared. This was a matter of fashion, but fashion reflects social mores. It was a leveling down of fashion.

This had begun during the French Revolution. By 1815, with the defeat of Napoleon, Western clothing for men in the highest social circles took on the basic features of what is the modern business suit. Wigs disappeared. Lace disappeared. Men’s styles ceased to change very much. With the coming of mass-produced clothing, meaning off-the-rack clothing, it became difficult for men to distinguish themselves from poor men, who could now afford to dress in suits that resembled the suits worn by the richest classes. The same applied to women.

This led to leveling down. When clothing no longer clearly identifies social class, the fashions of a lower social class can influence those of the upper classes. There is no greater example of this leveling downward than blue jeans. By 1980, they became universal, East and West, among people under age 30. There was a black market for blue jeans in Communist countries. This shift took place during the international student rebellion, 1965–70. What had been pants of choice among teenage males in the 1950s became high fashion by 1980. Men and women wore them. You could even buy expensive pre-faded jeans, thereby avoiding the new jeans look. Yet blue jeans had been invented by a Jewish tailor in San Francisco during the California gold rush, sometime around 1850. They were suitable for miners.

The economic issue is the conservation of resources. Peter and Paul were adamant that covenant-keeping women should not spend a lot of money on high fashion. They understood that fashion is a temptation for those who want to move up the social scale. They agreed that such competition should not enter the church. In coming to this conclusion, both of them warned that the pursuit of fashion outside the church is also a waste of resources. Covenant-keeping women are supposed to separate themselves from idle pursuits, and one of the idle pursuits is fashion.

Peter speaks of marks of piety. These have to do with behavior, not clothing: “hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price.” Peter is arguing that clothes do not make the woman. What makes the woman is ethical behavior. Paul agreed: “But (which becometh women professing godliness) with good works.” The attempt to gain a good reputation is legitimate. Peter and Paul advocated such a pursuit. What is not legitimate is the attempt to gain a reputation for high and expensive fashion. Fashion, both apostles clearly understood, is a matter of vanity. Vanity is not to be indulged in. A public mark of not being seduced by vanity is the unwillingness to pursue fashion.

D. Good Taste vs. High Fashion

In every society, there is a concept of good taste. Peter is not telling his readers and listeners to dress tastelessly. The difference between fashion and tastefulness has to do with social status and money. Good taste is universal. High fashion is not.

An example would be shined leather shoes. Whether rich or poor, a person who shines his shoes is considered tasteful. It testifies to the concern of the individual that he not look shabby. The cost of shining shoes is minimal. When shoes are shined and otherwise cared for, they last longer. A person saves money by having shined shoes instead of scuffed shoes. Shined shoes testify to the careful allocation of assets. Bob Jones Sr., the founder of Bob Jones University, used to say: “Your shoes may have holes in the soles, but they should be shined.” This is the proper attitude toward shoes. Peter’s principle of fashion is hostile to the pursuit of stylish shoes that are expensive. Prior to the French Revolution, rich men in Western Europe wore shoes with silver buckles. This is the sort of display that Peter says should be avoided. No one needs silver buckles on his shoes. There are better uses for silver than buckles on shoes.

A good example of the violation of this prohibition against high fashion was the Easter parade. Beginning in the 1870s, on Easter morning in New York City, the day on which most churches celebrate the resurrection of Christ from the dead, it was common in upper-class churches for women to wear their finest clothing. Men did the same. Women would go to great expense to buy a special outfit that they would wear only once, on Easter morning. Then they would parade up Fifth Avenue to display their finery. There was a 1947 movie called Easter Parade, based on a 1933 song.² The tradition began to

2. The 1933 song, Easter Parade, was written by America’s quintessential popular song writer, a Jewish immigrant who changed his name to Irving Berlin. It began: “In your Easter bonnet, with all the frills upon it, you’ll be the grandest lady in the Easter Parade.” Berlin is most famous for White Christmas, the best-selling song of all time, fade, along with churches, in the 1950s. There are few churches in New York City today, compared to the size of the population, and their members do not indulge in an Easter parade.

By the late twentieth century, the leveling down in fashion led to the abandonment of suits and dresses in American churches. The casual look, which had originated in California in Silicon Valley in the 1950s,³ spread to businesses in the West Coast, then to churches. The student revolution of 1965–70 also accelerated this trend.

Conclusion

Peter singles out women as violators of this rule of spiritual fashion: outward adornment rather than the marks of the spirit. Men are far less tempted than women to indulge in costly displays of fashion. This was true in Peter's day. It was true in Isaiah's day. It is a mark of rebellion. Isaiah prophesied, Moreover the LORD saith, Because the daughters of Zion are haughty, and walk with stretched forth necks and wanton eyes, walking and mincing as they go, and making a tinkling with their feet: Therefore the LORD will smite with a scab the crown of the head of the daughters of Zion, and the LORD will discover their secret parts. In that day the Lord will take away the bravery of their tinkling ornaments about their feet, and their cauls, and their round tires like the moon, The chains, and the bracelets, and the mufflers, The bonnets, and the ornaments of the legs, and the headbands, and the tablets, and the earrings, The rings, and nose jewels, The changeable suits of apparel, and the mantles, and the wimples, and the crisping pins, The glasses, and the fine linen, and the hoods, and the vails. And it shall come to pass, that instead of sweet smell there shall be stink; and instead of a girdle a rent; and instead of well set hair baldness; and instead of a stomacher a girding of sackcloth; and burning instead of beauty (Isa. 3:16–24).

Covenant-keepers are not to waste time, energy, and money on a vain pursuit of fashion.

and God Bless America.

3. Tom Wolfe, "Robert Noyce and His Congregation," Forbes ASAP (Aug. 25, 1997). (<http://tinyurl.com/5wq12b>)

THE WISDOM OF A DONKEY

Having eyes full of adultery, and that cannot cease from sin; beguiling unstable souls; an heart they have exercised with covetous practices; cursed children: Which have forsaken the right way, and are gone astray, following the way of Balaam the son of Bosor, who loved the wages of unrighteousness; But was rebuked for his iniquity: the dumb ass speaking with man's voice forbad the madness of the prophet (II Peter 2:14–16).

The theocentric issue here was hierarchy: point two of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Dumb Animals, Dumber Sinners

Peter lists practices of evil people. These are people who refuse to stop sinning. They are greedy. They are cursed children. He compares them with Balaam, the Mesopotamian prophet (Deut. 23:4), who was hired to curse the Israelites (Num. 22). Balaam knew that he was not supposed to curse the Israelites, but the Moabite king continued to pressure him until he capitulated. The king offered him great rewards. The king had his number. He perceived that this man was greedy. He appealed to his greed, and eventually Balaam surrendered.

Peter says that Balaam's donkey was wiser than Balaam. This is a clear reference to one of the amazing miracles of the Old Testament. This is an affirmation of a talking donkey. The New Testament affirms the existence of a talking donkey who was rational. The donkey drew conclusions from evidence. It spoke to its master.

There are few passages in the Old Testament that more obviously challenge the concept of autonomous scientific law than this one. There are few passages in the Old Testament that are more ridiculed by humanists as absolutely impossible to accept. This passage is believed by humanists to be clear evidence that the Bible cannot be trusted with respect to history or scientific facts. There is no way for Bible-believers to explain away the non-scientific nature of this story. There is evidence from both the Old Testament and the New Testament that such a donkey existed. The donkey did not just exist; the donkey serves as Peter's example of the foolishness of man. The logic of his argument makes sense only on the supposition that a genetically stupid animal spoke. It was stupid, but Peter says it had more sense than a covenant-breaking prophet.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

Peter's point is that an animal, which we associate with the inability to speak, and therefore with the inability to think rationally, was able to think more rationally than a sinner who was about to curse the people of God in exchange for rewards. Such a transaction is the essence of foolishness, Peter is arguing. The proof of Peter's position is the fact that a donkey argued a better case than a prophet did. In other words, covenant-breaking is really stupid. It is more stupid than the thought processes of a donkey.

Peter is saying that when covenant-breakers pursue iniquity, they are vulnerable to being dealt with by God by the mouth of a donkey. In other words, that which is obviously incapable of challenging a man—a dumb animal—is in fact quite capable of challenging him, and not only challenging him, but completely overcoming his arguments. Peter is saying that a violation of God's law is stupid beyond belief. It is more logical biblically to believe in a donkey that talks to its master than it is to believe that an individual is acting wisely when he consistently and defiantly disobeys the law of God.

B. Greed

Peter twice refers to greediness. He singles out covetousness. He also refers to the wages of unrighteousness. When an individual desires something that belongs to another person, and he becomes obsessed with obtaining that item, he has violated the tenth commandment.² Anyone who does this is more stupid than a donkey. When you violate one of the Ten Commandments, and you do so self-consciously and repeatedly, then you have less sense than a donkey. This is a graphic way of describing the condition of covenant-breakers.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 12.

Greed is a snare. A person who is caught up in the snare of greed is trapped. Peter says such a person cannot stop sinning. He is addicted to sin. He is headed toward destruction. He has gone astray.

The individual who compromises his own ethics for the sake of economic gain is playing the fool, Peter says. He is playing the fool to such an extent that a donkey is wiser than he. This is unwise indeed. Peter calls such an individual back to the law of God. He is not to commit adultery. He is not to be unstable. He is not to be covetous. The mark of someone who has gone astray is a person who compromises his ethics for the sake of gain.

C. Ethics and Economics

This passage implies that biblical ethics is superior to economics. It is not good enough that an individual can get rich through unethical behavior. This is the essence of stupidity, Peter says. A donkey knew better than this. This argument would have no validity if the incident Peter describes did not take place. If it did not take place, then covenant-keepers are the stupid ones. If covenant-keepers are foolish for believing that a donkey reasoned with an individual by speaking to him, then the Bible is not a reliable guide for the establishment of ethics. The Bible should be ignored as surely as we would ignore an individual who claims to be able to speak to animals. In modern terms, we might call this Peter's argument from Dr. Doolittle. Yet Peter makes exactly this argument: someone did talk to animals. That person lost an argument with a donkey. He gained for himself the judgment of God (Num. 31:8). He could not, or at least he did not, turn away from his sin.

Peter's argument collapses if there never was a talking donkey whose owner was a corrupt prophet who sold his services for gain. We must take seriously the revelation of the Old Testament, including its revelation of historical events that we find difficult to believe, if we are to make sense of New Testament ethics. There is no legitimate way to segregate New Testament ethics from Old Testament history. This passage should make clear the principle that the New Testament interprets and validates the Old Testament. Peter has no problem with believing in a talking donkey. He uses this argument to strengthen his case against the pursuit of wealth at the expense of ethics.

Conclusion

Greed is a sin. People who are afflicted with this sin are less wise than Balaam's donkey. Peter's condemnation is true only to the extent that the account in Numbers is correct. Humanists deny that it is correct. Biblically speaking, they are less rational than a donkey.

This story is a touchstone for covenant-keepers' commitment to the Bible over humanism. If they can believe this story, why are the first eleven chapters of Genesis such a problem to them? They worry about finding a way to reconcile geology, astronomy, and paleontology with Genesis 1. They interpret the biblical texts, over and over, according to the latest fad in the world of humanism or the world of academic neo-evangelicalism. Yet they do not worry about reconciling Numbers 22 with biology. There is no way to re-interpret this.

And the LORD opened the mouth of the ass, and she said unto Balaam, What have I done unto thee, that thou hast smitten me these three times? And Balaam said unto the ass, Because thou hast mocked me: I would there were a sword in mine hand, for now would I kill thee. And the ass said unto Balaam, Am not I thine ass, upon which thou hast ridden ever since I was thine unto this day? was I ever wont to do so unto thee? And he said, Nay (Num. 22:28–30).

We have a choice: side with the talking donkey or side with the humanists, who are not up to her level of awareness.

41

TWO FORMS OF WEALTH

Because thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked: I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment, that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear; and anoint thine eyes with eyesalve, that thou mayest see (Rev. 3:17–18).

The theocentric issue here was sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. The Church of Laodicea

Of the seven churches of Asia to which John writes letters, the one that gets preached about most often is Laodicea. People who are aware of this section of the book of Revelation are more likely to remember the Church of Laodicea. It was the church that was neither cold nor hot, which God promised to would vomit out of His mouth. That imagery is very powerful. Most people cannot name the other six churches, nor can they identify what those churches were known for.

John is specific about the sin of Laodicea. It was the sin of arrogance. This arrogance was based on wealth. He says that the church said it was rich. He is speaking of a collective entity. This indicates that this attitude prevailed among all of the members, or at least among those members who were representative of the church. The church defined wealth as a large number of goods. This large number of goods meant that it was in need of nothing. This is a common interpretation of the meaning of wealth. There are things that a person wants, but there is nothing that he needs.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

Not needing anything means that an individual or an organization does not face immediate calamities. He is not seeking a way out of a desperate situation. He is getting along just fine. The pressures of everyday life that afflict the common man, meaning the person who does not have financial reserves, do not afflict the person who is wealthy. This is one of the great benefits of being wealthy. The rich individual lives above the fray. He has no worries that money can eliminate.

John says that this self-confidence of the church of Laodicea is an illusion. He asks rhetorically: “Don’t you know that you are wretched and miserable and poor and blind and naked?” This is certainly a rhetorical list. If a person is wretched, he is in great need. If he is miserable, he is in need. If he is poor and blind and naked, he is in need of just about everything. John uses these descriptive phrases to indicate that the church is bankrupt. It is in great need.

B. Wealth and Poverty

He contrasts economic wealth with spiritual poverty. This is a contrast familiar to anyone who has read the gospels. “For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul” (Matt. 16:26).² Jesus warned against the conflict between Mammon and God. “No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon” (Matt. 6:24).³ An individual who pursues wealth with dedication, Jesus said, is in the clutches of the Mammon. He worships another God. Such a person is obviously in spiritual poverty.

1. Blindness

John extends this insight to say that the Church of Laodicea, because of its complacency regarding the outward affairs of life, is trapped in spiritual blindness. Members of the church do not perceive that they are spiritually poor. This is what he means when he calls them blind. It is not that they are physically blind; it is that they are

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 35.

3. Ibid., ch. 14.

spiritually blind.

A person who is spiritually blind is incapable of assessing his own spiritual condition. This is why John brings up this criticism of the church. John is like a person who is trying to lead a blind man out of a ditch. The blind person is incapable of escaping by himself. He needs help. But this form of blindness is so great that the person who needs help does not know that he needs help.

John switches his metaphor to that of gold. He says that the church should buy from him gold that has been tried in the fire. This imagery goes back to Isaiah's condemnation of Judah. He used the same imagery: trial by fire. He said that the people of Judah had been corrupted. They were not pure. They were like false wealth, with base metals added to precious metals. In other words, they were counterfeits. "Thy silver is become dross, thy wine mixed with water" (Isa. 1:22). Isaiah said that God would bring judgment. "And I will turn my hand upon thee, and purely purge away thy dross, and take away all thy tin" (Isa. 1:25).⁴ Isaiah warned of Judah of its condition of debased status. John is warning the church of Laodicea that it is in the same condition. They are not rich, and they need to be rich. They need the pure gold that has been tried by fire. This is a metaphor of spiritual purity.

He says the church is naked. He says he has white raiment. This is the clothing needed by the church of Laodicea. White clothing in the epistle is associated with the purity of the church and also authority.⁵ The church of Laodicea, being naked, is not clothed in white raiment.

He says he will anoint their eyes with salve. Why? So that they may see. Again, this relates to their lack of ability to assess their own spiritual condition. They are in need of an eye salve, so that they can see just how spiritually debased they are.

John's use of economic imagery to describe spiritual condition is not unique. It is found in both the Old Testament and the New Testament. The contrast between economic wealth and spiritual poverty is a familiar theme in the Bible. Jesus made it plain that this is not just a matter of imagery. "Then said Jesus unto his disciples, Verily I say unto you, That a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven. And again I say unto you, It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God"

4. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 3.

5. Revelation 3:5, 4:4, 7:9, 13–14.

(Matt. 19:23–24).⁶ This was powerful imagery. It indicated that the contrast between economic wealth and spiritual poverty is more than just imagery. It is a matter of actual covenantal condition. The person who is rich is unlikely to enter the kingdom of God.

2. Immunity

Why should this be the case? We see the answer in this passage. It is a matter of immunity from the crises of life. The church at Laodicea thought of itself as being without need. There were no pressures on it that could not be dealt with successfully with economic assets. The church believed that the cares and concerns of this life can be dealt with through the accumulation of goods. This view is widely shared. It is the essence of the religion of Mammon. It focuses on the goods of this world because it believes that the cares of this world are dealt with most efficiently by wealth. It is the belief that men can buy their way out of the major problems of life. Obviously, this does not apply to many of the cares of life, such as sickness, death, psychological afflictions, hatred in the house, and all the other burdens of life for which money offers no solace. But men have a tendency to dismiss these cares precisely because these cares cannot be dealt with through money. Men assume that if they have enough money, they can avoid the threat of such cares in their lives.

John says that the most important needs of this life are spiritual. These needs are beyond the ability of people with wealth to buy their way out. There is no market for the purchase of deliverance from spiritual affliction. Yet John speaks of such deliverance as if it were a market transaction. He tells the church that it should buy the fine gold which he has for sale: gold tried by fire. He deals with spiritual deliverance in terms of the language of market transactions.

3. Economic Imagery

This indicates how powerful the imagery of the market is in the thinking of man. This is why Jesus resorted to pocketbook parables again and again. Men recognize the burdens of life that can be dealt with through the possession of goods. They are not equally perceptive with respect to other burdens of life. So, New Testament authors resort to the imagery of economics in order to make a spiritual point.

6. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 38.

His point is that gold that has been tried by fire, meaning spiritual purity, is of great value. It is paid for, not through the accumulation of wealth, but through self-discipline under God, by the grace of God, in the process which theologians call progressive sanctification. This is what the church of Laodicea lacked.

Conclusion

John's message indicates that the church of Laodicea had fallen into the trap of regarding economic wealth as the be-all and end-all of human existence. It was trapped in the religion of Mammon. It needed deliverance. The first step in this process of deliverance, John says, is self-realization. The church needs eye salve. It needs the ability to assess its spiritual condition in the light of biblical revelation. It has lost this ability. The evidence that it has lost this ability is the fact that the church regards itself as without needs.

REVERSAL OF FORTUNE

The merchants of these things, which were made rich by her, shall stand afar off for the fear of her torment, weeping and wailing, And saying, Alas, alas, that great city, that was clothed in fine linen, and purple, and scarlet, and decked with gold, and precious stones, and pearls! For in one hour so great riches is come to nought. And every shipmaster, and all the company in ships, and sailors, and as many as trade by sea, stood afar off, And cried when they saw the smoke of her burning, saying, What city is like unto this great city! (Rev. 18:15–18)

The theocentric issue here was sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Urban Collapse

John describes the collapse of a great city. He does not name the city. He calls it Babylon the great. This points back to the fall of the city of Babylon, which took place on the night of a great feast, in which the king and his court ate a meal from plates that had been confiscated from the Temple at Jerusalem half a century earlier (Dan. 5:2–3). A supernatural hand had appeared and had written a message on the wall. The king called for Daniel, a prophet of God, to translate and interpret the message. Daniel did so. “This is the interpretation of the thing: MENE; God hath numbered thy kingdom, and finished it. TEKEL; Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting. PERES; Thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians” (Dan. 5:26–28). Within 24 hours, Babylon fell to the Medo-Persian Empire.²

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Cyrus in 539 B.C. conquered the city by re-directing the Euphrates and sending

The fall of the city described by John is described in similar terms. John says that the city fell in one hour (v. 17). He also says that it fell in one day (v. 8). It had been a great city. He describes in detail the wealth of this city. He begins with the standard marks of great wealth: gold, silver, and precious stones. He adds pearls. Then he lists expensive clothing: fine linen, purple, silk, and scarlet. These are fine clothes that were colored. To color fabric in the ancient world was a long and expensive process. To wear purple was to wear something of great value. He goes on to describe other implements of wealth. It is a long list.

All of these visible signs of wealth disappear without warning. "And the fruits that thy soul lusted after are departed from thee, and all things which were dainty and goodly are departed from thee, and thou shalt find them no more at all" (v. 14). This language is reminiscent of the message of Isaiah against Judah.

Come down, and sit in the dust, O virgin daughter of Babylon, sit on the ground: there is no throne, O daughter of the Chaldeans: for thou shalt no more be called tender and delicate. Take the millstones, and grind meal: uncover thy locks, make bare the leg, uncover the thigh, pass over the rivers (Isa. 47:1–2).

The cause of this fall? Sin. "For all nations have drunk of the wine of the wrath of her fornication, and the kings of the earth have committed fornication with her, and the merchants of the earth are waxed rich through the abundance of her delicacies" (Rev. 18:3). This is a faithless city. Jerusalem had been a faithless city in Isaiah's time. His language was similar. "How is the faithful city become an harlot! it was full of judgment; righteousness lodged in it; but now murderers" (Isa. 1:21).

B. Unemployed Merchants

As with any prosperous city, there are merchants who had supplied these goods. John says, "And saying, Alas, alas, that great city, that was clothed in fine linen, and purple, and scarlet, and decked with gold, and precious stones, and pearls" (v. 16)! Then he added a crucial phrase: "for in one hour so great riches is come to naught" (v. 17).

The description indicates that great wealth and success can be overturned rapidly. This is what had happened to the original city of Babylon. It will happen again, John says, describing his vision of the fall of the great city. This fall is comprehensive. The city had been rich; it becomes poor. The speed and magnitude of the transformation astounded the merchants. This was the end of their source of wealth. “And they cast dust on their heads, and cried, weeping and wailing, saying, alas, alas, that great city, wherein were made rich all that had ships in the sea by reason of her costliness! For in one hour is she made desolate” (v. 19)!

his troops into the city through the now open aqueducts.

C. Economic Destruction

The destruction of the city is presented in terms of economic loss. John understands that his readers and listeners will recognize the extent of the failure of a civilization when they hear of its complete economic destruction. He also speaks of plagues. But this appears only in one verse (v. 4). Most of the passage is devoted to a description of the great wealth of the city and the magnitude of the loss, which takes place in a very brief period of time.

The city is so completely destroyed that tradesmen will no longer be found in the city (v. 22). The light of the city shall go out (v. 23). There will be no more voices of the bridegroom and the bride (v. 23). This indicates the cutting off of all inheritance.

The reason for this devastation appears in the final verse of the chapter. “And in her was found the blood of the prophets, and of saints, and of all that were slain upon the earth” (v. 24). This identifies the city: Jerusalem. This was the city in which the prophets were slain. Jesus had prophesied: “That the blood of all the prophets, which was shed from the foundation of the world, may be required of this generation; From the blood of Abel unto the blood of Zacharias, which perished between the altar and the temple: verily I say unto you, It shall be required of this generation” (Luke 11:50–51). This was the city that had violated God’s covenant throughout its history. It was not Rome that had slain the prophets; it was Jerusalem.

The city had been blessed by God in terms of external indicators of success. The list of the marks of the city’s wealth pointed to the blessing of God. Yet, in one day, in one hour, the city fell. The city lost all of the success indicators that had marked it before.

This parallels Psalm 73. The psalmist wrote that he had been distressed by the evidence of the success of covenant-breakers. But then he had come to his senses. He now understood that the success indicators achieved by covenant-breakers serve as a slippery slope to perdition. “Surely thou didst set them in slippery places: thou castedst them down into destruction. How are they brought into desolation, as in a moment! they are utterly consumed with terrors” (Ps. 73:18–19).³ What had initially appeared to be positive sanctions had in fact been negative sanctions. The good things of life were common in this city. Then, seemingly without warning, all of the luxuries disappeared. Those who had prospered by supplying these luxuries to residents of the city saw their occupations destroyed in the twinkling of an eye. They bewailed the fact that they have suffered such a loss.

The message here is that covenant-breaking, while temporarily successful, leads ultimately to devastation. The great city had fallen. God’s negative sanctions had at last been imposed. This is a testimony to the continuing operation of God’s positive and negative sanctions. The final verse, which points to the blood of the city, indicates that there is a predictable relationship between covenant-breaking and negative sanctions.

The fall of Jerusalem marked the final end of the Old Covenant order. This was the fulfillment of Jesus’ prophecy regarding the fall of the city in one generation.⁴

Conclusion

The destruction of Jerusalem is described in this passage. The fall is described in terms of the loss of great wealth. This had been an important city. It had been sufficiently wealthy to attract merchants. The merchants stood far off and bewailed the loss of such a lucrative market.

John uses the language of economic success to identify the greatness of the city. Down through the centuries, this passage has attracted attention. People in all eras and all countries recognize the trappings of wealth. People want their fair share of such wealth. John says here that wealth is precarious. It can be lost in a day, in an hour. Bad behavior produces economic loss.

3. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 17.

4. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

THE FINAL INHERITANCE

He that overcometh shall inherit all things; and I will be his God, and he shall be my son (Rev. 21:7).

The theocentric issue here was inheritance: point five of the biblical covenant.¹

A. The Great Reversal

This is the culmination of the great reversal of the economic factor that began with the Fall of man. “And unto Adam he said, Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree, of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat of it: cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field” (Gen. 3:17–18).² As the culmination, it is the culmination of the great reversal. It will finally reverse God’s curse of history—the culmination of Christ’s definitive reversal the curse. It will be the culmination of the kingdom’s progressive reversal of the curse.

1. Inheritance/Disinheritance

Inheritance is point five of the biblical covenant model.³ The process of progressive corporate sanctification in history is a sorting out of inheritance and disinheritance.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

3. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 5.

His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth (Ps. 25:13).

For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth (Ps. 37:9).

But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace (Ps. 37:11).

For such as be blessed of him shall inherit the earth; and they that be cursed of him shall be cut off (Ps. 37:22).

The righteous shall inherit the land, and dwell therein for ever (Ps. 37:29).

Wait on the LORD, and keep his way, and he shall exalt thee to inherit the land: when the wicked are cut off, thou shalt see it (Ps. 37:34).

The seed also of his servants shall inherit it: and they that love his name shall dwell therein (Ps. 69:36).

Arise, O God, judge the earth: for thou shalt inherit all nations (Ps. 82:8).

Any attempt by amillennial expositors to internalize these passages, as if they applied only to an interior mental and emotional state of covenant-keepers in the midst of a world governed by covenant-breakers, is an example of an incorrect hermeneutic triumphing over the plain teaching of the texts. As surely as the text of Revelation 21:7 must be interpreted literally, so must the inheritance passages of the Psalms.

2. From Wrath to Grace

Genesis 3 brought into history a new paradigm: from grace to wrath. But it also established a counter paradigm: from wrath to grace. The history of mankind from Genesis 3 to Revelation 21 is a preparation for Revelation 21:7: the full inheritance of covenant-keepers. This is not the story of defeat snatched from victory by the intervention of God. It is the story of victory extended progressively, so that the final defeat of covenant-breakers will come as no surprise to covenant-keepers or covenant-breakers. Why? Because of the great reversal proclaimed by Mary before the birth of Christ.

For he that is mighty hath done to me great things; and holy is his name. And his mercy is on them that fear him from generation to generation. He hath shewed strength with his arm; he hath scattered the proud in the imagination of their hearts. He hath put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree. He hath filled the hungry with good things; and the rich he hath sent empty away. He hath holpen his servant Israel, in remembrance of his mercy; As he spake to our fathers, to Abraham, and to his seed for ever (Luke 1:49–55).⁴

3. Revelation 21:7

This was the great reversal. The great reversal of Revelation 21:7 is merely the culmination of the great reversal announced by Mary and confirmed by Jesus.

And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen (Matt. 28:18–20).⁵

This announcement announced the Great Commission: the progressive sanctification of the world.⁶

B. Economic Growth

Biblical economics teaches that God's positive sanctions are extended to societies that conform to biblical laws, including economic laws. The concept of compound economic growth did not exist prior to the development of postmillennial eschatology by the Puritans and Calvinists in the seventeenth century. It was only when men began to believe in irreversible progress that they could accept the possibility of compound economic growth. It was because Adam Smith was the deistic heir of seventeenth-century Scottish Calvinism that he could conceive of a book that offered the possibility of the compound wealth of

4. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 1.

5. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2000), ch. 48.

6. Kenneth L. Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/GentryGGC>) nations. It was only because Enlightenment humanists appropriated and secularized the postmillennialism of seventeenth-century British Calvinists that Smith's book was accepted. This was the origin of the concept of long-term, irreversible economic growth.

The world has been completely transformed by the process of 2% economic growth per annum. The world of 1776, when The Wealth of Nations appeared, was not that different from the world in which Jesus walked the roads of Palestine, and the Apostles wrote their epistles. Life spans were comparable. There was greater literacy because of Gutenberg's movable type, but a construction worker in Jesus' day would have recognized the tools his craft in 1776. Not today. Our world is fundamentally different from the world of Smith's book.⁷

We can and should expect far greater transformation of the world because of the effects of a steady 2% increase per year. This produces the exponential curve. We are getting close to that curve.

There could be a reversal of this process. The division of labor could be reversed by the familiar horsemen of war (nuclear), plague (biological weapons), and famine (banking collapse). The costs of such a reversal would be catastrophic. But we now know what men did not know in 1776: it is possible for an economy to grow by 2% per annum for two centuries. Men should have known it in 1400 B.C.

And it shall come to pass, if thou shalt hearken diligently unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to observe and to do all his commandments which I command thee this day, that the LORD thy God will set thee on high above all nations of the earth: And all these blessings shall come on thee, and overtake thee, if thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God. Blessed shalt thou be in the city, and blessed shalt thou be in the field. Blessed shall be the fruit of thy body, and the fruit of thy ground, and the fruit of thy cattle, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks of thy sheep. Blessed shall be thy basket and thy store. Blessed shalt thou be when thou comest in, and blessed shalt thou be when thou goest out. The LORD shall cause thine enemies that rise up against thee to be smitten before thy face: they shall come out against thee one way, and flee before thee seven ways. The LORD shall command the blessing upon thee in thy storehouses, and in all that thou settest thine hand unto; and he shall bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee (Deut. 28:1-8).⁸

7. Gregory Clark, A Farewell to Alms: A Brief Economic History of the World (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 2007), ch. 11.

8. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2000), ch. 69.

Conclusion

The great reversal in the garden of Eden was itself reversed definitively with the incarnation, life, death, resurrection, and bodily ascension of Jesus Christ. The Great Commission built on the Greater Reversal. The culmination of the Greater Reversal is described in Revelation 21:7.

CONCLUSION

And Elijah came unto all the people, and said, How long halt ye between two opinions? if the LORD be God, follow him: but if Baal, then follow him. And the people answered him not a word (I Kings 18:21).

The people of God hedged their bets. They usually do. But finally they come to their senses (I Kings 18:40).

I wrote in the Preface that all types economic theory are governed by a five-point system of assumptions. This is analogous to the Bible's five-point biblical.¹ The epistles offer this covenantal structure of economics.

Point 1: The sovereignty of God. God is the source of all wealth. "Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning" (James 1:17).² Our language should attest to God's sovereignty, James taught (James 4:13–15).³

Point 2: Hierarchy. Paul wrote of Jesus' incarnation and ministry:

Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God: But made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name: That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; And that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father. Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992). (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

2. Chapter 33.

3. Chapter 36.

out your own salvation with fear and trembling (Phil. 2:6–12).⁴

Jesus was subordinate to God, subordinate to men, and now reigns from on high. This is the model for covenant-keepers. The epistles announce the existence of a hierarchical system of economic authority. This is in the form of a covenant. “Brethren, I speak after the manner of men; Though it be but a man’s covenant, yet if it be confirmed, no man disannulleth, or addeth thereto” (Gal. 3:15). This is the model for contracts.⁵

Point 3: Ethics. The epistles announce a system of ethical laws. These involve such issues as morally mandatory charity,⁶ placing the other person’s interests on a par with our own,⁷ showing no ecclesiastical favor to the rich,⁸ no covetousness,⁹ contentment,¹⁰ self-improvement,¹¹ hard work,¹² the division of labor,¹³ inheritance,¹⁴ predictable sanctions,¹⁵ honesty,¹⁶ and modesty in apparel.¹⁷

There are not patterns of behavior. They are calls to ethical conformity. A system of institutional sanctions converts ethical standards into patterns of behavior.

Point 4: Sanctions. Until Christian economists offer an exclusively Bible-based theory of economic sanctions—endogenous or exogenous or both—they must remain content to baptize humanistic theories of economic sanctions in the name of Jesus—or not baptize them at all. This has been the condition of Christian economists all the way back to the medieval scholastics. The debates have centered around which humanist theory of economic causality gets baptized, and under which terms of surrender: Christians to humanists, not the other way around.

The epistles offer no discussion of economic causality different from the Old Testament’s discussion. The Mosaic law established a

4. Chapter 20.

5. Chapter 12.

6. Chapters 4–9, 11, 13, 15, 17.

7. Chapter 19.

8. Chapter 35.

9. Chapters 16, 30, 36, 40.

10. Chapters 23, 30.

11. Chapter 21.

12. Chapters 24, 26–28.

13. Chapter 14.

14. Chapters 16, 43.

15. Chapters 8, 13, 17.

16. Chapters 15, 27.

17. Chapters 35, 39.

system of sanctions. Obedience to God's Bible-revealed law brings visible external blessings in history (Deut. 28:1–14). Disobedience brings negative external sanctions (Deut. 28:15–68).¹⁸ There is nothing comparable to this in the epistles. The closest that the epistles come to this is the principle of sowing and reaping.¹⁹ God has tilted the playing field in favor of His people (Col. 3:10–12).²⁰

Point 5: Inheritance. “He that overcometh shall inherit all things; and I will be his God, and he shall be my son” (Rev. 21:7). This passage is the culmination of both Testaments.

These are economic themes, but they do not constitute an analytic system. The Bible offers authoritative revelation regarding the details of such a system, but it does not offer a final summary of the system. The closest it comes to this are Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 8 and 28.

A. Themes

Reaping and Sowing (sanctions). Here, we come the closest to the system of economic causation found in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. There are blessings in this life for charitable giving. “But this I say, He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully” (II Cor. 9:6).²¹ We must give up wealth in order to gain wealth. Every economic theory says this. The dividing issues are these: “Who gives up what? How is he predictably rewarded? What system of sanctions enforces this system of sanctions?”

Paul makes it clear that God is the Enforcer. “Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting. And let us not be weary in well doing: for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not. As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith” (Gal. 6:7–10).²² God promises to reward generosity with economic blessings. The generous person can have confidence that he will not be brought

18. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

19. Chapters 8, 13, 17.

20. Chapter 25.

21. Chapter 8.

22. Chapter 13.

low without an overwhelming reason. David said as much. "I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread" (Ps. 37:25).²³ Paul does not call for the establishment of a system of institutional sanctions that reward charity. God does this directly. This is a system governed by supernatural intervention.

Charity (ethics). A continuing economic theme in the epistles is the moral necessity of charity. This sets the epistles apart from modern economic theory, whether free market or socialistic. Free market economists relegate charity to the realm of personal values. Some people like to give away money, odd as this may seem to free market economists. Most people do not. Says the economist: "To each his own. Economics is neutral with regard to personal ends. Ends are a matter of personal taste. Charity or pornography: each is equally legitimate as an end." Socialistic economists strive to substitute legal entitlement for voluntary charity. Charity is seen as too personal, too much based on the whims of individuals with wealth, whose moral values are as suspect as their motives. It is unreliable. Charity should be legislated. It should be compulsory. It should further the goals of society, as defined by politicians and bureaucrats.

The epistles present a very different concept of charity. For the covenant-keeper, charity is a moral imperative. It is a test of faith. The model is the incarnation of Jesus Christ. "For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich" (II Cor. 8:9).²⁴ The riches spoken of here are not marketable.²⁵

The heart of New Testament charity is its voluntarism. There is neither legal compulsion nor institutional negative sanctions for refusing to give. The Lord loves a cheerful giver, Paul wrote (II Cor. 9:7).²⁶ (Paul said nothing about God's attitude toward a cheerful tax collector.) Covenant-keepers have a duty to give, whenever they can help others. But, then again, so do local churches, which is why there are deacons (Acts 6:1–4).²⁷

Paul's second letter to the Corinthian church invokes equality, but

23. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 6.

24. Chapter 5. Cf. Chapter 20.

25. Chapter 1.

26. Chapter 9.

27. Gary North, Sacrifice and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Acts, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 5.

of a special kind: the equality of the miracle of the manna (II Cor. 8:13–15).²⁸ Lest we forget, God provided equality for the people of Israel in the wilderness: same supplies, same taste.²⁹ Lest we also forget: the state did not supply any manna. Paul wrote a fund-raising letter, not a political party's platform.

Charitable giving strengthens the bonds within the Christian community. It creates mutual dependence: members to community, and back again. Voluntary charity strengthens the social order by strengthening community.³⁰ People can have greater confidence that failure will not destroy them. They are willing to take more risks for the sake of God's kingdom.³¹

In contrast, compulsory charity creates mutual dependence in a much broader community, one not linked by oath-bound confession to the God of the Bible and the biblical covenants. This dependence extends from the recipients of the money back to the taxpayers. It creates resentment on both sides.

Charitable giving should be as calculating as investing is. A person asks: "What is the payoff?" First, the prospective donor should consider the payoff for himself. "But this I say, He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully" (II Cor. 9:6).³² Generosity pays. Second, he should consider the payoff for the recipient. Is the gift a subsidy to evil-doing? If so, he should not make the gift. Paul's example of such wasteful charity was church money given to widows younger than age 60. "But the younger widows refuse: for when they have begun to wax wanton against Christ, they will marry; Having damnation, because they have cast off their first faith. And withal they learn to be idle, wandering about from house to house; and not only idle, but tattlers also and busybodies, speaking things which they ought not" (I Tim. 5:11–13).³³ More recently, there is a photo in the World Wide Web of a beggar on

28 Chapter 6.

29. As is typical of charity cases, the people were not at all grateful. "And the mixt multitude that was among them fell a lusting; and the children of Israel also wept again, and said, Who shall give us flesh to eat? We remember the fish, which we did eat in Egypt freely; the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlick: But now our soul is dried away: there is nothing at all, beside this manna, before our eyes" (Num. 11:4–6).

30. Chapter 9.

31. Chapters 4, 10.

32. Chapter 8. Cf. Chapters 13, 17.

33. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 7:G.

an American street. He is holding a sign: "Need cash for alcohol research." That beggar had a sense of humor. Similarly, the donor should ask: Is charity a subsidy for laziness (II Thes. 3:10–12)?³⁴ If so, he should not make the gift.

One of the most profound and irreconcilable differences between Christian economics and humanist economics is the different attitude toward economic growth. Both the Bible and modern economics affirm the legitimacy of economic growth. Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28 are the most self-conscious documents in ancient history that advocate the moral imperative of economic growth. But there is a completely different explanation of the means of economic growth. The Mosaic law affirms obedience to biblical laws. Modern economics affirms increasing investment per capita.³⁵ The Bible does not mention per capita investment. Modern economics does not mention obedience to biblical law.

The epistles' call for charity, because it is a call for obedience to God, is implicitly a call for economic growth. This call is presented in terms of personal economic growth. "But this I say, He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully" (II Cor. 9:6). Charity and success are linked.³⁶ The epistles are silent regarding corporate economic growth or per capita growth in general.

Work (ethics). The New Testament's work ethic is found in the epistles. Paul testifies to his own efforts. "I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 3:14).³⁷ He labors on Christ's behalf. "Whereunto I also labour, striving according to his working, which worketh in me mightily" (Col. 1:29).³⁸ The covenant-keeper's work is comprehensive. "And whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God and the Father by him" (Col. 3:17).³⁹ Work enables men to gain a good reputation for honesty. This gains them reliable income. "And that ye study to be quiet, and to do your own business, and to work with your

34. Chapter 28.

35. Free market economists affirm the efficacy of profit-seeking investment. Socialist and Keynesian economists affirm the efficiency of state investment, meaning the investment of funds confiscated from the public by force and allocated by tenured bureaucrats who cannot easily be fired for losses.

36. Chapter 11.

37. Chapter 21.

38. Chapter 24.

39. Chapter 26.

own hands, as we commanded you; That ye may walk honestly toward them that are without, and that ye may have lack of nothing" (I Thes. 4:11–12).⁴⁰

This is the background for Paul's famous statement, "For even when we were with you, this we commanded you, that if any would not work, neither should he eat. For we hear that there are some which walk among you disorderly, working not at all, but are busybodies. Now them that are such we command and exhort by our Lord Jesus Christ, that with quietness they work, and eat their own bread" (II Thes. 3:10–12).⁴¹ This outlook transforms societies when it becomes widespread. This is often called the Protestant ethic, because of the enormous influence Max Weber's 1905 book, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism.

Paul was adamant. So vital is work that churches should not give charity to people who refuse to work (II Thes. 3:10–12).⁴² No stronger statement against the economics of the welfare state can be found in the Bible or anywhere else in ancient literature.

Entrepreneurship (ethics). The epistles give impetus to entrepreneurship. They tell covenant-keepers to be confident about the future, a crucial feature of the outlook that characterizes entrepreneurs. "Be careful [full of care] for nothing; but in every thing by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus" (Phil 4:6–7).⁴³ God has intervenes to support covenant-keepers in their ventures (Col. 3:10–12).⁴⁴

Motivation (sanctions). Adam Smith launched modern free market economics with this observation of people's motivation:

But man has almost constant occasion for the help of his brethren, and it is in vain for him to expect it from their benevolence only. He will be more likely to prevail if he can interest their self-love in his favour, and shew them that it is for their own advantage to do for him what he requires of them. Whoever offers to another a bargain of any kind, proposes to do this. Give me that which I want, and you shall have this which you want, is the meaning of every such offer; and it is in this manner that we obtain from one another the far greater part

40 Chapter 27.

41. Chapter 28.

42. Chapter 28.

43. Chapter 22.

44. Chapter 25.

of those good offices which we stand in need of. It is not from the benevolence of the butcher the brewer, or the baker that we expect our dinner, but from their regard to their own interest. We address ourselves, not to their humanity, but to their self-love, and never talk to them of our own necessities, but of their advantages.⁴⁵

Smith called this impulse self-love. Modern economists call it self-interest.

Self-interest in the New Testament is always balanced by concern for others' best interests. "Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others" (Phil. 2:4).⁴⁶ The proper motivation is service, not self-interest. Parents understand this with respect to their obligations to their children and to each other. The New Testament demands that we extend this concern beyond the covenants of church and family. This is because Christ provided the model through His incarnation, death, resurrection, and ascension.⁴⁷

This is the most profound distinction between Christian economics and humanistic free market economics. The difference can be seen in the attempt of a dying person to bargain with God. One man says, "If you give me five more years, I will give away half of my money." The other man says, "I have been giving away half of my income for two decades. If I die, I can no longer do this. If you want this money for your kingdom, give me five more years." The terms of exchange are the same: five years for half his income. The motivations are radically different. The first man is self-interested. The second man is service-oriented. Paul set forth the correct version of this bargaining procedure. "For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain" (Phil. 1:21). He lived to serve. "For I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ; which is far better: Nevertheless to abide in the flesh is more needful for you" (Phil. 1:23-24).⁴⁸

In a free society, it is better to have covenant-breakers bargain in terms of surrendering wealth to gain wealth than it is to have them gain wealth by stealing, either directly or indirectly through politics. The free market social order is superior to any economy based on taxation and central planning. There is greater freedom, greater creativity, greater personal responsibility, and greater output per unit of resource input (efficiency). This is analogous to the question of the per-

45. Adam Smith, The Wealth of Nations (1776), I:II:2.

46. Chapter 18.

47. Chapter 19.

48. Chapter 18.

son you want to live next door: a sober atheist or an alcoholic atheist. The benefits of the free market are great. The benefits of central planning are few, except in wartime. But this not change the fact that it is better for society when property owners are other-oriented in their motivations and dealings with each other.

Men pursue efficiency. For what purpose? To serve others better or to reap greater entrepreneurial profits personally? The epistles affirm the latter.

James was defiantly hostile to the motivation of rich men. He ridiculed them (James 5:1–6).⁴⁹ Peter agreed. He believed them to be less wise than Balaam's donkey (II Peter 2:14–16).⁵⁰ Both apostles were applying Jesus' warning to rich men, that it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God (Matt. 19:24).⁵¹ John warned the Laodicean church that it suffered from the affliction of riches (Rev. 3:17–18).⁵² Division of Labor (ethics). Adam Smith's other famous passage had to do with pin-making. A factory hires unskilled laborers to produce pins. It breaks down pin production into routine procedures. This factory can vastly outproduce the same number of highly specialized pin makers, working alone. Smith begins The Wealth of Nations with this observation. The Bible observed this long before. "Two are better than one; because they have a good reward for their labour" (Eccl. 4:9). Paul makes this point in Romans 12 and I Corinthians 12: the church as a body. He reasserts this in Ephesians 4:14–16.⁵³ Covenant-keepers should cooperate. Each should do his job.

Conclusion

The epistles are an extension of Jesus' ministry. The economic themes He taught, especially in Luke's gospel, are seen in the epistles. Jesus did not emphasize economic growth. He merely assumed its possibility. Moses had told the generation of the conquest that long-term economic growth is not only possible, it is morally binding. The positive sanctions of God are bound covenantally to God's Bible-revealed law, which is morally binding.

49. Chapter 38.

50. Chapter 40.

51. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 38.

52. Chapter 41.

53. Chapter 14.

Those who argue that Jesus annulled the social laws of Moses face a dilemma. Jesus and the apostles articulated no substitute for either the Mosaic laws or the Mosaic law's sanctions, whether civil or cosmic. This leaves Christians epistemologically mute in the face of rival systems of laws and sanctions. They choose sides, based on what seems acceptable to them, nation by nation, era by era. They sit on the sidelines of civilization, generally mute, but with their intellectual spokesmen baptizing first one, than another, non-Christian social theory. Anglo-American Christians prefer Anglo-American Enlightenment social theories, which were modeled on the bottom-up structure of Calvin's ecclesiology, as developed by seventeenth-century Scottish Presbyterianism. Continental Christians prefer the socialism of nineteenth-century Enlightenment social theory, whose model was the top-down hierarchy of sixteenth-century Jesuits. The supreme oddity of this is that both roads of the Enlightenment lead back to the tiny, obscure College of Montagu at the University of Paris, where Calvin attended until the year (and maybe even the month) that Ignatius of Loyolla enrolled: 1528. They had been preceded at Montagu by the man who tried to mediate between their rival systems of ecclesiology: Erasmus. Yet only obscure specialists in sixteenth-century European history have ever heard of Montagu College.

This is the final volume of an economic commentary on the Bible that has stretched to two dozen volumes, plus about eight book-length appendixes. What does it all boil down to? A single question: If not biblical law, then what?

APPENDIX

ESCHATOLOGY AND SOCIAL THEORY

A. Corporate Casuistry

The question arises as to whether a society that experiences long-term economic growth has been blessed by God because of its covenant-keeping. Is outward economic prosperity evidence of outward covenant-keeping by a majority of the society's members? In other words, is there corporate ethical cause and effect in history? Does covenant-breaking produce prosperity, while covenant-keeping produces poverty? Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28 teach explicitly that there is corporate covenantal cause and effect in history. The righteous in general get richer, and the unrighteous in general get poorer.

This covenantal cause-and-effect process in history is widely denied by most New Testament expositors. They claim that the covenantal corporate predictability which prevailed under the Mosaic law has been abolished by the New Testament. This means that the New Testament's cosmic order is fundamentally different from the Old Testament's cosmic order. It means that there is a new system of ethics in the New Testament. In this system, covenant-breakers can prosper over the long run, and covenantkeepers may not catch up. That which was considered ethically inescapable under the Mosaic law, namely, that righteousness predictably produces prosperity, and unrighteousness predictably produces poverty, is regarded by New Testament expositors as somehow inferior to the New Testament covenantal system of cause and effect. Ethical cause and effect no longer exists corporately, we are assured. We are told that, with respect to societies, outcomes are not connected with confessions. We are assured that we cannot make reliable forecasts regarding the long-term progress of covenant-keeping.

1. Amillennialism

We are assured by amillennialists that the best that Christians can hope for historically in the long run is randomness. Meredith G. Kline stated this emphatically in an article attacking Greg. L. Bahnsen's 1977 book, Theonomy in Christian Ethics.

And meanwhile it [the common grace order] must run its course within the uncertainties of the mutually conditioning principles of common grace and common curse, prosperity and adversity being experienced in a manner largely unpredictable because of the inscrutable sovereignty of the divine will that dispenses them in mysterious ways.¹

Other amillennialists assure us that the long-term progress for covenant-breaking is so great, and the power that covenant-breakers will achieve in society is so overwhelming, that only the direct intervention of Christ at the Second Coming can prevent covenant-keepers from being totally destroyed by covenant-breakers. This was explicitly taught by Cornelius Van Til, in his book, Common Grace.

But when all the reprobate are epistemologically self-conscious, the crack of doom has come. The fully self-conscious reprobate will do all he can in every dimension to destroy the people of God. So while we seek with all our power to hasten the process of differentiation in every dimension we are yet thankful, on the other hand, for "the day of grace," the day of undeveloped differentiation. Such tolerance as we receive on the part of the world is due to this fact that we live in the earlier, rather than in the later, stage of history. And such influence on the public situation as we can effect, whether in society or in state, presupposes this undifferentiated stage of development.²

Van Til's position is clear: as history develops, the persecution of Christians by reprobates increases. The good get better, while the bad get worse; the good get less influential, while the bad get increasingly dominant. Everyone becomes more self-conscious, and spiritual darkness spreads. Christians should therefore be thankful that they live today rather than later. We are tolerated today, he says; later, we will be persecuted. This is the traditional amillennial view of history.

This message is one of historical despair. It undermines Christians

1. Meredith G. Kline, "Comments on an Old-New Error," Westminster Theological Journal, XLI (Fall 1978), p. 184.

2. Cornelius Van Til, Common Grace (1947), reprinted in Common Grace and the Gospel (Nutley, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1972), p. 85.

in their attempt to establish a Christian social order. It tells them that, no matter how faithful they are in applying biblical principles to specific historical situations, their efforts are in vain, culturally speaking. Worse than this: their efforts are self-destructive. Their success will only draw attention to their efforts to overcome covenant-breaking in society. This will alert covenant-breakers to the activities of covenant-keepers. Covenant-breakers will then take steps to persecute covenant-keepers in order to destroy their social institutions. Consistent amillennialism teaches that covenant-breakers will be successful in their attempts to overcome covenant-keepers in history, and also successful in undermining their social institutions, which are consistent with biblical principles. This outlook is consistent with amillennial eschatology. In fact, amillennial eschatology mandates that this view of social change be accepted.

This outlook is so pessimistic that only very rarely do amillennialist social thinkers go into print with it. A few have. One of them was Herman Hanko, who was the senior theologian of the tiny Dutch-American denomination, the Protestant Reformed Church. Only Satan can grant widespread economic success in history, he taught.

I was compelled to warn God's people against the spiritual dangers involved in postmillennialism. It is my fervent hope and prayer that those who hold to postmillennialism do not actually promote the kingdom of Antichrist; but Herman Hoeksema was right when somewhere he warned God's people of the spiritual danger involved. It is not inconceivable that, if the saints are looking for a glorious kingdom on earth, they will be tempted to identify the kingdom which Antichrist establishes with the kingdom of Christ. It will be hard enough in that dreadful day to stand for the cause of Christ without putting other spiritual temptations in the way.³

I do not doubt that a kingdom of peace, of great plenty, of enormous prosperity and uncounted riches, of beauty and splendor such as the world has never seen, will some day be established. Scripture points us to that. What makes one cringe, however, is that this kingdom is described by Scripture as the kingdom of the beast (read Revelation 13). This makes postmillennial thinking of considerable spiritual dangers.⁴

3. Herman Hanko, "Response to 'The Other Side' of Postmillennialism," Standard Bearer (April 1, 1990), p. 295. Cited by Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1992] 1997), p. 506. (<http://bit.ly/klghshd>)

4. Herman Hanko, "The Illusory Hope of Postmillennialism," Standard Bearer

2. Dispensationalism

Equally adamant that long-term economic prosperity is of the devil is accountant and popular writer of paperback dispensational eschatology books, Dave Hunt. He wrote two books on this: Peace, Prosperity, and the Coming Holocaust (1983) and Whatever Happened to Heaven? (1988). I reviewed them in 1992.⁵

This outlook implies that success on a broad base is the result of the creative work of Satan. Satan has overcome the inherent tendency of the social world of the Mosaic law, in which covenant-keepers experience success, and covenant-breakers experience failure. While this was built into the Old Covenant, Van Til, Hanko, and Hunt have insisted that not only has this system of ethical causation been annulled, it has been reversed in the New Testament. In our era, covenant-keeping produces widespread poverty, and covenant-breaking produces widespread prosperity. This prosperity lures unsuspecting and naive covenant-keepers into accepting as legitimate the social goal of long-term economic growth, the authors have argued.

B. Is Wealth Satanic?

Western civilization and the free-market social order have produced long-term economic growth ever since the late eighteenth century. This being the case, there is no other conclusion consistent with both amillennialism and dispensationalism than this: the free-market social order is inherently satanic. After all, this order has produced the extraordinary prosperity in which we all live. Yet such prosperity, they insist, is the mark of the devil. Such prosperity can only come because Satan wants to lure Christians into the trap of believing that covenant-keeping produces long-term prosperity and economic success. So, Christians will be tempted to pursue wealth and success in every field.

Naturally, neither of the two authors—Hanko or Hunt—ever said this. They firmly believed in free market principles. But if long-term economic prosperity is the lure of the devil, and if the free-market social order alone produces long-term prosperity, then the only logical conclusion is that the free-market social order is satanic. They never discussed this. I doubt that they ever thought about it. It is obvious that their followers would reject such a conclusion had they ever announced it.

(Jan. 1, 1990), p. 159. Cited in ibid., pp. 506–7.

5. Gary North, "Ghetto Eschatologies," Biblical Economics Today (April/May 1992). (<http://bit.ly/gnghetto>)

These men have defended a position regarding the source of widespread prosperity which is at odds with Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. It is also at odds with the position of Ben Franklin that honesty is the best policy. It is at odds with the belief that Western civilization, being at bottom Christian in its origins, has produced extraordinary economic growth, which is itself possible only in a private property social order. Private property is explicitly taught in the Ten Commandments⁶ and by the case laws of Exodus.⁷ Private property is affirmed throughout the Old Testament. So is the legitimacy of long-term economic growth. But the defenders of amillennialism and dispensationalism refuse to follow the inescapable logic of their eschatological viewpoints.

With respect to the doctrine of long-term economic growth as an aspect of the private property social order, dispensationalism and amillennialism are inconsistent. On the one hand, the defenders of both systems usually insist that they favor the free market social order. Sometimes they even are willing to quote “Thou shalt not steal” and “Thou shalt not covet” as binding ethical laws under the New Testament. But when they are pressed on the issue of the legitimacy of long-term economic growth as the inescapable outcome of the ethical cause-and-effect system which God has created to govern the affairs of mankind, as revealed in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28, they explicitly deny that this system of ethical causation is operational today.

This leaves them with this alternative: the argument that covenant-keeping produces long-term poverty, and covenant-breaking produces long-term economic growth. Conclusion: only to the extent that covenant-keepers are minority members of overwhelmingly covenant-breaking societies are covenant-keepers said to participate legitimately in a wealthy social order. Covenant-keepers are therefore analogous to Lot in Sodom. The advocates of both amillennialism and dispensationalism rush to warn Christians that any compromise with prosperity as a goal for history is satanic.

Then what of compromise with the free market, which has produced the very prosperity that pessimillennial theologians warn against? Amillennial theologians and dispensational theologians do not publicly deal with this issue. To ask such a question would raise

6. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986).

7. Ibid., Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990).

questions in the minds of their followers about their commitment to private enterprise. Their followers are committed to private enterprise in most cases. There are some exceptions, mainly university scholars who have adopted either socialism or the Social Gospel, in the name of evangelical Christianity, but the broad majority of dispensationalists and amillennialists have recognized that the Social Gospel is liberal to the core.⁸

C. Eschatology and Social Theory

People ask me all the time: “Is eschatology really that important?” Invariably, these people are not committed strongly to any view of eschatology, and they also want to avoid conflict, which would force them to study the rival views and come to a decision.

I have written numerous books to say that eschatology is important to social theory, especially my book, Millennialism and Social Theory.⁹ Here is my thesis, argued for almost four decades: without a concept of theonomic postmillennialism, no concept of an explicitly biblical social order is possible. Because they reject postmillennialism, neither amillennialism nor dispensationalism can accept the Christian origins of the prosperity of the West and its private property social order. So, amillennialists and dispensationalists have steadfastly refused to go into print with books on social theory. They often deny that there is any such thing as Christian social theory. This is because the only possible basis for explicitly biblical and explicitly detailed social theory would be an appeal to the Mosaic law. They insist that the Mosaic law has been completely annulled, and not only annulled, that the principles undergirding the ethical cause-and-effect structure of the Mosaic law have been reversed in New Testament times. “The good get poorer, and the bad get richer.” They dare not go into print with such a viewpoint. They would alienate their followers. So, they restrict their criticism of postmillennialism, and especially of theonomic postmillennialism, by painting with a broad stroke their position that such teaching can lead to satanic conclusions.

They suffer from the age-old problem: you cannot beat something with nothing. They are both unable and unwilling to develop explicitly biblical social theories. Why is this the case? Because the only basis for the construction of such social theories is an appeal to the specific revelation of the Bible, which means the Mosaic law. This means theonomy. They reject theonomy.

8. Joel McDurmon, God Versus Socialism: A Biblical Critique of the New Social Gospel (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2009).

9. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

1. The Epistles

The epistles affirm the same system of ethical cause and effect that the Mosaic law affirmed and the prophets affirmed. They affirm the position that God's sanctions operate in history, not just in eternity. They affirm that what we see in history is a down payment, or earnest, of what we will see in eternity. We will see great splendor in eternity for covenant-keepers, and excruciating poverty for covenant-breakers. Covenant-keepers are not said to grab victory out of the jaws of defeat. Covenant-breakers are not said to grab defeat out of the jaws of victory. There is consistency between historical development and each personal condition. History is not a pack of tricks played on covenant-breakers. It is not a trap to lure them into rebellion against God because of their economic success. The Scriptures are clear that such arrogance is the result of holding back the truth in unrighteousness. It is part of the covenant-breakers' self-conscious attempt to worship the creation rather than the Creator. What we read about covenant-breakers in Romans 18:18–22,¹⁰ we read throughout the epistles regarding the blindness of covenant-breakers.

Paul in other passages warns Christians that they may suffer the kind of persecution that he suffered. This is not the same as saying that all Christians throughout history will suffer the same sort of persecutions that he suffered. If this were not the case, and if all Christians must always suffer persecution, then why did the Roman Empire fall to Christianity? Or are we to conclude that the entire medieval era was a period of enormous satanic victory? Renaissance humanists concluded that the medieval world was both Christian and evil. They named it the "dark ages." They were in revolt against Christian civilization. They were self-consciously attempting to resurrect classical civilization. They hated in the Middle Ages precisely because the era was self-consciously Christian.

D. Eschatology Matters

Eschatology counts. It counts for social theory. It counts for personal motivation. It counts in establishing one's long-term plans, which include leaving a legacy behind. If, as both dispensationalism and amillennialism teach, this legacy will be destroyed by satanic forces, either during the future Great Tribulation of dispensationalists or the future tribulation period of amillennialism, then of what possible use is capital expended today for the creation of long-term social institutions, except for the institutional church and the family? Even education becomes more of a way to create a hothouse environment for the children of the faithful than to challenge the humanistic institutions and worldviews that surround the Christians. Everything is defensive; nothing is offensive. Any attempt to call one's followers to fight the good fight in the expectation of winning the good fight is dismissed as a satanic or heretical, i.e., postmillennial. So, both groups call their followers to fight the good fight with this motivation: "The more successful you are in fighting the good fight, the more guaranteed your defeat will be in history. The more consistent you are in applying biblical principles to the social environment, the more likely you will be persecuted because covenant-breakers will see what you are doing and will deeply resent it."

10. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 2.

This is why both amillennialism and dispensationalism favor the creation of social and cultural ghettos. These are confessional ghettos. They may be nationalist ghettos. But they are always ghettos. They are like the mythical travelers west across the prairie in 1870 who, when attacked by the Indians, formed a circle with the wagons. As a matter of fact, they never did this. It would have been a suicidal tactic. But it made for great Hollywood movies, and it makes for great tactics of social retreat.

Conclusion

You may think that I am exaggerating for the purposes of rhetoric. I have used a little rhetoric, such as the image of forming a circle with the wagons, but I am in no way exaggerating the actual production, or lack of production, of works of social theory by dispensational theologians and amillennial theologians. Even in those few cases when amillennial theologians have tried to make some kind of statement about social theory, they do not appeal to biblical law for society's ethical foundations and specific judicial foundations. Generally, they write books about some version of an anti-utopia. A classic example is the 1957 book, The Society of the Future, by H. van Riesen. It was written by a Dutch scholar, and his conclusion was that Western civilization is headed toward a period of terrible persecution of Christians in a society completely dominated by humanists. Christians will exist only on the fringes of society.

My work in Christian economics rests on a self-conscious rejection of amillennialism, dispensationalism, and pietism insofar as they promote interpretations of the Bible that undermine the building of the comprehensive kingdom of God in history. My work is a defense of the free market social order. It is a defense of this order in terms of this assertion: the Mosaic law's concept of ethical cause and effect made possible Western civilization and free market capitalism.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Gary North grew up in southern California, the son of FBI special agent Samuel W. North, Jr., and his wife, Peggy. North converted to Christianity in high school and began frequenting right-wing bookstores in the Los Angeles area during his college years. Between 1961 and 1963, while an undergraduate student, North became acquainted with the works of Austrian School economists Ludwig von Mises, F.A. Hayek, and Murray Rothbard. During the same period, he began reading the works of conservative Presbyterian minister Rousas John Rushdoony. North made it his life's work to synthesize Austrian Economics with Rushdoony's theological conservatism. Starting in 1967, North became a frequent contributor to the libertarian journal The Freeman where he had first read their work. He later joined the senior staff of the publisher, the Foundation for Economic Education (FEE), 1971–73. North received a PhD in history from the University of California, Riverside in 1972. His dissertation was The Concept of Property in Puritan New England, 1630–1720.

He served as research assistant for libertarian Republican Congressman Ron Paul in Paul's first term (1976), and he shared a small office with the staunchly Calvinistic political philosopher, John W. Robbins, who later became a noted anti-Van Til, pro-Clark presuppositional apologist, author, and publisher. Also on the staff was economist and historian Bruce Bartlett, although in his pre-supply-side economics days. Many of North's articles have appeared on LewRockwell.com. His own website is GaryNorth.com.

LIBERTY TODAY

