The text warns against becoming an economic oppressor. What must be recognized from the beginning is that in the case of buying and selling rural land in Israel, economic oppression was a two-way street. Whether a person was a seller of land (buyer of money) or a buyer of land (seller of money)—i.e., whether a lessor or lessee—he could become an oppressor, according to this passage. “And if thou sell ought unto thy neighbour, or buyest ought of thy neighbour’s hand, ye shall not oppress one another” (Lev. 25:14). This should warn us against any thought that the potential oppressor is always a buyer of some asset, or that a seller is always the potential oppressor.

This is especially relevant with respect to buyers of labor services (sellers of money) and sellers of labor services (buyers of money). It has been assumed by those who favor civil legislation that “protects labor” that employers are almost always the oppressors. Similarly, it has been assumed by those who oppose trade unions that the unions are normally the oppressors. Neither assumption is valid. What is valid is the conclusion that when the civil government interferes in the competitive market process of making voluntary contracts, the group favored by the legislation becomes the economic oppressor. This oppression is established by positive sanctions (subsidies) and negative sanctions (restraints against trade). The element of civil compulsion is the most important aspect in identifying the Bible’s concept of economic oppression.

Let me explain my reasoning by a discussion of the economics of labor unions. If the state threatens violence against an employer who refuses to hire trade union members, or refuses to pay the wages demanded by trade union members, the employer is being oppressed economically. But it is not just the employer who is victimized. If he capitulates to the state, then he must fire (or refuse to hire) those workers who are not union members. They are no longer legally employable by him. They are now forced by law either to look elsewhere for employment or join the local trade union, which may not be possible because of unofficial restrictions against entry.³³ What the voters and the politicians had regarded as economic oppression—an employer's refusal to hire one group of workers—was in fact a decision by the employer to hire a different group of workers: those who did not belong to a trade union. But very few legislators ever consider the effects of their law on those excluded. The legislation is called “pro-labor,” but it is in fact discriminatory against specific laborers. Such legislation oppresses non-union members.

33. Trade unions gain their economic ability to extract above-market wages from employers by their legal authorization from the state to exclude non-union members from the auction for labor services. If all trade unions opened their membership to all applicants, the unions could no longer exclude competing laborers, and the unions’ ability to extract above-market returns would then disappear. Unions adopt non-price means of excluding members: race, nationality, and especially the absence of family

The challenge for the economist is to use economic reasoning to explain what cannot be seen. The public can literally see specific people working for higher wages than they were offered before, and so the public concludes that the legislation has “helped labor.” The public cannot literally see those workers who have been forced by law to seek employment elsewhere. The voters do not readily consider the secondary effects of this “pro-labor” legislation, for these secondary effects are not visible. These effects are only perceived through economic reasoning—a skill that must be developed. The belief that “labor” in general has been helped by legislation making trade unions compulsory in certain industries and in certain regions is an example of what the mid-nineteenth-century French essayist Frédéric Bastiat called the fallacy of the effects not seen.³⁴

Furthermore, it is not just the employed labor union member who benefits. Those employers who can now afford to hire the excluded laborers, but who could not have afforded to do so at the wages previously offered to these laborers, before the law was passed, receive a subsidy: lower-priced labor services. So, civil legislation to “help labor” and to “stop exploitation by employers” by making trade unionism compulsory necessarily winds up helping some laborers at the expense of others, and also helping some employers at the expense of others.

It takes only the simplest level of economic analysis to understand the economic effects of such legislation, but virtually no college-level economics textbook discusses the legislation in this forthright manner, and no high school textbook does. Neither do the history textbooks. There is a good economic reason for this omission. The vast majority of textbooks are sold to tax-funded schools, and these schools are subject to political pressure from well-organized trade unions, most not-connections. See Gary S. Becker, “Union Restrictions on Entry,” in Philip D. Bradley (ed.), The Public Stake in Union Power (Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 1959), ch. 10. Becker won the Nobel Prize in economics in 1992.

34. Frédéric Bastiat, “What Is Seen and What Is Not Seen” (1850), in Selected Essays on Political Economy (Irvington, New York: Foundation for Economic Education, [1964] 1968), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/BastiatSeen>) ably the high school teacher unions. It is not in the unions' interest to have students exposed to the idea that their teachers' income is based in part on the political exploitation of other potential teachers who are willing to work for less but who are excluded through a threat of government violence against the school system's Board of Trustees. After several generations of such textbooks, even the trustees fail to understand the economics of legislated violence.

E. The State and Economic Oppression

The text in Leviticus warns against exploiting others economically. The person who leases a piece of land from an owner can become an oppressor, but so can the owner who leases it. The ethical and judicial question is this: What is economic oppression? This is not so easy to answer as Christian social commentators and humanistic legislators have sometimes imagined.

In my commentary on Exodus, I argued that neither the Bible nor economic theory provides a legally enforceable definition of economic oppression that is based on price. I argued that the state creates the conditions for economic oppression: injustice. This is affirmed by Psalm 82, which refers to rulers of the congregation, which was the nation as a whole.³⁵ "God standeth in the congregation of the mighty; he judgeth among the gods. How long will ye judge unjustly, and accept the persons of the wicked? Selah. Defend the poor and fatherless: do justice to the afflicted and needy. Deliver the poor and needy: rid them out of the hand of the wicked" (Ps. 82:1–4). Here is what I wrote in my Exodus commentary.

* * * * *

Economic theory provides no definition of the concept of "economic oppression" in the case of voluntary transactions. Only where coercion is involved—the threat of physical violence—can the economist be confident that oppression is involved. This does not mean that a definition of oppression is impossible, but it does mean that no appeal to modern humanistic economic theory can provide a clear-cut definition. The use of the coercive power of the civil government to extract resources from other people can be regarded as oppression in most instances, but there are no clearly defined criteria of oppressive voluntary transactions made in a free market. The mere presence of competitive bargaining between unequally rich or unequally skillful bargainers does not constitute economic oppression, as the bargain between Jacob and Esau indicates (Gen. 25:29–34).³⁶ Nevertheless, there are acts of economic oppression, even if conventional economic theory cannot state the criteria scientifically (neutrally).³⁷ . . .

35. James B. Jordan, The Sociology of the Church (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Ministries, 1986), Appendix A: "Biblical Terminology for the Church." (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>)

In the case of voluntary economic transactions, the Bible gives no specific guidelines as to what constitutes economic oppression, apart from oppression in the form of commands to perform a civil crime (e.g., adultery, prostitution). There are laws that prohibit false weights and measures or other crimes involving fraud, but these are general rules for the whole population. They are not laws designed specifically to protect widows, the fatherless, and strangers. Apart from the law regarding weights and measures, the Bible does not authorize legislation or court decisions against perceived cases of economic oppression.³⁸ There are no biblical (or economic) guidelines that define “price gouging” or “rent-racking,” or similar unpopular practices. The attempt of governors and judges, whether civil or ecclesiastical, to go beyond the enforcement of specific laws against fraud is necessarily an expansion of arbitrary rule. Legal predictability suffers, and therefore human freedom also suffers. The power-seeking state expands at the expense of individual freedom.

This is not to argue that such evil economic practices do not exist. No doubt they do exist. The question is: What, if anything, is the civil government or a church court supposed to do in any formal case of alleged oppression? The problem that freedom-seeking Christian societies must deal with is the preservation of the judicial conditions necessary for maintaining personal liberty. How can a society avoid oppression by unjust civil magistrates if the legal system offers great latitude for civil judges to define arbitrarily and retroactively what constitutes an economic crime? Civil government is a God-ordained monopoly of violence. Allow arbitrary and unpredictable power here, and the entire society can be placed under the bondage of oppressors—oppressors who legally wield instruments of physical punishment. In contrast, economic oppression is an individual act by a specific person against a handful of people locally. It is a temporary phenomenon, limited at the very least by the continuing wealth of the oppressor, the continuing poverty of the victims, and the lifespans of both the oppressor and the oppressed. There are no comparably effective restraints on oppression by those who control the administration of civil justice. Society-wide, monopolistic, state-enforced sin is generally a far greater threat to potential victims of oppression than localized, privately financed sin.³⁹

36. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 26.

37. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 48:C.

38. The laws requiring gleaning and prohibiting interest-bearing charitable loans to fellow Israelites had no civil penalty attached to them.

* * * * *

F. Oppression and the Jubilee Land Law

We now return to the text of the jubilee land law. Who is likely to become the victim of oppression? Answer: the person with less reliable information about alternative offers and future economic and legal conditions. This can be either party. In an overwhelmingly agricultural community, both parties probably have equally good information about the value of the fruits of production. The person who wants to lease the land probably has somewhat poorer information about the physical details of the property. On the other hand, the land owner may have fallen into debt. Perhaps he is not a good manager of his money. He may be a poor farmer. He may have poor information about the value of the stream of net income from the land. So, the text does not specify one of the two parties as the more likely oppressor.

To identify the oppressor here, we need to identify the person who uses the state, or his knowledge about the most likely future actions of the state, in order to gain a competitive advantage over the other person in a voluntary transaction. It is rare for biblical law to specify pricing as judicable economic oppression except in life-and-death situations—what I call “priestly pricing.” Biblically defined economic oppression through price-setting is usually based on a person’s efficient use of illegitimate power by the state. The oppressor and the civil magistrates act in collusion to oppress someone or some group.

1. A Question of Knowledge

The law of the jubilee was clear: in year 50, Israel’s agricultural land was to revert to the original owners or their heirs. This leads me to ask: On what basis could anyone not have known what to pay for or charge for leasing the land? All land was not equally valuable. To the extent that one piece of land was more productive, net, than another, to that extent the lease price would have been higher than less productive land. For example, a farm with a well-developed orchard would have brought a higher price than a farm whose income was dependent on farming that required higher inputs of labor and capital. The net income from the fruit of the orchard probably would have exceeded the net income from grain farming. So, the existence of variously priced annual leasehold rents was not necessarily evidence of economic oppression by anyone.

39. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 48:E.

Then what was? A cash payment or long-term annual rent agreement that was either too high (an exploiting lessor) or too low (an exploiting lessee) for the number of years remaining before the jubilee. But since everyone knew the number of years remaining, how could there be any doubt about this? The answer should be clear to anyone who has followed my logic so far: one of the parties knew that this statute would probably not be honored by the civil magistrates when the year of jubilee arrived.

Which of the two would become the beneficiary if only one of them knew the truth? In the case of an advance cash payment for the full term of the lease, the party making the payment would have benefited. The person giving up control over the property would have asked a price on the assumption that the property would return to him or his heirs in the jubilee year. But this price was too low if the person gaining control would not in fact be required to relinquish control at the jubilee.

In the case of a long-term lease arrangement, however, the person agreeing to pay the existing owner an annual payment until the next jubilee year would have taken on an obligation longer than he had suspected. If the civil courts enforced the payment of the terms of the lease, but refused to enforce the jubilee, the person obligated to pay could become the oppressed party. If the land became less productive or its fruits less valuable in the market, the person who leased the land was stuck. The owner would collect his rental payment indefinitely.

2. The Civil Magistrates as Enforcers

The decisive factor, then, was the covenantal faithfulness of the civil rulers. Their decision to neglect the enforcement of the jubilee year would create conditions for economic oppression by one of the two contracting parties. Each party in the transaction was therefore warned in advance by God: do not become an oppressor, even if corrupt civil magistrates make such oppression possible by refusing to enforce the terms of the jubilee land law. God warned everyone to abide by the jubilee law even if the civil rulers did not enforce it.

If I am correct in my analysis of this passage, then we have additional evidence that economic oppression in a free market is usually the result of civil magistrates who refuse to enforce God's Bible-revealed law. It is rarely the process of voluntary pricing in a free market that constitutes economic oppression; it is rather pricing in a society in which civil magistrates favor a particular individual or class by means of economically discriminatory legislation or economically discriminatory court decisions. State subsidies of all kinds enable people to oppress each other economically. The incentive to oppress others in this way is universal. The ability to do so is very limited when the civil magistrates restrict their actions to enforcing the laws of God by imposing the sanctions specified by His law. The state initiates economic oppression by creating the legal conditions in which such oppression is profitable. In short, the state subsidizes economic oppression. As in the case of any state subsidy, this increases the supply of the item being subsidized: economic oppression.

G. The Legitimacy of Both Rent and Interest

This law provides evidence of the existence of rental agreements in ancient Israel. A lease is a rental agreement. A potential lessee approaches the land owner and makes an offer to take control of the land, meaning the fruits produced by the land over time. "Land" here is defined as everything on the land or under the land, including houses, streams, ponds, fish, metals, and anything else specified by either the lease or local custom. The lessee can pay this rent in advance, or annually, or by a combination of the two. The terms of the lease are negotiable. What was not negotiable in ancient Israel was an extension of this lease beyond the beginning of the next jubilee year. The sound of the ram's horn in year 50 would end all agricultural leases.

Let us assume that the ram's horn has sounded. How would Israelites have estimated the value of a new lease? Let us begin with a hypothetical situation in which an heir has just inherited his land. He is an international trader by profession. He has no interest in farming. Neither do his sons. What he wants is cash, so that he can make purchases for the next voyage. He advertises that he is willing to lease the property to anyone who wants it: high bid wins.

Let us assume that those who might be interested in leasing the land are all of equal forecasting ability and equal ability as farmers. They all have cash, and they all want to farm. How will they calculate the value of the lease?

1. Capitalizing Future Income

First, they will make forecasts regarding the average net income that can be derived from the fruit of the land over the next 49 years, including those initial six sabbatical years in which there is neither income nor a miraculous triple crop.

Second, they will seek information on what the correct rate of interest is for long-term loans. (Let us assume that a developed market for commercial loans did exist in Israel.) The person with money to invest can invest in a farm for a period of time or lend the money into the loan market. The lender makes adjustments for comparative rates of risk, and then he decides where to invest in terms of the highest available rate of return. Will he invest in the land's lease or a bond? If his goal is money income, it will make no difference to him where the money will come from. He seeks the highest rate of return. He cares nothing about getting his hands into "the good earth," nor does he become ecstatic when clipping coupons. He simply wants the highest rate of return on his invested money. He can pay the land owner cash and receive lawful access to a stream of future agricultural income, or he can pay a borrower cash and receive a stream of future money income.

Let us consider a specific example. If the lessor's land is expected to produce an ounce of gold per year, net of all expenses, and the bond-issuer promises to repay the creditor an ounce of gold per year, the present price of the lease will equal the present price of the bond. Why? Because the rate of interest—the discount applied to the price of future goods in relation to the price of present goods—is applied equally to both streams of income. Once he has adjusted for comparative rates of risk regarding repayment, the man with gold to invest is not comparing a piece of paper (an IOU) with acres of dirt; he is comparing gold held in the present vs. gold received in the future.

If there was no organized market for such loans in ancient Israel, then each of the prospective lessees would have had to estimate what his own rate of discount was. This discount is not on money as such; it is on time itself. (I shift to the present tense.) Each potential lessee asks himself: “How high do I discount the value to me of future income in relation to cash held today?” If he expects to gain from the farm a net income of one ounce of gold per year,⁴⁰ including forfeited income during six sabbatical years, he will not offer the farm’s owner 49 ounces of gold, cash, even if he has that much available to invest. Why not? Because he already has 49 ounces of gold. Why should he give up 49 ounces today in order to get back one ounce per year over a 49-year period? *A bird in hand today is worth more than a bird in hand 49 years from now.*⁴¹ The 49th ounce of gold that he owns today is worth a great deal more to him than the 49th ounce of gold he expects to receive 49 years in the future. The discount that he applies to the value of each year’s ounce of gold is his rate of interest.

2. Interest and Rent

There are some contemporary commentators who claim that the Old Testament’s prohibition against interest from charitable loans to the poor—“thy poor brother” (Deut. 15:9)—also applied to commercial transactions. Rarely or never are these critics professional theologians, let alone economists. This interpretation of “usury” is incorrect. The two types of loans were (and are) morally and legally different.

The Hebrew word translated as usury in the King James Version means interest. Interest was prohibited when it was derived from a morally obligatory charitable loan to a poor person, either brother in the faith or a righteous resident alien. It was not prohibited when it was from a business loan, which was not morally obligatory. The charitable loan was morally compulsory (Deut. 15:9–10); the commercial loan was not. The charitable loan was cancelled in the seventh year (Deut. 15:1–7); the commercial loan was not. The borrower who did not repay a charitable loan on time could be sold into indentured servitude; this servitude lasted until the debt was repaid or until the year of national debt relief (Deut. 15:12–13). In contrast, the borrower who failed to repay a commercial loan suffered whatever penalties the contract specified. This collateral could legally involve indentured servitude beyond the seventh year, but not beyond the beginning of the year of jubilee, when every person had the right to return to his own land. The jubilee year was to break the bonds of every citizen in Israel, meaning every person who had an inheritance based on the conquest of Canaan.

40. This sounds about right for an 11-acre farm in the United States today; in ancient Israel, it would have been too much, except possibly in the inflationary era of Solomon’s reign, when gold poured into his personal treasury (I Kings 9:14, 28; 10:10, 14).

41. Especially if you are 49 years old.

Interest is familiar to most people: a payment made to a creditor by a debtor for the use of money over time. The money is then spent by the borrower in order to buy a factor of production or on consumption. But why should this definition of interest be limited to money? The addition of money to the transaction does not alter the economic nature of the transaction: payments made over time for the use of a scarce resource over time. It results from a discounting process: services today are worth more than the same services tomorrow. Today's value of a bird in hand is greater than today's value of a guaranteed bird in hand in the future. (I am not speaking here of comparative risk.)

Why is a resource valuable? Because it generates rent: a stream of income over time. To gain legal access to this stream of income, the renter must pay rent to the owner.⁴² As people's knowledge of economic alternatives improves, rental payments made to the owner of a production factor will more closely approximate the market value of that factor's output. Because the term rent has for so long been applied to land, people think of it exclusively as a factor payment to land. This limited definition is valid only in the case of a narrow theoretical discussion of the original factors of production: land (rent) and labor (wage).⁴³ But a wage is a rental payment for human labor. The analytic concept of rent—a stream of income—applies to every factor of production.

In terms of economic theory, the payment of rent is made to maintain legal control over any factor of production. A consumer today can rent a car or a tool or almost anything else that can be purchased. What if I want to buy a stream of income for a period of time? I can go into the market and offer a cash payment. How much will I offer? If I am well informed, I will offer no more than the expected stream of income discounted by the rate of interest. I can buy land this way. I can buy tools. I can buy a contractual stream of money: a bond. Because of market competition, the cash price I must pay to buy the rent (passive income stream) from land will equal the cash price I must pay to buy the rent (passive income stream) from a bond (money contract), assuming everyone expects them to produce equal streams of passive income. Unless I am misinformed (or remarkably charitable), I will not pay more to buy the same passive income stream from different sources of equal risk. Stated differently, the interest rate (discount for time) applies equally to rental income from all sources.

42. This assumes that he is not a sharecropper.

43. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State, pp. 367–69.

If I want to gain legal control a piece of land that will provide me a passive income stream over a period of time, I can do it in either of two ways: (1) borrow the money and pay cash in advance for the use of the land, paying interest to the creditor; (2) lease the land weekly or monthly, paying rent to the owner. Legally, the terms of the two contracts are different. Economically, they are the same.

This leads us to an important conclusion: if paying interest for the use of money over time is illegal biblically, then paying money for the use of land over time is also illegal biblically. We call such payments for land rent. I will put it another way. If I were to borrow money at a rate of interest and then go out and use this money to pay cash for the use of a piece of property over the same period as the loan period, it is no different economically from going to the owner of the property and guaranteeing him monthly rent for that period. I can either guarantee to pay the creditor who loaned me cash a monthly rate of interest until I repay the principal or guarantee to pay the property owner a monthly rental payment until the lease expires. Legally, I am equally obligated to pay. Economically, it will cost me the same amount of money in a competitive market.

Very few of those people—never are they trained economists—who claim that all interest payments are immoral understand that their negative judgment against interest must apply equally to rent.⁴⁴ A denial of the legitimacy or legality of interest payments over time is also a denial of the legitimacy or legality of rental payments over time, i.e., a lease.

The critic of all interest payments who says that he opposes interest payments “because the Old Testament does” has a major problem with Leviticus 25:14–17, i.e., the law governing long-term land leases. If a lease is legitimate, then rent is also legitimate, for a lease is a long-term rental contract. If rent is legitimate, then interest is also legitimate, for interest in a modern capitalist market is a rental contract for the use of money—an agreement entered into only because borrowers have uses for things money can buy. There is a lender and a borrower in each case. There is an agreement to pay money in installments over time for the use of goods over the same period of time. The lender (a person who gives up money or goods for a period of time) forfeits the use of the things that the cash would buy. The borrower (a person who gains control over money or goods for a period of time) gains access to the things money can buy by means of his promise to repay money or goods in the future. In each case, the lender will not lend unless he receives more money or more goods in the future than he gives up today; otherwise, it would be irrational to give them up, except as an act of charity.

44. One of my critics who understood this was S. C. Mooney. He wrote: “The economic similarity between usury and the rent of property readily is admitted. However, this close connection does not serve to legitimize usury, as Locke et al suppose; but to condemn rents.” Mooney, Usury: Destroyer of Nations (Warsaw, Ohio: Theopolis, 1988), p. 172. (<http://bit.ly/MooneyUsury>). For my detailed critique of Mr. Mooney’s utterly bizarre theory of interest and his equally bizarre applications, see Authority and Dominion, Appendix J: “Lots of Free Time: The Existentialist Utopia of S. C. Mooney.”

Conclusion

The jubilee land law prohibited oppression in the writing of land lease contracts. Oppression resulted when one of the two parties to the transaction used specialized knowledge to take advantage of the other. The kind of knowledge was quite specific: knowledge of future decisions by the civil magistrates not to enforce the terms of the jubilee land law.

Either party to the transaction could become an oppressor under this definition. The land owner might persuade the lessee to agree to a contract in which the lessee promised to make regular payments until the jubilee year was declared. If it was not declared, and the magistrates refused to allow him to escape from the terms of the contract, the lessee would find himself locked into the contract. Under some economic conditions (e.g., a long-term fall in the money price for agricultural products), this would defraud the lessee. On the other hand, the lessee might be able to get the land owner to accept a cash payment in advance for legal control over the land's production. If the jubilee land law was not enforced, the lessee would be able to extend his control over the land indefinitely. This would defraud the land owner. Conclusion: the state was the source of the opportunity for oppression.

Both parties were warned to honor the terms of the jubilee land law whether the civil magistrates did or not. God placed the primary responsibility for law enforcement on the contracting parties. He warned them both: "Honor the terms of the leasehold that I have made with Israel for control over My land."

The issue of economic oppression in this law was not the actual pricing of the factor of production: land. This decision was left to the contracting parties. Each looked at the expected future stream of income from the land. Each would apply the prevailing market discount of the price of future goods in relation to present goods to this stream of income: interest. Then they would decide what to offer each other. The agreed-upon price, however, had to take into consideration the irrevocable date for the termination of the contract: the jubilee year.

The existence of a law governing land leases in Israel testifies to the error of interpreting the Bible's prohibition against usury in charitable loans as a prohibition against all forms of interest. The decision to make a cash payment in order to acquire legal ownership of a stream of resource-generated income over a fixed period of time is identical economically to making a cash payment to buy an interest-paying bond with the same expiration date as the lease. This means that a prohibition against all interest payments must also be a prohibition against all rent payments. Yet this law establishes the legality of rent. I therefore conclude that the Bible does not prohibit interest in non-charity loans.⁴⁵

There is no evidence that the jubilee laws were ever enforced in Israel. This may indicate that the jubilee laws sometimes were not enforced. Probably they were not enforced prior to the exile, for the seventh year of release was not honored, which is why God sent Israel into exile (II Chron. 36:21). Thus, every Israelite could safely assume that other laws beside the jubilee land law would govern leasehold contracts. Other civil laws would provide differing authority to magistrates to decide which leases would be honored and which would not. The magistrates of Israel arrogated authority to themselves to disobey God regarding the sabbatical year. How far could they safely be trusted to honor the terms of other laws? The opportunities for economic oppression must have increased, compared to rule by the sabbatical law and the jubilee land law, for there would have been less certainty about the enforcement of the civil law. The greater the degree of judicial uncertainty, the greater the amount of resources necessary to protect oneself: better lawyers, larger bribes, and higher expenditures on searching out information regarding the integrity of one's trading partners and also the moral integrity of their legal heirs. These were long-term lease contracts.

45. The aforementioned Mr. Mooney has yet to reply to this argument, which I also offered in Tools of Dominion in 1990.

FOOD MIRACLES AND COVENANTAL PREDICTABILITY

Wherefore ye shall do my statutes, and keep my judgments, and do them; and ye shall dwell in the land in safety. And the land shall yield her fruit, and ye shall eat your fill, and dwell therein in safety. And if ye shall say, What shall we eat the seventh year? behold, we shall not sow, nor gather in our increase: Then I will command my blessing upon you in the sixth year, and it shall bring forth fruit for three years. And ye shall sow the eighth year, and eat yet of old fruit until the ninth year; until her fruits come in ye shall eat of the old store (Lev. 25:18–22).

The theocentric meaning of this passage is that God sustains His people, and more than sustains them. He offers them plenty. They are required to acknowledge this fact by trusting His promises. They display this trust through their obedience to His law. This is an aspect of point four of the biblical covenant model: sanctions.¹

A. Universal Benefits: Peace and Food

This passage begins with a re-statement of the familiar cause-and-effect relationship between corporate external obedience to God's covenant law and corporate external blessings. We know that the frame of reference is corporate blessings because of the use of the first person plural: "What shall we eat the seventh year? behold, we shall not sow, nor gather in our increase." In this case, the text focuses on two blessings: peace and food. "Wherefore ye shall do my statutes, and keep my judgments, and do them; and ye shall dwell in the land in safety. And the land shall yield her fruit, and ye shall eat your fill, and dwell therein in safety (vv. 18–19).” This is a repeated theme in the Bible. “But they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree; and none shall make them afraid: for the mouth of the LORD of hosts hath spoken it” (Micah 4:4).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2010), ch. 4.

If this dual promise of peace and food were found only in Leviticus 25, it could be discussed as an aspect of the jubilee laws and therefore no longer in force. But the list of God’s positive sanctions in Leviticus 26:3–15 indicates that this pair of positive sanctions was not uniquely tied to the jubilee. The promise of peace and food is more general than the jubilee law, since it refers to “my statutes” and “my judgments.” God refers Israel back to His revealed law-order. It is their covenantal faithfulness to the stipulations of this law-order which alone serves the basis of their external prosperity. Without obedience, they can have no legitimate confidence in their earthly future in the land. This law has a broad application. It undergirds the observation by David: “I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread” (Ps. 37:25). The link between obedience to God’s statutes and eating is reflected in David’s observation: righteousness and the absence of begging.

Why is this passage found in the jubilee statutes? Because of the unique place of both the land and the harvest in the jubilee laws. Preceding this section are laws that deal with the transfer of a family’s land to the heirs: the return—legally, though not necessarily physically—of each man to his father’s land (v. 13). This was a testament of liberation. Because of this law, there could be no permanent legal enslavement of Israelites inside the land.² The jubilee law also established an obligation for all leasehold contracts to be based on the jubilee year’s requirement of rural land’s reversion to the original family (vv. 14–17). Following the announcement of the dual blessing of peace and food is another promise: a triple crop in the sixth year of the seventh cycle of sabbatical weeks of years (vv. 20–22).

The promise of peace and food points the reader’s attention to the author of the law. God is sovereign. He promises to bring them national prosperity in response to their adherence to His laws. This promise is conditional: no obedience, no prosperity. This fact of covenantal life becomes clear in the next chapter of Leviticus. In order to demonstrate the reliability of His promises on a year-to-year basis, He promised a manifestation of His supernatural sovereignty: a miracle year.

2 2. The law applied to all Israelites. Aliens could become heirs of this promise through adoption, either into a family (rural) or tribe (walled city). Excommunication removed an heir from his landed inheritance. Excommunication also removed him from citizenship. This is why a excommunicant’s adult sons had to break publicly with him and his rebellion in order to preserve their own inheritance. Although there is no law governing this, I presume that minor sons of an excommunicated father could inherit upon their majority at age 20 if they broke with their father publicly when they turned 20. The goal of biblical law is restoration.

B. The Miracle Year

To the jubilee year was attached a miracle. God promised to deliver a triple crop in the sixth year of the seventh sabbatical cycle of years. “And if ye shall say, What shall we eat the seventh year? behold, we shall not sow, nor gather in our increase: Then I will command my blessing upon you in the sixth year, and it shall bring forth fruit for three years. And ye shall sow the eighth year, and eat yet of old fruit until the ninth year; until her fruits come in ye shall eat of the old store” (vv. 20–22). This triple portion was God’s way of announcing His presence with His people. They would be given sufficient crops to sustain them through the sabbath year and the jubilee year. Then, at the end of the jubilee (eighth) year, they were to plant for the next year.

In the wilderness period, they had been given the almost daily miracle of the manna. The exception to this miracle was itself an even greater miracle. On the day before the sabbath, they could gather a double portion. The manna in jars would not rot on the sabbath (Ex. 16:22). On every other day of the week, any manna that was left in a jar overnight would rot (Ex. 16:20).

As I have written in my commentary on Exodus, the manna had a function beyond the mere provisioning of the people with their daily bread. It was given to them in order that they might develop confidence in God as a sovereign provider. His provision of manna was miraculous. It was also regular. They had to trust God to bring the manna the next day, for it could not be stored overnight. Then, once a week, the regularity of the miracle was manifested in a different way: the miraculous rotting of the manna miraculously ceased. They could store it overnight, so that they would not have to labor to harvest it on the sabbath. So, the miracle was to teach them about the regularity of God’s provisioning, as well as their total dependence on His grace.³

3. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985),

When they came into the land, the manna ceased forever: “And the manna ceased on the morrow after they had eaten of the old corn of the land; neither had the children of Israel manna any more; but they did eat of the fruit of the land of Canaan that year” (Josh. 5:12). The fruit of the land would henceforth sustain them. But this did not mean that they were any less dependent on God for their food. Now, however, their food would come predictably in terms of their corporate covenantal conformity to His law: the greater their obedience, the more predictable their food.

In order to remind them of their continuing need to obey Him, as the sovereign provider of food, God did not totally remove His miracles from the land. Twice per century, God promised to provide them with bread in a miraculous way: the triple crop of the sixth year in the seventh cycle of the sabbatical week of years. This would be the equivalent of manna.

C. The Self-Discipline of Thrift

In a normal cycle of seven years, the Israelites had to save enough grain over six years to get through the seventh (sabbatical) year and half way through the eighth year, until the eighth-year crop could be harvested.⁴ But this was not the case in jubilee year periods. In the sixth year would come a triple crop. That crop would feed them in the second half of year six, all of year seven (sabbatical), all of year eight (jubilee), and half way through year nine.

This means that in the six years prior to a jubilee year, farmers did not have to store up crops in order to carry themselves through the sabbatical year, the jubilee year, and half way through the ninth year until the crop came in. This triple crop was Old Covenant Israel's equivalent of the manna of the wilderness: a miraculous gift from God. It was the bread of life.

In escaping the production restraints of a normal sabbatical cycle, they acknowledged their dependence on the grace of God. The thrift that was agriculturally necessary during normal sabbatical periods was not required during the jubilee's week of years. Each farm could safely consume or sell one-sixth of each year's crop during the final sabbatical cycle. This income would otherwise have had to be stored or sold for cash and retained in that form in preparation for the sabbatical year.

ch. 18.

4. Ibid, Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 53:C:1.

This pre-jubilee miracle would have made it possible for thrifty farmers to increase their purchase of farming tools, or make investments in urban industries, or make foreign investments. This extra marketable output of food would have tended to lower the price of food in Israel during jubilee periods, thereby stimulating the export of food to nations where food prices were higher.⁵ Meanwhile, not-so-thrifty Israelites could have enjoyed more food, or else they could have sold the agricultural surplus in order to buy urban-produced consumer goods or imported consumer goods. To both the thrifty and the less thrifty, God promised six consecutive years of relief from the pressure to save for the normal sabbatical year.

To take advantage of this miraculous gift from God, the Israelites had to trust God to deliver on His promise to the nation. If they refused to save for six years in preparation for the arrival of a sabbath year of rest and the jubilee year, back to back, a refusal of God to deliver the triple crop would have created near-famine conditions by the ninth year. Many people would have been forced to sell their family lands or even sell themselves into slavery—in the very period that God set aside for the recovery of family lands and the release of bondservants. Thus, they had to exercise faith that the triple crop would arrive on schedule.

On the other hand, if God delivered on His promise, but the people then refused to honor the sabbatical year and/or the jubilee year, planting and harvesting instead, this would have constituted a misuse of the jubilee miracle. It would have constituted theft from God through the economic oppression of hired harvesters, strangers, and gleaners. It is clear from the message of Jeremiah that the nation did not honor the sabbatical years for 70 sabbatical cycles, or 490 years. This is why they were sent into captivity. “To fulfil the word of the LORD by the mouth of Jeremiah, until the land had enjoyed her sabbaths: for as long as she lay desolate she kept sabbath, to fulfil threescore and ten years” (II Chron. 36:21).

There is no unambiguous biblical record that the jubilee law was ever honored in Israel. We know that the sabbath year of release was not honored for 490 years prior to the exile. Since they did not honor the sabbath year of release, it is highly doubtful that God ever gave them the promised triple crop in the seventh sabbatical cycle. Without the triple crop, perhaps they chose to ignore the jubilee law. The Bible does not say.

5. Because of the high cost of ground transportation, these exported crops would normally have gone by boat.

D. Miracles, Sanctions, and Mysticism

When Jesus announced His fulfillment of the jubilee year (Luke 4:18–21), He was announcing the end of the miraculous jubilee year.⁶ Under the New Covenant, there is no triple crop in the sixth year of the seventh “week of years.” The faith of New Covenant-keepers has been stripped of a national miracle that demonstrated the reliability of God’s providential and law-bounded covenantal order, just as a similar faith during the wilderness era was stripped of a daily miracle when the manna ceased upon the nation’s entry into Canaan. As the spiritual maturity of covenant-keepers advances, miracles steadily cease.⁷

1. Obedience and Blessings

The question arises: What about the covenantal cause-and-effect connection between corporate external obedience and corporate blessings? Are covenant-bound societies still promised peace and agricultural prosperity if they adhere to the external requirements God’s revealed law? Was this annulled by Jesus in His fulfillment of the jubilee year? No. In Leviticus 26, which appears after the close of the jubilee laws, we read: “And I will give peace in the land, and ye shall lie down, and none shall make you afraid: and I will rid evil beasts out of the land, neither shall the sword go through your land” (Lev. 26:6). This recapitulation of the promise of Leviticus 25:18–19 indicates that this aspect of the jubilee law was broader than an aspect of the jubilee law. But was it a cross-boundary law? Did it apply outside the Promised Land? The recapitulation in Leviticus 26 is paralleled in Deuteronomy 28, and is mentioned as a testimony to the nations:

The LORD shall cause thine enemies that rise up against thee to be smitten before thy face: they shall come out against thee one way, and flee before thee seven ways. The LORD shall command the blessing upon thee in thy storehouses, and in all that thou settest thine hand unto; and he shall bless thee in the land which the LORD

6. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

7. This has been the case in the history of Christianity. In the early church, the miracles of healing and exorcism were important in evangelism. Today, both of these gifts are far less evident in advanced industrial nations, although both still are used by some fundamentalist missionaries working in primitive societies or in societies deeply in bondage to a rival supernatural religion.

thy God giveth thee. The LORD shall shalt keep establish thee an holy people unto himself, as he hath sworn unto thee, if thou the commandments of the LORD thy God, and walk in his ways. And all people of the earth shall see that thou art called by the name of the LORD; and they shall be afraid of thee (Deut. 28:7–10).

Why should they be afraid of Israel if they did not interpret the visible predictable sanctions in Israel as proof of God's unique presence with Israel? Did this fear apply only to the risks of invading Israel? Were the nations not also to fear a counter-invasion by Israel?⁸ Deuteronomy 20:10–20 lists the laws of siege. These laws did not apply to Israel's invasion of Canaan, for they established legitimate terms of surrender, which were not options during the conquest. Therefore, these military laws had to apply to warfare outside the land. They were cross-boundary laws. Since Israel was to be feared by foreign nations, the corporate covenantal sanctions visible to foreigners inside the land had to be presumed by them to apply outside the land, too (Deut. 4:4–8).⁹

Without the miracle of manna or the miracle of the triple crop, New Covenant Christians are thrown back on their faith in God's revealed word. The compelling evidence of God is supposed to be God's word. This always was the case, but the miracles were added to overcome the Israelites' weakness of faith. Old Covenant believers in the wilderness had daily edible reminders of God's presence. In the Promised Land, these reminders were reduced numerically to twice per century. In the New Covenant, the miracle of food is restricted to the Lord's Supper. This miracle—co-participation in heavenly worship by the earthly church and the heavenly church—must be accepted on faith.¹⁰

8. Israel was not to initiate foreign wars. The Mosaic festival laws made empire impossible. There was no permanent payoff in launching foreign wars because of the distance of foreign nations from the central city where sacrifices were offered.

9. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 8.

10. New Covenant Christians have gone in three directions to explain this miracle. Roman Catholics have turned to philosophical realism: the literal, bodily presence of Christ in the sacrament. The Lutherans also are realists, defending the body and blood of Christ as being substantially present: Formula of Concord (1576), Art. VII, Sections 1, 2. Anabaptists have adopted nominalism: the Lord's Supper as a mere memorial. The biblical view is neither realism nor nominalism but covenantalism: God's special judicial presence in the eating of the meal. It is a meal eaten on the Lord's Day, or Day of the Lord, or judgment day.

2. Covenantal Predictability

Has God reduced His covenantal predictability in history along with His reduction of miracles? For instance, does it take longer today than it did in Mosaic Israel for God to bring his negative sanctions in history? No evidence that I am aware of suggests this. Sometimes, the negative sanctions came soon. God was angry with Israel, so He moved David to take an illegal holy census (I Sam. 24:1).¹¹ David's sin in numbering the nation brought an immediate plague on 70,000 people (II Sam. 24:15). Rapid judgment was the threat that Nineveh faced; the nation therefore repented. Covenant-breakers outside the land understood the cause-and-effect connection between corporate sin and God's wrath in history. In other cases, judgment was delayed for centuries. In Mosaic Israel, the nation violated the sabbatical year laws for centuries. Not until Jeremiah's day were they told that God would soon bring His corporate wrath against the nation for this long-term act of rebellion by sending them into captivity (I Chron. 36:21).

While miracles steadily disappear, the covenantal promise of God's predictable corporate sanctions remain in place. If this were not the case, the sanctions aspect of the Lord's Supper (I Cor. 11:30) would be transferred completely out of history. While a man's verbal oath and the physical sacraments are part of history, the oath is taken under God, who is in eternity. Some of the personal sanctions are both predictable and eternal, but corporate negative sanctions are exclusively historical (no sin beyond the resurrection). On what exegetical basis can the sacrament's sanctions be said to be predictable only outside of history and apply only to individuals?

This raises the question of civil oaths. Nations take oaths (Ex. 19). Are these oaths enforced exclusively by men rather than God? Political pluralists are logically compelled to answer yes: no God enforces corporate civil oaths with covenantally predictable historical sanctions invoked by the oaths. If pluralists were to answer no, thereby affirming God's predictable, corporate, covenantal, historical sanctions, they would have to abandon their pluralism. Their religion forbids them to answer otherwise: no supernatural frame of reference for civil oaths.

If God's predictable, corporate, covenantal sanctions in history were to disappear, just as predictable corporate miracles such as manna and the triple crop have disappeared, Christianity would necessarily be progressively absorbed into the larger covenant-breaking culture. Whatever regularity in corporate sanctions that might be said to exist in history would be based on shared, universal categories of social and political ethics, e.g., natural law theory. There would be no way for the kingdom of God to manifest its presence among men except through the verbal testimony of individuals regarding totally invisible, subjectively discerned patterns of predictability, e.g., "I feel all tingly when I pray." For those people who have no desire to feel tingly, or who are content to take niacinamide whenever they want to feel tingly, such verbal testimony carries no weight. Christian culture could be differentiated from pagan culture only through the personal mysticism of its members. But mysticism is inherently without theological and judicial content—beyond the realm of creeds and intellectual categories. So-called Christian mysticism cannot be distinguished judicially from pagan mysticism. In short, if neither revelational ethics and its attached sanctions nor miracles identify the historical presence of the kingdom of God, the institutional church ceases to have a role to play in history that is visibly different from any other charitable or salvationist organization. This lack of distinction overtook most evangelical churches in the twentieth century. Christianity is regarded by covenant-breakers as just one more ameliorative-mystical tradition among thousands.

11. The census was to be taken prior to holy war (Deut. 20).

The way to restore the church to its position as society's central institution is to preach a separate biblical worldview based on biblical law and biblical sanctions. The other avenue for distinguishing the church from the world—the quest for miracles or continuing revelation—in the twentieth century became the differentiating mark of pentecostals and charismatics.¹² The third path is mysticism.

Covenantal corporate predictability in history is mandatory if Christians are to reconstruct social theory. If such regularity did not exist in New Covenant history, then society could not be reformed on a uniquely Christian basis. The church would then seek to avoid social transformation. It would retreat from the world (discontinuity) or conform itself to the world (continuity). It would become either fundamentalist-mystical or liberal. This is generally what happened in the United States, 1900–1975. As Rushdoony said, the fundamentalists believe in God but not in history, while the liberals believe in history but not in God. In either case, the world is abandoned to the covenantal representatives of Satan. There is no neutrality.

12. Katherine Kulhman, I Believe in Miracles (New York: Pyramid Books, [1962] 1964).

E. Miracles of Feeding

The law of God is given to all men so that they will learn to obey the God of the Bible. If they live in societies that are marked by widespread obedience to the external laws of God, they will experience widespread external blessings, among which are peace and food.

To prove that this promise can be trusted, God on occasion has established miracles of feeding. The first time was in the wilderness period: the manna. When they entered the Promised Land, they initially lived off the crops of their defeated enemies. Then, as they began to plant and reap, they were to become thrifty: saving, not for a rainy day, but for the sabbatical year. But in the seventh cycle of sabbatical years, God promised to give them a miracle: the triple crop of the sixth year. This was to allow them to save for six years and not be forced to consume their savings in the seventh and eighth, or consume what would normally have been saved for six years and not be penalized for their consumption.¹³

The triple crop was also to remind them that God's blessings are predictable in history. It would remind them that the source of their prosperity was not thrift as such, but thrift within the framework of God's covenant. They were warned not to draw a false conclusion, one based on the humanist presupposition of the autonomy of man: "And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth. But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day" (Deut. 8:17–18).¹⁴ Covenantal blessings are given to confirm the covenant.

Conclusion

The miracle of the triple crop was promised to Israel in order to confirm visibly: (1) the sovereignty of God over nature; (2) the predictability of God's covenant-based blessings in history. The Israelites were not to capitulate to the temptation of worshipping another god, either a god of nature or a god of history—the only two kinds of idols available to covenant-breaking man.¹⁵

13. The prophets used the miracle of feeding on numerous occasions. The pagan widow of Zerephath had two containers that filled daily, one with oil and the other with meal, when Elijah lived in her home (I Kings 17:14–15). In the New Testament, Jesus used the miracle of feeding on two occasions.

14. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 22.

15. Herbert Schlossberg, Idols for Destruction: Christian Faith and Its Confronta-

Modern covenant-breaking man denies the miracles. He wishes to divinize either nature or history or both (Darwinism). To do this, he must deny all traces of God's authority over nature and history. Modern man has chosen evolution as his god, meaning his source of law. Evolution is said to govern both nature and historical process. Evolution is regarded as impersonal except when man, meaning elite men, learns the secrets of evolution and then directs both nature and history.¹⁶ A major appeal of evolution is power.

Modern Christians reject evolution in its humanist form. They insist that God is still sovereign over history, although Augustinians and Calvinists alone insist that God predestines everything that comes to pass in history. There are virtually no visible traces of Catholic Augustinianism and very few traces of Calvinism. Furthermore, most modern Calvinists have explicitly or implicitly denied the existence of covenantal predictability in New Covenant times. They openly reject the idea of a national civil covenant under God. They are political pluralists.¹⁷ They do not believe that God brings predictable corporate sanctions, positive or negative, in terms of a nation's obedience to God's Bible-revealed law.¹⁸

This belief leaves them without any miracles with which to challenge humanists and other covenant-breakers. This belief also provides them with a theological explanation for the seeming helplessness of Christianity to transform culture by establishing the civilization of God in history: God's kingdom. This in turn creates a deep psychological need to find personal solace in the midst of inevitable cultural defeat: pietistic ecclesiastical ghettos. Finally, their widespread acceptance of life in these ghettos has led to the development of ghetto eschatologies.¹⁹

Without a concept of God's covenant in history, Christians have not been able to develop an explicitly Christian social theory. They have relied on imported pagan natural law concepts to develop what few social ideas they possess. All of this has been the product of the tion with American Society (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, [1983] 1993), p. 11.

16. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), Appendix A.

17. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), chaps. 3–5. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

18. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), ch. 7. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

19. Gary North, "Ghetto Eschatologies," Biblical Economics Today, XIV (April/May 1992). (<http://bit.ly/gnghetto>)

widespread acceptance of the original theological assumption, namely, that God in the New Covenant era has annulled the covenantal predictability of Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. With neither widespread faith in the miracle of covenantal predictability nor the presence of earlier covenantal miracles of food and healing, modern Christians have become almost totally defensive in their thinking. Ideas have consequences.

THE RIGHT OF REDEMPTION

The land shall not be sold for ever: for the land is mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with me. And in all the land of your possession ye shall grant a redemption for the land (Lev. 25:23–24).

We begin with a theocentric analysis of this passage. This passage has to do with inheritance: point five of the biblical covenant model.¹

The prohibition against the permanent sale of rural land was connected to the nation's judicial status as strangers and sojourners with God. What did this mean? God began to dwell in the land of Israel when the conquest began, i.e., after the nation had crossed Canaan's border. This means that He lived among them judicially. He did not take up residence with them physically. His unique judicial presence in the land was marked physically by the presence of the two tablets of the law inside the Ark of the Covenant. Even this testimony had to be taken on faith; no one was allowed to look inside the Ark. When this law was violated by the men of Bethshemesh, God killed 50,070 of them (I Sam. 6:19). Negative corporate sanctions came immediately after God allowed the corporate infraction to take place.²

A. Covenantal Inheritance

This law identified the Israelites as strangers and sojourners with God. The meaning here is “strangers from the world in the land.” This was in contrast to strangers and sojourners who might come into the land. These would become strangers and sojourners in the land, but

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 5.

2. Had the first three or four people who looked inside the Ark immediately been stricken with leprosy, as Miriam was stricken in the wilderness (Num. 12:10), the infraction would have ceased.

without God, i.e., not members of an Israelite family.

To be a stranger and sojourner with God under the Mosaic Covenant had a specific judicial meaning: one's heirs would inherit a portion of a particular plot of land in Israel. To inherit, a person had to be a member of an Israelite family that had participated in the conquest. The Israelites' righteous shedding of the blood of that generation of Canaanites had been a covenant sign for Israel. No one who was not biologically or judicially (through adoption) an heir to one of those families that had participated in that original ritual sacrifice could own rural land on a permanent basis in Israel until the law was changed by God after the exile (Ezek. 47:21–23).

The special judicial presence of God among them had been manifested historically to Israel by the genocide of the Canaanites. God had used His people—a royal priesthood (Ex. 19:6)—to bring negative historical sanctions against His enemies. They had served in a holy army. They had inherited the land of God's enemies. This was inheritance through corporate execution. Their landed inheritance began with their obedience in committing genocide.³ It ended with their national disinheritance at the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.

To be a covenantal stranger with God meant that you possessed permanent legal title to a plot of land. This land could not be permanently alienated. Title could not be legally transferred to another family by a leaseholder in any generation. God held original title; families held secondary title. This was a guarantee to Israel: for as long as the nation remained obedient to God, its original families would not be disinherited. There was only one way for corporate disinheritance to take place: God's public execution of the nation of Israel. "And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God" (Deut. 8:19–20).⁴ This took place at the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.⁵ The inheritance was transferred to another corporate people, just as Jesus had promised: "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43). This was God's act of covenantal execution, not literal execution.

3. None of this is visible in W. Brueggemann's book, The Land (London: SPCK, 1978). He wrote the following: "But Israel's Torah is markedly uninterested in a religion of obedience as such. It is rather interested in care for land. . ." (p. 60). Thus, he interprets the Mosaic law's universally acknowledged concern for ethics as a concern for ecology. You would be hard-pressed to find any interpretation of the Pentateuch more bizarre and misleading than this one. Then he quotes Joshua 1:7–8, God's command to be strong and courageous in the conquest of the land. Concludes Brueggemann: "The rhetoric is peculiar because it is an imperative to martial bravery and courage. But what is asked is not courage to destroy enemies, but courage to keep Torah" (p. 60). It is not the Bible's rhetoric that is peculiar. What is peculiar is Prof. Brueggemann's hermeneutic.

B. Redemption on Demand

Why would an Israelite have voluntarily leased out his land? The obvious reason was that the owner believed that he had better uses for the money than for the land. Perhaps he preferred to live in a city. Perhaps he was involved in commerce and wanted capital. Perhaps he was involved in some infraction that required an immediate payment to a victim.

An involuntary lease was used to raise money to pay off debts: victims of crimes or lenders in some business transaction in which the land had been used as collateral. The repayment of interest-free charitable loans was not governed by the jubilee law but by the more frequent sabbatical year law (Deut. 15:1–10). Charitable debts were cancelled every seventh year. But charitable loans were not collateralized by land; they were collateralized by the debtor's willingness to go into bondage for up to six years, should he default.

The existence of an interest payment in a loan agreement identified the loan as non-charitable, non-compulsory, and therefore more risky for the debtor, for the sabbatical year of release (Deut. 15:7–10) did not apply to business loans. The man who began as a poor man when he borrowed money in an emergency did not put his land on the line, assuming that he still owned any land. In contrast, the man who became a poor man after going into debt in order to finance a business venture or a consumer purchase did have to forfeit his land if his land was the collateral he had agreed to provide the lender.

The jubilee law specified that the collateral could be redeemed at any time. The lender who had repossessed the collateral of the family's inheritance was permitted to use it as a productive asset until one of two things took place: (1) the jubilee year began; (2) the poor man or his kinsman-redeemer paid back the principal.

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 23.

5. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

If thy brother be waxen poor, and hath sold away some of his possession, and if any of his kin come to redeem it, then shall he redeem that which his brother sold. And if the man have none to redeem it, and himself be able to redeem it; Then let him count the years of the sale thereof, and restore the overplus unto the man to whom he sold it; that he may return unto his possession. But if he be not able to restore it to him, then that which is sold shall remain in the hand of him that hath bought it until the year of jubile: and in the jubile it shall go out, and he shall return unto his possession (Lev. 25:25–28).

C. The Kinsman-Redeemer

The person who is identified in Leviticus 25 as the person with the authority to buy back a poor man's land is the kinsman (Lev. 25:25–26). The same root word in Hebrew is used for the verb for purchasing: "And if it be not redeemed within the space of a full year, then the house that is in the walled city shall be established for ever to him that bought it throughout his generations: it shall not go out in the jubile" (Lev. 25:30). "And if a man purchase of the Levites, then the house that was sold, and the city of his possession, shall go out in the year of jubile: for the houses of the cities of the Levites are their possession among the children of Israel" (Lev. 25:33).

1. A Messianic Model

The office of kinsman-redeemer was based on a messianic model: "Yea, all kings shall fall down before him: all nations shall serve him. For he shall deliver the needy when he crieth; the poor also, and him that hath no helper. He shall spare the poor and needy, and shall save the souls of the needy. He shall redeem their soul from deceit and violence: and precious shall their blood be in his sight" (Ps. 72:11–14). The kinsman-redeemer was the same office as the blood-avenger, the go'el (sometimes transliterated as ga'awl). "But if the man have no kinsman [go'el] to recompense the trespass unto, let the trespass be recompensed unto the LORD, even to the priest; beside the ram of the atonement, whereby an atonement shall be made for him" (Num. 5:8). "The revenger of blood [go'el] himself shall slay the murderer: when he meeteth him, he shall slay him" (Num. 35:19). God identified Himself as Israel's kinsman-redeemer: "Wherefore say unto the children of Israel, I am the LORD, and I will bring you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians, and I will rid you out of their bondage, and I will redeem [go'el] you with a stretched out arm, and with great judgments"

(Ex. 6:6).

The blood avenger was the nearest of kin. It was he who had the responsibility of pursuing and then slaying anyone suspected of having murdered his kinsman. The cities of refuge were built in order to provide a place for suspected murderers to flee. The city of refuge was a legal boundary into which the authority of a blood avenger from outside the city did not extend. "And they shall be unto you cities for refuge from the avenger; that the manslayer die not, until he stand before the congregation in judgment" (Num. 35:12). Outside the boundaries of a city of refuge, "The revenger of blood himself shall slay the murderer: when he meeteth him, he shall slay him" (Num. 35:19). After a trial in the city, a man convicted of murder (as distinguished from accidental manslaughter) was placed outside the city, to be executed by the blood avenger (Num. 35:25). A man convicted of accidental manslaughter could lawfully be killed by the blood-avenger at any time outside the city of refuge, until the high priest died. Here the language of release is the same as the language of the jubilee year: returning to the family's land: "Because he should have remained in the city of his refuge until the death of the high priest: but after the death of the high priest the slayer shall return into the land of his possession" (Num. 35:28).

In the captivity of Israel, God acted as their kinsman: "Go ye forth of Babylon, flee ye from the Chaldeans, with a voice of singing declare ye, tell this, utter it even to the end of the earth; say ye, The LORD hath redeemed his servant Jacob" (Isa. 48:20). In doing so, God acted as blood-avenger: "And I will feed them that oppress thee with their own flesh; and they shall be drunken with their own blood, as with sweet wine: and all flesh shall know that I the LORD am thy Saviour and thy Redeemer, the mighty One of Jacob" (Isa. 49:26).

2. Why Redeem Another Man's Land or Person?

The kinsman-redeemer was the agent authorized by God to buy back the property of a close relative. The question is: What was the benefit for him? Why would any relative do this? It would have been a major capital outlay unless the jubilee was near. David Daube has offered a plausible explanation: the kinsman-redeemer bought the use of the land for himself until the jubilee year or until his relative could purchase the land from him, whichever came first. In other words, the kinsman-redeemer became the new master of the property.⁶

It was also a benefit to the original owner when his kinsman-redeemer leased back the property. First, the land would probably be taken care of more carefully by a relative, i.e., there would be less “strip mining” of its productivity. Second, the kinsman-redeemer might be willing to allow him to work the land as a sharecropper. The original owner would come under the authority of a relative rather than a stranger. The relative might treat him better; he, in turn, would have family pressures on him to perform more efficiently as a caretaker. These are economic arguments. Third, the land would remain in the family—an important aspect of family authority in Israel. This is a social factor rather than economic: a matter of status. It was an embarrassment for a family to have an insolvent member in its midst. This was a way for the family to demonstrate its willingness to “care for its own.”

The text does not indicate that the land had to be returned immediately to the original owner. The economics of the case does indicate that without the kinsman-redeemer’s right to use the land for his own benefit until either the jubilee or the land’s redemption by the relative, there would have been little likelihood that this law would have been honored in practice.

The same principle of transferred authority applied also to the redemption of an Israelite brother from servitude in the household of a resident alien. “And if a sojourner or stranger wax rich by thee, and thy brother that dwelleth by him wax poor, and sell himself unto the stranger or sojourner by thee, or to the stock of the stranger’s family: After that he is sold he may be redeemed again; one of his brethren may redeem him” (Lev. 25:47–48). Better to be a servant in the household of a relative than in the household of a foreigner. Better to be under the temporary authority of a covenant-keeper with sufficient money to redeem you than under the authority of a covenant-breaker. But the poverty-stricken man had still fallen into poverty. He was still stricken. The best way to return him to full productivity was to train him in the ways of productivity. The necessary hierarchy of master and servant was not broken by this form of redemption. The poor man still had to learn the techniques of serving the consumer. He needed an intermediary to teach him these techniques: his more prosperous kinsman-redeemer.

6. David Daube, The New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism (1956), p. 272, cited in Donald A. Leggett, The Levirate and Goel Institutions in the Old Testament: With Special Attention to Ruth (Cherry Hill, New Jersey: Mack, 1974), p. 93.

When God redeems us, He does not turn us loose to do whatever we want; He becomes our new master. The standard antinomian refrain—"We're under grace, not law"—is incorrect. Men in history are always under both grace and law. The question is: Which kind of grace and which kind of law? Every society has laws and sanctions. Non-biblical laws and sanctions are an aspect of common grace; biblical laws and sanctions are an aspect of special grace.⁷ Without grace, there would be social chaos: hell's down payment ("earnest") in history. If there were no predictable covenantal sanctions in history for obedience and disobedience, there could be no social predictability. We would then live in moral and social chaos. The greater the chaos, the less social order.

Man's autonomy is never a valid theoretical option. God remains the original owner of us and our property. This fact receives confirmation every time someone dies. The old question—"How much did he leave behind?"—is always answered: "All of it." Men are inescapably stewards of God's property.⁸ The question is: Who should teach us the principles and practices of responsible stewardship? The jubilee law made this plain: the kinsman-redeemer, the Israelite family's agent of redemption and judgment. Only when the jubilee land laws ended with the establishment of a New Covenant did this system of family redemption and training end.

D. Walled Cities

The law of redemption applied inside the walled cities of Israel in a different way: the seller or his kinsman had only one year to redeem a home (dwelling place). Once this year had passed, the buyer became a permanent owner. "And if a man sell a dwelling house in a walled city, then he may redeem it within a whole year after it is sold; within a full year may he redeem it. And if it be not redeemed within the space of a full year, then the house that is in the walled city shall be established for ever to him that bought it throughout his generations: it shall not go out in the jubile" (Lev. 25:29–30). Notice: this law applied only to homes. It did not apply to other kinds of urban real estate. Only a residence was protected by the year of grace. Title to other real estate passed at the time of sale. Title to urban real estate was alienable: for sale to aliens.

7. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

8. Remove God from theology, and death points to another principle of ownership: the land owns man. The land stays; men depart. Man becomes a steward for the land, not of the land. This is the view of the radical ecological activist groups.

1. The Right of Redemption

Outside the boundary of the wall, the Israelite's right of redemption was universal, bounded by a 50-year limit. "But the houses of the villages which have no wall round about them shall be counted as the fields of the country: they may be redeemed, and they shall go out in the jubile" (v. 31).

Was it legal for subsequent generations to build walls around unwalled cities? Yes. Would this new wall have changed the legal status of the heirs of the original families? No. An unwalled city of Joshua's day, with the exception of the cities of the Levites, came under the jubilee's rural land law. The inheritance left by the original generation could never be alienated by contract.⁹ The inheritance could only be alienated by God, through corporate covenantal execution. So, a wall could be built for the sake of military defense, but this would not have changed the legal status of the heirs of the original families. No alteration of the inheritance of the original families was allowed; the defensive wall was not a judicial wall.

Citizenship could not be revoked for any reason other than excommunication. This means that the priests, through their delegated authority to the Levites, could alone revoke citizenship. This is the mark of a biblical civil order. The civil order does not autonomously establish or enforce the criteria of citizenship. Citizenship is creedal, and the church enforces the content of the creed. A biblical civil order cannot become autonomous; biblical political theory reflects this fact.

Any Israelite family would have had the right to participate in the distribution of rural land. This would have been that family's permanent inheritance. Who would have chosen to live in a walled city in the era of the conquest? Urban residents would then have been made up of the following: (1) land-owning Israelites who became absentee landlords; (2) permanent resident aliens who had been adopted into the tribe of a city; (3) permanent resident aliens who had not been adopted by an Israelite family or tribe; (4) traders who would reside there relatively briefly; (5) Levites who were not residents of a Levitical city; (6) soldiers or other officials from the central government; (7) Israelites who had been excommunicated (i.e., circumcised strangers: nok-ree); (8) convicted Israelite criminals who had been sold into servitude to someone in a walled city.¹⁰

9. Rabbinical opinion was that only the walled cities in the era of Joshua's conquest were exempted from the jubilee rural land law. Arakhin 9:6; The Mishnah, trans. Herbert Danby (New York: Oxford University Press, [1933] 1987), p. 553.

2. One Year's Grace

The period of redemption was limited to one year. Why? Again, nothing explicit is said about this. We have to deduce reasons from our knowledge of the Bible and our knowledge of men's motivations.

The idea of a period of grace applied only to the seller of the house. The seller's interests were defended by this law. The buyer remained uncertain for a year. He did not know if he could remain in his new house; it could be redeemed at any time. Perhaps he left his previous house empty, forfeiting rental income. Perhaps he subleased it to someone for a year. If the buyer of the new house was evicted before the sublease on his original residence had expired, he had to find temporary living quarters under difficult circumstances: rapid eviction. Such a threat of eviction would have raised the price of a move in pre-exilic Mosaic Israel. The more numerous the buyer's possessions, the more expensive the move. In the words of a modern proverb: "Two moves equal one fire." Each transfer of ownership of a house in a walled city would have tended to go to a richer person than the one who was selling it. Why? Because wealthy people could more easily have borne the risks of eviction. The existing owner probably had a greater "need to sell" than the buyer had a "need to buy."¹¹

Why would anyone have sold? A business setback is one obvious

10. The Bible does not say whether convicted criminals were part of the jubilee land law's primary benefit: a judicial return to the family's land, i.e., liberation from bondage. This would have meant freedom for all criminals in the jubilee year. This, in turn, would have created a subsidy to crime as the jubilee year approached: a conviction would not have led to a high price for his sale into bondage, since the time of potential servitude was steadily shrinking. The victims would have been short-changed. Because God defends the victim, it seems safe to conclude that there were two exceptions to the jubilee law of liberation: the apostate who had forfeited his inheritance and the criminal who was still under the requirement to pay off his victims or the person who bought him, with the purchase price going to the victims. This conclusion follows from two general principles of biblical law: (1) God does not subsidize evil; (2) victim's rights. If this is correct, then the criminal who was released from bondage would have had to wait until the next jubilee year to reclaim his land.

11. The concept of need, beyond mere physical survival, should never be discussed apart from the question of price.

reason, especially if the business involved debt. The Bible teaches that the debtor is servant to the lender: “The rich ruleth over the poor, and the borrower is servant to the lender” (Prov. 22:7). The Bible discourages servitude, which is why the jubilee law existed: God’s redemption of His servants as their kinsman-redeemer—the owner of all the land—by mandating their right to return to their ancestral plots.

In walled cities, however, this redemption process did not exist, except for the one-year grace period. In the case of loans collateralized by homes, there were greater incentives to lend in walled cities than in rural areas, and greater risks for borrowing. A person who took a loan secured by the collateral of his rural inheritance knew that the closer the year of jubilee came, the less money he could expect to borrow against his collateral. The lender would lose whatever net income the land might produce in the year beyond the jubilee. He would be allowed to keep all of the triple crop in the sixth year, but in the seventh he could not farm it. In the eighth year, he lost it. In contrast, an urban dweller knew that if he went bankrupt, he would have only one year to raise enough cash to redeem his house. After that, it was lost forever unless he could persuade the buyer to sell it back—unlikely at the price he had been paid: the value of the loan. Thus, his risk was comparatively much greater that he would lose his urban inheritance than his rural.

In walled cities, the Israelites would experience the continual temptations of debt: rich resident aliens enthusiastic to lend money, hoping that the debtor would default. This would be a comparatively easy way to buy up property in urban Israel. If the loan was repaid, the lender received his normal urban rate of return.¹² If the loan was not repaid, he received a revocable lease on the house plus the possibility of permanent possession one year after the original owner transferred title. This would have been the preferred way for wealthy aliens to give their heirs a permanent stake in Israelite society.

Any Israelite who borrowed significant sums on these terms would have been either a “high roller”—a person willing to bear a lot of risk—or a very present-oriented consumer, like the prodigal son in Jesus’ parable. A very confident entrepreneur might think he had a unique opportunity, probably connected to an invention or trade. He might be willing to risk his inheritance for the capital to develop it. But a less risk-oriented person would have preferred invested capital—selling a share of ownership—to debt financing.

12. The rate of interest in walled cities would have tended to be lower than elsewhere in Israel: better collateral, with more rich people seeking to lend money.

This limit of one year on the right to redeem an urban house would have channeled urban investment into higher-risk debt ventures or moderate-risk joint ventures. A resident alien (or anyone else) who was looking for a permanent home to buy in Israel would have sought out (advertised for) Israelites who were willing to accept debt financing for high-risk projects that other investors had already shunned. The lender's offer would have amounted to this: "Win, and I win with you; lose, and you're out in the cold. I won't be."

The text does not speak of a deferred payment, i.e., a mortgage beyond one year. The right of redemption was one year. There is no indication that this meant anything except one year from the time that the transfer of ownership took place. Ownership is a judicial concept: the identification of the legally responsible agent. The owner has the right to disown the property.

Could there have been home mortgages under such a legal system? Yes, but the original owner had only one year to reclaim his property unless the buyer subsequently defaulted on his payments. He would have had to repay to the new buyer whatever the new buyer had paid him during the interim. The purchaser had to forfeit the use of the item or money that he used to buy the house. This is what the seller owed him if the former wanted to reclaim the house.

3. A Stake in Society

No explicit reason is provided in the Bible to explain this judicial difference: wall vs. no wall. The judicial boundary established by the city's wall provided an exemption from the jubilee land law after 12 months.¹³ Inheritance there was based on secondary purchase rather than original conquest. It was based on economics rather than ecclesiastical confession. This made possible a place for resident aliens or post-conquest converts to the faith to gain what is sometimes called a stake in society. A stake is a marker that establishes the edge of a boundary in land, but it is used here more broadly: a permanent residence or a permanent possession of value that is tied to a specific place. A stake in society is therefore a legal claim, something that at some price is worth defending, either in a court or on a battlefield.

Would resident aliens have been required to fight to defend the 13. Though not interest-free: see above. There is no escape from the phenomenon of interest: a discount of future goods as against those same goods in the present.

city? Not unless they were citizens. They did not possess membership in an Israelite family. The military numbering process would not have touched them (Ex. 30). Presumably they could volunteer, but only if they professed the required national confession of faith, the shamaw Israel: “Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God is one LORD” (Deut. 6: 4). There were many instances of foreign soldiers in Israel’s holy army, Uriah the Hittite being the most famous. Citizenship was probably a reward granted to circumcised resident aliens who volunteered for military service. If you could be legally numbered, you were a citizen; conversely, if you could not legally be numbered, you were not a citizen.¹⁴

Was confession, circumcision, and eligibility for service in the Lord’s army sufficient to establish an inheritable claim of citizenship? Yes. Was this citizenship inalienable? Yes. Citizenship was covenantal. Covenantal inheritance was by confession, circumcision, and eligibility to bring sanctions: as a holy warrior and therefore as a judge.¹⁵ Once a citizen of Israel, a person could not become a permanent bondservant under Mosaic law.

4. Post-Exilic Israel

This raises an extremely important point: the alteration of land ownership after the exile. Ezekiel prophesied that after Israel’s return from exile, strangers in the land would participate in a second division of the land by lot. These strangers would gain permanent possession in the land. Strangers who resided within the jurisdiction of a particular tribe at the time of the reclaiming of the land by that tribe would become part of a new land allocation (Ezek. 47:21–23). They could not be disinherited. But if that was true, then they could not be enslaved.

There is no indication that the jubilee’s heathen-slave law was annulled after the exile. Jesus announced His ministry in terms of jubilee liberation (Luke 4:18–21).¹⁶ This assertion rested on the continuing authority of the jubilee slave law. That aspect of the jubilee was related to family inheritance, not the original distribution of land under Joshua.

14. Chapter 29:H.

15. Deborah, a prophetess, also served as a judge (Jud. 4:4). She served functionally as a holy warrior: senior in command (Jud. 4:8). As the sanctions-bringer against Sisera, Jael also served as a holy warrior (v. 22). Neither was circumcised, but both were under legal authority of circumcised males: husbands.

16. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

But a new land allocation would free participating heathen families from any threat of inter-generational bondage. Those who resided in the land at the time of the return could not lawfully be enslaved.

This was the source of the lawful continuing presence of Sam-arit-ans in the land. These foreigners had been brought into the Northern Kingdom by the Assyrians to replace the captive Israelites. The returning Israelites were not authorized to kill or exile these people. There would never again be a lawful program of genocide to establish original title in Israel. Rather, the resident alien at the return would receive an inheritable grant of rural land. The worship of Canaanite gods and religion never reappeared. The gods of Canaan had been gods of the land, meaning gods of the city-state. Those gods were no longer relevant in a nation under the authority of Medo-Persia, then Hellenism, and finally Rome. In contrast, Persian dualism, Hellenism, and Talmudism were not bound by geography. These became the main threats to biblical orthodoxy.

The returning Israelites took centuries to reconquer the land. The reconquest was never completed, nor was Mosaic civil authority ever re-established. The tribes did not re-establish their original borders, nor were they ever again free from foreign civil rule. But the Jews did come close to re-establishing their pre-exilic political power and national boundaries in the decades prior to Rome's invasion, which led non-Jewish inhabitants of Palestine to welcome the Romans.¹⁷ Because the physical boundaries of the Promised Land had been breached during the exile, never to be healed, and because the pre-exilic judicial boundaries were never again established, the original land distribution of the era of the conquest lost its judicial relevance. Israelite citizenship therefore lost most of its judicial relevance except during periods of civil revolt. Confession, circumcision, and adoption remained the basis of this much-reduced citizenship. God's holy army had ceased to exist.

5. Urban Citizenship

Ammonites and Moabites could become members of the congregation after 10 generations (Deut. 23:3). This was citizenship, for the same 10-generation limit applied also to Israelite bastards (Deut. 23:

17. The one city that refused to submit to the Jews was Pella. W. H. C. Frend, The Rise of Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984), p. 19. It was to Pella, located beyond the Jordan, that the Jerusalem church supposedly fled just before the siege of the city by Rome in A.D. 69. Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, III:V.

2). The question is: Where would these new citizens have exercised their judicial powers? I think it must have been inside walled cities. The cities were tribal affairs. They had been parcelled out to the tribes under Joshua (Josh. 13:23–32; 15). Citizenship in a city must have been tribal. But judges in cities probably resided in those cities. Local urban residents possessed knowledge of local affairs.

The question is: Was real estate ownership required to be an urban citizen? Did an urban resident lose his citizenship if he lost ownership of his home? That could happen in one year. Was the threat of disenfranchisement hanging over the head of every urban real estate owner who did not have an inheritance in rural Israel? The Bible does not say. Any answer is speculative. But since lawful participation in holy warfare seems to be the best way to define the mark of citizenship, my conclusion is that aliens could become eligible for citizenship as adopted members of the tribes governing walled cities. Citizenship did not require the ownership of a home in a walled city. Urban citizenship was by confession, circumcision, and eligibility for holy war. It was not based on landed inheritance.

For an alien to become a citizen in Israel meant that he became a free man. Israelites were not allowed to own Israelite slaves as inheritable property (Lev. 25:46b). By becoming a citizen, the alien permanently established his legal claim as an Israelite.

This raises the question of access to citizenship. Deuteronomy 23 is the main section dealing with this. The context is that of an outsider wanting in. Deuteronomy 23:1 lists the eunuch. I think this refers to a foreign eunuch, not an Israelite.¹⁸ If an Israelite warrior, for example, received such an injury, was he expelled from the congregation? Did he cease to be an Israelite? Did he become a heathen subject to permanent bondage? This does not seem reasonable. The passage refers to outsiders wanting in, including bastards, i.e., outsiders to the covenantal family. The context is not of an insider who is being forced out. In any case, adoption into an Israelite family could always overcome this restriction.¹⁹ Caleb, the son of a Kenizite (Num. 32: 12), was surely a citizen. He must have been adopted into the tribe of Judah (Num. 13:6), the tribe of Jacob's messianic promise (Gen. 49: 10).²⁰

18. Rushdoony argues that it was an Israelite who became a eunuch. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 84.

19. The adoption of the Ethiopian eunuch—a foreigner—into the New Covenant church (Acts 8:26–40) is indicative of the law of adoption.

20. He may not have been adopted into a family. This took place prior to the conquest of Canaan, so the issue of family adoption and landed inheritance was not yet Circumcised resident aliens were not citizens unless they were eligible to serve in God's holy army: adoption into the tribe under whose authority they fought. They did not otherwise possess the legal right to impose judicial sanctions as judges in Israel. Only citizens possessed this right. In other words, resident aliens could never become citizens except by adoption: the implicit or explicit acceptance of military service. Urban adoption was tribal, not familistic.

Uriah was called a Hittite. This may have meant that he was not a third-generation circumcised resident, and therefore not normally eligible for citizenship. But he was a warrior in God's holy army. This indicates that the resident alien could become a citizen through military service in the defense of Israel during wartime, even if he was not a third or tenth generation circumcised resident. If a circumcised alien was willing to risk dying for God in defense of Israel's boundaries, and if his offer to serve was accepted by the military, this made him a citizen: a man with the right to the office of judge—a sanctions-bringer.

6. The Sociology of Home Ownership

Poor people rent; rich people own; middle-class people pay off mortgages. Economic freedom produces incentives for owners to build housing for poorer people to rent. Poor people rent new quarters when they grow richer. People move to better quarters when they grow richer. Only the richest sons of the richest families stay put, decade after decade. They move from their palatial summer homes to their palatial winter homes. They are mobile; ownership is not. Permanent landed estates are an important mark of "old money." The dispersal of landed estates in Europe in the twentieth century through the drastic taxation of large inheritances was an aspect of class warfare: the middle classes, in the name of the poorer classes, voted away the wealth of the landed classes, whose heirs could no longer afford to inherit.

In walled cities, the kinds of people who would have wound up as owners of urban housing would have been the same kinds of people who own urban property today. Richer people would have been dominant home owners. That is, those who were the most productive people in the economy would have been most likely to buy a home and retain a stake in society. This property right, irrespective of a family's creed or ritual, to buy and inherit housing in Mosaic Israel's walled cities was an important way for Israel to attract and keep very productive people from abroad. It would have made Israel's walled cities centers of entrepreneurship and trade. Innovative, creative businessmen from the Mediterranean region would have immigrated.

Turnover of ownership would initially have been much more rapid in walled cities than in rural settings or in unwalled cities. Nineteenth-century American capitalism's story of "poor man to rich man to poor man" in three generations would have been much more common in Israel's walled cities than outside them, at least until population growth shrank the size of the average farm.²¹

The walled cities of the Canaanite era became the walled cities of Israel. Which cities would have been the walled cities of Canaan? First, cities that housed cultures with military aspirations: city-state empires. Second, cities with wealth to protect from invasion: trade centers. Third, cities with unique religious icons or practices that served the needs of a particular region: religious centers. Walled cities would have tended to be cities on the crossroads of trade. Their architecture, water systems, and similar "infrastructure" would have been suited to trading centers. Thus, their character as crossroad cities would not have been radically altered by Israelite civilization. This means that walled cities would have become cosmopolitan: world (cosmos) cities (polis = city). This raises the question of citizenship. It also raises the question of pluralism.

7. Pluralism: Cultural, Not Judicial

The walled city would have been the preferred place of residence for wealthy aliens and wealthy covenant converts who were not heirs of the generation of the conquest. These cities would have been the centers of cosmopolitan life, where ideas and customs from outside the land would have intermingled. This means that the ideas and customs of a particular foreign god would always have had competition from people who had faith in other gods. This would have created a true cultural pluralism within the legal framework of a biblically covenanted community. The walled cities would have been testing areas—social laboratories—for many ideas and practices, but always within the judicial boundary of God's law.

These testing areas were sealed off judicially from the land outside their walls. This seal was not absolute. Resident aliens could lease agricultural property outside the walls, but they had no assurance of being able to renew these leases, nor could they pass on legal access to rural land to heirs. The jubilee was designed to cut short any attempt by foreigners to colonize the land of Israel. Even urban colonization would have been restricted to ideas and customs that were not in violation of the laws of God. Urban aliens were not citizens. They could not serve as judges.

21. Tocqueville commented on the United States in the 1830s: "But wealth circulates there with incredible rapidity, and experience shows that two successive generations seldom enjoy its favors." Alexis de Tocqueville, Democracy in America, ed. J. P. Mayer (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, [1835] 1966), I:3, p. 54.

Not being citizens, resident aliens could not impose judicial sanctions in Mosaic Israel. They could not lawfully seek converts to their imported religions. Only the non-confessional expressions of these imported religious worldviews were legal in the public square. This is why cultural pluralism is not the same as judicial pluralism. Cultural pluralism within a holy commonwealth is stripped of theological confession and judicial sanctions.

The modern humanist world has made politics formally as pluralistic as culture is. This has created a situation in which politics has become polytheistic.²² Beginning at the outbreak of World War I in 1914, Western nations have imposed immigration barriers in order to keep out foreigners, for fear of losing both culture and politics to hordes of aliens. The expansion of the welfare state has made such restrictions even more important: keeping aliens away from the public treasuries. But “alien” is not defined covenantally; it is defined culturally. National boundaries become walls barring too great a disruption of the established culture, however pluralistic it may already be. Barbed wire has replaced theological confession as the preferred means of discouraging immigrants.

In Mosaic Israel, foreign culture was bounded by urban walls, physiological walls (circumcision), and confessional walls. When the Mosaic law was enforced, immigrants from foreign cultures (plural) could not become threats to Israel. God’s word alone had judicial authority, so imported cultures had to conform to the covenant. The ethical and judicial terms of the covenant became filtering devices for sifting through the wheat and the chaff in every cultural import. There was no need for immigration barriers. There is no evidence that such barriers ever existed. Mosaic law does not authorize them, precisely because it does not authorize political pluralism.

Lest we forget: the ultimate immigration barrier is abortion.

22. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), Part 3. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

E. The Levites' Cities

There was one additional aspect of the jubilee land law: Levitical cities. There were 48 of these cities, six of which were cities of refuge (Num. 35:6–7). “Notwithstanding the cities of the Levites, and the houses of the cities of their possession, may the Levites redeem at any time. And if a man purchase of the Levites, then the house that was sold, and the city of his possession, shall go out in the year of jubile: for the houses of the cities of the Levites are their possession among the children of Israel. But the field of the suburbs of their cities may not be sold; for it is their perpetual possession” (Lev. 25:32–34).

The Levites were therefore likely to be urban dwellers at any point in Israel's history. They could not become owners of rural land, which was the inheritance of other tribes.²³ Their presence in a region would have been concentrated in a local tribal city. At the same time, they were dispersed as a tribe throughout the land, just as their cities were. This kept all of the tribes in close proximity to specialists in covenantal law and ritual. This also kept the nation free from priestly attempts to centralize rural land ownership, except in periods in which the jubilee inheritance laws were not enforced. Even in such rebellious periods, there was always the possibility that some subsequent generation would enforce the law. Anti-jubilee legal title was always at risk.

The Levites would have been urban residents. They advised rural people, but they lived primarily in cities. Their “home base” was urban. This fact should tell the commentators something, but none of them ever mentions it. Israel's legal structure was designed to produce an urban society. Covenant-keeping would bring rapid population growth. In a growing economy, wealth is increasingly based on intellectual labor and creativity, not on raw materials.²⁴ As agriculture becomes more efficient, fewer people need to work the land, or can afford to. Thus, the structure of jubilee ownership led the Levites to live in cities, which is where a growing percentage of the population of covenant-keeping Israel was expected by God to dwell as time went on—and outside the Promised Land, also in cities. The Levites would become the major urban real estate owners except in non-Levite walled cities. Most people would have to rent or lease housing from them.

23. Priests occasionally could. See chapter 37.

24. Julian Simon, The Ultimate Resource (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1981); Warren T. Brookes, The Economy in Mind (New York: Universe, 1982); E. Calvin Beisner, Prospects for Growth: A Biblical View of Population, Resources, and the Future (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, 1990).

Let us not mistake what this would have meant: the accumulation of urban wealth by one tribe. Urban wealth would increasingly have become the dominant form of wealth in a growing economy, as it is today. Unless Israel conquered new lands, Israelites had only four places to go if they wanted to escape rural life: the original walled cities, unwallled cities, Levitical cities, and other nations. They could not permanently own homes in unwallled cities: a disadvantage. In the original walled cities, the influence of the Levites as advisors would have been strong. In Levitical cities, they would have been the predominant home owners, renting space to poorer residents. Thus, the structure of land ownership favored the Levites above all other tribes in times of righteousness. They were the most mobile tribe, the most urban tribe, and the most educated tribe. They had the greatest number of personal contacts across the nation. They would steadily have become the dominant tribe and the wealthiest tribe in a covenantally faithful society.

Why did God subsidize the Levites in this way? One economic reason was the fact that the Levites had an incentive to make sure that the jubilee laws were enforced. They had the authority to excommunicate civil rulers who refused to enforce God's civil law. Levitical families would receive back their homes in the same year that the other tribes' families received back their lands. But did they do this? It seems more likely that they refused to pressure civil magistrates to enforce the jubilee. If they did refuse, there would have been a class of homeless Levites who had to rent housing in their own cities. This would have led to class division within the priestly tribe. If the civil authorities enforced the jubilee only in Levitical cities, there would have been widespread resentment among the other tribes.

Conclusion

This law had to be temporary. The tribal structure was not designed to be permanent; its purpose would end after Shiloh (the Messiah) had come: a member of the tribe of Judah (Gen. 49:10). When the redeemer came, the right of redemption would end. The ideal of the city of God would then replace the ideal of the land of God.

The structure of land ownership under the jubilee system was clearly a wineskin destined to be broken, either through God's blessing—urbanization and/or the conquest of new lands—or God's cursing: conquest by other lands and dispersion. The inheritance of Joshua's day would fade into insignificance: (1) through urbanization; (2) through the extension of the boundaries of Israel outward, beyond the original land grant and the jubilee law; or (3) through emigration, either voluntary or forced. In any case, the importance of the right of redemption would fade.

The right of redemption meant different things to different people in ancient Israel. For the rural land owner, it meant that he could collateralize a business loan or lease his property without the risk of disinheriting his children. An urban home could become the property of the lender if the borrower defaulted. It could become part of the lender's permanent legacy to his children. Also, an urban house was located in a commercial center. The benefits of lending to the urban real estate owner were greater than lending to a rural family with the land as collateral. This meant that a rent-seeking lender might not lend him so much, or at so low an interest rate, as he would lend the home-owning resident of a walled city.

The resident of a walled city lived in an economically active trading center that was cosmopolitan. Resident aliens could buy permanent ownership of homes in such cities. They could even become citizens. The influence of resident aliens in Israel was concentrated here, for only here could they buy homes and pass them to their children. The buying and selling of homes would have concentrated home ownership into the hands of rich families irrespective of their religion. There would have been considerable turnover in ownership, with successful merchants buying or foreclosing on the homes of the less successful. It would have been difficult for any family residing in a walled city to retain ownership of a home through several generations. In other words, home ownership in a walled city in Israel was far more like the modern world than home ownership was elsewhere in Israel. As we have seen, a growing Israelite population would have pushed the population out of rural Israel and into walled cities or outside the nation.

For the Levite, the jubilee redemption law was limited to Levitical cities. This would have tended to tie Levitical families to certain cities. A Levite could also buy a permanent home in a walled city, although he had no competitive advantage over any other buyer. He had no inheritance in the land outside the cities. This structure of inheritance would have made the Levite primarily an urban figure. If the economy and the population grew, the Levites would become the principal Jewish home owners in Israel. But since God's law is not designed to favor one family over another, long-term, we can safely conclude that the jubilee inheritance laws were not designed to be permanent. They would end when the Kinsman-Redeemer finished His work. As it turned out, it was in His office of Blood-Avenger that He ended the jubilee laws: in A.D. 70.

POVERTY AND USURY

And if thy brother be waxen poor, and fallen in decay with thee; then thou shalt relieve him: yea, though he be a stranger, or a sojourner; that he may live with thee. Take thou no usury of him, or increase: but fear thy God; that thy brother may live with thee. Thou shalt not give him thy money upon usury, nor lend him thy victuals for increase. I am the LORD your God, which brought you forth out of the land of Egypt, to give you the land of Canaan, and to be your God (Lev. 25:35–38).

The theocentric basis of this law was God’s role as the liberator. Men are to fear God. This fear of God should overcome men’s fear of nature and history. Fear of God is liberating; fear of the creation is paralyzing. Liberation is an aspect of point two of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. Usury Defined

This law is an extension of Exodus 22:25: “If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as an usurer, neither shalt thou lay upon him usury.”² The Hebrew word translated here as usury means bite. “And the LORD sent fiery serpents among the people, and they bit the people; and much people of Israel died” (Num. 21:6). In both Exodus and Leviticus, the borrower is described as being a poor brother in the faith, i.e., under God’s covenant. The heart of the matter in Leviticus 25:35–38 and Exodus 22:25 is the establishment of judicial conditions for charitable, interest-free loans: poverty, covenantal brotherhood, and geographical proximity. As we shall see, these conditions had to be legally identifiable in order for the prohibition against usury to be enforced by a civil court. It was this aspect of conditionality that medieval theologians failed to recognize when they issued prohibitions against taking interest in all loans. The biblical texts are clear; it is the theologians who have been muddled.³

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 49.

What is usury? Both texts are quite clear about the definition: usury is any positive rate of return taken from a loan. There is no universal prohibition in the Bible against interest. This is clear from the text in Deuteronomy that authorizes covenant-keepers to make interest-bearing charitable loans to covenantal strangers. "Thou shalt not lend upon usury to thy brother; usury of money, usury of victuals, usury of any thing that is lent upon usury: Unto a stranger thou mayest lend upon usury; but unto thy brother thou shalt not lend upon usury: that the LORD thy God may bless thee in all that thou settest thine hand to in the land whither thou goest to possess it" (Deut. 23: 19–20). In fact, God encourages His people to lend to those outside the faith; it is a means of subduing them. "For the LORD thy God blesseth thee, as he promised thee: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow; and thou shalt reign over many nations, but they shall not reign over thee" (Deut. 15:6).⁴ Lending at interest is an aspect of the dominion covenant. Biblically, there is no universal prohibition against this.

Medieval Christian expositors concluded, following Aristotle rather than Moses, that interest is always prohibited.⁵ It is not. What was prohibited under Mosaic law was interest taken from a poor

3. The non-theologians have been even more muddled. See, for example, S. C. Mooney, Usury: Destroyer of Nations (Warsaw, Ohio: Theopolis, 1988). (<http://bit.ly/MooneyUsury>). For my response, see North, Authority and Dominion, Appendix J: "Lots of Free Time: The Existentialist Utopia of S. C. Mooney."

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 70.

5. The prohibition against interest (usury) began with the Council of Nicea (325): clerics were prohibited from making interest-bearing loans. J. Gilchrist, The Church and Economic Activity in the Middle Ages (New York: St. Martin's, 1969), p. 155. This prohibition was gradually extended by the theologians after 800. Ibid., p. 63. The Second Lateran Council (1139) was especially hostile, going so far as to prohibit usurers from being granted Christian burial. Ibid., p. 165. The Council at Vienna (1311–12) mandated the excommunication of civil rulers who permitted usury within their jurisdictions. Ibid., p. 206. Gilchrist's excellent book did not receive the audience that it should have. It includes translations of the texts of the general councils. This makes it invaluable.

brother in the faith or a poor resident alien who had subordinated himself to the civil covenant, presumably by submitting to circumcision. The lender, then as now, was not to take advantage of certain poor people: those who had submitted themselves to the terms of the covenant. He was required by God to make a charitable loan. He would thereby forfeit the interest he might have earned from a business loan. Forfeited interest was the charitable component of his act. If interest were universally prohibited, then all legal loans would be charitable. There would then be no economic distinction between charity loans and business loans, or between dominion by restoring the covenant-keeping poor and dominion by subordinating the covenant-breaking poor. The Bible teaches otherwise.

B. Charity: Conditional vs. Unconditional

Charitable loans are part of God's program to provide help to honest, covenant-keeping people who have fallen on hard times. These loans are not supposed to subsidize sloth or evil. God does not want us to subsidize evil with the money or assets that He has provided for us.⁶ In this sense, *biblical charity is necessarily morally conditional.*⁷ Biblical charity is never a judicially automatic "entitlement," to use the terminology of the modern welfare state: a compulsory redistribution of wealth from the successful to the unsuccessful (minus approximately 50% for "handling" by government bureaucrats⁸). It is this element of covenantal conditionality which distinguishes biblical charity from humanist compulsion.⁹

The modern welfare state does not distinguish judicially between faith and unbelief, or between righteousness and moral rebellion, as primary factors underlying both wealth and poverty. The Bible's ethics-based correlation is an implicit denial of the very foundation of hu-

6. R. J. Rushdoony, "Subsidizing Evil," in Rushdoony, Bread Upon the Waters (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1969), ch. 3.

7. Ray R. Sutton, "Whose Conditions for Charity?" in Theonomy: An Informed Response, ed. Gary North (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991), ch. 9. (<http://bit.ly/gnthelon>) Sutton was responding to Timothy J. Keller, "Theonomy and the Poor: Some Reflections," in Theonomy: A Reformed Critique, eds. William S. Barker and W. Robert Godfrey (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan Academic, 1990), ch. 12.

8. James L. Payne, The Culture of Spending: Why Congress Lives Beyond Our Means (San Francisco: ICS Press, 1991), p. 51.

9. Marvin Olasky, The Tragedy of American Compassion (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, 1992).

manism's welfare state. The welfare state rests on two rival theories of the origin of wealth and poverty, held together dialectically in most humanist explanations of economic inequality: (1) the chance distribution of economic assets and personal skills; (2) the exploitation of the poor by the economically and politically successful. The state is seen as the most powerful agency that possesses a moral and legal obligation to offset the effects of either chance or exploitation. The welfare state therefore in theory looks only at the numbers, not at the moral condition of the recipients of state money: their reported income in relation to statute law. Being bureaucratic, the West's welfare state must by law ignore moral criteria and respond strictly in terms of formal criteria: so much income; so many children in the household under age 18, irrespective of the mother's marital status; and so forth. The welfare state is to biblical charity what fornication is to biblical marriage. It literally subsidizes fornication by subsidizing the bastards who are produced by fornication, thereby swelling the ranks of the government-dependent children of the morally corrupt.¹⁰ This creates lifetime employment for the next generation of welfare state bureaucrats—the unstated but inevitable goal of the welfare state. Yet so powerful is humanism today in the thinking of academically trained Christians that they have become open defenders of the legitimacy of the modern welfare state's system of compulsory wealth redistribution, despite the fact that it rests on a theory of unconditional legal entitlement.¹¹

C. Reducing Our Fear of the Unknown

Biblical charity is essential for building God's kingdom on earth, for it reduces our fear of the unknown. We are not to live in fear of the unknown. We are to live in the fear of God, which is the beginning of wisdom (Prov. 1:7; 9:10). Intense fear of any aspect of the creation tends to paralyze men, to keep them in bondage to the creation. Fear and paralysis are what the biblical covenant was designed to overcome.

10. Charles Murray, "The Coming White Underclass," Wall Street Journal (Oct. 29, 1993), editorial page.

11. Ronald J. Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger: A Biblical View (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1977). For a line-by-line refutation of Sider, including his revised second edition (1984), see David Chilton, Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators, 3rd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1985] 1990). (<http://bit.ly/dcsider>) Sider did not reply to Chilton in either his second or third edition (Waco, Texas: Word, 1990). The fourth edition (1997) recanted much of what the first three editions had proclaimed in the name of biblical ethics. North, Inheritance and Dominion, Appendix F.

Perfect love casts out fear (I John 4:18).

Bad things can and do happen to good people from time to time, while good things happen to the unrighteous (Ps. 73). The world sometimes appears to be governed by a system of perverse historical sanctions. Schlossberg is correct: "The Bible can be interpreted as a string of God's triumphs disguised as disasters."¹² Covenant-keepers are not immune from the corporate curse that God has placed on the creation. We are also not immune to the corporate curses He places on the covenant-breaking society in which we live. So, as a way to reduce our fear of the unknown, God commands us to be generous to others in the faith during their time of need.

Biblical charity is a form of social insurance—not state insurance, but social insurance: provided through voluntarism without any threat of civil sanctions. Biblical charity begins with those who labor in the work of building God's kingdom on earth, who in turn voluntarily support other covenantally faithful people who share in this work. Biblical charity is therefore part of God's system of corporate covenant sanctions—in this case, positive sanctions, beginning with covenant-keepers and extending to covenant-breakers only after those inside the household of faith have been assisted.

Charity creates dependence. This dependence is to be temporary except in cases of permanent physical or mental helplessness. The biblical goal is dominion by covenant, not by permanent dependence. This is why state charity is so dangerous to biblical dominion and therefore to liberty. It creates a permanent political base of dependents and also a permanent corps of state-funded welfare agents whose income depends on the maintenance of poverty to relieve. For this corps of welfare agents, poverty is where the money is.¹³ The positive sanction of charity is not to be provided by the state, which must impose compulsory negative sanctions (taxes) on some people in order to extend positive sanctions (welfare) to others. The state is to promote the general welfare only by punishing criminals and defending the nation from invasion. A biblical positive sanction—the general welfare—is the social result of the state's exclusively negative sanctions.

The state is required by God to defend the legal boundaries that establish private property, not invade these boundaries in an illegitimate messianic quest to bring positive sanctions to the poor. The civil magistrate is figuratively to stand inside the boundaries beside of the property owner to defend him against any threat of invasion by a non-owner. He is not to stand outside the boundaries by the side of the non-owner, threatening to invade. Defenders of the welfare state reject this view of the civil magistrate. Because so many of these defenders are orthodox theologians and church leaders, Christian social theory today is either non-existent (baptized humanism) or undermined by humanism.

12. Herbert Schlossberg, Idols for Destruction: Christian Faith and Its Confrontation with American Society (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, [1983] 1993), p. 304.

13. Shirley Scheibla, Poverty Is Where the Money Is (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1968).

D. The Stranger and the Sojourner

This text says that we are to relieve the stranger and the sojourner. The text in Deuteronomy 23:20 says that we may lawfully charge strangers interest. How can this apparent contradiction be resolved? Answer: by going to the Hebrew text. At this point, I reprint a portion of a chapter, "The Prohibition Against Usury," which appears in my commentary on the case laws of Exodus, Part 3 of Authority and Dominion chapter 49, Section C.

* * * * *

The text in Leviticus 25, the chapter on the jubilee year, is clear: "And if thy brother be waxen poor, and fallen in decay with thee; then thou shalt relieve him: yea, though he be a stranger [geyr], or a sojourner [to-shawb]; that he may live with thee. Take thou no usury of him, or increase: but fear thy God; that thy brother may live with thee. Thou shalt not give him thy money upon usury, nor lend him thy victuals for increase" (Lev. 25:35–37). It begins with the determining clause: "If thy brother be waxen poor."

The interpretation of the Leviticus 25 passage initially seems difficult because of the King James translation of Deuteronomy 23:20: "Unto a stranger [nok-ree] thou mayest lend upon usury; but unto thy brother thou shalt not lend upon usury: that the LORD thy God may bless thee in all that thou settest thine hand to in the land whither thou goest to possess it." We must begin with the presupposition that God's revealed law is not inconsistent. But here we have what appear to be two rules regarding the stranger: you may not lawfully charge the stranger interest, yet you may lawfully charge him interest. How can we reconcile these two statements?

The answer is that the Hebrew word used in Leviticus 25:35, transliterated geyr [gare], is not the same as the Hebrew word in Deuteronomy 23:20. Similarly, “sojourner” [to-shawb] is related to yaw-shab,¹⁴ meaning “sit,” and implying “remain,” “settle,” “dwell,” or even “marry.”¹⁵ To-shawb therefore means resident alien. The stranger [nok-ree] referred to in Deuteronomy 23:20 was simply a foreigner.¹⁶ Two different kinds of “stranger” are referred to in the two verses. Thus, if the resident alien was poor, and if he was willing to live in Israel under the terms of the civil covenant, then he was entitled to a special degree of civil legal protection. What was this legal protection? If he fell into poverty, he was not to be asked to pay interest on any loan that a richer man extended to him. With respect to usury, he was to be treated as a poverty-stricken Hebrew. Not so the foreigner.

What must be understood is that the economic setting is clearly the relief of the righteous poor. The recipient was any poor person who had fallen into poverty through no ethical fault of his own, and who was willing to remain under God’s civil hierarchy.

There is a parallel passage in Deuteronomy 15. Deuteronomy 15 lists the economic laws governing Israel’s national sabbatical year. In this national year of release, the text literally says, all debts to neighbors are to be forgiven: “At the end of every seven years thou shalt make a release. And this is the manner of the release: Every creditor that lendeth ought unto his neighbour shall release it; he shall not exact it of his neighbour, or of his brother; because it is called the LORD’S release” (Deut. 15:1–2).¹⁷ The text is clear: the neighborly loan is the focus of the law.

At least one kind of loan was explicitly exempted by the text: loans to non-resident foreigners. “Of a foreigner [nok-ree] thou mayest exact it again: but that which is thine with thy brother thine hand shall release” (Deut. 15:3). This could have been a traveller or foreigner who owned a business locally. It could have been a business contact in another country. It was not a poverty-stricken resident alien, who was treated by biblical civil law as a neighbor.

14. Strong’s Concordance, Hebrew and Chaldee Dictionary, p. 123.

15. Ibid., p. 52.

16. This is the translation given in the Revised Standard Version, the New American Standard Bible, and the New International Version. The alien and the sojourner were equivalents judicially in the Mosaic law. The NIV translates Leviticus 25:35 as “an alien or a temporary resident.”

17. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 36.

E. Who Is My Neighbor?

Because all debts to a neighbor are to be forgiven, the legal question legitimately arises: “Who is my neighbor?” This was the question that the lawyer asked Jesus (Luke 10:29). Jesus answered this question with His parable of the good Samaritan. The Samaritan finds a beaten man on the highway. The man had been robbed. He looked as though he was dead. He was in deep trouble through no fault of his own. He was on the same road that the Samaritan was traveling. The Samaritan takes him to an inn, pays to have him helped, and goes on his journey. He agrees to cover expenses. He shows mercy to the injured man who was incapable of helping himself. He is the therefore true neighbor of the person on the road. The lawyer admitted this (Luke 10:37).

So, the context of the parable is not simply geographical proximity in a neighborhood. It is proximity of life. Samaritans did not normally live in Israel. They had very little contact with the Israelites. But this Samaritan was walking along the same road as the beaten man, and he was in a position to help. He saw that the man was a true victim. The latter was in trouble through no visible fault of his own. He therefore deserved help—morally, though not by statute law—but the priest and the Levite had refused to offer him any help. The Samaritan was being faithful to the law.

This parable was a reproach to the Jews. They knew what Jesus was saying: they were too concerned with the details of the ceremonial law to honor the most important law of all, which the lawyer had cited. “Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbour as thyself” (Luke 10:27). What they also fully understood was that Jesus was predicting that the gentiles (Samaritans) who did obey this law of the neighbor would eventually rule over the Jews, for this is what Deuteronomy 15 explicitly says. He who shows mercy to his neighbor will participate in his nation’s rule over other nations. “Only if thou carefully hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to observe to do all these commandments which I command thee this day. For the LORD thy God blesseth thee, as he promised thee: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow; and thou shalt reign over many nations, but they shall not reign over thee” (Deut. 15:5–6). Notice also that the means of exercising this rule is through extending them credit.

This is a very significant covenantal cause-and-effect relationship.

If a nation is characterized by the willingness of its citizens to loan money, interest-free, to their poverty-stricken neighbors, including resident aliens, who are stricken by poverty, not immoral pursuers of poverty by their lifestyles, the nation will eventually extend its control over others by placing them under the obligation of debt. “The rich ruleth over the poor, and the borrower is servant to the lender” (Prov. 22:7). This is why it was legal to take interest from the foreigner who was living outside the land. It was a means of subduing him, his family, and his God-defying civilization. It was (and is) a means of dominion.

[Added in 1994:] This does not mean, as Timothy Keller insisted that it means, that my neighbor is anyone in need anywhere on earth. He wrote: “Anyone in need is my neighbor—that is the teaching of the Good Samaritan parable.”¹⁸ No, that is the teaching of the modern welfare state and its international embodiment, the United Nations Organization, a would-be reincarnation of the Roman Empire, but on a much wider scale: the incarnation of humanism’s New World Order.¹⁹

F. Moral Obligation

Because these charitable loans were supposed to be cancelled in the seventh year, the national sabbatical year, there was an obvious temptation to refuse to make such loans as the sabbatical year of release approached. God recognized this temptation, and He warned against it.

If there be among you a poor man of one of thy brethren within any of thy gates in thy land which the LORD thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not harden thine heart, nor shut thine hand from thy poor brother: But thou shalt open thine hand and shalt surely lend him sufficient for his need, in that which he wanteth. Beware that there be not

18. Keller, “Theonomy and the Poor,” p. 275. For my critique of this position, see Gary North, Westminster’s Confession: The Abandonment of Van Til’s Legacy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991), pp. 271–80. (<http://bit.ly/gnwc>)

19. R. J. Rushdoony, “The United Nations,” in Rushdoony, The Nature of the American System (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1965] 2001). (<http://bit.ly/rjrns>); Rushdoony, “Has the U.N. Replaced Christ as a World Religion?” in Your Church—Their Target, compiled by Kenneth W. Ingwaldson (Arlington, Virginia: Better Books, 1966), ch. 10; Rushdoony, “The United Nations: A Religious Dream,” in Rushdoony, Politics of Guilty and Pity (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1970] 1995), pp. 184–199. (<http://bit.ly/rjrpogap>). See also Chesley Manly, The UN Record: The Fateful Years for America (Chicago: Regnery, 1955); V. Orval Watts, The United Nations: Planned Tyranny (New York: Devin-Adair, 1955); G. Edward Griffin, The Fearful Master: A Second Look at the United Nations (Boston: Western Islands, 1964); Robert W. Lee, The United Nations Conspiracy (Boston: Western Islands, 1981).

a thought in thy wicked heart, saying, The seventh year, the year of release, is at hand; and thine eye be evil against thy poor brother, and thou givest him nought; and he cry unto the LORD against thee, and it be sin unto thee. Thou shalt surely give him, and thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him: because that for this thing the LORD thy God shall bless thee in all thy works, and in all that thou puttest thine hand unto (Deut. 15:7–10).

This indicates that God placed a moral obligation on the heart of the more successful man, who was supposed to lend to his neighbor. But this was not statute law enforceable in a civil court. God would be the avenger, not the state.

The context of the obligatory loan of Deuteronomy 15, like the zero-interest loan of Exodus 22:25–27, is poverty. There will be poor people in the promised land, Moses warned. Because of this, these special loans are morally mandatory. There must be a year of release, “Save when there shall be no poor among you; for the LORD shall greatly bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance to possess it” (Deut. 15:4). Does this mean that these loan provisions would eventually be annulled? No. “For the poor shall never cease out of the land: therefore I command thee, saying, Thou shalt open thine hand wide unto thy brother, to thy poor, and to thy needy, in thy land” (Deut. 15:11). Everything in Deuteronomy 15 speaks of poverty and biblical law’s means of overcoming it. Deuteronomy 15 is not dealing with business loans; it is dealing with charity loans. There was no statute law that imposed sanctions on anyone who refused to make an interest-free loan.

G. Defining Poverty by Statute

Why was this not a statute law? Because biblical civil law imposes only negative injunctions. It prohibits publicly evil acts. Biblical civil law does not authorize the state to make men good. It does not authorize the state to force men to do good things. It does not authorize the creation of a messianic, salvationist state. The state cannot search the hearts of men. God does this, as the Creator and Judge, so the state must not claim such an ability. The state is only authorized by God to impose negative sanctions against publicly evil acts. It is not authorized to seek to force men to do good acts. In short, the Bible is opposed to the modern welfare state.

1. Defining Poverty

There is no way for biblical statute law to define what poverty is apart from the opinions of those affected by the law, either as taxpayers, charitable lenders, or recipients of public welfare or private charity. “Poverty” is too subjective a category to be defined by statute law. The state needs to be able to assign legal definitions to crimes, in order that its arbitrary power not be expanded. Economic definitions of wealth and poverty that are not arbitrary are not available to the civil magistrates for the creation of positive legal injunctions. Thus, God’s civil law does not compel a man to make a loan to a poor person.

Nevertheless, the civil law does prohibit taking interest from certain categories of poor people. How can the law do this without creating the conditions of judicial tyranny through arbitrariness? If the magistrates cannot define exactly what poverty is for the purpose of writing positive civil injunctions, how can they define what a charitable loan is? How can the state legitimately prohibit interest from a charity loan if the legislators and judges cannot define poverty with a sufficient degree of accuracy to identify cases where a charity loan is legally obligatory for the potential lender?²⁰

The lender decides who is deserving of his loan and who is not. This is his moral choice. God will judge him, pro or con, not the state. However, once the lender grants this unique, morally enjoined charity loan, he may not extract an interest payment. This is a negative injunction—not doing something which is forbidden by law—and therefore it is legitimately enforceable by civil law, as surely as the civil magistrates in ancient Israel were supposed to enforce the release of debt slaves²¹ in the seventh (sabbatical) year (Deut. 15:12–15). The requirement to lend to a needy brother under the terms specified in biblical law is a positive injunction. It therefore comes under the self-government provisions of the conscience and the negative sanctions of God. This positive injunction is not under the jurisdiction of the civil courts. On the other hand, the prohibition against charging interest on these unique loans, being a negative injunction, does come under the enforcement of both civil courts and church courts.

20. This is the question that S. C. Mooney raised in his attempt to remove any distinction between charity loans and business loans. Mooney, Usury, pp. 123–27.

21. A debt slave was a person who had asked his neighbor for a morally mandatory, zero-interest charity loan, and who had then defaulted. He was then placed in bondage until the sabbatical year, or until his debt was paid.

2. Bondservice

The key to understanding the Bible's civil definition of poverty is the loan's contract. There must be a mutually agreed-upon contract, explicit or implicit, in order to establish a legally enforceable loan. If the borrower came to the lender and called upon him to honor Deuteronomy 15:7–8, then the borrower admitted that his was a special case, a charity loan, and it was governed by the civil law's terms of the sabbatical year and the prohibition against interest. The borrower made his request a matter of conscience.

In so doing, he necessarily and inescapably placed himself under the terms of biblical civil law. If he could not repay his debt on time, he could legally be sold into bondservice. This was not a collateralized commercial loan. The borrower was so poor that he had almost no collateral except his land. He chose not to use his land as collateral—or was forced to because he had already leased his land. Yet he was still in dire need. All he could offer as collateral was his promise, his cloak, and his bodily service until the next sabbatical year, should he default. Thus, the borrower admitted that he in principle had already become a bondservant. He admitted through the loan's contractual arrangement that the borrower is servant to the lender. If he could not repay, he would go into bondservice until the next sabbatical year, or until his debt was repaid, whichever came first.

How would the civil magistrate in Israel know which kind of loan was in force, commercial or charitable, and therefore whether interest was valid or illegal? By examining the nature of the loan's collateral. If a loan went to an individual who, if he should default on the loan, would be placed in debt slavery, then this was a charitable loan governed by the provisions of Deuteronomy 15. This is why the year of release applied to both kinds of servitude: debt servitude and bodily servitude that arose because of a man's default on a charity loan.

Furthermore, if it was a loan with the individual's cloak as security, then it was also a zero-interest loan. The collateral described in Exodus 22:25–27 insured little more than that the individual was a local resident—he had to come to the lender to get it back each evening—and that the loan was temporary. (It also made multiple indebtedness more difficult.)²² It would have been a very small loan. This was clearly not a business loan. A business loan would have a different kind of collateral: property that was not crucial to personal survival on a cold night. If the borrower defaulted on a commercial loan, he would forfeit the property specified in the loan contract. He would not forfeit his freedom or his children's freedom. In short, the Old Testament's texts governing lending specify that certain kinds of loans would have certain kinds of collateral, and wherever these unique forms of collateral appeared, the lender could not legally demand an interest payment.

22. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 49:J.

Biblical civil law is exclusively negative law—prohibiting evil public deeds—not positive law, which enjoins the performance of righteous public deeds. An example of this distinction is the enforcement of the tithe: church courts can legitimately require voting members to tithe as a condition of maintaining their voting church membership; the state cannot legitimately require residents to tithe to a church or other organization on threat of civil punishment.

Once the contract was made, the lender was placed under the limits of the civil law. He could not extract interest from the borrower, even a resident alien. But the borrower also was placed under limits: if he defaulted, he could be sold into bondservice. Each party was under limits. Each had decided that this was a true poor loan situation. Each agreed to a unique set of contractual obligations by entering into this arrangement.

Thus, once the contract was made, either implicitly or explicitly, the state had a legal definition of poverty. If the borrower was legally subject to the possibility of being sold into bondservice for defaulting on the loan, then the lender could not lawfully extract interest from him. On the other hand, if the borrower was unwilling to place his own freedom in jeopardy, then he was unwilling to define himself as a poor man for the sake of the civil law's definition. Thus, he had to pay interest on the loan, and his obligation to repay the loan extended beyond the sabbatical year. If he was not under the threat of bondservice, he was not under the protection of the sabbatical year or the zero-interest provisions against usury.

* * * * *

Today, the state does not recognize the legitimacy of temporary servitude in order to repay loans. The modern state has annulled the defining legal condition under which God established the Mosaic law's morally compulsory charitable loans.

What about the New Covenant? Jesus set forth this rule: "And if ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye? for sinners also lend to sinners, to receive as much again. But love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again; and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be the children of the Highest: for he is kind unto the unthankful and to the evil" (Luke 6:34–35).²³ The law has been extended to God's covenantal enemies even when the threat of servitude for default has been eliminated. The law is broader and more rigorous in the New Covenant. But it is still conditional: no subsidy of evil. It is part of God's judgment: "Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head" (Rom. 12:20).²⁴

H. Interest and Inflation

In Authority and Dominion, I went into considerable detail about the economics of time-preference: the originary interest rate. I also discussed the thousand-year history of the church's false interpretations of the usury prohibition as a universal prohibition against all forms of interest. I do not need to reprint the entire chapter here. Those readers who want a detailed treatment may consult that chapter. Warning: it is a long chapter.²⁵

The interest rate is a universal category of human action. It is not a purely monetary phenomenon. It results from the inescapable discount that acting men place on the future. For example, a brand new Rolls-Royce automobile is worth more to me today than the same Rolls-Royce delivered a year from now is worth to me today.²⁶ A bird in hand today is worth more than the same bird in hand in a year.²⁷ This rate of discount of future goods vs. physically identical goods that are in our possession today is the rate of interest.²⁸ It does not apply to money alone, just as the text in Leviticus indicates; it applies to food and, by extension, all goods and services. Interest on charitable loans is prohibited in the case of money, services, or goods—a recognition in

23. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 10.

24. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 10.

25. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 49.

26. I use the Rolls-Royce example because its style does not change very often, and older models retain their market value.

27. This assumes that the bird's species is not known to be facing extinction or some tremendous fall in numbers next year.

28. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. 19. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

God's law of the universality of the interest rate. The rate of interest is a discount for time across the entire economy.

In a period of rising prices (i.e., falling value of money), an astute charitable lender prefers to lend food (“victuals,” or “vittles,” as the word is pronounced)²⁹ rather than money. He cannot lawfully charge interest on such loans. A loan “in kind”—a consumer good rather than money—means that the lender will receive back the physical equivalent of whatever he gave up temporarily to the borrower. He will not suffer an additional loss from the debtor's repayment of the loan in money of reduced purchasing power. Since he cannot lawfully charge interest, he does not tack on what is called an inflation premium to the loan: an extra payment to compensate him for the fall in the value of money. There is little doubt that price inflation in Israel would have increased the number of loans in kind compared to money loans. A charitable loan made in money would have produced a loss of more than the forfeited interest; it would have meant the loss of capital.

On the other hand, in a time of falling prices (rising money value), either as a result of an economic depression or because of added economic output, an astute lender would prefer to lend money rather than goods. He would then receive an implicit interest return on the loan: added capital (purchasing power) despite the numerical equality of the monetary units repaid. The Bible allows this. In times of falling prices, an astute borrower will prefer a loan in goods rather than money, but he is not in a position to demand such a loan. “Beggars can't be choosers,” as the saying goes. However, in most periods in history, this added return on money loans is very low, since prices rarely fall rapidly except following a period of high monetary inflation. Economic output grows slowly most of the time; prices therefore fall slowly.

There is no question that the lender's decision to loan in money or in goods is heavily dependent on the civil government's monetary policies. Because monetary policy cannot achieve economic neutrality,³⁰ to some extent there will always be profits and losses in debt arrangements. Either the lender loses or the debtor loses, depending on the terms of the contract and monetary policy. The key judicial issue, however, is that in a covenanted Trinitarian nation, the contract for a

29. The word is seldom used outside of backward rural areas.

30. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State: A Treatise on Economic Principles, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), p. 818. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardMES>) charitable loan must not impose an explicit interest payment.

Conclusion

Usury from the poor brother is prohibited by the Bible. In the Mosaic Covenant, this poor person had to be willing to risk going into bondservice for up to six years if he defaulted on such a zero-interest loan. The civil courts were required to enforce this provision of a charitable loan. This bondservice provision was assumed in every zero-interest loan, which the court could safely assume was a charity loan. It was this willingness on the poor person's part to risk bondservice that identified him as a needy person. Accepting such a loan was a last resort. It was this degree of poverty, and only this degree of poverty, that created a moral obligation on the lender to lend to a deserving poor person.

This usury prohibition has nothing to do with interest on business loans or consumer loans, whether or not they are collateralized, although large loans normally will be. Commercial loans possess no element of moral obligation. Such interest-bearing loans in Mosaic Israel were not under the cancellation provisions of the sabbatical year, but the collateral for the loan could not be perpetual bondservice, for only heathens could be enslaved permanently in Israel. The Israelite bond-servant had to be paid a wage, enabling him to buy his way out.³¹

The Pentateuchal texts are clear: covenant-keepers do not owe interest-free charitable loans to those who are not under the jurisdiction of either God's ecclesiastical covenant or God's civil covenant. This means that Christians who live under a civil government in which citizenship is not based on taking or implicitly accepting a formal Trinitarian oath owe no loans to resident aliens, i.e., non-believers. Why not? Because, covenantally speaking, Christians have become the resident aliens. We are the strangers in a strange land. We live as Abraham lived in Canaan, not as Joshua's heirs lived in Israel.³² The difference is, Abraham looked forward to deliverance and victory during Joshua's generation (Gen. 15:16). Today, the vast majority of Christians praise their permanent resident-alien status as God's plan for the New Covenant era: political pluralism.³³ What Jews in Jesus' day correctly regarded as civil tyranny—subservience to Rome’s pantheon of gods, incarnated in the state—today’s Christians regard as political freedom. Even Calvinists, Protestantism’s historic defenders of theocracy, from Calvin’s Geneva through Cromwell’s England to Puritan New England, have fallen into this humanist mind-set.³⁴ The Greek rationalism of the medieval university’s curriculum has triumphed over whatever biblical elements had been sporadically tacked on by wishful Scholastic thinkers.

31. Chapter 30.

32. Martin E. Marty, Pilgrims in Their Own Land: 500 Years of Religion in America (Boston: Little, Brown, 1984).

33. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

The New Testament has broadened the net of those who have a legitimate moral claim on our charitable loans: from poor brothers to poor covenant-breakers. But the law is still conditional. We are not to subsidize evil. We lend to very poor people who are not poor because of their own moral flaws. We are not even to lend in the hope of regaining our principal, let alone interest (Luke 6:34–35). The charitable loan law is more rigorous in the New Covenant, but it is not unconditional.

34. An example is Gary Scott Smith, The Seeds of Secularization: Calvinism, Culture, and Pluralism in America, 1870–1915 (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Christian University Press, 1985).

PROMISE, ADOPTION, AND LIBERTY

And if thy brother that dwelleth by thee be waxen poor, and be sold unto thee; thou shalt not compel him to serve as a bondservant: But as an hired servant, and as a sojourner, he shall be with thee, and shall serve thee unto the year of jubile: And then shall he depart from thee, both he and his children with him, and shall return unto his own family, and unto the possession of his fathers shall he return. For they are my servants, which I brought forth out of the land of Egypt: they shall not be sold as bondmen. Thou shalt not rule over him with rigour; but shalt fear thy God (Lev. 25:39–43).

The theocentric principle is clear: God is the master. He sets the terms for bondservice.

A. Bondservants

What was a bondservant in Mosaic Israel? The Hebrew words used in this passage cannot be distinguished by grammar. In verse 39, the Hebrew translated as bondservant is 'abodah. It is used in many ways in the Old Testament, sometimes referring to honorable labor, sometimes not. The word is found in the description of Israel's bondage in Egypt: "And they made their lives bitter with hard bondage, in mortar, and in brick, and in all manner of service in the field: all their service, wherein they made them serve, was with rigour" (Ex. 1:14). It is also used with respect to priestly service: "This is the service of the families of the sons of Merari, according to all their service, in the tabernacle of the congregation, under the hand of Ithamar the son of Aaron the priest" (Num. 4:33). It is used to describe work prohibited on the sabbath or other festival days: "And on the seventh day ye shall have an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work" (Num. 28:25). There is no ethical pattern here. The word simply means service.

In Leviticus 25:42–43, another Hebrew word is used, 'ebed. This word is used twice: “For they are my servants, which I brought forth out of the land of Egypt: they shall not be sold as bondmen. Thou shalt not rule over him with rigour; but shalt fear thy God.” The first sense is honorable; the second is dishonorable. Grammar does not tell us anything that would enable us to distinguish the two legal conditions: servants to God vs. slaves to men. Context must determine its interpretation. In this respect, both of these Hebrew words—‘abodah and ‘ebed—are analogous to the Greek word doulos, which is sometimes translated slave and other times as servant.

We must therefore turn from grammar to context in our search for meaning. The context of this passage is twofold: poverty and permanent slavery. The preceding section in Leviticus 25 deals with zero-interest charitable loans to poor people, either Israelites or resident aliens (vv. 35–38). The succeeding section deals with inter-generational slavery: a legal condition exclusively of non-Israelites (vv. 44–46). In between is this section: how to treat a poor Israelite.

B. Two Forms of Bondservice

In the previous chapter, I argued that the identifying mark of a person who was morally entitled to consideration for a zero-interest charitable loan was his willingness to become a bondservant if he did not repay the debt on schedule. In the sabbatical year, charitable debts as well as bondservice that resulted from a debtor’s inability to repay a charitable loan (Deut. 15:12) were to be cancelled nationally (Deut. 15:1–7).¹ The reason for this was that the two obligations were linked judicially. When the legal obligation to repay a charitable loan ceased, so did the obligation to serve as a bondservant for having defaulted on a charitable loan.

Leviticus 25:39 states that an Israelite could be sold into bondservice. He would not automatically go free until the jubilee year. The sabbath-year release did not apply to him. I call this jubilee bondservice, in contrast to sabbatical bondservice. I argue in this chapter that both forms of bondservice were likely to have been legal penalties for personal bankruptcy. There was always the threat of debt bondage in Mosaic Israel. The differences between the two forms of bondservice were the results of two different types of loans: charitable vs. non-charitable. There was a much greater threat of long-term bondage for having defaulted on a non-charitable loan than a charitable loan. A person entered a business debt contract with open eyes. A poor man who sought a charitable loan was under greater external constraints. God imposed reduced risks of servitude on him.

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 36.

A man's unwillingness to bear the risk of up to six years of bondservice for his failure to repay a loan established the loan as a morally compulsory, zero-interest, charitable loan. Unless the poor borrower was willing to take this risk, he had no moral claim on the lender. Yet it is clear from the text that Israelites could lawfully be sold into servitude until the next jubilee year. This bondage was a means of debt repayment. So, if servitude of up to 49 years was possible, why did the threat of no more than six years of bondservice judicially identify a morally compulsory charitable loan?

The answer is found in the issue of legal access to the inheritance. A man who was so poor that he was willing to risk bondservice until the next sabbatical year, but who was unwilling to put up his land as collateral, had a moral claim on a zero-interest charitable loan. He had a property to return to. He was poor, but he was obviously not so present-oriented or risk-oriented that he would use his inheritance as collateral. His poverty was temporary. He had an inheritance to return to in the sabbatical year after a period of bondservice. His post-crisis goal was liberty and dominion: self-government. So, he used his own potential servitude as collateral to secure the charitable loan.

The borrower who was willing to use his inheritance as collateral in a business loan, or one who had already leased out his land until the next jubilee year, was not equally protected by the Mosaic law. He had no moral claim on a zero-interest charitable loan. Either this was a business loan, in which the element of moral obligation was not involved, or else the person was economically incompetent: he had already leased his inheritance, yet he still wanted a loan. For this person, the time limits on bondservice that were offered by the sabbatical year of release were inoperative. He could be placed into bondservice until the next jubilee year.

Access to the inheritance served as the debtor's sanctuary. If he had not leased out his land, or if he had not lost it because he had used it as collateral to secure a non-charity loan that later went bad, he could not be placed in bondservice for longer than six years. God reminded the debtor that retaining possession of his inheritance was very important in God's eyes. Debtors who were willing to place their inheritance at risk to secure a business loan, or who had already leased out their land, were regarded by the Mosaic law as second-class debtors. They had no moral claim on a zero-interest loan. They also did not possess a sanctuary from bondage: they could serve beyond six years, i.e., until the next jubilee trumpet sounded.

C. Bondservice and Boundaries

An impoverished Israelite who had been sold into jubilee bondservice was not to be treated as a bondservant by a fellow Israelite; instead, he was to be treated as a hired servant. This passage indicates that being a hired servant was preferable to being a bondservant. An Israelite was not to compel a fellow Israelite to serve as a bondservant. We need to ask: What was the difference between a bondservant and a hired servant?

There were exclusionary boundaries on hired servants and sojourners that did not apply to bondservants: “There shall no stranger eat of the holy thing: a sojourner of the priest, or an hired servant, shall not eat of the holy thing. But if the priest buy any soul with his money, he shall eat of it, and he that is born in his house: they shall eat of his meat” (Lev. 22:10–11). A sojourner and a hired servant could not eat a holy meal with a priest; the priest’s household bondservant could. What was different between the two? The sojourner and hired servant were not owned, and therefore they could leave the household; the household’s boundary did not restrict them. The slave could not leave; the boundary did restrict him. He therefore had legal access to the ritual meal of the priest’s household. He was judicially inside the household’s boundary.

The shared judicial status of sojourners and hired servants in Mosaic Israel seems to have been two-fold: first, they could leave the household of the employer; second, in some instances they were uncircumcised. We see this in the law of the Passover: it prohibited strangers and hired servants from eating, yet it allowed circumcised strangers to eat.

And the LORD said unto Moses and Aaron, This is the ordinance of the passover: There shall no stranger eat thereof: But every man’s servant that is bought for money, when thou hast circumcised him, then shall he eat thereof. A foreigner and an hired servant shall not eat thereof. In one house shall it be eaten; thou shalt not carry forth ought of the flesh abroad out of the house; neither shall ye break a bone thereof. All the congregation of Israel shall keep it. And when a stranger shall sojourn with thee, and will keep the passover to the LORD, let all his males be circumcised, and then let him come near and keep it; and he shall be as one that is born in the land: for no uncircumcised person shall eat thereof (Ex. 12:43–48).

The defining judicial issue in the Passover law was an individual's circumcision, not his right of mobility. In contrast, the definition of "sojourner" and "hired servant" applicable to Leviticus 25:40 is based on the existence of a household boundary. The sojourner and the hired servant could legally leave the jurisdiction of the household at the end of their voluntary, contractual service. The bondservant could not. The jubilee law did not require the Israelite to treat his impoverished brother as an uncircumcised person. It therefore must have required the owner to treat his fellow Israelite as well as he would treat a geographically mobile person. The poor Israelite was to be protected.

D. Who Were the Poor in Israel?

The poor man had no money or marketable assets except his labor. This is an economic definition. There is no biblical text that reveals such a definition. It is not suitable as a legal definition. The Mosaic law applied to legally identifiable classes of individuals. It prohibited certain forms of behavior regarding the treatment of the poor: "thou shalt not." But there is no economic definition of poverty offered by the Bible. This case law had a judicial definition rather than an economic definition.

A man was defined as legally poor in terms of his willingness to risk bondservice if he defaulted on a charitable loan. Access to one's inheritance assured liberation from debt servitude, either in the sabbatical year (where the land was not pledged) or the jubilee year (where the land might be pledged). The jubilee law did not make economic poverty illegal. It did not equalize wealth. It did not equalize opportunity. What it did was place maximum limits on debt servitude, and therefore maximum limits on debt: six years (zero-interest charitable loans) and 49 years (interest-bearing business loans). The jubilee law restricted the discounted market value of a loan collateralized by a man's inheritance. In year 50, the land would return to him. Lenders beware!

There was no guarantee that a plot of ground would be economically valuable through the centuries. The jubilee law made no legal guarantee of anyone's economic condition. The Bible is not a handbook of statist wealth redistribution. It is a handbook of covenantal liberty: God's handbook for man's redemption, i.e., a transformation of his judicial status in God's court: from guilty to innocent.

If my explanation of the Mosaic law's judicial definition of poverty in this case law is correct, then this case law no longer applies under the New Covenant. The definition was tied to inheritance within the Promised Land. With the annulment of the Promised Land's special covenantal status, this case law's definition of poverty ceased to be judicially relevant.

E. To Buy a Brother

This passage governs the treatment of an Israelite who has been sold to another Israelite. He had to serve the purchaser until the jubilee unless his kinsman-redeemer bought him out of bondage.

This means that he was not under the protection of the sabbatical year of release (Deut. 15). Why not? Because he was not in his predicament as a result of his inability to repay a zero-interest charitable loan. Such loans were cancelled in the sabbatical year. Also, the person who was sold into bondage because of his failure to repay a charitable loan had to be provided with capital when he departed during the sabbatical year: "And when thou sendest him out free from thee, thou shalt not let him go away empty: Thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock, and out of thy floor, and out of thy winepress: of that wherewith the LORD thy God hath blessed thee thou shalt give unto him" (Deut. 15:13–14). This is not specified as a requirement here: "And then shall he depart from thee, both he and his children with him, and shall return unto his own family, and unto the possession of his fathers shall he return" (Lev. 25:41). Yet in both cases, the justification for the law was the former condition of the Israelites in Egypt: "And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt, and the LORD thy God redeemed thee: therefore I command thee this thing to day" (Deut. 15:15). "For they are my servants, which I brought forth out of the land of Egypt: they shall not be sold as bondmen" (Lev. 25:42).

1. A Judicial Distinction

What is the judicial distinction between the two conditions of household servitude? The Bible is not explicit, but the difference appears to relate to lawful immediate access to rural land. The poor man in Deuteronomy 15 was to be sent away with sheep, grain, and wine. This indicates that he had a home to return to. The poor man in Leviticus 25 was to be sent back to his land only with his family. Nothing is said of his buyer's responsibility to provide him with any economic resources. His judicial status as a free man was his primary resource; his landed inheritance was his economic resource; and his family went free with him. This distinguished him from both the poor man who had defaulted on a zero-interest, morally mandatory charitable loan (Deut. 15:12) and the pagan slave who never departed, and whose children became the property of the Israelite who had bought him (Lev. 25:45–46).²

The poor man in Leviticus 25 had already been legally stripped of immediate access to his land. Until the jubilee, he became as a poor resident alien in the land. He did not own a home in a walled city. He was landless. But this landless condition was economic, not judicial. His judicial status as a free man was guaranteed by his legal claim to his landed inheritance. The jubilee year would reinstate him as owner and legal occupier of his family plot. He had no claim to his family's land in the present, but he had permanent title. The year of jubilee guaranteed this. But if he became a bondservant, he forfeited his judicial status as a freeman until he was released. He could no longer respond to a call to be numbered without his master's permission.

Unlike the foreign slave, who was the property of the family that bought him or inherited him, the temporarily landless Israelite in bondage had to be paid a wage by his Israelite master.³ At the very least, he had to be treated as well as a hired man was treated. The hired man could walk away from a tyrant. The permanent slave could not. So, the master was not allowed to treat his Israelite servant in the way that he was allowed to treat his permanent heathen slaves.

But this distinction between freeman and slave does not explain why this case law required the owner to treat him as a hired servant. What was the distinguishing mark of the hired servant? Answer: he could walk away from the household of the man who hired him. To retain his services, the renter of his labor services had to pay him a wage.

2. Chapter 31.

3. The resident alien did not have to pay him a wage. This law did not apply to the resident alien, who was no brother. This gave the resident alien a competitive position in the market for Israelite servants. He could pay a higher price for the net value of expected stream of income, since the net was higher: no wage expense. This was not a civil law. Civil laws had to apply equally to all residents (Ex. 12:49). Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 14.

2. Wages

This means that in order to obey this law, an Israelite master must have had to pay a wage to an Israelite bondservant. The master was to this extent not an owner but a renter of services. Yet the servant had been sold into servitude. We must examine the apparent discrepancy between these judicial conditions: owner vs. renter; bondservant vs. hired servant.

The wage was crucial to the servant. If saved, it was this money or goods that would serve as his source of re-capitalization in the year of jubilee. He did not have to be given anything at the time of his departure in the jubilee year, unlike the land-owning poor Israelite who had defaulted on a charitable loan (Deut. 15:14–15). He had to be paid a wage, also unlike the Deuteronomic (sabbatical) bondservant. The jubilee bondservant was under bondage for a much longer period than the Deuteronomic bondservant, except in the seventh cycle of sabbatical years that preceded the jubilee. He could amass more wealth through thrift because he had more years of bondservice in which to save.

This arrangement raises a significant question. If the buyer could go into the open market and hire an Israelite for a day, or a month, or a year, why would he buy a full-time hired servant? The latter had to be cared for in bad times, whereas a hired servant could be dismissed. The buyer's expected stream of net income had to reflect the costs of feeding, clothing, and housing the servant, in good times and bad, and also paying him a wage. Why would anyone bother to buy such a servant? Answer: the buyer was securing a permanent hired worker who could not legally depart in search of higher wages elsewhere or better working conditions elsewhere. What the buyer was securing was a hired servant who could not be bid away from the buyer's household. The servant could not leave at will. He was placed within a legal boundary: the household of the family that had purchased him. The buyer was buying a stream of labor services until the jubilee. The servant could not lawfully cut off this stream of service by walking away.

Did the owner-renter have to pay the bondservant a wage equal to that paid to a hired servant? The text is not explicit on this point. It says only that the Israelite must be treated as a hired servant. If a hired servant could leave at any time in response to a better offer, did the owner-renter have to match every offer? This seems unlikely, given the status of the bondservant as a member of the household until redemption. The bondservant gained security; this always comes at a price. The price of security is the loss of entrepreneurial opportunities—in this case, the future prospects of renting one's services to another employer. So, the wages paid would have been discounted to compensate the owner-renter for the "lifetime (jubilee) employment contract" costs of employing the servant.

The legal option of liberty was always open: buying one's way out of bondage. But would he do this? This decision depended heavily on the owner's treatment. If his wages were high enough, he might do this. I conclude that wages that would not have enabled a man to buy his way out of servitude before the jubilee would have been judged as too low by a church court. But there was another factor that limited his personal exodus. The jubilee Israelite bondservant had no land to return to. He probably would have preferred the security of servitude, given the fact that his wages could accumulate to serve as his capitalization in the year of jubilee.

He was protected by law from exploitation. It is not clear whether the court with jurisdiction was civil or ecclesiastical. With respect to the requirement that he pay the servant a wage, it was ecclesiastical. The Bible does not designate the state as an agency that lawfully imposes positive sanctions. The state protects people from force and fraud by others.

F. "If He Be Sold Unto Thee"

The passive language indicates that the individual did not sell himself; he was sold to the buyer. Who would do this? A previous owner? No; the law stipulates that "he shall be with thee, and shall serve thee unto the year of jubile." He had to be taken care of. He was not a commodity to be bought and sold at will. He had been a local resident: "thy brother that dwelleth by thee." He did not expect to be sent away from the neighborhood.

The likelihood is that the man had been sold in order to pay a debt, but not a charitable debt, which would have been governed by Deuteronomy 15. Perhaps he had moved into a walled city to live. Perhaps he got involved in a business transaction that involved debt. The venture failed, and he was sold to pay off the debt. He would have been sold to the highest bidder, but the bidders would have been restricted by the market to residents of the walled city or the immediate surrounding area, or to someone living in the neighborhood close to the man's family plot. These were the people who knew him and his capacities. There was not to be a large-scale market for Israelite servants in Israel. Servitude was personal, just as God's system of servitude is. Owners were supposed to know something about those whom they purchased.

It is possible that the man sold himself to the buyer in order to put aside money for his return to his land. This form of voluntary servitude was something like that of the voluntary servant of Deuteronomy 15: "And it shall be, if he say unto thee, I will not go away from thee; because he loveth thee and thine house, because he is well with thee; Then thou shalt take an aul, and thrust it through his ear unto the door, and he shall be thy servant for ever. And also unto thy maid-servant thou shalt do likewise" (Deut. 15:16–17). The difference is that the jubilee form of bondservice allowed the servant to return to his land at the jubilee.

G. An Exception to the Law: Criminal Trespass

Wenham argued that the reason why a man was sold to another was to pay off a debt.⁴ I agree. He cited as proof Exodus 22:3, a case law governing a criminal trespass: "The sun be risen upon him, there shall be blood shed for him; for he should make full restitution; if he have nothing, then he shall be sold for his theft." I disagree with this proof text for Leviticus 25:39–43. The reason why I disagree is this: God does not subsidize evil.

1. No Escape from Restitution

A criminal, seeing the approach of the jubilee year, might think to himself: "If I get away with this crime, I will benefit. If I do not get away with it, I will not have to remain in another man's service for very long. The larger the value of what I steal, the better the risk-reward ratio is." The closer to the jubilee year, the better the risk-reward ratio for crimes against property, if Wenham's interpretation is correct. The criminal's victim could not expect anything like double restitution from the sale of a criminal if the jubilee year was near. The stream of expected labor services would be cut off by the jubilee. Thus, the sale price of the criminal would be low. If the criminal was to be liberated at the jubilee, this legal arrangement would not only subsidize theft, it would subsidize high-value thefts. The victims would be penalized because of the liberation aspect of the jubilee year.

4. Gordon J. Wenham, The Book of Leviticus (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1979), p. 322.

My conclusion is that the year of jubilee did not apply to convicted criminals. Neither did the law mandating owners to treat Israelite bondservants as hired workers. Criminals were sold into slavery in order to repay their victims and meet God's judicial requirements. The most important issue was not the liberation of the criminal; rather, it was the maximization of the criminal's selling price, so that the victim would receive double restitution. The law of God does not discriminate against victims of crime in the name of liberation. The principle of victim's rights lies at the heart of the Bible's criminal justice system.⁵ The criminal must have remained outside the protection of the jubilee, and therefore outside the judicial status of citizen, until he repaid his debt to his victim. He could regain his citizenship only when his debt was paid. His adult sons, however, could return to the family's land at the time of the jubilee. Their inheritance was not forfeited by their father's crime, for the sins of the father do not transfer to his children (Deut. 24:16). As redeemers, they might even have paid off his debt.

The biblical warrant for this interpretation is Israel's experience in the Babylonian captivity. God removed most of them from the land for 70 years. They had violated His sabbath year of release and the land's rest for 490 years (II Chron. 36:17, 21). God did not allow them to return to their individual patrimonies in the normal jubilee year. They were under criminal sanctions, repaying their victim: the land itself. They could not return to their patrimonies until the debt was repaid. They temporarily lost their judicial status as judges in the land.

2. The Price of Redemption

If my view is correct, then the closer the jubilee year, the larger the market for buying convicted criminals. As the legal term of service shortened for Israelite bondservants, and their market prices dropped accordingly, those in the market for long-term bondservants would have been forced increasingly to enter the market for heathen slaves and Israelite criminals.

5. Gary North, Authority and Dominion, chaps. 34, 37–40, Appendix M. See also Gary North, Victim's Rights: The Biblical View of Civil Justice (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnvictim>)

Second, if I am correct about the unique inapplicability of the law governing the treatment of Israelite bondservants, the net return on an Israelite's investment in buying a convicted criminal would have equalled the return available to resident alien purchasers, who were not under the terms of this law. The price for criminals would have tended to be higher than the price of other Israelite bondservants, assuming that the criminal was not violent. The price-depressing aspects of buying a criminal would have been offset in whole or in part by the higher rate of return: no requirement to pay him a wage. This, too, was a benefit to the criminal's victim: a higher sale price was more likely to assure him of his double restitution payment.

The questions arise: What was the proper redemption price? How long would he have to serve? Did he become a lifetime slave? If his kinsman-redeemer wanted to buy him out of bondage, how much did he owe the buyer? The prorated price of the jubilee year did not apply if he was not entitled to go out in the jubilee.

Let us consider modern business practice. If a man buys an interest-paying instrument at face value in order to receive a guaranteed income, and if the company issuing the bond possesses the right of redemption, the company must repay the face value of the bond in order to cancel the debt. The buyer has received guaranteed income from the asset in the meantime.

The economic difference between a bond and a bondservant is that the buyer is not sure how much net income the bondservant will produce. The bond pays a guaranteed rate of return. It is purchased at a discount from its face value. The discount is based on the prevailing rate of interest. The face value—redemption price—of the bond and today's rate of interest are known in advance. The price and the rate of return can be calculated.

There is no guaranteed rate of return for a bondservant. The buyer must estimate the future net income from a bondservant. Then he must discount this by the prevailing rate of interest. The higher the estimated net income, the higher the market price. But how long will he retain control over the bondservant? Unlike a bond, there is no fixed time period. Unlike a bondservant under the protection of the jubilee, there is no fixed time period. There must be a way to reduce the number of variables, so that the victim gets paid. But how?

The higher the estimated value of the criminal's productivity as a servant, the higher the price he will bring. This means that a criminal with a good work ethic is less likely to be able to escape servitude; his redemption price will be too high. This is contrary to biblical law: a subsidy for evil. There must be a way around this anomaly. But what?

The solution solves both problems: (1) too many variables and (2) the subsidy for evil. His legal redemption price must be limited by the payment to the victim. The kinsman-redeemer must be allowed to buy him out of servitude for this payment. If a bidding war pushes the criminal's market price above this maximum restitution payment, who receives the extra money? Not the victim; he is not entitled to it. Not the state; it is not entitled to it. It must go to the criminal's account—money for his redemption. This puts a ceiling on the market price of criminals. A buyer is less likely to continue to bid if he knows that the criminal can use the money above the restitution payment to shorten his time of service. The extra money will make it less expensive for the man's kinsman-redeemer to put up the difference and buy him out of servitude. Conclusion: the purchase price of a convicted criminal on the competitive market for bondservants will not be significantly higher than the money owed to his victims. When this limit is reached, bidding will tend to cease as bidders drop out. This is as it should be: the punishment (servitude) should be proportional to the crime (damages produced).

But if he has no kinsman-redeemer who is willing to pay off his debt, he will remain in bondage forever. He cannot buy his way out. He has no assets and no way to earn any. The message is clear: an enslaved criminal needs a kinsman-redeemer who has both the assets and the willingness to sacrifice his own interests on behalf of his relative.

H. Holy War, Citizenship, and Liberty

A citizen is a person who has the authority to serve as a civil judge, declaring innocence or guilt. The Israelite bondservant's judicial status as a temporary slave removed his judicial status as a citizen. He could not serve as a civil judge during his period as a man bound to another man's household. He did remain an Israelite. He did possess post-jubilee title to his land. No text says the following, but my biblical law-immersed intuition tells me that for a man to become a bondservant was judicially the equivalent of having become a minor. An Israelite had become a slave in another man's house, under another's temporary authority. Judicially, he had become a child.

Citizenship in a holy commonwealth is the legal authority to declare or bring negative civil sanctions in God's name. The pre-eminent manifestation of this authority in pre-exilic Israel was service in the military: God's holy army. The army had the task of defending the boundaries of the land, i.e., keeping it holy, secure from foreign invaders. The army had to keep the land from being profaned by invaders: boundary violators. To be a member of the army required the payment of redemption blood money at the time of the numbering of the nation immediately prior to a holy war (Ex. 30:12–13).⁶ Circumcised Israelite males became eligible to serve at age 20 (Ex. 30: 14).⁷

The Israelite slave had to be treated as “as an hired servant,” the text says. He had to be paid a wage by his Israelite master. He therefore had money to pay the redemption blood money to the priests. Did this give him the right to serve in the army? No; he was judicially a child even though he was over age 20. Only with his owner's permission could he serve in the army. He was not a free man; he was not a citizen.

Was a gentile slave who paid his redemption blood money and also fought for Israel in a holy battle subsequently released from bondage? Abram had fighting men (Gen. 14:14), but they did not receive automatic freedom. However, this was before the Abrahamic covenant was established (Gen. 15). It may be that in pre-exilic Israel, the willingness of a slave to risk his life in holy battle gained him his freedom, though not landed inheritance.⁸ He became a citizen in a walled city. If nothing else, manumission might have been a bonus offered to him by his master. This view helps explain the considerable number of foreigners listed among David's 30 mighty men (I Chron. 12:3–6). It may also explain the presence in David's army of the most famous foreign officer of all, Uriah the Hittite.

6. North, Authority and Dominion, Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 58.

7. My presumption is that David was under age 20 at the time of his confrontation with Goliath. This would explain why his brother regarded him as an observer rather than as a warrior at risk (I Sam. 17:28). David had not paid his redemption blood money. He was then authorized by Saul to serve as the army's representative in battle, but there is no mention of the required payment. This may have been an oversight on Saul's part, or perhaps Saul paid it for him. We are not told.

8. It is one of the most interesting facts about the American Civil War (1861–65) that in its final months, Southern leaders and generals began to discuss the possibility of granting freedom to any Negro slave who was willing to enlist in the Confederate army. But the South had gone to war to defend the region's right to slavery. With this public discussion, the war effort began to collapse. If the slaves could be trusted to defend the Confederacy, then the old myth of their innate status as children in need of supervision had been ludicrous. This called into question the legitimacy of the “peculiar institution” and the war to defend it. See Richard E. Berringer, et al., Why the South Lost the Civil War (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1986), ch. 15.

What we do not know is whether these gentile slaves would have been required by law to wait until the jubilee year in order to receive their freedom. They surely could not have become citizens unless they continued to attend Passover, even though, as household slaves, they would automatically have been circumcised (Gen. 17:11–13). Circumcision was necessary but not sufficient to make an adult male a citizen. Attendance at Passover was mandatory. My view is that they and their families would have been released immediately after the cessation of military hostilities. This release had nothing to do with the jubilee. The release provisions of the jubilee year were uniquely associated with inheritance in the land, and the released gentile bondservant had no inheritance in the land. In any case, his owner would have had to consent in the first place to his enrollment in God's holy army.

The same rule governed the Israelite bondservant, whether a bankrupt or a convicted criminal. His owner had to consent to his military service. The owner may have had to pay his blood money fee for him—certainly this was the case with a criminal. I do not think any bondservant could be called into service by the state unless his owner consented. He was not his own man. He was the lawful property of another man until his debt was paid.

I. The Basis of Liberty

As New Covenant people, we have difficulty understanding the degree of importance associated with landed inheritance under the Mosaic economy. The connection between land and inheritance was extremely close. The question is: Was it unbreakable?

The section on the jubilee ends with these words: "For unto me the children of Israel are servants; they are my servants whom I brought forth out of the land of Egypt: I am the LORD your God" (Lev. 25: 55). The legal status of later generations as God's covenantal bondservants rested on their ancestors' historical experience in the days of Moses: deliverance from bondage in Egypt. It also rested on the next generation's participation in the conquest of Canaan under Joshua. This participation was the legal foundation of landed inheritance in Mosaic Israel. From everything we find in this section of Leviticus, inheritance was the legal foundation of every aspect of the jubilee law. I see no exceptions. Even in the case of the enslavement of heathens (vv. 44–46), the judicial issue was perpetual inheritance, though not landed inheritance.

This raises a whole series of questions. Commentators rarely ask them, let alone answer them. This is why there has been so much confusion regarding the jubilee year among conservative evangelicals, and why liberation theologians have gotten away with exegetical murder.

1. Freemanship

First, who was a free man under the Mosaic law? There were degrees of freedom. Every resident of Israel was free from arbitrary law. The same civil law code applied to all men: “One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you” (Ex. 12:49).⁹ But it is obvious that this principle of equality before the civil law did not apply to the jubilee law. The jubilee made a fundamental distinction between the resident who did not have an inalienable legal claim to landed inheritance and the resident who did. The resident who did have such a claim was identified by God as His servant.

There was only one way that someone who had not participated in either the exodus or the conquest could become God’s servant, so defined: by adoption. God adopted Abram and his covenantal heirs, but the promised inheritance was not secured until Joshua’s day. That is, God’s promise to Abraham was not fulfilled until Joshua’s day. The fulfillment of this promise (Gen. 15:16) was God’s proof in history of the reliability of His covenant and its promises. Adoption, promise, and inheritance were linked judicially in the Abrahamic covenant and the Mosaic Covenant.

2. Naturalization

Second, there were two forms of adoption: into a tribe (walled city) or into a family (rural land). The circumcised resident alien was offered the promise of citizenship for his heirs (Deut. 23:3–8): tribal adoption. The tenth-generation heir of a bastard Israelite was offered citizenship (Deut. 23:2): access into God’s holy army. The supreme example was David, the ultimate holy warrior, the tenth-generation heir of Judah and Tamar (Ruth 4:18–22).¹⁰

Adoption for males was not automatic, except (probably) for those who volunteered for military service during a war. Presumably, three generations constituted the standard period of testing for most resident aliens (Deut. 23:8). This adoption must have been made in the name of the congregation, presumably by the local tribal congregation inside a walled city, but not by a specific family. Had citizenship been available only through adoption by a family, the naturalization laws would have forced a dilution of the landed inheritance of specific families. This would have been a mandatory program of economic disinheritance. No such program was mandated by the Mosaic law.

9. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 14.

10. On gaps in this genealogy, see Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 11:G.

3. Criminals

Third, what about the criminal? The criminal lost his citizenship until the debt was repaid. He could not be numbered to fight in God's holy army until his debt was repaid; hence, he was not a citizen during this period. He was not a free man; hence, he was not a citizen. Having had civil judicial sanctions brought against him, he did not possess the right to participate as a civil judge, bringing the state's judicial sanctions on others. This restriction is not found any text, but it is inferred by the nature of citizenship: the lawful authority to bring God's civil sanctions against lawbreakers. Until the victim was repaid, or the buyer whose purchase had provided the funds was repaid, the judicial status of the criminal was that of non-citizen.

I argue that he also lost his claim to his family's land, and therefore lost his right to participate in the jubilee. That is, he did not automatically return to his land at the jubilee. This legal status did not apply to his adult male children. They could go back to the land at the jubilee if they broke with him publicly regarding his crime. They could then become his kinsman redeemers, which is another reason why they were allowed to return to the family plot. In this sense, he could be adopted by his son or sons. That is, he regained access to his forfeited inheritance through an act of redemption in his behalf.¹¹ Otherwise, the judicial status of the criminal as an heir in the jubilee was forfeited until his debt was repaid. Because he received no wage, his kinsman-re-

11. This is the judicial basis of the re-established inheritance of a portion of the sons of Adam. A son of Adam who was not under the negative sanction of forfeited citizenship had to break publicly with the crime of His earthly father, thereby reclaiming the inheritance on behalf of those whom He has chosen to redeem. This was the act of the supreme Kinsman-Redeemer, Jesus Christ, the last (second) Adam (I Cor. 15:45).

deemer had buy him out of servitude.¹²

J. Possession or Confession?

Another problem case is the adopted immigrant. When an Israelite adopted an immigrant, he was conveying a kind of manumission to him: manumission prior to enslavement. The covenantally faithful adopted person and his heirs could not be lawfully enslaved permanently after the adoption except on the same basis that an Israelite could lose his citizenship and his inheritance, i.e., excommunication. This act of grace cost the adopting family something: the dilution of the sons' economic inheritance. It was a major step for a father with sons to adopt another son, at least in the period in which a few acres meant something economically to the heirs. This means that if God's covenantal blessings continued, and families grew large, the economic cost of adoption would decrease, since the economic value of the dilution of acreage would have been minimal.

The circumcised immigrant could become a citizen, or his heirs eventually could, through adoption by a tribe, probably in a walled city, but he had no claim to land distributed at the conquest. Only adoption into an Israelite family could provide land. The jubilee year therefore offered no unique economic benefit for him. Did it confer any judicial benefit? Yes. The heathen slave law was part of the jubilee law. The heathen slave law expressly stated that all inheritable slaves had to be purchased from heathens (Lev. 25:44–45).¹³ This was the magna carta for the naturalized citizen. By breaking covenantally with heathendom, and by becoming a full citizen ready to serve as a holy warrior, the immigrant received a perpetual grant of manumission from inter-generational servitude. He could not be permanently enslaved inside Israel. The jubilee year therefore functioned as a year of release for every citizen, even those with no inheritable property.

The naturalized citizen could not hope to indebt himself by means of the collateral of an inheritable plot of land unless an Israelite family had adopted him. To this extent, he was less able to gain access to the market for loans. But with respect to his liberty, he could not lawfully be enslaved. Leviticus 25 does not say that the landless immigrant citizen would be released from debt bondage. The language is that of a return to the family's land. But because the slave law made it illegal to enslave an Israelite on an inter-generational basis, the jubilee year of release must have applied to the non-inheriting naturalized citizen. The trumpet announced release from bondage for every Israelite except the criminal.

12. The New Covenant warns us: "The wages of sin is death" (Rom. 3:23). We are in need of grace from a kinsman-redeemer.

13. Chapter 30.

K. Cross-Family Adoption

There were three ways out of slavery for gentiles. First, there was manumission, either as payment for physical brutality by his owner or through voluntary manumission by his owner, but this would not automatically have freed his family (Ex. 21:2–4).¹⁴ Second, there was legal adoption by his owner. This would have freed his family from the threat of bondage forever. There was a third way out: adoption by another Israelite family. This act of grace would have transferred the right of inheritance to him. He and his family would then go out in the jubilee.

This aspect of the Mosaic law is never discussed by the commentators, yet it was fundamental to the redeeming work of Jesus Christ. Adoption by one household head could liberate other men's slaves. In fact, if one man had been willing to divide his sons' landed inheritance to the point of no economic return, he could have freed every slave in Israel. He would not even have been required to purchase the liberated slaves in order for them to receive their freedom at the jubilee. The moment he adopted them, they would have become heirs of his estate, meaning heirs of his judicial status. They would have become citizens of Israel at the next jubilee. No heir of the conquest could be legally kept in slavery beyond the jubilee year. This act of universal adoption would have made the liberator very unpopular, as we can easily imagine, but it was always a legal option under the Mosaic covenant. The most likely candidate to do this was a man with abolitionist sentiments and without biological heirs.

Would he have owed the slave owners anything? Only for the time remaining until the jubilee. This prorated payment would have become progressively smaller as the jubilee year approached. In the year of jubilee, he would have owed them nothing. There was only one exception to this rule: the criminal who had been sold into slavery to pay his victim. In this case, his owner had to be repaid fully before the slave could be released. The buyer had paid a price based on the amount of restitution the criminal owed to the victim, not the prorated value of his services until the jubilee. The criminal was not protected by the jubilee. God's law does not subsidize crime. So, in order for the redemption to be secured through adoption, the adopting redeemer would have had to pay to the owner whatever the owner had paid to the criminal's victim.

14. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 31.

It is understandable why Israel may never have invoked the jubilee. Had it been honored, almost every slave owner's investment would have been at risk. All it would have taken to free all the gentile slaves in Israel was for one lawful heir to decide that the per capita economic value of his children's landed inheritance was worth forfeiting for the sake of a single mass adoption.

There was such a man. His name was Jesus. He publicly declared the judicial intent of His ministry by announcing the availability of liberation through adoption into His family (Luke 4:18–21).¹⁵ The result was predictable: the slave-owners and their accomplices killed Him. With the death of the Testator came the inheritance: judicial liberation.¹⁶ But because of the jubilee law, this deliverance had to await the blowing of the trumpet at the next jubilee year: on the tenth day of the seventh month, the day of atonement (Lev. 25:9), yom kippur. I agree with James Jordan that this final jubilee year came three years after the crucifixion, in the same year as the inauguration of Paul's ministry to the gentiles.¹⁷ On that historic yom kippur, God released from judicial bondage every gentile slave in Israel who had publicly professed faith in, and subordination to, the New Covenant's head of household.¹⁸ Be-

15. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

16. "For where a testament is, there must also of necessity be the death of the testator. For a testament is of force after men are dead: otherwise it is of no strength at all while the testator liveth" (Heb. 9:16–17).

17. James B. Jordan, "Jubilee, Part 3," Biblical Chronology, V (April 1993), p. 2. (<http://bit.ly/jbjub3>)

18. It would not surprise me in heaven to learn that Stephen's stoning took place on the day of atonement. Christ, the slain Passover lamb, asked God to forgive His executioners (Luke 23:34). Similarly, Stephen's last words were: "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge" (Acts 7:60). If he was in fact the symbolic purification offering for the day of atonement (Lev. 16), Stephen's words would have been appropriate, paralleling the words of the symbolic Passover lamb. As required by the laws of sacrifice governing the day of atonement, the Jews killed one goat, Stephen, but the scapegoat, present at the execution, was soon to wander into the wilderness, bringing the message of liberation to the gentiles: Paul.

Lest it be thought that no execution could lawfully take place on the day of atonement, consider Joseph ibn Migash, a Jewish judge who had an informer executed on a cause Old Covenant Israel refused to honor this adoption, having killed the adopter instead, God destroyed Old Covenant Israel.¹⁹

As I said, there was one exception to manumission through outside adoption: the criminal who had been sold into slavery to repay his victim. The adopter would have had to pay the owner's purchase price plus anything still owed to the victim. In the case of Jesus Christ, He made this supreme payment to the victim, God the Father, who had placed all of mankind into servitude because of man's rebellion in the garden.

This should end the debate over whether a man needs to profess the Lordship of Christ in order to be saved. A regenerate person has no choice but to profess Christ's comprehensive lordship. He cannot lawfully partake in the jubilee inheritance without this profession. But because of God's mercy, this oath can be taken for him representatively, either by his parents when they offer him for baptism as an infant or when he voluntarily consents to baptism after infancy. Whether the oath is verbally professed or not, it is an inescapable aspect of God's covenant. There is no lawful inheritance apart from this subordination to the head of the church. There is therefore no liberation apart from such a confession.

To keep Christian slaves in bondage beyond that final jubilee year was a crime. Furthermore, all slaves who claimed Jesus' universal offer day of atonement that fell on a sabbath. A modern Jewish legal scholar remarks that this action "shows how sacred a duty the elimination of informers was conceived by great judges." Haim H. Cohn, "Informer," The Principles of Jewish Law, ed. Menachem Elon (Jerusalem: Keter, [1975?]), col. 508. An informer is defined as "a Jew who denounces a fellow-Jew to a non-Jew, and more particularly to non-Jewish authorities, thereby causing actual or potential damage. . . . It is no defense to a charge of informing that the person denounced is a sinner and wicked, or has caused the informer grief or harm—no informer will ever have a share in the world to come." Ibid., col. 507.

Immediately preceding his execution, Stephen had publicly charged the Jews with murder because of their betrayal of Jesus to the Romans. "Which of the prophets have not your fathers persecuted? and they have slain them which shewed before of the coming of the Just One; of whom ye have been now the betrayers and murderers" (Acts 7:52). In other words, Stephen charged them with having been informers to the Romans, betraying a fellow Jew to the gentiles. This is one reason—I believe the main one—why they took the risk of breaking Roman law by executing him themselves without a Roman trial. To have taken him to the Roman authorities would have constituted an act of informing, thereby confirming his accusation against them. As historian Michael Grant has written, they participated either in the equivalent of an unauthorized lynching or a deliberately illegal execution by the Council of Jerusalem. Michael Grant, The Jews in the Roman World (New York: Dorset, 1973), p. 116.

19. David Chilton, The Great Tribulation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dctrib>) of adoption into His family after this jubilee year would have to be released at the next jubilee. But the fall of Jerusalem 37 years after this final jubilee year ended the temple's Passover system and the land inheritance system established by the Mosaic covenant. There would never again be a God-authorized jubilee. Thus, the fall of Jerusalem ended the legality of Mosaic slavery forever.

Conclusion

The jubilee law established protection for poor Israelites who were sold into servitude. This servitude was mild, requiring the masters to pay wages to their Israelite servants. It required them to treat these people as they would treat a hired servant who could leave an employer who was abusive.

The jubilee law established a legal distinction between a free man and a heathen slave. The pre-exilic heathen slave had no right to jubilee freedom, for he was not eligible for military service. He was outside the civil covenant. The legal basis of citizenship was adoption, either by a tribe or a family. A woman was adopted by marriage to an Israelite, e.g., Rahab and Ruth. This was adoption into a family. Citizenship was automatic with adoption.

Citizenship was possible for male gentile converts to the covenant. This judicial promise was carried out by tribes. This might take as long as ten generations (Deut. 23:2); it might take as few as three (Deut. 23:7–8). Once they became citizens, they could not be permanently enslaved (Lev. 25:44–46).²⁰ The heathen slave law served as a magna carta of liberty for the naturalized immigrant. He could achieve full legal status as a citizen despite the fact that he had no inheritance in the land. Citizenship was by confession, circumcision, and numbering in the holy army. But it was not granted overnight by a tribe.

Jesus Christ was the ultimate Heir, the promised Seed (Gal. 3:16), the One for whom the Mosaic system of tribal inheritance had been created. It was He who announced the jubilee year (Luke 4:18–21). It was He who offered men adoption into His family (John 1:12). It was He who paid the debts of the criminals He adopts into His family. Instead of a hole in the ear drilled by an awl at the doorway of an Israelite's household (Ex. 21:6), baptism is the new mark of adoption. The New Covenant's jubilee year of release was the final jubilee for Old Covenant Israel.

20. Chapter 30.

SLAVES AND FREEMEN

Both thy bondmen, and thy bondmaids, which thou shalt have, shall be of the heathen that are round about you; of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids. Moreover of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you, which they begat in your land: and they shall be your possession. And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession; they shall be your bondmen for ever: but over your brethren the children of Israel, ye shall not rule one over another with rigour (Lev. 25:44–46).

The theocentric principle undergirding this law is simple to state, but difficult for modern man to accept: God is the cosmic slavemaster. This is the issue of hierarchy: point two of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. Permanent Slaves

The text must be taken literally. First, Israelites could buy slaves from other nations. These people were already slaves according to the laws of their own nations. The Israelites did not make them slaves; they merely changed the slaves' residence: new boundaries. Second, the Israelites could buy slaves from among strangers residing in the land. But there was no authorization to buy slaves from other Israelites. This means that slaves in one Israelite family could not be sold to another family. They became part of a family's permanent inheritance.

There is no question about it: Mosaic law legalized inter-generational slavery. If Leviticus 25:44–46 is still binding, then the enslavement of those who not part of the covenant by those who are is legal in

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

God's eyes. Enslaved converts who make a profession of faith after their enslavement, or the descendants of slaves, would still remain permanently bound. But no Bible commentator today wants to conclude such things, unlike almost all commentators, Jews and Christians, up to the 1750s. The exegetical question facing every Bible commentator is this: Has this law been explicitly annulled by the New Covenant? If not, then on what explicitly biblical ethical basis is it no longer binding?

Modern man rebels against this thought, just as he rebels against the thought of an eternal lake of fire: no exit from God's cosmic torture chamber. Even Christians are squeamish about this. They prefer not to think about its implications. They also do not like to think about the fact that God's Mosaic law authorized slavery, but it did. In fact, the decline of Western man's faith in the reality of eternal damnation loosely paralleled the decline of his faith in the moral legitimacy of slavery.

Prior to the 1750s, virtually the whole world believed in the moral legitimacy of slavery. The ideal of abolition came quite late to Western Civilization, in the era of the Enlightenment.² Yet it was not Enlightenment rationalists who proposed the idea. It was only with the decision of a handful of members of the Society of Friends (Quakers) that the ideal of abolition as morally obligatory began to be spread by an identifiable organized group. This began at the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in 1758. The group agreed to cease doing business with members who bought or sold black slaves. In 1761, the London Yearly Meeting ruled that Quaker slave dealers should be disowned. Professor Davis comments on the remarkable speed with which slavery fell out of favor after millennia of acceptance:

As late as the 1770s, when the Quaker initiative finally led to a rash of militant antislavery publications on both sides of the Atlantic, no realistic leader could seriously contemplate the abolition of New World slavery—except, on the analogy with European slavery and serfdom, over a span of centuries. Yet in 1807, only thirty-four years after a delegation of British Quakers had failed to persuade the Lord of Trade to allow Virginia to levy a prohibitive tax on further slave imports, Britain outlawed the African slave trade. Twenty-six years later, Britain emancipated some 780,000 colonial slaves, paying 20 million pounds compensation to their supposed owners. Only ninety years separated the first, cautious moves of the Philadelphia Quakers from the emancipation edicts of France and Denmark (1848), which left Brazil, Cuba, Surinam, and the southern United States as the only important slaveholding societies in the New World. It was barely a century after the founding of the London Society for Effecting the Abolition of the Slave Trade (1787), sixty-one years after the final abolition of slavery in New York State (1827), that Brazil freed the last black slaves in the New World. . . . From any historical perspective, this was a stupendous transformation. . . . From the distance of the late twentieth century, however, the progress of emancipation from the 1780s to the 1880s is one of the most extraordinary events in history.³

2. In some cultures, most notably Islamic, the idea has yet to take deep root.

In Tools of Dominion, I devoted over one hundred pages to a discussion of the biblical theology of slavery.⁴ It would be unwise for me to reproduce that chapter here. It was appropriate to include such a discussion in a book dealing with the case laws of Exodus, because the case laws begin with a consideration of the purchase of a slave (Ex. 21:2–6). Slaves on their way out of a generation of servitude and into freedom would have been interested in a law governing slavery. I here reprint part of that chapter, but with modifications noted by the brackets.

* * * * *

B. The Economics of Israelite Slavery⁵

The jubilee land tenure law, when enforced, made it impossible for any family to amass permanently large land holdings. It is usually assumed by commentators that the jubilee land law was never enforced, but this is debatable. The sabbatical year of rest for the land was clearly not enforced, which was the reason God gave for sending Israel into captivity (Jer. 50:34; I Chron. 36:21).⁶ The jubilee land law was tied to the sabbatical year: it was to follow the seventh sabbatical year (Lev. 25:8–9). Nevertheless, the repeated unwillingness of Israelites to sell their land to those outside the family, most notably Naboth's refusal to

3. David Brion Davis, Slavery and Human Progress (New York: Oxford University Press, 1984), p. 108.

4. Gary North, Tools of Dominion (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/gntools>)

5. Ibid., pp. 140–44.

6. The sabbatical year was honored in the inter-testamental era. In 162 B.C., during his brief one-year reign, King Antiochus V (Eupator) “made peace with the people of Bethsura, who abandoned the town, having no more food there to withstand a siege, as it was a sabbatical year when the land was left fallow” (I Macc. 6:49, NEB).

sell his land to King Ahab (I Kings 21), indicates that the state must have enforced some sort of prohibition against the permanent sale of a family's land. Ahab stole Naboth's inheritance. Jezebel had him accused of blaspheming God and the king (I Kings 21:13), but this would not have been sufficient to disinherit Naboth's children or at least his nearest kinsman. The king had to steal the land (vv. 15–16). What may have taken place was the continuing refusal of greedy owners to rest their land one year in seven, but also the insistence of heirs that the jubilee year be honored, at least with respect to the redistribution of family land. Both decisions are consistent with the assumption of land hunger in a predominantly agricultural economy.

1. Small Plots of Land

A family could lease a neighboring piece of property for up to half a century, but then it reverted to the original family. We know that large families are a sign of God's covenantal blessing (Ps. 127:3–5). The larger that Israel's families grew in response to the nation's covenantal faithfulness to God, the smaller each family's inherited land holding would become. This made it economically impossible for any branch of a family to amass a large number of heathen slaves during periods of God's covenantal blessings, for it was illegal to amass permanently the large tracts of land that were necessary for the support of slaves.⁷

Thus, at the beginning of each jubilee year, when all land holdings reverted to the heirs of the original land-owners, most [rural] heathen slaves would have been released [or sold] by their owners, whether or not the law allowed them to retain ownership of them indefinitely. Heathens were allowed to buy homes in walled cities, where the jubilee land laws did not apply (Lev. 25:29–33). Those heathens who remained in slavery would have been parceled out among inheriting Israelite children when the heirs returned to their share of the family's traditional lands, thereby reducing the possibility of large-scale slave gang labor. It would also have increased the likelihood of manumission: freedom for slaves whose economic productivity, without large land holdings, would have dropped sharply. In other words, by reducing Israel's per capita capital (land), the jubilee land tenure law was designed to reduce agricultural labor productivity in Israel.⁸ This was the whole idea: to encourage covenantal dominion outside the land by encouraging Israelite emigration.

7. Patrick Fairbairn, The Revelation of Law in Scripture (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan, [1868] 1957), p. 118.

8. The law of diminishing returns applied to labor: too much labor in relation to land.

This economic link between the size of land holdings and the economic feasibility of large-scale gang slavery is the simplest explanation for God's inclusion of the heathen slave laws within the section of Leviticus that presents the jubilee land tenure laws. One possible reason why the Bible offers no example of the nation's honoring of the jubilee land distribution laws is that politically influential owners of large slave gangs recognized that the economic value of their slave holdings would be reduced drastically if they had to return their land to the original families. Thus, any significant increase in the inter-generational slavery of heathens would have testified to a refusal by the judges to enforce the original jubilee land distribution agreement that had been agreed to by all the tribes prior to the conquest. A growing population of permanent foreign slaves would therefore have been a visible warning to Israel that they were disobeying God's law. This was the same visible warning that God had given to Egypt (Ex. 1:12, 20).

Slavery very clearly was not supposed to become a major institution in Israel. The larger the population grew—a promised blessing of God—the more valuable the land would become: increased demand. The more expensive the land became, the less would be the return from economic rents produced by an investment in slaves. Free laborers and tenant farmers would compete to work at low wages and low returns. By lowering the economic return from slaves, this law was designed to reduce the demand for slaves.

[There was a way around this limitation: some form of cooperative agriculture. If family members pooled their rural inheritances operationally, allowing a common administrator to employ slaves, larger plots could have been maintained. But the gangs of slaves that were common to the American South prior to 1865 were employed only on large plantations, which could not exist in Israel when the jubilee was enforced.]

Without cheap land, or increasingly productive land, permanent agricultural slavery is unlikely to be maintained long term.⁹ Under circumstances of increasing land scarcity, the reasons for holding slaves would then be more consumption-oriented than production-oriented: slaves as status symbols, i.e., consumer goods rather than producer goods.

9. Evsey D. Domar, "The Causes of Slavery or Serfdom: A Hypothesis," Journal of Economic History, XXX (1970), pp. 18–32.

2. The American South's Fertile Land

Because chattel slavery remained profitable in the American South prior to 1860, there is no need to resort to the thesis of slaves as merely status symbols. They were status symbols, surely, but they were also profitable. Where, then, was the South's cheap land, if this economic thesis is correct? There is evidence that it was the continuing development of the fertile lands in the West South Central region of the South—Alabama to east Texas—that kept slave prices high throughout the South, since slave owners who owned less fertile lands could profitably export slaves to the region with more fertile lands.¹⁰ But if cheap land is basic to profitable slavery, did the slave owners in the British West Indies suffer losses when land became scarce? The tentative answer is yes, since it was only when new land could be brought under cultivation that the Caribbean economies grew. The Genoveses wrote: "Thus, as early as the period 1670–90, overproduction plunged the sugar economies of Brazil and the Caribbean into crises that ruined both planters and their creditors. The pattern recurred many times. . . . When Caribbean sugar production ran afoul of market gluts, the ensuing crises led to a shift of resources to fresher land in newly developed colonies. Thus, one factor, 'land,' alone accounted for the regional economy's ability to survive the periodic purges of the market generated by the tendency toward overproduction."¹¹ They concluded: "So long as land remained available at prices unthinkable low by European standards—so long as colonial settlers faced empty spaces or spaces that could be emptied by a controlled dose of genocide—resources would be shifted, and the grim wastefulness of the system as a whole would remain disguised."¹²

What we must recognize is that the whole economic thrust of the jubilee land tenure laws, when coupled with God's promise of population growth for national obedience, was to push the Israelites out of the Promised Land, and therefore outside the geographical boundaries where the jubilee land law, including its slave laws, operated. The jubilee law's goal was world missions and covenantal dominion, not the permanent enslavement of heathens inside tiny Israel.¹³

10. This was an important aspect of the argument by Alfred H. Conrad and John R. Meyer in their classic 1958 article, "The Economics of Slavery in the Antebellum South," Part III, ibid., reprinted many times. There is not much debate about this: Stanley L. Engerman, "The Effects of Slavery upon the Southern Economy: A Review of the Recent Debate," in Hugh G. J. Aitkin (ed.), Did Slavery Pay? (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1971), pp. 318–20. Both essays are reprinted here, as they are in Robert W. Fogel and Stanley L. Engerman (eds.), The Reinterpretation of American Economic History (New York: Harper & Row, 1971).

11. Elizabeth Fox-Genovese and Eugene D. Genovese, Fruits of Merchant Capital: Slavery and Bourgeois Property in the Rise and Expansion of Capitalism (New York: Oxford University Press, 1983), pp. 45–46.

12. Ibid., p. 44.

Neither the Roman Republic nor the Roman Empire, as a pagan society already in spiritual bondage, came under the terms of the jubilee land tenure law. That law applied to Israel because of the specific terms of the military spoils system of land distribution that families had agreed to prior to Israel's invasion of Canaan (Num. 36). Rome developed the latifundia, the huge family land holdings that apparently supported the slave gang system. The Roman land tenure system may not actually have produced slave gangs, if land holdings were divided into smaller units within the latifundia. Scholars still debate the issue. In any case, a legal order that permits the long-term amassing of inheritable land, and does so through such restrictions on inheritance as primogeniture (eldest son inherits) and entail (the prohibition against the permanent sale of a family's land), makes economically possible the creation of huge plantations.¹⁴ Such permanent, inheritable land holdings, if accompanied by a legal order that permits lifetime slavery, can lead to the creation of slave gangs whenever market conditions make gang labor profitable. On the other hand, whenever the legal principle of "all sons inherit" or "all children inherit" is enforced, it becomes nearly impossible to create an agricultural economy that is based on the widespread family ownership of large gangs of slaves. Such was to have been the case in ancient Israel, for the eldest son was limited to an inheritance of only a double portion of his father's assets (Deut. 21:17). . . .

C. Slavery and Hell¹⁵

The doctrine of perpetual slavery is nothing special when compared to the doctrine of eternal damnation. In fact, perpetual slavery is an institutional testimony to the reality of eternal damnation. It should direct the slave's attention to the fate of his eternal soul. (It should also

13. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 1.

14. So, for that matter, does corporate ownership of land, either by ecclesiastical or state agencies, or by a corporate distribution of share ownership.

15. North, Tools of Dominion, pp. 166–68.

direct the master's attention to the same issue.) Slavery was designed by God to be a means of evangelism in the Old Testament. The question can therefore legitimately be raised: Is it a means of evangelism in New Testament times? For instance, why did Paul send the runaway slave Onesimus back to his master Philemon (the Epistle to Philemon)? But anyone who dares raise this obvious question today faces the verbal wrath of Christian pietists and antinomians everywhere, not to mention secular humanists.

Slavery embarrasses Christians, yet earthly slavery can sometimes offer hope. Eternal slavery is hopelessness incarnate. Eternal slavery—without productivity, without hope of escape, and with perpetual pain—is a good description of hell. Is it any wonder that the doctrine of eternal damnation is de-emphasized in preaching today? Is it any wonder that God is spoken of mostly as a God of love, and seldom as the God of indescribable eternal wrath? D. L. Moody, the turn-of-the-century American evangelist, set the pattern by generally refusing to preach about hell. He made the preposterous statement that “Terror never brought a man in yet.”¹⁶ That a major evangelist could make such a theologically unsupported statement and expect anyone to take him seriously testifies to the theologically debased state of modern evangelicalism. It has gotten no better since he said it.

Consider the theological implications of Moody's statement. God created the place of eternal terror. He revealed His plans concerning final judgment in the New Testament, unlike the Old, which is very nearly silent concerning the details of the afterlife. If God does not intend that the terror of final judgment bring people to repentance, then hell is exclusively a means of God's vengeance, for supposedly it in no way brings anyone to repentance this side of death. Moody was implicitly arguing that there is no grace attached in history to the doctrine of hell; therefore, hell must be exclusively a means of punishment. But nothing in the creation is exclusively a means of punishment for those still living. There is grace to living men in every act of God and in every biblical doctrine. There is grace attached to the doctrine of hell; people sometimes do get scared into repentance. Any warning of imminent judgment before God's final judgment can serve as a means of personal or institutional restoration. All judgments in history are simply testimonies to the coming final judgment, and therefore all of 16. Cited by Stanley N. Gundry, Love Them In: The Proclamation Theology of Dwight L. Moody (Chicago, 1976), p. 99.

God's temporal judgments offer both cursing and blessing.¹⁷

God punishes deceased covenant-breakers forever, not in order to reform them, but because they refused to be reformed by God's saving grace in history. Hell is not a reform school; it is a place of eternal retribution.¹⁸ God therefore holds ethical rebels in perpetual slavery. God is in this sense the Cosmic Slaveholder. Rebels beyond the grave do not work in order to please this Cosmic Slaveholder; they are stripped of the power to work, for labor is an aspect of dominion. They serve Him exclusively as recipients of His incomparable wrath. We may not like the idea, but this is what He says He has done and will do. No one ever escapes God's eternal slave system if he departs from this life as a moral slave to Satan rather than a moral bondservant to God. There is no "underground railroad" out of slavery in hell. This is why Christians offer the gospel of salvation to rebels against God: to enable them to escape eternal punishment and eternal slavery to the Sovereign Master of the eternal fiery whip.

In history, we are either involuntary slaves to God or voluntary bondservants to God. Both conditions are permanent beyond the grave. We either serve Him willingly in history, openly acknowledging our status as unprofitable servants in His covenantal household,¹⁹ or else beyond this life we will experience perpetual lashes from His judgmental whip as eternal slaves without hope. There is no middle ground. There is no alternative scenario. Being a bondservant to God is the essence of freedom. Being a slave to God is the essence of hell. Choose this day which condition of servitude you prefer. . . .

D. Jesus' Annulment of the Jubilee Land Laws²⁰

The fulfillment of the jubilee year by Jesus at the outset of His ministry (Luke 4:17–21) made plain the liberating aspects of the rule of Christ in history.²¹ He announced His ministry with the reading of Isaiah 61, "to preach delivery of the captives" (Luke 4:18). His intention 17. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 4. North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 4.

18. I have written in greater detail regarding the biblical doctrine of hell in my Publisher's Epilogue to David Chilton's book, The Great Tribulation (Ft. Worth: Dominion, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dctrib>)

19. "So likewise ye, when ye shall have done all those things which are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants: we have done that which was our duty to do" (Luke 17: 10). See North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 41.

20. North, Tools of Dominion, pp. 144–47.

21. Gary North, Liberating Planet Earth: An Introduction to Biblical Blueprints (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gnlpe>)

was clearly the spiritual liberation of His people, and this leads to progressive maturity in the faith, which in turn is supposed to lead to liberation out of chattel slavery, if offered by the owner (I Cor. 7: 21b). We have our “ears pierced” (Deut. 15:17) spiritually by Christ; we become permanent adopted sons of His household. Yet even in the case of Leviticus 25, God’s goal was always liberation. These pagans were being purchased out of their covenantal slavery to demonic religion. They were being redeemed (bought back). They were being given an opportunity to hear the gospel and see it in operation in households covenanted to God. They were being given an opportunity to renounce paganism and thereby escape eternal slavery in the lake of fire.

Obviously, if the legal provision that allowed Israelite families to retain the lifetime services of heathen slaves, as well as to transfer ownership of the heathens’ children to the Israelites’ children, is severed from the jubilee land tenure law, then the economic possibility of establishing slave gangs becomes a reality. The legal restriction against the permanent amassing of land disappears. Thus, to argue that the lifetime slave-holding provisions of Leviticus 25 were not an integral part of the jubilee land tenure system is to argue that the history of chattel slavery in the West was in principle sanctioned by the Bible. I am arguing the opposite: the lifetime slave-holding provisions of Leviticus 25 were an integral aspect of Israel’s jubilee land tenure laws, and therefore when God annulled the latter, He also annulled the former. By transferring legal title to His kingdom to the gentile world (Matt. 21:43), and by visibly annulling Israel’s legal title to the land of Palestine at the time of the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70,²² God thereby also annulled the Israelite land tenure laws. What had been a God-approved spoils system for a unique historical situation—the military conquest of Canaan by Israel—became a dead letter of biblical law after the fall of Jerusalem.

Constantine announced in 315 that slaves who had been condemned to work in the mines or as gladiators were to be branded on the hands or legs, not on the face.²³ This act of comparative charity led the owners, who had formerly branded their slaves, to have metal collars put around their slaves’ necks. Clearly, Constantine was no aboli-

22. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>). Cf. Chilton, Great Tribulation.

23. Theodosian Code 9:40:2; cited in Finley, Ancient Slavery and Modern Ideology (New York: Viking, 1980), p. 127.

tionist. Later legislation under Christian rulers in Rome and Byzantium was not noted for any tendency toward abolitionism.

The Christian West did not honor God's abolition of permanent slavery through Christ's fulfillment of the jubilee year. The Renaissance revived the example of the Roman Empire: reinstituting slavery to farm sugar plantations—a new agricultural development—in the second half of the fourteenth century.²⁴ The Western hemisphere's plantations from the fifteenth century onward, and especially the American South in the nineteenth century, made slave gang agriculture profitable again. The church did not recognize that God no longer allows His people and those under His civil covenant the legal right to amass slaves and deed them to the next generation.

It was the creation of huge land grants in Virginia especially, but also in other southern colonies in the United States, from the late seventeenth century through the eighteenth, that initially made economically possible North American Negro slavery, with its extensive use of gang labor. The Virginia legislature repeatedly made land grants to politically favored families of many thousands of acres per family.²⁵ In New England, the towns did not make such huge land grants. They multiplied towns rather than allowing individual families to amass huge tracts of land.²⁶ Without large plantations, slave gang labor was not economically feasible in the New England area. While New Englanders were heavily involved in the slave trade as owners of shipping facilities and as investors in the sea trade, they were seldom owners of slaves.²⁷ In 1652, Rhode Island actually passed a law against Negro slavery, but there is no evidence that the law was ever enforced. Newport, Rhode Island, became the center of the slave trade in the next century.²⁸

* * * * *

24. Davis, Slavery and Human Progress, pp. 59–66.

25. Leonard Woods Larabee, Conservatism in Early American History (Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press Great Seal Books, [1948] 1962), pp. 32–36.

26. John W. Reps, Town Planning in Frontier America (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, [1965] 1969), ch. 5; Sumner Chilton Powell, Puritan Village: The Formation of a New England Town (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1963] 1965), chaps. 2, 8, 9; Kenneth A. Lockridge, A New England Town: The First Hundred Years (New York: Norton, 1970), pp. 10–13, 70–72.

27. Winthrop D. Jordan, White Over Black: American Attitudes Toward the Negro, 1550–1812 (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1968), pp. 66–71.

28. Charles M. Andrews, The Colonial Period of American History, 4 vols. (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1936] 1964), II, p. 30.

E. The Ethics of Slavery

An Anglo-American economic historian is tempted to dwell on the economics of Anglo-American slavery and Anglo-American abolitionism in relation to Anglo-American capitalism, topics whose scholarly literature seems to grow exponentially year by year.²⁹ But the far more important and more lasting question is the relationship between Christianity and slavery, which in the context of the post-medieval West, is related to the question of Christianity and racism. Here is a blot on the church of Jesus Christ that appears, in retrospect, to be the product of an incomparable moral blindness, yet for many centuries it was not recognized as such by Christianity. Of course, it was also not recognized to be a blot on Judaism, Islam, or any other major religion. Slavery throughout man's history was universal until the nineteenth century. But because the United States fought a civil war over the question of the constitutional legality of abolitionism (1861–65), and also because the United States was (and remains) the nation in which Protestant fundamentalism has had the largest representation, the issue of the close connection between Bible-affirming Protestantism and Negro slavery refuses to go away. Forrest G. Wood, a dedicated and self-conscious secular historian and the son of a conservative Protestant family, has described this Christian racist mentality well: the arrogance of faith.³⁰ What went wrong?

What went wrong, as I argued in Tools of Dominion and also argue here, was the refusal of Christians to take seriously the full implications of Jesus Christ's annulment of the jubilee laws (Luke 4). When the jubilee ceased, the only legitimate biblical justification for permanent servitude also ceased. But Christians have not taken seriously

29. Seymour Drescher, Capitalism and Antislavery: British Mobilization in Comparative Perspective (New York: Oxford University Press, 1987); Christine Bolt and Seymour Drescher (eds.), Anti-Slavery, Religion, and Reform (Hamden, Connecticut: Archon, 1980); David Eltis, Economic Growth and the Ending of the Transatlantic Slave Trade (New York: Oxford University Press, 1987); Roger L. Ransom, Conflict and Compromise: The Political Economy of Slavery, Emancipation, and the American Civil War (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1989); Barbara L. Solow (ed.), Slavery and the Rise of the Atlantic System (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1991); Robert William Fogel, Without Consent or Contract: The Rise and Fall of American Slavery (New York: Norton, 1989). A week before I completed this chapter, Fogel was awarded half of the one million dollar 1993 Nobel Prize in economics, which he shared with economic historian Douglas North (no relation).

30. Forrest G. Wood, The Arrogance of Faith: Christianity and Race in America from the Colonial Era to the Twentieth Century (New York: Knopf, 1990). On his self-conscious secularism, see page xx.

either the jubilee year or its New Covenant annulment. Those few who do take it seriously, if only as an ethical model, generally deny that it has been completely annulled forever. This blindness toward the Mosaic law, its context, and its functions led to the near-universal acceptance by the church of the moral legitimacy of slavery.

1. A Southern Baptist Defends Slavery

In 1856, less than a century after the decision of the Philadelphia Quakers to place negative economic sanctions on those members of their fellowship who owned slaves or trafficked in them, Rev. Thornton Stringfellow, a Baptist from Virginia, wrote a widely distributed essay, "A Scriptural View," in which he appealed to the Bible in defense of slavery. Rev. Stringfellow appealed to Abraham's ownership of servants, Joseph's enslavement of the Egyptians during the famine, and Job's ownership of servants. He also appealed to Leviticus 25:45–46. He noted that not one prophet arose in Israel to challenge the legitimacy of involuntary heathen slavery.³¹ He went on to argue: "It is from God himself; it authorizes that people, to whom he had become king and law-giver, to purchase men and women as property; to hold them and their posterity in bondage; and to will them to their children as a possession forever; and more, it allows foreign slaveholders to settle and live among them; to breed slaves and sell them."³²

This is correct but misleading. Leviticus 25 did not authorize the breeding of slaves for sale by citizens of the holy commonwealth. When an Israelite household bought a slave, that slave had to remain in the household of that family until he died, or was released voluntarily, or was disfigured through battery by the owner, or was adopted by another Israelite household. The same was true of the slave's children. Leviticus 25:44–45 is clear: Israelites could buy slaves only from foreigners, either outside the nation or resident aliens dwelling inside the nation's borders. Thus, even on the assumption that this law was still in force, no one in the American South who claimed to be a United States citizen could lawfully appeal to this text to justify breeding slaves for sale.

Stringfellow saw that the previous Levitical law, which prohibited the Israelites from compelling their fellow Israelites from serving as permanent bondservants, is proof that the heathen slave could be treated differently under the Mosaic law's provisions. The Israelite servant went out in the jubilee.³³ Having said this, Strinfellow then went to the New Testament: "I affirm then, first, (and no man denies,) that Jesus Christ has not abolished slavery by a prohibitory command: and second, I affirm, he has introduced no new moral principle which can work its destruction, under the gospel dispensation; . . ."³⁴ He referred to several passages in Peter's and Paul's epistles that give rules to servants.³⁵ He ignored Luke 4:18–23.

31. Thornton Stringfellow, "A Scriptural View of Slavery" (1856), in Slavery Defended: The Views of the Old South, ed. Eric L. McKittrick (Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1963), p. 92.

32. Ibid., pp. 92–93.

2. Judicial Continuity

A hundred and one years later, Professor John Murray of Westminster Theological Seminary wrote this Politically Incorrect statement: "But though slavery as the property of one man in the labour of another is not intrinsically wrong, it does not follow that we ought to seek to perpetuate slavery. Though the Scripture exercises an eloquent reserve in refraining from the proscription of the institution, and though it does not lay down principles which evince its intrinsic wrong, nevertheless the Scripture does encourage and require the promotion of those conditions which make slavery unnecessary."³⁶ Lest he be mistaken for a would-be confessor to Simon Legree, he wrote in a footnote: "The thesis that slavery is not intrinsically wrong does not in the least justify the 'gigantic evils' frequently accompanying the institution." He praised William Wilberforce and his evangelical Clapham Sect of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries.³⁷ But Murray's exposition is, theologically speaking, a mild-mannered, guarded, but nonetheless unmistakable condemnation of nineteenth-century abolitionism: the only abolitionism that any American remembers. On the question of slavery, Wilberforce was an absolutist; it was his moral absolutism that attracted his followers and steeled their will to do political battle in England for over four decades, despite seemingly impervious political resistance. The Clapham Sect would have rejected Murray's exposition as in principle on the side of the slave holders. Abolitionism's goal, after all, was abolition. It was not the reform of

33. Ibid., p. 93.

34. Ibid., p. 94.

35. Ibid., pp. 95–97.

36. John Murray, Principles of Conduct: Aspects of Biblical Ethics (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, [1957] 1964), p. 100.

37. Ibid., p. 101n.

slavery that Wilberforce called for, but its permanent, universal abolition by civil law.

Murray did not refer to Leviticus 25. Had he done so, he would have raised a whole series of issues that he was not prepared to discuss in a short chapter on labor. The main issue that he did not choose to raise was the question of judicial continuity. If slavery has not been judicially annulled by the New Testament, then by what judicial standard should civil judges evaluate the legitimacy or illegitimacy of any particular instance of permanent slavery? He stated plainly that the abolitionist impulse is not biblical. This question then becomes theologically inescapable: By what standard? By what standard are specific cases of slavery to be judged?

Murray was skirting the issue, just as several generations of Christian ethicists have skirted it. Prior to the American Civil War, the Calvinist scholar Moses Stuart of Andover Seminary in 1835 appealed to Leviticus 25:44–46 as the proof text that refuted the Christian abolitionists' claim that slavery is sinful in itself.³⁸ Yet Stuart personally regarded slavery as an institution that should and would gradually fade away without legislative pressure. His position was morally ambiguous.³⁹ He was not alone in his ambiguity.

During the Civil War, Bibliotheca Sacra, the Andover journal, published three essays by Elijah P. Barrows, whose exegetical strategy was to ignore the Old Testament texts on slavery and then claim that the New Testament's ethic was against it. He moved from the text to an alleged Gospel spirit.⁴⁰ This was close to the Christian abolitionists' pre-War view.

Charles Hodge, the leading conservative Presbyterian theologian in America, 1825–1877, author of Systematic Theology (1871–72), took an even more neutral position than Stuart's prior to the War: slavery as not sinful in itself, but subject to legislative reforms to do away with certain evil aspects of slavery as then practiced.⁴¹ When the Southern congregations in 1861 seceded from the Northern Presbyterian Church, both the Old School and the New School denominations, thereby matching the secession of the Southern states from the United 38. Robert Bruce Mullin, "Biblical Critics and the Battle Over Slavery," Journal of Presbyterian History, LXI (Summer 1983), p. 215. Cf. J. H. Giltner, "Moses Stuart and the Slavery Controversy: A Study in the Failure of Moderation," Journal of Religious Thought, XVIII (1961), p. 31.

39. Ibid., pp. 216–17.

40. Ibid., p. 220.

41. Ibid., pp. 218–19.

States, Hodge wrote five Princeton Review essays critical of Southern slavery, calling for its abolition, but still he refused to say that the Bible condemns slavery. He appealed to nationalism instead.⁴² This theological compromise led to the destruction of Old School Presbyterianism after its reunion of the pro-abolition New School wing in 1869.⁴³ In 1875, biblical higher criticism began to invade the United States and its theological seminaries. Mullin wrote of the Unitarians' response to the Calvinists' exegetical ambivalence on slavery: "Bound by their dogmatic presuppositions and their belief that the Bible contained a perfect moral law, they were unable to deal with the biblical ambivalence towards slavery. The obvious solution . . . was to abandon the belief in the infallibility of Scripture, and instead to acknowledge the historical relativity of the biblical record."⁴⁴

Here is the exegetical problem: if there is unmodified judicial continuity between the Mosaic law and today, then there is no biblically legitimate justification for the compulsory abolition of chattel slavery. This conclusion would also involve pulling into the New Covenant era all the other laws governing slavery. The ethicists shudder at this prospect. Most of them remain prudently silent. Others search for a principle of judicial discontinuity, but they never find it. Why not? Because they do not analyze contextually the only law in the Bible that authorizes inter-generational chattel slavery. What is its context? The jubilee laws.

F. The Jubilee Context

It is my contention that the laws governing permanent heathen slaves were an unbreakable part of the jubilee laws. If I am correct, this means that the exegetical case in favor of the annulment of the heathen slave laws rests on the New Testament's annulment of all of the jubilee laws. It is also my contention that if the heathen slave laws are not subsumed under the jubilee laws, then there is no New Testament case for the abolition of chattel slavery. On the contrary, abolitionism itself would be anti-biblical, since the Mosaic law clearly authorized slavery. Abolitionism's universal condemnation of slavery would then go against the Bible's authorization of a certain type of inter-generational chattel slavery. Abolitionism would then be sinful, which John Murray refused to write but obviously believed.

42. Ibid., pp. 221–22.

43. Gary North, Crossed Fingers: How the Liberals Captured the Presbyterian Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1996), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/gncrossed>)

44. Mullin, p. 222.

There are Christian social analysts today, on the right and the left, who call for the reintroduction of the jubilee laws. The conservatives want the jubilee's law regarding debt repudiation, while the liberationists want its laws of land redistribution, which they think should be applied to all forms of privately owned (but never state-owned) property. No one, however, is publicly calling for the restoration of inter-generational chattel slavery. This is a typical example of smorgasbord Christianity: "A little of this, a little of that, but not that over there, certainly; I never touch the stuff."

To understand the law of inter-generational heathen slavery, we first must understand the purposes of the jubilee law. Its overriding purpose was judicial: to create an inter-generational link between the families and tribes of the conquest with their heirs, culminating in the advent of the promised Seed.

Citizenship was by covenant: by circumcision and by participation in the national feasts, especially Passover. But this was not sufficient; household slaves also were circumcised (Gen. 17:12–13) and participated in the Passover (Ex. 12:44). What identified a citizen in Israel was his eligibility for numbering in the army of Israel. This made him a free man, or as citizens are often called, a freeman. Who was eligible? Adult circumcised men who were: (1) members in good standing in the church, and (2) not under bondage. This would have included circumcised men who lived in walled cities, whether or not they owned real estate, and heirs of the original families that conquered Canaan. An inheritance in rural land was a covenant-keeper's guaranteed legal status as a freeman. He could permanently lose this civil status only through ecclesiastical excommunication, i.e., covenant-breaking.

The naturalized citizen was no less a citizen. He could not be enslaved even though he had no inheritance in the land. The inheritance proved that a man was a citizen, but it was not necessary that every citizen have an inheritance. The inheritance was proof of citizenship; it was not the only proof. Proof of adoption was equally valid.

What this points to is the centrality of the doctrine of adoption in Israel's civil order. The doctrine of adoption was placed by Ezekiel's revelation at the center of Israel's history. Israel had been adopted by God as His wife.

Now when I passed by thee, and looked upon thee, behold, thy time was the time of love; and I spread my skirt over thee, and covered thy nakedness: yea, I swore unto thee, and entered into a covenant with thee, saith the Lord GOD, and thou becamest mine. Then washed I thee with water; yea, I thoroughly washed away thy blood from thee, and I anointed thee with oil. I clothed thee also with brodered work, and shod thee with badgers' skin, and I girded thee about with fine linen, and I covered thee with silk. I decked thee also with ornaments, and I put bracelets upon thy hands, and a chain on thy neck. And I put a jewel on thy forehead, and earrings in thine ears, and a beautiful crown upon thine head. Thus wast thou decked with gold and silver; and thy raiment was of fine linen, and silk, and brodered work; thou didst eat fine flour, and honey, and oil: and thou wast exceeding beautiful, and thou didst prosper into a kingdom. And thy renown went forth among the heathen for thy beauty: for it was perfect through my comeliness, which I had put upon thee, saith the Lord GOD (Ezek. 16:8–14).

For the convert to Judaism, adoption was the only way into guaranteed legal status as a free man. This could be family adoption. An Israelite family could adopt him and give him a portion of the family's inheritance. This is why the Jews were furious with Jesus' gospel of redemption: it offered full legal status as free men to any person through adoption. They understood exactly what He was doing legally. Paul wrote of his brethren in the flesh: "For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh: Who are Israelites; to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises; Whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came, who is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen" (Rom. 9:3–5). The Jews had been the adopted ones, and now the gentiles would be, too. All of this liberating judicial inheritance would come to the gentiles through adoption by Christ. He was offering them liberation through His redemption. He was buying them out of slavery—slavery to sin above all, but also slavery in the broadest sense.

Christians should acknowledge that Jesus Christ was the ultimate abolitionist. He paid the slaves' ultimate Owner the price required: the sacrifice even to death of a perfectly righteous man. But because those redeemed by Christ have been legally adopted, they can never again fall into the ultimate judicial status of servitude: sin and eternal death. "And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose. For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brethren" (Rom. 8:28–29). The issue is judicial immunity: "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth. Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us" (Rom. 8:33–34).

G. Slavery as a Model of Sin

Heathen residents of Israel could be permanently enslaved to repay their debts. The presence of permanent slaves in Israelite households was a visible testimony of what it means to be outside the inheritance of God. Slave status was like a permanent sign in front of a person's eyes: "No Exit." This was the representative mark of eternal punishment. There is no exit for Adam's heirs apart from adoption into the family of God through Jesus Christ, the firstborn Son. The Seed—the culmination of the Abrahamic promise—lawfully inherited the land. Elect gentiles are heirs of this promise. But the focus of this promise is liberation from sin. Those who trust in the law for their inheritance are disinherited, replaced by those adopted by grace. This is why Jesus' message outraged the Jews. Paul spelled out the message in its judicial context: promise, inheritance, and seed. He began his discussion with the redeemed person's escape from the imputation of Adam's sin.

Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin. Cometh this blessedness then upon the circumcision only, or upon the uncircumcision also? for we say that faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness. How was it then reckoned? when he was in circumcision, or in uncircumcision? Not in circumcision, but in uncircumcision. And he received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had yet being uncircumcised: that he might be the father of all them that believe, though they be not circumcised; that righteousness might be imputed unto them also: And the father of circumcision to them who are not of the circumcision only, but who also walk in the steps of that faith of our father law, but Abraham, which he had being yet uncircumcised. For the promise, that he should be the heir of the world, was not to Abraham, or to his seed, through the righteousness of faith. For if they which are of the law be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect: Because the law worketh wrath: for where no law is, there is no transgression. Therefore it is of faith, that it might be by grace; to the end the promise might be sure to all the seed; not to that only which is of the law, but to that also which is of the faith of Abraham; who is the father of us all, (As it is written, I have made thee a father of many nations,) before him whom he believed, even God, who quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be not as though they were. Who against hope believed in hope, that he might become the father of many nations; according to that which was spoken, So shall thy seed be (Rom. 4:8–18).

It was Jesus Christ who sacrificed His lawful inheritance in the Promised Land in order to bring His brethren through adoption into the family of God. The son of David abandoned His lawful inheritance for the sake of His elect. In doing this—delivering to them the promised inheritance—He gave them their irrevocable judicial status as freemen.

It is worth noting that the judicial precedent for this act was Joseph's decision to forfeit his status as the namesake of a tribe of Israel for the sake of his Egyptian sons, Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. 48). His father Jacob acquiesced to this transfer of inheritance: the name. Jacob thereby adopted into his household the foreign-born sons of an Egyptian mother: gentiles. Thus, even prior to the announcement regarding the promised Seed, Shiloh (Gen. 49:10), there had been an adoption by the patriarch which disinherited his son for the sake of this beloved son's gentile sons. Joseph, the kinsman-redeemer of Israel/Jacob, was the primary redemptive model in the Old Covenant for Jesus, the Kinsman-Redeemer of the New Israel in the New Covenant.

H. Outraged Slave Owners

This had always been the threat to slave owners in Israel: a man might adopt another man's slave as his own son, thereby providing him with a lawful inheritance. This legal status as an adopted son could not be taken away except through ecclesiastical excommunication, and even then, his sons would inherit.⁴⁵ At the sound of the trumpet in the jubilee year, the adopted slave would go free. It was the sound of the trumpet in the jubilee year that invoked every heir's legal status as a free man.

45. To inherit, the sons of an excommunicated man would have had to renounce their father's act of rebellion. In the case of a man who became a eunuch while in slavery, the law is silent regarding his sons. It seems to me that their father's legal status at the time of their conception would have been legally determinative. They would have inherited at the jubilee.

There was nothing that a slave owner could do to prevent this. If a lawful heir to the original conquest was willing to dilute his descendants' economic inheritance, he could share with anyone an undiluted legal inheritance. The point of the jubilee land law was not that it promised the heir a guarantee of some sort of economic future. Rather, it identified him and his descendants as free men. This was the ultimate form of civil liberation that any foreigner could hope for: to be an adopted son of a citizen of Israel. This grant of liberation could be offered to any slave. But there was no way that the slave could purchase this judicial grant of liberty. He had nothing of his own to give in exchange. His liberation was the result of an act of grace on the part of a head of an Israelite household.

The possibility of "formerly heathen" slave liberation always existed, but we have no record of any non-Levite who reduced his sons' economic inheritance for the sake of liberating his own slaves or other men's slaves through adoption. This indicates that God's covenant blessing of population growth was not granted for very long, and men clung to their few acres of land in the expectation that it was really worth more than the liberation of other men's slaves.

The slave, of course, could refuse this offer of liberation. He might prefer bondage to liberation, servitude to inheritance. If you regard this possibility of refusal as being so unlikely that it must be the speculation of a madman, consider the response of millions of sin-cursed slaves to the message of the gospel. They will not accept Christ's offer of liberation. They know that there are three conditions attached to this offer of freeman's status: acceptance of the adopting man's name; lifetime subordination to a priesthood; taking personal responsibility for one's actions. So it would have been in Mosaic Israel. First, the adopter would have a bad reputation among slave owners: the destroyer of the value of the lawful inheritance of slave-owning families. Second, the legal status of a freeman in Israel could be lost through excommunication. Third, his economic condition could sink quite low if he was incompetent.

But wouldn't a gentile slave have regarded these conditions as mild compared to lifetime servitude for himself and his heirs? Probably. Then what about an Israelite slave? But how could there have been any Israelite slaves? Didn't the jubilee law protect them from slavery? Not if they suffered excommunication and then fell into servitude through an economic crisis or some other negative sanction. This scenario is exactly what Jesus was threatening the Jews with if they rejected His offer of adoption: excommunication, negative sanctions, and slavery. He was the true High Priest who could lawfully excommunicate God's enemies, an authority that He demonstrated when He used whips against the money changers in the temple. Did the Jews heed His warning? Not many did. Did they assent to being adopted by Him? Not many did. But gentiles did.

I. Biblical Law: Death and Resurrection

At this point, I ask myself: Could there be any Christian who has read this far and still not understand what the jubilee law was all about? Then I ask myself: Why do the commentators emphasize the jubilee law's economic inheritance and its supposed ramifications, applications, and implications? Why have expositors who are masters of Hebrew, with years of experience, failed to recognize what is so incredibly obvious that it screams at the reader? The moment anyone puts three obvious pieces together, he concludes that any predominantly economic interpretation of the jubilee is ridiculous. The three pieces are: (1) God's covenantal blessing of population growth; (2) a fixed supply of rural real estate; (3) an ever-shrinking economic inheritance in rural land under the conditions of covenantal blessing. I ask myself: Why has this not been obvious? Why (as far as I know) am I the first expositor who has seen all this?⁴⁶

The most important factor in exegeting specific Old Testament laws is a presupposition: the Mosaic law is a coherent system that culminates in the work of Jesus Christ. Some Mosaic laws were buried with Him; others were resurrected with Him. Seed laws, food laws (priestly), and land laws stay buried. They are replaced, respectively, by the law of spiritual adoption, the Lord's Supper, and the worldwide kingdom of God. Once a person understands this simple preliminary set of hermeneutical rules, it takes only a little imagination and some attentive Bible reading to make sense of God's law.

This is not to say that making the real-world applications is easy. This may take a lifetime of study in just one field. But the judicial principles are easy to understand, and not very difficult to become familiar with.⁴⁷

46. If there have been others, their observations have not been picked up by the major commentators.

Conclusion

My conclusion in Chapter 4 of Tools of Dominion is my conclusion here, which I reprint below. I must add here an observation regarding freemanship. A freeman was eligible to serve in God's holy army. A slave was not a freeman. The jubilee law identified freemen: heirs of the original conquest. But they were not the only freemen in Israel. Circumcised resident aliens could be adopted by the tribes governing walled cities and by rural families.

Economically, the jubilee inheritance law, if enforced, would have tended toward the manumission of heathen slaves. The net cost of owning slaves would have grown high as the size of inherited agricultural parcels shrank in response to a growing population. The same would also have been true in walled cities. Thus, we must regard the judicial aspect of the heathen slave law as more important than the economic: the Mosaic law's identification of freeman status for land-owning heirs of the conquest, so long as they remained members of the ecclesiastical covenant.

When Jesus annulled the jubilee laws, He annulled the heathen slave law. He removed the judicial basis for inter-generational slavery. In this sense, Jesus was an abolitionist. While it took the church over 17 centuries to begin to preach abolition, this legal and moral position was nevertheless implied by the abolition of the jubilee law. When covenantal freemanship no longer tied in any way to landed inheritance within the boundaries of Israel, but came exclusively through spiritual adoption into God's family, there was no longer any covenantal purpose for inter-generational heathen slavery. There was also no longer any covenantal purpose for geographical Israel.

As for the economics of the heathen slave law, the Conclusion in Tools of Dominion suffices.⁴⁸

* * * * *

Servitude exists because sin exists and because God's judgments in history and eternity also exist. This was Augustine's argument a millennium and a half ago, an argument that was old when he offered it:

47. This is why God required that the Mosaic law be read to the assembled nation one year in seven (Deut. 31:10–13).

48. North, Tools of Dominion, pp. 203–6.

slavery is one of God's penal sanctions against sin.⁴⁹ Richard Baxter warned slave owners in 1673: "If their sin have enslaved them to you, yet Nature made them your equals."⁵⁰

Covenant theology teaches that slavery is an inescapable concept. Slavery's positive model is the indentured servant who buys his way out of poverty, or who is released in the sabbatical year or jubilee year. He learns the skills and worldview of dominion. He becomes self-governed under God, a free man. Slavery becomes a means of liberation when coupled with biblical ethics. The fundamental issue, as always, is ethical rather than economic. His ability to buy his way out is indicative of a change in his ethical behavior.

Slavery's negative model is God's judgment of covenant-breakers throughout eternity. He consigns them first to hell and then, at the resurrection, to the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14–15). God places people on the whipping block, and then He flogs them forever. Of course, what they actually experience for eternity is far more horrifying than the comparatively minor inconvenience of an eternal whip. I am only speaking figuratively of whips; the reality of eternal torment is far, far worse than mere lashes. Thus, the legal right of some people to enslave others under the limits imposed by God's revealed law is based on the ultimate legal right of God to impose eternal torment on covenant-breakers. Biblical servitude is a warning to sinners as well as a means of liberation.

What I am arguing is simple: it is not chattel slavery as such that appalls most covenant-breakers and their Christian ideological accomplices; rather, it is the doctrine of eternal punishment. The denial of the New Testament doctrine of eternal punishment, above all other denials, is the touchstone of modern humanism. It is this doctrine, above all others, that humanists reject. They stand, clenched fists waving in the air, and shout their defiance to God, "You have no authority over us!" But He does. They proclaim, "There is no hell!" But there is. And the lake of fire will be even worse.

For all his protests, modern man nevertheless still accepts the legitimacy of slavery. Humanists understand implicitly that the right to enslave others is an attribute of God's sovereignty. They declare the state as the true God of humanity, and then they proclaim the right of the state to enslave men.⁵¹ They have created the modern penal system, with its heavy reliance on imprisonment, yet have rejected the criminal's obligation to make restitution to the victim. They allow murderers to go free after a few years of imprisonment or incarceration in a mental institution, to murder again, for humanists are unwilling to allow the state to turn the murderer's soul over to God as rapidly as possible, so that God may deal with him eternally. They regard man as the sovereign judge, not God. They have invented the slave-master institution of the modern prison, while they have steadily rejected the legitimacy of capital punishment. Better to let murderers go free, humanists assert, than to acknowledge covenantally and symbolically that the state has a heavenly judge above it, and that God requires human judges to turn murderers over to Him for His immediate judgment, once the earthly courts have declared them guilty as charged.

49. Augustine, City of God, Book 19, Chap. 15. Cf. R. W. Carlyle and A. J. Carlyle, A History of Medieval Political Theory in the West, 6 vols., 2nd ed. (London: Blackwood, [1927] 1962), I, p. 113.

50. Richard Baxter, A Christian Directory (London: Robert White for Nevil Simmons, 1678), Part II, Christian Oeconomicks, p. 71. The first edition appeared in 1673.

The humanist abolitionist tries to put God in the dock. He tries to put the state on the judgment throne of God. What he hates is the Bible, not slavery as such. The question is never slavery vs. no slavery. The question is: Who will be the slave-master, and who will be the slave? Autonomous man wants to put God and His law in bondage. On judgment day, this strategy will be exposed for the covenant-breaking revolution that it has always been. The abolitionists will then learn what full-time slavery is all about. It is a lesson that will be taught to them for eternity.

The spiritual heirs of Pharaoh's Hebrew agents (Ex. 5:20–21) are with us still. Christians are in spiritual and cultural bondage to the theology of the power religion, and therefore to the state. They must prepare for another exodus, meaning they should be prepared to experience at least a share of the preliminary plagues, just as the Israelites of Moses' day went through the first three out of 10. It is nevertheless time to leave Egypt, leeks and onions notwithstanding.

We must be prepared for numerous objections from Pharaoh's authorized and subsidized representatives inside the camp of the faithful. They owe their positions of influence to Pharaoh and his taskmasters, and they will not give up their authority without a confrontation. They will complain that their potential liberators are at fault for the increased burdens that Christians suffer (Ex. 5:20–21). They will continue to sing the praises of the welfare state. They will continue to sing the praises of tax-supported “neutral” education. They will tell the faithful that humanist slavery is freedom, and biblical freedom is barbaric. They will attract many followers within the camp, for there will always be camp followers close by any army. Choose this day whom you will serve.

51. Libertarian anarchists are exceptions to this rule, since they do not acknowledge the legitimacy of the state.

31

MANDATORY REDEMPTION UPON PAYMENT

And if a sojourner or stranger wax rich by thee, and thy brother that dwelleth by him wax poor, and sell himself unto the stranger or sojourner by thee, or to the stock of the stranger's family: After that he is sold he may be redeemed again; one of his brethren may redeem him: Either his uncle, or his uncle's son, may redeem him, or any that is nigh of kin unto him of his family may redeem him; or if he be able, he may redeem himself. And he shall reckon with him that bought him from the year that he was sold to him unto the year of jubile: and the price of his sale shall be according unto the number of years, according to the time of an hired servant shall it be with him. If there be yet many years behind, according unto them he shall give again the price of his redemption out of the money that he was bought for. And if there remain but few years unto the year of jubile, then he shall count with him, and according unto his years shall he give him again the price of his redemption. And as a yearly hired servant shall he be with him: and the other shall not rule with rigour over him in thy sight. And if he be not redeemed in these years, then he shall go out in the year of jubile, both he, and his children with him. For unto me the children of Israel are servants; they are my servants whom I brought forth out of the land of Egypt: I am the LORD your God (Lev. 25:47–55).

The theocentric meaning of this passage is that deliverance out of bondage is an act of God's grace. The central figure in biblical redemption is the kinsman-redeemer, who in the Mosaic Covenant was the closest relative to the person who has been sold into bondage. The kinsman-redeemer was also the blood avenger (Num. 35:12). He was an agent of sanctions, point four of the biblical covenant model.¹ As an agent, he was part of a hierarchy, point two of the biblical covenant model.² The two points are always linked.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia:

A. Payment and Liberation

The universal redemption of Israelite freemen out of bondage was to be automatic in the fiftieth year, the jubilee year. On the day of atonement in the jubilee year, the day on which the ram's horn sounded, no Israelite heir of the original conquest could lawfully be kept in bondage except for criminals and those who, through renunciation of the covenant or by excommunication, had lost their judicial status as freemen.

This law added another way of escape for the Israelite bondservant: redemption by his kinsman-redeemer. The first form of redemption—the jubilee—required no payment to the slave owner; the second did. The first was based on judicial inheritance; the second was based on personal grace by the nearest of kin.

Why would anyone have sold himself to a resident alien? Because he had finally run out of income. This raises another question: Had he already leased his land to another? I think he had. The sabbatical year system of morally mandatory interest-free charitable loans would have protected a person with a farm to return to. Defaulting on this kind of loan, he would have sold himself to another Israelite to repay it. His temporary owner then had to care for him and his family, although without paying him wages, and then was required to give him food and animals in the sabbatical year (Deut. 15:14–15). This implies that the man in year seven owned his own land to return to with his new flock. But the man in Leviticus 25 was in such desperate straits that he had to sell himself and his family into bondage until the next jubilee year. He would not be entitled to assets out of his master's capital at the end of his term of service. He had become a stranger in the land. This was only permitted by God until a kinsman-redeemer bought him back, or until he could buy his way out of bondage, or until the jubilee's trumpet sounded. But the foreigner was under no obligation to pay him a wage. This made the Israelite slave especially helpless.

B. God's Designated Agents

The kinsman-redeemer was God's designated agent of family redemption. He was the one who had the primary authority to buy back a close relative who had been forced to sell himself into bondservice.³ That someone in his family had been reduced to such a desperate, humiliating act was a mark of family shame. It was such a shameful thing that a kinsman-redeemer would have felt some degree of moral obligation to make the purchase. But, as we shall see, there were also economic incentives involved.

American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Sutton, ch. 2. North, ch. 2.

An Israelite was supposed to serve God as God's designated agent in Old Covenant history. If an Israelite fell under the family authority of a resident alien, this would interfere with his service to God. A covenant-breaker would become an economic intermediary standing between God and the Israelite.

Then why was the resident alien allowed to buy an Israelite? Because he had been economically successful. Verse 47 identifies the nature of his success: "And if a sojourner or stranger wax rich by thee. . . ." His wealth not only enabled him to buy an Israelite; it authorized him to do so. The Mosaic law recognized that covenant-breakers sometimes possess skills that are more effective in meeting the demands of consumers than those possessed by covenant-keepers. These skills may be able to be imitated. By subordinating themselves to the authority of a rich resident alien, the poor Israelite and members of his family were placed in an educational relationship under an economically productive family. The Mosaic law acknowledged that it was better to be under the authority of an economically successful covenant-breaker than to live a life of economic failure, i.e., bankruptcy.

This indicates that God wants His people to be economically productive. He was willing to have covenant-keepers subordinate themselves to covenant-breakers as a means of educating covenant-keepers in the techniques of wealth accumulation. This education was a positive sanction of bondage.

C. Customer Authority

Nothing is said in this passage that would have prohibited another Israelite from buying the poor man. What is affirmed is that the resident alien could also enter the market. He was authorized by God's law to become a competitive bidder in the market's auction for the poor Israelite's labor services. This raised the market price of these services. Why did God allow this? First, in order to allocate scarce labor services according to the demand of customers. Second, in order to enable the poor Israelite to become a more efficient economic agent of customers. He had to become the subordinate agent of a covenant-keeper—a rich one. He would have to hew wood and draw water in a covenant-breaker's household until the day of his redemption. He would learn from the most aggressive bidder in the local market.

3. I use the word slavery to refer to the permanent enslavement of heathens.

The covenant-breaker, acting as the economic agent of customers was allowed to purchase the capitalized labor services of covenant-keepers in order to meet the demands of customers. The scarce economic resource of labor would then be channeled into goods and services that were demanded by customers. What this means is that preserving customer authority in Israel was more fundamental in God's law than preserving freeman legal status of bankrupt Israelites, at least until redemption took place or the jubilee's trumpet sounded. In this case, that which served consumers most efficiently was authorized by God's law. A bankrupt Israelite's legal status as a freeman was not to be defended, free of charge, at the expense of the consumer.

The kinsman-redeemer could lawfully buy back the servant's legal status as a freeman, but this involved a risk on his part. He would probably have had to take over the care of the man and his family, for they had no land to return to. Freemanship was not a free gift to a landless Israelite until the day of jubilee. Someone had to pay: the kinsman-redeemer.

A man in bondage retained the right to buy his freedom: "... or if he be able, he may redeem himself." Where would he get the money to redeem himself? Probably from an inheritance. A relative died and left him the purchase price of his redemption.

D. A Stronger Competitor

The resident alien had no obligation to pay a wage to an Israelite who had been sold into bondage. In contrast, the Israelite who purchased another Israelite had to pay a wage (Lev. 25:39–40).⁴ In both cases, the bondservant would go free in the jubilee year. Since the buyer was buying an expected stream of net income until the jubilee, which buyer could expect a larger stream of net income? Presumably, the resident alien. He did not have to pay a wage; the Israelite buyer did.

The resident alien was in a stronger bidding position than an Israelite buyer, but the Israelite might decide to outbid the alien in order to avoid the shame in Israel of the sale of an Israelite to a resident alien. Altruism and religious pride have limits, however; at some price, the Israelite bidders would have dropped out of the auction. This means that those Israelites who defaulted on the largest sums would have been most likely to serve in the households of resident aliens. The resident alien could better afford to bid a higher price for purchasing a debtor.⁵ Also, in the jubilee year, the Israelite departed without capital from the household of a resident alien. Had he been under the authority of an Israelite, he could have saved his wages. Conclusion: the more money a man owed, the more likely that only a resident alien could afford to buy him to discharge the man's debt. It was therefore better to owe less money than more money, in the hope that an Israelite would buy you in a crisis, out of charity. Charity has limits.

4. Chapter 30.

The greater the man's debt had been, the longer his years of servitude. This system of bondage was therefore a model of hell. Greater debts resulted in more burdensome servitude. "And that servant, which knew his lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more" (Luke 12:47–48).⁶ The difference was this: Israel had the jubilee year for those Israelites who were heirs of the conquest and who were still members of the ecclesiastical covenant. Hell has no jubilee year of release. There is no longer a jubilee year. Jesus Christ, the cosmic Kinsman-Redeemer, abolished it: definitively (Luke 4:18–21),⁷ progressively (through the adoption of gentiles: Paul's ministry), and finally (A.D. 70). Apart from His redemption, there is no escape from eternal servitude.

This means that the greater the debt, the more money the kinsman-redeemer would be required to pay to redeem his relative, or else the longer the man would have remained in bondage. The greater the debt, the greater the price of redemption; the greater the debt, the greater the grace of redemption.

5. Once the auction price of the bondservant matched the debt he owed, any additional money raised by the bidding process went to the bondservant. This would have placed a loose cap on the bidding, since the additional money could be used by the bondservant to buy his way to freedom. The buyer was then subsidizing a reduced return on his investment: a shorter term of service.

6. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

7. Ibid., ch. 6.

E. A New Master

The Israelite who had been purchased from a resident alien was subsequently to be treated by his relative as a hired servant. He was to be paid a wage: “And as a yearly hired servant shall he be with him: and the other shall not rule with rigour over him in thy sight” (v. 53). This means that the kinsman-redeemer was leasing his relative’s labor services, not simply liberating him. The poor man had no land to return to. Until the jubilee year came, he was tied to the kinsman-redeemer unless the latter voluntarily released him.

Then why buy him at all? First, to overcome the shame of the family: to liberate a brother from bondage in the household of a foreigner. Second, to keep the resident alien from profiting at the expense of an unpaid Israelite servant. If the price of labor had risen since the day that the stranger bought the man, the resident alien was reaping an entrepreneurial profit. The unexpected rise in the value of labor services was being pocketed by the foreigner. The jubilee law authorized the kinsman-redeemer to buy the future labor services of his relative, which would run out at the next jubilee. He paid the original purchase price minus the years already served. The value of these labor services was higher than when the alien purchased the Israelite, but the purchase price per year of servitude remaining was fixed by the jubilee law. The kinsman-redeemer was in a position to re-claim from the alien all remaining entrepreneurial profits in an agricultural venture, should they continue. The tithe on these profits would then revert to the Levites.

1. An Economic Return

The kinsman-redeemer would have had to pay his kinsman a wage. This leads us to the third point: the presence of an economic return. What was the nature of this return? The kinsman-redeemer could always hire labor services on a piece-rate basis. Why, economically speaking, would he commit himself to buying an Israelite, who would be owed a wage? Answer: to reduce his risk. The kinsman-redeemer might buy his relative for the same reason that producers buy goods to put into an inventory. If a producer has very little time to get delivery of the particular resource input, he has to pay a higher price to buy it “off the shelf”—some seller’s shelf. Instead, he puts it on his own shelf.⁸ Keeping an inventory is a substitute for knowing the future perfectly, just as holding cash is. If we knew the future perfectly, we could time production and sales so well that we would need neither inventories nor cash in reserve.⁹

By purchasing his kinsman out of bondage, the kinsman-redeemer would have secured a permanent employee for himself until the jubilee year. The relative was still a bondservant who was not allowed to walk away. He was legally tied to the household of his redeemer until he could afford to redeem himself or the jubilee came. But he was at least out from under the authority of a resident alien. He would henceforth receive a wage. He was better off.

The kinsman-redeemer could buy his relative out of bondage at a price commensurate with the years remaining until the jubilee: a prorated price that dropped as the jubilee approached (v. 50). When the alien paid for the Israelite, the redemption price was locked in by civil law. The alien could not readily sell the capitalized services of the Israelite to the highest bidder, who probably would have been another resident alien. The price paid by the original purchaser established the maximum price that a kinsman had to pay to redeem his relative, and this price steadily dropped as the jubilee year approached. It is unlikely that any subsequent buyer would pay the original purchaser more than the redeemer’s price, for he would have risked seeing the kinsman-redeemer buy the man out of bondage at a price based on the original owner’s purchase price. It was legal for a resident alien to buy an Israelite servant, but the jubilee law placed limits on this market.

2. Capitalized Value

The terms of redemption were the same for Israelite bondservants as for rural land (Lev. 25:14–16). It was a prorated redemption: the redeemer had to pay only for the time remaining before the jubilee. This means that the purchase price would be averaged on an annualized

8. Prior to widespread computerization of inventories in the 1980s, and prior to Federal Express and other overnight delivery private mail firms, inventories in American business were larger. The “just in time” techniques of computerized production did not exist, or existed only in a few firms.

9. If no one needed cash in reserve, there would be no cash; its value would fall to zero. Transactions would be by barter only. We cannot really imagine such a moneyless world, for it is a world of man’s omniscience, which is neither possible nor conceivable (Deut. 29:29). This is a major problem for economic theory, which assumes omniscience in the creation of such theoretical constructs as equilibrium.

basis: from the time of purchase to the jubilee.

This means that the original buyer took a risk. If he “bought low,” when the expected value of the land’s output or the servant’s output was low, on the assumption that prices for these services would rise, he could lose his entrepreneurial profit if a redeemer came to claim his right of purchase. The original buyer would be repaid whatever was owed to him based on the original purchase price, not on the new, higher value of the expected stream of services. On the other hand, if he “bought high,” when the expected returns were high, and then the value of the services fell, the land or bondservant would be less likely to be redeemed, since the redeemer would have to pay a prorated price based on the original purchase price, which was high. This means that the original buyer was more likely to suffer losses than enjoy profits if the market value of the expected stream of services changed.

This was even more true of land redemptions. The kinsman-redeemer could re-purchase his kinsman’s land from a buyer at a fixed price: whatever the buyer had paid prorated according to the years remaining till the jubilee. He had no wages to pay. When he bought a relative out of bondage, he had to pay him a wage. Not so with land.

What is clear is that the purchase of either rural land in Israel or an Israelite bondservant was a lease agreement. Because of the jubilee year’s limits on both rural land transfers and Israelite servitude, this was not a purchase; it was a lease. It was not a lease with an option to buy; it was a lease in which an outsider—the kinsman-redeemer—had the option to redeem the lease. The lease was a rental arrangement in which the redeemer could interrupt the long-term rental agreement by making a prorated payment to the lessor. God was the owner of the land and the Israelites; He set the terms of trade. This price system would have restricted the market for Israelite bondservants and rural land.

F. Utopian Populists

On the fringe of many political movements, both right wing and left wing, are populist utopians who claim that a world without interest on business loans is both morally obligatory and economically possible. This is the economic equivalent of claiming that perpetual motion is possible in this world. It is rarely pointed out that this was the position promoted by John Maynard Keynes, the most influential economist in the world in the second half of the twentieth century.¹⁰ Because of the medieval commentators' confusion over interest from business loans (biblically valid) and interest from charity loans to fellow believers (biblically prohibited), they prohibited all interest, which they regarded as a single phenomenon. This religious tradition has led many subsequent monetary cranks—Protestants, Catholics, and cultists—to claim that their position is biblical.¹¹ Let me point out one more time that those people who preach the ideal of a world of zero interest rates cannot defend their system biblically.

Rent is the economic return produced by some scarce resource over a specified time period. The resource may be land, but it could also be labor. What is the present value of this stream of income? We cannot know until we know the rate of interest: the time discount applied by economic actors to all streams of income. The origin of interest is human action: time preference. Rents will, through competition, tend to equal the rate of interest.¹² Thus, the defender of a zero-interest economic system must, if he follows the logic of his system, deny the moral legitimacy of all rental contracts. (There are very few populist analysts who have understood this implication of their system.)¹³ But this section of Leviticus clearly affirms the legitimacy of such rental contracts. This poses an insolvable theoretical problem for those people who argue that, biblically speaking, rental contracts are

10. Keynes wrote that "a properly run community . . . ought to be able to bring down the marginal efficiency of capital in equilibrium approximately to zero within a single generation; . . ." Keynes, The General Theory of Employment, Interest, and Money (New York: Macmillan, 1936), p. 220. If the marginal efficiency of capital is zero, then the price of capital has to be zero, since the value of any asset's output under equilibrium conditions is equal to the value of the final (marginal) unit produced, which in his example is zero. Zero multiplied by anything is zero.

11. Calvin Elliott, Usury: A Scriptural, Ethical and Economic View (Middlesburg, Ohio: Anti-Usury League, 1902); C. F. Parker, Moses the Economist (London: Covenant, 1947), pp. 55–60. For "usury" defined as "interest which is higher than is requisite," see J. Taylor Peddie, The Economic Mechanism of Scripture: The Cure for the World Crises (London: Williams & Norgate, 1934), p. 156. For a critique of the Social Credit movement's suggested reform, the abolition of private banking and interest-bearing loans, see Gary North, Salvation Through Inflation: The Economics of Social Credit (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1993). (<http://bit.ly/gnsti>)

12. Chapter 26, subsection on "Interest and Rent."

13. S. C. Mooney, a defender of interest-free business loans, is one of the few populists who have understood this. He insists that "it is not lawful for one to sell the use of his property (rent)." S. C. Mooney, Usury: Destroyer of Nations (Warsaw, Ohio: Theopolis, 1988), p. 173. (<http://bit.ly/MooneyUsury>) illegitimate. They deal with this problem by ignoring it.¹⁴

1. On the Fringe of a Movement

The populist, being a fringe figure, appeals to people on the fringe of a movement who are ideologically committed but untrained in economic reasoning. They have a taste for ideas that are outrageous and even bizarre. They are tempted to push beyond the ideological limits of the movement to which they are loosely attached. If something sounds new, unique, or controversial, they have a tendency to believe it. There are many such ideas in life that deserve a hearing, despite the opposition of establishments. There are establishments in life; indeed, scholarship and science are impossible without establishments. These establishments do suppress the public discussion of certain ideas.¹⁵ But every anti-establishment hypothesis must be examined very carefully in order to determine whether it makes sense logically and also corresponds to the data it seeks to explain. Fringe ideas must be tested. Those who gravitate toward them are rarely able to do the necessary testing. They are true believers, not careful scholars.

Economic analysis involves long chains of reasoning. A recommended policy must be analyzed in terms of its effects, as they spread through the economy. Few people are equipped intellectually or by training to examine long chains of reasoning. Therefore, as Hazlitt said in the opening sentence of Chapter 1 of Economics in One Lesson, “Economics is haunted by more fallacies than any other study known to man.”¹⁶ He then explains why this is the case: “The art of economics consists in looking not merely at the immediate but at the longer effects of any act or policy; it consists in tracing the consequences of that policy not merely for one group but for all groups. Nine-tenths of the economic fallacies that are working such dreadful harm in the world today are the result of ignoring this lesson.”¹⁷ Crackpot economics always breaks this chain of reasoning.

People who are attracted to populism do not understand that

14. Mooney refused to comment in his book on Leviticus 25:25–28 and 25:47–51. For a critique of Mr. Mooney, see Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Appendix J: “Lots of Free Time: The Existentialist Utopia of S. C. Mooney.”

15. Thomas Kuhn, The Structure of Scientific Revolutions (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1962).

16. Henry Hazlitt, Economics in One Lesson (Norwalk, Connecticut: Arlington House, [1946] 1979), p. 15.

17. Ibid., p. 17.

when some writer denies the legitimacy of interest from business loans, he is also denying the legitimacy of the economic category known as rent. They do not understand that anyone who denies the legitimacy of interest and rent then must explain how a world without interest would operate. They take the populist's word on faith. Commitment to crackpot economics can easily become a substitute for orthodox religion,¹⁸ or at least a false corollary to orthodox religion.

I will say it one more time: economics becomes crackpot when it claims that the economic world can operate apart from a rate of interest. It is crackpot to the same degree that physics becomes crackpot when it affirms the possibility of perpetual motion.

2. The Unity of Economic Theory

The phenomenon of interest affects every aspect of economic theory and practice. It is the discount that every rational person places on future goods as against present goods: the free gift of a Rolls-Royce automobile delivered next year vs. the Rolls Royce delivered this afternoon. Better sooner than later, other things being equal. The anti-interest utopian therefore has an intellectual and moral obligation to reconstruct all of economic theory in terms of his radical hypothesis. No one has ever done this, in the millennia in which anti-interest hypotheses have been offered, from Aristotle to the present.

When Eugen von Böhm-Bawerk's monumental History and Critique of Interest Theories was published in 1884, he understood that all of capital theory had to be reconstructed in terms of his theory of interest as a discount of future goods as against present goods. He then wrote The Positive Theory of Capital, equally monumental, which appeared in 1889. Then he spent years writing Further Essays on Capital and Interest, a book defending the first two volumes. Certain problems in Böhm-Bawerk's theory led his student Ludwig von Mises to write Theory of Money and Credit, published in 1912. From there, Mises went on to write Socialism (1922) and Human Action (1949), each book extending his theory of capital, interest, and money. The point is, you cannot legitimately announce that an economy can and should operate without interest payments on business loans and leave it at that. Yet this is what the populist utopians do.

18. North, Salvation Through Inflation.

Conclusion

The jubilee was the year of redemption in Israel. It reunited judicially the dispossessed Israelite and his landed inheritance. The maximum time limit placed by God's law on Israelite bondservice was therefore the same as the limit on the leasing of rural property: the next jubilee year.

The possibility of immediate redemption was available in both cases: land and labor. The kinsman-redeemer could buy his relative out of bondage by making a prorated payment to the buyer based on the original purchase price. This payment was based on the years remaining until the jubilee: the original purchase price divided by the number of years until the jubilee multiplied by the number of years remaining.

The presence of this law in the Mosaic law indicates how important the ideal of customer authority is in God's eyes. An Israelite who found himself in dire straits economically could lawfully sell himself to a resident alien. The economic success of the resident alien was legitimate. He had met the demands of customers. The Israelite had failed to meet the demands of customers. The resident alien was authorized to buy the Israelite until the next jubilee year. So important were the twin ideals of efficiency and profit that God was willing to see some of His people in temporary bondage to covenant-breakers within the boundaries of the Promised Land. Perhaps these less efficient Israelites would learn to become more efficient producers, thereby improving the options available to consumers.

Because the resident alien did not have to pay a wage to an Israelite bondservant, while Israelites were required to pay him a wage, this law gave a competitive advantage to the resident alien in the market for Israelite bondservants. It made it clear what the consequence of bankruptcy was likely to be: long-term bondage to covenant-breakers.

What was illegal for an Israelite—the refusal to pay a wage to his Israelite bondservant—was not illegal for resident aliens. Why not? Because bondage to resident aliens was a model of hell: the wrath of God. It served as a reminder to the Israelites of their need for a kinsman-redeemer. They were all in debt to God. They could not afford to buy their way out of Adam's bondage. Only God's grace of the fulfilled jubilee offered the nation long-term hope, and only God's grace in the interim as their kinsman-redeemer offered short-term hope. God's designated Kinsman-Redeemer is Jesus Christ, who announced the fulfillment of the jubilee principle when He began his public prophetic ministry (Luke 4:18–21).¹⁹

This law rested on a required wage payment, but there were no specifics regarding the amount of the wage. This made law enforcement difficult for the magistrates, and therefore also made legal predictability difficult for Israelite masters. I conclude that this law was enforced by the Levites, not the civil magistrate. They would have had more leeway in working out equitable arrangements with the masters. This law did not prohibit an evil act, i.e., the legitimate function of civil government. It mandated positive sanctions, and only for Israelite masters. It therefore discriminated economically against Israelite masters. But Mosaic civil law was to be equal for all (Ex. 12: 49).²⁰ So, this must have been an ecclesiastical law.

19. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 6.

20. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 14.

NATURE AS A SANCTIONING AGENT

If ye walk in my statutes, and keep my commandments, and do them; Then I will give you rain in due season, and the land shall yield her increase, and the trees of the field shall yield their fruit. And your threshing shall reach unto the vintage, and the vintage shall reach unto the sowing time: and ye shall eat your bread to the full, and dwell in your land safely. And I will give peace in the land, and ye shall lie down, and none shall make you afraid: and I will rid evil beasts out of the land, neither shall the sword go through your land (Lev. 26:3–6).

The theocentric message here is that God is the sovereign sustainer of the creation, who personally intervenes into the realm of nature in terms of His covenant. Because His covenant with Israel was judicial, the land was uniquely under His law's sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant model.¹ This law was not purely impersonal-mathematical; it was ethical: point three of the biblical covenant model.² These two points are always linked.

A. Covenantal Blessings

The covenantal blessings of Leviticus 26:3–6 were corporate. Rain in due season was promised by God for all the land within the boundaries of national Israel, not just for the land belonging to covenant-keeping individuals. The individual Israelite would receive these blessings only as a resident of a covenanted nation: inside the national covenant's geographical boundaries. These boundaries were primarily judicial and secondarily geographical. Only within these covenantal boundaries could the promised blessings be successfully invoked in God's name, generation after generation, and only if those living within these boundaries were actively conforming themselves to the ethical boundaries of God's revealed law. Only inside the land of promise—a covenanted nation—were there sufficient numbers of covenant-keepers and also publicly law-abiding covenant-breakers to call forth these promised blessings through the generations.³ These were not cross-boundary laws.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Sutton, ch. 3. North, ch. 3.

As I shall argue later in this chapter, the covenantally predictable sanctions of rain and sunshine were exclusive to Mosaic Israel's economy. They were land sanctions, which are no longer God's means of imparting predictable blessings and curses. The New Covenant has transferred God's predictable sanctions from climate to society. What a society does in response to the terms of God's Bible-revealed law determines God's predictable blessings and cursings. Nature's climatic processes are no longer covenantally predictable, and hence are no longer covenantal sanctions. It is what society does in response to God's revealed law that will determine whether nature's covenantally unpredictable climatic processes become blessings or curses.

Does this mean that none of the Mosaic covenant's system of corporate sanctions applied outside of the boundaries? No, but it does mean that only inside Israel's boundaries was there any legitimate hope that positive blessings could be sustained long term. The basis of God's blessings is always judicial: God's grace. The nations outside the land could become the recipients of God's common grace, but only if they outwardly obeyed the terms of God's revealed law. But apart from special grace, common grace cannot be maintained long term. The covenant-breaking recipients of common grace will eventually revolt against God and His law. The blessings are not sufficient rewards to persuade them to remain outwardly faithful indefinitely. Large numbers of covenant-breakers must be converted to saving faith if they are not to rebel.⁴

3. It is a theologically and psychologically disastrous misinterpretation of God's promises of wealth to place them within an exclusively personal or individual framework. The individualism of the "positive confession" charismatic movement is an example of just such a false interpretation of covenantal, corporate promises. God's blessings are not successfully invoked verbally; they are invoked corporately and ethically. Individual Christians are not supposed to "name it and claim it." Instead, we are to do the following: obey God personally by following His law; pray for the widespread movement of the Holy Spirit in what is called revival; work toward a corporate, constitutional, and civil affirmation of the absolute authority of the God of the Bible; and hope for the best until these covenantal requirements are met. Only after this can we be confident about predictable, sustainable corporate blessings.

The best example of this process of moral backsliding under the Mosaic Covenant economy is Nineveh, capital city of Assyria. The fact that God threatened Nineveh with destruction in 40 days indicates that the Levitical system of negative corporate sanctions was in operation outside the land of Israel. These were not Mosaic seed and land sanctions. These were cross-boundary sanctions. Nineveh repented on a corporate but external basis in the face of Jonah's preaching of imminent negative sanctions. Why do I say external sanctions? Because no one was required to become circumcised in order for God's wrath to be withdrawn. This was common grace, not special (soul-saving) grace. The nation escaped external destruction because their flagrant sinning ended. Eventually Assyria revolted against God, invaded Israel, and carried off the residents of the Northern Kingdom. Then Babylon destroyed Assyria.

Common grace cannot be sustained apart from special grace. Covenant-breakers eventually return to their outward rebellion. God then gives them up to their lusts (Rom. 1:18–22).⁵ Apart from circumcision, there was no possibility of special grace under the Old Covenant after Abraham.⁶ There could be no inheritance of covenantal blessings beyond the third and fourth generation of those who hated God (Ex. 20:5).⁷

B. Sanctions and Representation

The blessings listed here are agricultural and social: bread, wine, and peace. These are positive sanctions.⁸ Ten righteous representatives of Sodom would have kept God from bringing total negative sanctions against that city, but only because of Abraham's negotiation with God

4. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/gndcgr>)

5. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 3.

6. This is why Egypt was not brought to saving faith under Joseph. We know this because there was no covenantal succession; every Egyptian family suffered the death of the firstborn at the exodus. Egypt's faith was a common grace faith.

7. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 22:C:1.

8. Peace might be considered the absence of war, but given the condition of mankind after Adam's rebellion, it takes God's active grace to bring peace to man. Peace is not normal even though it is normative. Peace is not passive. War and sin are the passive condition of covenant-breaking man (James 4:1).

(Gen. 18:24–32). But what about positive sanctions in Israel? What had to be done in Israel in order to gain bread, wine, and peace? The people as a covenantal unit were told to obey God. The Bible never mentions a specific percentage of the population that must obey God in order for God's positive, visible sanctions to become predictable in history. This is why the absolute predictability of God's sanctions in history is an unobtainable ideal. But absolute anything in history is unobtainable by men, so this should not deter us in our quest to gain His positive sanctions. What the Bible teaches is that the number of active covenant-keepers must be large enough to represent the nation judicially. The society must be marked by widespread obedience to the civil laws set forth by God. Blessings apart from faithfulness are a prelude to negative sanctions on a comparable scale.

God promised covenantal blessings to the residents of the nation of Israel in response to individuals' covenantal obedience. Obedience is always in part individual, for individuals are always held responsible by God for their actions. This responsibility is inescapable in history and at the day of final judgment.⁹ Nevertheless, there is no doubt that God's promised historical responses to individual obedience were corporate sanctions. The question is: How many people in Israel had to obey God's law in order for the nation to receive these promised visible blessings? This is the question of covenantal representation.

In the bargaining process between Abraham and God over the fate of Sodom, Abraham persuaded God to drop the minimum-required number of righteous men to only 10 as the condition of avoiding total negative sanctions against the city (Gen. 18:24–32). These threatened corporate sanctions were both negative and total. There is nothing in the Mosaic law to indicate that a remnant of only 10 men would have preserved the nation of Israel from lesser negative sanctions, such as invasion or captivity. God told Elijah that He had kept 7,000 men from bowing the knee to Baal, but God did not on their account promise to spare Israel. On the contrary, He used Elijah as His agent to anoint Hazael the Syrian, who would then bring negative sanctions against Israel. This revelation from God came as a unit:

And the LORD said unto him, Go, return on thy way to the wilderness of Damascus: and when thou comest, anoint Hazael to be king over Syria: And Jehu the son of Nimshi shalt thou anoint to be king over Israel: and Elisha the son of Shaphat of Abel-meholah shalt thou anoint to be prophet in thy room. And it shall come to pass, that him that escapeth the sword of Hazael shall Jehu slay: and him that escapeth from the sword of Jehu shall Elisha slay. Yet I have left me seven thousand in Israel, all the knees which have not bowed unto Baal, and every mouth which hath not kissed him (I Kings 19:15–18).

9. The law's visible sanctions are more predictable at the final judgment.

Abraham's bargaining was based on a theory of covenantal representation. Ten righteous men in Sodom could have served as representatives for the entire city, even though the city's population was perverse. This is an indication of the magnitude of God's grace. But His grace is not without ethical conditions. There did have to be 10 righteous men in Sodom in order for God to display His grace to all the other inhabitants. The 7,000 covenant-keepers of Elijah's day served as covenantal representatives who kept Israel from being totally destroyed, Sodom-like, but their presence in the land did not protect the nation from lesser negative sanctions. God's grace sometimes temporarily offsets a widespread decline of faith, as it did in the days of Hezekiah (II Kings 20:1–6), but if there is no widespread repentance during this period of grace, God's specially imposed negative corporate sanctions will inevitably come on a rebellious society. These are predictable in history. The New Covenant has not altered this cause-and-effect relationship.

Who was responsible for gaining these blessings? The text does not identify any single representative. Could a single agent represent the nation as a whole? In some cases, yes. God spared Judah for the sake of Hezekiah's repentance. The crucifixion of Jesus definitively proves the point.¹⁰ By bringing Him under the negative sanction of public execution, Israel's representatives brought the whole nation under God's negative sanction of public execution in A.D. 70.¹¹ In Israel, covenantal representatives included the high priest, priests in general, Levites, civil rulers, prophets, and heads of households.¹² The people of Israel were to serve the world as a royal priesthood (Ex. 19:6). They

10. "And one of them, named Caiaphas, being the high priest that same year, said unto them, Ye know nothing at all, Nor consider that it is expedient for us, that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not. And this spake he not of himself: but being high priest that year, he prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation; And not for that nation only, but that also he should gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad" (John 11:49–52).

11. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

12. In most cases, this would have been a circumcised male. In the case of widows and divorced women, they became the heads of their households, for they were required to fulfill their vows without initial approval by a male (Num. 30:9).

represented other nations.¹³ The Mosaic law did not single out civil officers as the nation's primary legal representatives. The office of high priest was far more important than the office of king. National Israel could and did exist without a king; it could not exist without a high priest. It is a sign of the modern world's perversity that the civil ruler is regarded as possessing the crucial form of sovereignty.¹⁴ This same error governed pagan men's thinking in the ancient world.¹⁵

God's promises to a corporate entity do not mandate that there be a representative political agency to serve as His primary economic agent. This means that a central agricultural planning bureau should not be created by the state, nor should such an agency make the decisions about what to plant, where, and when. There must be no civil "Department of Bread and Wine." Neither it nor any another political agency should decide which crops to sell, at what price, and to whom, except during wartime, and then only because the state takes on a priestly function, when its corporate decisions are literally life-and-death representative decisions.¹⁶ Nevertheless, the question remains: If God makes men responsible collectively, as His covenantal promises indicate that He does, then what kind of representative human authority should be established in order to monitor the arena—the boundaries—in which the sanctions are applied, both positive and negative?

C. Stipulations and Representation

God's covenantal promises in the Mosaic law were ethical, not magical or technical. They were governed by God's stipulations: the boundaries of legitimate behavior. Were these stipulations exclusively 13. During the feast of tabernacles, Israel sacrificed a total of 70 bulls for the 70 nations (Jud. 1:7), plus one for Israel (Num. 29:13–36).

14. A representative discussion is Bertrand de Jouvenal, Sovereignty: An Inquiry into the Political Good (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1957). The author was a conservative. This book was a companion volume to his equally political study, Power: The Natural History of Its Growth, rev. ed. (London: Batchworth, 1952).

15. R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1971] 2007), chaps. 3–5. (<http://bit.ly/rjroam>)

16. Even during wartime, politicians should strive to let the market allocate resources in most instances. Fiscal policy—taxing and spending—not monetary inflation coupled with a system of compulsory rationing, should be the primary control device. This enables producers to make rational decisions about what to produce. The profit system motivates producers to create the most efficient weapons. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. 34, sect. 2. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>) civil? No. Were they predominantly civil? No. The Mosaic laws matched the four covenants, i.e., the four biblically legitimate self-maledictory oaths: individual, familial, ecclesiastical, and civil. The problem in any covenanted society is to discover which agency has primary jurisdiction in any specific instance. No human agency has final, total authority. Only God possesses absolute authority, an authority that He transfers in history only to His incarnate living Word, Jesus Christ,¹⁷ to the Holy Spirit,¹⁸ and to His incarnate written word, the Bible.¹⁹

1. Self-Government Under God's Law

The primary form of biblical government is always self-government. The primary agency of jurisdiction is the individual conscience. It has to be: only at this level does the individual law-enforcer have sufficiently accurate and detailed information regarding both his motivation and the results of his actions. Furthermore, only the individual can search his own heart, and even then, such knowledge is flawed. "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked: who can know it? I the LORD search the heart, I try the reins, even to give every man according to his ways, and according to the fruit of his doings" (Jer. 17:9–10). This is why God threatens eternal sanctions, positive and negative, on individuals: to persuade them to focus their attention in history on the requirement of obedience.

Adam was given a positive injunction: to dress and guard the garden (Gen. 2:15). He was also given a negative injunction: to avoid eating the fruit of a specific tree (Gen. 2:17). The first was a task of personal dominion. The second was a warning against false worship: eating a forbidden meal. Both stipulations necessarily involved corporate responsibility: familial (dominion) and ecclesiastical (communion). Corporate responsibility flows from individual responsibility. The point is, responsibility does flow outward from the individual. There is more to biblical responsibility than personal responsibility because personal responsibility in a covenantal order is necessarily representative. The representative models of the principle of representation are Adam and Christ.

17. "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him; and without him was not any thing made that was made" (John 1:1–3).

18. Jesus said: "But when the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me" (John 15:26). "Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth: for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak: and he will shew you things to come" (John 16:13).

19. Jesus said: "I have given them thy word; and the world hath hated them, because they are not of the world, even as I am not of the world" (John 17:14). "Sanctify them through thy truth: thy word is truth" (John 17:17). Paul wrote: "All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness" (II Tim. 3:16).

The Mosaic law reflects this judicial fact of life, especially in Leviticus, the premier book of stipulations. Leviticus begins with ecclesiastical stipulations: priestly laws governing the representative sacrifices and laws governing the enforcement of covenantal boundaries, i.e., excommunication from the assembly. The feasts and ritual sacrifices of the Mosaic Covenant are obvious examples of priestly laws.²⁰ Next in number and importance are the family-related statutes, mainly laws controlling sexual deviation (Lev. 18; 20), personal ethics and land management (Lev. 19), and inheritance (Lev. 25). Civil statutes and civil sanctions are a distant fourth in both number and importance.

Obedience must be representative when God's sanctions are corporate. Certain individuals represent a larger body of individuals. The word body is covenantally appropriate: a head represents the other members.²¹ This judicial principle provides us with no specific information regarding corporate ownership. The Mosaic law does, however. Leviticus 25 says a great deal about Old Covenant corporate ownership: it was familial. The jubilee law centered around a man's family inheritance, which was based in turn on God's original distribution of the land of Canaan to the Israelite conquerors. The crucial inheritance was judicial: the legal status of freeman. The far less important inheritance was geographical: a specific plot of ground. The primary role of civil government in Israel with respect to landed inheritance was to enforce the terms of the jubilee law.

The jubilee law was the most important corporate civil law in Mosaic Israel, for it established freemanship. This is what identified a free man, a man who could not be sold into permanent servitude with his family. There were other civil laws, but this was the archetype. The jubilee was not a law guaranteeing a specific economic income. It was instead a law establishing a legal right: an enforceable boundary around his legal status as a freeman.

20. In the New Covenant, the one feast is the Lord's Supper, which is the heir of the Passover and the other Mosaic Covenant feasts.

21. "For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the church: and he is the saviour of the body" (Eph. 5:23). "And he is the head of the body, the church: who is the beginning, the firstborn from the dead; that in all things he might have the preeminence" (Col. 1:18).

2. Jubilee and Legal Rights

The jubilee law served Mosaic Israel as a model for all civil legislation. It was primarily a defense of legal rights, not a promise of positive economic sanctions. It was God alone who promised positive economic sanctions, not the state. These positive sanctions came to individuals primarily through their families. The economic success of individuals and families determined the size of the tithe: positive sanctions to the church and state. Families also provided charity to the poor, under threat of church sanctions. The gleaning law served as the model of this form of charity: if a man did not work, neither did he eat. Men also received positive sanctions from the church through the Levites. Presumably, people received positive sanctions from voluntary, non-ecclesiastical organizations that served the poor, but there are no biblical injunctions in this regard.

Finally, there were civil sanctions, which were exclusively negative: to protect the nation from God's corporate negative sanctions in history. Faithfulness by the civil government in executing these negative sanctions would bring God's positive sanctions, most notably peace. It is the civil government's task to insure peace: defensive boundaries placed around violent people within the nation—economic restitution, public flogging,²² and public execution—and a geographical defensive boundary placed around violent people outside the nation. Peace is God's national blessing: a successful quarantine against violence. This quarantine begins with the work of the conscience: "From whence come wars and fightings among you? come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members?" (James 4:1). It moves outward from the individual to the other covenantal institutions, and from there to all of society. It is the responsibility of civil magistrates to suppress external violence. This results in external peace. But without the grace of God in regenerating the souls of men, the civil suppression of violence cannot be maintained indefinitely. The fundamental form of government is self-government, not civil government.

D. Common Grace

The question arises: Did the covenantal promises of Leviticus 26 perish with the other land laws of Israel? The law promised predictable blessings: “If ye walk in my statutes, and keep my commandments, and do them; Then I will give you rain in due season, and the land shall yield her increase, and the trees of the field shall yield their fruit” (vv. 3–4). The New Testament seems to establish another principle, that of common grace: the rain falls on everyone indiscriminately, irrespective of covenantal status. The context of the New Testament teaching is individual behavior, but the sanctions are corporate:

22. The limit is 40 lashes (Deut. 25:3). It is worth noting that Noah's flood came from 40 days of rain, and Christ's encounter with Satan came after 40 days of temptation in the wilderness (Luke 4:2).

Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you; That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same? And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the publicans so? Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect (Matt. 5:43–48).²³

The context of this passage is the rule of law: love thy neighbor. Here is the biblical principle of love: “Love worketh no ill to his neighbor: therefore love is the fulfilling of the law” (Rom. 13:10).²⁴ We are to treat friends and enemies lawfully. This is the personal application of the Mosaic law’s principle of equality before the law: “One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you” (Ex. 12:49).²⁵ Nature’s patterns affect all men the same in New Covenant history, sending rain and sun on good men and evil men. We are therefore to treat all men justly. In this passage, our righteous judgment is the equivalent of God’s gift of rain and sun.

1. God’s Justice

The focus of Jesus’ discussion of the rain and sun in the Sermon on the Mount is God’s unmerited gift of justice: every man is to be the recipient of justice. Antinomian commentators shift the focus of this passage from our righteous treatment of other men to another topic:

23. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 10.

24. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 12.

25. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 14.

God's universal distribution of blessings in history. These blessings are indeed universal, but they are also conditional. They are as conditional as the positive sanctions of God's law. The impartiality of God's justice mandates the conditionality of the blessings of justice. Every decision on our part must be ethically conditional, even the positive sanction of charity.²⁶ The context of the passage is the mandatory distribution of our justice. It is not, as Meredith G. Kline argued, the general unpredictability of God's corporate sanctions in New Covenant history.²⁷ Rather, the point that Jesus was making is that men must be utterly predictable in administering civil justice. All negative sanctions must match those mandated by God. They are ideally to be as predictable as the universality of both rain and sunshine. These sanctions must be predictable because they are conditional. Where does God prescribe these civil sanctions? Where else but in His revealed law? Hope for a peaceful and prosperous land has been universal in man's history.

But there is a problem: the question of the rain. There is no explicit indication that the Levitical promise of rain in due season—a unique positive sanction in the Mosaic law—continues into the New Covenant era. Kline correctly recognized that this indicates a shift from the Old Covenant to the New Covenant. Kline then extrapolated from Jesus' announcement of the visible randomness (i.e., covenantal unpredictability) of the rain in the New Covenant to the visible randomness of all the promised sanctions in the Mosaic law. What Kline did was to assume that the rain, which was an aspect of the land laws, represents all the corporate sanctions in the New Testament. This assumption is incorrect. If it were correct, there could be no uniquely biblical system of social theory.²⁸ This is why we must pay considerable attention to the positive covenantal sanction of rain in due season.

26. Ray R. Sutton, "Whose Conditions for Charity?" in Gary North (ed.), Theonomy: An Informed Response (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991), ch. 9. (<http://bit.ly/gntheon>)

27. "And meanwhile it [the common grace order] must run its course within the uncertainties of the mutually conditioning principles of common grace and common curse, prosperity and adversity being experienced in a manner largely unpredictable because of the inscrutable sovereignty of the divine will that dispenses them in mysterious ways." Meredith G. Kline, "Comments on an Old-New Error," Westminster Theological Journal, XLI (Fall 1978), p. 184.

28. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), chaps. 7, 8. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

2. Rain in Due Season

The Levitical positive sanctions listed in the text are peace, wine, and bread. Rain in due season is a means of producing grain and grapes, meaning bread and wine. The rain is a blessing only insofar as it produces crops. Obviously, rain was no blessing in Noah's day. Too much rain ruins crops. So, the promise was for rain in due season. It would be just the right quantity of rain to produce the positive economic sanction of agricultural productivity.

The New Testament's teaching is that rain and sunshine fall on all men. This is God's common grace. The New Testament's emphasis here is on a common blessing. As I have already argued, the twin blessings of sunshine and rain are representative of God's blessing of righteous judgment, which His covenant people are to emulate. But both rain and sunshine can become common curses: rain becomes flooding; sunshine becomes drought. The question we must get answered is this: Is nature under the New Covenant a means of God's predictable covenantal sanctions in history? It was in Moses' day, at least inside the boundaries of the Promised Land. The land had vomited out the Canaanites.

Defile not ye yourselves in any of these things: for in all these the nations are defiled which I cast out before you: And the land is defiled: therefore I do visit the iniquity thereof upon it, and the land itself vomiteth out her inhabitants. Ye shall therefore keep my statutes and my judgments, and shall not commit any of these abominations; neither any of your own nation, nor any stranger that sojourneth among you: (For all these abominations have the men of the land done, which were before you, and the land is defiled;) That the land spue not you out also, when ye defile it, as it spued out the nations that were before you (Lev. 18:24–28).²⁹

But after the Promised Land ceased to be a kingdom boundary,³⁰ did climate still play this judgmental role? No. Jesus today spews out His enemies, not the land. "So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth" (Rev. 3:16). Climate in the New Covenant has ceased to be a means of predictable covenantal judgment. What determines the fruitfulness of the field

29. Chapter 10.

30. Jesus warned the Pharisees: "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43).

today is adherence to God's laws, including his laws of ownership. Put another way, a Christian nation whose civil government imposes socialist ownership will not enjoy the large number of external blessings experienced by a pagan nation whose civil government defends free market ownership. Also, if the two nations were to reverse their systems of ownership, there would be no predictable long-term reversal of rainfall and sunshine patterns within their respective geographical boundaries. The New Covenant moved from climate to society with respect to the locus of predictable sanctions. More to the point, this shift culminated a shift that had begun at the time of the conquest of the land. The earlier shift in the locus of sanctions had been a far more radical shift: from predictable manna outside the Promised Land to predictable inheritance without manna inside the Promised Land. When the Israelites crossed the boundary from the wilderness into Canaan, the source of their bread ceased to be manna. "And the manna ceased on the morrow after they had eaten of the old corn of the land; neither had the children of Israel manna any more; but they did eat of the fruit of the land of Canaan that year" (Josh. 5: 12).

3. Coals of Fire

If rain in due season is a blessing, and if all of God's gifts are ethically conditional, then what is the nature of climate's conditionality? I have argued that the blessings of climate are analogous to—representational of—the blessing of God's predictable justice in history.³¹ God tells His people to give good gifts—render impartial justice—to covenant-breakers, just as He sends rain and sunshine on sinners. There is an ulterior motive in such unmerited common grace: an escalation of their condemnation. In the section on justice in Romans, Paul quotes Proverbs 25:21–22. The passage in Proverbs reads: "If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink: For thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head, and the LORD shall reward thee." Here is how Paul applies this biblical principle of condemnation through mercy: "Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord. Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good" (Rom. 12:19–21).

31. Such justice ceases to be a blessing for covenant-breakers in eternity.

At the very least, the common blessings of nature bring covenant-breakers under greater eternal condemnation. This is because of the principle that there is a link between God's blessings and man's responsibilities. "But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more" (Luke 12:48).³² But what about in history? In what way is nature's ethically random distribution of gifts ethically conditional in history? We can be sure that those who receive such undeserved gifts heap up coals of fire on their unrepentant heads in eternity. What about in history?

Paul wrote: "Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good" (v. 21). The goal here is the overcoming of Satan's kingdom. This victory is not confined to eternity. Satan's kingdom is obviously going to be overcome in eternity, with or without mercy from Christians in history. So, Paul's frame of reference in this passage has to be history. By showing mercy in history, Christians accomplish two things: they weaken some covenant-breakers' resistance to the truth, and they strengthen other covenant-breakers' resistance to the truth. That is, covenant-breakers' reactions to the gift of mercy vary in history. If their negative reactions to mercy always strengthened their resolve to defy God and His kingdom, and also always strengthened their ability to resist, or even left such strength "neutral," then how could showing mercy to evil men lead to the overcoming of evil with good? Wouldn't mercy in this case be counter-productive, strengthening evil men's will to resist and also their ability to resist God's kingdom? Wouldn't showing mercy then subsidize evil? Yet the Bible does not recommend that covenant-keeper subsidize evil.

This is why Paul did not presume that mercy always strengthens evil men's ability to resist the expansion of God's kingdom. On the contrary, he assumes that our showing mercy—dealing lawfully with sinners—leads to an expansion of the kingdom of God in history. In Romans 11, Paul prophesies an era of great blessings in history. Speaking of the future conversion of the Jews, Paul wrote: "Now if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness?" (Rom. 11:12).³³ Romans 12 continues his message of victory in history. Good will overcome evil. This means that the merciful gift of God's civil justice in history will strengthen God's kingdom in history.

32. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

33. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 8.

God's unmerited gifts in nature produce analogous effects. They progressively condemn covenant-breakers and bless covenant-keepers. While the rain in due season in the New Covenant era does not fall only on covenant-keepers or only on covenant-keeping societies, it does have kingdom-expanding effects in history. It brings covenant-breaking societies under God's condemnation. Jesus Christ will impose negative sanctions against them in history. Long-term rebellion increases the quantity of judgmental fire on their corporate heads. What is different in the New Covenant is that climate no longer imposes the negative sanctions. In Elijah's day, God withheld rain in Israel for several years in order to strengthen Elijah's position and weaken Ahab's resistance (I Kings 17:1). This is no longer God's method of bringing negative sanctions in history. Climate is no longer God's covenantal agent. But, contrary to Kline in particular and amillennialists in general, this does not mean that God no longer brings predictable sanctions in history. His sanctions are no less real just because they are no longer delivered through climate. They are delivered through society.

The language of Leviticus 26:3–6 is not only covenantal, it is in part sacramental. By identifying the vineyard and bread as the blessed products of the land, the Mosaic law invoked the language of Abrahamic Holy Communion: bread and wine (Gen. 14:18). The visible proof of God's communion with His people—His residence inside Israel's boundaries—was the four-fold blessing of peace and land, bread and wine.

E. Two Forms of Representation

The ultimate issue was this: Who owns the land? The Bible is clear: God owns the land and everything on it. "For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills" (Ps. 50:10). The secondary question is this: Who acts as God's lawful agent in the administration of any given plot of land? It is this question that has divided Christians from very early days.

God delegates two forms of limited sovereignty to man: judicial sovereignty and market sovereignty. The first we call ownership; the second we call customer authority. Each has its own respective doctrine of representation. The jubilee land law makes it clear that the heirs of the families of the conquest possessed judicial authority over Israel's rural land. This does not mean that these families possessed economic authority over the land. Control over any economic resource must be defended in the market. The person who owns a scarce economic resource—a resource that commands a price—either serves those consumers who offer the high bids for the asset's fruits of production or else he must content himself with a reduced level of income. If he experiences reduced income, he thereby pays for the privilege of serving consumers other than those who offer the high bids. There is therefore a cost of serving low-bidding consumers: forfeited income. Over time, control of scarce resources moves, through the competitive bidding process, to those economic agents who most efficiently serve the customers who offer the high bids. The profitable producers (customer agents) buy productive assets from those who are less profitable.

The jubilee land law governed the leasing of rural land, and there is no question that resident aliens and converts to the faith could buy and sell individual plots of land for up to 49 years. Thus, economic authority over the land remained in the hands of consumers. They could, through their decisions to buy or not buy, establish who their economic representatives would be. Those economic agents who were more responsive to the demands of consumers would prosper more than those who were less responsive. Those agents who prospered would be in a strong position to lease the key agricultural resource: land. The heirs of the conquest retained long-term legal sovereignty over the land as God's agents. The more productive farmers could nevertheless purchase economic authority over the land as the consumers' agents. In 42 years out of 50, consumers were authorized by God to exercise primary authority—economic authority—through their agents: the more efficient farmers.

The primary mark of economic representation in Mosaic Israel was the lease. God delegated far more economic authority to the efficient producer than to the original owner. This points to the minimal economic impact of the jubilee land law. This law was not primarily economic; it was primarily judicial. It established freemanship, not a guaranteed income. In a free society, only consumers can establish a land owner's income, and consumers are notoriously fickle. They guarantee nothing to any of their representatives. "What have you done for me lately?" is their rallying cry. "What will you do for me now, and at what price?" is their battle cry. The authority of the consumer rests on his right to change his mind until he signs a contract.

Conclusion

God's covenantal sanctions in history are corporate. Positive sanctions rest on the obedience of individuals: representatives. The boundaries of Mosaic Israel were primarily judicial and secondarily geographical. Within these boundaries, climate itself was bound to the stipulations of God's national covenant. The rain would fall in due season if the nation's representatives remained faithful. These representatives included the high priest, priests in general, Levites, civil rulers, and heads of households.

The positive sanctions listed in this passage are land and peace, bread and wine. The Levitical laws governing ownership prove that it was not the civil government which was the primary representative agent in Mosaic Israel. It was not the state which was to create national economic planning for agriculture. The success or failure of Israel's agriculture depended on the obedience of the people, manifested publicly in the behavior of their representatives, i.e., their leaders. The primary form of government is self-government, and the leaders had to begin with self-government, as did every other Israelite. Corporate responsibility flows from individual responsibility.

The promised sanction of rain in due season was unique to Mosaic Israel. It was not a cross-boundary sanction. In the New Covenant, the universality of common grace governs the climate, just as it did outside of the place of residence of the Israelites under the Old Covenant. Rain and sunshine fall on covenant-breakers and covenant-keepers without distinction in the New Covenant. Climate is no longer God's agent of judicial sanctions. God's law governs man's legal relationships, and obedience to His law-order is what determines predictable corporate sanctions in New Covenant history. Societies can overcome the restraints (boundaries) of climate through obedience to God's law.

The doctrine of representation is inherent in any system of biblical authority. The judicial representatives of the land were the heirs of the conquest. The economic representatives of the consumers were those who were willing to buy their continued control over the land. Control over the land was to be maintained by those who used the land least wastefully in serving those who offered the high bids for the fruits of the land: consumers. It was the consumers' authority over the land that Mosaic law defended in 49 years out of 50.

The covenantal promise of bread and wine has sacramental overtones. It points to the communion of God and man at a meal: the marriage supper of the lamb (Rev. 19:9). Israel was also promised land and peace. From an economic standpoint, land is not nearly so crucial as freedom in producing the largest possible quantities of bread and wine. The law of God provided freedom; the land was secondary. The law was given at Sinai before the generation of wandering. The stipulations would remain basic to continued prosperity in the land. Obedience was the foundation of the promised positive sanctions. Corporate prosperity is therefore ethically conditional.

LIMITS TO GROWTH

For I will have respect unto you, and make you fruitful, and multiply you, and establish my covenant with you. And ye shall eat old store, and bring forth the old because of the new (Lev. 26:9–10).

The theocentric meaning of this passage is easy to summarize: God, who is the author of life, establishes the covenantal laws governing life. These are boundaries: point three of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. A Biological Promise

The biological promise in verse 9 is two-fold: the multiplication of obedient covenant-keepers in history and the equal or greater multiplication of their crops. This two-fold promise is covenantal. It is therefore ethically conditional.

The dual positive sanctions of a growing population and growing food supplies are tied to the law of God. As in the case of every positive covenantal sanction, there is an unstated assumption: the threat of negative sanctions. In this case, the negative sanctions match the positive sanctions: (1) zero population growth or even population decline; (2) hunger. Corporate disobedience calls forth these negative sanctions.

Were these two sanctions part of what I have called seed and land laws? No. A seed law, in the sense that I am using it in this commentary, was tied to the promised Seed, the Messiah, the prophesied son of Judah. It had to do with maintaining the tribal divisions in Mosaic Israel until Shiloh came (Gen. 49:10). The earlier promise given to Abraham regarding the multiplication of his heirs through the Seed, Jesus Christ (seed, in Paul's sense)² was not a seed law sanction in the sense that I am using the term, i.e., Jacob's later prophecy. Jacob's prophecy governed the promise up to the coming of the Seed: the end of the Old Covenant. God's promise to Abraham regarding the multiplication of his seed—heirs—applies to both Old and New Covenants: a cross-boundary covenant and promise (Gen. 15:5). Its mark in the Old Covenant was circumcision (Gen. 17:10). This was a covenantal stipulation in the sense of confession rather than geography: a visible boundary separation from covenant-breakers rather than geographical boundary separations among biological units (tribes). Leviticus 26:9 is an application of the Abrahamic covenant, not Jacob's tribal prophecy.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

Broadly covenantal sanctions applied outside of the land of Israel. That is, these covenantal sanctions were common grace sanctions. Societies that obeyed the covenant's external laws would prosper; those that rebelled would not. The promise of high population growth in this passage was an implicit threat of reduced population for rebellion. The archetype of this threat was Noah's Flood: a pre-Abrahamic sanction. God will not again bring a flood to cut off all mankind, but He does reduce the populations of rebellious societies, primarily through the covenantally predictable effects of social organization in a particular natural environment.

B. The Curse of Hunger

Hunger is a major covenantal threat in God's law. "Because thou servedst not the LORD thy God with joyfulness, and with gladness of heart, for the abundance of all things; Therefore shalt thou serve thine enemies which the LORD shall send against thee, in hunger, and in thirst, and in nakedness, and in want of all things: and he shall put a yoke of iron upon thy neck, until he have destroyed thee" (Deut. 28: 47–48). Again, "They that be slain with the sword are better than they that be slain with hunger: for these pine away, stricken through for want of the fruits of the field" (Lam. 4:9).

Food is therefore a major covenantal blessing. This blessing is stated in Leviticus 25:10 in a way that is easily recognized by an agricultural people: "And ye shall eat old store, and bring forth the old because of the new." The time of greatest potential crisis for an agricultural society is the period immediately preceding the harvest. The old store is running low; the new store has not yet arrived. The word for “old” is used with regard to the stored produce in the year following the jubilee year. “And ye shall sow the eighth year, and eat yet of old fruit until the ninth year; until her fruits come in ye shall eat of the old store” (Lev. 25:22). God’s promise is not slack. Israel need not fear famine; the stored crop will not be entirely consumed before the new crop is harvested.

2. "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ" (Gal. 3:16).

This means that the covenantal blessing of “fruitfulness” was comprehensive, applying equally to the fertility of obedient covenant-keeping families and to their crops. The rate of human population growth inside the boundaries of Israel would be matched by the rate of population growth in the fields. In this way, God promised to confirm His covenant publicly. He promised a growing population in Israel: the application of Genesis 1:28 and Genesis 9:7 to His covenant people, the true heirs of the promise. This means that God’s corporate, covenantal standard for the expansion of covenant-keeping families is above 2.1 children per family, which is the biological replacement rate.

The modern world understands hunger as a threat to humanity—not a curse, which is personal, but a threat. Unlike the Bible, a majority of modern humanist intellectuals and their accomplices within Christianity have contrasted the blessing of food with population growth. They have argued since the mid-1960s that in order for the world’s poorest people to attain sufficient food supplies, they must be willing to reduce the size of their families. These intellectuals have also frequently argued that the West, which has abundant quantities of food, must give away food to the world’s poor. This means having Western governments give food away to the governments of Third World (aid-receiving) nations. Such political food transfers have been going on throughout the post-World War II era.

Anti-population growth proponents refuse to admit that there is no specter of famine haunting the vast majority of humanity, and where it does haunt a handful of small, backward nations, all located in Africa, this is the result of government policies, such as: (1) war, especially civil war; (2) a government monopoly on the purchase of food from farmers, with prices set far below market prices; or (3) government intervention into the local agricultural economy.³ That is to say,

3. An example: the decision by Western nations in the late 1960s to dig water wells in sub-Saharan Africa, which led the nomads to locate their herds close to the “free” water. This produced overgrazing and famine in the mid-1970s. See Claire Sterling, “The people face food shortages because the free market is not allowed to function.⁴

C. Physical Limits to Growth

Boundaries are limits. In a finite world, there are limits to every promise of growth. These limits may be geographical or they may be economic, but there are limits to growth. This is the inescapable reality of finitude. The process of compound physical growth cannot go on forever in a finite world. Growth has temporal limits.⁵

1. Population Growth

God calls for population growth because He calls for covenantal obedience. He wants to see positive growth in covenant-keeping societies. Long-term compound growth is a moral imperative in God's covenantal universe. Long-term stagnation is a sign of God's curse. Yet there are unquestionably limits to growth. This is why God's call for population growth points to God's final judgment at the end of history and the transformation of mankind into a host like the angels: fixed numbers, either in the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14–15) or in the resurrected New Heaven and New Earth (Rev. 21:1–2).

Covenant-breakers who do not wish to think about the final judgment have become advocates of zero population growth: an exchange, either compulsory or voluntary, either natural or political, of a compounding human population for extra eons of time. The growing acceptance by intellectuals in the West of the zero-population growth movement⁶ and the zero economic growth movement,⁷ which became Making of the Sub-Saharan Wasteland," Atlantic Monthly (May 1974).

4. Appendix G: "Malthusianism vs. Covenantalism."

5. Gary North, "The Theology of the Exponential Curve," The Freeman (May 1970). (<http://bit.ly/NorthCurve>). Reprinted in North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 8. (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>)

6. Lincoln H. and Alice Taylor Day, Too Many Americans (New York: Delta, [1963] 1965); William and Paul Paddock, Famine—1975! America's Decision: Who Will Survive? (Boston: Little, Brown, 1967); Paul Ehrlich, The Population Bomb (New York: Ballantine, 1968); Gordon Rattray Taylor, The Biological Time Bomb (New York: World, 1968); Population and the American Future, the Report of the Commission on Population Growth and the American Future (New York: New American Library, 1972). For an economist's critique, see Jacqueline Kasun, The War Against Population: The Economics and Ideology of World Population Control (San Francisco: Ignatius, 1988).

7. Ezra J. Mishan, The Costs of Economic Growth (New York: Praeger, 1967); Mishan, The Economic Growth Debate: An Assessment (London: George Allen & Unwin, a unified cause and intellectual fad almost overnight in the mid-1960s, testifies to the presence of widespread covenant-breaking and philosophies to match. In 1970, the world's population could have been housed in American middle-class comfort in a city the size of Texas and New Mexico—15% of United States land—with a population density no larger than what one-third of Americans experienced. If people had been content to live in a city as crowded as New York City, they could all have fit in the state of Montana.⁸ Yet intellectuals became fearful of the “population bomb.”

2. Living Space

At some point, even covenant-keepers will run out of living space if they continue to grow in number. They will reach environmental limits: boundaries beyond which man's dominion cannot extend. We need to consider three facts regarding man's limits to growth. First, any rate of growth, if compounded, eventually becomes exponential. The population of any multiplying species approaches infinity as a limit. But environmental finitude makes its presence felt long before population infinitude is reached. The environment places limits on growth. No species can maintain a positive growth rate indefinitely. Second, mankind, unlike the angels, is not a numerically fixed host in history. Yet mankind is ultimately limited by the environment. This fact points to the ultimate limit to growth: time. At some point, mankind will reach its maximum population. Third, and by far the most significant fact, this point in time of maximum population is reached when God returns in final judgment. What must be understood is that this maximum population limit is covenantal more than environmental. It comes because God runs out of mercy for covenant-breakers, not because mankind runs out of living space or food.

The limits of nature and the reality of compound growth indicate a point in history when mankind reaches a maximum. We do not know where this point is—it is in this sense indeterminate—but we know that the environment does impose limits. The economist's evidence for this is the rising price of some goods in relation to others. One thing cannot grow forever. It is governed by what the economist calls the law of diminishing returns.⁹ But this "Newtonian" insight is significant only insofar as it warns rational covenant-breakers of the reality of finitude and the limits to growth. The reality of finitude is not nearly so significant a limit as the reality of covenantal rebellion. It is not mankind's fertility in general that presses our species toward its biological limits; it is rather covenant-breaking man's rebellion that reaches God's judicial limits in history. While the logic of finitude does warn scientific man of autonomous mankind's limits—the destruction of all meaning in the heat death of the universe (absolute zero)—this insight can be misinterpreted by covenant-breakers. They can (and have) proposed technical solutions to a covenantal problem. One such proposed solution is the zero-growth ideology.

1977); Donella Meadows, et al., The Limits to Growth (New York: Universe Books, 1972); E. F. Schumacher, Small Is Beautiful: Economics As If People Mattered (New York: Harper & Row, 1973); Mancur Olson and Hans H. Landsberg (eds.), The No-Growth Society (New York: Norton, 1973); Leopold Kohr, The Overdeveloped Nations: The Diseconomies of Scale (New York: Schocken, 1977). For a critique, see E. Calvin Beisner, Prospects for Growth: A Biblical View of Population, Resources, and the Future (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, 1990).

8. Robert L. Sasone, Handbook on Population (Author, 1972), p. 98.

3. Limits: Newtonian vs. Covenantal

According to a strictly Newtonian interpretation of the environmental limits to growth, the faster the rate of compound growth, the sooner growth will cease or time will run out. The greater the blessings of growth, the shorter the time remaining before time runs out or mankind ceases to grow. Man's limits are regarded as exclusively environmental.

The Bible speaks of other limits as more fundamental. God brings final judgment in response to a final rebellion of human covenant-breakers against human covenant-keepers (Rev. 20:7–10). The discussion of the limits to growth needs to be framed in terms of the Bible's covenantal limits—moral, judicial, and eschatological—rather than in terms of Newtonian environmental limits: mathematical, physical, and biological.¹⁰

9. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 30.

10. There are some journalists and social thinkers who prefer to substitute quantum mechanics for Newtonian mechanics as a model for social theory. They want to escape the Newtonian world's determinate limits to growth by means of an appeal to the indeterminacy of the quantum world: physical indeterminacy, not merely conceptual. The two most prominent American authors who take this approach are George Gilder and Warren Brookes. At the time of his death in December of 1991, Brookes was working on a book developing this idea. He and I had spent hours on the phone discussing this issue. He had presented an early version of his thesis in The Economy in Mind (New York: Universe Books, 1982), ch. 1. He was a Christian Scientist

The growth of population points either to the limits of growth or the limits of time. Because the Bible affirms that the limits to covenant-keeping man's population growth are covenantal rather than biological, the Bible affirms that there will be a final judgment. The Bible's promise of growth in one segment of the human population—covenant-keepers—is a testimony to the end of history. Men are expected to obey God's law; if they do, God promises to extend to them the positive sanction of growth. Therefore, time will run out. But, the Bible also tells us, time will run out before mankind presses against unyielding environmental limits. The primary limit to growth in history is covenantal. The environmental limits to growth are merely theoretical—not hypothetical, but determinate physical limits that are indeterminate in man's knowledge.

D. Social Limits to Growth

The more fundamental limits to growth are social. This is the economic manifestation of the covenantal principle of hierarchy. Not everyone can attend the best universities, drive the finest automobiles, and wear the latest fashions. These goods are limited in supply. We cannot produce many more of them, so competition to use or own them is intense. Fred Hirsch used the analogy of the person at a sporting event who wants to see the game more clearly. He stands up. But eventually, others also stand up. Then one person stands on tiptoe. Others do the same. Eventually, the tallest people with the strongest lower leg muscles get the best view. So, society informally agrees to sit down at sporting events and in concert halls, since this is less taxing on everyone's leg muscles, and in the long run, nobody can overcome his height limits. Hirsch's point: in this case—seeing over everyone's head—what a few people can do, not everyone can do at the same time. He and leaned toward accepting non-physical explanations of man's condition. Gilder outlines his thesis in Microcosm (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1989). Eloquent as Gilder is regarding the exponential increase in the power of computers, he cannot apply his thesis to population growth. Bodies cannot escape into the realm of the quantum in order to evade the limits to growth. Gilder invokes Moore's Law, which says that the number of transistors on commercial microchips doubles every 18 months. This law has held true since the late 1960s. The law seems to overcome certain physical limits. But Moore's Law does not overcome the limits on biological growth. Moore's Law was discovered by Gordon Moore, the co-founder of Intel, the largest American microchip producer. On Moore's Law and its astounding implications, see Raymond Kurzweil, in The Law of Accelerating Returns (March 7, 2001). (<http://bit.ly/KurzweilSingularity>) calls such goods and services positional goods.¹¹ As economic growth continues, more and more people can afford to buy these goods, so more will be produced. When this happens, these goods lose their initial character: providing the owners with status, i.e., position. Other goods and services, more fixed in number, are then sought by those seeking status. There will always be positional goods.

1. Barriers to Entry

One of the ways that the rich defend themselves from new competitors is to create government barriers to entry. They get laws passed to keep “the unwashed” middle classes and successful entrepreneurs at a safe distance. Their problem is that the free market system extends wealth to many people. As economist Thomas Sowell describes it, the poor can outbid the rich collectively; there are so many of them. Land developers start buying of formerly unoccupied land in order to sell condominiums and other smaller property units to the upper middle class. Businessmen serve the needs of the less rich because the world of the less rich is where the money is. The less rich collectively bid valuable property away from the rich. This is especially true of scarce resources such as beachfront property and wilderness areas located within driving distance of commercial airports. In response to this competitive threat to their “free ride”—scenery they do not own or are afraid their rich neighbors’ heirs will sell to developers—the rich seal off land adjacent to their valuable property in the name of preserving the environment. They do this by having the state legislate limits on all new real estate development.¹²

2. “Old Money”

Members of the wealthiest class in the United States—what some analysts have called “Old Money”—have for over a century regarded themselves as the trustees of the nation’s beautiful things: art and scenic land. By trustees, they have in mind those special people who can properly maintain these assets, mainly for themselves and their own social class. As the value of these scarce positional goods has increased, these self-appointed trustees have sought government intervention to enable them to keep the middle classes away from these treasures.

11. Fred Hirsch, The Social Limits to Growth (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1978), p. 11.

12. Thomas Sowell, “Those Phony Environmentalists,” Los Angeles Herald Examiner (March 23, 1979); reprinted in Sowell, Pink and Brown People and Other Controversial Essays (Stanford, California: Hoover Institution Press, 1981), pp. 104–5. See my summary in North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 44:J.

Nature is regarded by the Old Money as the means of an ordeal process (i.e., initiation rite) which the young males of this class are supposed to experience as a means of both health and maturation.¹³ For example, at the age of 23, future author Francis Parkman (The Oregon Trail, 1849) was sent west by his wealthy Boston family for his health just prior to the California gold strike that launched the great gold rush. Over the next half century, he was followed by many others of his class.¹⁴ Among them was the Old Money's most famous career model, Theodore Roosevelt, who spent much of his youth in the West shooting game, and who, as President of the United States (1900–1909), became the legendary promoter of conservation and Federal land control through a system of national parks.¹⁵

A new paganism has appeared, and members of the Old Rich have been its dedicated promoters. As Nelson Aldrich, one of their own, wrote in 1988: "Nature worship today is laying the spiritual and institutional groundwork for the closest thing to a widespread social religion (as opposed to the individualistic religion of success) that Americans have ever had. Nature is sacred to millions of people in America. . . ." ¹⁶

We have now entered the political battle for control over nature, he said, a battle that is both religious and economic. "The social religion of Nature, which began with rich kids going outdoors for their health, ends in political action against the market—the condo developers, the shopping-mall impresarios, the army of entrepreneurs whom Old Money (and not Old Money alone) imagines to be despoiling Arcadia."¹⁷ As Aldrich's book makes clear, the Old Money deeply distrusts and sometimes even despises the open-entry system known 13. Nelson W. Aldrich, Jr., Old Money: The Mythology of America's Upper Class (New York: Knopf, 1988), pp. 158–69. Aldrich was the great-grandson of the U. S. Senator who in 1912 introduced the original version of the legislation that created the Federal Reserve System (1913), the quasi-private U.S. central bank. The original Aldrich became fabulously wealthy as a pay-off from the business and banking interests that controlled him throughout his career, as this book chronicles without remorse.

14. Ibid., p. 160.

15. Ibid., p. 161.

16. Ibid., p. 158.

17. Ibid., p. 169.

as the free market, for the free market transfers economic power to the masses. This is why Old Money supports such organizations as the Nature Conservancy, the Wilderness Society, and the Sierra Club.¹⁸ These groups are using their tax-exempt foundation status to buy up and seal off millions of acres of land across the nation. They use tax money to do it.

The system works approximately like this. First, these organizations target certain prime wilderness areas. Second, individuals in the know buy land near these targeted areas, thereby locking up property that, in Warren Brookes' words, is ideal for "profitable upscale adjacent residential development that is then used to finance still more acquisition."¹⁹ Third, they use tax-deductible money to buy up the prime land that makes the nearby developed areas valuable. Fourth, they sell these prime parcels—but not the land designated for development—to the United States government, thereby halting any further development inside the newly "socialized" boundaries. Fifth, they develop their privately owned parcels. Presto: a marvelous legal monopoly, purchased at low prices in part with taxpayers' money. A similar process works internationally. Large New York banks—protected by the United States government's bank deposit insurance system and also by the policies of the quasi-private Federal Reserve System—are making debt-for-nature swaps, exchanging their now-depreciated Third World debt certificates for prime land in those nations.²⁰ This process also can be used to remove prime land from development by those other than the favored few.

Aldrich wrote: "The roots of Old Money environmentalism go back to the most fiercely protected of all the treasures of Old Money, the summer places on the coast of Maine, their 'camps' in the Adirondacks, their ranches out West."²¹ An early operational model of this plan was designed by John D. Rockefeller, Jr. He bought a summer home on Mt. Desert Island in Maine. This unique island became the summer center of America's Establishment—the place where elites from different fields—finance, industry, journalism, foreign policy, and 18. Ibid., pp. 222–23. For a brief survey of these three groups, see Jo Kwong Echard, Protecting the Environment: Old Rhetoric, New Imperatives (Washington, D.C.: Capital Research Center, 1990), Appendixes 8–10.

19. Warren Brookes, Washington Times (Jan. 29, 1991), cited by Larry Abraham and Franklin Sanders, The Greening (Atlanta, Georgia: Soundview, 1993), p. 93.

20. Abraham and Sanders, Greening, pp. 51–53, 59–61, 93.

21. Aldrich, Old Money, p. 223.

religion—met and mixed with each other.²² Rockefeller and Edsel Ford, along with other affluent neighbors, over a period of years bought up 5,000 acres on the island and then turned this property over to the National Park Service in 1916. This became the first national park in the eastern states.²³ Two pairs of favorable biographers insist that this was in no way a self-serving act because Rockefeller then went on to promote national conservation all over the country.²⁴ On the contrary, this conservation impulse is enormously self-serving. Buying up geographically unique and aesthetically desirable land for personal use and then placing the surrounding property under government control is part of a systematic elitist strategy. The rich maintain the “unspoiled” wilderness which lies on the fringes of their spacious retreats—“unspoiled” in this case meaning “legally cut off from the less rich.” The less rich may be allowed to hike in, but they are not allowed to buy land, build cabins, and in other ways permanently “spoil nature.” This process of selective exclusion through government control accelerated as the twentieth century moved forward.

E. Angelic Hosts Are Fixed; Races Are Not

Living species multiply. Angels do not. The angels constitute a fixed host. In heaven and hell, the number of angels remains constant. This fact of life is rarely discussed by theologians and never by social theorists. It should be. It is fundamental to understanding the ultimate origin of the zero population growth ideology.

Satan rules representatively, just as God does. He rules hierarchically. But, unlike God, Satan is neither omniscient nor omnipotent. His decree is that of a creature: under God’s decree. This has organizational consequences for the way he exercises power. He is dependent on the supply of information flowing to him, whether from demonic beings or from other sources. This flow of information is limited. It contains “noise,” just as it does for humans. God is omniscient; Satan is not. He gets confused. He has trouble monitoring the thoughts and activities of those under his covenant.

22. William R. Hutchison, “Protestantism as Establishment,” in Hutchison (ed.), Between the Times: The Travail of the Protestant Establishment in America, 1900–1960 (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1989), p. 10.

23. Peter Collier and David Horowitz, The Rockefellers: An American Dynasty (New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1976), p. 147.

24. Ibid., p. 148; John Ensor Harr and Peter J. Johnson, The Rockefeller Century (New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1988), p. 200.

This flow of information is finite. So is his power to make decisions and enforce them. To the extent that his sources of information and power depend on the activities of those under his command, he faces a problem. The more people he needs to monitor, the greater the flow of accurate information necessary to his empire. The greater the number of people, the more strain this places on the resources at his disposal. In short, Satan's host is put under ever-greater pressure as the human population under their covenantal authority grows. This is even more true of the pressures brought by those under God's covenantal authority. The more covenant-keepers on earth, the more the breakdown of Satan's control. Like a juggler who has to keep a growing number of oranges in the air, so is Satan.

People are a threat to Satan. They multiply; his demonic host does not. Even covenant-breakers pose a problem: the coordination of Satan's plans becomes more difficult as mankind's numbers increase. Then there is the eschatological threat: a major move by the Holy Spirit could adopt large numbers of covenant-breakers into the family of God. When this happens, Satan's fixed host will have their hands full, to use a non-angelic expression. More than full: they will find control over events slipping through the equivalent of their fingers.

The increase of mankind's numbers poses no threat to the host of heaven, for God is absolutely sovereign. God is not dependent on His angels for information. God does not suffer from information overload. There is no noise in God's perception. The angels of heaven need not rely on their own mastery of history. They rely on God. Thus, for the angels, the multiplication of humanity poses no organizational threat. They outnumber Satan's host by two to one. Stars and angels are linked symbolically in Scripture. We read: "And there appeared another wonder in heaven; and behold a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his heads. And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth: and the dragon stood before the woman which was ready to be delivered, for to devour her child as soon as it was born" (Rev. 12:3-4).²⁵ Two-thirds were loyal.

A growing population creates problems for any creature who would seek to control history. The addition of more humans creates problems for Satan and his host. Men necessarily must represent either God or Satan in history. Those who represent Satan are rebels, 25. The numbers of the judgments on earth described in Revelation 8 also indicate a two-to-one advantage.

just as he is. They cannot be trusted, just as he cannot be trusted. Thus, Satan benefits from a growing population only insofar as he can keep them under his covenant and entrap them. The threat of their rejection of his covenant grows ever-greater over time. More humans will join God's forces, and more likelihood that God will send His promised days of blessing.²⁶

This is why the zero population growth movement and the abortion movement can be accurately described as satanic. These movements are not ethically neutral responses to widespread sociological forces that threaten mankind's survival. They are religious movements that are opposed to the positive blessings of God, which in turn promote His kingdom.

F. Israel's Limits

The question for Israel was this: When these limits to population growth were reached inside the nation's geographical boundaries, how did God expect the Israelites to overcome these population limits? There were either geographical limits or population limits. Walking to the feasts placed geographical limits on Israel, but without limits on Israel's population, Israel's geographical limits would be breached. Conclusion: God mandated another exodus beyond the borders of Israel when He established population expansion as His covenantal standard. The Israelites were expected to move outside of the geographical boundaries of Israel. This was the meaning of Christ's metaphor of new wine in old wineskins (Matt. 9:17): the fermenting new wine would burst its inflexible container. His people were always intended to inherit the earth, not just the land of Israel.

For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth (Ps. 37:9).

But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace (Ps. 37:11).

For such as be blessed of him shall inherit the earth; and they that be cursed of him shall be cut off (Ps. 37:22).

Inheritance in Israel implied growth for obedient covenant-keepers: growth in the number of heirs and growth in the value of their individual inheritances. But geographical limits—family land, tribal land, national land—were judicially fixed by the terms of the conquest. A growing number of heirs necessitated a declining per capita landed inheritance within the Promised Land. This pointed to the eschatological nature of God's covenantal laws of inheritance: a transcending of Israel's geographical boundaries. The promised inheritance of covenant-keepers pointed to the breaking of the boundaries of the Promised Land. The limits to growth of confessional Israel would not be the boundaries of geographical Israel. The original conquest of Canaan would cease to be a limiting factor in the extension of God's covenantal boundaries.

26. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology, 2nd. ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1992] 1997). (<http://bit/klghshd>)

G. Entropy

There is a trade-off between population growth and time remaining to mankind. The covenant-breaker understands this trade-off. Above all else, he wishes to escape final judgment, and understandably so. Thus, he seeks to find some way around the covenantal implications of population growth. One way of doing this is to deny that mankind's growth will continue in history. It will stop, covenant-breakers insist, but this will not end history. Another way of doing this is to deny that history will end as a result of God's Second Coming in final judgment. Instead, the universe itself will bring impersonal judgment to the processes of time: the heat death of the universe. This is the final judgment of the second law of thermodynamics: the one-way movement of kinetic (potential) energy into heat. Entropy will smother all life and motion, including time itself, in its frozen grip of absolute zero.²⁷

The covenant-breaker prefers this view of universal impersonal death to the Bible's view of personal death, meaning the second death: "And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death. And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire" (Rev. 20:14–15). Better the "heat death" of the universe—frozen wastes—than the eternal heat death of covenant breakers.

Any attempt to place an absolute environmental limit around mankind's long-term population growth, while simultaneously affirming the extension of time beyond this absolute limit, is necessarily an attempt to deny or deflect the biblical doctrine of final judgment. It is the inevitability of some final physical limit to the population growth of covenant-keepers that points to one of two things: (1) the future breaking of the corporate covenant, but without God's temporal judgments against covenant-breakers, and without the subsequent restoration of His people, i.e., (a) a steady-state, zero-growth population or (b) a shrinking population; or (2) the end of history, either because of (a) God's final judgment or (b) the death of mankind as a species.

27. Gary North, Is the World Running Down?: Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

In order to affirm both the reliability and inevitability of God's corporate, covenantal promises (i.e., His positive biological sanctions) in history, the Christian has to insist on the covenantal inevitability of the final judgment, when mankind will at last become a fixed host: covenant-keepers (New Heaven and New Earth) and covenant-breakers (lake of fire). Either man's corporate growth will cease in history or history will cease. God's covenantal promises point to the second option. The promises of God insist that corporate growth will not cease where men keep God's covenant law-order. These promises include the restoration in history of a formerly covenant-keeping society after its people have broken God's law.

And I will restore thy judges as at the first, and thy counsellors as at the beginning; afterward thou shalt be called, The city of righteousness, the faithful city (Isa. 1:26).

For I will restore health unto thee, and I will heal thee of thy wounds, saith the LORD; because they called thee an Outcast, saying, This is Zion, whom no man seeketh after (Jer. 30:17).

Know therefore and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem unto the Messiah the Prince shall be seven weeks, and threescore and two weeks: the street shall be built again, and the wall, even in troublous times (Dan. 9:25).

H. The Malthusians

When Rev. Thomas Robert Malthus wrote his anonymous first edition of his Essay on the Principle of Population (1798), he accelerated a great debate over the desirability of population growth. Although in later editions of his famous essay he modified the stark environmentalism of the original, it is his original words that have been cited again and again: "Population, when unchecked, increases in a geometrical ratio. Subsistence increases only in an arithmetical ratio."²⁸ Put another way, the population of the species man grows at a geometrical rate, while the populations that man consumes grow at an arithmetical rate. This indicates that man is something special in creation: a species limited by its environment in a unique way. Also, geometrical (exponential) growth being what it is, mankind reaches its environmental limits a lot faster than any other species does. How, then, can mankind keep growing? Why, by 1798, had not mankind long since reached its limits to growth? Why was the population of Europe accelerating rapidly by the time Malthus wrote his essay? There are no obvious answers, which may be why Malthus abandoned this now-familiar phrase in the many subsequent editions of the essay.

From 1798 until today, there have been avid followers of some version of Malthus' error. They regard man as a cancer on a benign host, nature. Western man is the most cancerous of all. Western man is dominion man, and this spells the end of nature, said "deep ecologist"²⁹ Bill McKibben: "We have deprived nature of its independence, and that is fatal to its meaning. Nature's independence is its meaning; without it there is nothing but us."³⁰ He is correct: the Western world still lives intellectually in the shadow of Genesis 1:26–28. "The idea that the rest of creation might count for as much as we do is spectacularly foreign, even to most environmentalists."³¹ Man is seen by deep ecologists as a uniquely destructive species in nature.

The question of man's population growth is connected to the question of time. If man's population growth remains positive, then either time or space will run out eons before the heat death of the universe brings its impersonal judgment on the universe. The humanist decries the first outcome—mankind's filling up of his environmental space—because he recoils in terror at the thought of the second. But man will fill the earth. This will fulfill a major aspect of the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:28). After that comes the final rebellion and the final

28. Thomas Robert Malthus, An Essay on the Principle of Population (New York: Penguin Books, [1798] 1982), p. 71.

29. The deep ecologists go beyond ecologists who want scientific planners to protect the environment in the name of mankind's higher interests. The deep ecologists want nature to govern man, or at the very least, want scientific planners to sacrifice mankind's desires in the name of nature's autonomy and therefore its authority over the wants of men.

30. Bill McKibben, The End of Nature (New York: Random House, 1989), p. 58.

31. Ibid., p. 174.

judgment (Rev. 20:7–9). This eschatological scenario alienates humanists of both persuasions: mechanical and organic. It rests on a presupposition: the environment is under man. If true, then nature is not autonomous.

The autonomy of nature implies the near-permanence of nature. For the humanist, man's meaning must be subordinated to nature's permanence. To save man from God's judgments, man must submit to nature's. McKibben wrote: "The chief lesson is that the world displays a lovely order, an order comforting in its intricacy. And the most appealing part of this harmony, perhaps, is its permanence—the sense that we are part of something with roots stretching back nearly forever, and branches reaching forward just as far. Purely human life provides only a partial fulfillment of this desire for a kind of immortality. . . . But the earth and all its processes—the sun growing plants, flesh feeding on these plants, flesh decaying to nourish more plants, to name just one cycle—gives us some sense of a more enduring role."³² It is nature's cyclical processes within a temporally unbounded universe that supposedly provide meaning to man, who alone in the universe perceive nature's meaning. If time is essentially unbounded but the environment is not, then man's population must be made bounded. A growing human population is a threat to this worldview: a worldview bounded by physical limits rather than temporal. Temporal limits are too dangerous, for they imply a God beyond time who breaks into time, bringing final judgment.

The Malthusians challenge the possibility and therefore the legitimacy of temporally unbounded compound growth. The idea that God rewards covenantally faithful societies with expansion—numerically, economically, and geographically—appalls the Malthusians. The growth-oriented secular economist is willing to challenge the Malthusian vision, but only because he refuses to discuss biological limits as absolute limits.³³ But there are biological limits, even though the human population may reach 30 billion or 40 billion or 500 billion before these limits are reached. The fact is, the biological limits to mankind's growth on earth are measured in centuries, not eons. The limit of the speed of light restricts man's geographical extension. This brings covenant-breaking man face to face with one of two limits: biological expansion or temporal extension.

32. Ibid., p. 73.

33. Economists rarely discuss absolute limits. To them, all limits are marginal and relative.

Conclusion

The fundamental economic issue is not population growth. It is not the increase of food per capita. It is not capital invested per person. The fundamental economic issue is ethical: God's covenant. Nevertheless, the language of Leviticus 26:9–10 is agricultural. Why? Because in an agricultural society, the mark of God's blessing is food. God promised to provide bread for all. He also promised to increase their numbers.

This does not mean that He promised nothing else to them. He promised an agricultural people access in history to the city of God, the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21). The city of God is the image of a regenerate society. The city is therefore not inherently evil. Urban life is not inherently depersonalizing. Covenant-breaking is evil and depersonalizing. Covenant-breaking is made less expensive in cities because of the higher costs of gathering information about individual actions, as well as the higher costs of imposing informal social sanctions. The anonymity of urban life makes social pressures to conform to moral standards much less effective than they are in rural or small-town regions. But covenant-breaking is not uniquely inherent to cities. It can be overcome through God's grace.

If this were not the case, then the promise of population growth would be a threat to the covenant. A covenantal blessing would inevitably become a covenantal curse. The grace of God would necessarily produce the wrath of God. This is the operational viewpoint of both premillennialism and amillennialism regarding church history, but it is a false view of history.³⁴ While covenantal blessings can and have led to corporate covenant-breaking, just as God warns (Lev. 26; Deut. 8; 28), they do not inevitably lead to them. The covenant's blessings are conditional; they do not continue indefinitely irrespective of corporate obedience. God's negative corporate sanctions come in history, and then society is given another opportunity to repent and rebuild: "And they shall build the old wastes, they shall raise up the former desolations, and they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations" (Isa. 61: 4).

The biblical view of history is growth-oriented. It not only proclaims the possibility of population expansion and increasing wealth per capita, it also establishes these as mandatory corporate goals in history. Until mankind becomes a fixed host at the end of history—covenant-breakers in the lake of fire eternally (Rev. 20:14–15), covenant-keepers developing the New Heaven and New Earth (Rev. 21; 22)—covenant-keeping mankind is expected by God to grow in numbers, wealth, and influence.

34. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), chaps. 4, 5, 9. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

GOD'S ESCALATING WRATH

I am the LORD your God, which brought you forth out of the land of Egypt, that ye should not be their bondmen; and I have broken the bands of your yoke, and made you go upright. But if ye will not hearken unto me, and will not do all these commandments; And if ye shall despise my statutes, or if your soul abhor my judgments, so that ye will not do all my commandments, but that ye break my covenant: I also will do this unto you; I will even appoint over you terror, consumption, and the burning ague, that shall consume the eyes, and cause sorrow of heart: and ye shall sow your seed in vain, for your enemies shall eat it. And I will set my face against you, and ye shall be slain before your enemies: they that hate you shall reign over you; and ye shall flee when none pursueth you (Lev. 26:13–17).

The theocentric issue here is the fear of God, which is related to His law and its negative sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. Sanctions and Succession

This passage introduces that section of Leviticus 26 which lists the types of negative corporate sanctions in history that Israel could expect if God's covenant people violated God's law. As is true of Deuteronomy 28, a parallel passage on corporate sanctions, the negative sanctions greatly outnumber the positive sanctions. The Israelites were to understand the theocentric basis of wisdom: "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom: and the knowledge of the holy is understanding" (Prov. 9:10).

This section on sanctions appears in the fifth section of the Book of Leviticus. The fifth point of the covenant deals with succession. Why does a section on sanctions appear here? Because sanctions are linked covenantally to succession. This is why eschatology cannot be separated covenantally from theonomy, i.e., God's law and its biblically mandated sanctions. Sanctions determine who will inherit what: inheritance and disinheritance. God identifies Himself as the God of the covenant: deliverer, law-giver, and sanctions-bringer. God's threat of temporal wrath is to redirect the attention of citizens of a holy commonwealth to the possibility of disinheritance in history: wrath as the prelude to corporate disinheritance.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2010), ch. 4.

B. The Fear of God

The passage begins with a reminder: the God who threatens these historical sanctions is the God of corporate grace in history. He led them out of bondage in Egypt. They had been bent under the yoke of slavery, but He had broken their yoke and made them walk upright. This upright physical walk was analogous to an upright ethical walk. The language of walking before God is the language of covenantal obedience, both individual and corporate.² The morally crooked walk is mirrored by the bent walk of the slave who is under a yoke.

The temptation is always disobedience to God's standards (point three of the biblical covenant model). "But if ye will not hearken unto me, and will not do all these commandments; And if ye shall despise my statutes, or if your soul abhor my judgments, so that ye will not do all my commandments, but that ye break my covenant." This necessarily involves the threat of negative sanctions (point four). "I will even appoint over you terror, consumption, and the burning ague, that shall consume the eyes, and cause sorrow of heart." The essence of this sanction is disinheritance (point five). "And ye shall sow your seed in vain, for your enemies shall eat it." Invaders will inherit: "And I will set

2. "And when Abram was ninety years old and nine, the LORD appeared to Abram, and said unto him, I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect" (Gen. 17:1). "And ye shall not walk in the manners of the nation, which I cast out before you: for they committed all these things, and therefore I abhorred them" (Lev. 20:23). "In the ninth year of Hoshea the king of Assyria took Samaria, and carried Israel away into Assyria, and placed them in Halah and in Habor by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes. For so it was, that the children of Israel had sinned against the LORD their God, which had brought them up out of the land of Egypt, from under the hand of Pharaoh king of Egypt, and had feared other gods, And walked in the statutes of the heathen, whom the LORD cast out from before the children of Israel, and of the kings of Israel, which they had made" (II Kings 17:6–8).

my face against you, and ye shall be slain before your enemies: they that hate you shall reign over you; and ye shall flee when none pursueth you." So fearful will God's people become that they will flee when none pursue.

The covenantal issue is the fear of God. When men refuse to fear God, He raises up others who will terrify them. Covenant-breakers will thereby learn to fear God's human agents of wrath, so that they might better learn to fear God. The point is this: God is worth fearing even more than military invaders. If the stipulations of the Creator are widely ignored, then military invaders will become increasingly difficult to ignore. In this regard, the covenant-breaking adult is as foolish as a child. A father spansks a child when the child runs into a busy street. The real threat to the child is the street's traffic, but the child is fearless before this external threat. He must learn to fear his father in order to learn the greater fearfulness of the street. He fears the lesser threat more than the greater threat. Similarly, the sinning covenant-breaker loses his fear of the Father—the far greater threat—and must be reminded to fear God by a lesser external threat. The magnitude of God's wrath is manifested by the magnitude of the threat of military sanctions: God's wrath is more of a threat than a military defeat. The lesser threat is imposed by God in order to remind men of the greater threat.

C. Softening Their Resistance

The first negative sanction is both psychological and physical: terror and consumption. This will produce sorrow. This defensive mentality is the mentality of the slave and the prisoner. The second threatened negative sanction is military defeat. If this threat fails to persuade them to repent, the sanctions will escalate further. "And if ye will not yet for all this hearken unto me, then I will punish you seven times more for your sins" (Lev. 26:18). The stated punishment is drought. God's wrath is manifested by His destruction of the covenantal nation's food supply. This was a major threat to a pre-modern agricultural society. "And I will break the pride of your power; and I will make your heaven as iron, and your earth as brass: And your strength shall be spent in vain: for your land shall not yield her increase, neither shall the trees of the land yield their fruits" (Lev. 26: 19–20). Drought was God's means of softening up the resistance of King Ahab against Elijah's message (I Kings 17:1).

1. Inheritance

As in the case of Egypt, the next sanction involved the children: “And if ye walk contrary unto me, and will not hearken unto me; I will bring seven times more plagues upon you according to your sins. I will also send wild beasts among you, which shall rob you of your children, and destroy your cattle, and make you few in number; and your high ways shall be desolate” (Lev. 26:21–22). God sent beasts against those children who mocked the prophet Elisha: “And he went up from thence unto Bethel: and as he was going up by the way, there came forth little children out of the city, and mocked him, and said unto him, Go up, thou bald head; go up, thou bald head. And he turned back, and looked on them, and cursed them in the name of the LORD. And there came forth two she bears out of the wood, and tare [tore] forty and two children of them” (II Kings 2:23–24).

The judgments are again military: “And if ye will not be reformed by me by these things, but will walk contrary unto me; Then will I also walk contrary unto you, and will punish you yet seven times for your sins. And I will bring a sword upon you, that shall avenge the quarrel of my covenant: and when ye are gathered together within your cities, I will send the pestilence among you; and ye shall be delivered into the hand of the enemy. And when I have broken the staff of your bread, ten women shall bake your bread in one oven, and they shall deliver you your bread again by weight: and ye shall eat, and not be satisfied” (Lev. 26:23–26). Enemies laying siege outside the gates, pestilence and hunger inside the gates: so shall covenant-breakers be reminded of the importance of God’s law.

But even this may prove futile. “And if ye will not for all this hearken unto me, but walk contrary unto me; Then I will walk contrary unto you also in fury; and I, even I, will chastise you seven times for your sins. And ye shall eat the flesh of your sons, and the flesh of your daughters shall ye eat” (Lev. 26:27–29). This was fulfilled in the days of Elisha, during Ben-hadad’s siege of Samaria:

And it came to pass after this, that Ben-hadad king of Syria gathered all his host, and went up, and besieged Samaria. And there was a great famine in Samaria: and, behold, they besieged it, until an ass’s head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of dove’s dung for five pieces of silver. And as the king of Israel was passing by upon the wall, there cried a woman unto him, saying, Help, my lord, O king. And he said, If the LORD do not help thee, whence shall I help thee? out of the barnfloor, or out of the winepress? And the king said unto her, What aileth thee? And she answered, This woman said unto me, Give thy son, that we may eat him to day, and we will eat my son to morrow. So we boiled my son, and did eat him: and I said unto her on the next day, Give thy son, that we may eat him: and she hath hid her son. And it came to pass, when the king heard the words of the woman, that he rent his clothes; and he passed by upon the wall, and the people looked, and, behold, he had sackcloth within upon his flesh (II Kings 6:24–30).

2. Captivity

Destruction would come upon all the land, rural and urban. If men refused to honor the sabbatical year of release, God promised to give the land its rest through the captivity of the nation.

And I will make your cities waste, and bring your sanctuaries unto desolation, and I will not smell the savour of your sweet odours. And I will bring the land into desolation: and your enemies which dwell therein shall be astonished at it. And I will scatter you among the heathen, and will draw out a sword after you: and your land shall be desolate, and your cities waste. Then shall the land enjoy her sabbaths, as long as it lieth desolate, and ye be in your enemies' land; even then shall the land rest, and enjoy her sabbaths. As long as it lieth desolate it shall rest; because it did not rest in your sabbaths, when ye dwelt upon it" (Lev. 26:31–35).

The captivity of the people of Israel would be a negative sanction against the people and a positive sanction for the land:

The land also shall be left of them, and shall enjoy her sabbaths, while she lieth desolate without them: and they shall accept of the punishment of their iniquity: because, even because they despised my judgments, and because their soul abhorred my statutes (Lev. 26:43).

This judgment was imposed by God in the days of Jeremiah:

And they [the Chaldeans] burnt the house of God, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem, and burnt all the palaces thereof with fire, and destroyed all the goodly vessels thereof. And them that had escaped from the sword carried he away to Babylon; where they were servants to him and his sons until the reign of the kingdom of Persia: To fulfil the word of the LORD by the mouth of Jeremiah, until the land had enjoyed her sabbaths: for as long as she lay desolate she kept sabbath, to fulfil threescore and ten years (II Chron. 36:19–21).

The people were to eat the fat of the land of promise. This was God's promised positive sanction. They would feed on the land. In contrast, the negative sanction of captivity was pictured as another kind of feast: the eating of the people by a foreign land. "And ye shall perish among the heathen, and the land of your enemies shall eat you up. And they that are left of you shall pine away in their iniquity in your enemies' lands; and also in the iniquities of their fathers shall they pine away with them" (Lev. 26:38–39).

Step by step, sanction by sanction, God would bring them face to face with the magnitude of their rebellion. The goal was their repentance: "If they shall confess their iniquity, and the iniquity of their fathers, with their trespass which they trespassed against me, and that also they have walked contrary unto me; And that I also have walked contrary unto them, and have brought them into the land of their enemies; if then their uncircumcised hearts be humbled, and they then accept of the punishment of their iniquity: Then will I remember my covenant with Jacob, and also my covenant with Isaac, and also my covenant with Abraham will I remember; and I will remember the land" (Lev. 26:40–42). Negative corporate sanctions in history are designed to restore covenantal faithfulness on the part of God's people. They are not judgments unto oblivion but judgments unto restoration.

Conclusion

God's escalating wrath in history serves as a means of restoring dominion by covenant. These negative sanctions are positive in intent: restoring faithfulness and, in the case of captivity, providing rest to the land itself. These sanctions were part of the covenantal law-order of Israel. This is why the section listing the sanctions ends with these words: "These are the statutes and judgments and laws, which the LORD made between him and the children of Israel in mount Sinai by the hand of Moses" (Lev. 26:46). There is no doubt that the sanctions were part of the stipulations. There was no way for Israel to obey God's law without imposing the required negative sanctions. If the authorities refused to impose the stipulated negative sanctions, God would impose His stipulated negative sanctions. These negative sanctions would become progressively more painful. God's negative sanctions were designed to persuade men of the integrity—the seamless—of God's revealed law. If the people refused to learn from one set of punishments, God threatened to impose worse punishments.

The principle underlying this escalation of negative sanctions is simple to state: "But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more" (Luke 12:48).³ The escalating sanctions in Israel were a form of covenant-affirmation: establishing the social predictability of God's law. The reliability of God's law was visible in the escalation of God's corporate sanctions, both positive and negative.

Modern Christian theologians assume that the Mosaic Covenant's divine sanctions no longer operate in the New Covenant era.⁴ From this idea (or at least paralleling it), they conclude that the Mosaic Covenant's civil sanctions are no longer valid. This is logical, given the incorrect presupposition. The divine sanctions undergirded the Bible-revealed familial, civil, and ecclesiastical stipulations; if the authorities refused to impose these mandatory sanctions, God would then impose His sanctions. If the threat of God's corporate sanctions are removed, then the sanctions undergirding the institutional sanctions are absent. Without sanctions, there is no law. Biblical sanctions are inseparable from biblical stipulations: no sanctions = no law. Remove God's corporate sanctions in history, and the legal order becomes judicially autonomous in history.

The autonomy of society from God's Bible-revealed law is the agreed-upon agenda of an implicit alliance between the humanists and the pietists. The humanists assume that God's corporate sanctions have always been mythological. Christian pietists assume that these sanctions have been annulled by the New Covenant. This pair of false assumptions serves as the judicial basis of the humanist-pietist alliance against the ideal of God's theocratic kingdom in history: Christendom.

If God's sanctions did not operate predictably in history, it would be impossible to produce a self-consciously biblical form of social theory. Christians would have to rely on some version of pagan natural law theory in order to construct their social theories. This is what they have done for almost two millennia. With the collapse of natural law theory after Darwin, Christian social theory has floundered. Darwin's target was William Paley's providential and teleological order; he hit his target.⁵ Everyone standing behind this target has been epistemologically defenseless ever since.

3. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

4. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), ch. 7. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

5. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), pp. 347–48.

THE PRIESTHOOD: BARRIERS TO ENTRY

Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When a man shall make a singular vow, the persons shall be for the LORD by thy estimation. And thy estimation shall be of the male from twenty years old even unto sixty years old, even thy estimation shall be fifty shekels of silver, after the shekel of the sanctuary. And if it be a female, then thy estimation shall be thirty shekels. And if it be from five years old even unto twenty years old, then thy estimation shall be of the male twenty shekels, and for the female ten shekels. And if it be from a month old even unto five years old, then thy estimation shall be of the male five shekels of silver, and for the female thy estimation shall be three shekels of silver. And if it be from sixty years old and above; if it be a male, then thy estimation shall be fifteen shekels, and for the female ten shekels. But if he be poorer than thy estimation, then he shall present himself before the priest, and the priest shall value him; according to his ability that vowed shall the priest value him (Lev. 27:2–8).

The theocentric basis of this passage is that the God of the covenant does allow vows. Vows are oaths. Oaths are associated with point four of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. Vows and Succession

The question is, what kind of vow is in view here? This is one of the most peculiar passages in the Mosaic law. The rabbinical commentators do not do a better job than the Christians in explaining it, and the Christians are universally perplexed. It is obvious that vows were involved. Money payments were also involved. We need to answer two questions: What was the nature of the vow? What was the function of the money payment?

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

To begin to sort out this pair of problems, we must answer this question: What is a vow? Biblically, a vow is a lawful invocation of God's covenantal sanctions, positive and negative. To escape God's corporate negative sanctions, there must be individual vows of repentance: covenant renewal. Covenant renewal involves a public reaffirmation of God's covenant: His sovereignty, authority, law, sanctions, and triumph (historical and eschatological). These are the five points of the biblical covenant model.² A lawful public affirmation of God's covenant always comes in the form of a vow. In order to set oneself apart judicially before God, one takes a vow. Vows necessarily involve sanctions. They are self-maledictory oaths that invoke God's sanctions, positive and negative. Formal judicial separation is based on a vow; it always points to God's sanctions in history. This is why holiness (point three of the biblical covenant model) points to judgment (point four).

The vows in this instance were ecclesiastical. The Hebrew word that describes these vows, pawlaw, is translated here as "singular." The translation itself is singular: pawlaw is translated as "singular" in the King James Version only in this singular verse. It is elsewhere translated as "marvelous," "wondrous," or "separate." Lawful vows are always out of the ordinary, and these vows were very special vows among vows. They were marvelous vows. The question is: In what way?

Commentators argue about the possible reasons for the placement of this chapter at the end of Leviticus. Why should a section on vows appear at the end of a book on holiness? Gordon Wenham wrote: "It is a puzzle why ch. 27, which deals with vows, should appear in its present position, since ch. 26 with its blessings and curses would have made a fitting conclusion to the book."³ He offers two possible explanations, neither of them convincing.

I suggest the following explanation: the end of Leviticus marks a transition from a book that centers on point three of the biblical covenant model—holiness, boundaries—to a book that centers on point four: oaths, sanctions. But what about part five of the book, inheritance? Here is the central theme of this passage: the loss of inheritance in one tribe in exchange for inheritance in another tribe.

2. Sutton, chaps. 1–5. North, chaps. 1–5.

3. Gordon J. Wenham, The Book of Leviticus (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1979), p. 336.

The previous chapter, Leviticus 26, deals with God's positive and negative corporate sanctions in history. The move from an emphasis on point four of the biblical covenant model—sanctions—in Chapter 26 to point five—succession—in Chapter 27 is appropriate.⁴ Negative sanctions in the context of Chapter 26 have to do with disinheritance. Chapter 26 presents a catalogue of God's corporate covenantal sanctions. Chapter 27 begins with rules governing a particular type of personal vow. This in turn raises the issue of covenantal continuity. Jordan wrote: "Payment of vows relates to the fifth commandment, as we give to our Divine parent and thereby honor Him, and to the tenth commandment, since payment of vows and tithes is the opposite of covetousness. Thus, this final section of Leviticus has everything to do with continuity."⁵ The passage is where it belongs: in part five. The vow relates to inheritance: family continuity over time.

B. Devoted to Temple Service: Irreversible

The text does not tell us what stipulations governed this type of vow. The text also does not provide a context. This is why the commentators get so confused. The old line about "text without context is pretext" is applicable. The law was addressed to priests: "the persons shall be for the LORD by thy estimation." Whose estimation? The priests. Anything dedicated to the Lord is assumed by commentators to have been dedicated to or through the priesthood. The text is silent about the nature of the dedication; it speaks only of pricing. A gift of individuals was in some way involved because specific prices are associated in the text with specific genders and ages.

Wenham discussed this law as symbolic of a man's willingness to pledge himself or those under his authority as temple slaves. The vow-taker could not really serve God in this way, Wenham argues. Access to the temple was reserved to Levites and priests.⁶ Once the vow was made, Wenham said, the person who had made it was required to redeem himself and any other people under the vow's authority by making an appropriate payment to the temple. These singular vows specifically invoked mandatory payments. "To free themselves from the vow, they had instead to pay to the sanctuary the price they would have commanded in the slave market.”⁷ Once made, the vow had to be paid. He cites Psalm 116: “I will pay my vows unto the LORD now in the presence of all his people. Precious in the sight of the LORD is the death of his saints. O LORD, truly I am thy servant; I am thy servant, and the son of thine handmaid: thou hast loosed my bonds. I will offer to thee the sacrifice of thanksgiving, and will call upon the name of the LORD. I will pay my vows unto the LORD now in the presence of all his people” (Ps. 116:14–18).⁸ This was David’s affirmation of the law of vows, which states: “But if thou shalt forbear to vow, it shall be no sin in thee. That which is gone out of thy lips thou shalt keep and perform; even a freewill offering, according as thou hast vowed unto the LORD thy God, which thou hast promised with thy mouth” (Deut. 23:22–23).⁹

4. James B. Jordan, Covenant Sequence in Leviticus and Deuteronomy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), p. 17. (<http://bit.ly/jjcovseq>)

5. Ibid., p. 39.

6. Wenham, Leviticus, p. 338.

We need to answer two questions. First, was Wenham correct about the exclusively symbolic nature of this type of vow? Second, was he correct about the payment as a substitute for literal temple service? Most commentators have agreed with Wenham on this point. I do not. I argue that the terms of the vow were not symbolic, and the payment was not a substitute.

1. Devotion: Change in Legal Status

In the case of heathen slaves, Israelites possessed lawful title to the slave and the slave’s heirs (Lev. 25:44–45).¹⁰ There is no reason to assume that an Israelite could not transfer ownership of his slave to an individual priest or to the temple. The tabernacle-temple already employed permanent pagan slaves: the Gibeonites. They were the hewers of wood and drawers of water for the assembly; hence, they were involved in religious service. This permanent temple slavery had been specifically imposed on them by Joshua as a curse: “Now therefore ye are cursed, and there shall none of you be freed from being bondmen, and hewers of wood and drawers of water for the house of my God” (Josh. 9:23). They were permanently set apart—devoted—for temple service. This was the result of their deception in gaining the vow of peace from Joshua (Josh. 9). The covenantal blessing—peace in the land—because of the Gibeonites’ deception became their covenantal curse: permanent slavery under the priests. They had escaped God’s

7. Idem.

8. Idem.

9. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 58.

10. Chapter 31.

covenantal ban of hormah—either their total destruction or their permanent expulsion from the land—but they could not escape His covenantal ban of temple servitude. Hormah (chormah) means “devoted.” Its frame of reference was God’s total destruction: “And the LORD hearkened to the voice of Israel, and delivered up the Canaanites; and they utterly destroyed them and their cities: and he called the name of the place Hormah” (Num. 21:3). A city devoted to total destruction was under hormah: a total ban. This destruction was a priestly act.¹¹

We conclude that there is nothing in the Mosaic Covenant to indicate that pagan slaves could not be assigned to temple service even though they could not lawfully assist with the sacrifices. They were not allowed inside those temple boundaries that were lawfully accessible only to priests, but they still could work for the priests outside these boundaries. Thus, a symbolic transfer of ownership of a pagan slave to the priests is not the concern of this passage. The deciding issue contextually cannot be priestly ownership as such. The issue is also not the dedication or sanctification of household slaves. There was nothing special in Israel about the dedication of household slaves—nothing “singular.” It has to be something more fundamental: service within the normally sealed boundaries of the temple.

Then who were the vow-governed individuals of Leviticus 27:2–8? They were family members under the lawful authority of the vow-taker. The vow was a specific kind of vow, a vow of devotion. Devotion here was not an emotional state; it was a change in judicial status.

2. Devotion vs. Sanctification

At this point, I have to introduce a crucial distinction of the Mosaic law: devotion vs. sanctification. A sanctified item was set apart for God’s use, though not necessarily on a permanent basis. A devoted thing was set apart permanently for priestly service or sacrifice. This distinction is based on the law that appears later in this section of Leviticus:

Notwithstanding no devoted thing, that a man shall devote unto the LORD of all that he hath, both of man and beast, and of the field of his possession, shall be sold or redeemed: every devoted thing is most holy unto the LORD. None devoted, which shall be devoted of men, shall be redeemed; but shall surely be put to death (Lev. 27:28–29).

11. On “hormah,” see James B. Jordan, Judges: God’s War Against Humanism (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Ministries, 1985), pp. 10–12. (<http://jjjudges>)

Death here was not necessarily physical death; it was, however, necessarily covenantal death. This meant that the devoted item was placed within the irreversible boundaries of God's ban. This form of covenantal death meant that the item was beyond human redemption. The devoted object came under God's absolute control. In many passages in Scripture, the Hebrew word for "devoted" (khayrem) is translated as "accursed" or "cursed." Such a cursed item could not be used for anything other than sacrifice to God. If it was subsequently misused—violated or profaned, in other words—the person who violated God's boundary himself came under the ban: beyond human redemption.

And the city [Jericho] shall be accursed, even it, and all that are therein, to the LORD: only Rahab the harlot shall live, she and all that are with her in the house, because she hid the messengers that we sent. And ye, in any wise keep yourselves from the accursed thing, lest ye make yourselves accursed, when ye take of the accursed thing, and make the camp of Israel a curse, and trouble it (Josh. 6:17–18).

But the children of Israel committed a trespass in the accursed thing: for Achan, the son of Carmi, the son of Zabdi, the son of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah, took of the accursed thing: and the anger of the LORD was kindled against the children of Israel (Josh. 7:1).¹²

But the people took of the spoil, sheep and oxen, the chief of the things which should have been utterly destroyed, to sacrifice unto the LORD thy God in Gilgal (I Sam. 15:21).

It is worth noting that this Hebrew word is the very last word that occurs in the Old Testament, in the passage that prophesies the coming of Elijah (John the Baptist), the man Jesus identified as the last man of the Old Covenant.¹³ "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the LORD: And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse" (Mal. 4:5–6). This was God's threatened negative sanction: covenantal disinheritance—fathers vs. sons—that involved God's curse on Old Covenant Israel. As Jesus later warned: "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter in law against her mother in law. And a man's foes shall be they of his own household" (Matt. 10:34–36).

12. Because Achan had violated the holy ban that God placed around Jericho's spoils, he placed his whole household under the ban. It was legally possible for a father to place his family under God's ban—disinheritance from the family's land and legal status—through covenantal adoption into the priesthood. But in this case, Achan placed his family under hormah: God's absolute ban of destruction. As the head of his household, he went through an adoption process: not into the tribe of Levi, but rather into covenantal Jericho. Thus, it was mandatory that the civil government execute his entire household, including the animals, and bury all his assets with them (Josh. 7:24). See Appendix A: "Sacrilege and Sanctions."

13. "The law and the prophets were until John: since that time the kingdom of God is preached, and every man presseth into it" (Luke 16:16).

The devoted item could not be redeemed by the payment of a price. It had been permanently transferred covenantally to God as a sacrificial offering. This is the meaning of the singular vow. The singular vow was a vow whose stipulations were irrevocable. The devoted item was placed within the confines of an absolutely holy boundary: beyond human redemption. The vow was voluntary; the resulting transfer was irrevocable: a singular vow.

3. Devotion Through Adoption

Could an Israelite lawfully devote his child to priestly service? Yes; as we shall see, Jephthah's daughter was so devoted by her father. Once a person was adopted into the family of Aaron specifically or into the tribe of Levi, he could not re-enter another Israelite tribe by a subsequent act of adoption. He had been devoted to the temple: beyond redemption. So had his covenantal heirs. If I am correct about this, then in the context of marriage—another form of legal adoption¹⁴—there was no option for an Israelite father to buy back his daughter from her priestly husband by returning the bride price to his son-in-law.¹⁵ Similarly, there was no way for a man to buy back himself, his wife, or his children from formally devoted service to God. In short, there was no redemption price for this kind of vow. This is why the vow was pawlaw: "singular."

There is no indication that a man could place his adult male children into mandated priestly service. An adult son was not eligible for compulsory adoption. He was a lawful heir to the land and the legal status of his tribe and family. He could not be disinherited at his father's prerogative. The crucial legal issue for identifying adulthood

14. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 31:B.

15. The dowry remained with the wife in any case; it was her protection, her inheritance from her father.

for men was military numbering. An adult male was eligible to be numbered at age 20 to fight in a holy war: “This they shall give, every one that passeth among them that are numbered, half a shekel after the shekel of the sanctuary: (a shekel is twenty gerahs:) an half shekel shall be the offering of the LORD” (Ex. 30:13). At age 20, a man came under the threat of God’s negative sanctions: going into battle without first having paid blood money to the temple.¹⁶ Once he became judicially eligible for numbering as a member of his tribe, he became judicially responsible for his own vows. He became, as we say, “his own man.” He became a member of God’s holy army. A father could no longer act in the son’s name.

A daughter could not legally be numbered for service in God’s army. Thus, an unmarried daughter could be delivered into a priestly family, as we see in the peculiar case of Jephthah’s daughter (Jud. 11:34–39).¹⁷ Jephthah’s vow to sacrifice the first thing to come out of his house could not legally be applied literally to a person. He could not lawfully burn a person, nor could the priests; therefore, any person who came under the terms of such a lawful vow had to be devoted to God in temple service.¹⁸ Jephthah had made a singular vow. It was irreversible. This means that his daughter had to be disinherited.¹⁹ She was beyond redemption.

There was a distinction in Mosaic law between someone or something dedicated (sanctified) to the priesthood and someone or something devoted to the priesthood. The former could be redeemed by the payment of the market price plus a premium of one-fifth (Lev. 27:13, 15, 19).²⁰ The latter could not be redeemed.

Disinheritance was permanent in Old Covenant Israel. This could only be by covenant: specifically, by covenantal death. This is why disinheritance was a form of devoted giving. The head of the household publicly gave his heirs over to God. He²¹ publicly broke the family’s covenant with such a person. There were only three means of lawful disinheritance in Old Covenant Israel: civil execution for a capital

16. Ibid., ch. 58.

17. I accept the standard interpretation of this story: she was not literally executed by her father.

18. Jordan, Judges, pp. 204–13.

19. Ibid., p. 205.

20. Chapter 38.

21. Or, in the case of a widow (Num. 30:9), she. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 16.

crime, expulsion from the congregation for an ecclesiastical crime, or adoption into another family or tribe. All three involved broken covenants: civil, ecclesiastical, and familial. In the third instance, the broken family covenant was simultaneously replaced by a new family or tribal covenant. A daughter was normally disinherited by her father in this way, and if she was to become a wife rather than a concubine, she was to receive a dowry from her father.²²

Jephthah's daughter was disinherited in a unique way: by legal transfer into a priestly family. She bewailed her virginity (Jud. 11:37) because this was the mark of her unmarried condition, and therefore of her eligibility for transfer into the tribe of Levi apart from her own will. The standard interpretation of the story of Jephthah's daughter rests on the assertion that as a temple servant, she would have had to remain a virgin.²³ I am aware of no evidence from the Book of Leviticus or any other biblical text regarding the mandatory and therefore permanent virginity of female temple servants. Then why did she bewail her virginity? Not because she was bewailing her supposed future virginity, but because she was bewailing her present virginity. It was her virginity that bound her to the terms of her father's vow; otherwise, her husband's authority would have negated the father's vow.

Jephthah's daughter was, as the phrase goes, "her daddy's girl": a dynasty-coveting power-seeker. When her virginity cost her the inheritance of her father's political dynasty, she bewailed her virginity. Her heart was not right with God. What was an enormous honor—adoption into the tribe of Levi, the spiritual counsellors of the nation—she saw as a thing to bewail in the mountains for two months (Jud. 11:37).

Jordan raised a question: "Why didn't Jephthah substitute a money payment for his vow? These monetary substitutes are set out in Leviticus 27:1–8."²⁴ He said that commentators who have addressed this question have no easy explanation for it. He refers to Leviticus 27:28–29: "Notwithstanding no devoted thing, that a man shall devote unto the LORD of all that he hath, both of man and beast, and of the field of his possession, shall be sold or redeemed: every devoted thing is most holy unto the LORD. None devoted, which shall be devoted of men, shall be redeemed; but shall surely be put to death." Thus, he concludes, Jephthah's daughter could not be redeemed. "Since Jephthah vowed to offer this person as a whole burnt sacrifice, we realize that he was ‘devoting’ him or her to the Lord, and thus no ransom was possible.”²⁵ This is the correct interpretation.²⁶ But this answer raises a more important question: If she could not legally be redeemed from this vow of temple service, how could anyone be redeemed from a vow of temple service? If the answer is that no person could be redeemed from such a singular vow under Mosaic law—and this is the correct answer—then what are we to make of Leviticus 27:2–8? What was the meaning of all those prices?

22. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 32.

23. Jordan took this approach: Judges, p. 210.

24. Ibid., p. 206.

C. Not a Redemption Price

In the section of Leviticus 27 that follows this one, we read of the redemption price of animals that are set apart (sanctified) to be offered as sacrifices (vv. 9–13). Then, in the section following that one, we read of the redemption price of a house sanctified to the priesthood (vv. 14–15). Finally, in the next section, the laws governing sanctified fields are listed (vv. 16–25). In the second and third cases, the term “sanctify” (kawdash, holy) is used.²⁷ In all three cases, the redemption price was the market price at the time of the redemption plus 20% (vv. 13, 15, 19).

Then comes Leviticus 27:26: “Only the firstling of the beasts, which should be the LORD’S firstling, no man shall sanctify it; whether it be ox, or sheep: it is the LORD’S.” This law specifically denies the legitimacy of sanctifying the animal. This means that no redemption of the animal was legal. It was a devoted animal, not a sanctified animal. Sanctification in this context meant “set apart until redeemed.” This legal condition was less rigorous than devotion. Devotion meant that the legal boundary around the object was permanent. The same is true of the vow of Leviticus 27:2–8. In this passage, there is no mention of a supplemental payment of one-fifth. This is evidence that what is being considered in verses 2–8 is not a series of redemption prices. Then

25. Ibid., pp. 206–7.

26. Jordan pointed out to me that the only other use of pawlaw—“singular,” as in singular vow—in the hipil voice is found in Numbers 6:2, which relates to a Nazirite vow: “Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When either man or woman shall separate themselves to vow a vow of a Nazirite, to separate themselves unto the LORD: He shall separate himself from wine and strong drink, and shall drink no vinegar of wine, or vinegar of strong drink, neither shall he drink any liquor of grapes, nor eat moist grapes, or dried. All the days of his separation shall he eat nothing that is made of the vine tree, from the kernels even to the husk” (Num. 6:2–4).

27. In the first case, sacrificial animals, the cognate term for “sanctify” is used: kodesh, holy (vv. 9, 10).

what does this section refer to?

The preliminary answer was given in 1846 by Andrew Bonar. He concluded that the list of prices in Leviticus 27:2–8 is not a list of redemption prices. “There seems to me a mistake generally fallen into here by commentators. They suppose that these shekels of money were paid in order to free the offerers from the obligation of devoting the person. Now, surely, the whole chapter is speaking of things truly devoted to God, and cases of exchange and substitution are referred to in ver. 10, 13, 15. As for persons devoted, there was no substitution allowed. The mistake has arisen from supposing that this amount of money was ransom-money; whereas it was an addition to the offering of the person, not a substitution.” He pointed to the case of Jephthah’s daughter as evidence.²⁸

Bonar explained the additional monetary payment in terms of the giver’s gratitude. A person who was really grateful to God, he said, would add money to the transfer. This misses the judicial point. What we have here is an entry fee: a payment analogous to a marriage dowry. A person who desired to transfer himself or a member of his family into the tribe of Levi had to provide a “dowry”—not to the family, but to the temple.²⁹ Why a dowry? Because, theologically speaking, the bride of God is not a concubine. She is a free wife. The free wife in Israel had to be provided with a dowry. Judicially speaking, the Levites were freemen in Israel. For anyone within another tribe to become a member of the tribe of Levi, the person’s family—the head of the household—had to offer an additional payment. This payment was judicial. It established the person’s legal status: a freeman (wife) rather than a slave (concubine).

Members of the tribe of Levi could not normally own rural land outside of 48 specified cities (Num. 35:7).³⁰ Thus, any person who was delivered by a vow and payment into temple service lost his or her claim to his or her ancestral land. We see this in the case of Jephthah’s

28. Andrew Bonar, A Commentary on Leviticus (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, [1846] 1966), p. 497.

29. This does not mean that the money could never go to the adopting family. Officers of the temple might choose to transfer the funds to an adopting family for various reasons, such as the education of young children who had been adopted, or the care of older people.

30. There were two exceptions: (1) when a family dedicated a piece of land to the priesthood and then refused to redeem it before the next jubilee year; (2) when a family dedicated a piece of land to the priesthood but then leased the whole property to someone else (Lev. 27:16–21). Chapter 37.

daughter, in an incident that has confused Bible commentators for centuries. As his only child (Jud. 11:34), she was the lawful heir of his land and its accompanying legal status, but only so long as she did not marry outside his tribe (Num. 35:6–9).³¹ By being adopted into the tribe of Levi, she could not thereafter marry outside of the tribe of Levi. Thus, she had to forfeit her inheritance from Jephthah. She could not extend her father's dynasty, a point Jordan makes.³² A father alienated his family's inheritance forever from his heirs if his male children were under age 20 or his daughters were unmarried at the time he made his vow. This did not mean that they lost their legal status as freemen; Levites possessed freeman status. But the heirs did lose their claim on the family's land.

Could the priest annul the vow? Yes. There was no compulsion that he adopt someone into his family. The vow was analogous to the vow of a daughter or married woman: it could be annulled within 24 hours by the male head of the household (Num. 30:3–8). The priests, acting in God's name, as the heads of God's ecclesiastical household, could lawfully annul someone's vow of adoption into the tribe. But if the vow was accepted by a priest in authority, the vow-taker and any other members of his family covered by his vow were then adopted into the tribe of Levi if they could pay the entry fee. Once adopted by the priest's family, there was no way back into non-Levitical freeman-ship in Israel. At the time of the adoption, the adopted family's original inheritance had been forfeited to the kinsman-redeemer, the closest relative in their original tribe (Num. 27:9–11).³³ They could retain their status as freemen only as members of the tribe of Levi. Their family land was no longer part of their inheritance. But the makes were still members of God's holy army. They were still citizens.

D. The Restrictive Function of Price

These prices were not market prices. They had nothing to do with comparative rates of economic productivity. They were instead barriers to entry into the tribe of the priests. Primary judicial authority in Israel was supposed to be inside the tribe of Levi, for the Levites had unique access to the written law of God. They were the spiritual and therefore the judicial counsellors in Israel.³⁴ It was not easy to gain ac-

31. North, Sanctions and Dominion, ch. 22.

32. Jordan, Judges, p. 205.

33. North, Sanctions and Dominion, ch. 15.

34. This is why Paul speaks of the double honor of those who labor in the word:

cess to this position of honor and authority. Adoption into the tribe of Levi was legal, but it was not cheap.

The entry price for an adult male was set at 50 shekels of silver.³⁵ The price for an adult female was 30 shekels.³⁶ The male child's price was 20 shekels; the female child's was 10 shekels. Very young children's prices were lower: five shekels (male) and three shekels (female). For the elderly, the prices were 15 shekels (male) and ten shekels (female).

The formal prices of the sexes differed. Males were priced higher than females in every age group. Similarly, old people were priced higher than very young children, but less than children age 5 to 20. Why? Did this have something to do with market pricing? These were not cases of pure market pricing, but can the differences in formal prices be explained in terms of expected productivity, just as market prices can be explained? Yes, but such an explanation is misleading.

Prices always serve as barriers. The question is: Were prices in this instance barriers to entry or barriers to escape; that is, were they entry prices or redemption prices? Were they based on the value of services to be redeemed or were they tests of authority to be honored?

1. Explanation: Economic Productivity

If we regard the prices as redemption prices, we are tempted to explain the price differences in terms of the varying market value of the individuals. By adopting this explanation, we misunderstand the legal nature of the transaction; nevertheless, we can make a plausible economic case. We can interpret the passage in terms of the repurchase value of the person whose services had been handed over to the temple.

If economic redemption was the meaning of the price structure of

"Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour, especially they who labour in the word and doctrine" (1 Tim. 5:17). Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 7.

35. This was the same as another judicial price: the formal bride price owed by a seducer of a virgin to her father. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 47:D. It rests on an interpretation of the false accuser's penalty of Deuteronomy 22:19: "And they shall amerce him in an hundred shekels of silver, and give them unto the father of the damsel, because he hath brought up an evil name upon a virgin of Israel: and she shall be his wife; he may not put her away all his days." One hundred shekels was double restitution.

36. The same price that was owed to the owner of a gored slave (Ex. 21:32)

Leviticus 27:2–8, then the vow became a peculiar symbolic ritual: people were being handed over to God verbally, but then repurchased from the temple economically. Such a ritual would have converted an otherwise simple monetary donation into the formality of a sacred vow. A lawful vow invoked God's name and God's sanctions in history. Why should God's name have been formally invoked? Why didn't the person wishing to give money to the priests just give it? A strictly economic analysis misses the judicial point: the singular vow produced a permanent alteration of someone's legal status. The prices listed in the text were not redemption prices; they were transfer prices analogous to dowries.

Still, it is quite tempting to think of these prices as redemption prices. This is the way men think in a century dominated by various forms of economic determinism, whether left wing (e.g., Marxism) or right wing (e.g., the pure logic of choice).³⁷ If we begin with this assumption of economic determinism, we are easily tempted to conclude that these prices were shadows of market prices. Here is how we might reason:

Why were adult males priced highest of all? Because they are at the peak of their economic value. Their training was behind them. They had a lifetime of productive service ahead of them. In order to buy himself back from lifetime service, the vow-taker had to pay a very high price.

What about the lower price for females in each age group? This would also seem to have been governed by the principle of productivity. For some reason or reasons, females were less valuable economically than males. (See next paragraph.) But females produce children. Weren't these children assets? If they had become the permanent, inheritable property of the owner, yes. This low formal price for women is evidence that the duration of the vow's conditions did not extend beyond the jubilee year. At that time, every heir of the conquest's generation returned to his land. All servitude ended for them. So, the children born of women protected by the jubilee law would not have been equally as valuable as inheritable slave children. The period available for capitalization was shorter.

Even in the late twentieth century—an era of federally legislated “equal pay for equal work” laws—the economics of motherhood have not changed significantly. Women still are paid less than men. Why? Because their expected net economic returns are lower than men's.

37. Richard D. Fuerle, The Pure Logic of Choice (New York: Vantage, 1986).

They have children who must be cared for. From 1981 through 1985, 30% of American women with paid maternity leave or other benefits did not return to the labor market after six months, while 56% of women without maternity benefits did not return to work.³⁸ The free market places a lower value on capital invested in women in the work force. This lower return on investment is compensated for by lower wages paid to women. Any attempt to mandate equal wages by civil law will produce unemployment for women in general, while subsidizing women with good looks or academic credentials.³⁹

Why would older people be more valuable than very young children? Because they are on average more productive. Very young children are net absorbers of scarce economic resources. It takes time for the present losses to be compensated by future returns. The net flow of expected future income discounted by the prevailing interest rate is low because the expected positive income stream is too many years in the future. This was not true of those over age 4. The payoff would be faster. Why the difference? Those above age 4 are expected to become net producers sooner than those younger than 5. An older person was less valuable than a child above age 4. The older person has skills and experience, but he or she also can be expected to have infirmities. The expected net income stream is less for this reason and also because of shortened life expectancy.

So, one can argue on the basis of economic analysis that these were redemption prices. That is to say, one can see a loose correlation between the price differentials of Leviticus 27:2–8 and the free market's pricing of labor services in the late twentieth century, and then conclude that the Mosaic law's stipulations were reasonably consistent with market forces. The evidence of varying prices seems to fit the economic reality of age-specific and gender-specific economic productivity. A person who believes in the continuing validity of this Mosaic statute, and who adopts this approach to explaining Leviticus 27:2–8, is forced to conclude that these gender-related and age-related price differentials are permanent in New Covenant history, with or without human bondage (i.e., the capitalization of expected lifetime net income). If the price differentials are based on productivity differentials, these productivity differentials have to be assumed to be permanent—part of the human condition. This means that technological changes and educational changes can never overcome productivity differentials, especially gender-based differentials.

38. Felice N. Schwartz, Breaking With Tradition: Women and Work, The New Facts of Life (New York: Warner, 1992), p. 59. She cited Martha O'Connell, "Maternity Leave Arrangements: 1981–1985," Work and Family Patterns of American Women, Current Population Reports, series P–23, no. 165 (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, March 1990).

39. Gary North, "The Feminine Mistake: The Economics of Women's Liberation," The Freeman (Jan. 1971); reprinted in Gary North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 24. (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>)

The initial assumption of this line of economic reasoning is incorrect. The context of this law was not labor productivity, but rather priestly holiness. The focus of concern was not the capitalization of economic productivity but rather the necessity of restricting access into the priesthood. God placed judicial boundaries around the temple. God's presence in Israel was marked by a series of "no trespassing signs"—restrictions on physical access—which became more rigorous as men approached the holy of holies. These boundaries were judicial. Lawful access across each boundary was based on a person's judicial status, not his economic status.⁴⁰ Vows marked a person's move across these judicial boundaries.

2. Explanation: Submission to Authority

Let us begin with another assumption: these prices were dowries, not redemption prices. Why was the highest entry price required of an adult male? Because the adult head of a household was a man who was used to exercising family authority and perhaps other kinds of civil authority. By placing a high entry price on his adoption into the tribe of Levi, God protected His priestly servants from invasion by two groups: (1) power-seekers seeking to extend their authority into the church; (2) poor people seeking a guaranteed income as members of the tithe-receiving tribe. The power-seekers first had to abandon all legal claim to their original inheritance and also had to provide a considerable entry fee. Married men also had to pay for their wives' and minor children's entry into the tribe of Levi. This further restricted entry into the priestly class.

God established an entry fee higher for aged people—age 60 and over (v. 7)—than for very young children: under age 5 (v. 6). Why? Because old people tend to be more set in their ways, more used to deference from younger people, even priests. They would be more trouble to govern than very young children. The very young child would grow up in the presence of the Levites and the priests. He would learn to respect authority. He would not be a major threat to the ecclesiastical hierarchy. There was less need for a monetary barrier to his entry into the household of the church.

40. North, Sanctions and Dominion, ch. 3.

God established lower prices for old men than for male children ages 5–19 (v. 5). The prices for females, young and old, were the same: 10 shekels. Why? The issue was authority: males had more authority than females did. Children of this age group reflected their parents' attitudes. The boys would have been more difficult to control than aged men. Young girls and old women were judged of equal difficulty. So, the discrepancies in these dowry prices can be explained in terms of expected resistance to ecclesiastical authority. But what about the lower price for females in each age group? This is also consistent with the hypothesis that this law was imposed by God in order to reduce the Levite adoptees' resistance to ecclesiastical authority. Israelite women were accustomed to obey male heads of household. They were more likely to respect hierarchical authority. Thus, they were less of a threat to the established ecclesiastical order. The payment could be smaller because the need to establish a barrier to entry was less.

E. Sonship Is Judicial

It was an honor to be a member of the tribe of Levi. This tribe guarded the law of the covenant, a guardianship symbolized by the two tablets of the law inside the Ark of the Covenant (Deut. 31:26). The priests were in charge of guarding the Ark. That is, the priests policed the boundaries between the Ark and the world outside.

Adoption is always an aspect of God's law. This included adoption into the tribe of Levi, and even the family of Aaron. Sonship is judicial. Biblical sonship must always place covenantal faithfulness above biological relationships. When Eli elevated his sons to the priesthood, judicially ignoring the presence of faithful servant Samuel, God cut off Eli's inheritance by executing his sons. Eli had warned both of them what would happen, but they had refused to listen: "If one man sin against another, the judge shall judge him: but if a man sin against the LORD, who shall intreat for him? Notwithstanding they hearkened not unto the voice of their father, because the LORD would slay them" (I Sam. 2:25). Eli refused to impose the negative sanction of disinheritance through excommunication, so God disinherited them through execution. He did this by subjecting the whole nation to a military defeat by the Philistines. A man of God warned Eli of what was about to happen

(I Sam. 2:27–36), but Eli refused to take effective steps to evade God's wrath. He could have adopted Samuel from the beginning, had his mother consented, which she was obviously ready to do, having dedicated him to God for life (I Sam. 1:11). At any time, Eli could have adopted Samuel in place of his sons, making him a priest at age 30.⁴¹ Instead, he honored biological sonship above adoptive sonship. Adoption is fundamental in establishing covenant-keeping sonship; biology is not. Eli had decided to maintain a boundary between Samuel and the altar; God therefore placed a boundary between Eli and his inheritance. Samuel could have become Eli's heir; by honoring his sons, Eli chose to disinherit his family's name.

Eli's decision cost Israel dearly, as priestly rebellion always does. Because Eli had made his sons the priests of Israel, Samuel later became a prophet who brought God's covenant lawsuit against Saul (I Sam. 15). Samuel, not the high priest, anointed David (I Sam. 16). Had Samuel been a priest, the priesthood would have retained more of its temporal authority. God honored Samuel more than He honored the civil authority of the priesthood.

F. The Kinsman-Redeemer

Leviticus 27:2–8 is the passage governing the conditions of adoption into the tribe of Levi. There had to be a payment—the equivalent of a dowry—to the temple.⁴² In the case of a slave, his owner had to provide the funds. If the adoptee was the head of a household, he had to make the payment on his own behalf, or find someone to make it for him.

Who was the most likely person to make the payment for him if he could not afford to pay? Both judicially and economically, there is little doubt: the kinsman-redeemer. He would inherit title to the land left behind by a newly adopted family. The entry price was high; no one else was likely to have the same incentive to make so large a payment.

41. Age 30 was the minimum age of service in the temple (Num. 4:3, 23, 30, 35, 39, 40, 43, 47).

42. I do not think the price was paid to Levite families. Had the money gone to individual families, there would have been a strong motivation for Levites to recruit new members of the tribe. The entry fee was to serve as a barrier to entry, not a motivation to recruit new members. If the money went directly to the temple, local Levites would have had far less incentive to recruit non-Levites into the tribe. Aaronic priests would have possessed a veto over adoption: the men with the greatest authority in Israel. Adoption in this case was tribal, not familial, analogous to circumcised resident aliens who were adopted into tribal cities if they were accepted to serve in God's holy army.

This points to the work of Christ as the Kinsman-Redeemer of Israel and mankind. He has paid the fee for all those who are adopted into the New Covenant priesthood. No one else has either the incentive or the ability to pay this price. In His case, the incentive is not economic, for two reasons. First, Jesus Christ already is God the Father's lawful heir in history and eternity. He will inherit everything. Second, the entry price is too high—far beyond the very high price of 50 shekels in Old Covenant Israel. The price is the death of the Kinsman-Redeemer. His motivation was grace, not profit. Christians inherit as heirs of their Kinsmen-Redeemer, Jesus Christ. Everyone else is eternally disinherited.

Verse 8 reads: "But if he be poorer than thy estimation, then he shall present himself before the priest, and the priest shall value him; according to his ability that vowed shall the priest value him." The high priest, Jesus Christ, has paid the maximum price for each of His saints—those set apart by God judicially for priestly service. Entering with nothing of our own, we do not need to plead before a priest for a lower entry fee. The high priest has paid it all.

Conclusion

If this analysis is correct, then it should be obvious that this law has been annulled with the New Covenant's change in the priesthood. The passage's variations in price—young vs. old, male vs. female—have nothing to do with economic productivity. They are irrelevant for the economic analysis of labor markets. They were equally irrelevant for such analytical purposes under the Mosaic Covenant.

The prices listed in Leviticus 27:2–8 were not redemption prices; they were entry barrier prices. They were not based on the expected economic productivity of people who were then immediately redeemed out of God's ecclesiastical service; they were based on the need to screen power-seekers and security-seekers from access to ecclesiastical service. They were not market prices; they were judicial prices. They were not barriers to escape from ecclesiastical service; they were barriers to entry into ecclesiastical service. Thus, rather than applying economic analysis to the productivity of the groups specified in Leviticus 27:2–8, we should apply economic analysis to the question of the judicial boundary separating the tribe of Levi from the other tribes.

THE REDEMPTION-PRICE SYSTEM

And if it be a beast, whereof men bring an offering unto the LORD, all that any man giveth of such unto the LORD shall be holy. He shall not alter it, nor change it, a good for a bad, or a bad for a good: and if he shall at all change beast for beast, then it and the exchange thereof shall be holy. And if it be any unclean beast, of which they do not offer a sacrifice unto the LORD, then he shall present the beast before the priest: And the priest shall value it, whether it be good or bad: as thou valuest it, who art the priest, so shall it be. But if he will at all redeem it, then he shall add a fifth part thereof unto thy estimation. And when a man shall sanctify his house to be holy unto the LORD, then the priest shall estimate it, whether it be good or bad: as the priest shall estimate it, so shall it stand. And if he that sanctified it will redeem his house, then he shall add the fifth part of the money of thy estimation unto it, and it shall be his (Lev. 27:9–15).

The theocentric meaning of this passage is simple: God is to be honored by sacrifice. Sacrifice is related to part four of the biblical covenant model: sanctions.¹

A. Gifts to Priests

A person could give an animal or a piece of real estate to God through the priesthood. If he changed his mind later and decided to buy it back, he paid a redemption fee of one-fifth above the estimated value of the gift. The recipient, the priest, made this original estimation. God was willing to allow men to change their minds regarding previous sacrifices, but not at zero price. Once offered as a sacrifice, the property did change ownership: from the original owner to the priest. Whatever benefits the owner received from making the sacrifice—self-esteem, public acclaim, etc.—were purchased upon redemption: an additional payment of one-fifth.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2010), ch. 4.

This passage deals with the re-purchase of animals and houses that had been given to priests either for ritual sacrifice or for resale by the priests. Later in this chapter, I will consider the third redemption payment: fields. In each case, the cash redemption price required an additional 20% payment.² This was what distinguished a redemption price from the previous passage's payment structure, which was not a redemption price but rather an entry fee into the tribe designated by God for holy service. The visible difference between the two forms of voluntary payment to the priesthood—dedication and devotion—was the presence of a penalty payment. The dedicated item did not become hormah: God's whole burnt offering. With dedication there was a possibility of economic redemption: de-sanctification.

B. Pricing and Penalties

A beast was designated by its owner as a sacrifice. The owner brought it to the priest. The beast was then identified as having become holy (kodesh). To be holy is to be set apart judicially, i.e., sanctified (kawdash). But the degree of separation was less than in the case of an offering that was devoted to God: it did not come under the ban.

The priests were Israel's agents of formal sanctification. They possessed the authority to set apart certain beasts for sacrificial purposes. The individual could not sacrifice his animal on his own authority if he expected to establish it as a judicially valid offering; he had to bring it to the priests. This dependence on the priesthood to validate sacramental offerings to God reinforced the social and legal authority of the priesthood. This arrangement did not limit men's ability to make economically significant offerings to God, but such unsanctified offerings were not sacramental. Laymen could show good faith, but they did not have the power to invoke God's sanctions authoritatively.³

2. There was an exception, as we shall see: a lessee paid a cash redemption price, but no 20 penalty.

3. One of the fundamental institutional differences between magical religion and biblical religion is seen in this distinction between sanctified offerings and unsanctified offerings. The person who invokes magic believes that his formal incantations and rituals allow him to manipulate supernatural power directly and authoritatively. Biblical religion denies such authority to all those who have not been anointed, either by birth or adoption (Old Covenant priesthood or prophetic anointing) or by the laying on of hands (New Covenant ministry-priesthood). The priest in the New Covenant

Once it had been dedicated—sanctified—the beast’s owner had the right to change his mind about sacrificing this particular beast. For whatever reason, he could choose to spare the life of this animal. The priest would then estimate the value of this beast according to its market price. An additional 20% had to be paid by the owner: a redemption (buy-back) price. This specific redemption price is not established in the text, in contrast to verses 2–8, where specific prices are stated. This is because the prices for sacrificial animals were not judicial prices; they were market prices. They varied according to market conditions. The redemption price of an animal was tied to its market price. This was also the case in the price of a house dedicated to the temple (vv. 14–15).

The priest had the authority to fix the redemption prices of dedicated items (vv. 12, 15, 19) other than fields. If he set a price too high, the owner would not redeem the item. The priest would then wind up owning an asset worth only what the free market determined, when he could have had a market price plus 20%. He would thereby have forfeited the opportunity to enjoy what speculators call a quick turnaround. He was allowed to obtain the market price for the animal by selling it back, keeping the extra 20% for himself. The presence of the 20% payment kept the priest’s pricing relatively honest, i.e., in close approximation to market prices. So, in this instance, the extra payment imposed in the redemption of sanctified items was not a penalty payment. It was more of a “keep the priests’ redemption price valuations honest” payment. We should probably think of it as a transaction fee. The giver proved his dedication to God by dedicating the beast to a priest and then paying a 20% transaction fee in order to redeem it.

C. Priests and Fields

The jubilee law applied to houses in the 48 cities of the Levites and to the common land surrounding them (Lev. 25:32–33; Num. 35:7). These homes could not be permanently alienated from the families of the Levites. “Notwithstanding the cities of the Levites, and the houses of the cities of their possession, may the Levites redeem at any time. And if a man purchase of the Levites, then the house that was sold, and the city of his possession, shall go out in the year of jubile: for the houses of the cities of the Levites are their possession among the children of Israel" (Lev. 25:32–33). The jubilee law of inheritance applied to the Levites' homes in Levitical cities and to rural land in Israel. The Levites could not lawfully be excluded from their inheritance, but they were excluded from the other tribes' inheritance. To maintain their own inheritance, they had to defend the inheritance of the other tribal families. They had to preach the jubilee law. God gave them an inheritance in their cities; this served as an economic incentive for them to declare the jubilee year.

does not offer a sacrifice to God (Heb. 9); rather, he offers to church members the sacramental means of covenant renewal: the Lord’s Supper.

Priests could not normally own rural land; it was not part of their inheritance at the time of the conquest of Canaan. When enforced, the jubilee law made it impossible for the priesthood to extend its political influence into the other tribes apart from the exposition and application of the Mosaic law. The jubilee law was designed to keep a centralized ecclesiocracy from being formed. The jubilee land law was primarily a law of citizenship. It was designed to provide a permanent judicial veto for the tribes. The tribal system, when reinforced by the jubilee law, decentralized political power in Israel.

Levites could lease rural properties. They could also receive rural properties as gifts until the next jubilee year. They were not prohibited from subleasing these sanctified fields. These fields would have provided them with a stream of income. Within a predominantly rural economy, this stream of income may have been significant, depending on the size and productivity of the dedicated plots.

The jubilee law's restriction on Levitical ownership of rural land was not primarily economic. The jubilee law itself was not primarily economic; it was judicial: a mark of freeman status for the heirs of the conquest. But there were economic incentives tied to the preservation of political freedom. A small but relevant aspect of these incentives was the law of the unredeemed field. Priests could in rare instances become permanent owners of rural land when an owner or his heirs failed to redeem a reclaimed dedicated plot. But in order for this transfer of title to take place, the jubilee year first had to be declared publicly throughout the nation. "And if he will not redeem the field, or if he have sold the field to another man, it shall not be redeemed any more. But the field, when it goeth out in the jubile, shall be holy unto the LORD, as a field devoted; the possession thereof shall be the priest's" (Lev. 27:20–21).

The existence of a law that tied the jubilee year to a permanent transfer of rural land to priestly members of the tribe of Levi delivered an important tool of influence into the hands of covenant-keeping rural land owners. If covenant-keeping men suspected that the civil authorities and the priests had conspired to avoid proclaiming the approaching jubilee year, they had a way to encourage the ecclesiastical authorities to proclaim the jubilee year on time. All the land owners had to do was dedicate some fields to the priests and then reclaim the fields for themselves, refusing to redeem these fields with cash plus a 20% payment. To inherit these fields at the jubilee, the priests would have to proclaim the jubilee year. The Mosaic law therefore provided the other tribes with a legal way to bribe otherwise dishonest priests into covenant-keeping with respect to the proclamation of the jubilee year.⁴ This was an expensive way to persuade priests to honor the jubilee year; effective bribes normally involve considerable losses. At least until the plots shrank in size and value through population growth, this transfer of land could be significant.

D. Establishing the Redemption Price

The law governing sanctified fields provides one of the few cases of a specified price in the Mosaic law. This law identified a single crop as the economic measure: barley. This law applied to a single case: a field voluntarily dedicated to a priest.

And if a man shall sanctify unto the LORD some part of a field of his possession, then thy estimation shall be according to the seed thereof: an homer of barley seed shall be valued at fifty shekels of silver. If he sanctify his field from the year of jubile, according to thy estimation it shall stand. But if he sanctify his field after the jubile, then the priest shall reckon unto him the money according to the years that remain, even unto the year of the jubile, and it shall be abated from thy estimation. And if he that sanctified the field will in any wise redeem it, then he shall add the fifth part of the money of thy estimation unto it, and it shall be assured to him (Lev. 27:16–19).

What was the redemption price of a piece of land? If sanctified land had been treated as if it had been any other capital asset, the free market would have informed owners and priests of its value. But this unique case was not to be decided by an appeal to the free market. Instead, the calculation had to begin with an estimation of a quantity of barley seed. As we shall see, the appropriate unit of measurement to define the limits of a dedicated field was the field's output: one homer of barley seed per year. Nevertheless, the grammar of the text does not specify whether "seed" in this case law refers to input (seeds planted) or output (seeds harvested).⁵ Because of input-output ratios, I accept the "output" interpretation (see below). Also, because prices are established in terms of the expected value of a resource factor's future output, I accept the output view's interpretation of "seed."

4. On the moral legitimacy of bribing corrupt judges, see Gary North, "In Defense of Biblical Bribery," in R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), Appendix 5. "A gift is as a precious stone in the eyes of him that hath it: whithersoever it turneth, it prospereth" (Prov. 17:8). "A gift in secret pacifieth anger: and a reward in the bosom strong wrath" (Prov. 21:14). Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 67.

This case law specifies a particular crop: barley seed. It also specifies a unit of volume: homer (pronounced "khomer"). It refers to a unit of money: a shekel of silver. It refers to a number: 50. We must now seek to make sense of the passage: the redemption value of the land.

1. A Perplexing Translation

From Leviticus 27:2–8, we know that 50 shekels of silver represented a great deal of money. It was sufficient to serve as a major barrier against an adult male's entry into the tribe of Levi (Lev. 27: 3).⁶ Fifty shekels of silver bought an adult male slave in the ancient Near East.⁷ The average wage of a worker was one shekel of silver per month.⁸ We must bear this in mind as we study verse 16.

The literal text of the pricing clause of verse 16 is somewhat obscure: seed of homer of barley at fifty shekels of silver. The standard interpretation of this clause links the price of a homer of barley to the jubilee year. The difficult question is this: To what does the phrase "at fifty shekels of silver" refer? There is a sharp division of opinion between translators and commentators. Translators link the 50 shekels to the unit of measurement: the price of one homer of barley seed. Commentators link the 50 shekels to the jubilee cycle: the combined

5. Some commentators believe that this referred to the amount of seed the field would produce (output view). Others think it means the amount of seed that a field would absorb (input view). Wenham, who follows R. de Vaux (Ancient Israel): "seed" referred to the field's output of barley seed, not its input of barley seed. Gordon J. Wenham, The Book of Leviticus (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1979), p. 340n. I agree with this view.

6. See Chapter 36.

7. Wenham, p. 338, citing I. Mendelsohn, Slavery In the Ancient Near East (New York: Oxford University Press, 1949), pp. 117ff.

8. Wenham, idem., citing Mendelsohn, ibid., p. 118.

prices of an annual homer of barley seed through the cycle.

I side with the commentators. Here is my reasoning. It has been estimated that in Mesopotamia, the familiar price of barley was one shekel of silver per homer.⁹ Because the jubilee year occurred every fiftieth year, it is tempting to conclude that the text really means output (or perhaps input) per land unit of one homer of barley a year for 50 years. A homer is variously estimated at between 29 gallons and 59 gallons.¹⁰ Wenham said that a field yielding (output) a homer of barley seed was valued at one shekel, or 50 shekels per jubilee period. Harrison takes the view that “seed” means input: “The land being vowed was valued by the priest in terms of the amount of seed required for sowing it annually, each homer of barley representing a price of fifty shekels for the forty-nine year period. This is comparable to Mesopotamian practices, where a homer of barley cost a shekel.”¹¹ The comment by Rashi¹² is similar: “. . . an area requiring a Khor of barley seed . . . is redeemable by fifty shekels. . . .”¹³ All agree: 50 shekels per jubilee cycle.

There is one minor problem with this interpretation: the maximum legal planting period was not 50 years or 49 years but 42 years. The seven sabbatical years were supposed to be honored. In the year prior to the sabbatical year of the jubilee year there would be a triple crop (Lev. 25:21), so the total output was the equivalent of 44 years of crops. If we figure from seed inputs, then the total is less: 42 years. The presumption has to be that a particular plot of ground that on average either can sustain (input view) a homer of barley seed or else can produce (output view) a homer of barley seed each year is to be valued at the beginning of the 49-year period at 50 shekels of silver. This seems to be a reasonable interpretation of the 50-shekel requirement.¹⁴

9. Ibid., p. 340. Wenham cites R. P. Maloney, Catholic Biblical Quarterly (1974), pp. 4ff; P. Garelli and V. Nikiprowetsky, Le Proche-Orient Asiatique: Les Empires mésopotamiens, Israël (University of Paris, 1974), pp. 273–74, 285–86.

10. Ibid., p. 339.

11. R. K. Harrison, Leviticus: An Introduction and Commentary (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1980), p. 237.

12. Rabbi Solomon (Shlomo) Yizchaki (1040–1105).

13. Chumash with Targum Onkelos, Haphtaroth and Rashi's Commentary, A. M. Silbermann and M. Rosenbaum, translators, 5 vols. (Jerusalem: Silbermann Family, [1934] 1985 [Jewish year: 5745]), III, p. 131b.

14. Reasonable as in “more reasonable than the alternative.” The fact is, paying 50 shekels of silver in cash at the beginning of the jubilee cycle for 44 years of output meant paying far too much. The buyer-redeemer was forfeiting the interest that could have been earned. The market value of the final harvested homer of barley 48 years later was a small fraction of the value of a homer of barley at the beginning.

2. Output or Input?

My interpretation of the passage is that it refers to the crop's output of seeds rather than input of seeds. I begin with contemporary units of measurement. There are 8 gallons to the bushel. If the biblical homer was 59 gallons—the high estimate—this was about 7.3 bushels of barley. With modern agricultural techniques, an acre of land can produce up to 50 bushels of barley, or 6.8 homers.¹⁵ In the Old Testament era, the land's output would have been far lower. At one-quarter of today's productivity, this would have been under 13 bushels per acre, or slightly under two homers. Using the high estimate of what a homer of barley was, we conclude that the land required to grow one homer was about half an acre. Using the lower estimate of 29 gallons per homer, or slightly over three bushels, this output would have required a quarter of an acre. For a small farm—say, 10 acres—this seems like a reasonably sized plot to dedicate to the priesthood.

If we are discussing seed inputs, a modern farmer can get almost a 20-to-one increase from seeds planted. This ratio of output to input would have been far less in ancient Israel, but still the amount of acreage necessary to seed (input) one homer of barley would have been quite small. It therefore seems more likely that the text refers to output rather than input: the land required to produce one homer of barley.

3. The Economics of the Translators' Version

Were the King James and other versions' translators correct? Does the reference to 50 shekels mean "50 shekels per homer" rather than "50 homers of barley per jubilee cycle," i.e., one shekel of silver times 50? If the translation is correct, this redemption price was astronomical: 50 times the average market price of a homer of barley, plus 20%. But this would have been only the beginning of the redemption burden. The field's potential output of barley per year was then multiplied by 44: the years of production remaining until the next jubilee year. So, the total number of homers of barley that a field could produce was multiplied by 44 years, and this gross output figure was then multiplied by 50 shekels. There was a prorated reduction in price in terms of the number of years remaining until the jubilee, but with these huge payments, such prorating would have been economically irrelevant to 15. I say this on the authority of the highly efficient farmer who leased the Institute for Christian Economics' farm in Maryland.

most Israelites.

What was the redemption payment all about? It covered the case of a person who had vowed to transfer a field or a field's output to a priest. At some point before the jubilee, the original owner decided to reclaim the field for himself. To do this lawfully, he had to pay a cash redemption price to the priest at the time of the reclaiming. If the formal redemption price was established at 50 shekels per homer of barley, as the familiar translations suggest, then the typical owner could afford to redeem his field only in the final sabbatical year before the jubilee, when the unseeded output of the field would be minimal, or in the jubilee year itself.¹⁶ If he or his surviving heirs decided not to redeem it, his family lost the field forever. The translators' interpretation of the 50 shekels—applying to a homer of barley—would lead us to the conclusion that the details of the prorated redemption payment structure were merely symbolic, for almost no one could have afforded to redeem his field much before the jubilee year.

If the conventional translation is correct, we are led inexorably to this unpalatable conclusion: once the owner dedicated the field to the priesthood, he could not expect to redeem it until the jubilee year. The price would have been far too high. This seems to be too radical a requirement: a redemption price totally disconnected from the market price. Conclusion: the reference to 50 shekels of silver refers to the fixed judicial price of a field that would produce one homer of barley per season through the entire jubilee cycle. The closer to the jubilee year, the lower the field's remaining redemption price. In short, the redemption price of a field capable of producing one homer of barley per year was 50 shekels of silver at the beginning of the jubilee cycle, plus 20%.

My conclusion is that the commentators' conventional interpretation, not the translators' conventional translation, is correct: the prorated redemption price was one shekel of silver per year remaining until the jubilee year per homer-producing unit of land. This means that translators should abandon the familiar translation: "[a] homer [of] barley seed [shall be priced at] fifty shekels [of] silver." It should be translated as follows: "[A field producing a] homer [of] barley seed [per year shall be priced at] fifty shekels [of] silver [at the beginning of the jubilee cycle].” The problem is, such a translation imports so much interpretive material into the text that translators probably will never accept this translation. They will try to stick with the sparse Hebrew text as closely as possible. But when they do this, they destroy the economic relevance of the prorated land-redemption system. They create a text that misinterprets the law.

16. Legally, the crop could not be harvested. Probably this would have been interpreted as a crop of zero output. If the estimation was made in terms of barley seed used for planting, the price had to be zero, since it was illegal for anyone to plant in a sabbatical year or a jubilee year.

E. Priestly Inheritance

We now return to the unique law governing the inheritance of rural land by priests: “And if he will not redeem the field, or if he have sold the field to another man, it shall not be redeemed any more. But the field, when it goeth out in the jubile, shall be holy unto the LORD, as a field devoted; the possession thereof shall be the priest’s” (Lev. 27:20–21).

There were only two ways that a priest could acquire rural property in Israel. The first case is easy to understand: the land’s owner had dedicated the field to the priesthood. He or his heirs then refused to pay the priest its output, year by year, and also refused to pay the redemption price. The priest’s family automatically inherited it by default in the jubilee. On the other hand, if the priest took immediate control of the dedicated plot, working the land himself or leasing it out, the owner would automatically receive it back at the jubilee. Here was a risk for the owner. When the priests or their agents took immediate control over dedicated land, they had a short-term economic incentive not to declare the jubilee year. They might prefer to keep working these dedicated lands for themselves indefinitely. But they would incur a long-term economic penalty for such lawlessness: land owners would be unlikely in the future to dedicate land to the priesthood. The priesthood would also lose respect in the eyes of the nation.

The second case—leased land—is more difficult to understand. The passage is no longer clear to us grammatically. There are two ways of interpreting it. First, a man dedicated a field to a priest, but then he sold (leased long term) the field to another man. If we understand the economics of the dedicated field as a gift of the output of the field, with the owner of the field cultivating the land and giving the produce to the priest after each harvest, then the subsequent lease appears to be a case of a default on the original pledge. The defaulting individual had leased his pledged field to another man. This lease contract was honored by the priest, but in the year of the jubilee, the field reverted to the priest.

The second interpretation assumes that a man who had already leased out his land to another person then dedicated a plot of ground to the priest. The lessor's contract with the lessee was honored by the priest. The lessee was allowed to use the field during the years remaining until the jubilee, but then ownership was transferred permanently to the priest.

In both interpretations, the claim of the lessor (land owner) took immediate precedence over the claim of the priest, but the priest became a permanent beneficiary in the jubilee year. I think both interpretations are plausible, but the first one seems more plausible. The land owner indebted himself to the priest: an implicit promise to farm the property for the priest's benefit. He subsequently sought to escape this debt burden without paying the field's prorated redemption price (including the 20% penalty) before leasing the land to another person. The new penalty was the permanent forfeiture of the field. The original owner thereby disinherited his heirs of the value of this property. The heirs still owned the remaining (non-dedicated) fields, but the economic value of the judicially sanctified field had been permanently removed from them.

F. Disinherited Sons and Priestly Heirs

The claims of the original owner were primary until the jubilee. He could evict a priest or the priest's agent from previously dedicated land. In times of famine, for example, an owner might decide to evict the priest or stop paying the priest the output of the dedicated field. But if, by the time of the jubilee, he had refused to redeem the land by the payment of one shekel of silver for every year of the eviction, plus 20%, he lost ownership of the land.

The priests had the possibility of inheriting rural land if the vow-designated land was not redeemed by the vow-taker. In such cases, the potential beneficiaries obviously had an economic incentive to oppose the debasement of the shekel (Isa. 1:22). A shekel of falling value would have made it less expensive for those who faced the permanent loss of their land to redeem it prior to the jubilee.

Would the owner of rural land ever have dedicated all of its output to a priest? Not unless he was willing to risk disinheriting his sons. If he was subsequently forced by economic pressures to reclaim the land's output, and then he or his sons failed to redeem the land at the mandatory price, plus 20%, all of his land would go to the priest in the jubilee year. Thus, there was an economic restraint on the over-commitment of land to the priesthood. The heirs of the conquest were to this degree protected. The only person who would have committed most or all of his land's output to a priest would have been a very rich absentee landlord who made his money in commerce. But to dedicate all of one's land in a grand display of wealth was risky. This person might subsequently fall into economic distress and be compelled to lease his property to another. The heirs of this individual would then have lost ownership of all the dedicated land. If their father had pledged all of their land, they would have lost their guaranteed status as freemen. Thus, the high risks of default would have tended to reduce the number of such large-scale pledges to priests.

Nevertheless, the possibility of disinheritance did exist. If a father was so distressed by the ethical rebellion of all of his sons, he had the ability to disinherit them. He could not disinherit one son among many in this way, but he could disinherit all of them. He could do this by dedicating all of his landed inheritance to a priest. He would then do one of two things: lease this land to someone else, or reclaim the land's output for himself. If his sons refused to redeem the land before the jubilee, or could not afford to, they lost their inheritance forever. The priest could not transfer the land back to the original owner. To do so would have meant disinheriting the tribe of Levi. The Mosaic law made no provision for such repatriation to the original owner's family. Once a piece of rural land passed into the possession of a priest, it had to remain there until he died. Then it passed to his nearest of kin. Unredeemed dedicated land became devoted land at the jubilee. It could never again lawfully leave the jurisdiction of the priesthood.

We have no historical example of this in Old Testament, but we have the archetype example in the New Testament: the transfer of title of the kingdom of God from the Jews to the church. How was this accomplished? First, Jesus announced that God the Father had promised the kingdom's inheritance to His new priesthood, the church. "Therefore I say unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43). This was a formal announcement of God's dedication of the Promised Land. But such a transfer of ownership could be made only to a priest. Rural land could be lawfully transferred from the family of one tribe to the family of another tribe only in this unique case: the formal dedication of the land's output to a priest followed by a failure to deliver this output and a failure to redeem it.

This New Testament transfer of ownership was not to be to a single family of the priesthood; rather, it was made to a new nation. That nation is the church, which constitutes a new priesthood: a kingdom of priests (I Peter 2:9). The representative priest of this nation of priests was the High Priest. The High Priest is Jesus Christ (Heb. 9). This public dedication was legally secured for the church by the death of Jesus Christ, i.e., the death of the Testator. "For a testament is of force after men are dead: otherwise it is of no strength at all while the testator liveth" (Heb. 9:17). The publicly visible evidence of the transfer of the High Priest's inheritance to His heirs came when the Holy Spirit fell on the church at Pentecost (Acts 2).

Old Covenant Israel had refused to honor this dedication. They crucified the new High Priest. They did not redeem the land. Prior to the next jubilee, the output of the land was not delivered to the new priests, nor was the mandatory 20% redemption payment. That is, the dedicated output of the land was not redeemed by the heirs whose legal title had been at risk. The Jews not only did not pay the new priesthood the mandatory redemption price of 20%; they persecuted the church. This secured the irrevocable transfer of the kingdom to the new priesthood.

When was the next jubilee year after the dedication? When did the transfer of legal title to the heirs of the High Priest take place? James Jordan's study of New Testament chronology dates Jesus' death in A.D. 30 (Jewish year: 3960). Paul was converted shortly thereafter, after Pentecost. The next year, Jordan concludes from his study of the calendar after the exiles' return from Medo-Persia, was the seventh sabbath year in the final jubilee cycle.¹⁷ The jubilee came in 3962, the year that Paul's ministry to the gentiles began.¹⁸ This, I conclude, was the date of the transfer to the church of legal title to the kingdom of God: the fulfillment of Jesus' prophecy in Matthew 21:43.

Old Covenant Israel's failure to redeem this dedicated land was God's means of disinheriting all of His rebellious Israelite sons. They

17. If Jordan is correct that Jesus was sacrificed in the year prior to the seventh sabbath, this would have been the year scheduled by God for the miraculous triple harvest. This was the year of the largest firstfruits offering, which was delivered to the priesthood at Pentecost.

18. Jordan, "Jubilee, Part 3," Biblical Chronology, V (April 1993), [p. 2]. (<http://bit.ly/jbjub3>) See also, "Chronology of the Gospels," ibid, IV (Dec. 1992). (<http://bit.ly/jbjgospels>) could be legally disinherited only as a family unit; selective disinheritance by a father was not possible. As long as any of the family's land remained in the father's possession, all of his sons would have a piece of the inheritance. Disinheritance would not remove them from their tribe. Tribal membership secured their legal status as freemen. Thus, disinheritance was in this case economic, not judicial. The sons would have no lawful claim on any portion of the land. In A.D. 70, the self-disinherited sons of God were evicted by Rome from the temple. After Bar Kochba's rebellion of A.D. 133–35, they were evicted by Rome from the land. The diaspora began.

The idea so prevalent in modern fundamentalism that the modern State of Israel is in some way biblically entitled to God's original grant of land to Abraham, which was secured by Joshua during the conquest, is inescapably a denial of the authority and binding character of God's revealed law. The Old Covenant sons of God forfeited forever their legal title to the Promised Land and their guaranteed citizenship in the kingdom of God by their persecution of the New Covenant priests, the heirs of the dedication: the church. The covenantal heirs of these disinherited sons can reclaim their citizenship in the kingdom only as adopted sons, i.e., as members of God's New Covenant church. There can never be a repatriation of either the Promised Land or the kingdom of God to the Jews. Once a dedicated piece of land passed into the possession of a priest at the jubilee, there was only one way for it ever to be transferred back to the original owner. The original owner had to become a priest, and not merely a priest: the nearest of kin to the priest who had been given the land. He had to be adopted by that priest. Only through the death of this adopting kinsman-priest could the original owner legally regain possession of his former inheritance.

The Kinsman-High Priest made this offer of adoption to every Jew as well as to every gentile. "But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name" (John 1:12). He still makes it. There is no other way to secure a piece of the now-devoted inheritance in history, which is mandatory in order to secure it in eternity.

This means that the land comprising the modern State of Israel is not the Promised Land of the Old Covenant. It also has no judicial connection to the kingdom of God or any prophecy regarding this kingdom. The kingdom of God had been connected to the land prior to Jesus' ministry and death, but the legal transfer of the kingdom took place at the time of the final jubilee, when the Jews redeemed neither land nor kingdom from the church. God transferred to the church, the new priesthood, lawful title to the kingdom at the resurrection of Jesus (Matt. 28:18–20), but He allowed the Jews to stay in control over both the land and the temple until A.D. 70. When they failed to redeem the land from the church prior to the next (and final) jubilee, title automatically transferred to the new priesthood. The land ceased to have any covenantal relevance in A.D. 70, when it came under God's vengeance.¹⁹

G. Lessees: Exempt from Earthly Negative Sanctions

It was not just the original land owner who had the option of rewarding the priests by a temporary donation of his land's net output. So could the person who had leased land from an original owner. But his situation was judicially unique: he was spared the 20% redemption penalty. "And if a man sanctify unto the LORD a field which he hath bought, which is not of the fields of his possession; Then the priest shall reckon unto him the worth of thy estimation, even unto the year of the jubile: and he shall give thine estimation in that day, as a holy thing unto the LORD" (Lev. 27:22–23). This law specified that the field would return to the original owner in the jubilee year (Lev. 27:24). The law protected the original land owner from the consequences of vow-breaking by the lessee. The lessee could not transfer ownership of something he did not own: land beyond the jubilee.

The lessee also escaped the penalty of disinheritance. A lessee who broke his vow of dedication and reclaimed the land was not threatened by the loss of the land in the jubilee. In fact, this law specifies no penalty at all. It does not state that the lessee must forfeit an equivalent quantity of his own land. This means that there was far greater likelihood that he would break his vow of dedication, compared to an original owner. The question arises: Why was the lessee exempt from the 20% penalty? If he was not subject to the threat of losing the dedicated land—it was not his land—then why wasn't the redemption penalty even greater than 20%? Why were no penalties imposed? The text does not say. We can only guess. Let us guess intelligently.

The lessee owed the original owner regular payments unless he had already paid the owner in advance. This placed him in a weaker economic position, other things being equal, than the original land owner. Either he bore greater contractual risk than an original owner would have borne or, if he had already paid the owner in advance, he had less cash available to redeem the land from the priest. Since the goal of a land-dedication vow was to reward the priests, excessive economic barriers to redemption would have been a disincentive for such vows. Thus, the priest bore greater risk of having his plans disrupted by a lessee than by an original owner. The lessee was more likely to reclaim the dedicated property than an original owner was.

19. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

If he paid no 20% penalty for breaking his vow to the priest, what would have protected the priests? They were protected by the inescapable phenomenon of interest. The present value of future goods is less than the present value of identical present goods. This discount is called the rate of interest.²⁰ The priest could lawfully demand an immediate cash payment of all the shekels remaining to be paid until the jubilee. But the present value of the money to be accrued in the future is less than the present value of the same number of monetary units paid today in cash. So, the lessee paid a penalty to the priest: the difference between the present value of the cash shekels and the present value of those shekels to come. This was not the 20% penalty, but it was nonetheless a penalty.²¹

The fact is, however, the law provided no explicit earthly negative sanctions for a priest to impose on a lessee who reclaimed previously dedicated land. The priest had to rely on the conscience of the lessee not to reclaim it. We see here that the long-term sanctity of the land as inheritance judicially outweighed the short-term sanctity of the land in priestly dedication. Only original owners could bring this unique sanction of disinheritance on their heirs.

H. A Judicial Price: Fixed by Law

Why not use a free market price in establishing the redemption price of dedicated land? Why did the text specify a specific price (50 shekels of silver) and a specific crop (barley)? Samson Raphael Hirsch, the early nineteenth-century Orthodox Jewish commentator, offered this explanation: this case “was the one unique case, standing quite by itself, where a field could be sold and the purchase ultimately become permanent. Hence for buying back, for the redemption of such a field which could eventually become a permanent purchase there could be no market price ascertained, so that the fixing of a universal fixed value was a necessity.²² I do not accept his explanation, but I do accept his identification of the uniqueness of this fixed price—a non-market price.

20. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. 19. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

21. Those who deny the universal phenomenon of time-preference (interest) will have to seek for another explanation of how the priests were protected from disruptions in their plans: forfeited vows by lessees.

When a specific price is established by the Mosaic law, it becomes a judicial price, not a market price. Hirsch acknowledged that this was not a market price. What is not plausible is his argument that the market price in this case would have been difficult to ascertain. At the beginning of a jubilee cycle, it would have been only slightly higher than the lease price. The effect of discounting an income stream on years beyond half a century is to reduce its present value greatly.

There was another reason for a judicial price in this instance. The underlying problem was the threat of monopolistic exploitation by the priest—the possible misuse of his authority to declare arbitrarily a redemption price. The judicial price of 50 shekels protected the original owner. It was the priest's responsibility in all the redemption cases to declare the price, to which a 20% payment was added. In this unique case, however, the priest was given an opportunity to take permanent possession of land belonging to a member of another tribe. The temptation to cheat would have been very high. If the priest deliberately set the price too high, the original owner or his heirs could not afford to redeem the field until the jubilee year or the sabbatical year immediately preceding it. In those two years, the input of the land was zero—no seeding was legal—and the output was not legal for harvesting. Thus, even a supposed 50-shekel per homer price would not have been a barrier to redemption. The legal market price of the crop was still zero. But economic conditions might change prior to the jubilee year. The head of the family might be tempted later to lease it out if he needed money. The family would then lose the property forever at the jubilee year. The terms of redemption were therefore specified by law, so that there could be no doubt on the part of the field's redeemer or the civil and ecclesiastical authorities concerning exactly what was owed by the redeemer to the priestly family.

22. Samson Raphael Hirsch, The Pentateuch: Leviticus (part II), trans. Isaac Levy (Gateshead, England: Judaica Press, [1878?] 1989), p. 825.

I. Restricting the Accumulation of Priest-Owned Land

In the European Middle Ages, deathbed transfers of land to the church were common. The church and especially its monastic orders accumulated huge tracts of land over the centuries as a result of these and other forms of land transfer.²³ In contrast, a deathbed legacy of land to the priesthood on a permanent basis was almost impossible to make in Israel. A dying man might dedicate a plot of land to a priest, but the man's heirs could redeem it early or else wait for the jubilee year. The only possible deathbed transfer that could permanently have alienated land was a deathbed legacy from an owner—probably debt-ridden—who had leased out his plot of land and who then dedicated it to a priest. This assumes that the second interpretation of the leased land default is correct, which I do not accept. If that interpretation is correct, then economically incompetent men were the most likely sources of such permanent transfers of rural land in ancient Israel. But it was the wealthy medieval landowner, not the poor peasant, who was the source of deathbed legacies.

C. W. Previté-Orton commented on the two-fold threat to the medieval church in the twelfth century: too many lax men joining the monastic orders and too much wealth donated to these orders. "The extraordinary growth of monasticism new and old in the century of Church reform undoubtedly brought too many into the cloister, whether as converts or oblates, who had no true or lasting vocation for the ascetic life; and the enormous landed wealth lavished on them by the laity, either in devotion or in fear of Judgment Day, proved a dangerous ally of laxity and degeneration."²⁴ This was not true in Mosaic Israel. First, the entry price system of Leviticus 27:2–8 reduced the likelihood of the influx of poor people into the tribe of Levi. Second, the jubilee law, when coupled with the price of 50 shekels per barley-producing land unit at the beginning of the jubilee cycle (Lev. 27:16) and the permanent transfer law of Leviticus 27:20–21, reduced the likelihood of deathbed transfers of land. Such a transfer was a penalty, not a righteous gift.

23. Marc Bloch, Feudal Society (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1940] 1961), pp. 208–9; R. W. Southern, Western Society and the Church in the Middle Ages (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1970), pp. 261–63.

24. C. W. Previté-Orton, The Shorter Cambridge Medieval History, 2 vols. (Cambridge: At the University Press, [1952] 1966), I, p. 506.

Conclusion

The redemption price of dedicated rural land was a judicial price, not a market price. It was somewhat arbitrary, although not excessively so, given the conventional Mesopotamian price of one shekel of silver per homer of barley. It provided a rough means of estimating the redemption price of a piece of land.

The presence of a penalty payment of 20% identified as redemption prices three of the four prices in this passage: beasts, houses, and owner-dedicated fields.²⁵ These three penalty payments also served to keep the priests honest in making their estimation of the redemption price of any property. If the priests estimated the price above the market price, the potential redeemer would not buy it back, so the priest would forfeit the 20% bonus available to him.

The law governing the redemption of sanctified fields created a unique opportunity for the priests: the right to inherit rural land. If the sanctified plot was subsequently reclaimed by the owner but not redeemed, it became the inheritance of the priest in the jubilee year. This law served as the land owners' means of bribing a corrupt priesthood into announcing the jubilee year. The priests could not inherit unredeemed sanctified land unless they proclaimed the jubilee year. Set apart once by vow, the land could not be reclaimed—de-sanctified—by the vow-taking owner except by a cash redemption payment plus a 20 penalty.

This law placed a major restriction on the ability of a land owner to leave land to a priest. His heirs had the right to redeem the land. Thus, deathbed transfers of rural land were highly unlikely. The land owner would have had to sanctify the land on his deathbed without his heirs' paying an ever-smaller redemption price as the jubilee year approached. The priests would not become owners of property among the other tribes.

25. The fourth, exceptional price was the field dedicated by a leaseholder. He had to pay in cash the fixed shekel payments remaining on the property until the jubilee year, a price not discounted by the rate of interest.

TITHING: THE BENEFIT OF THE DOUBT

And all the tithe of the land, whether of the seed of the land, or of the fruit of the tree, is the LORD'S: it is holy unto the LORD. And if a man will at all redeem ought of his tithes, he shall add thereto the fifth part thereof. And concerning the tithe of the herd, or of the flock, even of whatsoever passeth under the rod, the tenth shall be holy unto the LORD. He shall not search whether it be good or bad, neither shall he change it: and if he change it at all, then both it and the change thereof shall be holy; it shall not be redeemed (Lev. 27:30–33).

We come at long last to the final and shortest exposition in this commentary. The theocentric meaning of this passage is that God, as the owner of all things, deserves a tithe. This is an aspect of hierarchy: point two of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. A Holy Tithe

The tithe is described here as being holy (kodesh). It was judicially set apart for God by the Levites. That is, the tithe was sanctified. The tithe was not under the ban (see below). We know this because the 20% redemption payment was present in this law. The Levites enjoyed the tithe as God's representatives.

In a purely monetary society, the redemption law of the tithe is irrelevant. No one is going to pay a 20% payment to buy back his monetary tithe. This law is relevant only in a society in which income in kind is common: income measured in something other than money. In such societies, goods are sometimes retained by their producers to be used or enjoyed for themselves, not sold into the market for money.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

Why would someone pay a commission to redeem an object? Only if that object has special meaning or importance for him. If the quality of grain in a tithed sack is identical to the grain in the other nine sacks, the tithe-payer is not going to pay a commission to buy back the tithed sack. The assumption behind this law is that the impersonal collecting of the tithe may produce a personally significant loss for the tithe-payer. In order to enable him to minimize this loss, the law allows him to pay a 20% commission to buy back the special item.

There is no indication that this law has been annulled by subsequent biblical revelation. It applies only to agriculture, as the text indicates—primarily to herds of animals.

B. A Tithe on the Net Increase

The text reads: “And concerning the tithe of the herd, or of the flock, even of whatsoever passeth under the rod, the tenth shall be holy unto the LORD. He shall not search whether it be good or bad, neither shall he change it: and if he change it at all, then both it and the change thereof shall be holy; it shall not be redeemed.” The tithe was collected from the increase of the herd. It was not imposed as a tax on capital. It was a tax on the increase. This increase was a net increase. If one animal of the herd had died since the time of the most recent payment of the tithe, the herd owner was allowed to set aside a replacement from the animals born since the last payment.² Had this not been the case, then losses from a disease that killed half a man’s herd could not be deducted when assessing the net annual increase. This would constitute a tax on capital.

This law reveals that God gave the benefit of the doubt to the herd owner. An old beast that had died could lawfully be replaced by a young beast without the payment of a tithe. Presumably, this exchange would have benefited the owner, since the newborn animal would have had many years of productivity ahead of it. There would have been an increase of net productivity for the herd but not a net increase in the size of the herd. In some cases, however, the older beast would have been more valuable, especially a prize animal used for breeding or a trained work animal. God, as sovereign over life and death, imposes net losses or gains on a herd’s productivity, irrespective of the number of beasts in the herd.

2. This is the economic equivalent of allowing a farmer to set aside from this year’s crop an amount equal to last year’s seed. A person pays the tithe on net output only once. He does not keep paying on capital, i.e., replaced producer goods.

What was not tolerated by God was any attempt by the owner to pick and choose from among the newborns. The owner could not lawfully select the best of the newborns to replace the dead animals, using the less desirable newborns to pay his tithe, thereby cheating God. Presumably, the birth order of the newborns would govern the replacement of any dead beasts. The first newborn after the death of another member of the herd would have been segregated immediately from the other newborns as not being eligible for the tithe.

C. Under the Rod

Those newborn beasts that remained after the owner had replaced any dead animals constituted the net increase of the herd. In this case law, the herd owner lined up the newborns, probably in a pen, and drove them one by one past the Levite. Each beast passed under a rod. Every tenth beast was taken by the Levite. The herd owner was not allowed to walk the beasts under the rod in any pre-planned order. The same law that governed the voluntary sanctification of beasts governed the involuntary sanctification of beasts: "He shall not alter it, nor change it, a good for a bad, or a bad for a good: and if he shall at all change beast for beast, then it and the exchange thereof shall be holy" (Lev. 27:10). The owner was allowed to buy back any sanctified beast, but only by paying the redemption price commission.

The herd owner was given the benefit of the doubt at the end of the line. Only the tenth beast was holy. If as many as nine of the final group of beasts passed under the rod, the herd owner owed no tithe on those nine beasts. Where the product could not be divided without destroying the life or value of the item, the tithe applied only to discrete items. All those animals that passed under the rod after the final group of 10 had been counted escaped the sanctification process.

Because God gave the benefit of the doubt to the tithe-payer, it was especially evil for him to arrange in advance the collection of the tithe, with or without the collusion of the Levite. The assembling process was to be humanly random. Neither the tithe-payer nor the Levite was to manipulate the crop or the herd to his own advantage, or to the other's advantage. God owned the tenth; He alone was authorized to arrange the collection process. Any attempt by man to arrange the process was not only theft from God, it was an assertion of man's autonomy. It was an attempt to manipulate the created order in a way prohibited by God.

D. The Ban

What if a tithe-payer defied God and manipulated the tithe-collection process? The tithed items came under the ban: “if he change it at all, then both it and the change thereof shall be holy; it shall not be redeemed.” The tithed item became hormah: devoted to God. This degree of sanctification was absolute; once within the boundaries of God’s possession, it could not lawfully be removed.

Why would a person manipulate the outcome of the collection process? Because he was trying to cheat God. He was unwilling to risk paying the 20% commission that would be imposed if he subsequently wanted to buy back a specific item. What was the penalty for this act of theft? Permanent loss. The very process of altering the outcome made the tithe holy—not holy as in sanctification, but holy as in devoted. The right of redemption ended.

There is no ban today—no hormah. That is because the New Covenant has annulled the sacrifice of animals. This aspect of the law is also annulled.³

Conclusion

The tithe was paid on the net increase of the herd. The owner of the herd paid his tithe only out of the newborn animals that remained after he had set aside replacement beasts for the ones that had died during the year. He was required to run the remaining newborns under a rod. He could not lawfully order the line of newborns so that the outcome of the tithe could be known in advance. The tenth beast became the property of the Levite. As in all cases of redemption, he could buy back that beast for a payment of its market value plus an additional payment of one-fifth.

If the owner violated this law by arranging the order of the beasts as they lined up, he could not buy back any of the animals. They became devoted to God—beyond redemption.

There is no New Testament evidence that the economics of this law has been altered. The tithe on the increase of a herd should still be honored.

What about the rod? Was its use tied exclusively to the office of

3. By extension, the law of the military annihilation of all enemy males is also annulled (Deut. 20:13): no hormah.

Levite? The association with Moses and the rod indicates that its use was in some way tied to the Mosaic covenant. Aaron's rod was in the Ark of the Covenant (Heb. 9:4), but the Ark has disappeared. My conclusion is that there need be no rod in the process, but there must be a random distribution of the herd during the tithing process. We are not allowed to cheat God. If a prize animal gets tagged for collection by the church, the owner can pay its market price plus 20%. The presumption is, however, that prize animals of breeding age will be segregated in advance. The tithe on the net increase in prize animals must come from the segregated herd of prize animals. Such segregation was not lawful in Mosaic Israel (Lev. 19:19).⁴

If, after counting everything owed, there are up to nine beasts left over, no tithe is imposed. God still gives herd owners the benefit of the doubt.

What about the ban? Today, we do not sacrifice animals to God. Thus, to place an animal under the ban is to misinterpret this law. The owner can buy back the beast at a market price, but probably at public auction. Then he pays an additional 20% to the church. No cheating is allowed; whatever he pays for the animal, and however he obtains it, he pays 20% of what the purchase price had been at the time of the auction or its initial sale by the church.

4. Chapter 17.

CONCLUSION

Thrice in the year shall all your men children [males] appear before the Lord GOD, the God of Israel. For I will cast out the nations before thee, and enlarge thy borders: neither shall any man desire thy land, when thou shalt go up to appear before the LORD thy God thrice in the year (Ex. 34:23–24).

This was God's ultimate visible evidence of His covenantally predictable defense of Israel. The very boundaries of the land would become sacrosanct—sacred and set apart by God—during the three mandated annual festivals. God promised that during the Israelites' numerous corporate journeys to Jerusalem, which was the only authorized place of sacrifice on earth, their enemies would not even want to invade the land. In their times of greatest military vulnerability, when the unarmed army of the Lord was marching to Jerusalem, the nation would be sheltered by the divine intervention of God. The nation was holy: set apart by God. This included the land itself. The sacrilege of military invasion during the mandatory feasts could not take place for as long as God maintained His covenant with Mosaic Israel. Israel would not be profaned. The sign of God's rejection of Israel would be a military invasion during a feast, especially Passover.

In A.D. 70, during Passover, the Roman legions surrounded the holy city and laid siege to it.¹ This event was that which had been forecast by Jesus (Luke 21:20–24): the Great Tribulation.² When the city fell, the Romans set fire to the temple. What would have been the ultimate boundary violation under the Mosaic Covenant—the ultimate sacrilege—was not only permitted by God, it had been prophesied by God. It was God's answer to a heavenly prayer:

And I looked, and behold a pale horse: and his name that sat on him was Death, and Hell followed with him. And power was given unto them over the fourth part of the earth, to kill with sword, and with hunger, and with death, and with the beasts of the earth. And when he had opened the fifth seal, I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held: And they cried with a loud voice, saying, How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth? And white robes were given unto every one of them; and it was said unto them, that they should rest yet for a little season, until their fellowservants also and their brethren, that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled. And I beheld when he had opened the sixth seal, and, lo, there was a great earthquake; and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood; And the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind (Rev. 6:8–13).³

1. Josephus, The Wars of the Jews, VI:IX:3.

2. David Chilton, The Great Tribulation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dctrib>)

The fall of Jerusalem to the Romans was God's final sign that the Jews' rebellion had terminated the Mosaic Covenant. Israel's national boundary was definitively and permanently breached by Rome during the nation's final Passover. The temple's sacred boundaries were eliminated. The sacrifices ended. These boundaries ceased to have covenantal relevance because the Mosaic Covenant had ceased to have any authority. God's predictable, covenantal, negative corporate sanctions were thoroughly applied to that nation which had broken His covenant. Divine protection for the boundaries of the land would never again defend Israel's residents.

A. Government and Sanctions

This raises a major question of biblical interpretation: What about those aspects of the Mosaic law that applied to Israel's civil government? Were they all annulled with the annulment of Israel's geographical boundaries? Were any of those laws cross-boundary phenomena? That is, did any of them serve as binding judicial standards for foreign nations? Deuteronomy 4:4–8 indicates that at least some of them did.⁴ Does this mean that these have been extended by God into the New Covenant era? Are they still covenantally binding and therefore judicial ideals toward which all nations should strive, and in terms of which all nations are judged in history? My answer is the answer which is sometimes said to be the ultimate summary of all sociological theory: some are, some aren't. This answer in turn requires an additional principle of interpretation, a theological means of separating: (1) the cross-boundary Mosaic Covenant civil standards that are still judicially binding on men and nations from (2) the temporally and geographically bounded Mosaic standards. In short, the correct answer requires a hermeneutic: a principle of interpretation. The Book of Leviticus forces serious Christians to search for this biblical hermeneutic. Without this hermeneutic, Leviticus becomes a snare that traps antinomians in their total dismissal of all of its laws, and traps legalists in their total acceptance.

3. See David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), pp. 193–95. (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 8.

In order to apply the Bible judicially to the governmental realm—personal, church, state, and family—we require two things: a principle of institutional exclusion and the presence of negative sanctions to enforce this exclusion. Exclusion and inclusion are two sides of the same fence. Every boundary has an inside and an outside. So it is with membership in God's authorized covenantal institutions.

1. By Oath Consigned

Let us begin with the initial requirement for covenantal membership: the oath. There can be no lawful covenantal participation apart from a binding self-maledictory oath under God. A covenant is established only by a binding oath under God. People are, in the words of Meredith Kline, by oath consigned.⁵ They are consigned by God⁶ to heaven or hell in terms of a personal oath⁷ of allegiance⁸ and also by their lifelong adherence—"the perseverance of the saints"⁹—to its judicial stipulations.¹⁰

Let us consider political theory. People are consigned by an oath, either implicit or explicit, to membership in one state or another. The primary jurisdiction of the civil government is geographical. Everything within the boundaries of a particular state is under its jurisdiction, although this jurisdiction is always shared in certain ways with the other two covenantal institutions and usually shared also with re-

5. Meredith G. Kline, By Oath Consigned: A Reinterpretation of the Covenant Signs of Circumcision and Baptism (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1968).

6. Point one of the biblical covenant: sovereignty.

7. Point four of the biblical covenant: sanctions.

8. Point two of the biblical covenant: hierarchy.

9. Point five of the biblical covenant: inheritance.

10. Point three of the biblical covenant: law.

gional civil governments within the jurisdiction of the larger civil government. But one civil government has final civil jurisdiction, short of lawful rebellion by lower levels of civil government—the Protestant Reformation’s doctrine of interposition.¹¹

In contrast to their automatic subordination by implicit oath of obedience to the state on the basis of geography or birth, people may or may not be consigned by implicit oath to a church or a family. Those people who refuse to accept as binding on them the ethical and judicial terms of the covenantal oath in question cannot lawfully be part of the covenantal institution in question. Those who refuse to take this oath are not allowed in, and those inside who break the terms of this oath must be expelled: negative sanctions. There cannot be lawful government apart from oath and negative sanctions. The person’s oath may be implicit,¹² but if the institution’s sanctions are exclusively implicit, then there is neither a covenant nor a government: no sanctions, no government.

2. The Adamic Covenant

Inclusion into God’s special covenant of redemption is by adoption. But there is another covenant, a more general covenant: the post-Edenic Adamic covenant. It was marked eucharistically (“graciously”) by God’s provision of animal coverings for Adam and Eve (Gen. 3:21). This general Adamic covenant also has laws and sanctions. It brings men under condemnation in eternity. The covenantally disinherited sons of Adam are still under its laws in history. Therefore, in order to pursue a better world, covenant-breakers must conform themselves to God’s general covenantal law-order. The entire pre-Flood world should have repented. Similarly, Sodom should have repented. Nineveh was also required to repent. There is no doubt that God through Jonah threatened Nineveh with negative corporate sanctions in history, just as He threatened Sodom through Abraham and the angelic visitors. The threat of such sanctions against non-covenanted nations testifies to the existence of covenantally binding laws. That is, the sanctions

11. John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion (1559), IV:xx:31. See also Michael R. Gilstrap, “John Calvin’s Theology of Resistance,” Christianity and Civilization, No. 4 (1983), pp. 180–217; Tom Rose, “On Reconstruction and the Federal Republic,” ibid., pp. 285–310. (<http://bit.ly/CRtheology>)

12. In the United States, a person born in the United States or born of one United States parent need not take a formal oath in order to vote as American citizen at age 18.

testify to the existence of general covenant laws that nations break at their peril.

The Ten Commandments and many of the Mosaic Covenant's case laws applied to the entire ancient world: cross-boundary laws. This was a form of covenantal inclusion. It was not inclusion within God's unique covenant of redemption, but it was inclusion within the general post-Eden Adamic covenant of temporal preservation: common grace. This grace is not given for the sake of covenant-breakers but for the sake of covenant-keepers.¹³

The existence of these general covenantal laws is affirmed by Paul's words: "For when Gentiles who do not have the Law do instinctively the things of the Law, these, not having the Law, are a law to themselves, in that they show the work of the Law written in their hearts, their conscience bearing witness, and their thoughts alternately accusing or else defending them, on the day when, according to my gospel, God will judge the secrets of men through Jesus Christ" (Rom. 2:14–16; NASB). The work of the law is written on all men's hearts—not the law itself, which resides only in the hearts of Christians (Heb. 8:10), but the work of the law.¹⁴ If this were not true, on what legal basis could God condemn all covenant-breakers on the day of judgment and still remain faithful to His covenant with Adam? The existence of the universal sanction of death testifies to the continuing authority the laws of the Adamic covenant (Rom. 5:12–14).

This does not mean that Spiritually unaided human reason can discover the laws of the Adamic covenant. There is no such thing as Spiritually unaided human reason. God aids all men's reason to some degree in history. God grants varying degrees of common grace to men so that they can sense some aspects of His general social laws. He restrains their moral and intellectual rebellion. But the mind of covenant-breaking man is in rebellion; so, as men become more perverse—more consistent with their covenant-breaking presuppositions—they rebel against the knowledge they possess by common grace. They suppress the truth that God constantly reveals to them in nature (Rom. 1:18–22). Therefore, covenant-breaking man's logic cannot be trusted to persuade him of the truth. It can be trusted only to condemn him before God. His logic is as corrupt as his morals are. He has a flawed epistemology (theory of knowledge) because of his moral rebellion.¹⁵ This is why all natural law theory rests on an illusion: the illusion of logically shared moral standards and sanctions among all mankind. Natural law theory is the creation of covenant-breaking men: Stoics of the late Classical period and Newtonians of the modern era.

13. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

14. On the difference between these two operations, see John Murray, The Epistle to the Romans, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1959), I, pp. 72–76.

Covenant-breaking man is by Adamic oath consigned to hell. He is from conception an oath-breaker in Adam, his legal representative before God (Rom. 5). He is a disinherited son: in time and eternity. He has been excluded from eternal life in history. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him" (John 3:36). To the extent that he and his fellow covenant-breakers live consistently in history with their broken oaths, they will become progressively more rebellious and progressively more threatened by God's predictable corporate negative sanctions in history.

Political pluralists emphatically deny this. They deny any legitimate New Covenant judicial relationship between God's righteous exclusion of covenant-breaking men in eternity and a civil government's righteous exclusion of them from citizenship in history. They affirm the civil legitimacy another standard and another oath. To which theologians reply: By what other standard?¹⁶ By what other oath?

3. Theocracy: Trinitarian vs. Non-Trinitarian

In the New Covenant, every civil oath must be Trinitarian, for the New Covenant reveals that the God of the covenant is a Trinitarian God. There is no other God whose oath is binding in history and eternity. The Great Commission requires that Christians work to see to it that all nations are baptized into Christ (Matt. 28:18–20).¹⁷ God requires that every nation on earth be brought under His civil covenant's administration through corporate affirmation: a Trinitarian oath. Civil magistrates are all supposed to be Christians.

A civil oath invokes God's laws and sanctions in history. The state's jurisdiction is geographical and therefore comprehensive within its boundaries—no separate jurisdictions. The only exceptions to this rule are foreign embassies. Inside their boundaries their home nations' laws prevail. I argue that no such grant of judicial immunity to any non-Trinitarian nation's embassy is biblically valid within a Christian nation. Every non-Christian nation must come to God's nations "on bended knee," to this extent: it is not entitled to a separate jurisdiction within the geographical boundaries of one of God's covenanted nations. Any attempt to renounce the requirement of a Trinitarian civil oath is necessarily an attempt to invoke another god's covenant. But there can be no covenantal neutrality in history. Thus, inclusion in and exclusion from civil citizenship are required by God to be based on public Trinitarian confession. Citizenship—the authority to render binding judgment in a civil court, which includes the ballot box—must be based on restricted church membership (ecclesiastical boundaries) and a restricted franchise (civil boundaries).¹⁸ It is this assertion regarding the civil oath which distinguishes Trinitarian theocratic movements (few and far between) from the broad range of post-Newtonian Christianity, i.e., political pluralism based on a shared confession of faith.¹⁹ This usually becomes a confession of faith in autonomous civil government.

15. Cornelius Van Til, A Christian Theory of Knowledge (Nutley, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1969).

16. Greg L. Bahnsen, No Other Standard: Theonomy and Its Critics (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991). (<http://bit.ly/gbnos>)

17. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), ch. 10. (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

Second, there must be the imposition of negative institutional sanctions in history to defend the stipulations of this oath. These negative sanctions are specified in the Mosaic covenant: formal warning or excommunication (ecclesiastical) and either economic restitution, public whipping, loss of citizenship, or public execution (civil). Modern Christians do not readily accept these general exclusionary requirements as legitimate if done in the name of Jesus Christ. Modern churches rarely excommunicate members. Many churches celebrate the Lord's Supper so infrequently that there is hardly anything to be excommunicated from.²⁰ It should therefore come as no surprise that Christians who are unwilling to excommunicate theologically deviant members are also hostile to any concept of citizenship based on a public, Trinitarian oath of allegiance. In this crucial judicial sense, modern Christians have become inclusivists. They have become civil Unitarians—belief in any god as sufficient for civil oath—and even civil atheists: binding civil oaths without reference to God. That is, they have become pluralists.²¹ This ecclesiastical and civil inclusivism has steadily been extended from modern politics—which is accompanied by a common civil religion²²—into theology. Evangelical leaders have begun to abandon the biblical doctrine of hell and then lake of fire: the ultimate place of exclusion.²³

18. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

19. The problem for the American churches today is this: the United States of America is officially covenanted constitutionally to the god of humanism, i.e., religious neutrality (Article VI, Section III). Ibid., pp. 385–92.

20. The Church of Christ denomination, following Alexander Campbell's rejection of Presbyterianism's closed communion, holds the Lord's Supper weekly, but then it denies the Supper's covenantal relevance by refusing to exclude anyone from participating.

B. Natural Law Theory

While modern Christians accept in theory the legitimacy of formal excommunications, however rare excommunications may be in our day—surely not a testimony to widespread exemplary living by Christians in our day—they do not believe in civil excommunication from the civil franchise on the basis of creedal confession. Protestant Christians for over three centuries, and Anglo-American Roman Catholics for at least a century, have adopted political pluralism as their civil ideal. This has required the adoption of a common-ground judicial confession: natural law philosophy. Today, however, only Christians and a tiny handful of secular scholars still defend natural law theory.

Natural law theory is a defunct world-and-life view in modern humanism. Charles Darwin and his followers by 1880 had destroyed the epistemological foundations of natural law philosophy.²⁴ Darwinism has enshrined the doctrine of environmental determinism. Binding biological laws at any moment in history are explained as the result of 21. North, Political Polytheism, Part 3.

22. Russell E. Ritchey and Donald G. Jones (eds.), American Civil Religion (New York: Harper & Row, 1974); Robert V. Bellah, The Broken Covenant: American Civil Religion in Time of Trial (New York: Seabury Crossroad, 1975); Bellah and Frederick E. Greenspahn, Uncivil Religion: Interreligious Hostility in America (New York: Crossroad, 1987); Sidney E. Mead, The Lively Experiment: The Shaping of Christianity in America (New York: Harper & Row, 1963); Richard V. Pierard and Robert D. Linder, Civil Religion and the Presidency (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan Academic, 1988).

23. In 1989, at a conference of almost 400 evangelical American Protestant theologians, a majority refused to affirm the doctrine of hell. World (June 3, 1989), p. 9. See below: Appendix G, “The Covenantal Structure of Judgment,” footnote #1.

24. Rousas J. Rushdoony, The Biblical Philosophy of History (Nutley, New Jersey: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1969), pp. 6–7; Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), Appendix A.

the conflict for survival: individuals vs. individuals, species vs. species, and species vs. geological environment. Similarly, binding social laws at any moment are explained as the result of competitive social groups and their physical and social environments. There are therefore no permanently binding social or moral laws in the worldview of Darwinism. The triumph of the Darwinian worldview has been almost universal, even among groups that do not accept Darwin's doctrine of exclusively biological evolution.

Faith in ancient Stoicism's theory of a shared common-ground philosophy that unites all rational men is now fading even among Christians—its last defenders. This has left modern Christianity judicially mute: judicial salt without savor, fit for being trampled underfoot politically. This is exactly where God's enemies want us.

What Christians need is an authoritative foundation for their knowledge. Without this, those who represent Jesus Christ in history will remain incapable of defending the judicially binding character His oath. They will remain impotent to bring God's covenant lawsuit against covenant-breakers in every area of life. In short, they will continue to refuse to invoke God's corporate sanctions in history.

C. The Laws of Leviticus

How does Leviticus fit into a program of covenantal sanctions? Can Christians confidently invoke the corporate sanctions of Leviticus (Lev. 26) as God's continuing corporate historical sanctions, both positive and negative?

This commentary focuses on the narrow topic of economics. I have surveyed the Levitical laws governing economics. I have also distinguished temporary Mosaic laws of the land from permanent covenantal laws that crossed Israel's geographical boundaries during the Mosaic era and then passed into the New Covenant. It is appropriate here to review these laws.

1. Land Laws and Seed Laws

Land laws and seed laws were laws associated with God's covenantal promises to Abraham regarding his offspring (Gen. 15–17). There was a chronological boundary subsequently placed on the seed laws: Jacob's prophecy and promise. "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be" (Gen. 49:10). After Shiloh came, Jacob said, the scepter would depart from Judah. The unified concept of scepter and lawgiver pointed to the civil covenant: physical sanctions and law. Jacob prophesied that the lawful enforcement of the civil covenant would eventually pass to another ruler: Shiloh, the Messiah.

The Levitical land laws were tied covenantally to the Abrahamic promise regarding a place of residence for the Israelites (Gen. 15:13–16). These land laws were also tied to the Abrahamic promise of the seed. “In the same day the LORD made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates” (Gen. 15:18). The mark of those included under the boundaries of these seed laws was the covenantal sign of circumcision (Gen. 17:9–14). Circumcision established a personal covenantal boundary. There were also family and tribal boundaries tied to the laws of inheritance. The ultimate inheritance law was above all a land law: the jubilee law (Lev. 25).

The fall of Jerusalem and the abolition of the temple’s sacrifices forever ended the Mosaic Passover. The five sacrifices of Leviticus 1–7 also ended forever. There can be no question about the annulment of the inheritance laws by A.D. 70. But with this annulment of the inheritance laws also came the annulment of the seed laws. Once the Messiah came, there was no further need to separate Judah from his brothers. Once the temple was destroyed, there was no further need to separate Levi from his brothers. There was also no further need to separate the sons of Aaron (priests) from the sons of Levi (Levites). Therefore, the most important Mosaic family distinction within a single tribe—the Aaronic priesthood—was annulled: the ultimate representative case. The tribal and family boundaries of the Abrahamic covenant ceased to operate after A.D. 70. This annulled the Mosaic law’s applications of the Abrahamic covenant’s land and seed laws. The land and seed laws were aspects of a single administration: the Mosaic Covenant. The New Covenant—based exclusively and forthrightly on the covenantal concept of adoption²⁵—replaced the Mosaic Covenant.

25. Infant baptism is not a confirmation of covenantal inheritance through biological inclusion but rather its opposite: the confirmation of covenantal inheritance through adoption, i.e., adoption into the family of God, His church. The one who baptizes is an agent of the church, not an agent of the family. This was true under the Abrahamic covenant, too: the male head of the household circumcised the males born into that household, but as an agent of the priesthood.

(a) Land Laws

Biblical quarantine (Lev. 13:45–46). This law dealt with a unique disease that came upon men as a judgment. Only when a priest crossed the household boundary of a diseased house did everything within its walls become unclean. This quarantine law ended when this judicial disease ended, i.e., when the Mosaic priesthood ended.²⁶

Promised land as a covenantal agent (Lev. 18:24–29). The land no longer functions as a covenantal agent. That temporary office was operational only after the Israelites crossed into Canaan. That office was tied to the presence of the sanctuary: the holy of holies.²⁷

The laws of clean and unclean beasts (Lev. 20:22–26). This was a land law, for it was associated with the land's office as the agent of sanctions. These laws marked off Israel as a separate nation. This is true of the dietary laws generally, which is why God annulled them in a vision to Peter just before he was told to visit the house of Cornelius (Acts 10).²⁸

The national sabbatical year of rest for the land (Lev. 25:1–7). This was an aspect of the jubilee year. The law was part of God's original grant of leaseholds at the time of the conquest. There is no agency of enforcement today. There has been no national grant of land.²⁹

The jubilee law (Lev. 25:8–13). This law applied only to national Israel. It was a law uniquely associated with Israel's conquest of Canaan. It was in part a land law and in part a seed law: inheritance and citizenship. It was more judicial—citizenship—than economic. The annulment of the jubilee law was announced by Jesus at the beginning of his ministry (Luke 4:17–19). This prophecy was fulfilled at the final jubilee year of national Israel.³⁰ This probably took place in the year that Paul's ministry to the gentiles began, two years after the crucifixion.³¹

The jubilee law prohibiting oppression centered around the possibility that the priests and magistrates might not enforce the jubilee law (Lev. 25:14–17). Thus, those who trusted the courts when leasing land would be oppressed by those who knew the courts were corrupt.³²

26. Chapter 9.

27. Chapter 10.

28. Chapter 21.

29. Chapter 23.

30. Chapter 24.

31. James Jordan, "Jubilee (3)," Biblical Chronology, V (April 1993), [p. 2]. (<http://bit.ly/jbjjub3>)

3232. Chapter 25.

The jubilee year was to be preceded by a miraculous year bringing a triple crop (Lev. 25:18–22). This designates the jubilee year law as a land law with a blessing analogous to the manna. The manna had ceased when the nation crossed the Jordan River and entered Canaan.³³

The prohibition against the permanent sale of rural land (Lev. 25:23–24). This was a land law. This law did not apply in walled cities that were not Levitical cities.³⁴

The law promising rain, crops, peace in the land, and no wild beasts in response to corporate faithfulness (Lev. 26:3–6). This was a land law. Nature's predictable covenantal blessings were tied to the office of the holy land as the agency of sanctions.³⁵

(b) Seed Laws

Gleaning (Lev. 19:9–10). The gleaning law applied only to national Israel, and only to farming. It was an aspect of the jubilee land laws: inheritance and citizenship. It was a means of establishing a major form of charity in tribe-dominated rural regions. This law promoted localism and decentralization in Mosaic Israel.

The moral principle of gleaning extends into New Covenant times as a charity law, but not as a seed law. The moral principle is this: recipients of charity who are physically able to work hard should. This law is not supposed to be applied literally today. There were no applications in civil law. This law was enforced by the priesthood, not by the state, for no corporate negative sanctions were threatened by God, nor would it have been possible for judges to identify precisely which poor people had been unlawfully excluded.³⁶ This principle of interpretation also applies to the re-statement of the gleaning law in Leviticus 23:22.³⁷

The laws against allowing different breeds of cattle to interbreed (Lev. 19:19). This was a temporary seed law. It reflected the laws of tribal separation. So did the law against sowing a field with mixed seeds. Also annulled is the prohibition against wearing wool-linen garments.³⁸

The law against harvesting the fruit of newly planted trees for three

33. Chapter 26.

34. Chapter 27.

35. Chapter 32.

36. Chapter 11.

37. Chapter 22.

38. Chapter 17.

years and setting aside the fourth year's crop as holy (Lev. 19: 23–25). This was a seed law. It was a curse on Israel because of the failure of the exodus generation to circumcise their sons during the wilderness wandering. It is no longer in force.³⁹

The law governing the enslavement of fellow Israelites (Lev. 25: 39–43). This was a seed law, although by being governed by the jubilee law, there was an aspect of land law associated with it. There is no longer any long-term indentured servitude bringing a family under the authority of another family for up to 49 years.⁴⁰

The law governing the permanent enslavement of foreigners (Lev. 25:44–46). This must have been a seed law rather than a land law, for it opened the possibility of adoption, either by the family that owned the foreign slaves or by another Israelite family.⁴¹

The law governing the redemption of an Israelite out of a foreigner's household by the kinsman-redeemer (Lev. 25:47–55). This was a seed law.⁴²

2. Priestly Laws

The laws of five sacrifices (Lev. 1–7). These were all priestly laws. They are no longer in force.⁴³

The law prohibiting wine drinking by priests while they were inside the tabernacle or temple (Lev. 10:8–11). This law was exclusive to priests as mediatorial agents. The wine belonged to God. It had to be poured out before the altar. This law was tied to the holiness of the temple. It did not apply to Levites or priests outside of the temple's geographical boundaries.⁴⁴

The law establishing the official prices of people who take vows (Lev. 27:2–8). This was a law governing access to the priesthood. These vows governed those who were devoted—irrevocably adopted—to priestly service.⁴⁵

The law establishing vows to priests and the inheritance of rural land (Lev. 27:9–15). This law was primarily priestly but secondarily a seed law: an aspect of inheritance. This law placed the negative sanc-

39. Chapter 18.

40. Chapter 29.

41. Chapter 30.

42. Chapter 31.

43. Chapters 1–7.

44. Chapter 8.

45. Chapter 35.

tion of disinheritance on those who vowed to support a priest through the productivity of a dedicated plot of land and then refused to honor the vow. The land went from being dedicated to devoted: beyond redemption.⁴⁶

The final abolition of the Mosaic priesthood at the fall of Jerusalem ended the authority of all of these laws forever. They were holiness laws for the holy land. The holy land is no longer holy.

3. Cross-Boundary Laws

Cross-boundary laws are still in force under the New Covenant. These are properly designated as Deuteronomy 4 laws: designed by God to bring men to repentance through the testimony of civil justice within a holy commonwealth.

Fraud and false dealing (Lev. 19:11–12). The laws against theft still prevail. They had no unique association with either the land or the promised seed.⁴⁷

The law against robbing an employee by paying him later than the end of the working day (Lev. 19:13). This law protects the weakest parties from unfair competition: the ability to wait to be paid.

The law against tripping the blind man and cursing the deaf man (Lev. 19:14). The weaker parties are to be protected by civil law.⁴⁸

The prohibition against enforcing laws that discriminate in terms of wealth or power (Lev. 19:15). This law had no unique association with Israel's land or seed laws. Its theological presupposition is that God is not a respecter of persons: a theological principle upheld in both covenants.⁴⁹

The prohibition against personal vengeance (Lev. 19:18). This establishes the civil government as God's monopoly agency of violence.⁵⁰

The law prohibiting judicial discrimination against strangers in the land (non-citizens) (Lev. 19:33–36). This law an aspect of the just weights law. Laws governing justice were not land-based or seed-based.⁵¹

The law against offering a child to Molech (Lev. 20:2–5). This was a law governed by the principle of false worship, although it appears to

46. Chapter 36.

47. Chapter 12.

48. Chapter 13.

49. Chapter 14.

50. Chapter 16.

51. Chapter 19.

be a seed law (inheritance) or perhaps a land law (agricultural blessings). It had to do with identifying the source of positive sanctions in history: either God or a false god. God's name is holy: sanctified.⁵² This will never change.

The jubilee law prohibiting taking interest from poor fellow believers or resident aliens (Lev. 25:35–38). This law was an extension of Exodus 22:25. It was included in the jubilee code, but it was not derived from that code. In non-covenanted, non-Trinitarian nations, however, Christians are the resident aliens. Thus, the resident alien aspect of the law is annulled until such time as nations formally covenant under God.⁵³

The law promising fruitfulness and multiplication of seed (Lev. 26:9–10). This law was covenantal, not tied to the holy land or the tribal structure of inheritance. It was a confessional law, but because of its universal promise, it was a common grace law.⁵⁴

Negative corporate sanctions (Lev. 26:13–17). These were promised to Israel, but they were not tied to either the holy land or the promised seed. The governing issue was the fear of God, which is still in force.⁵⁵

The law of the tithe that applied to animals passing under a rod (Lev. 27:30–37). This law still applies, though it is no longer very important in a non-agricultural setting. God still prohibits individuals from structuring tithes in kind (goods) from pre-collection rearrangements that favor the tither.⁵⁶

D. The Principle of the Boundary

I have argued that Christians need a Bible-based hermeneutic in order to interpret correctly the applications of the laws of the Old Covenant in the New Covenant era. This is also Professor Poythress' argument.⁵⁷ By now the reader should understand what this biblical principle of judicial interpretation is: the principle of the boundary.

This is a very long commentary. Most of it has been devoted to an explanation of laws that are no longer binding: seed laws, land laws,

52. Chapter 20.

53. Chapter 28.

54. Chapter 33.

55. Chapter 34.

56. Chapter 37.

57. Vern Sheridan Poythress, "Effects of Interpretive Frameworks on the Application of Old Testament Law," in Theonomy: A Reformed Critique, eds. William S. Barker and W. Robert Godfrey (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan Academic, 1990), ch. 5.

and priestly laws. Why devote so much time, money, and space to a study of things no longer relevant? Answer: in order to be confident about the laws that are still relevant.

A scholar spends most of his life examining records, experiments, books, and articles that do not apply to his immediate concerns. Scholarship is the process of sifting through what is, for a scholar, mostly irrelevant information. He sifts in terms of a principle—a hermeneutic—which leads to scientific and intellectual breakthroughs. So it is with the New Covenant student of the laws of Leviticus. Our problem today is that there is no agreement among Christians regarding the proper principle governing this judicial sifting process.

Theonomists have a general principle of judicial interpretation: unless an Old Covenant law is in principle or specifically annulled by the New Testament, it is still in force. Bahnsen wrote: “The methodological point, then, is that we presume our obligation to obey any Old Testament commandment unless the New Testament indicates otherwise. We must assume continuity with the Old Testament rather than discontinuity.”⁵⁸ That is, the theonomist announces with respect to all Old Covenant laws: “Innocent until proven guilty.” An unchallenged Old Covenant law is said to have been granted citizenship automatically by the New Testament. No additional proof of citizenship is required by law. Unless its citizenship has been revoked by the New Testament, a Mosaic law automatically crosses the boundary between the two covenants. The law’s adoption into the New Covenant kingdom of God is automatic. The representative rhetorical hard case for this principle of interpretation is the law’s mandated stoning of rebellious sons (Deut. 21:18–21).⁵⁹

All other schools of Christian biblical interpretation assert a rival judicial hermeneutic: any Old Covenant law not repeated in the New Testament is automatically annulled. The non-theonomist announces with respect to every Old Covenant law: “Guilty until proven innocent.” An Old Covenant law is automatically turned back at the border of the New Covenant unless it has had citizenship papers issued by the New Testament. Its disinheritance is automatic unless it has been explicitly adopted into God’s New Covenant kingdom. The representative rhetorical hard case for this hermeneutic is bestiality (Lev. 18:23; 20:15–16).⁶⁰

58. Greg L. Bahnsen, By This Standard: The Authority of God’s Law Today (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1985), p. 3. (<http://bit.ly/gbbts>)

59. By mandating the execution of rebellious adolescents and adult sons, this case law declared war against any criminal class. The enforcement of this case law means that a criminal class cannot easily come into existence. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 185–91.

A majority of the economic laws of Leviticus were turned back at the covenantal border. But this rejection was not automatic. The geographical and tribal promises that went to Abraham's seeds (plural) were fulfilled with the coming of the prophesied Seed (singular: Gal. 3:16)—the Messiah, Shiloh, Jesus Christ, the incarnate Son of God—who announced His ministry's fulfillment of the judicial terms of the jubilee year (Luke 4:16–21). This fulfillment was confirmed through His death and resurrection—the ultimate physical liberation. Israel's permanent disinheritance was prophesied by Jesus: "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43). This transfer of the kingdom's inheritance to this new nation took place at Pentecost (Acts 2). The visible manifestation of the permanent revocation of the Abrahamic inheritance to his biological heirs was the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Israel had failed to keep the terms of the covenant. The predictable negative corporate sanctions came in history.

E. Discontinuity and Continuity in the Levitical Sacrifices

The whole burnt offering was annulled by the New Covenant. There is no evidence that its underlying principle of sacrifice was annulled: unblemished animal, the best of the flock, but only one. This was a high-cost sacrifice, but it was nevertheless limited. Conclusion: man cannot pay God all that he owes. This judicial principle was illustrated by the whole burnt offering, but it was not limited to it.

The meal offering was annulled, but not its underlying principle of the hierarchical authority of the priesthood. The salt of this earthly sacrifice is no longer lawfully administered by any priest; the eternal salt of the covenant (Mark 9:47–49) is administered by the High Priest, Jesus Christ. The judicial principle of the meal offering still is in force: if you do not bring a satisfactory offering to be salted and consumed by the fire, then you will become that offering.

The peace offering is no longer eaten by the offerer at a meal held inside the boundaries of the temple. But the economic principle of the heaven—the best a man can offer God from his “field”—has not been removed from the New Covenant’s voluntary offerings. Neither has the cultural principle of leaven: expansion over time.

60. See my response to Dan G. McCartney: Gary North, Westminster's Confession: The Abandonment of Van Til's Legacy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991), pp. 211, 214. (<http://bit.ly/gnwc>)

The related principles of corporate responsibility and corporate representation are no longer manifested in the sin offering, i.e., purification offering. Nevertheless, they are clearly revealed in the Adamic covenant and the New Covenant. The biblical principle of the delegation of earthly authority—from God to the people to their representative—was illustrated in the purification offering, but it was not inaugurated by this offering. It therefore did not perish with this offering. Also, we no longer bring an animal to serve as our trespass or reparation offering for a sin of omission, but the principle of the sacrifice proportionate to one’s wealth still applies, in church and state.

A thief’s reparation offering is no longer made by presenting a ram without blemish. But there is no indication that an offering comparable in value to a ram in the Mosaic economy should not still be presented to a church by the self-confessed thief, nor should his victim be denied the return of the thing stolen plus a reparation payment of 20%. The judicial boundary between sacred and common still exists. A violation of such a boundary still constitutes a profane act. But sacred boundaries in the New Covenant are overwhelmingly judicial-ecclesiastical rather than geographical.

The annulment of the Levitical sacrifices has not annulled the principles that underlay these sacrifices, any more than the annulment of the Mosaic priesthood has somehow annulled the principle of sacrifice. The High Priest’s office still exists, but only one man holds it: the resurrected Jesus Christ. The mediatorial role of the Old Covenant priest in offering a bloody sacrifice has been annulled by Christ’s perfect, one-time sacrifice (Heb. 9). This does not mean that the ministerial, judicial, and educational role of the Levites has been annulled. The diaconate has replaced the Levites’ social role. Melchizedek, the priestly king of Salem, offered Abraham bread and wine, and Abraham paid his tithe to him (Gen. 14:18–20). The annulment of the Mosaic priesthood did not annul this Melchizedekan ecclesiastical role. This is the inescapable message of the epistle to the Hebrews, which is the New Testament’s book of priestly discontinuity.

There is both judicial continuity and discontinuity in the transition between Old Covenant and New Covenant. Both of these principles must be forthrightly proclaimed and defended exegetically. This commentary is long because Christians have too often only intuitively recognized which features of the Mosaic law have been annulled and which are still binding. They have not applied a consistent hermeneutic. It is long because it is exegetical. Most of all, it is long because we require casuistry to make sense of Leviticus: the application of general law to specific cases, and the investigation of specific case laws to discover the general legal principle governing any of them. Casuistry is a tiring, highly detailed process of discovery that must continue in every generation if God's kingdom is to be extended. John Frame insisted in 1990, "all the exegetical work remains to be done!"⁶¹ Not all. A great deal, no doubt, but not all. It is also worth noting that the modern "school of the non-prophets," which asserts an absolute judicial discontinuity between the whole of Leviticus and the New Covenant, has a great deal of work ahead of it, too.

I have said my piece regarding Leviticus. It has been a long piece. It is now my critics' turn to say theirs. Then we shall see just how much discontinuity they can prove, and what the moral and cultural effects of these alleged discontinuities will be. I suggest that they begin with the Levitical case laws governing bestiality. One thing is sure: if they turn to pre-Kant natural law as their suggested alternative to the Mosaic law, they will have to show why Hume was wrong, Kant was wrong, Hegel was wrong, Darwin was wrong, and existentialism is wrong. If the only civil stipulation they leave us with is the death penalty in Genesis 9, they have not left us with much.⁶² They have in fact left us judicially defenseless. If we cannot appeal to God's justice, as manifested in His Bible-revealed law, to what should Christians appeal? The dispensationalist answers, "the Rapture." The amillennialist answers, "the end of history." But what happens to us if either event is delayed?

I answer: if we cling to a hermeneutic of personal judicial discontinuity only, we should prepare for negative corporate sanctions. "Salt is good: but if the salt have lost his savour, wherewith shall it be seasoned? It is neither fit for the land, nor yet for the dunghill; but men cast it out. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear" (Luke 14:34–35).

61. John Frame, "The One, the Many, and Theonomy," in Theonomy: A Reformed Critique, p. 97.

62. H. Wayne House and Thomas D. Ice, Dominion Theology: Blessing or Curse (Portland, Oregon: Multnomah Press, 1988), pp. 127, 130. For a reply, see Greg L. Bahnsen and Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., House Divided: The Break-Up of Dispensational Theology (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), pp. 93–96. (<http://bit.ly/gbkghd>)

Conclusion

For three decades, the critics of theonomy have issued this challenge: "Prove your case exegetically." Rushdoony's first volume of The Institutes of Biblical Law (1973) was theonomy's frontal assault. He suggested hundreds of ways in which Mosaic case laws still apply. He used the Ten Commandments as his integrating principle. Bahnsen's Theonomy in Christian Ethics (1977) provided a technical apologetic defense of theonomy, written in the arcane language called "theologian." It has received more attention—most of it negative—from the theologians than Rushdoony's Institutes because Bahnsen wrote fluently in their adopted tongue, which the rest of us have difficulty following without a dictionary and a grammar handbook. I showed in Tools of Dominion (1990) how the case laws of Exodus still apply to economics and civil justice. These books all emphasized continuity.

Our critics have not been satisfied. They have continued to complain: "You say that you have a hermeneutical principle of discontinuity. Let us see it in action." They have implied that theonomists possess no hermeneutic of discontinuity, other than the obvious annulment of the laws sacrifice by the Epistle to the Hebrews. If our critics are honest—a gigantic if—we should now begin to see a muting of this criticism, or at least a mutating. I am not counting on this, however. I first published this in 1994. So far, no response.

A challenge appeared in the Spring, 1993, issue of the Bulletin of the Association of Christian Economists. Westmont College economics professor Edd S. Noell, in a well-balanced summary of the theonomic (i.e., my) approach to economic analysis, concluded with this challenge to theonomists (i.e., to me): "They must more carefully delineate the Old Testament laws that are abolished by the New Testament and the exegetical basis for their position in this regard. They must consider more extensively the issue of the context of the ancient agrarian economy of Israel in which the Mosaic law was given. There is more work to be done to convince fellow Christian economists of some of the specific exegetical conclusions they reach (in regard to monetary reform as well as other policy applications)."⁶³

An Economic Commentary on the Bible is my response to this criticism. So are my Introduction to Christian Economics (1973) and two of my books in the Biblical Blueprint Series: Honest Money (1986) and 63. Edd S. Noell, "A Reformed Approach to Christian Economics: Christian Reconstruction," Bulletin (Spring 1993), p. 16.

Inherit the Earth (1987). So is my critique of Social Credit economics, Salvation Through Inflation (1993). So is my chapter in the book edited by Robert Clouse, Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views of Economics (1985). So are 20 years of my newsletter, Biblical Economics Today—over 1,600 double-spaced manuscript pages. There is, of course, always more work to be done, more Bible passages to consider. There are always more typesetting and printing expenses to pay. I plan to do the work and pay the expenses. But I think it is fair for me to ask my critics in 2011, as I asked in 1994: “Where have all the other Christian economists been for the last 40 years? Unlike me, they are being paid good salaries by colleges and universities to write books and articles. Where are all those explicitly Christian economics books and articles?”

The Association of Christian Economists has been around since the mid-1980s, but so far as I know, no other member has produced even one volume of an economic commentary on the Bible. I also have seen nothing like my book, The Coase Theorem (1992): an expressly Christian critique of a Nobel Prize-winning secular economist. Other than the ill-fated attempts by Keynesian Christian economist Douglas Vickers to refute my approach to the Bible and to economics,⁶⁴ no other Christian economist has challenged me exegetically on the issues I have been raising. No one has addressed the foundational epistemological questions that I raised as long ago as 1976.⁶⁵ Noell comes close to admitting as much: “Outside of the Reconstructionist literature, one searches in vain for more than a handful of thoughtful, Biblically-based critiques of non-Christian economic methodology.”⁶⁶ Christian critics have made it clear that they do not like my approach to economics, but not one of them has offered a systematic, integrated methodological alternative that he is willing to defend exegetically. The critics face the old problem of practical politics: they cannot beat something with nothing.

64. Douglas Vickers, Economics and Man: Prelude to a Christian Critique (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1976). This was followed by his brief book, A Christian Approach to Economics and the Cultural Situation (Smythtown, New York: Exposition Press, 1982), which in fact did not specify what this “Christian approach” is. For a response to Vickers, see Ian Hodge, Baptized Inflation: A Critique of “Christian” Keynesianism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1986). (<http://bit.ly/HodgeBI>)

65. Gary North, “Economics: From Reason to Intuition,” in North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1976), ch. 5.

66. Noell, p. 10.

In this commentary, I have shown how the twin Mosaic principles of land and seed—ultimately, laws of inheritance—were limited both by time and geography. From the beginning, there were boundaries placed by God around all those laws that were judicial applications of the Abrahamic and Mosaic laws governing land and seed. There were also priestly laws that perished with the New Covenant, taking parts of Leviticus with them.

Let me cite once again my comments in Chapter 17, “The Preservation of the Seed.”

* * * * *

It is therefore mandatory on me or on another defender of theonomy’s hermeneutic to do what Poythress said must be done: (1) identify the primary function of an Old Covenant law; (2) discover whether it is universal in a redemptive (healing) sense or whether (3) it is conditioned by its redemptive-historical context (i.e., annulled by the New Covenant). In short: What did the law mean, how did it apply in ancient Israel, and how should it apply today? This task is not always easy, but it is mandatory.

The question Poythress raises is the hermeneutical problem of identifying covenantal continuity and covenantal discontinuity. First, in questions of covenantal continuity, we need to ask: What is the underlying ethical principle? God does not change ethically. The moral law is still binding, but its application may not be. Second, this raises the question of covenantal discontinuity. What has changed as a result of the New Testament era’s fulfillment of Old Covenant prophecy and the inauguration of the New Covenant? A continuity—prophetic-judicial fulfillment—has in some cases produced a judicial discontinuity: the annulment of a case law’s application. A very good example of this is Leviticus 19:19.

I begin any investigation of any suspected judicial discontinuity with the following questions. First, is the case law related to the priesthood, which has changed (Heb. 7:11–12)? Second, is it related to the sacraments, which have changed? Third, is it related to the jubilee land laws (e.g., inheritance), which Christ fulfilled (Luke 4:18–21)? Fourth, is it related to the tribes (e.g., the seed laws), which Christ fulfilled in His office as Shiloh, the promised seed? Fifth, is it related to the “middle wall of partition” between Jew and gentile, which Jesus Christ’s gospel has broken down (Gal. 3:28; Eph. 2:14–20)? These five principles prove fruitful in analyzing Leviticus 19:19.⁶⁷

Let us ask another question: Is a change in the priesthood also accompanied by a change in the laws governing the family covenant? Jesus tightened the laws of divorce (Matt. 5:31–32). The church has denied the legality of polygamy. Did other changes in the family accompany this change in the priesthood? Specifically, have changes in inheritance taken place? Have these changes resulted in the annulment of the jubilee land laws of the Mosaic economy? Finally, has an annulment of the jubilee land laws annulled the laws of tribal administration?

* * * * *

I hope the reader recognizes by now that there are principles of interpretation that are applicable to the laws of the Mosaic Covenant. The ultimate hermeneutic principle in the question of the continuity of the Old Covenant legal order in the New Covenant era is the principle of the boundary. Such a boundary does exist. There is discontinuity. But other boundary principles allow us to determine whether a law has been resurrected with Jesus Christ in the New Covenant. Those case laws that have been resurrected with Christ and adopted into the New Covenant law-order provide Christians with their tools of dominion.

End of Volume 3

67. There are several other hermeneutical questions that we can ask that relate to covenantal discontinuity. Sixth, is it an aspect of the weakness of the Israelites, which Christ's ministry has overcome, thereby intensifying the rigors of an Old Covenant law (Matt. 5:21–48)? Seventh, is it an aspect of the Old Covenant's cursed six day-one day work week rather than the one day-six day pattern of the New Covenant's now-redeemed week (Heb. 4:1–11)? Eighth, is it part of legal order of the once ritually polluted earth, which has now been cleansed by Christ (Acts 10; I Cor. 8)?

BOUNDARIES AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON LEVITICUS

VOLUME 4

Other Books by Gary North

An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)

Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)

An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)

Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)

Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)

Government by Emergency (1983)

Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)

75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)

Coined Freedom (1984)

Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)

Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)

Honest Money (1986)

Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)

Dominion and Common Grace (1987)

Inherit the Earth (1987)

Liberating Planet Earth (1987)

Healer of the Nations (1987)

The Pirate Economy (1987)

Is the World Running Down? (1988)

When Justice Is Aborted (1989)

Political Polytheism (1989)

The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)

Victim's Rights (1990)

Westminster's Confession (1991)

Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar

The Coase Theorem (1992)

Salvation Through Inflation (1993)

Rapture Fever (1993)

Tithing and the Church (1994)

Crossed Fingers (1996)

The Covenantal Tithe (2010)

BOUNDARIES AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON LEVITICUS

VOLUME 4

GARY NORTH

Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus
Volume 4

Copyright © Gary North, 2012
Second Edition

Published by:

Point Five Press
P.O. Box 2778
Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Volume 1

| | |
|---|-------|
| Foreword | xi |
| Preface | xxxii |
| Introduction to Boundaries and Dominion | 1 |
| Introduction to Part I: Sacrifices (Lev. 1–7) | 30 |
| 1. Sacrifice, Stewardship, and Debt (Lev. 1:1–4) | 36 |
| 2. Priestly Representation (Lev. 2:1–3) | 61 |
| 3. Leaven and Progressive Sanctification (Lev. 3:1, 17) | 70 |
| 4. Corporate Responsibility (Lev. 4:1–3, 22–24) | 103 |
| 5. Proportional Payments to God (Lev. 5:6–7, 11–12) | 459 |
| 6. Sacred, Profane, and Common (Lev. 5:14–19) | 178 |
| 7. Guardian of the Civil Oath (Lev. 6:1–7) | 228 |
| Introduction to Part II: Cleansing (Lev. 8–16) | 262 |
| 8. Wine as a Boundary Marker (Lev. 10:8–11) | 264 |
| 9. Biblical Quarantine (Lev. 13:45–46) | 282 |
| Introduction to Part III: Separation (Lev. 17–22) | 300 |
| 10. The Promised Land (Lev. 18:24–29) | 302 |

Volume 2

| | |
|--|-----|
| 11. Gleaning: Charity Without Entitlement (Lev. 19:9–10) . . . | 323 |
| 12. Verbal Bonds (Lev. 19:11–12) | 363 |
| 13. Protecting the Weakest Party (Lev. 19:13–14) | 381 |
| 14. Impartial Justice vs. Socialist Economics (Lev. 19:15) | 407 |
| 15. Local Justice vs. Centralized Government (Lev. 19:15) . . . | 444 |
| 16. The State’s Monopoly of Vengeance (Lev. 19:18) | 472 |
| 17. The Preservation of the Seed (Lev. 19:19) | 493 |
| 18. Covenantal Fruit (Lev. 19:23–25) | 527 |
| 19. Measuring Out Justice (Lev. 19:33–37) | 549 |
| 20. Inheritance by Fire (Lev. 20:2–5) | 589 |
| 21. Inheritance Through Separation (Lev. 20:22–26) | 619 |

| | |
|---|-----|
| Introduction to Part IV: Covenantal Acts (Lev. 23–24) | 634 |
| 22. Mutual Self Interest: Priests and Gleaners (Lev. 23:22) . . . | 636 |

Volume 3

| | |
|--|-----|
| Introduction to Part V: Inheritance (Lev. 25–27) | 647 |
| 23. The Sabbatical Year (Lev. 25:1–7) | 653 |
| 24. Boundaries of The Jubilee Land Laws (Lev. 25:8–13) | 673 |
| 25. Economic Oppression (Lev. 25:14–17) | 712 |
| 26. Food Miracles (Lev. 25:18–22) | 736 |
| 27. The Right of Redemption (Lev. 25:23–24) | 748 |
| 28. Poverty and Usury (Lev. 25:35–38) | 764 |
| 29. Promise, Adoption, and Liberty (Lev. 25:39–43) | 786 |
| 30. Slaves and Freeman (Lev. 25:44–46) | 808 |
| 31. Mandatory Redemption upon Payment (Lev. 25:47–55) . . | 834 |
| 32. Nature as a Sanctioning Agent (Lev. 26:3–6) | 847 |
| 33. Limits to Growth (Lev. 26:9–10) | 865 |
| 34. God’s Escalating Wrath (Lev. 26:13–17) | 884 |
| 35. The Priesthood: Barriers to Entry (Lev. 27:2–8) | 892 |
| 36. The Redemption-Price System (Lev. 27:9–15) | 911 |
| 37. Tithing: The Benefit of Doubt (Lev. 27:30–33) | 930 |
| Conclusion | 935 |

Volume 4

| | |
|---|------|
| APPENDIX A–Sacrilege and Sanctions | 957 |
| APPENDIX B–Rushdoony on the Tithe: A Critique | 970 |
| APPENDIX C–Leaven as Exclusively Evil | 1025 |
| APPENDIX D–Greek Mythology: The Myth of Classical Politics | 1044 |
| APPENDIX E–The Covenantal Structure of Judgment | 1064 |
| APPENDIX F–Rushdoony on “Hybridization” | 1085 |
| APPENDIX G–Malthusiansim vs. Covenantalism | 1108 |
| APPENDIX H–Conspiracy, Forgery, and Higher Criticism | 1145 |
| APPENDIX I–Critics of the Five Point Covenant Model | 1159 |

Appendix A

SACRILEGE AND SANCTIONS

So Joshua sent messengers, and they ran unto the tent; and, behold, it was hid in his tent, and the silver under it. And they took them out of the midst of the tent, and brought them unto Joshua, and unto all the children of Israel, and laid them out before the LORD. And Joshua, and all Israel with him, took Achan the son of Zerah, and the silver, and the garment, and the wedge of gold, and his sons, and his daughters, and his oxen, and his asses, and his sheep, and his tent, and all that he had: and they brought them unto the valley of Achor. And Joshua said, Why hast thou troubled us? the LORD shall trouble thee this day. And all Israel stoned him with stones, and burned them with fire, after they had stoned them with stones. And they raised over him a great heap of stones unto this day. So the LORD turned from the fierceness of his anger. Wherefore the name of that place was called, The valley of Achor, unto this day (Josh. 7:22–26).

Achan appropriated forbidden objects in Jericho. These objects had been previously set aside by God for His temple. “But all the silver, and gold, and vessels of brass and iron, are consecrated unto the LORD: they shall come into the treasury of the LORD” (Josh. 6:19). This holy (set-aside) property is what Achan had appropriated. His was therefore an act of sacrilege. Sacrilege is a profane act, but a specific form of profanity: theft from a temple or a holy place.¹ Jericho was to be offered as the firstfruits sacrifice to God on God’s fiery altar. The entire city was to be burned. Its confiscated treasures were to be set aside for God’s temple.

1. The Greek word for “sacrilege,” hierarsuleo, means “to rob a temple.” Walter Bauer, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, trans. William F. Arndt and F. Wilbur Gingrich (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1957), p. 374. New Testament examples: “Thou that sayest a man should not commit adultery, dost thou commit adultery? thou that abhorrest idols, dost thou commit sacrilege?” (Rom. 2:22). “For ye have brought hither these men, which are neither robbers of churches, nor yet blasphemers of your goddess” (Acts 19:37).

Because of Achan's act of sacrilege, God killed 36 Israelites in the first battle of Ai (Josh. 7:5). They were not responsible for his act of sacrilege, but God nonetheless imposed capital sanctions on them. This event was later used by Joshua in his strategy to take the city of Ai: "For they will come out after us till we have drawn them from the city; for they will say, They flee before us, as at the first: therefore we will flee before them" (Josh. 8:6). Nevertheless, the 36 dead men were dead because of a sin committed by a man in secret, a man who was not a representative civil ruler in Israel. Judicially, why did God kill them? Because of Achan's representative position as a priest (Greek: hieros) of God in the national hierarchy (Greek: hierarch = high priest).

A. Achan's Priestly Role in a Holy War

In his capacity as a warrior-priest, Achan had committed sacrilege. Jordan is correct: "All of Israel were [sic] a nation of priests, and it is the priests who prosecute holy war. God Himself had established a parallel between the war camp and the Tabernacle, both holy places. . . ." ² As a member of God's holy army, Achan had been ordered to bring burning judgment against Jericho. His was not simply a run-of-the-mill capital crime of a father in his role as father; it was the sin of a man who had personally appropriated forbidden objects that were to be set apart for God, i.e., holy objects. His disobedience was a priestly act. The nation burned the remains of Achan and his family. God's direct sanction against false worship by a priest was fire (Lev. 10:2); it was also His punishment for a non-priest who offered incense illegally (Num. 16:35). ³

1. Sacrilege

The crime of sacrilege in the Old Covenant era carried with it a biblically unique degree of covenantal responsibility. The sanctions imposed by God and by the state against this crime seem to have extended to all those who were under the criminal's legal jurisdiction.

2. James B. Jordan, Judges: God's War Against Humanism (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Ministries, 1985), p. 93. (<http://jjjudges>)

3. Prostitution was not specified as a capital crime in Israel, except when committed by a priest's daughter. "And the daughter of any priest, if she profane herself by playing the whore, she profaneth her father: she shall be burnt with fire" (Lev. 21:9). This indicates that a connection to the priesthood placed special restrictions on individuals, and violations brought a unique sanction: execution by fire.

This analysis in turn suggests that Adam's primary crime was also sacrilege.⁴ He had eaten a prohibited communion meal by appropriating fruit that had been explicitly set aside by God. Sacrilege was the original crime that brought all of humanity under God's negative sanctions. Adam's sons and daughters have received a death sentence because of the sins of their father. This sanction appears to be a unique judicial aspect of sacrilege in Adam's case and Achan's.⁵

The penalty imposed by Joshua and the court was the public execution of Achan, his family, and his entire inheritance. Even the stolen goods had become polluted through sacrilege, and therefore had to be burned with fire, along with the corpses (Josh. 7:25). God instructed the people of Israel to do with Achan what they had been instructed to do with Jericho. Worse; not even the silver and gold were to be salvaged for the tabernacle. The fire would be all-encompassing.

2. Fathers and Sons

There is no doubt that God sanctioned the execution of Achan and his household, for He immediately withdrew His anger and His negative sanctions (v. 26). Yet the targets of this public execution were Achan's family members. The crucial question is: Did they partake in their father's sin? If not, was this execution in violation of Deuteronomy 24:16? That text announces: "The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers: every man shall be put to death for his own sin." Why were the sons and daughters executed for the sin of the father? The text in Joshua does not say that they knew of the crime, although they may have. It does speak of the burning of his tent. This indicates that the goods had been buried inside his tent. Those inside may have known what was going on. It is not stated specifically that some of the children were too young to know, nor does it state that some were old enough to be in their own tents. The point is, inside the judicial boundary of Achan's tent, everything had been polluted. The tent represented the judicial boundary of Achan's authority as a household priest. Everything inside that boundary had become profane as a result of his unauthorized and self-conscious trespass of holy objects. Everything inside was fit for destruction.

4. Wrote Sir Henry Spelman in the seventeenth century: "Thus it appeareth that Sacrilege was the first sin, the master-sin, and the common sin at the beginning of the world, committed in earth by man in corruption, committed in paradise by man in perfection, committed in heaven itself by the angels in glory; . . ." Spelman, The History and Fate of Sacrilege (1698); Eades edition (London: John Hodges, 1888), p. 1; cited by R. J. Rushdoony, Law and Society, vol. 2 of Institutes of Biblical Law (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1982), p. 33.

5. A fiery sword was placed by God at the entrance of the garden to keep out the sacrilegious priest and his heirs (Gen. 3:24). Achan's remains were burned (Josh. 7:25).

Surely the animals did not know. Why were even the animals under his administration executed? What had these animals done to deserve stoning? They had done nothing more than the animals had done in Adam's representative Fall, yet they, too, had suffered the consequences, as have their descendants. A cursed form of death entered the animal kingdom as a judgment from God. The subordinates suffered as a result of their master's act of defiance.

Because the text of Joshua 7 is not specific regarding the knowledge of Achan's sons and daughters regarding their father's act of sacrilege, we cannot be sure that they did not know and understand what their father was doing. The fact that the family's animals were stoned does indicate that a comprehensive ban—hormah—had been placed by God on his whole household, irrespective of their knowledge or consent. If Deuteronomy 24:16 is accepted as a universally binding standard for Israel's civil government, then we must conclude that they both knew and understood. If they did not know and understand, then we must conclude that Deuteronomy 24:16 did not apply in cases of sacrilege. The text of Joshua 7 does not definitively prove one interpretation over the other, but the execution of the animals does suggest that sacrilege was a unique crime and therefore outside the judicial boundary of Deuteronomy 24:16 regarding innocent sons and guilty fathers.

3. Holy War

The issue at stake was the conquest's judicial character as a uniquely holy war. God had directed the Israelites to destroy all the families inside the boundaries of Canaan. "And when the LORD thy God shall deliver them before thee; thou shalt smite them, and utterly destroy them; thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor shew mercy unto them" (Deut. 7:2; cf. 7:16). They were not allowed to show mercy, except to Rahab and her family, because she had covenanted with Israel before the holy army entered the land. Once the army had crossed over the boundary of the land, no other mercy was to be extended to the inhabitants within that boundary. The normal rules of holy warfare did not apply. Israel was not allowed to offer terms of surrender to any Canaanite city, unlike wars outside the land (Deut. 20:10–11).

By stealing holy objects in Jericho—goods that God had appropriated for Himself—Achan had not only stolen from God; he had also united himself and his family covenantally with Jericho. By stealing part of God's required first-fruits offering, Achan became a citizen of Jericho. He also became profane: the violator of a sacred boundary placed by God around the city of Jericho. He was therefore required to suffer the judgment of every citizen in Jericho: death. Achan's covenantal citizenship extended down to his children and his property: the animals and the stolen goods. Just as Rahab had become a citizen of Israel by hiding the spies and placing the red string publicly in her window, so did Achan become a citizen of Jericho by hiding the banned goods. Just as Rahab's family had survived because of her covenant, so did Achan's family perish because of his covenant. Achan and his family became Canaanites, and therefore the entire family came under the covenantal ban: hormah.

B. Aaron and His Sons

Aaron built the golden calf and thereby brought sin on the people (Ex. 32). All of the people had initiated his representative priestly sin, so three thousand of them suffered the deadly consequences as representatives of the nation (Ex. 32:28). By serving as executioners against them, the Levites removed from their tribe the curse of Jacob (Gen. 49:7), becoming the priestly, holy, set-aside, first-born tribe (Num. 1:47–53).

In contrast to their father, Aaron, Nadab and Abihu initiated their own sins. God brought direct sanctions against them: "And Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron, took either of them his censer, and put fire therein, and put incense thereon, and offered strange fire before the LORD, which he commanded them not. And there went out fire from the LORD, and devoured them, and they died before the LORD. Then Moses said unto Aaron, This is it that the LORD spake, saying, I will be sanctified in them that come nigh me, and before all the people I will be glorified. And Aaron held his peace" (Lev. 10:1–3). Then Moses warned their father and their priestly successors not to display any sign of grief, lest the people be subjected to God's wrath. The people were to bewail God's sanctions against the two priests.

And Moses called Mishael and Elzaphan, the sons of Uzziel the uncle of Aaron, and said unto them, Come near, carry your brethren from before the sanctuary out of the camp. So they went near, and carried them in their coats out of the camp; as Moses had said. And Moses said unto Aaron, and unto Eleazar and unto Ithamar, his sons, Uncover not your heads, neither rend your clothes; lest ye die, and lest wrath come upon all the people: but let your brethren, the whole house of Israel, bewail the burning which the LORD hath kindled. And ye shall not go out from the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, lest ye die: for the anointing oil of the LORD is upon you. And they did according to the word of Moses (Lev. 10:4–7).

C. David's Numbering of Israel

Another example of a near-sacrilegious⁶ crime in which there was a representative legal relationship was David's numbering of the people. This census-taking was allowed by God only when the nation was being set aside for holy war to bring God's capital sanction against His enemies (Num. 1:3). Thus, David could act legally only in his capacity as senior military priest. He misused his civil authority as king to number the people, despite Joab's strong warning (II Sam. 24:3).

The people were at fault for numerous crimes, but not David's particular crime, which was only possible for Israel's senior military leader to commit: high military priest of the holy army. But because there was no imminent holy war, David's act was an act of theft: treating God's holy army as if it were the king's army. David's priestly act of sacrilege would bring all those under his jurisdiction under the threat of God's wrath. The text says that God wanted to punish Israel, and David was God's means to that end. "And again the anger of the LORD was kindled against Israel, and he moved David against them to say, Go, number Israel and Judah" (II Sam. 24:1).⁷ The use of the metaphorical verb kindled points to His holy ban against them. It was nevertheless David's personal sin that he numbered them, for he was not preparing

6. "Near-sacrilegious" may be too weak a designation. The event has the marks of sacrilege, if I am correct in my thesis that numbering the people was a priestly act.

7. The intermediary agent between God and David was Satan: "And Satan stood up against Israel, and provoked David to number Israel" (I Chron. 21:1). Satan bore responsibility for this action, as did David, but the Bible clearly says that God moved David to do it. Those who seek to assert a philosophical contradiction between God's will and David's actions need to listen to Paul's warning against such a misuse of moral philosophy: "Thou wilt say then unto me, Why doth he yet find fault? For who hath resisted his will? Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour?" (Rom. 9:19–21).

for holy war.

He soon recognized that he had sinned. “And David’s heart smote him after that he had numbered the people. And David said unto the LORD, I have sinned greatly in that I have done: and now, I beseech thee, O LORD, take away the iniquity of thy servant; for I have done very foolishly” (II Sam. 24:10). He asked God for forgiveness, and God offered him the choice of one negative sanction among three. David told God that He should decide. That was what God had been waiting for and aiming toward: “So the LORD sent a pestilence upon Israel from the morning even to the time appointed: and there died of the people from Dan even to Beersheba seventy thousand men” (II Sam. 24:15). Only men died in this plague. Clearly, it was a judicial plague, not biological—analogous to the death of all the firstborn of Egypt, who also were not contagious. Public health measures would not have reduced the death rate.

The Bible does not say that all 70,000 men deserved the negative sanction of death. Some surely did; some probably didn’t. Men live in societies, and as members of covenant-bound collectives, they become subject both to God’s negative sanctions and His positive sanctions. Jeremiah and Ezekiel went out in the Babylonian captivity, yet both had remained faithful to God. Individuals cannot always escape the negative sanctions associated with corporate responsibility simply by their own righteous behavior. Good men can suffer in unrighteous societies, while bad men can prosper in righteous societies (Ps. 72). In any case, they did not deserve death for the crime of sacrilege; if anyone did, David did, yet he was not punished directly. He was punished representatively: through the decimation of his army. His kingdom was reduced by 70,000 men. Like the stolen goods in Achan’s tent that could never be used in the temple, so were these 70,000 potential holy warriors. David had sought confirmation of his power as king through the census. God reduced the nation’s power by 70,000 potential holy warriors. They had become sacriligious. They suffered the consequences.

D. Jeroboam and the Priesthood

Consider Jeroboam’s revolt against Rehoboam. The revolt itself was not illegal. The subsequent problem for the Northern Kingdom was that Jeroboam committed sacrilege after the secession, and the people consented. He appointed new priests to administer the sacrifices. He appointed the dregs of society to these offices. "After this thing Jeroboam returned not from his evil way, but made again of the lowest of the people priests of the high places: whosoever would, he consecrated him, and he became one of the priests of the high places. And this thing became sin unto the house of Jeroboam, even to cut it off, and to destroy it from off the face of the earth" (I Kings 13:33–34). Once again, we see that sacrilege leads to the disinheritance of the offender's sons, even though they had not committed the original crime. Why was his decision an act of sacrilege? What had Jeroboam stolen from the temple? Jeroboam had stolen the actual rites of the temple; he had stolen God's lawful worship. He had violated the monopoly of worship that God had established for the entire nation, not just the Southern Kingdom.

He had also stolen God's holy army of priests. Jeroboam removed God's holy army from the highways of the nation. No longer would the holy army of Israel march three times a year to Jerusalem. The people implicitly consented to Jeroboam's sacrilegious decision: they could have walked to Jerusalem to offer their sacrifices, but most chose not to. They preferred Jeroboam's local golden calves (II Kings 10:29). What the people saved in travel expenses and trouble, however, they more than lost when God brought negative sanctions against them. Meanwhile, the lawful priesthood departed from Israel:

And the priests and the Levites that were in all Israel resorted to him out of all their coasts. For the Levites left their suburbs and their possession, and came to Judah and Jerusalem: for Jeroboam and his sons had cast them off from executing the priest's office unto the LORD: And he ordained him priests for the high places, and for the devils, and for the calves which he had made. And after them out of all the tribes of Israel such as set their hearts to seek the LORD God of Israel came to Jerusalem, to sacrifice unto the LORD God of their fathers. So they strengthened the kingdom of Judah, and made Rehobam the son of Solomon strong, three years: for three years they walked in the way of David and Solomon (II Chron. 11:13–17).

Jeroboam brought negative sanctions against the lawful priests; God therefore brought negative sanctions against the Northern Kingdom. The northern tribes of Israel accepted the representation of politically appointed, profane priests, who in turn committed sacrilege daily. The Northern Kingdom of Israel did not recover from these priestly acts of sacrilege. It was burdened by kings who were far more corrupt and tyrannical than Judah's kings, and it went into captivity under a vicious nation, Assyria, over a century before Judah fell to the more tolerant Babylonians. Israel's land was inhabited from then on by the Samaritans: foreigners who were brought into the land by the Assyrians to replace the captive Hebrews.

For the children of Israel walked in all the sins of Jeroboam which he did; they departed not from them; Until the LORD removed Israel out of his sight, as he had said by all his servants the prophets. So was Israel carried away out of their own land to Assyria unto this day. And the king of Assyria brought men from Babylon, and from Cuthah, and from Ava, and from Hamath, and from Sepharvaim, and placed them in the cities of Samaria instead of the children of Israel: and they possessed Samaria, and dwelt in the cities thereof (II Kings 17: 22–24).

The people were at risk in the rebellion of their king, for the king placed them under the rule of a new priesthood. By consenting to the decision of Jeroboam, the people became sacrilegious. It was their continuing consent to sacrilege rather than Jeroboam's initial act of sacrilege that eventually brought God's permanent sanction of captivity upon the Northern Kingdom.

E. New Testament Biblical Theology: The High Priest

The primary sin in history is sacrilege. The penalty for sacrilege is fire; so is the final negative sanction (Rev. 20:14–15). The representative nature of sacrilege is the primary message of the gospel: from the first Adam to the second Adam, the curse of death was revealed in all men. The resurrection of Jesus Christ, the second Adam, revealed that He has representatively atoned for that original sin, which had brought all of mankind under the curse. Paul wrote: "Therefore as by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life. For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous" (Rom. 5:18–19).

The New Testament does not speak of the atoning work of Jesus Christ in His capacity as king, but rather in His capacity as high priest. "But Christ being come an high priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building; Neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us" (Heb. 9:11–12). It was in His representative office as high priest, not as king, that Jesus Christ established the link between Himself and the covenant people, the saints of God: those people who have come under God's eternal positive sanctions because Jesus Christ came under God the Father's negative sanctions.

F. Sacrilege in English History

Until the advent of the modern worldview, it was a common belief among Christians that sacrilege is always visited by God's negative sanctions. An old English proverb appeared in several versions: "Evil-gotten goods lightly come and lightly go." "Ill-gotten goods will not last three crops." "Ill-gotten goods would not last to the third heir."⁸ It is therefore appropriate to refer at this point to the work of Sir Henry Spelman.

Spelman wrote a popular book against laymen who impropriated tithes, which are owed exclusively to the institutional church: De non temerandis ecclessis (1613). It went through four editions. It emphasized divine judgments against the sacrilegious. In 1632, he began a study of the families that bought or inherited the church and monastic properties that had been confiscated by Henry VIII in 1546. He limited his research to ex-monastic estates within a 12-mile radius of Rougham in Norfolk.⁹ This study was published posthumously in 1698: The History and Fate of Sacrilege. Webb and Neale in the mid-nineteenth century carried forward this suggestive research. They found that of 630 families that inherited these lands, only 14 families still survived, and that 600 had clearly come under special judgment. They asserted that there was a statistically significant factor in the disasters that befell the 600.¹⁰ A similar though shorter study was written by Sir Simon Degge in 1699.¹¹ Thomas remarks that "Degge's conclusions

8. Keith Thomas, Religion and the Decline of Magic (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1971), p. 97.

9. Ibid., p. 99.

10. Rushdoony, Law and Society, ch. 7. Rushdoony's strong endorsement of Spelman's thesis on sacrilege and its sanctions is curious, given Rushdoony's firm commitment to the view that tithes do not belong to the institutional church, and that the layman can lawfully give it to any kind of Christian charity. Rushdoony, "To Whom Do We Tithe," in Rushdoony and Edward A. Powell, Tithing and Dominion (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1979), ch. 7. See Appendix B: "Rushdoony on the Tithe: A Critique."

11. Degge, Observations upon the possessors of monastery-lands in Staffordshire.

were, like Spelman's, regarded as too dangerous to be published at the time, and only appeared in print in 1717."¹²

Nevertheless, throughout the seventeenth century, similar warnings had been offered by Catholic controversialists and many leading Anglican scholars, including John Whitgift, Francis Godwin, Lancelot Andrewes, Jeremy Taylor, Joseph Mede, Isaac Basire, and Robert South.¹³ There were also political leaders who warned their children against purchasing church lands: William Cecil (Lord Burleigh), Edward Hyde (Lord Chatham), and Thomas Wentworth (Earl of Straf-ford).¹⁴ Others, including John Milton, denied any such a punishment for those who bought and sold "monkish lands."

Two families that had profited from the confiscations and which still survived in Spelman's day were the families of Oliver Cromwell, Puritan England's Lord Protector, and his contemporary John Winthrop, the first governor of the Puritans' Massachusetts Bay Colony. Ironically, Winthrop's ancestor, who had purchased from King Henry in 1544 the land of the monastery at Bury St. Edmunds, was named Adam Winthrop—appropriate, if his crime was indeed sacrilege.¹⁵

Richard Williams, Oliver Cromwell's ancestor, took the name Cromwell from his uncle, Thomas Cromwell, "hammer of the monks" and the architect of the English Reformation. Richard had acted as Cromwell's agent in the suppression of the monasteries, and his reward was great: three abbeys, two priories, and the nunnery of Hinchinbrooke, which alone was worth some £2,500 per year, an immense fortune. The fortunes on both sides of young Oliver's family had been founded on the spoliation of the church.¹⁶ But the extravagances of Sir Oliver Cromwell, young Oliver's uncle, who lived for almost a century, led to the dissolution of much of the main family's fortune, and Hinchinbrooke was sold in 1627, the year before young Oliver's first election to Parliament.¹⁷ In any case, Oliver's side of the family had not owned Hinchinbrooke, but it did own smaller, less productive former church lands.

Doctoral dissertations are seldom useful to anyone, let alone useful

12. Thomas, Religion, p. 99.

13. Ibid., p. 100.

14. Ibid., p. 101.

15. Edmund S. Morgan, The Puritan Dilemma: The Story of John Winthrop (Boston: Little, Brown, 1958), p. 1.

16. Christopher Hill, God's Englishman: Oliver Cromwell and the English Revolution (New York: Harper Torchbooks, [1970] 1972), p. 37.

17. Antonia Fraser, Cromwell: The Lord Protector (New York: Knopf, 1974), p. 13.

to the kingdom of God, but a series of detailed dissertations on the fate of the families that bought these monastic lands, compared to the fate of families that did not, would be eminently useful. It would be a very difficult task, however, given the carnage and disruptions of the Puritan Revolution, 1642–59, and its aftermath in 1660, the restoration of Charles II.

Conclusion

We have considered the crime of sacrilege at some length. There is no question that it invoked God's direct sanctions, which immediately extended to those under the authority of the priestly transgressor: from Adam to his heirs, from Achan to his heirs, and from David to 70,000 Israelites. Achan's case indicates that the civil magistrate was required to impose the capital sanction against the transgressor's whole household, including animals. That there were Old Covenant corporate sanctions applied by God in history in response to a representative agent's sin is an inescapable conclusion, at least in the case of sacrilege.

If unintentional sins by the priests brought the assembly under God's negative sanctions,¹⁸ then how much greater was the corporate threat of sacrilege? Sacrilege is far worse. This leads us to a political conclusion that breaks definitively with the Enlightenment: if God ever provides the historical circumstances in which His saints become the founders of a new civil society or the inheritors of an old one, they must maintain the sanctioning authority which God has publicly entrusted to them. They must guard against acts of sacrilege in both the ordained priesthood and the public at large. Sacrilege is not merely sin in general or an improper profession of faith; it is a specific kind of sin: stealing God's property. Those who believe that God will sit back indefinitely while the modern state or modern witches commit atrocities against the property of the church of Jesus Christ do not understand Leviticus 4: God's judgment will come in history.¹⁹ The state is still required by God to defend the church against sacrilege. The state is not neutral.

As in the Old Covenant era, the moral integrity of the people, not their rulers, is judicially primary. The priests and civil rulers will eventually reflect the moral condition of the people, for priests and civil rulers are the people's ordained representatives. Those citizens who remain covenantally faithful to God by obeying His law through His grace (Eph. 2:8–10) will find that their enemies are eventually brought under God's negative sanctions. The covenant-breaker, if he is consistent, is eventually driven to commit sacrilege. At the banquets of covenant-breakers, the holy treasures of the temple will be used as common plates: profanity. When this happens, the handwriting is on the wall for the rulers and the social order they represent. They will be replaced (Dan. 5).²⁰

18. Chapter 4.

19. The Soviet Union persecuted the church. Robert Conquest (ed.), Religion in the U.S.S.R. (New York: Praeger, 1968); Gerhard Simon, Church, State and Opposition in the U.S.S.R. (London: C. Hurst, [1970] 1974). In 1991, the Soviet Union collapsed in a blood-free act of political suicide.

Because the function of civil government is to apply negative temporal sanctions against convicted transgressors in order to protect the entire society from God's negative temporal sanctions, the sacrilege laws are still in force in the New Covenant era. This means that the death penalty must still be imposed on people who commit sacrilege. On the other hand, the hormah of the Mosaic Covenant—a priestly act of total destruction within the boundaries of geographical Israel—was required by God only during the original conquest of Canaan. It did not apply after Israel's return from the exile, when strangers living in the land were to be protected by the jubilee land laws (Ezek. 47:21–23).

Sons and daughters can escape the fate of their father by declaring themselves no longer his sons. The New Testament emphasizes God's gracious adoption as more powerful in history than Adam's sacrilege and subsequent disinheritance. The sins of the sacrilegious parent do not extend to the children in the New Covenant era if the children break publicly with their father when they learn of his sacrilege. Furthermore, there is no evidence that this was not also the case in the Old Covenant. But what of a child too young to have understood what his father had done, or one who did not discover the crime until after his father's conviction? To escape execution, he would have to have been adopted by another family. All those who remained within the family of the sacrilegious agent had to suffer the same penalty. This is still the way of escape for the sons of Adam: adoption by a family whose head is untainted by the crime of sacrilege. There is only one such family: the family of God, redeemed by the Second Adam, Jesus Christ.

20. In the twentieth century—perhaps throughout modern times—the events in the Soviet Union of August 19–21, 1991, best illustrate this principle of replacement. The astoundingly inept attempted coup by the old guard Soviet leaders failed in a nearly bloodless series of events. The experiment in atheism, 1917–1991, had failed.

Appendix B

RUSHDOONY ON THE TITHE: A CRITIQUE

And, behold, I have given the children of Levi all the tenth in Israel for an inheritance, for their service which they serve, even the service of the tabernacle of the congregation. Neither must the children of Israel henceforth come nigh the tabernacle of the congregation, lest they bear sin, and die (Num. 18:21–22).

The text is clear: the Levites as a tribe were entitled to the entire tithe. That is, they had a legal claim on it: “all the tenth in Israel for an inheritance.” This inheritance was as secure legally in God’s eyes as the landed inheritance of the other tribes. Of course, it was far less secure operationally; the men of Israel did not always pay their tithes. Those who refused to pay their tithes to the Levites were guilty of robbing God. As surely as it was theft to steal title to another man’s land, so was it theft to withhold any part of the tithe from the Levites. The first form of theft was active; the second form was passive; but both were theft. “Will a man rob God? Yet ye have robbed me. But ye say, Wherein have we robbed thee? In tithes and offerings. Ye are cursed with a curse: for ye have robbed me, even this whole nation” (Mal. 3:8–9).

The context is equally clear regarding the legal basis of this entitlement: the Levites’ service as guardians of the tabernacle/temple’s sacramental boundary. They were required to stand at this sacramental boundary and restrain (probably execute) anyone who trespassed it (Num. 18:1–22).¹ The Levites’ entitlement and the Levites’ task as boundary executioners were explicitly linked by the Mosaic law.²

1. On the debate within modern Jewish scholarship on the Levites as executioners—Jacob Milgrom vs. Menahem Haran—see James B. Jordan, “The Death Penalty in the Mosaic Law,” Biblical Horizons Occasional Paper No. 3 (Jan. 1989), Pt. 3. Milgrom argued that the Levites were armed guards; Haran denies this. Jordan agrees with Milgrom.

There can be no doubt: the Levites were entitled to the whole tithe. I ask again: On what legal basis? The text answers: their service in the temple. But which form of service: Sacramental or social? I answer: sacramental. Rushdoony's answer: social. On this seemingly minor issue, the Christian Reconstruction movement divided in 1981. It will remain divided until one side or the other gives up its view of the judicial basis of the tithe, or until one of them disappears. Contrary to those people who blame all institutional divisions on personality conflicts—even God vs. Satan, I suppose—the dividing issue here is ecclesiology: the doctrine of the church, and has been since 1981.³

A. Church and Tithe

I have presented my view of the tithe in my book, The Covenantal Tithe.⁴ I have defended it in another book, Perspectives on Tithing: Four Views.⁵

The theology of the tithe is not a minor issue; it is central to biblical ecclesiology. It is also important for a proper understanding of the covenant—specifically, the church covenant.⁶ The tithe is an aspect of judicial authority in the church, i.e., point two of the biblical covenant model, hierarchy-representation, which Sutton argued in Chapter 2. This representation is both substitutionary (“Who or what in history dies in my place?”) and judicial (“Who in history declares me judicially acceptable before God?”).

The proper performance of this representative ecclesiastical office does mandate certain social services—charity, for example—but the covenantal-judicial basis of the eldership is not social; it is sacramental (point four of the biblical covenant model: oath-sanctions).⁷ A man is

2. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 10.

3. For a detailed study of the sacramental basis of the tithe, plus additional information on the background of Rushdoony's theology of the tithe, see Gary North, Tithing and the Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994). (<http://bit.ly/gntithing>)

4. Gary North, The Covenantal Tithe (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2011).

5. Gary North, “The Covenantal Tithe,” in David A. Croteau (ed.), Perspectives on Tithing: Four Views (Nashville, Tennessee: B&H Academic, 2011).

6. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), chaps. 10, 11. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

7. Similarly, the office of civil magistrate, called “minister” by Paul in Romans 13:4, not a minister of the gospel just because he calls himself one or because he is charitable. He is a minister only because he has been ordained by a lawful church. Ordained ministers guard the sacraments against profane acts: boundary violations. That is, they control lawful access to the sacraments. They include some people and exclude others. The following four aspects of a church are judicially linked: the formal ordination of ministers by other ministers (i.e., no self-ordination or ordination exclusively by laymen), hierarchical authority (an appeals court system), ministerial control over legal access to the sacraments, and the local institutional church's exclusive authority to collect and distribute all of its members' tithes in God's name. To deny any one of these aspects of the church is to call into question all four. So it was under the Mosaic Covenant; so it is under Christ's New Covenant. Rushdoony has implicitly denied the first two points by defending ecclesiastical independency, and he has emphatically denied the other two. He is consistent (or at least he was until 1992).⁸ His theological critics had better be sure their theological positions are equally consistent.

B. The Doctrine of the Church in Christian Reconstruction

The major dividing issue within Christian Reconstruction has been the doctrine of the institutional church. Officially, the movement split in 1981⁹ over Rushdoony's outrage regarding a minor theological point in an essay I submitted as my monthly column in the Chalcedon Report. I had relied on a passage in James Jordan's 1980 master's thesis.¹⁰ is also based on point four: sanctions, in this case, negative sanctions. He punishes evil-doers (v. 4).

8. North, Tithing and the Church, ch. 10.

9. My last year as editor of The Journal of Christian Reconstruction was in 1981.

10. Jordan's master's thesis had been accepted by Westminster Theological Seminary (Philadelphia). The offending passage—on the circumcision of Gershom by Zipporah—appears on pages 85–86. An expansion of this observation was later published by Jordan in his book, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), Appendix F, "Proleptic Passover." (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>) Rushdoony initially demanded that I defend my observation in greater detail, which I did. He then said my defense was insufficient. He then fired me as editor of The Journal of Christian Reconstruction. I later published a larger version of this defense: "The Marriage Supper of the Lamb," Christianity and Civilization, No. 4 (1985). (<http://bit.ly/CAC1985>). No other critic has ever written to Jordan to challenge his essay as heretical. I have never received a single letter from anyone other than Rushdoony, pro or con, regarding my essay. The whole incident was officially based on a trifle. In this appendix, I deal with what I regard as the unstated dividing Rushdoony had made a very similar observation in the Institutes, which he probably had forgotten making.¹¹ I find it difficult to believe that this blow-up on Rushdoony's part was based merely on a brief section in Jordan's master's thesis. Jordan had sent him a copy of it over a year before the blow-up; he had remained silent about it. I believe that the real offense was our view of the institutional church, which we had begun to promote vigorously through the fledgling Geneva Divinity School. There was an irreconcilable division over the correct answer to this question: What is the fundamental institution in the long-term process we call Christian reconstruction? Rushdoony has repeatedly answered: "the family," along with its subordinate agency, the Christian school. The "Tyler wing" of the Christian Reconstruction movement answered: "the church." There is no way to reconcile these views.

If this dispute were simply over the percentage of men's income owed to God, it would not be a major dividing issue in our day. There is nothing unique about Christians today who dismiss as "legalism" any suggestion that they owe 10% of their net income to God. But Rushdoony, as the co-founder of Christian Reconstruction, could hardly take this antinomian approach to the question of the tithe. The Bible is clear about the tithe's mandatory percentage: men owe 10% of their net income to God.¹² The argument is not over the tithe's percentage; the argument is over which agency (if any) possesses the God-given authority to collect it and then distribute it. The debate within Christian Reconstruction is over this question: Where is the locus of God's delegated sovereignty over the allocation of tithe: In the tither or the institutional church? I answer: with the institutional church. Rushdoony answered: with the tither.

1. Church and Tithe

From 1965 until the publication of his two-volume Systematic Theology in 1994, Rushdoony sporadically attempted to cobble together his doctrine of the institutional church in order to support his view point: Rushdoony's view of the institutional church.

11. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 427–29. On the close connection between Rushdoony's comments and my own, see North, "Marriage Supper," p. 218.

12. There is a subordinate question: the third-year tithe and the poor tithe. Were these separate, additional tithes? Rushdoony argues that they were. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 53.

of the tithe. His view of the tithe is that Christians can lawfully send the tithe anywhere they wish; therefore, the institutional church has no lawful claim to any portion of the tithe, or at least not above the tenth of a tenth that went to the Aaronic priesthood under the Mosaic law. He needed a doctrine of the church in order to defend such a thesis theologically. In this appendix, I examine the connections between his view of the tithe and his view of the institutional church.

This has not been an easy task. Rushdoony never wrote a book on the doctrine of the church, for reasons that will become clear as you read this appendix. (This refusal to go into print was even more true of his defense of the continuing authority of the Mosaic dietary laws: not so much as one full page of exegesis devoted to the topic, despite its great importance for him personally as a distinguishing mark of his theology.)¹³ There is no issue of Chalcedon's Journal of Christian Reconstruction devoted to the doctrine of the church. I assure the reader, this was not my decision as the editor of the first fifteen issues, 1974–1981. In Tyler, I participated in a symposium on “the Reconstruction of the Church” in 1985, which my monetary offering above my required tithe financed.¹⁴ Rushdoony forbade me to publish any issue of the journal devoted exclusively to the church. This was the only rule that he ever set forth for my editing.

2. Church and Family

Late in his career, Rushdoony attempted to trace the institutional church back to the family—not just chronologically but covenantally. This theory of ecclesiastical origins is the heart and soul of this, his most important theological error. He wrote: “The father of the church was Abraham, with whom God made a covenant (Gen. 15), and through whom the covenant sign, circumcision, was instituted (Gen. 17). The covenant with Israel in Exodus 20 is a continuation of the same covenant, a covenant of grace and law. The church thus began as a family, and the structure of both the covenant nation and congregation retained this same character.”¹⁵ The church began as a family,

13. He never commented on I Corinthians 8: “Howbeit there is not in every man that knowledge: for some with conscience of the idol unto this hour eat it as a thing offered unto an idol; and their conscience being weak is defiled. But meat commendeth us not to God: for neither, if we eat, are we the better; neither, if we eat not, are we the worse” (vv. 7–8).

14. James B. Jordan (ed.), “The Reconstruction of the Church,” Christianity and Civilization, No. 4 (1985). (<http://bit.ly/CAC1985>)

15. R. J. Rushdoony, “The Nature of the Church,” Calvinism Today, I (Oct. 1991),

Rushdoony said; hence, the family in both his theology and his social theory is the central institution: the master covenantal model. Rushdoony's social theory is familiocentric. He regarded the institutional church as an extension of the family.¹⁶ In his view, the great war for the minds of men is the war between family and state. The Bible teaches otherwise.

Rushdoony failed to recognize that the priesthood did not originate with Abraham. It originated with Melchizedek. Abraham paid his tithe to Melchizedek (Gen. 14:20), and he received bread and wine from him (Gen. 14:18). Christ's high priestly office was grounded in Melchizedek's primary priesthood, not Levi's secondary and judicially subordinate priesthood (Heb. 7:9–10). Here is the fatal flaw in Rushdoony's familiocentric argument: Melchizedek had no parents (Heb. 7:3). I take this literally: Melchizedek was therefore a theophany. At the very least, he had no genealogy; his authority was not derived in any way in the family. Melchizedek is the refutation of Rushdoony's ecclesiology and his familiocentric social theory.

C. The Biblical Position: Ecclesiocentrism

I disagreed with Rushdoony on the centrality of the family in Christian society. The fundamental institution in history is not the family; it is the church, which extends beyond the final resurrection as the Bride of Christ (Rev. 21). The family does not: there is no marriage in the resurrection (Matt. 22:30). Jesus made it plain: the false ideal of the sovereign family is a far greater threat to Christianity than the false ideal of the sovereign state. Jesus never spoke this harshly regarding the state:

Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter in law against her mother in law. And a man's foes shall be they of his own household. He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me: and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me (Matt. 10:34–37).

p. 3. This journal is published in England: P. O. Box 1, Whitby, North Yorkshire YO21 1HP.

16. I would call any social theory emanationist which traces the origin of church, state, or family to one of the other institutions. Christian social theory must be Trinitarian, insisting on the covenantal uniqueness of each of the three institutional covenants.

The family is temporary, limited to history: no marriage in the resurrection. "For in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven" (Matt. 22:30). The state is temporary, also limited to history: no suppression of evil (Rom. 13:4) in the post-resurrection, sin-free world. But the church is eternal. The church is therefore the central human institution. The family and the state are legitimate covenantal institutions in history, but they do not possess the most important authority given by God to any institution: the power to excommunicate. Why is this the most important sanction? Because it alone is binding in eternity. Breaking the family bond by death or divorce is not binding in eternity; physical death through execution is not binding in eternity. In contrast, lawful excommunication is binding in eternity. Christian social theory must affirm without compromise or qualification that the true sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper are more important in history than the democratic state's imitation sacrament of voting or the family's imitation sacrament of sexual bonding.

Rushdoony understood the relationship between church authority and excommunication, so in order to defend his sociology of familism, he denied that the church possesses the authority to excommunicate, as we shall see. He thereby denied the existence of the keys of the kingdom—the judicial authority of the institutional church in history (Matt. 16:19). He did this in the name of Christian orthodoxy, as we shall see.

D. The Conservatives' Position: Familiocentrism

Why do social and political conservatives traditionally identify the family as the central institution of society? There are two primary reasons. First, because they reject the liberals' assertion that the central social institution is the state. In this they are correct. Such a view is necessary but not sufficient for accurate social theory. Second, because conservatives adopt natural law theory. We must examine both assumptions: one incomplete and the other incorrect.

1. Anti-Statism

Conservatives regard the family as the only institution with sufficient authority and respect to challenge the state successfully on a long-term basis. One of the strongest statements to this effect was written by G. K. Chesterton. The family, he wrote, "is the only check on the state that is bound to renew itself as eternally as the state, and more naturally than the state.”¹⁷ They view the social function of the institutional church as an adjunct to the family, just as liberals see the church as an adjunct to the state. Conservatives rarely view the institutional church as a covenantally separate institution possessing superior authority to both family and state. This is a serious error.

The authority to excommunicate is the greatest judicial authority exercised in history. The lawful negative sanctions of the rod (family) and the sword (state) are minor compared to the sanction of excommunication (Matt. 16:19). But because formal excommunication does not impose bodily pain in history, modern man dismisses the church’s authority in both history and eternity. This includes modern conservatism. It also includes most Protestant churches, who refuse to honor each other’s excommunications. They thereby deny Jesus’ words: “And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell” (Matt. 10:28). The only agency in history that lawfully announces a person’s condemnation to hell—short of repentance before physical death—is the institutional church. This authority is implicitly recognized by the modern Western state. A condemned criminal on his final walk to the place of execution cannot legally be accompanied by his spouse or his political representative; he can be accompanied by a minister.

The battle between patriarchalism and statism in the West has been going at least since the rise of the Greek city-state, an outgrowth of clans and family sacrifices.¹⁸ The problem is, the family always loses this battle as a covenant-breaking society advances over time because the family does not have the power possessed by the state: the monopoly of life-threatening violence. Step by step, the state replaces the family in the thinking of most members of covenant-breaking society. The state possesses greater power; in the power religion of humanism, this justifies the expansion of the state.

The family fights a losing defensive battle when it fights alone. Its authority is steadily eroded by the state. For example, the divorce rate

17. Chesterton, “The Story of the Family,” in The Superstition of Divorce (1920); The Collected Works of G. K. Chesterton, vol. 4 (San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 1987), p. 256. His reference to eternity betrays his confused social theology: neither the human family nor the state is eternal; the church is (Rev. 21, 22).

18. Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955).

risks when the state replaces the family's functions, especially its welfare functions. Therefore, if the familio-centric view of the church were true—the church as an adjunct to the family—the church would inevitably lose alongside of the family. This view of the church is widely held today. Result: those people inside various church hierarchies who seek power have increasingly allied themselves and their churches with the state.¹⁹

2. Natural Law Theory

An implicit natural law theory undergirds conservatism's social analysis: belief in the existence of moral absolutes that are discoverable by universal logical principles. This faith in moral-logical universals undermines the judicial authority of the church. The Trinitarian church is not universal in human history; the state and family are. "Religion" and "the sacred" are undeniably universal in history; the church is not. Because the family and the state appear to be the universal institutions, and because the church exists only where Christianity has made inroads, conservatives conclude that the war for liberty can be won only if the family is strengthened against the state. The church is regarded by conservatives as a useful ally in the family's battle against the state. The church serves as social cement; this is preferred to political cement. Whenever the church claims more than this subordinate role for itself, American conservatives become leery. This is why the primary authors of the U.S. Constitution—right-wing Enlightenment humanists²⁰—were willing to mouth words of praise for "religion," but never for Jesus Christ as the incarnate Second Person of the Trinity, nor for His church.²¹ Religion in general is elevated; the church in particular is demoted.

19. C. Gregg Singer, The Unholy Alliance (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1975). (<http://bit.ly/SingerUA>) This book is a detailed history of the Federal Council of Churches and its successor, the National Council of Churches.

20. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), Part 3. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

21. George Washington and Abraham Lincoln spoke of religion and morality as great benefits for society. Neither of them was willing to profess personal faith in the work of Jesus Christ as the sole pathway to eternal life. Religion in their view is instrumental rather than foundational. See Paul F. Boller, George Washington & Religion (Dallas: Southern Methodist University Press, 1963). Washington refused to take the Lord's Supper: self-excommunication. Lincoln avoided commenting publicly on his religion except in the 1846 Congressional campaign, when he issued a handbill admitting that he was not a church member, but assured voters that they should not vote for a man who scoffs at religion. "Handbill Replying to Charges of Infidelity," The Collected Works of Abraham Lincoln, ed. Roy P. Basler, 8 vols. (New Brunswick, New Jersey:

This view of the church implicitly places world history above church history because the institutional church has been narrower in its influence than mankind up to this time. The most widely accepted opinions and logic of “mankind in general”—the covenantal sons of Adam—are assumed by natural law theorists to be the legitimate moral and judicial standards for all societies. This implicit and sometimes explicit humanism of natural law theory is contrary to the Bible’s revelation of God’s work in history through His covenant people. Covenant-breakers are adjuncts to covenant-keepers in history, just as the lake of fire (Rev. 20:10) will be an adjunct to the culmination of the New Heaven and New Earth (Rev. 21:1) in eternity. Covenant-keepers rather than covenant-breakers are the focus of history. Israel was central to the ancient world, not the great empires. The exodus is central to human history, not the fall of Troy. The angel of death is central to human history, not the Trojan Horse. The Pentateuch is central to human history, not The Iliad, The Odyssey, and The Aeneid. Moses is central to human history, not Plato and Aristotle. Special grace is central to history, not common grace.²² Natural law theory, whatever its specific ethical content may be—on this crucial point, natural law theorists disagree—is the outworking of common grace. Bible-revealed law, not natural law, is central to history. Looking back from eternity, all men will recognize this. Men are required by God to evaluate history in terms of what He has revealed about eternity, not evaluate eternity in terms of what men assume about history. Humanism denies this. So does natural law theory.

E. Rushdoony’s Ecclesiology

Rushdoony subordinated the doctrine of the church to the doctrine of the family. In doing so, he adopted familiocentrism, though not natural law theory. This abandonment of theonomy in favor of traditional conservatism undermined the covenantal foundation of his theology. His view of church and family was an anomaly in his original theology—an error no larger than a man’s hand. Like Elijah’s cloud, it grew into a mud-producing storm after 1981.

Rutgers University Press, 1953), I, p. 382. See also his “National Fast Day Proclamation” (Aug. 12, 1861), where he spoke of “the Supreme Government of God.” Ibid., VI, p. 482.

22. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/gndcrg>)

Rushdoony systematically avoided developing a doctrine of the institutional church. He offers one chapter in the Institutes (XIV) and one in Systematic Theology (XII), but both are incomplete. Neither addresses in detail the judicial issues of the ordination of ministers and public excommunication by ordained church officers. This is especially absent in Systematic Theology, completed in 1984 but not published until mid-1994. He had broken not only with the Westminster Confession of Faith (which he officially had to affirm until he resigned from the ministry of the Orthodox Presbyterian Church in 1970) and the 39 Articles of Episcopalianism (which he officially affirmed after 1973), but with all of Trinitarian orthodoxy from the Council of Nicea forward.

Critics of the church's lawful, God-ordained claim on every individual's lifetime commitment again and again seek to elevate "Christianity" and dismiss "the church," as if there could somehow be Christianity without the church and its mandated sacraments. One sign of a person's move away from historic Christianity's doctrine of the church to conservative humanism is his adoption of the pejorative word, Churchianity.²³ The person who dismisses "churchianity" is often a defender of his personal ecclesiastical autonomy: a sovereign individual who judges the churches of this world and finds them all sadly lacking. In his own eyes, all the churches fall short of his almost pure and nearly undefiled standards. No church announces God's authoritative word to him; rather, he announces God's authoritative word to the churches. No church officer represents him before God; instead, he represents himself. Like the foolish defense lawyer who hires himself as his own advocate in a court of law, so is the man who is contemptuous of "churchianity." He confidently excommunicates all churches for failing to meet his standards. All congregations have failed to measure up, except (should he deign to begin one) his own. He ignores the obvious: a self-excommunicated person is no less excommunicated.

Rushdoony's views on the institutional church became adjuncts to his theory of the tithe. Prior to his assertion in 1991 of the Chalcedon Foundation's status as a church (initially, he called it a chapel)²⁴ as well as a governmentally chartered educational organization, his views on 23. For a good example, see Rushdoony's editorial, "Copycat Churchianity," Chalcedon Report (June 1992).

24. The Chalcedon Report (Jan. 1992) published an article by Rushdoony, "The Life of the Church: I Timothy 5:1-2." That essay was introduced as follows: "Note: The Life of the Church was a communion sermon at the Chalcedon Chapel evening service, October 27, 1991."

the tithe were fully consistent with his views regarding the visible church. They constituted a single, consistent, and monumental error. This error, if applied retroactively to the conclusions of Volume 1 of The Institutes of Biblical Law, would destroy the covenantal basis of Rushdoony's theology and therefore also his social theory.

The fact is, his three-fold error came late in his career. This shift in theology began shortly before he left the Orthodox Presbyterian Church in 1970, but it was not completed until the early 1980s. In other words, what Volume 1 of The Institutes hath given, Volume 2 need not take away. Only small traces of his error are visible in Volume 1; this error can and must be separated from that foundational book. Because of this, I find it necessary to challenge the book that he and Edward Powell co-authored, Tithing and Dominion (1979).²⁵ The chapters are identified as to which author wrote which. I refer here only to Rushdoony's chapters. (Rushdoony broke decisively with Powell shortly after he broke with me and Jordan.)

F. Tithing and Dominion

With respect to dominion the Bible teaches, first, that the dominion covenant was established between God and the family. God has assigned to the family the primary dominion task in history (though not in eternity): to be fruitful and multiply (Gen. 1:27–28)—a biological function.²⁶ Second, as we shall see, the tithe is a mandatory payment from man to God through a covenantal institution: the church. Therefore, if the tithe were the basis of dominion, God's law would mandate a tithe to the family, the agency of dominion. But there is no God-specified mandatory payment to the family, i.e., no legal entitlement. On the contrary, it is the productivity of individuals, families, and other voluntary associations that is the source of both tithes and taxes. This is inevitable: the source of the funding cannot be entitled to funding.²⁷ The individual²⁸ or family is the source of the funding. The tithe is 25. Edward A. Powell and Rousas John Rushdoony, Tithing and Dominion (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1979).

26. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, n Economics, 2012), ch. 4.

27. There are parent-child economic requirements, but these are intra-family relationships.

28. This would include those fictitious legal individuals known as corporations. One way to solve the problem of tithing on retained earnings would be for 10% of the common shares of all new corporations to be assigned to a specific church from the beginning. The church would automatically participate in all dividends and capital therefore owed to the institutional church by the individual or the family.

Rushdoony defended the tithe as the foundational basis of biblical dominion. He also described the church as an unproductive organization, as we shall see. Conclusion: if the tithe is foundational to dominion, and if the church is unproductive, then it is the tithe rather than the church which is the source of Christianity's cultural productivity. In terms of such a perspective, the institutional church's importance in the dominion process is secondary to the tithe's importance. This is exactly what Rushdoony began saying publicly after 1973.²⁹

It is not clear to me whether his doctrine of the church and his doctrine of the tithe originally stemmed from his decision to redirect his own tithe money into the Chalcedon Foundation and to remove himself from the authority of any local church, or whether his shift in theology came first. These events surely paralleled each other chronologically.³⁰ He did not bother to articulate his views until the late 1970s. By 1991, however, it was clear that his published doctrine of the church was an extension of his published doctrine of the tithe. He constantly wrote about the tithe. Until his 1991 essay in Calvinism Today, he steadfastly refused to write clearly about the institutional church.

In June, 1994, his two-volume Systematic Theology appeared.³¹ The manuscript had been completed in 1984. Chapter 12, "The Doctrine of the Church," was more radical and confrontational against Calvin's doctrine of the church than had been Chapter 14, "The Church," in Institutes of Biblical Law. But what came later, in the early 1990s, was more radical and confrontational than Systematic Theology.

Sometime in the late 1960s, Rushdoony warned me of not dealing early with a heresy in one's career. He used the example of a Calvinist publisher and amateur economist, Frederick Nymeyer, who paid for translations of the works of the Austrian economist, Eugen von Böhm Bawerk. From 1953 to 1960, he published a low-circulation magazine, originally called Progressive Calvinism, but later called First Principles gains.

29. When I served as a Board member of the Chalcedon Foundation in 1975, Rushdoony was directing his own tithe into Chalcedon, as he told me. I was a paid staff member at the time. He did not ask me to follow his lead, nor did I volunteer to do so. I have no reason to believe that he subsequently re-directed his tithe to a local church, since he did not belong to a local church.

30. North, Tithing and the Church, ch. 10.

31. R. J. Rushdoony, Systematic Theology, 2 vols. (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1994).

In Morality and Economics. It was an attempt to present the economics of Böhm-Bawerk as being consistent with Christianity. There was a lot of good material in this magazine, but it was far more Austrian than Christian. Then, in 1967, he wrote and published a book called No Civil War in the Cave. Rushdoony regarded it as Pelagian. He told me, “If a man does not deal with a heresy early in his career, it will dominate his thinking as he grows older.”

G. Church and Sanctions

In contrast to the family, both state and church are lawfully entitled to economic support from those who are under their respective covenantal authorities. The state’s jurisdiction is territorial (e.g., over non-covenanted resident aliens) and judicial (e.g., over its covenanted citizens who live outside the state’s territory³²). The church’s jurisdiction is equally judicial, though not (in Protestant societies) territorial. Both institutions have lawful covenantal claims before God over a small portion of the net productivity of all those who live voluntarily under their jurisdiction. Their God-given authority to impose negative sanctions against those who refuse to pay is the outward mark of their covenantal sovereignty. To deny the right of either church or state to bring such sanctions is a denial of their God-delegated covenantal sovereignty.

1. Tithe Revolt

Rushdoony understood this with respect to the state; he therefore opposed the tax revolt or “patriot” movement.³³ But he denied that any payment is automatically owed to the institutional church. No church can lawfully compel its members to pay it their complete tithe or even any portion thereof, he insisted. “It is significant, too, that God’s law makes no provision for the enforcement of the tithe by man. Neither church nor state have [sic] the power to require the tithe of us, nor to tell us where it should be allocated, i.e., whether to Christian Schools or colleges, educational foundations, missions, charities, or anything else. The tithe is to the Lord.”³⁴ He then cited Malachi 3:8–12. With respect to the tithe, Rushdoony believed in the divine right of the individual with respect to the institutional church: no earthly appeal beyond conscience. This was not an error of logic on his part; it was a consistent application of his ecclesiology.

32. United States. citizens living outside the country must pay income taxes on their salaries. As of 2012, the first $91,500 was exempt.

33. R. J. Rushdoony, “The Tax Revolt Against God,” Position Paper 94, Chalcedon Report (Feb. 1988), pp. 16–17.

34. Ibid., p. 16.

The existence of a mandatory payment to the church is evidence of a covenantal relationship: *a legal bond established by a self-maledictory oath*³⁵ which each church member takes either explicitly or representatively (by parents). The church has a lawful claim on a tithe of every member's net increase in income.³⁶ Unlike the state, which is ruthless in collecting taxes owed, the church rarely enforces its lawful claim. This is not surprising: the modern church rarely enforces anything under its lawful jurisdiction.³⁷ The state has arrogated power to itself in the face of the churches' defection. In our day, most Christians regard this as normal and even normative. They prefer to think of the church as judicially impotent. They prefer to think of the state's physical sanctions as the greatest possible sanctions. They refuse to regard formal excommunication as threatening them or anyone else with eternal consequences. Like the humanists, they prefer to fear men

35. Sutton, That You May Prosper, pp. 83–91. Rushdoony refused to discuss the self-maledictory oath as the judicial basis of all four biblical covenants: personal, church, state, and family. He defined the covenant as God-given law rather than as oath-invoked God-given law. This unique judicial oath formally invokes God's sanctions. Without this formal invocation, there is no redeeming covenant bond possible. There is only the general, Adamic covenant bond: a broken covenant. Rushdoony's definition does not acknowledge this fact. He wrote: "In the Biblical record, covenants are laws given by God to man as an act of grace." Rushdoony, "Covenant vs. Contract," Chalcedon Report (June 1993), p. 20. If correct, this definition would make the covenants universal, since biblical laws govern everything in history, as he argued for years. But if he were to discuss the sanctions-invoking oath as basis of the four covenants, he would have to discuss oath-breaking in the church and its formal sanctions: the doctrine of excommunication. He would also have to discuss in detail Article VI, Section III of the U.S. Constitution, which prohibits religious test oaths for Federal (national) office. This is why the U.S. Constitution is an atheistic, humanistic document—a fact which Rushdoony refused to accept for over three decades. See North, Political Polytheism, Appendix B: "Rushdoony on the Constitution."

36. This obligation does not apply to gifts from husbands to wives and vice versa; nor does it apply to intra-family gifts to minors. Parents who feed their children need not set aside a tithe on the food so consumed. The obligation is covenantal, and the institutional payment of the tithe by the head of the household serves as a representative payment for all of its members.

37. At worst, a pastor who is convicted of adultery is suspended for a year or two. I know of at least one case where an admitted adulterer was asked by his presbytery only to transfer to another presbytery. The members' idea of negative sanctions was limited to "Not with our wives, you don't!" He voluntarily left the ministry. I bought part of his library.

rather than God. They stand in front of the local church and in effect chant the child's challenge: "Sticks and stones can break my bones, but names ['excommunicant'] can never hurt me!"

Neither the state nor the church is a profit-seeking organization. This is why both possess lawful claims on a small part of the net productivity of their members. Therefore, they cannot be primary agencies of dominion in history. They are secondary agencies of dominion. This is why the Great Commission of Matthew 28:18–20 is not strictly an extension of the dominion mandate of Genesis 1:26–28. A small portion of the fruits of dominion are brought to the institutional church. The church is not the source of these fruits. The institutional church, through its authority to declare someone as an adopted son of God, brings covenant-breakers formally into the eternal household of God, but the institutional church is not itself a family. It possesses greater authority than the family. Thus, the tithe cannot be a primary aspect of dominion. It is a secondary aspect.

2. Productivity

This is not to say that church and state are not economically productive. They are the source of God's authorized covenantal sanctions: the negative sanctions of the sword (state) and the positive and negative sanctions of the keys of the kingdom (church). Rushdoony's language is seriously misleading when he wrote that "church and state are not productive agencies."³⁸ This is the language of secular libertarianism, not Christianity. Nevertheless, he made an important point: "The state is a protective agency whose function is to maintain a just order, to insure restitution for civil wrongs, and to protect the people from external and internal enemies. . . . The church's function is protection and nurture by means of its ordained ministry."³⁹ What is the biblical meaning of "protection"? Civil protection means the defense of boundaries—judicial rights against invasion, either by individuals or by the state itself. Protection by the state is achieved by its enforcement of negative sanctions against evil-doers (Rom. 13:1–7).⁴⁰ Biblically speaking, the state provides no lawful positive sanctions, e.g., nurture. Protection by the church is also achieved through its imposition of negative sanctions (e.g., I Cor. 5). Nurture by the church is the product of positive sanctions (e.g., II Cor. 8).

38. Rushdoony, Law and Society, Vol. 2 of Institutes of Biblical Law (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1982), p. 129.

39. Idem.

40. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 11.

Rushdoony mistakenly contrasted these beneficial covenantal functions with what he calls "productivity." His view of productivity is incorrect. These covenantal functions are basic to productivity, but they cannot be financed unless those under their authority remain productive. The income of both church and state must come from the outside: from God through the individual and the corporate entities that are under the respective jurisdictions of church and state.

Rushdoony discussed the non-productivity of the church in a chapter on the Lord's Supper (Holy Communion). He made a catastrophic theological error by denying the sacramental basis of the church. "The problem in history has been the unhappy sacramentalization of church and state."⁴¹ He rightly castigated the idea of a sacramental state, but then wrote: "Similarly, the church sees itself as the sacramental body and preempts Christ's role. Communion is thought of as a church rite rather than Christ's ordinance." This contrast implicitly assumes that Holy Communion is not a church rite, i.e., not a biblically mandatory ritual: a false theological assumption if there ever was one. He reduced communion to a "feast of charity" or a "love feast."⁴² He never acknowledged the sacrament of the Lord's Supper as a divinely empowered covenant-renewal ceremony of the institutional church, a ceremony that invokes God's positive and negative sanctions in history and eternity.

The institutional church has only one ultimate means of discipline: excommunication, i.e., excluding a person from the rite of the Lord's Supper. Without the positive sanction aspect of the Lord's Supper, the negative sanction of exclusion is judicially meaningless. Those who hold a nominalist view⁴³ of the Lord's Supper strip the institutional church of its disciplinary authority. Calvin wrote that "it is certainly a highly reprehensible vice for a church not to correct sins. Besides, I say our Lord will punish an entire people for this single fault. And therefore let no church, still not exercising the discipline of the ban, flatter itself by thinking that it is a small or light sin not to use the ban when necessary."⁴⁴ He also wrote: "But this is not to say that an individual is 41. Rushdoony, Law and Society, p. 128.

42. Idem.

43. The nominalist acknowledges no judicial authority beneath the words that define the sacraments. Thus, the sacraments become a mere memorial. This was Zwingli's view of the Lord's Supper. It is also the Baptist view.

44. John Calvin, "Brief Instruction for Arming All the Good Faithful Against the justified in withdrawing from the church whenever things are contrary to his will."⁴⁵ Calvin was not a defender of the individual's autonomy in relation to the institutional church. He fully understood what the sole basis of a declared Christian's judicial separation from the institutional church has to be: excommunication.

H. The Sacraments

The sacraments are means of bringing God's sanctions in history on His people: blessings and cursings. They are covenant signs. They are oath signs. Rushdoony insisted that the sacraments are family rites, not rites administered under the exclusive jurisdiction of the institutional church. He replaced the sacramental church with the sacramental family.

1. Baptism

Rushdoony saw baptism as a covenant sign, which it is. But affirming covenant in general is not sufficient. A covenant sign must be administered. Which institution has been granted this monopoly by God: church, state, or family? For two almost thousand years, the church's answer has been clear: the church. This opinion, Rushdoony said, is a sign of the hardening of the church's arteries. "Baptism is a covenant fact. The church has converted it into an ecclesiastical fact. Circumcision in the Old Testament is a family rite, because the family is the primary covenant institution; the family gives birth to and rears the child."⁴⁶ But physical birth is Adamic; Adam's sons need adoption.

Was circumcision a family rite? No; it was an ecclesiastical, priestly rite. The head of a household may have administered this rite as a household priest in a nation of priests (Ex. 19:6). If so, was this done in his judicial office of father or priest? The issue here is covenantal authorization. The question of covenantal authority is easy to decide. Answer this question: Who possessed the sole authority to annul the rite of circumcision by the excommunication of covenant-breakers? The answer is obvious: a Levitical priest, not the father. Covenant-breakers were to be cut off from the church and therefore from citizenship by excommunication.

Errors of the Common Sect of the Anabaptists" (1544), in Treatises Against the Anabaptists and Against the Libertines, ed. Benjamin Wirt Farley (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker, 1982), p. 65.

45. Calvin, Treatises, p. 65.

46. Rushdoony, Systematic Theology, p. 732.

How do we know that the father did not possess this authority? Because excommunication mandated family disinheritance. But a father had no authority to disinherit his son. "If a man have two wives, one beloved, and another hated, and they have born him children, both the beloved and the hated; and if the firstborn son be hers that was hated: Then it shall be, when he maketh his sons to inherit that which he hath, that he may not make the son of the beloved firstborn before the son of the hated, which is indeed the firstborn: But he shall acknowledge the son of the hated for the firstborn, by giving him a double portion of all that he hath: for he is the beginning of his strength; the right of the firstborn is his" (Deut. 21:15–17). If he could not disinherit the hated wife's son, surely he could not disinherit the loved wife's son. Rushdoony commented on this passage several times in Institutes of Biblical Law, but he failed to make the judicial connection linking circumcision, excommunication, and disinheritance. All were exclusively priestly acts.

As a household priest, the father may have circumcised his sons. We are not told this specifically regarding the Mosaic era. Surely, without specific revelation, we should not draw revolutionary ecclesiastical conclusions from the mere possibility that the father circumcised his son. But if he did, he did so a delegated agent of the Levitical priesthood. He did not retain the authority to excommunicate, i.e., judicially revoke the covenant. This points to the two-fold judicial reality of circumcision. It was priestly in two senses: general and special. First, the father representatively invoked the covenant oath in the name of his son through the rite of circumcision. He had a lawful role as a father: a general Israelite priest (Ex. 19:6). Second, in invoking the covenant oath, he affirmed the law of the covenant. As a general priest, perhaps he could lawfully do this. But a special priest of the tribe of Levi, not the head of the household, would determine whether the circumcised son met the stipulations of the covenant: confession of faith and outward obedience to God's law. This identifies both sacraments as ecclesiastical.

Having defied the entire history of the church by proclaiming baptism as a family rite, Rushdoony then condescendingly announced: "Having said all this, let me add that much of the church's teachings on baptism are [sic] very important. The error has been to limit its implications to the society of the church, and membership therein.”⁴⁷ This was as persuasive as a statement from some dedicated socialist: “Having said all this, let me add that much of the Austrian School economists’ teachings on the free market are very important. Their error has been to ground their system on the idea of private property.”

2. Lord’s Supper

Having announced the transfer of the authority to baptize from the church to the marital family, he immediately moved to a discussion of the Lord’s Supper. He began: “As we have seen, baptism is in to [sic; he means into] the covenant of our God.”⁴⁸ This was never a matter of dispute. What is a matter of dispute is which covenantal agency possesses the right to baptize. This is a dispute between Rushdoony and (in round numbers) all the theologians in the history of the church. He then moved to the Lord’s Supper: “Like baptism, the Lord’s Table or communion is rooted in the Old Testament, in the Passover.”⁴⁹ He appealed to Jesus: “Our Lord’s institution of this rite came with the Passover celebration and with His interpretation of the meaning of Passover as fulfilled in Himself.”

Let us pursue this assertion for a moment. The move from Passover to the Lord’s Supper came in the upper room on the night before Jesus’ crucifixion, as Rushdoony affirmed in Institutes of Biblical Law.⁵⁰ Let me ask an obvious question: Where were the wives and children of the apostles? Peter had a mother-in-law (Matt. 8:14); presumably, he also had a wife. His wife was not in the upper room, nor was his mother-in-law, who dwelt in his household. Unless Rushdoony is ready to affirm the celibacy of the apostles, he faces a monumental problem: Passover was in no way a family rite in the sense of a marital family. The Head of a new household of faith administered the rite that night. This household was confessional. Something radical had taken place in the exterior form of Passover that night, but not judicially. Jesus did not violate the Mosaic Passover.

Unless the Lord’s Table was a judicially radical break with Passover—which Rushdoony denied—then this change in outward form points to an inescapable conclusion: the judicial-covenantal agency of final authority over the Passover was never the marital family. To the extent

47. Rushdoony, Systematic Theology, p. 734.

48. Ibid., p. 735.

49. Idem.

50. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 46.

that the family administered certain aspects of this rite, it did so, as in the case of baptism, under authority delegated from the priesthood.

The Lord's Supper honors this judicial fact. The special priesthood of the institutional church still possesses authority over the rite; the general priesthood is still subordinate. This was always the case judicially in Mosaic Israel; the Lord's Supper makes this visible. Rushdoony remained silent about the implications of this transformation of outward celebration. Had he ever discussed the change in celebration, he could not readily have come to this conclusion: "As we examine the Lord's Table or eucharist from the perspective of Scripture, we must recognize that it is the Christian Passover. The Passover of Exodus is a family rite; it was oriented to admitting the smallest child able to speak and understand into the joy of salvation and the meaning of salvation (Ex. 12:21–27). It is no less a family celebration in the New Testament; the family is now Christ's family."⁵¹ In the Institutes, he called this a family service.⁵²

Judicially, this statement is correct, but it proves the opposite. The Lord's Supper is no less a family celebration than Passover was under Mosaic law because, judicially speaking, Passover never was a rite under the authority of a marital family. It was always a rite of God's adopted family: the institutional church. This is why all the families of Israel had to journey to a central location to celebrate Passover (Deut. 16:6–7). Passover in Israel was never celebrated at home. It was celebrated outside the geographical jurisdiction of a family's tribe because it was celebrated under another tribe's authority. This authority was national because it was Levitical: the tribe of Levi. It was therefore under the authority of the special priesthood. The 12 non-priestly tribes could not claim any originating authority over Passover. This means that the general priesthood of Israel, i.e., members of the 12 non-Levitical tribes, could not lawfully administer Passover apart from the presence of the special priesthood: the Levites. Like King Jeroboam (I Kings 12:25–33), Rushdoony ignored this. Jeroboam, however, was not a familist.

We return to the question of excommunication. No one who had been excommunicated could lawfully attend Passover. The physical mark of circumcision was judicially irrelevant; the officially declared judicial status of the excommunicate was the only relevant legal issue. Only the Levitical priesthood had the authority to excommunicate.

51. Rushdoony, Systematic Theology, p. 736.

52. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 752.

Furthermore, the father or other household head did not have the authority to invite an excommunicated son or daughter to celebrate the Passover. The excommunicate was considered covenantally dead. (Some Orthodox Jewish sects continue to this day to have public burials of those sons who have converted to a rival religion.)

Rushdoony's view of the local church affected his doctrine of the sacraments. He neglected—and his exposition necessarily denies—the sacramental basis of the local church's authority to collect the tithe. "As against an empty rite, Christian fellowship in Christ's calling, around a table, is closer to the meaning of the sacrament."⁵³ But if the judicial rite of the Lord's Supper is not backed up (sanctioned by) the promise of eternal sanctions, both positive and negative, then it is truly an empty rite: judicially empty—the nominalist-fundamentalist-memorialist view of the sacraments: Anabaptism.⁵⁴

Rushdoony's post-1973 published view of the church is non-covenantal: the church as a fellowship without judicial sanctions rather than an institution possessing the judicial keys of the kingdom. He even insisted that a church has no lawful authority to discipline those members who refuse to attend its worship services: "We are urged not to forsake 'the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is' (Heb. 10:25), but the church is not given authority to punish those who do."⁵⁵ Then who is? Only God, apparently. There is supposedly no appeal beyond the individual's conscience: the "divine right" of a non-attending church member. Then what judicial authority does the institutional church possess? In Rushdoony's view, none. What meaning does church membership have? Less than membership in a local social club, which at least requires the payment of dues for membership. In Rushdoony's theology, a local flower arrangement society possesses more authority over its members than a local church possesses over its members.

Rushdoony's view of church discipline represents a fundamental break from the history of the church, including the theology of the Protestant reformers and especially Calvin. Rushdoony insisted (without any citations from the Bible) that a Christian has the God-given authority to remove himself indefinitely from a local congregation and cease taking the Lord's Supper, but without ecclesiastical judicial consequences. This necessarily implies that self-excommunica-

53. Rushdoony, Law and Society, p. 129.

54. On this question, Zwingli was an Anabaptist.

55. Rushdoony, "The Nature of the Church," Calvinism Today, I (Oct. 1991), p. 3.

tion, which is a form of excommunication, is not an actionable offense within the church. This is a denial of Holy Communion, for it is a denial of excommunication.

3. From Calvinism to Autonomy

Calvin was clear about the keys of the kingdom in history. He cited Matthew 16:19: "And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." He then commented that "the latter applies to the discipline of excommunication which is entrusted to the church. But the church binds him whom it excommunicates—not that it casts him into everlasting ruin and despair, but because it condemns his life and morals, and already warns him of his condemnation unless he should repent. . . . Therefore, that no one may stubbornly despise the judgment of the church, or think it immaterial that he has been condemned by the vote of the believers, the Lord testifies that such judgment by believers is nothing but the proclamation of his own sentence, and that whatever they have done on earth is ratified in heaven."⁵⁶ This is why the sacrament is a monopoly, the church is sacramental, and the tithe is owed to the church. Rushdoony denies all three conclusions.

Rushdoony had ceased being a Calvinist by the late 1970s. He became a predestinarian Congregationalist without a local congregation (until he announced his own in 1991), a man who holds a Baptist view of church hierarchy: "Another aspect of jurisdiction is this: every church, small or great, is Christ's congregation, not man's. Its loyalty must be to God in Christ, and to His law-word, not to a denomination nor a sister church."⁵⁷ Late in his career, Rushdoony began to issue his Baptist anathemas against all church hierarchies: "There is in this an implicit and sometimes unconscious heresy. Heresy is a strong word, but nothing less can describe the problem. This authoritarian attempt to control other churches is revelatory of a lack of faith in the triune God and an unseemly faith in the power of man. It assumes the virtual non-existence of the Holy Spirit."⁵⁸ Those who hold a hierarchical view of church government are members of a modern Sanhedrin, he said.

56. John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion (1559), IV:xi:2. Edited by Ford Lewis Battles, 2 vols. (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1960), II, p. 1214.

57. Rushdoony, "Nature of the Church," p. 3.

58. Ibid., p. 4.

“We must separate ourselves from modern Sanhedrins.”⁵⁹

This is a strange line of theological reasoning from someone who retained the title of minister of the gospel only through his ordination by a tiny Episcopalian denomination (total number of congregations in the denomination: two, both of them located hundreds of miles away from Rushdoony). During his years of ministry in this officially hierarchical denomination (“sanhedrin”?), he refused to attend any local church. He continued to avoid taking the Lord’s Supper. He clearly abandoned Calvin’s doctrine of the church. This is why Calvinists who started out with him in the early 1970s (or in my case, the early 1960s) have been excluded from his presence. Their view of the church is, in his eyes, anathema, and so are they. He did not tolerate opposition on this point.

I. Defining the Institutional Church

The church possesses the authority to include and exclude people from the sacraments: “binding” and “loosing.” The Bible teaches that the tithe is judicially grounded solely in the covenantal authority of the church, which in turn is grounded on its unique sacramental monopoly. We see this connection between tithing and sacramentalism in the first biblical example of tithing: Abraham’s tithe to Melchizedek, the priest of Salem, who gave Abraham bread and wine (Gen. 14:18). It was not Melchizedek’s office as king of Salem that entitled him to Abraham’s tithe; it was his priestly status, which authorized him to distribute the positive sanction of Holy Communion: bread and wine. Rushdoony discusses Melchizedek briefly, but only with respect to the authority of the priesthood generally; he does not mention the tithe or Holy Communion.⁶⁰

What is noticeable about Rushdoony’s avoidance of any clear definition of the church is that he long refused to define the institutional church as the exclusive source of the sacrament of the Lord’s Supper. Instead, he focused on the church in the broadest sense, i.e., the kingdom of God. He wrote in Law and Society: “Second, the church is the City or Kingdom of God. It is thus more than any church (as we call it) or state can be. The boundaries of God’s church include every ‘church,’ state, school, family, individual, institution, etc. which is un- der Christ's royal law and rule. But it includes far, far more."⁶¹ Notice that he placed church in quotation marks when referring to institutional churches—organizations possessing the authority to excommunicate. He did not do this with the following words: state, school, family, individual, institution. Do these quotation marks indicate an underlying contempt for local institutional churches?

59. Ibid., p. 8.

60. Rushdoony, Law and Society, p. 368. He did not mention Melchizedek in Volume 1 of the Institutes.

What, then, of the lawful role of the institutional church? Until Systematic Theology, he had avoided dealing with two crucial issues: a judicially binding ecclesiastical hierarchy and the uniquely sacramental nature of the church. The real issue is this: the church as an oath-bound, covenantal, hierarchical institution whose elders possess the power to excommunicate those who rebel against church authority. Rushdoony carefully avoided a covenantal-judicial definition of the church, substituting a functional definition. "It should be apparent by now that our concern is less with the church as an institution and more with the church as the witness to and the evidence of the life and the work of the triune God in history."⁶² In Law and Society, he wrote: "Very clearly, the church in Scripture means the Kingdom of God, not merely the worshipping institution or building. . . . It includes godly men and their possessions, and the earth they subdue in the name of the Lord."⁶³ He then launched into a chapter titled, "Church Imperialism." It is a long attack on bishops and church hierarchy, which he insisted are pagan in origin: "ecclesiastical totalitarianism."⁶⁴

J. Familism

In Chapter 75, "Kingdom Courts," he returned to his fundamental social theme: familism. He had already equated the church with the kingdom of God. "In the Kingdom of God, the family is in history the basic institution."⁶⁵ The unique, central social institution is not the institutional church, he insists; rather, it is the family. The family possesses an authoritative court, he insisted—indeed, the authoritative court in history. In contrast, Rushdoony rarely discussed in Law and Society the existence of authoritative church courts except in the context of family courts, which possess superior authority, he said, since the pattern of all government is based on the family. Jethro's hierarch-

61. Ibid., p. 337.

62. Rushdoony, Systematic Theology, p. 777.

63. Ibid., p. 337.

64. Ibid., p. 341.

65. Ibid., p. 343.

ical appeals court in Exodus 18 “utilized an already existing family office, the eldership. The elders are mentioned before Jethro speaks, in Exodus 18:12. They were heads of families, clans, and tribes.”⁶⁶ Notice that Rushdoony adopted the term elder, used in the New Testament to designate an ecclesiastical office, to identify what he insists was a “family office, the eldership.” This was a denial of what he had written in the Institutes: “The elder, first, was what the name indicated, an order man in a position of authority. The elder was comparative, so it could mean a man ruling over his household.”⁶⁷ What it could mean, he said in 1973, it always means, he said in 1984. He went on: “Scripture gives us the basic ingredients for success: the godly family, and the system of elders.”⁶⁸ In his chapter, “The Theology of the Family,” he wrote that “the family is a community, the central community. . . . The family is the Kingdom of God in miniature when it is a godly family. . . .”⁶⁹ It is God’s civilization.

1. No Evidence Offered

To prove this, he offered no evidence. There is no verse in the New Testament that refers to elder as the head of a family. Luke 15:25 refers to an older son. Presbuteros usually refers to a church office. Bauer’s definitive lexicon offers no example of presbuteros as a head of family, either in the New Testament or Greek literature. The word means what it means in English: older.⁷⁰ This grammatical assessment is supported by the long entry in Kittel’s Theological Dictionary of the New Testament.⁷¹ Rushdoony in 1984 rested his argument on an assertion for which there is no grammatical evidence.

He then compounded his error: “Another office, that of deacon, is the name for a family servant.”⁷² Not according to Bauer or Kittel, it isn’t. It means simply servant. It usually refers in Greek literature to someone who waits on a table, just as its context indicates in Acts 6. The author in Kittel lists six general uses for the term in the New Testament: waiter at a meal, servant of a master, servant of a spiritual

66. Ibid., p. 368.

67. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 740.

68. Rushdoony, Systematic Theology, p. 369.

69. Ibid., p. 389.

70. Walter Bauer, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, trans. William F. Arndt and F. Wilbur Gingrich, 4th ed. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1952] 1957), pp. 706–7.

71. Kittel, vol. VI, pp. 651–83.

72. Rushdoony, Systematic Theology, p. 683.

power, servant of Christ, servant of God, servant of the church. He offers no example of household servant.⁷³ It is always dangerous to base an important theological point on an appeal to grammar. It is sometimes legitimate, but risky. When you do this, make sure there is at least some grammatical evidence.

2. Training in the Family

Why should the family be regarded as the “kingdom of God in miniature”? Why not the state? Why not the church? The fact is, there is no “kingdom of God in miniature”—no single institution that uniquely represents God’s kingdom. The kingdom of God is the holy realm of God’s dominion in history through formal covenanting by His people and their faithfulness in extending this dominion.

Rushdoony insisted on the judicial separation of the New Testament office of elder from the institutional church. “Moreover, there is no reason to restrict Paul’s counsel concerning the election of elders (or bishops) to the institution for worship. Paul’s church is the Kingdom of God, the assembly of the redeemed. His counsel sets forth the requirements for eldership in every realm, church, state, school, etc.”⁷⁴ With such a broad definition of elder as a ruler in general, the eldership loses its sacramental character. This was Rushdoony’s oft-stated goal: the de-sacramentalization of the institutional church.

There are two enormous theological risks inherent in such a view of the church: (1) the attempted de-sacramentalization of society, i.e., secular humanism; (2) the attempted sacramentalization of either state or family. The fact is, sacramentalization is an inescapable concept. It is always a question of which institution becomes elevated to sacramental status. Unfortunately, Rushdoony did not understand that sacramentalization is an inescapable concept. He sought to de-sacramentalize the institutional church, but he remained silent about any substitute. He did not see the Lord’s Supper as an ecclesiastical matter, but rather fundamentally a family matter: “The central sacrament of the Christian faith is a family fact, a common sharing of bread and wine from the Lord’s Table.”⁷⁵

Which institution becomes the prime candidate for sacramentalization in place of the church? In Rushdoony’s theology, there is no pos-73. Kittel, vol. II, pp. 88–89.

74. Ibid., pp. 368–69.

75. R. J. Rushdoony, “The Life of the Church: I Timothy 5:1–2,” Chalcedon Report (Jan. 1992), p. 15.

sibility of the sacramentalization of the state, but why not the family? Rushdoony moved dangerously close to this conclusion. In between his assertion of the family as the kingdom of God in miniature and his discussion of the office of elder as “first of all a family office,”⁷⁶ this disconcerting statement appears: “Our regeneration establishes a union with the Lord. Our every sexual act is an essential step which makes us a member of the other person.”⁷⁷

Rushdoony needed to qualify his language covenantally. It is legitimate to describe Christ’s love for His church as the love of a husband for his wife, as Paul does in Ephesians 5:23–33, but not when you begin with a theory of the church as an extension of the family. Also, not when you personally refuse to take the sacrament of the Lord’s Supper, for this refusal raises the issue of a substitute sacrament. Biblically, there is no form of covenant renewal for the family except through membership in the institutional church and participation in the Lord’s Supper. But if the uniquely sacramental character of the institutional church is denied, then what is to prevent the substitution of sexual bonding for the Lord’s Supper?

There is no court of earthly appeal beyond the family, Rushdoony said. Here is his defense of patriarchy—and therefore of clannism. “The strength of family government is that the godly family, while having numerous problems and disputes, settles these within its own circle. The family is the institution of strength. To go outside the family is to deny the family and to break it up.”⁷⁸ This means the divine right of the family—no earthly appeal beyond it, either to church or state. Although he never mentioned the word, this is the divine right of the patriarch. He presented this novel thesis as an exegesis of I Corinthians 6:1–8, where Paul enjoins members of the Corinthian church not to go before pagan civil courts. In short, he argued for the divine right of the individual against the institutional church (the tithe issue), but not against the hierarchical family.

3. The Family as the Central Institution

His Systematic Theology makes his familiocentrism explicit. “The family is central to the covenant and therefore to every Christian institution, church, state, school, and all things else.”⁷⁹ Rushdoony again

76. Law and Society, p. 389.

77. Idem.

78. Ibid., p. 345.

79. Rushdoony, Systematic Theology, p. 678. The chapter seems to have been writ-cited Exodus 18 to prove his contention that the family is the central institution. Exodus 18 established a hierarchical chain of appeals courts. The problem for Rushdoony's argument is that this was civil government. It did not apply explicitly to Aaron, the priest. It applied to the tribes. Rushdoony insisted that "both the synagogue and the church were ruled by elders; obviously both saw this as God's requirement."⁸⁰ With no footnote, he inferred from unnamed extra-biblical sources that only elders served as leaders of the synagogue. There is no biblical evidence about the synagogue, presumably a post-exilic institution. But even if this eldership was required, this does not lead to his conclusion, namely, "The office of elder was more than tribal: it originated in the family; the head of the family was its elder. God thus ordained that the family be the nucleus of government."⁸¹ Where does it say in the Bible that only family heads may be civil rulers? Nowhere. Rushdoony did not cite a single biblical law to support his contention. Fact: Samson was an unmarried civil judge for many years.

What about the church? Here, there is biblical evidence that a man must be a successful ruler of his own household before being ordained by a church as a minister of the gospel, a point Paul made clear (I Tim. 3:1–11).⁸² This no more makes the family the nucleus of all government than a requirement that a man must be able to read in order to vote in a civil election makes literacy the nucleus of all government. The family is a training ground for learning how to govern. There is nothing revolutionary in this observation. The church is to use the family as a surrogate. If a man cannot rule well in his family, Paul said, do not make him a leader in the church. The odds are against his success. That this requirement governs ordination to the pastorate is clear to everyone except seminary professors and churches that ordain unmarried seminary graduates. They have substituted term papers for family rule as the screening criteria. This has been disastrous for the church.

First Timothy 3 does not make the family the nucleus of all government. Self-government is the nucleus of all government. This is why there will be a day of final judgment in which each person will be judged by God. God will not ask where your parents are, or your chil-ten prior to 1984.

80. Ibid., p. 680.

81. Idem.

82. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 3.

dren, or your ministers, or your rulers. God will ask only what you thought of His son, Jesus. The reason why Paul specified the family as the screening institution is that family government makes visible a man's skills of self-government in the context of a nearly universal hierarchy. There are more heads of families than heads of civil government. If the family were the nucleus of all government, somewhere in the Bible there would be a law making marriage a requirement for civil office. Nowhere does such a law appear. But Rushdoony's commitment to patriarchy was greater than his commitment to biblical law. Hence, he wrote in 1984: "The biblical form of government requires that men and the families be trained to govern. The basic government is on the family level, and all other forms of government rest thereon."⁸³

In Politics of Guilt and Pity (1970), he wrote: "The basic government is man's self-government. Other governments of man include the family, the church, the school, his business, and many private associations as well as public opinion."⁸⁴ This was the ideal of government that had attracted his early associates. In Institutes of Biblical Law, he also began with self-government under God. "Government means, first, self-government, then the family, church, state, school, calling, and private associations as well as much else."⁸⁵ But later in the book, and perhaps three years later in terms of when he wrote this passage, he began to modify his earlier position. "The basic government of man is the self-government of Christian man."⁸⁶ A hint of a shift in his perspective immediately followed: "The family is an important area of government also, and the basic one. The church is an area of government, and the school still another."⁸⁷ Notice: he used the word basic for both self-government and family government. This equality could not survive indefinitely. In Systematic Theology, he moved the family to first place. This was a major shift away from his original theology. He now placed an institution at the center of both his social theory and his theology; before, his social theory had rested on the principle of self-government under God's law. This proposed central institution is not the church. It is the church's oldest rival, the one Jesus had warned against most strongly (Matt. 10:34–37).

83. Rushdoony, Systematic Theology, p. 681.

84. Rushdoony, Politics of Guilt and Pity (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1970] 1995), p. 144. (<http://bit.ly/pogap>)

85. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 240.

86. Ibid., p. 772.

87. Idem.

K. The Rhetoric of Contempt

Rushdoony in 1991 delivered a lecture, "Reconstructing the Church," at the Third International Conference on Christian Reconstruction, held in England. He briefly summarized the traditional Protestant and Reformed three-fold definition of the church: orthodox preaching, administering the sacraments, and disciplining. He called this definition "reductionism."⁸⁸ Its limitation, he said, is that it focuses on the institutional church, not the members and their responsibilities. He then quoted William Booth, founder of the Salvation Army—a worldwide parachurch organization that closely resembles a church but does not offer the sacraments. Rushdoony favorably cited Booth's description of the late-nineteenth-century church in England as a "mummy factory."⁸⁹ This was a clever remark made by a "General" whose organization's publicly recognized symbols are neither the cross of Christ nor a communion cup but instead are: (1) a large bass drum beaten by a lady wearing a funny hat; (2) a black cooking pot and a hand-wrung bell jingling for our cash each Christmas. Let me say it early: the church has never been a mummy factory. This truth was learned by the Pharaoh of the exodus, who never became a mummy. He drowned instead. Local churches may produce some spiritual mummies in certain eras, but the church is God's bride. Rushdoony's rhetoric here is suicidal.

What is extremely significant is this: in his earlier days, Rushdoony had forthrightly affirmed the familiar three-part definition of the church, defending all three points as crucial in the war against humanism. In his 1983 book, Salvation and Godly Rule, he included a chapter on "Outlaw Cultures." The essay's internal evidence indicates that it was written in 1972.⁹⁰ Rushdoony wrote eloquently and to the point

88. R. J. Rushdoony, "Reconstructing the Church," Calvinism Today, II (July 1992), p. 24.

89. Idem.

90. Whenever Rushdoony included newspaper citations, the date of the latest citation is probably close to the time he wrote the essay. Prior to his move to Vallecito, California, in 1975, he threw out his lifetime collection of newspaper clippings. (What I would have paid for this collection had I known in advance he intended to trash it!) The chapter cited a local Southern California newspaper, The San Gabriel Tribune: June 26, 1972. He had many disciples in the San Gabriel Valley in this period. One of the attendees of his evening lectures in Pasadena (in the San Gabriel Valley), held in the late 1960s, probably sent him the newspaper clipping. There is no footnote reference in the book to anything published later than 1973. So, I think it is safe to conclude that the chapter was written no later than the publication date of Volume 1 of The Institutes: 1973. That he could write these chapters in the early 1970s, several ap-that “the marks of a true church, i.e. a body of worshippers, have been defined for centuries as the faithful preaching of the word of God, the faithful administration of the sacraments, and the application of Biblical discipline. Without these things, we are not talking about the church in any historical or theological sense. Instead, a purely humanistic ideal of a denatured church is given us. Such a church is simply a part of the City of Man and an outlaw institution at war with the City of God.”⁹¹

I agree completely with his excellent summary of the marks of a true church and the humanistic implications of any denial of it. The problem is, nineteen years after he wrote it, eight years after he published it, Rushdoony openly repudiated it, and more than repudiated it: became contemptuous of it, ridiculing it. The transformation of his theology during the 1980s was extensive—a fact not widely perceived by his followers or his critics. He replaced his original commitment to the theology of Calvin and the Protestant reformers with something resembling Anabaptism—and, in some cases, theological liberalism, as we shall see. This transformation centered in his doctrine of the church, but it was not confined to it.

In 1977, Rushdoony adopted sharp rhetoric regarding amillennial though theologically orthodox churches. In a 57-page book titled, God's Plan for Victory: The Meaning of Postmillennialism, he referred to the mythical “Orthodox Pharisees Church” (p. 9), whose initials were OPC, the same as the Orthodox Presbyterian Church. Rushdoony had openly begun to burn his ecclesiastical bridges behind him. He never stopped burning them. This is what I call the Roger Williams syndrome: no church meets his standards. He finds himself worshipping in smaller and smaller settings, always led by himself. At the end of his life, it was only family members and employees of Chalcedon who regularly attended his Bible studies—or, as he had called them parently in late 1972 and early 1973, while he was completing the manuscript of The Institutes, indicates his continuing productivity in 1970–73 period.

Compare the tightly written chapters in Volume 1 with those in Volume 2, Law and Society (1982), whose newspaper citations cluster noticeably around 1976–77. These post-1973 chapters are shorter, relying heavily on footnote references to Bible commentaries and religious encyclopedias, with few references to scholarly journals and scholarly monographs: a visible contrast with the footnotes in his pre-1974 books. The theological structure and integrating theme of Law and Society are difficult to discern, unlike Volume 1. With 160 brief chapters plus appendixes, it could hardly be otherwise.

91. R. J. Rushdoony, Salvation and Godly Rule (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1983), p. 160. (<http://bit.ly/rjrsagr>) only after late 1991, church worship services.

Having invoked the phrase “mummy factory” with respect to the modern church, he then rallied to the defense of parachurch ministries, referring to “the common and contemptuous use of the term parachurch. . . . People who rail against parachurch activities want to limit Christ’s work to what they can control.”⁹² Well, that all depends. If the particular parachurch ministry deliberately and self-consciously conducts pseudo-worship meetings but without the sacrament of the Lord’s Supper during the hours when churches normally conduct worship meetings—the Salvation Army comes to mind, as does Chalcedon’s Bible studies (1968–1991)—then the critics have a legitimate complaint. Also, if a parachurch ministry actively solicits tithes that belong solely to the institutional church, then the critics have a legitimate complaint: opposing the theft of the tithe by interlopers. The issue is to be decided by an appeal to God’s revealed word, not to rhetoric, i.e., the institutional church as a “mummy factory.”

L. A Question of Jurisdiction

What Rushdoony ignored after 1973 should be obvious to anyone with any familiarity with the West’s judicial theology and Reformation history. Protestantism’s definition of the church as an institution was a means of identifying the church’s lawful jurisdiction. That is to say, the traditional Protestant definition places judicial boundaries around the church as an institution—a major goal of the Protestant Reformation, especially the limiting of the sacraments to baptism and the Lord’s Supper. Like the U.S. Constitution’s limitation of the national government’s jurisdiction, this traditional Protestant definition was designed to place boundaries around what the institutional church could rightfully claim as its area of legitimate covenantal authority. It is no more meaningful to criticize the familiar three-fold definition of the institutional church—i.e., that this definition does not describe what church members should do—than it is to criticize the U.S. Constitution because it does not specify what citizens are supposed to do. The judicial question is this: What is the institutional church authorized by God to do as His designated monopoly?

It is therefore misleading—I would call it deliberately, self-consciously subversive—for a theologian of Rushdoony’s stature to criticize the traditional Protestant definition of the institutional church on this basis: that the definition does not tell us what church members are supposed to do. Church members can and should do lots of wonderful things; but they can also avoid doing lots of wonderful things and still remain members in good standing—and not be contemptuously dismissed as mummies. The judicial issue is what is crucial here: defining what the institutional church must do in order to be a faithful covenantal organization under God. At this absolutely crucial point in his theology, Rushdoony in 1991 abandoned historic Protestantism's judicial theology in favor of a definition of the church based on "fellowship" and "good works"—the traditional view of theological liberalism.

92. R. J. Rushdoony, “Editorial,” Chalcedon Report (April 1993), p. 2.

Having misled his readers on this point, Rushdoony then went on to mislead them even more. He said that the church must perform the Great Commission: establish the crown rights of King Jesus, baptize nations, and teach them to obey God's word. Notice: not one reference to the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. While Matthew 28:18–20 mentions only baptism, the establishment of the church requires the Lord's Supper. Any theologically accurate discussion of the Great Commission must assume the accuracy of the three defining judicial marks of the institutional church. But if you have just ridiculed the institutional church as a mummy factory, your reader may not notice what you are really doing: removing respect for the judicial authority of the institutional church as the sole legitimate source of the sacraments. Was this Rushdoony's goal in 1991? I think it was. Rushdoony in mid-1991 had not taken the Lord's Supper, except when lecturing at some distant church, for over two decades.⁹³

93. You cannot take the Lord's Supper if you do not attend a local church. Rushdoony attended no local church except as a guest lecturer after he ceased preaching for the Anglican Orthodox Church in the mid-1960s. I attended Chalcedon's Sunday meetings from the beginning, though irregularly, 1965–71. I was employed by Chalcedon, 1968–81, and I spoke at its meetings each month, 1973–75, as did Greg Bahnsen. Not once did Rushdoony offer the Lord's Supper at a Chalcedon meeting when I was in attendance during the years that I attended them or spoke at them. David Graves, who tape recorded every Chalcedon weekly meeting from 1972 to 1981, stated in writing that never was the Lord's Supper served at any Sunday Chalcedon meeting. I reprinted Mr. Graves statement in Tithing and the Church, p. 150. I mention this in response to Rushdoony's insistence that there is no evidence for any accusation against his ideas regarding communion, and that those people who say such critical things must "provide evidences of the charges," and if they refuse, they should be denounced "as liars and slanderers, because they cannot produce the evidences." Rushdoony said that he would no longer answer questions about this matter. Rushdoony, "Random Notes," Chalcedon Report (Oct. 1993), p. 31. I can hardly blame him for not answering: the truth is embarrassing.

M. The Legal Basis of the Tithe

The judicial foundation of the tithe is not its supposedly primary role as an aspect of dominion; it is rather based on the church's covenantal role as the monopolistic guardian of the sacraments, which establishes its possession of the keys of the kingdom. In this sense, the church's authority is the same as the Levites' authority under the Mosaic covenant: guardian of the holy. Its ultimate means of discipline is excommunication: separating former members from the communion table. There is no church authority apart from the sacraments. Remove respect for the sacraments, and you thereby remove respect for church discipline. This has been the pattern of modern fundamentalism, and Rushdoony was in this regard a dedicated fundamentalist, not a Calvinist. Calvinism is not merely a belief in predestination. Luther believed in predestination (The Bondage of the Will), but he was surely not a Calvinist. Luther and Calvin divided over the issue of the Lord's Supper: a sacramental issue. Calvin devoted the longest section of his Institutes to a study of the church: Book IV. Break with Calvin on his doctrine of the church, and you have broken with Calvin. This is what Rushdoony did. This is a major reason why Rushdoony's theology is rejected without a fair hearing by pastors and theologians within the Calvinist world. They see him for what he was after 1980: an ecclesiastical independent who happens to believe in predestination and infant baptism.

N. Dominion and Subordination

The requirement to exercise dominion is a requirement to seek a profit. On this point, see Jesus' parable of the talents (Matt. 25:14–31),⁹⁴ which immediately precedes His description of the final judgment. The tithe is paid out of the net increase of our efforts. In short: no increase = no tithe. Individuals and families produce net increases; churches, at best, invest excess funds in profit-seeking, non-church endeavors. The family, not the church, is the primary agency of dominion, and because of this, the family is not granted any economic entitlement by God. The church is entitled to the tithe; non-church agencies are not. Dominion has nothing to do judicially with the God-given authority to collect the tithe. Dominion does have something to do with paying the tithe, however: a public acknowledgment of one's institutional subordination to God's church.

94. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 47.

That Rushdoony wrote of tithing and dominion as judicially linked, and then announced that the church is not a productive institution, points to his anti-ecclesiastical conclusion: a denial that the institutional church has a legitimate claim on the tithe. But the fundamental topic is not tithing and dominion. Rather it is tithing and subordination. When we get this clear, and only then, should we begin to consider the next topic, subordination and dominion.⁹⁵ Only to the degree that Christians are subordinate before God through membership in His institutional church are they fully empowered by God to extend His comprehensive dominion. Subordination (point two of the biblical covenant model) precedes dominion (point three). Rushdoony denied this covenantal reality in his writings and his actions after 1974.

Rushdoony defended his view by separating the Levites' sacramental function from their cultural and social functions. He argued that the Levites performed many social services, "providing godly education, music, welfare, and necessary godly assistance to civil authorities."⁹⁶ Thus, Rushdoony concluded, it was their provision of these social services that justified their collection of the tithe. They did not possess a legal claim on the tithe, Rushdoony argued. If they failed to provide these cultural services, Israelite church members had an obligation to cut them off financially. They still do, he insisted.

It is worth noting that this view of church authority is shared by the modern American liberal. The modern liberal's acceptance of the idea of tax exemption is based on his theory of useful social services. The liberal allows the state to grant tax exemption to churches on the same basis that it grants tax exemption to non-profit, government-chartered charitable foundations such as Chalcedon. The liberal categorically rejects any suggestion that the Trinitarian church is automatically tax-immune, based on its separate covenantal status as a God-ordained government—a government that possesses the authority to impose judicial sanctions.⁹⁷ Analogously, Rushdoony regarded the church as having no lawful claim to Christians' tithes based on its separate covenantal status as a God-ordained government that possesses the authority to impose judicial sanctions. In his theology, the church has no legal claim on members' money greater than their desire to support it because of the social services it provides them. In short, Rushdoony's theology of the church's claim on the tithe is the same as the liberal's theology of the church's claim to tax exemption. They both ask the church the same question: "What have you done for society lately?"

95. Gary North, "Dominion Through Subordination," Biblical Economics Today, XV (Aug./Sept. 1993). (<http://bit.ly/gndts1993>)

96. Rushdoony, "The Foundation of Christian Reconstruction," in Tithing and Dominion, p. 9.

97. A former employee of Chalcedon, Rev. Douglas F. Kelly, made the case for the church's tax immunity: "Who Makes Churches Tax Exempt?" in Christianity and Civilization, No. 3 (1983). (<http://bit.ly/CRtheology>)

"This tithe belongs to God, not to the church, nor to the producer."⁹⁸ This observation is irrelevant for any discussion of the tithe. Of course the tithe belongs to God; everything belongs to God (Ps. 50: 10). The question is this: What institution possesses the God-given monopolistic authority to collect the tithe from covenant-keepers? That is, which institution possesses the God-given authority and responsibility to revoke voting membership for any head of household who refuses to pay a tithe? The biblical answer is obvious: the church. Rushdoony disagreed with this answer. He wanted to remove from the institutional church any legal claim to the tithe.

He raised the spurious issue of an apostate church in order to destroy the legal claim of all churches: "It cannot be given to an apostate church without being given thereby against God, not to Him."⁹⁹ This is quite true; it is therefore an argument for a person to leave an apostate church. In fact, the best indicator to a church member that he should transfer his membership to another church is that he can no longer in good conscience pay the tithe to the church that now possesses lawful authority over him. The individual has the God-given authority and responsibility to decide which church to join; he does not have the authority to decide not to tithe to this church. But in a world filled with non-tithing Christians, Rushdoony's doctrine of church and tithe finds many supporters.

O. Church and Kingdom

Rushdoony argued that the individual has the God-given authority to decide where his tithe money should go. As a statement of the God-delegated authority of the believer, this is true, but only in a very specific and limited way: his authority to transfer his membership to another congregation. But Rushdoony was not talking about this form of conscience-based authority before God. The decision Rushdoony speaks of is a decision made not on the basis of where the Christian chooses to have his local church membership, but rather on the basis of the Christian's assessment of the broadly defined cultural performance of the church's officers. "The priests and Levites, to whom it [the tithe] was originally given, had charge of religion, education, and various other functions."¹⁰⁰ The tithe, he said, must constitute the financing of every aspect of Christian reconstruction, not just the preaching of the word and the administration of the sacraments: "But the law of the tithe makes clear it is God's money and must go to God's causes, to Christian worship, education, outreach, and reconstruction. . . . And the tithe must bear the whole burden of Christian reconstruction."¹⁰¹

98. Rushdoony, "Tithing and Christian Reconstruction," Tithing and Dominion, p. 3.

99. Idem.

This is clearly incorrect. Everything that a person owns is supposed to be devoted to Christian reconstruction: heart, mind, soul, and capital. The tithe is only one-tenth of one's net increase. It is a token of our subordination as a holy priesthood to God as the Cosmic Owner, not the primary fund for reconstruction. He continued: "What we must do is, first, to tithe, and, second, to allocate our tithe to godly agencies. Godly agencies means far more than the church."¹⁰² The Levites provided education, music, and so forth. "The realm of the godly, of the Christian, is broader than the church. To limit Christ's realm to the church is not Biblical; it is pietism, a surrender of Christ's kingship over the world. The purpose of the tithe must be to establish that kingship."¹⁰³

It is clear why Rushdoony refused to cite the texts in Numbers that established the legal basis of the claim of the Levites to the tithe. These passages explicitly link the tithe to the office of ecclesiastical guardian. It was not the Levites' social services that entitled them to the tithe; it was their boundary service as the tabernacle's and temple's agents of execution: guardians of what was sacramentally holy.¹⁰⁴

1. A Comprehensive Kingdom

Rushdoony made a valid Protestant point: the kingdom of Christ is larger than the institutional church. As he said, limiting the kingdom to the institutional church is indeed the essence of pietism. But he cre-

100. Idem.

101. Ibid., p. 5.

102. Rushdoony, "The Foundation of Christian Reconstruction," ibid., p. 9.

103. Idem.

104. North, Sanctions and Dominion, ch. 3.

ated great confusion in his own mind and his followers' minds by equating the tithe and charitable giving to the broader kingdom. This view of the tithe is equally pietistic: it limits the financing of the kingdom. The kingdom of Christ in history is comprehensive. It must be extended by every bit of productivity at the disposal of covenant-keepers.¹⁰⁵ When a Christian makes a profit or earns a wage, all of this is to be earmarked for extending the kingdom of Christ, broadly defined: education, entertainment, the arts, leisure, capital formation, etc.

The kingdom of Christ is not extended primarily by charitable institutions. The kingdom of Christ is extended through dominion, and this is financed by Christians' net productivity. Rushdoony understood this "net productivity" principle with respect to taxation: the state may not lawfully tax capital, only net income. This is why he long opposed the property tax as anti-Christian.¹⁰⁶ But he did not acknowledge that this same principle also applies to the tithe. Neither tithes nor taxes are the basis of dominion; productivity is. That is, growth is the basis of dominion. Where there is no doctrine of progressive dominion in history, there is no doctrine of economic growth.¹⁰⁷ This growth of God's kingdom comes primarily through two processes: (1) the confiscation of Satan's assets through God's adoption of Satan's human disciples; (2) the economic growth enjoyed by God's human disciples, which enables them to redeem the world through purchase.¹⁰⁸

The kingdom of Christ, broadly defined, must be equated with the total efforts of covenant-keepers: heart, mind, and soul. What is my conclusion? First, all of the tithe goes to the local church. Second, gifts and offerings can go to other charities. Third, the kingdom of Christ is extended by total productivity, including economic productivity.

105. Through common grace, it is extended even by covenant-breakers. North, Dominion and Common Grace.

106. He wrote in 1967: "The property tax came in very slowly, and it appeared first in New England, coinciding with the spread of Deism and Unitarianism, as well as atheism. Such anti-Christian men saw the state as man's savior, and as a result they favored placing more and more power in the hands of the state. The South was the last area to accept the property tax, and it was largely forced on the South by post-Civil War era, conservative elements limited it to the county and retained the legal requirement that only owners of real property could vote on the county level." Rushdoony, Chalcedon Newsletter #24 (Sept. 1967). Reprinted in Rushdoony, The Roots of Reconstruction (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1991), p. 606.

107. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988). (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

108. There is a third way: military conquest. But this method of dominion is not primary. It lawful only when it is the result of successful defensive campaigns that produce comprehensive victory in wars launched by God's enemies.

Fourth, total economic productivity, not charity, is the primary economic means of extending God's kingdom in history. This is why God promises long-term economic growth to covenant-keeping societies (Deut. 28:1–14).¹⁰⁹ More wealth per capita should come from covenant-keeping men than is used up by them.¹¹⁰ Covenant-keepers should leave a positive economic legacy to their grandchildren.¹¹¹ “A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just” (Prov. 13:22).

2. Sovereignty

If you want to find out where sovereignty lies in any social system or social theory, you must do two things: (1) identify the sacraments; (2) follow the money.¹¹² In Rushdoony's theology, the kingdom of God is based on a compact between God and the individual Christian. The institutional church is without covenantal authority in this God-and-man compact. Church officers must take whatever they receive from church members and be thankful to the donors for whatever this is. Rushdoony's ecclesiology allows church officers no legitimate institutional sanctions to impose on those members who send all or a portion of their tithe money elsewhere.

The judicial question surrounding the tithe is this: Who lawfully retains sovereign control over the allocation of the tithe? Rushdoony's answer: the individual Christian, not the officers of the church. “The Christian who tithes, and sees that his tithe goes to godly causes, is engaged in true social reconstruction. By his tithe money and his activity he makes possible the development of Christian churches, schools, colleges, welfare agencies, and other necessary social functions.”¹¹³ (And, he might have added, non-profit educational foundations, but this would have appeared self-serving.) He did not mean that Christi-

109. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 68.

110. E. Calvin Beisner, Prospects for Growth: A Biblical View of Population, Resources, and the Future (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, 1990).

111. This is one reason why a Christian should instruct his heirs not to put him on a life-support system once two physicians say that it is unlikely that he will recover. The capital of most estates in the U.S. is used up in the last six months of an aged person's life. It is better to die in bed at home six months early and leave capital behind. Christians must buy back the world, generation by generation. This requires a growing supply of capital.

112. North, Political Polytheism, p. 553.

113. Rushdoony, “Foundation of Christian Reconstruction,” Tithing and Dominion, pp. 8–9.

ans retain ultimate control over the allocation of their tithes by choosing which local congregation to join; rather, they retain immediate allocational authority in their capacity as church members or even as non-church members.

If this were true, then Rushdoony might have asked: What if the Christian can locate no agency that meets his standards of social action? Can the Christian then lawfully tithe to himself in order to fund the doing of his own good deeds? Why not? More to the point, can he set up his own church and tithe to it? As of 1991, Rushdoony apparently believed that this is the case. He claimed that Chalcedon had somehow become a church. (Then what are the members of what was formerly its Board of Trustees: Ruling elders? There was never any restriction against women serving on Chalcedon's Board of Trustees; Rushdoony's wife Dorothy so served when I was a Trustee in the 1970s. Can women now become elders in his new church? Or have Chalcedon's By-Laws been rewritten to exclude women?)

I have argued that tithe money can and should go to all kinds of charitable services, but it is church officers who are invested with the God-given authority to decide which of these endeavors to support and in what proportion.¹¹⁴ Rushdoony asserted that it is the tithepayer's God-given authority to make these decisions. "Since the tithe is 'holy unto the Lord', it is our duty as tithers to judge that church, mission group, or Christian agency which is most clearly 'holy unto the Lord'."¹¹⁵ Rushdoony did not define the holiness of the recipient organizations as legal holiness—a formal, judicial, covenantal, setting apart by God through His written revelation—but rather as social holiness, to be judged by individual tithers. In Rushdoony's ecclesiology, the church cannot bring judgment against individuals who refuse to transfer to the church 10% of their net income; on the contrary, they bring judgment against the church by withholding these funds and sending them elsewhere, such as to a non-profit, Federally tax-exempt, incorporated educational foundation located in central California.

Here is where the rubber of Rushdoony's anti-ecclesiastical worldview¹¹⁶ meets the covenantal road. The primary issue here is authority over money. In Rushdoony's published theology, lawful authority over

114. Because churches have refused to do this, they have forfeited enormous influence and authority in modern culture. See Gary North, "Royal Priests, Tin Cups in Hand," Biblical Economics Today, XIV (June/July 1992). (<http://bit.ly/gnrptc>)

115. Rushdoony, "To Whom Do We Tithe?" Tithing and Dominion, p. 30.

116. Pre-1992. He did not put into print what he believed regarding the institutional church after 1991.

the distribution of the tithe lodges in the individual Christian. He who pays the piper calls the tune, and the piper-payer in Rushdoony's theology of the tithe is the individual Christian. Rushdoony's theory of the proper financing of the kingdom of God is therefore individualistic, despite his affirmations to the contrary.

3. High Priest and King of Kings

The New Testament affirms that Jesus Christ is both King of kings and High Priest. His absolute sovereignty is revealed institutionally in history through the existence of biblically compulsory payments to two covenantal institutions: state and church. The state has a lawful claim on a portion—under 10% (I Sam. 8: 15, 17)—of the productivity of those under its jurisdiction. Why? Because the civil magistrate is a minister of God (Rom. 13:4). The church has a legal claim on 10% of its members' net income. Why? Because church officers are ministers of God. In both cases, the officers' ministerial function is what identifies these two institutions as sovereign. Compulsory taxes go to the kingly institution; members' compulsory tithes go to the priestly institution. Both institutions are covenantal. Both are entitled to a portion of our income. A person can no more legitimately allocate his tithe than he can legitimately allocate his taxes. He does not have the authority to do so; in both cases, he is under the threat of institutional sanctions, meaning he is under the threat of God's sanctions.

It is a major weakness of Rushdoony's social theory that he failed to identify anywhere in his writings the judicial and economic distinctions between Christ as High Priest and Christ as King of kings. The Bible teaches clearly that the tithe is mandatory. It goes to the church, and only to the church. Why? Because Jesus Christ is the high priest after the order of Melchizedek (Heb. 7). In Rushdoony's social theory, Christ's office as High Priest has no institutional sanctions.

In one limited sense, he is correct. The church technically cannot excommunicate people who, like Rushdoony, refuses to join a local congregation or take the Lord's Supper. But the church does not need to bring formal sanctions against those who are self-excommunicated.¹¹⁷ Self-excommunication is excommunication. It is sufficient that the church publicly identify self-excommunicated people as excom-

117. I am not referring to Rushdoony's 1992 anointing of Chalcedon as a church. I am speaking of his published theology and his two-decade absence from a local church and its communion table until 1992, when he began serving communion to himself and his family.

municates. (Rarely does any local church do this.) Church officers who serve the Lord's Supper to such self-excommunicated individuals have denied their holy offices as guardians of the sacraments. It is not surprising that a loose view of the sacraments is normally accompanied by a loose view of the church and a loose view of the tithe.

4. The Chalcedon Foundation

Rushdoony for decades paid his tithe to his own educational foundation, Chalcedon. He did not belong to any local church until early 1991, when he declared Chalcedon to be a church. Problem: his published theology of the tithe rests on a fundamental confusion between the sacramental function of the church and its educational and nurturing function. His published theology of the tithe does not acknowledge the judicial requirement of the individual Christian to finance the sacramental aspect of the kingdom by means of his tithe, and the dominion and kingly aspects by means of voluntary donations above the tithe to non-ecclesiastical organizations.

Prior to 1991, Chalcedon, like the Institute for Christian Economics, was kingly rather than priestly in its calling.¹¹⁸ Neither organization was entitled to any portion of the tithe except at the discretion of churches that collect tithes and then donate the money to either organization. (As the saying goes, "Don't hold your breath.") The donor owes his local church his tithe; he does not possess the authority to allocate his tithe money (priestly, sacramental money) to other organizations. Chalcedon, ICE, and all other parachurch and educational ministries owe it to their supporters to warn them never to send in donations unless they first tithe to a local church.¹¹⁹ This limitation would keep most of them quite tiny to the extent that they are financed by tithes, since very few Christians tithe. Rushdoony in the late 1970s invented a theology of the tithe that justified Chalcedon's collection of part or all of Christians' tithes. This self-interested theological confusion undermined his theology of the kingship of Christ and the dominion covenant.

Rushdoony's theology of the tithe rests on an economic distinction within the calling of the Levites: sacraments vs. social works. The Mosaic tithe, he said, was owed primarily because of the socially important services that were performed by the Levites. Only the 1% going to the priests directly constituted the sacramental portion; 9% went for social services. "Only a handful of Levites were engaged in temple service, as against the vast numbers whose work was instruction (Deut. 33:10)."¹²⁰ Note: his focus is on instruction. This is consistent. Chaldeon until 1991 was a strictly non-profit, government-chartered educational institution.

118. The ICE was legally chartered as a charitable trust, not a foundation.

119. On this point, see my response to John R. Muether in Gary North, Westminster's Confession: The Abandonment of Van Til's Legacy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991), pp. 289–92. (<http://bit.ly/gnwc>)

He has made his views clear, that "nowhere in Scripture is man or the church given the power to require or enforce tithing."¹²¹ On this weak theological reed he built his theology after 1979. (Ironically, it was my tithe to my church that was used to finance the publication of Tithing and Dominion.)

P. A Single Storehouse

The Bible does not speak of multiple storehouses of the tithe; it speaks of only one storehouse. If a society violates this single storehouse principle of the mandatory tithe, it brings itself under God's negative corporate sanctions. If it obeys this principle, it gains God's positive corporate sanctions.

Will a man rob God? Yet ye have robbed me. But ye say, Wherein have we robbed thee? In tithes and offerings. Ye are cursed with a curse: for ye have robbed me, even this whole nation. Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in mine house, and prove me now herewith, saith the LORD of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it. And I will rebuke the devourer for your sakes, and he shall not destroy the fruits of your ground; neither shall your vine cast her fruit before the time in the field, saith the LORD of hosts. And all nations shall call you blessed: for ye shall be a delightsome land, saith the LORD of hosts (Mal. 3:8–12).

Note that the word is storehouse (singular), not storehouses (plural). But this is not how Rushdoony summarized the text: "The tithe was given to the Levites, who stored the animals and grain in storehouses (Mal. 3:10) until they could either be used or sold. It is a silly and self-serving modernism which leads some clergymen to insist that the storehouse is the church. . . . The Levites had very broad functions in Israel: they were the teachers (Deut. 33:10), the musicians, the judges at times, the medical authorities and more; superintending foods and their cleanliness was a part of their duty.”¹²² But the issue is not, in Rushdoony’s phrase, “self-serving modernism.” The issue is the actual text of Scripture. Men must not become self-serving when they read the text of Scripture—liberals or conservatives. The text speaks of a storehouse: singular.

120. Rushdoony, Law and Society, p. 127.

121. Rushdoony, "The Nature of the Church," Calvinism Today (Oct. 1991), p. 3.

What Rushdoony always ignored in this connection was that the Levites protected the place of sacrifice. While they did indeed provide legal advice and other services, the office of Levite was defined in connection to the tithe as a judicial office: guardian of the temple. He then calls self-serving and modernist all those theologians who have identified the storehouse with the church: the receptacle of the tithe. Almost three decades of sending his own tithe to Chalcedon was presumably not self-serving, in his opinion. But those who say that the tithe belongs only to the local church are modernists and pietists. You know: modernists such as John Calvin, who commented on Malachi 3:10 by describing any withholding of the tithe from the priests as a form of sacrilege: “They had been sufficiently proved guilty of rapacity in withholding the tenths and the oblations; as then the sacrilege was well known, the Prophet now passes judgment, as they say, according to what is usually done when the criminal is condemned, and the cause is decided, so that he who has been defrauded recovers his right. . . . Bring, he says, to the repository (for this is the same as the house of the treasury, or of provisions) all the tenths, or the whole tenths. We hence learn that they had not withholden the whole of the tenths from the priests, but that they fraudulently brought the half, or retained as much as they could; for it was not without reason that he said, Bring all, or the whole.”¹²³

Calvin understood exactly what crime against God was involved in withholding the full 10% from the Levites: sacrilege. Paying the priests their tenth of the tithe was not sufficient to avoid the crime of sacrilege, Calvin said. They had to pay the entire remaining nine-tenths to the Levites. Sacrilege is an attack on God’s sacramental institution, the church—an attack on the sacraments. Calvin also understood clearly that the tithe went to the Levites and priests because of their judicial offices as guardians and administrators of the sacraments. This economic entitlement was grounded judicially in the sacraments, and only in the sacraments. Any other duties performed by the Levites and priests were incidental to their administration of the sacraments. Calvin never referred to these supplemental social activities. Rushdoony, in sharp contrast, categorically denies any sacramental authority to the institutional church. He has abandoned the theology of Calvin and the Puritans in the name of Calvin and the Puritans. Rushdoony has moved from Calvinism to Anabaptism. Nowhere is this clearer than in his published view of the tithe.

122. Rushdoony, “The Tithe in Scripture,” Tithing and Dominion, p. 17.

123. John Calvin, Commentaries on the Twelve Minor Prophets, 5 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker, [1559] 1979), V, p. 588.

Q. Rushdoony's Social Gospel

We can see Rushdoony's break with Calvinism in his false distinction between the Levites' task as educators and the place of sacrifice, the sanctuary. "Education was one of the functions of the Levites (not of the sanctuary)."¹²⁴ To prove this supposed separation of religious education from the sanctuary in the Levitical calling, he would have to identify the judicial basis of the Levites' separation from the other tribes in terms of their provision of social services. This cannot be done textually. Numbers 18 is clear, as we have seen: the separation of the Levites from the other tribes was based on their unique access to the temple and its sacrifices. This separation was based on a geographical boundary—legal access to the tabernacle/ temple—and not on their provision of social services, especially educational services.

Is the education of children lawfully a function of the church, the state, or the family? Rushdoony always denied the legitimacy of education by the state, but he was ambivalent regarding the educational authority of church and family. "The Christian school is a manifestation of the visible church, and at the same time, an extension of the home."¹²⁵ But which one possesses institutional sovereignty? Economically, the answer is clear: the agency that funds education. What about judicially? On this point, Rushdoony was ambivalent. But this much is clear: if education was the function of the Levites, and this function was separate from the sanctuary (i.e., the sacrifices), as he insisted was the case, then the Levites as educators were under the authority of families if families paid for education by allocating their tithes. This is exactly what Rushdoony's theology of the tithe concludes. This means that pastors as Levite-educators (i.e., as tithe-re- ceivers) are under the authority of families. Since he denied the sacramental character of the church, he stripped the church of all covenantal authority. It cannot impose sanctions for non-payment of tithes. Once again, we are back to familism-clannism.

124. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 55.

125. Rushdoony, Intellectual Schizophrenia: Culture, Crisis and Education (Philadelphia: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1961), p. 42.

Rushdoony's voluntaristic view of the tithe is shared by most of the modern church and most of its members, which is why the modern church is impotent, both judicially and economically. This is why statism has visibly triumphed in our day. Rushdoony admitted this when he wrote that "the abolition of the tithe has opened the way for truly oppressive taxation by the state in order to assume the social responsibilities once maintained by tithe money."¹²⁶ But he erred once again: the fundamental issue is not money; it is the sacramental character of the church. The fundamental issue is the judicial basis of the local church's claim on 10% of the net productivity of its members. This claim is sacramental-judicial, not social-economic.

Rushdoony always discussed the primary role of the church ("Levites") as a social agency, openly denying its sacramental character. He was wrong, and this single error has produced more harm for the Christian Reconstruction movement than anything else in his writings. He had no respect for the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and it shows. Without covenantal sanctions in history, there could be no covenant: church (keys), state (sword), or family (rod). He tried to strip the institutional church of her lawful negative sanction—excommunication—by stripping divine sanctions from the Lord's Supper. He wrote himself out of the church, 1970–1991, in order to justify his self-excommunication from the church.

In this respect, Rushdoony became a consistent defender of a social gospel. His pietist critics have recognized this, although their view of the tithe is rarely better than his, and their view of the sacraments is only slightly better. Rushdoony's theology does defend gospel preaching as a function of the church, thereby avoiding the liberal version of the social gospel. But the institutional church has three aspects: the preaching of the gospel, the administration of the sacraments, and the authority to police access to the sacraments, i.e., church discipline (the keys of the kingdom). One searches in vain in Rushdoony's writings for even one page devoted to a theological exposition of the discipline of the church. He steadfastly refused to discuss the meaning of the keys of the kingdom. This is why he never published so much as a chapter on the doctrine of the church: sacraments, tithe, and discipline.

126. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 57.

Rushdoony's view of the church is not even remotely Reformed. He used Calvinist phrases, but he long ago abandoned Book IV of Calvin's Institutes. Rushdoony's ecclesiology is completely wrong.

R. The Fatal Flaw in Rushdoony's Theology

Rushdoony began to develop the rudiments of his theology of the tithe in the late 1960s, after Chalcedon had received its tax-exempt status from the U.S. Internal Revenue Service. In The Institutes of Biblical Law (1973), he wrote: "Moreover, the modern church calls for tithing to the church, an erroneous view which cuts off education, health, welfare, and much else from the tithe."¹²⁷ He understood that his view of the tithe transfers power to the members, who are supposedly under no judicial requirement to pay their tithes to the church: "If the church collects the tax, the church rules society; if the state collects the tax, the state rules society. If, however, the people of God administer the tithe to godly agencies, then God's rule prevails in that social order."¹²⁸ The central legal issue is administration: Who has the God-given authority to allocate the tithe? The Bible is clear: the church. Rushdoony was equally clear: the tithe-payer.

1. Judicial Representation

Notice Rushdoony's implicit assumption: because God says that He is entitled to a tithe, a godly society is determined economically by the agent who distributes it. The biblical fact is very different: the judicial status of a godly society is determined covenantally in terms of which agency collects and then distributes the tithe, for this identifies which god rules in society by which representatives. A Christian society is identified biblically by the widespread presence of churches that collect the tithe, i.e., churches that possess and exercise their God-given authority to impose negative sanctions against members who refuse to pay the tithe.

My view is that the proper negative sanction to be used against non-tithing members is their removal from the list of voting members. They would not be allowed to impose sanctions on church officers.¹²⁹ God blesses covenantally faithful societies. Tithing to God's church is a primary mark of covenantal faithfulness. Cause and effect move from law (boundaries) to sanctions (blessings and cursings). But the judicial issue is God's delegated authority: Who owes what to whom? In short, who lawfully holds the hammer? Is the fundamental authority of the kingdom of God primarily economic, with Christian individuals holding the hammer, or is it primarily judicial, with church officers holding it?

127. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 513.

128. Ibid., p. 514.

129. North, Tithing and the Church, ch. 3.

Christians have always acknowledged that individuals owe taxes to the state. Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, Jesus said (Matt. 22:21). The individual does not lawfully decide how his taxes will be spent; the state's officers do. Christians have always acknowledged that Children owe support to parents. This is not optional. Even priests must pay, Jesus said. No priest can escape this obligation by crying, "corban," as if this obligation were a voluntary gift (Mark 7:11–13). (Corban is the Hebrew word used in Leviticus 2:1 to describe the meat [meal] offering, i.e., the second sacrifice.)

Then what about the church? Does the tithe-payer have the God-given authority to decide to pay the tithe to any organization other than the institutional church? No. Paying the tithe to the institutional church is each church member's legal obligation before God. In all three covenantal institutions, paying money is not a matter of choice; it is a matter of legal obligation. The allocation of the money so collected is not the decision of those who pay.

2. Economics or Oath?

Rushdoony misidentified this authority structure. In his view, economics, not God's covenantal law of the church, is determinative: a godly society, he said, is financed by the tithe. Again, his libertarian presuppositions are obvious. He was not exaggerating when he announced on national television in 1987: "I'm close to being a libertarian. . . ."¹³⁰ As he saw it, the success or failure of God's non-profit kingdom institutions will be determined by God's sovereignty by means of the decisions of individual Christians regarding where to pay their tithes—decisions made without any legitimate threat of institutional sanctions from the recipients. Sanctions—positive or negative—are imposed by individual Christians on the recipient institutions; the institutions have no legitimate negative sanctions of their own. The institutional church is described by Rushdoony as being little more than an income-seeking business that competes for the consumers' money. This view of church financing removes the power of the keys from the church. This conclusion is completely consistent with Rushdoony's pre-1991 view of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper: a rite without covenantal sanctions.

130. Bill Moyers, "God and Politics: On Earth as It Is in Heaven," Public Affairs Television (1987), p. 5.

3. Individualism or Familism

Rushdoony's libertarianism and individualism are both visible in his view of the tithe. On this topic, Rushdoony was an economic determinist. He said, in effect: "He who controls the allocation of the tithe controls Christian society. The individual Christian lawfully controls the allocation of the tithe, so he should control Christian society. The institutional church has no lawful authority to compel such payment by any threat of sanctions. Hence, the individual is judicially autonomous in the allocation of the tithe. Only God can impose negative sanctions against him." This is the libertarian theology known as the divine right of the individual. Divine-right theology always rests on a presupposition that someone—the king, the legislature, or the individual—is beyond legitimate institutional sanctions in history. Rushdoony's radical individualism is clearly seen here. He rejected covenant theology in favor of Anabaptist theology.

Rushdoony wrote repeatedly that individualism always leads to statism. The humanist state can compel payment of taxes, can demand obedience, and therefore it possesses divine rights. That is, the humanist state claims autonomy from (and therefore authority over) every rival institution. To challenge such a view of the state, there has to be an appeal to another authority with authority that is equal to the state's in many areas and superior to it regarding the collection of funds from its members. In short, the authority of the church to collect tithes from its voting members prior to the tax collector's extraction of money from church members must be affirmed in civil law. The church must have legal priority over the state's authority in the involuntary collection of money.¹³¹ Only if some other covenantal institution possesses comparable authority over its members' money can we identify an agency with comparable covenantal authority.

131. This is acknowledged implicitly judicially in the U.S. tax code. The taxpayer is allowed to deduct tithes and offerings from his gross income before estimating his income tax (though not his FICA or Social Security tax). He pays income taxes only on the money that remains after charitable giving. This is not true in most European countries, where the state has primary claim on income, with the church taking whatever remains.

Rushdoony's theology of the tithe denies such authority to the church. This leaves only the family as a rival covenantal institution. But, biblically speaking, the family possesses neither the sword nor the keys of the kingdom. This is the fatal flaw of Rushdoony's social theory. Rushdoony's anti-ecclesiastical theology can offer only two futile alternatives to the divine right of the state: radical individualism or patriarchalism-clannism. The state historically has overcome both of these alternatives, from ancient Greece to the present. He pointed this out in The One and the Many. "In early Greek and Roman cultures, paternal power was religious power, a power continuous with all being and essentially divine, requiring duties of the father and conferring him with authority. The father, as Fustel de Coulanges has shown, in The Ancient City, was under law; but, it must be added, he was not only under law but a part of that law and continuous with it in the chain of being. He was thus to a degree the law incarnate, in that he possessed a measure of the ultimate law in his person. This manifestation of law moved steadily from the father to the state, so that the state, originally the creature of the family and of the fathers, made itself the father, and the source of law, with the family turned into its creature."¹³²

By rejecting a sacramental defense of both the church and the tithe, Rushdoony converted his theology into a conservative version of the social gospel. The legitimacy of the church, manifested in Rushdoony's ecclesiology only by its ability to persuade church members to donate money to it, is grounded on the good deeds that churches perform in society. This is the U.S. Internal Revenue's view of non-profit status, the liberal's only reason for allowing the church to escape the tax man.

Rushdoony's view of the church was libertarian. He viewed the church strictly as a voluntary society. In his view, the church is not founded on a self-maledictory oath before God, for such an oath would transfer judicial authority to church officers as God's monopolistic agents. They could then lawfully compel payment of the tithe by members.

His view of church authority creates a divine right of the individual

132. R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1971] 2007), p. 130. (<http://bit.ly/rjroam>)

church member. The individual alone supposedly is God's designated agent who lawfully controls the distribution of the tithe rather than the church's ordained authorities. Beyond him there is no ecclesiastical appeal.

The alternative to a Christian view of society that places the church covenant at the center of its social theory is either a statist view of society or a patriarchal view of society. Rushdoony, faithful to an Armenian heritage that did not survive the second generation of immigrants—his generation—chose the latter view. Patriarchalism cannot survive for even three generations in a society that prohibits arranged marriages and allows easy divorce.

It also cannot survive the biblical view of marriage. It was Roman law, with its intense patriarchalism, that kept the clans alive. The English common law heritage was, from the twelfth century onward, utterly hostile to the revived Roman law's view of marriage and family authority, which steadily gained new respect and power on the Continent.¹³³ That Rushdoony should be regarded as soft on divorce, which in some cases he was,¹³⁴ is ironic: nothing undermines a patriarchal society—the family as sacramental—faster than the widespread acceptance of divorce on demand. His own sad experience with his first marriage, like the similar experiences of his brother and his sister, should have warned him.

Conclusion

The Levitical cultural and social services that Rushdoony lists as the basis of the Levites' reception of the tithe were all subordinate aspects of their primary judicial function: to guard the sacramental boundary around the tabernacle/temple. Secondarily, Levites were to declare God's law and to help the priests administer some of the sacrifices and some of the liturgies of worship—what Rushdoony dismissed as mere "rites." Numbers is clear: the tithe was based on the Levites' sacramental separation from the people—in other words, their holiness. "And, behold, I have given the children of Levi all the tenth in Israel for an inheritance, for their service which they serve, even the service of the tabernacle of the congregation. Neither must the children of Israel henceforth come nigh the tabernacle of the congregation, lest they bear sin, and die" (Num. 18:21–22). I comment on this in Chapter 10 of Sanctions and Dominion.

133. Alan Macfarlane, Marriage and Love in England: Modes of Reproduction 1300–1840 (Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1986), ch. 7: "Who Controls the Marriage Decision?"

134. See North, Tithing and the Church, pp. 156–57.

The New Testament has not abrogated the Old Testament. The church's hierarchical authority is grounded on the same judicial foundation that the Levites' authority was under the Mosaic law: their God-ordained service as guardians of a sacramental boundary. The requirement of each church member to tithe exclusively to the institutional church that lawfully administers the sacraments rests today, as it did in the Mosaic law, on the uniquely sacramental character of the church. The mark of the church's institutional sovereignty is its control over lawful access to the sacraments. This control necessarily involves the enforcement of a boundary: the right to exclude. The church's authority to exclude people from the Lord's Supper is the ultimate judicial basis of its discipline. Excommunication means exclusion from Holy Communion: the Lord's Supper. Because the institutional church possesses this sacramental monopoly, it alone possesses the authority to collect the full tithe of every member.

This authority to exclude is imparted to church officers by means of their possession of the keys of the kingdom. "And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven" (Matt. 16:19). Without access in history to the keys of heaven, there can be no kingdom of Christ in history: no heavenly keys = no earthly kingdom. The keys invoke heavenly sanctions; often, they invoke visible earthly sanctions. A king without sanctions in history is not a king in history. The most important sanctions in history are in the hands of those who control the keys to the kingdom: officers of God's visible church.

Rushdoony poured out his verbal wrath on the institutional church in his attempt to broaden the definition of the church to include the family and non-profit educational institutions, and, in his words, "far, far more."¹³⁵ This is why Rushdoony's view of the visible church has undermined his theology of the kingdom of God in history. Volume 2 of The Institutes of Biblical Law undermines Volume 1. What was a flaw no larger than a man's hand in Volume 1 became a whirlwind in Volume 2. It stripped him of his doctrine of the church covenant—a covenant grounded in an oath before God (baptism)—for every covenant must have negative institutional sanctions. His theology allows no formal negative sanctions for the church. If a Christian can, without consequences, decide not to take the Lord's Supper in a local church for 25 years, then what threat is excommunication? The correct answer is: he cannot do this without consequences. It is an answer Rushdoony refused to accept until 1991.

135. Rushdoony, Law and Society, p. 337.

Rushdoony's view of the tithe stripped him of his Calvinism, for it led to his rejection of the authority of the institutional church. This was a heavy price to pay. It is not easy to be taken seriously as a Calvinist theologian when you promote an Anabaptist or patriarchal view of the Lord's Supper, a Baptist ecclesiology, and a social gospel definition of the church. It would have been far cheaper for him just to have paid a tithe to some local congregation and have been done with it from 1964 until 2001—cheaper, that is, for a person willing to submit himself to another pastor. But, after 1964, Rushdoony refused to do either.

Rushdoony paid a heavy price: the bulk of his life's work is conveniently and illegitimately dismissed by serious churchmen as the work of a theological and personal screwball. By cutting his ties in 1970 with any denomination that was more than a few years old, he forfeited his ability to transfer his intellectual inheritance to someone of his choice. Only the institutional church survives intact until the day of judgment. Only the institutional church offers God-guaranteed covenantal continuity in history. If the institutional church rejects a man's work, then that work cannot stand the test of time. It will be weighed in the balance and found wanting.

To the extent that Rushdoony's work does survive, it will survive only because of the continuity provided by those who remain inside the institutional church, pay their tithes to the institutional church, and receive the Lord's Supper from men who have been lawfully ordained by other lawfully ordained men: the laying on of hands. This is true of every Christian's legacy. If the institutional church refuses to incorporate and develop a man's ideas in history, these ideas will not come to positive fruition in history. If a Christian's spiritual heirs remain peripheral to the institutional church, his legacy will remain peripheral in history. This truth may not seem relevant to a premillennialist or amillennialist who sees the cultural effects of the gospel in history as marginal, but it is extremely relevant to a postmillennialist, or should be.

Contempt for God's institutional church is theologically fatal. God's church is not now, nor has it ever been, a mummy factory. The institutional church, for all her flaws, is God's bride. God has no other.

Appendix C

LEAVEN AS EXCLUSIVELY EVIL

Another parable spake he unto them; The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took, and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened (Matt. 13:33).

The Dominionist interpreters constantly emphasize the Bible's elaborate system of symbols. This is the foundation of their whole method of interpretation. But they depart from their own principle when it doesn't serve their purpose. They try to make the symbol of leaven in this parable refer to the Kingdom of God and how it will spread to take dominion over the earth. However, there's one big problem with that interpretation—leaven in the Bible is always used as a symbol of evil's explosive power to spread. It is never used as a symbol of good.

Hal Lindsey (1989)¹

Yeast is a biblical symbol of continuity. It symbolizes growth over time, both of good and evil. If leaven in the Bible referred exclusively to the development of evil, then it could not be a defining characteristic of the kingdom of God. But Matthew 13:33 says that it is such a defining characteristic. Conclusion: it is not, contrary to the dispensationalists, invariably a symbol of evil. Late in his career, Dallas Seminary theologian J. Dwight Pentecost admitted this in the carefully concealed revision of his 1958 book, Things to Come.² But Hal Lindsey is not about to give up this crucial pillar of dispensationalism.

There is a very good reason for Lindsey's emphatic yet theologically insupportable assertion regarding the meaning of leaven. The dispensationalist must deny that the kingdom of God acts in a leaven-like fashion because of his view of the future of the church. If the kingdom of God grows steadily over time, yeast-like, reaching its consummation with Christ's Second Coming at the final judgment, then what of the timing of the so-called "secret rapture" of the church into heaven? This discontinuity is said by dispensationalists to be scheduled a thousand and seven years before the final judgment.³ This is why Dr. Pentecost's revision of Things to Come represents a remarkable surrender of a crucial element of the dispensational position.

1. Hal Lindsey, The Road to Holocaust (New York: Bantam, 1989), p. 47. As an aside, Bantam is located at 666 Fifth Ave., New York City.

2. See below, "Dr. Pentecost's Carefully Concealed Revision."

In contrast, amillennialists and postmillennialists deny that this bodily resurrection into the heavens will be secret. Second, they place it at the end of time, immediately prior to the final judgment. They appeal to Matthew 13, a chapter that utterly destroys the theological case for dispensational premillennialism, for it undermines dispensationalism's principle of historical discontinuity.

A. Continuity and Discontinuity

Matthew 13 denies the central pillar of dispensationalism's view of the future: the cosmic discontinuity of the bodily "rapture" of the saints up to heaven before the millennium, the period in which Jesus will supposedly reign from a throne in Jerusalem. The essence of the New Covenant kingdom in history is continuity, according to Matthew 13; therefore, the monumental historical discontinuity of the premillennial secret rapture⁴ cannot be made to fit within this kingdom continuity.

Consider Christ's parable of the tares and wheat, which is only one part of Matthew 13's defense of the New Covenant era of historical continuity:

Another parable put he forth unto them, saying, The kingdom of heaven is likened unto a man which sowed good seed in his field: But while men slept, his enemy came and sowed tares among the wheat, and went his way. But when the blade was sprung up, and brought forth fruit, then appeared the tares also. So the servants of the householder came and said unto him, Sir, didst not thou sow good seed in thy field? from whence then hath it tares? He said unto them, An enemy hath done this. The servants said unto him, Wilt thou then that we go and gather them up? But he said, Nay; lest while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat with them. Let both grow together until the harvest: and in the time of harvest I will say to the reap-

3. In pre-tribulational premillennialism, by far the most widely held view. In post-tribulational premillennialism, 1,000 years.

4. Hereafter referred to as the Rapture.

ers, Gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them: but gather the wheat into my barn (Matt. 13:24–30).

This parable confused the disciples. They asked Jesus to explain it to them. He did, making it clear that there will be no discontinuity (“Rapture”) before the His Second Coming in final judgment:

He answered and said unto them, He that soweth the good seed is the Son of man; The field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom; but the tares are the children of the wicked one; The enemy that sowed them is the devil; the harvest is the end of the world; and the reapers are the angels. As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire; so shall it be in the end of this world. The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity; And shall cast them into a furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. Who hath ears to hear, let him hear (Matt. 13:37–43).

Loraine Boettner, a postmillennial theologian, in 1958 devoted an entire chapter to this obvious problem in dispensationalism’s exegesis.⁵ He commented forcefully on the clear teaching of Matthew 13: 33, the parable of the leaven: gradualism.

The parable of the leaven teaches the universal extension and triumph of the Gospel, and it further teaches that this development is accomplished through the gradual development of the Kingdom, not through a sudden and cataclysmic explosion. . . . The Kingdom of heaven, like leaven, transforms that with which it comes in contact. All the meal was transformed by its contact with the leaven. Similarly, Christ teaches, society is to be transformed by the Kingdom of heaven, and the result will be a Christianized world. Premillennialists cannot admit this. To do so would contradict their whole system. Hence they seek another meaning, and where Christ says the Kingdom of heaven is like leaven, they say that the leaven is not symbolical of the Kingdom of heaven, but of evil.⁶

He then chided dispensational commentators—self-proclaimed defenders of a literal hermeneutic—for their obvious “spiritualizing” of the plain teaching of Scripture: “We are at a loss to understand how any one professing to take the Bible at face value, particularly those who lay great stress on literal interpretation, can deliberately contradict the words spoken so clearly and unequivocally and make them mean the exact opposite, in this case, false doctrine. These are the very people who protest so strongly against ‘spiritualizing.’ Anyone who can so change the meaning of Scripture can make it mean anything that he pleases.”⁷

5. Loraine Boettner, The Millennium (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1958), ch. 18.

6. Ibid., p. 27.

Without doubt, this is one of the most difficult passages in the Bible for the premillennial views of the Bible. To answer him, dispensationalists need at least a detailed volume. A brief, off-hand remark or two is not sufficient, yet this is all they bother to provide. They do not publicly acknowledge the existence of Boettner’s chapter. Since there is no answer to their exegetical problem except adopting either post-millennialism or amillennialism, one can hardly blame them. (This same criticism—no eschatological discontinuity in the future—applies to all premillennial systems.)

B. The Kingdom as Righteous Leaven⁸

The kingdom of God is like leaven. Christianity is the yeast, and it has a leavening effect on the pagan, satanic culture around it. It is designed to permeate the whole of this culture, causing it to rise. The bread produced by this leaven is the preferred bread. In ancient times—indeed, right up until the nineteenth century—bread was considered the staff of life, the symbol of life. It was the source of men’s nutrition. “Give us this day our daily bread,” we are to ask God (Matt. 6: 11). The kingdom of God is the force that produces the fine quality bread that men seek. The symbolism should be obvious: Christianity makes life a joy for man. It offers the cultural benefits that most men acknowledge as the best (Deut. 4:5–8).

Leaven takes time to produce its positive effect. Leaven requires historical continuity. Men can wait for their leavened bread, for God gives them time sufficient for the working of His spiritual leaven. They may not understand how it works, how its spiritual effects spread through their culture and make it a delight, any more than they understand how yeast works to produce leavened bread, but they can see the bread rising, and they can see the progressive effects of the leaven of the kingdom. They can look into the oven and see risen bread. If we really push the analogy—pound it, even—we can point to the fact that the dough is pounded down several times before the final baking, almost as the world pounds the kingdom; but the yeast does its work, just so long as the fires of the oven are not lit prematurely. If the full heat of the oven is applied to the dough before the yeast has done its work, both the yeast and the dough are burnt, and the burnt mass must be thrown out. But given sufficient time, the yeast does its work, and the result is the bread that men prefer.

7. Idem.

8. For a more detailed exegesis, see Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 12:G–I.

What a marvelous description of God's kingdom! Christians work with the cultural material available, seeking to refine it, to permeate it, to make it into something fine. They know that they will be successful, just as yeast is successful in the dough, if it is given enough time to do its work. That is what God implicitly promises us in the analogy of the leaven: enough time to accomplish our individual and our corporate tasks. He tells us that His kingdom will produce the desirable bread. This will take time. It may take several poundings, as God, through the hostility of the world, kneads the yeast-filled dough of man's cultures, but the end result is guaranteed.

C. Dr. Pentecost's Carefully Concealed Revision

Dallas Theological Seminary long-time professor J. Dwight Pentecost's book, Things to Come,⁹ is the standard academic book in Bible prophecy within dispensationalism. He reversed his views on just this point. Without telling the reader why he reversed himself, or even that he did reverse himself, he abandoned the traditional dispensational interpretation of the parable of the leaven (Matt. 13:33).

His earlier interpretation had followed the lead of C. I. Scofield and all other dispensational theologians of the twentieth century: the key rebuttal of the continuity eschatologies of postmillennialism and amillennialism. Without this theologically crucial rebuttal, it is impossible to defend premillennialism's eschatological discontinuity: the Rapture.

In the original edition (1958) and subsequent editions until the 1987 edition, he defended the traditional dispensational view of leaven as evil. In the original edition, he argued for the eventual triumph of unbelief in this, the "Church Age." He wrote that Jesus' parable of the mustard seed (Matt. 13:31–32) points to the expansion of an evil tree in history, "a monstrosity. . . . The parable teaches that the enlarged sphere of profession has become inwardly corrupt. This is the characteristic of the age" (p. 147). In his exposition of the parable of the leaven, he argued: "This evidently refers to the work of a false religious system. . . . This figure is used in Scripture to portray that which is evil in character. . ." (p. 148). Summarizing, he wrote: "The mustard seed refers to the perversion of God's purpose in this age, while the leaven refers to a corruption of the divine agency, the Word, through which this purpose is realized" (p. 148). Pentecost's focus here was ethics: the progressive triumph of evil through time, during the "Church Age." This could at least serve as the foundation of a dispensational philosophy of history: the defeat of the saints.

9. Dunham Publishing Co., distributed by Zondervan.

Three decades later, he abandoned this view, but very few of his followers are aware of the fact. The 1987 reprint is not a reprint but a strategically revised edition. It is nowhere identified as such. Dr. Pentecost had the typesetter carefully superimpose a crucial revised section. The switch is almost undetectable, yet it is a devastating admission for dispensationalism. Here is his revised exposition of Christ's kingdom during the "Church Age." Mustard Seed: "This part of the parable stresses the great growth of the kingdom when once it is introduced. The kingdom will grow from an insignificant beginning to great proportions" (p. 147). There is not a word about its ethical corruption. Leaven: "When leaven is used in Scripture it frequently connotes evil. . . . Its use in the sacrifices that represent the perfection of the person of Christ (Lev. 2:1–3) shows that it is not always so used. Here the emphasis is not on leaven as though to emphasize its character, but rather that the leaven has been hidden in the meal, thus stressing the way leaven works when once introduced into the meal" (p. 148). In short, there is now no focus on ethics: not one word about any evil effects of either the mustard seed or the leaven. Today his focus is on the growth of the kingdom of Christ in history—a postmillennial focus: "The parable of the mustard and the leaven in meal, then, stress the growth of the new form of the kingdom" (p. 148).

If Christ's kingdom is not being corrupted in our dispensation, then it is either ethically neutral (the kingdom of Christ as ethically neutral!?) or positive. Pentecost's theological problem is obvious: there can be no ethical neutrality. If the necessarily expanding kingdom of Christ is not being steadily undermined by theological and moral perversion, then it must be growing in righteousness. This interpretation is the postmillennial view of the kingdom of God: expansion over time. Matthew 13 is not discussing Satan's kingdom; it is discussing Christ's. Dr. Pentecost has very quietly overthrown the heart and soul of the traditional dispensational system's account of the inevitable progress of evil in what dispensationalists call the "Church Age."¹⁰ Yet no one inside the dispensational camp has been willing to discuss in public the implications of this radical alteration by Pentecost, or explain exactly why it has not, if correct, overthrown the dispensational system.

D. The Parables of Growth

The parables of growth point to a fulfillment of God's plan, in time and on earth. They point to a steady expansion of the leaven of the gospel. They point to an expansion of God's kingdom, in time and on earth, as the leaven makes something edible of the fallen dough of creation. The fallen dough will rise. It takes leaven. It takes kneading. It takes time. But the fallen dough of the cursed creation will rise. God promises this. But Christians still refuse to believe it. When Christ announces "The kingdom of God is like unto. . .," they reply, "Oh, come on, it couldn't be like that. No, it is really like this. . ."

Premillennialists substitute a parable of uprooted wheat (the Rapture). In "pop-dispensationalism," the uprooted wheat is returned to the field seven years later and is replanted, though fully mature and perfect, alongside of the still-maturing tares, and alongside of newly planted wheat.¹¹ Amillennialists, who do believe in historical continuity, have rejected this vision of a premature uprooting, but they have no confidence in Christ's earthly leaven, either. They wind up arguing for the cultural triumph of Satan's earthly leaven. Satan's leaven will steadily push out Christ's cultural leaven, we are told. Only at the final judgment will Christ's return in power instantaneously remove Satan's leaven and instantly fire up the oven, leaving His earthly leaven, the church, to do its work instantly, raising the dough in the midst of the oven. In other words, their view of the leaven of the church violates the parable's analogy, that is, the steady rising of the dough before the oven's final baking.

10. Gary DeMar spotted this shift in early 1992. He looked up Pentecost's section on leaven in the 1987 edition. He found that it was not what Kenneth Gentry had quoted in a newsletter. He telephoned Gentry, who looked it up in the 1958 edition. The two versions differed.

11. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), pp. 152, 255–56, citing Thomas D. Ice and Dave Hunt. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

Both of these millennial approaches are widely held today. Both provide theological justifications for the seeming inability of the church to grow more rapidly than Satan's kingdom does, and also the seeming inability of Christians, as Christians, to provide leadership in any field.¹² Whichever of these two substitutions a man accepts, he has abandoned the analogy of the holy leaven. He has abandoned the principle of godly growth over time. He has abandoned Christ's explicit teaching concerning the true nature of His kingdom. He may deny the continuity of growth (the uprooted wheat scenario). He may deny the continuity of victory (Satan's leaven wins). In either case, Christ's people must fail in their dominion assignment, in time and on earth.

In the second view, Satan's leaven triumphs, and God doesn't even bother to go through the premillennialists' "breathing robot" stage of the church, with the direct rule of Christ, in Person, through His bureaucratic hierarchy of breathing robots. God simply scraps history at the end, wiping out Satan in a cataclysmic example of historical discontinuity. God redeems the earth in an instant, makes His people into fully redeemed, fully perfect dominion men, who now can exercise dominion over a fully redeemed creation. In short, God's people in history never learn how to rule. The garden of Eden was a failure as a training camp for dominion; the land of Canaan was equally a failure as a training ground for dominion; and finally, the church of Jesus Christ, the New Jerusalem, winds up an historical failure as a training ground for dominion. Nothing that God does through His people has worked or can work culturally, given the power of evil in history, so God will at last—at the last—scrap the failed program in an instant and intervene graciously to give His people their comprehensive cultural victory on a platter. Here is a revised version of the New Testament's parable of the mustard seed: just add instant judgment (since time, God's law, and the ethical subordination of Christ's church to the Master obviously failed, and since the preaching of the gospel failed, and since Christian institutions failed), and presto: an instant mustard tree. So much for continuity.¹³

E. John Walvoord's Silence

John Walvoord was the major dispensational theologian of the 12 . The one major exception is the Wycliffe Bible translation organization's linguistics program.

13. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, ch. 6.

twentieth century. He wrote 30 books and served as president of Dallas Seminary from 1953 to 1986. He died in 2002 at age 92. It is not an accident that he refused to comment on Matthew 13:33 anywhere in his book on the Rapture. Neither did he offer any exposition on the meaning of the word "leaven." He had a major problem: explaining the Rapture's discontinuity. He ignored the problem. He wrote that "the truth about the church as the body of Christ has not yet been introduced, as this is not mentioned until Matthew 16:18. Further, the doctrine of the Rapture has not been introduced either, and the disciples were unaware of the truth of the translation of the saints at the end of the church age. Accordingly, the truth presented in Matthew 13 deals with the whole period between the First and Second Advents."¹⁴ In short, the continuity of history predicted in Matthew 13 was annulled by later revelation. Let us put this argument more graphically: Jesus deliberately misled His disciples in Matthew 13. Later, He showed them the truth. This sort of argument is common among theological liberals; it is sad to see a conservative expositor invoke it.

One wonders how Walvoord would answer a Jew who might question him about the doctrine of the Trinity and its apparent absence in the Old Testament. Walvoord probably would reply, "The revelation of the Trinity came after the Old Testament." But that is the Jew's whole point. Such a response does not deal with the fundamental dividing issue. The chronological sequence of revelation is not the issue here; the issue is theological consistency. The key hermeneutical question in both examples—the Trinity and the dispensational Rapture—is this: "Does some later Bible teaching categorically contradict an earlier teaching of the Bible?" The appropriate response for a conservative Bible scholar is to demonstrate that an earlier revelation is not contradicted by subsequent revelation.

This was not Walvoord's approach. He simply asserted that Jesus' teaching on the kingdom came, well, later. But we know that, Dr. Walvoord! That isn't the point. The point is this: the dispensationalists' Rapture doctrine categorically contradicts the plain teaching—literal, I hasten to add—of Matthew 13. The Rapture doctrine asserts the existence of a radical historical discontinuity between Christ's first advent and His coming again in final judgment. Matthew 13 denies such a possibility. This is premillennialism's number-one exegetical problem. It is comparable to amillennialism's inability to explain the Old Testa-

14. John F. Walvoord, The Rapture Question, rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan, 1979), p. 183.

ment's main passage that deals with the New Heaven and New Earth (also mentioned in Revelation 21), Isaiah 65: 17–23.¹⁵

Walvoord wrote that “the truth presented in Matthew 13 deals with the whole period between the First and Second Advents.” Post-millennialists and amillennialists agree entirely: “Second Advent” refers to Christ’s bodily, visible Second Coming at the final judgment. It refers to the end of sin-cursed time. But this cannot be its meaning for dispensationalists, since sin-cursed time does not end during the millennium, even though Christ is said to reign on earth during the millennium. Then what did Walvoord mean by “Second Advent”? The phrase is not listed in the book’s index. We do find “Second Coming,” especially “in contrast to the Rapture,” but unfortunately this reference takes us to the book’s endnotes (pp. 277–78): no comments, just a bunch of assorted notes. The entry for “Second Coming” refers us to page 61, where we read: “At the Second Advent, indeed, there is a gathering together of the church from heaven and the Old Testament saints in resurrection along with elect angels as well as elect on the earth. All elect of all ages converge upon the millennial scene.” This is a reaffirmation of a major discontinuity before the final judgment, when all the dead will be raised from the grave. But we do not need reaffirmations to persuade us; we need detailed exegesis.¹⁶ He provides none.

So, rather than discuss Matthew 13, which is the single most important continuity passage in the New Testament, and which on the face of it categorically denies the possibility of the premillennial Rapture, Walvoord just ignored the problem. The premillennial Rapture doctrine was first presented in the New Covenant, he said, with the doctrine of the church, which itself was tacked onto the kingdom doctrine by Jesus three chapters later, in Matthew 16. So much for Jesus’ teaching on His kingdom’s continuity. Jesus’ supposedly definitive teaching in Matthew 13 regarding the continuity of His kingdom

15. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, pp. 96–106.

16. For over 35 years, the theological leaders of the dispensational movement have contented themselves with a series of brief reaffirmations. Since the late 1970s, they have not given us very many of these. Ever since 1988—no Rapture, yet the 40th anniversary of the founding of the nation of Israel—we have heard very little at all. Since Bahnsen and Gentry destroyed House and Ice’s Dominion Theology: Blessing or Curse? (Portland, Oregon: Multnomah Press, 1988), we have heard nothing. See Greg L. Bahnsen and Kenneth L. Gentry, House Divided: The Break-Up of Dispensational Theology (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gbkg-house>). See also Gary North, Rapture Fever: Why Dispensationalism Is Paralyzed (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1993). (<http://bit.ly/gnfever>) barely survived for three chapters. Walvoord's exegetical strategy does not encourage anyone's confidence in dispensationalism's supposedly literalistic hermeneutic: "literal whenever convenient."¹⁷ The viewpoint's defenders declare that they are hermeneutical literalists, but when pressured, they also invoke symbolism.

F. C. I. Scofield's Denial

Walvoord was following C. I. Scofield's lead. Scofield's comment on the parable of the field is almost beyond belief. Jesus said: "The field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom; but the tares are the children of the wicked one" (v. 38). Message: the field is the world. Scofield said: "The parable of the wheat and tares is not a description of the world, but of that which professes to be the kingdom."¹⁸ Message: the field is not the world. Scofield was saying that Jesus was wrong. This is a very difficult position for a Bible-affirming author to take, but Scofield was a lawyer. He was presenting a typical lawyer's brief. "If the jury must be misled in order to win your case, this is the price a successful lawyer must pay." Lawyers pay it all the time.

1. Denying Christ's Continuous Kingdom

Scofield knew exactly what he had to do: deny the historical continuity of Christ's kingdom. He did this by denying that Jesus had said what Jesus had clearly said, namely, that the historical arena of Satan's deception is the world. Scofield's approach is the corrupt lawyer's tactic of the deliberate misrepresentation of fact. The preposterous nature of his comment should not be regarded as evidence of Scofield's intellectual incompetence. Lawyer Scofield was smart; he was also consistent: driven to this deceptive tactic by the inescapable logic of his position. He understood his jury. The jury for almost a century has remained silent about this obvious misrepresentation. His successors have not deviated from his interpretation. The dispensational theologians who edited the New Scofield Reference Bible (1967) left this note intact, word

17. Some reader may ask in a generation or two: "Why is North kicking this dead theological horse?" Answer: because in my day, this horse is indeed theologically brain-dead at the seminary level, but its body—local churches comprising millions of fundamentalists—is still kicking. I am trying here to give it a decent Christian burial. I am burying it with Scripture.

18. C. I. Scofield, The Scofield Reference Bible (New York: Oxford University Press, [1909] 1917), p. 1015n.

for word.¹⁹ They could not give up this note without abandoning the whole dispensational system. If the field is the world, then the world will never experience any discontinuity in the middle of New Covenant history so radical as the premillennial Rapture: the tearing out of the wheat, dispensationalism teaches (in open contradiction of the text), rather than the tares. They abandoned a great deal in their revisions of Scofield's notes, but not this. The price was too high.

The meaning of leaven is continuity and growth. This dual process refers to history: the kingdom of God. Yet this is what has always been denied by dispensationalism. The traditional dispensational view is that while leaven does refer to growth, this growth is the growth of evil. If good also grows, then a central pillar of dispensational theology collapses, and with it the central pillar of dispensational social ethics (meaning a theologically rigorous absence thereof). If good increases, then the Christian social theorist must answer two questions: (1) What is the legal basis in society of this progressive social good? (2) How is this progressive social good to be achieved? Dispensationalists shy away from asking either question. Both questions lead to theonomic answers.

2. Scofield and His Revisers

I need to cite Scofield here at considerable length, in order to make clear the nature of the exegetical debate. The exegetical debate centers around the question of the effects of the gospel in history. The dispensationalist assumes that the gospel must fail to transform the world in history, i.e., the era of the church prior to Christ's secret Rapture of the saints and His subsequent physical return to earth to establish an earthly kingdom. This is premillennialism's eschatological presupposition. The failure of the gospel to transform society is supposedly an inescapable prophetic truth: predestinated by God.

With this view of church history as his operating presupposition, Scofield then applied it to the interpretation of Matthew 13:33, which reads: "Another parable spake he unto them; The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took, and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened." Scofield recognized his primary theological problem in this passage: postmillennialism. So, he devoted his note to a refutation of . . . amillennialism. He had to deflect the jury's attention from the really hard nut to crack in this passage: its postmillennial implications, i.e., the growth of Christ's kingdom in history. Scofield wrote the following convoluted passage:

19. The New Scofield Reference Bible (New York: Oxford University Press, 1967), p. 1015n.

That interpretation of the parable of the Leaven (v. 33) which makes (with variation as to details) the leaven to be the Gospel, introduced into the world ("three measures of meal") by the church, and working subtly until the world is converted ("till the whole was leavened") is open to fatal objection: (1) It does violence to the unvarying symbolical meaning of leaven, and especially to the meaning fixed by our Lord Himself (Mt. 16.6–12; Mk. 8.15. See "Leaven," Gen. 19.3; Mt. 13.33 note). (2) The implication of a converted world in this age ("till the whole was leavened"), is explicitly contradicted by our Lord's interpretation of the parables of the Wheat and Tares, and of the Net. Our Lord presents a picture of a partly converted kingdom in an unconverted world; of good fish and bad in the very kingdom-net itself. (3) The method of the extension of the kingdom is given in the first parable. It is by sowing seed, not by mingling leaven. The symbols have, in Scripture, a meaning fixed by inspired usage. Leaven is the principle of corruption working subtly; is invariably used in a bad sense (see "Leaven," Gen. 19.3, refs.), and is defined by our Lord as evil doctrine (Mt. 16.11,12; Mk. 8.15). Meal, on the contrary, was used in one of the sweet-savour offerings (Lev. 2.1–3), and was food for the priests (Lev. 6.15–17).²⁰

Garbled, isn't it? Note: when a Bible expositor writes garbled prose, you can be fairly confident that he is having trouble explaining the text.

Scofield's view is affirmed, though in more readable English, by the New Scofield Bible: leaven as evil.

Leaven, as a fermenting process, is uniformly regarded in Scripture as typifying the presence of impurity or evil (Ex. 12:15,19; 13:7; Lev. 2:11; Dt. 16:4; Mt. 16:6,12; Mk. 8:15; Lk. 12:1; 1 Cor. 5:6–9; Gal. 5:9). The two wave loaves, representing Israel and the Gentiles as forming the Church, contained leaven in recognition of imperfections in the believers (see Lev. 23:17, note). The use of leaven in the three measures of meal seems intended likewise to represent evil within the kingdom of heaven. The teaching that leaven in this parable represents the beneficent influence of the Gospel pervading the world has no Scriptural justification. Nowhere in Scripture does leaven represent good; the idea of a converted world at the end of the age is contradicted by the presence of tares among the wheat and bad fish

20. Scofield Reference Bible, p. 1016n.

among the good in the kingdom itself.²¹

Then the editors added an afterthought, one not found in Scofield's original notes. They threw a sop—a single introductory clause—to those Christians who by 1967 desperately wanted to see some influence for good in history as a result of the gospel, that is, as a result of their personal efforts. This brief genuflect in the direction of social concern reflected the beginning of the end for traditional dispensationalism: “Although Biblical truth has a beneficial moral influence on the world,”²² the mingling of leaven is not the method of divine salvation or enlargement of the kingdom. Tares never become wheat.”²³

Some questions must be raised at this point. First and foremost, how in the name of Scofield can there be a visible, historically meaningful, beneficial moral influence of the gospel in this world prior to the Rapture? On what basis? Common grace, perhaps? If so, then post-millennialists can use this crucial admission to explain a great many things about the growth of God's kingdom in history. It was postmillennialism above all that Scofield had to refute in his note on Matthew 13:33—the task he discreetly avoided. On the other hand, if this beneficial influence is neither visible nor historically meaningful, why mention it at all? What emotional good would such an impotent influence in the “Church Age” do for one's followers? Why should one's followers care? They did not care in Scofield's day. By 1967, however, the emotional support for dispensationalism's social pessimism had begun to fade. A decade later in the United States, it faded rapidly, when American fundamentalist Christians re-entered the world of politics after half a century of withdrawal.²⁴

3. Smoke Screens

An argument found in both Scofield Bibles rests on the undeniable fact that there will still be tares at the end of history. I admit: not

21. New Scofield Reference Bible, p. 1015n.

22. Emphasis added.

23. Idem.

24. The withdrawal came in 1925, after the defeat in the media of fundamentalist spokesman William Jennings Bryan during the world famous Scopes “monkey trial.” The case centered on the teaching of evolution in tax-financed schools below the collegiate level. See George M. Marsden, Fundamentalism and American Culture: The Shaping of Twentieth-Century Evangelicalism, 1870–1925 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1980), ch. 21.

everyone will become a Christian. This admission would be a great deal more devastating if there had ever been any theologian in history—let alone an entire school of interpretation—who argued that when Christ returns there will be no one found on earth except born-again Christians.²⁵ That the Scofieldians thought it worth including this argument in their notes indicates their need for convenient stick men to refute. Space for notes in a Bible is extremely scarce. It is my contention that an expositor does not waste precious note space in a study Bible in order to refute nonsense unless he is trying to deflect the reader's attention from his own nonsense. He burns stick men in public in order to produce smoke.

The heart of the Scofield notes' argument, however, is the assertion that leaven always means corruption. This is a highly dangerous argument. It can very easily sink the theologian who rests his case on it. The familiar logician's tool is true: "A universal negative is refuted by a single positive." Such a positive example unquestionably exists, and our expositors knew this, which is why they refused to cite this key passage in their long list of supposed negative examples: "Besides the cakes, he shall offer for his offering leavened bread with the sacrifice of thanksgiving of his peace offerings" (Lev. 7:13). Leaven was mandated by God for use in peace offerings. How could a symbol of ever-growing evil serve as a sacrifice mandated by a holy God?

4. The Peace Offering

Elsewhere, Scofield offered a note on Leviticus 7:13. He acknowledged that this was a peace offering to God.²⁶

The use of leaven here is significant. Peace with God is something which the believer shares with God. Christ is our peace-offering (Eph. 2:13). Any thanksgiving for peace must, first of all, present

25. I wrote a book to deal with this very question of wheat, tares, and the final rebellion of Satan's forces at the end of time in a Christianized world: Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>). The answer is remarkably simple: the spread of the gospel increases the common grace of God in history. To gain God's external covenantal blessings, men must obey God's external covenantal laws. Men want these blessings, so they will obey. The external cultural blessings will come, as God has promised (Lev. 26; Deut. 28). The world will be progressively transformed. The rebels therefore have something big to rebel against.

26. Scofield Reference Bible, p. 134n. Amos 4:5: "And offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving with leaven, and proclaim and publish the free offerings: for this liketh you, O ye children of Israel, saith the Lord GOD."

Him. In verse 12 we have this, in type, and so leaven is excluded. In verse 13 it is the offerer who gives thanks for his participation in the peace, and so the leaven fitly signifies, that though having peace with God through the work of another, there is still evil in him. This is illustrated in Amos 4.5, where the evil in Israel is before God.

The leaven supposedly represented the evil peace-offerer. The unleaven supposedly represented Christ. This note was reprinted without alteration in the New Scofield Bible.

If we take Scofield at his word, then something symbolically evil was somehow a satisfactory offering to God. What verse could be appealed to in order to substantiate this thesis, namely, that an unclean thing was ever acceptable to God as an Old Covenant sacrifice? The dispensationalists do not attempt to offer such evidence. I cannot imagine what sort of evidence could be offered. The very context of this passage warns against such a conclusion:

And the flesh that toucheth any unclean thing shall not be eaten; it shall be burnt with fire: and as for the flesh, all that be clean shall eat thereof. But the soul that eateth of the flesh of the sacrifice of peace offerings, that pertain unto the LORD, having his uncleanness upon him, even that soul shall be cut off from his people. Moreover the soul that shall touch any unclean thing, as the uncleanness of man, or any unclean beast, or any abominable unclean thing, and eat of the flesh of the sacrifice of peace offerings, which [pertain] unto the LORD, even that soul shall be cut off from his people (Lev. 7:19–21).

Even to touch an unclean thing and then eat the peace offering meant excommunication from the congregation. Yet dispensationalists—those writing prior to the 1980s—wanted us to believe that leaven is exclusively a symbol of evil. But then they turned around and declared that this inherently evil symbol was acceptable to God as the basis of establishing peace with Him. (Those writing after 1980 have yet to replace this obviously untenable line of argument, but at least they no longer defend it.)

The whole point of a peace offering was to admit publicly that the person offering the peace offering was judicially clean. His sins had been forgiven. The peace offering was not a required sacrifice for wiping away sin. It was a voluntary sacrifice that acknowledged that the person's sin had already been wiped away. It was a public act of covenant renewal.

Nothing was placed on God's fiery altar that was not representationally clean. The sacrifice was a legal substitute. It pointed to a future legal substitute, Jesus Christ. To have a judicially impure object on God's altar would necessarily have pointed to the doctrine of Christ's humanity as fallen. Scofield understood this, so he identified the unleavened cakes as the symbol of Jesus Christ. But this approach destroys any doctrine of representation for the leaven. If the peace-offerer was represented by something impure, he had no legal basis for making the peace offering. His sacrifice of leaven would have condemned him publicly if leaven always meant evil exclusively. But if leaven is not always a symbol of evil, how are we to explain it? This is a problem facing all expositors.

G. The Leaven of the Pharisees

What is strange is the fact that within the Reformed tradition, there have been examples of interpretations of Leviticus 7:13 that are similar to Scofield's. Premillennialist Andrew Bonar²⁷ wrote in 1846: "His sins are all forgiven; there is peace between him and his God. There is in the worshipper no uncleanness now. But this reconciliation does not declare that there is no corruption left remaining in the worshipper. Perfect pardon does not imply perfect holiness. There is a remnant of evil left. But here we see that remnant of evil brought out before the Lord. The 'leavened cakes' intimate the corruption of the offerer; . . ." ²⁸ Amazingly, Rushdoony followed Bonar's lead.²⁹ The fact that dispensationalists have not been alert to the covenantal implications of this interpretation is not surprising; that covenant theologians have been equally inattentive to the covenant is very surprising.

Perhaps covenant theologians have been led into the dispensationalist ditch of muddled symbolism because of Jesus' warning regarding leaven of the Pharisees.

Then Jesus said unto them, Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees. And they reasoned among themselves, saying, It is because we have taken no bread. Which when Jesus perceived, he said unto them, O ye of little faith, why reason ye 27. On Bonar's premillennialism, see Iain H. Murray, The Puritan Hope: A Study in Revival and the Interpretation of Prophecy (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, 1971), p. 195.

28. Andrew Bonar, A Commentary on Leviticus (London: Banner of Truth Trust, [1846] 1966), p. 132.

29. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 82–83.

among yourselves, because ye have brought no bread? Do ye not yet understand, neither remember the five loaves of the five thousand, and how many baskets ye took up? Neither the seven loaves of the four thousand, and how many baskets ye took up? How is it that ye do not understand that I spake it not to you concerning bread, that ye should beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees? Then understood they how that he bade them not beware of the leaven of bread, but of the doctrine of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees (Matt. 16:6–12).

The disciples, initially committed to popular Jewish hermeneutical literalism and therefore frequently incapable of understanding Jesus' analogies, made a similar mistake. Jesus then told them what He meant. He was condemning the leaven of the Pharisees. They recognized that Jesus was talking about the Pharisees' false doctrine. The text does not say false doctrine as such, but only the Pharisees' false doctrine. The problem today is that modern theologians still have not understood the implications of the disciples' subsequent understanding of Jesus' warning. All leaven is not evil. The Pharisees' leaven was evil, so it had to be avoided. There was nothing wrong with leaven as such. It does not symbolize evil as such. Sometimes it symbolizes good, which is why it served as a mandatory peace offering. It symbolizes growth, not evil. Growth in evil is to be avoided; growth in righteousness is to be pursued.

Conclusion

The brief kingdom parable of the leaven in Matthew 13:33 rests on an understanding of leaven as a symbol of growth and continuity, not leaven as exclusively evil. If leaven is understood as exclusively evil, then Satan's kingdom must be viewed as triumphant in church history. This is exactly what premillennialism asserts with respect to the history of the church, i.e., the period prior to Jesus' bodily return to the earth. But the parable identifies the kingdom of heaven as leaven: growth.

We see in the discussion of leaven by dispensationalists an example of how eschatology can influence and even determine exegesis. What the passage speaks plainly about—the kingdom of heaven—the dispensationalist must deny. This is why J. Dwight Pentecost's admission in the latest edition of Things to Come is so devastating. He has abandoned the "leaven is always evil" exegesis. But it is discouraging to read the discussion of leaven by Bonar and Rushdoony (especially Rushdoony, a dedicated postmillennialist), who retain traces of the older dispensational view of leaven.

Leaven is an inescapable concept in the New Covenant era. Something must grow over time: either good or evil. Let it be good. We must therefore seek to purge the old exegetical leaven of eschatological defeat for the gospel and substitute the new leaven of eschatological victory.

Appendix D

GREEK MYTHOLOGY: THE MYTH OF CLASSICAL POLITICS

The great aim of the struggle for liberty has been equality before the law.

F. A. Hayek¹

One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you (Ex. 12:49).

The heritage of the biblical covenantal ideal of equality before the civil law made possible Western civilization. This tradition entered the West through the church. It did not come from Classical Greece. The argument that it did is part of the myth that Classical civilization is the foundation of Western liberty. It is one of the more successful myths of the Renaissance and the Enlightenment.² Rushdoony identifies the origin of the myth: “Greece: The Humanist’s Homeland.”³ He begins his chapter, “The Unity of the Polis,” with this crucial observation: “The importance of Greek thought in Western history cannot be understood by a reading of the works of specialists in the field, because the prevailing approach is neither philosophical nor historical but religious. . . . The majority of scholars turn to Greek culture, not for its own sake, but to find a heritage and a homeland to buttress their anti-Christianity.”⁴

A college textbook by F. Roy Willis is typical in its laudatory as-

1. F. A. Hayek, The Constitution of Liberty (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960), p. 85.

2. For a detailed study of the humanists’ continuing fascination with pagan Rome, see Peter Bondanella, The Eternal City: Roman Images in the Modern World (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987).

3. R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1971] 2007), p. 67. (<http://bit.ly/rjroam>)

4. Idem.

assessment of the Greeks' legacy to the West: "Athens was an attitude of mind and an achievement of the mind, a unique combination of the physical and the intellectual. And Western civilization owes an important part of its character, perhaps the finest part, to its nourishment for centuries from the Greek achievement that reached its height in Athens."⁵

What the introductory level textbooks invariably neglect to mention is that Athenian male society, like Greek society generally, was favorable toward homosexuality, especially between older men and young teenage boys.⁶ Women were known to complain about this, but they had no legal standing. Classical civilization, Greek and Roman, also practiced human sacrifice, a fact known to Lord Acton a century ago.⁷ This fact was systematically suppressed by the academic world in his day, just as it is today. Slavery was widespread in the classical world, in contrast to the ancient Near East. This fact is downplayed in the textbooks.

In assessing the legacy of the classical world, our model should be Charles Norris Cochrane's Christianity and Classical Culture, not Edith Hamilton's The Greek Way. We should take seriously Otto Scott's suggestion: Christians should study Classical history and culture, not in order to exaggerate the virtues of Classical civilization, but to understand why it collapsed.⁸

A. The Dual Philosophical Legacy of Greece

This is not to say that there has been no legacy from Greece. There have been two important philosophical aspects of this legacy: rationalism and irrationalism. As with all forms of humanism, the two are in fact one: the inescapable dialecticism of all of autonomous man's speculations.⁹ One side is the legacy recorded in the textbooks; the other

5. F. Roy Willis, Western Civilization: An Urban Perspective, 2 vols., 3rd ed.. (Lexington, Massachusetts: Heath, 1981), I, p. 53.

6. Hans Licht (pseud.), Sexual Life in Ancient Greece, trans. J. H. Freese (New York: AMS Press [1932] 1972), pp. 411–98; Robert Flacelière, Love in Ancient Greece (New York: Crown, [1960] 1962), ch. 3. There is today a scholarly journal called The International Journal of Greek Love. It prints articles on Greek homosexuality on a regular basis.

7. John Emerich Edward Dalberg-Acton, "Human Sacrifice" (1863), Essays in Religion, Politics, and Morality, in Selected Writings of Lord Acton, 3 vols. (Indianapolis, Indiana: LibertyClassics, 1988), III, pp. 395–442.

8. Otto Scott, "The Distortions of Classicism," Chalcedon Report (Sept. 1992), p. 3.

9. Cornelius Van Til spent his career exposing this humanist dialecticism.

has been recorded in obscure monographs. The textbooks downplay the religious side of the Greeks by discussing the myths of Olympus as if they were fairy tales that no influential Greek ever believed. This was in fact the case; there is little evidence that anyone in authority took seriously the Olympian myths except as political rituals. The Olympian gods were political creations: gods that the families of a city-state might formally worship. Without formal worship and collectively celebrated rites, there could be no civil law in Classical civilization.¹⁰

1. Academic Blackout: Occult Greece

What the textbooks ignore almost entirely is the other side of Greek religion, the dark, fearful, awesome side: the gods of the underworld. Both legacies were recovered by the Renaissance, but the occult side of the Renaissance is also the province of obscure monographs—though more of them today than existed in 1960. Since 1965, as the West has been invaded by Eastern mysticism and popular occultism, this neglected Greek legacy has begun to receive some academic attention, but the full story is still not found in the introductory textbooks, four decades later.

The supreme primary source of the rational side of the legacy is Plato's version of Socrates. While few people ever read Plato's major work, The Republic, and fewer still his other dialogues—which were not dialogues but were in fact monologues thinly disguised as dialogues—the rationalist side of Socrates has become legendary. Not many people know that Athens convicted Socrates of false religion—his appeal to occult gods: "Socrates is guilty of crime, because he does not believe in the gods recognised by the city, but introduces strange supernatural beings; he is also guilty, because he corrupts the youth." He was convicted by a majority of 60 votes in a jury of 501 men.¹¹ Bury, the great historian of Greece, offered this highly conventional assessment of Socrates' legacy:

When the history of Greece was being directed by Pericles and Cleon, Nicias and Lysander, men little dreamed either at Athens or elsewhere that the interests of the world were far more deeply concerned in the doings of one eccentric Athenian who held aloof from public affairs. The work of Pericles and Lysander affected a few generations in a small portion of the globe; but the spirit of that eccentric Athenian was to lay an impress, indelible forever, upon the thought of mankind. The ideas which we owe to Socrates are now so organically a part of the mind of civilised men, so familiar and commonplace, that it is hard to appreciate the intellectual power which was required to originate them. Socrates was the first champion of the supremacy of the intellect as a court from which there is no appeal; he was the first to insist, without modification or compromise, that a man must order his life by the guidance of his own intellect, without any regard for mandates of external authority or for the impulses of emotion, unless his intellectual [sic] approves. Socrates was thus a rebel against authority as such; and he shrank from no consequences.¹²

10. Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955).

11. J. B. Bury, A History of Greece (New York: Modern Library, [1913]), p. 565.

This assessment is conventional but ultimately erroneous. It neglects the irrationalist and mystical side of Socrates. He believed that a god (daimon) had spoken to him all of his adult life, telling him what to avoid.¹³ The conventional textbook assessment also places Socrates in the category of a rebel against authority as such. To the extent that Plato accurately reflected Socrates' viewpoint, Socrates was not a man at war against authority; he was a man in favor of displacing the existing authority with a new tyranny so powerful that it involved systematic lying, total state control over education, and communism for political leaders. When philosopher Karl Popper devoted the first volume of *The Open Society and Its Enemies*¹⁴ to an analysis of Plato as a mystic and a totalitarian, he did the academic world a great service—one which gained him the lasting hostility of Plato's many modern disciples.

The textbooks are filled with the legacy of Greek rationalism. Greek irrationalism is seldom mentioned, let alone emphasized.¹⁵ Students are given the stories of the Olympian gods. They are not told that these gods were politically constructed composites of a darker realm: gods of the underworld, the chthonic gods of Greece. These an-

12. Ibid., p. 561.

13. In the Apology 31, he said: "You have heard me speak at sundry times and in divers places of an oracle or sign which comes to me, and is the divinity which Meletus ridicules in the indictment. This sign, which is a kind of voice, first began to come to me when I was a child; it always forbids but never commands me to do anything which I am going to do. This is what deters me from being a politician." The Dialogues of Plato, translated by B. Jowett, 2 vols. (New York: Random House, [1892] 1937), I, p. 414.

14. Karl R. Popper, The Open Society and Its Enemies, 2 vols., 4th ed. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1963). It was first published in 1945.

15. An exception is the monograph by E. R. Dodds, The Greeks and the Irrational (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1951).

imistic gods were believed to inhabit the fields of every household, threatening hauntings and revenge against any male head of household who failed to maintain the proper rituals and sacrifices. A wife was assigned the task of keeping the household hearth-altar burning, from which we derive the phrase, “keep the home fires burning.” The study of these gods has been confined to academic specialists—one might call them eccentrics—in fields such as archeology and art history. The detailed researches of Cambridge University archeologist Jane Ellen Harrison and her disciples in the early decades of the twentieth century are known to very few historians.¹⁶ Some of these books appeared in the United States only when University Books, a publishing house specializing in reprints of scholarly materials related to the occult and the paranormal, and its adjunct Mystic Arts Book Club, reprinted them in the early 1960s.¹⁷ References to these extraordinary materials rarely appear even in specialized monographs on classical civilization.

Has this blackout been deliberate? Yes. Those scholars who have known the truth have generally kept their mouths shut. Consider Werner Jaeger, author of the multi-volume masterpiece on Greek education, Paideia. Hugh Nibley, the remarkable Mormon scholar and linguist, studied under him at the University of California at Berkeley in the 1930s. In an autobiographical essay, Nibley told of his studies in Hebrew and Arabic (he could learn a new language in a few weeks). “The most illustrious visiting scholar of the time was Werner Jaeger, who favored me with long chats and frank revelations over the teacups (my refusal to drink the stuff made an indelible impression on him and his wife). Professor Jaeger knew very well, he told me, that the Greeks were part of a wider Oriental complex, but he had to bypass all that in his study of the Greek mind, because it tended to disturb the neatness and balance of his great work on Greek Education.”¹⁸ That “wider Oriental complex” was both mystical and occult, as Jaeger well knew. It was a powerful underground stream in both Greek and Renaissance philosophy, and without which both would have dried up.¹⁹ The two traditions were united on one presupposition: man is the creator in history.

16. Jane Ellen Harrison, Prolegomena to the study of Greek Religion, 3rd ed. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, [1922] 1991). The first edition appeared in 1903. (<http://bit.ly/jehptsogr>)

17. Harrison, Epilogomena to the Study of Greek Religion (1921) and Themis: A Study of the Social Origins of Greek Religion (first edition, 1912; third, 1922), (New York: University Books, 1962). John Cuthbert Lawson, Modern Greek Folklore and Ancient Greek Religion (New York: University Books, [1910] 1964).

18. Hugh W. Nibley, “An Intellectual Autobiography,” in Nibley on the Timely and the Timeless: Classic Essays of Hugh W. Nibley, vol. 1 (Religious Studies Center, Brigham Young University, 1978), p. xxiii.

2. Academic Blackout: The Renaissance

A similar academic blackout has operated with respect to the Renaissance's recovery of Greek culture. The rational side of the Renaissance is the textbook account. Only since the mid-1960s has the occult side been rediscovered. The major figure in this reconsideration of the occult side of the Renaissance has been Francis Yates, who held no academic position in the British university system during her years of publishing.²⁰ Stephen McKnight's 1989 monograph on Renaissance thought is to the point: recent studies of the Renaissance have made mandatory a reconsideration of the origins of modernity. Secularization, the main theme, must be complemented by its opposite, sacralization. It was not just the secular tradition of Classical civilization that Renaissance scholars revived; it was also the magical-mystical side. Professor McKnight wrote: "In addition to the humanist revival of the studia humanitatis, the Neoplatonists rediscovered the prisca theologia. These materials, which were regarded as the earliest and purist non-Christian revelations, led Ficino and his followers to a new understanding of human nature. Sacralization is the term used to characterize this view of man as a terrestrial god capable of controlling the natural world and perfecting society."²¹ None of this was taught in my undergraduate days in the early 1960s, and it is still not in the Western Civilization textbooks.

B. The Standard of Written Law

We come now to another representative example of conventional scholarship's assessment of the legacy of Greece. Bruno Leoni, a professor of both legal theory and political science at the University of 19. Thomas Molnar, God and the Knowledge of Reality (New York: Basic Books, 1973).

20. Her best-known work is Giordano Bruno and the Hermetic Tradition (New York: Vintage, [1964] 1969). Cf. Yates, Theater of the World (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969); The Rosicrucian Enlightenment (New York: Methuen, 1986); The Occult Philosophy in the Elizabethan Age (New York: Methuen, 1983); Collected Essays, 3 vols. (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1984).

21. Stephen A. McKnight, Sacralizing the Secular: The Renaissance Origins of Modernity (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1989), p. 109.

Pavia, offered this bit of Greek mythology: "The ideal of a written law, generally conceived and knowable by every citizen of the small and glorious towns scattered all along the coasts of the Mediterranean Sea and inhabited by people of Greek descent, is one of the most precious gifts that the fathers of Western civilization have bequeathed to their posterity."²² He then cited Aristotle as one source of this legal tradition.²³

This is propaganda, not historical scholarship. First, there were comparatively few citizens in any of those Greek towns. Classical legal theory established separate legal orders for citizens, resident aliens, women, and slaves. Only citizens—males who could lawfully participate in the religious rites of the city—possessed legal rights.²⁴ At least one-third of the population was composed of slaves.²⁵ This is a vastly higher percentage than anything in the ancient Near East.²⁶ In all Greek and Roman establishments larger than the family, manual labor was done by slaves.²⁷ The written law did not defend their liberty. The principle of written law may have helped citizens, but it gave little protection to the majority of residents.

From the point of view of the slaves, the Greeks' defeat of Darius' Persian army in 490 B.C. at the battle of Marathon was a disaster. So was the defeat of Xerxes' fleet at the battle of Salamis in 480. Liberation from slavery had been imminent. The textbooks never consider this possibility. The Greeks are viewed as defenders of liberty and culture; the Persians are seen as barbarian tyrants. But Persia allowed the Israelites to return to their land and worship God openly (Ezra, Nehemiah). Christian students seldom connect the two accounts. It is as if the Persians were two different societies: one tolerant (the biblical account) and the other barbarian (the Greek version).

Second, the principle of a written body of law that is knowable to 22. Bruno Leoni, Freedom and the Law (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1961), pp. 73–74.

23. Ibid., p. 74.

24. On this point, see Fustel, Ancient City, Bk. III, chaps. XI–XII. Leoni dismisses Fustel's observation on the Greek concept of freedom as being fundamentally different from ours. Fustel has been "successfully revised in recent times," Leoni said, but he offers no footnotes to prove his point (p. 79).

25. M. I. Finley, Ancient Slavery and Modern Ideology (New York: Viking, 1980), p. 80. It was one-third in Athens: A. H. M. Jones, "Slavery in the Ancient World," Economic History Review, Second Series, IX (1956), p. 187.

26. Isaac Mendelsohn, Slavery In the Ancient Near East (New York: Oxford University Press, 1949), p. 119.

27. Finley, Ancient Slavery, p. 81.

all residents of a commonwealth had been the gift of God to Israel over a millennium before Aristotle taught political philosophy to the world-class conqueror Alexander the Great. God inscribed His law on tablets of stone—a graphic way of communicating the principle of written law. The Mosaic law required that every seventh year the entire law be read to the assembled nation: men, women, children, and resident aliens (Deut. 31:10–13).²⁸ To argue that Aristotle was the source of this tradition in the West is nothing short of ludicrous. It is, however, typical of humanist scholarship.

Written law in Greece, yes. Freedom? Not for many and not for long. Political success in Athens was based on a man's ability as a public speaker. This led to the rise of the Sophists, who sold the skills of rhetoric to the highest bidders—the superlawyers of their day. Historian Morton Smith wrote that “Athenians were litigious, and any man might find himself compelled to argue for his fortune, if not his life, before a court of several hundred of his fellow citizens. It was necessary to speak for oneself, though a writer might be hired to prepare the speech. By their studies of rhetoric, argument (whence logic), and grammar, the sophists laid the basis of Greek higher education, from which was to come the mediaeval university program. By their immediate teaching, however, they—intentionally or unintentionally—obscured the traditional patterns of Greek morality and raised up a generation of skeptics prepared to argue for any action which seemed to their own interest.”²⁹ Otto Scott is even more to the point: “These sophistae (teachers of wisdom) taught young adults, for the first time in history. They charged enormous sums: Protagoras demanded 10,000 drachmas ($100,000—or the equivalent of a modern university [education]) for the education of a single pupil. The Sophists introduced civilization's first ‘enlightenment’ which questioned tradition, religion, morals and all values.”³⁰ In short, they were the law school professors of their day: they undermined moral law.

The decline of traditional morality, accompanied by increasing Athenian wealth and political power, led the city into a series of military confrontations with Sparta, culminating in the Peloponnesian war, beginning in 431 B.C., a war that Athens lost. It was in this period of

28. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 75.

29. Morton Smith, The Ancient Greeks (Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1960), p. 72.

30. Otto Scott, “The Death of Socrates,” Chalcedon Report (Aug. 1991), p. 3.

defeat and despair that Athens executed Socrates in 399 B.C. He had been perceived by many critics as a Sophist. They were essentially correct: he was, in fact, a sophisticated dialectician who defended the existence a hypothetical realm of absolute knowledge, but also insisted that no one, including himself, had been able to enter it—a sophist's ploy if there ever was one. He was also a political authoritarian.³¹ In terms of his philosophical undermining of Greek religion, the Athenians' perception of Socrates was correct. He was guilty as charged. (He was also a defender of pederasty with adolescents, but that did not bother Athenians any more than it bothers his apologists today.)³²

C. Demythologizing the Greeks

War characterized Greek life as much as democracy and written law. War was a way of life, especially among the smaller city-states.³³ This includes civil wars, which were frequent outside of Athens and Sparta.³⁴ Then there was judicial and cultural inequality. The world-renowned Classical historian Moses Finley wrote: "In this society of unequals, the elite who dominated all activities, political, military, athletic, and cultural, constituted a single group. . . . The acceptance by 'the many' of this perpetual domination by 'the few' is a significant fact in classical Greek history, even in Athens during its most democratic period, from the time of Pericles to the time of Alexander the Great."³⁵

Something else characterized Greek political life: the absolute power of the state. There was no appeal beyond it. Finley has accurately summarized the nature of Greek politics: "In political terms, the power possessed by the community was total. That is to say, within the limits imposed by 'rule of law', however that was understood, and by certain taboos in the fields of cult and sexual relations, the sovereign body was unrestrictedly free in its decision-making. There were areas or facets of human behaviour in which it normally did not interfere, but that was only because it chose not to, or did not think to do so. There were no natural rights of the individual to inhibit action by the state, no inalienable rights granted or sanctioned by a higher authority.

31. Popper, Open Society, vol. 1, The Spell of Plato.

32. Plato, Symposium, sections 181–82.

33. M. I. Finley, "Introduction," The Legacy of Greece, ed. M. I. Finley (Oxford: Clarendon Press, [1981] 1988), p. 15.

34. Finley, "Politics and Political Theory," ibid., p. 25.

35. Finley, "Introduction," ibid., p. 15.

There was no higher authority."³⁶

1. The Legacy of Pericles

To prove his case for Greece as a major source of Western legal theory, Leoni cited Pericles' funeral oration of 430 B.C., which was eloquent in its defense of the political freedom of Athenian citizens.³⁷ This oration was wartime rhetoric from Athens' senior politician, delivered in the first year of the war with Sparta. This speech is regarded as one of the classic documents in Western civilization. The textbooks laud both Pericles and his speech (as reconstructed by Thucydides). Rarely are students told what followed. A year after Pericles gave his famous speech, a great plague hit maritime Athens, though hardly at all in Sparta and the inland cities of the Peloponnesian alliance,³⁸ and this led to the destruction of Athenian civil religion and personal morality.³⁹ Pericles' two sons died in the plague. Athens then sought peace with Sparta, which Sparta rejected. Pericles was suspended from his post and put on trial for a minor offense. He was subsequently re-elected to the post, having eloquently defended the necessity of empire, especially since the other city-states regarded it as immoral; it was too risky to quit now, he warned them. They responded to his call, and Athens' imperial war raged on. He died a year later.⁴⁰ The war continued for the next 25 years. Sparta won. Some Periclean legacy!

The rule of written Athenian law may have applied within the city, but not beyond its borders. Whenever it was regarded as necessary to extend Athenian control, Athenians ruthlessly suppressed the liberties of the lesser cities of the Athenian empire (the Delian League), which lasted from 478 B.C., the year after the second Persian invasion was repulsed by the allied city-states, until 404 B.C., when Athens was defeated by Sparta. For example, under Pericles' political leadership in 454 B.C., Athens moved the League's treasury from Delos to the 36. Finley, "Politics," ibid., pp. 26–27.

37. Leoni, Freedom and the Law, p. 78.

38. Bury, History of Greece, p. 390.

39. Thucydides wrote: "No one was eager to persevere in the ideals of honour. . . . They thought that it made no difference whether they worshipped God or not, as they saw all alike perishing; no one expected to live to be brought to trial for his offences, but each felt that a far severer sentence had been already passed upon them all and hung ever over their heads, and before this fell it was only reasonable to enjoy life a little." Thucydides, The History of the Peloponnesian War, edited in translation by Sir Richard Livingstone (New York: Oxford University Press, 1943), II:53, p. 122.

40. Bury, History of Greece, p. 391.

Athenian Acropolis. This was done in the name of a required religious payment to Athena, Athens' official goddess. The records indicate that one-sixtieth of the funds collected were registered as payments to the goddess.⁴¹ Some of these funds were then siphoned off to help finance Athens' gigantic public works construction programs: the famous statues and architectural glories of Periclean Athens. Bury admitted that it was bad imperial politics for Athens to extract these funds, however minimal, from the other cities in the league.⁴² When challenged by Thucydides regarding this policy, Athens voted to ostracize Thucydides, thus ending any significant political opposition to Pericles. The voters were swayed by Pericles' argument that the other cities had nothing to say about it, just so long as Athens defended them. The League's members supposedly had no right to interfere with the allocation of these funds, however large or small.⁴³ No accounting to the cities was necessary. In effect, this was a form of forced tribute to Athens. Athens also forced the other cities to withdraw their coinage and substitute Athenian coins.⁴⁴ Athens sent "inspectors," established garrisons, and sent small colonies of Athenians to the subject cities.⁴⁵ Yet Periclean Athens supposedly was the source of the ideal of written civil law in the West. So said Professor Leoni. He has not been alone in this opinion.

It was this growing Athenian empire that led Sparta into its own confederation. The city-states of Greece deeply resented Athens' violations of their religious and legal autonomy. Historian David Greene summarized the fundamental issue raised by Athenian tyranny: "By what right had Athens virtually obliterated the external autonomy of the various states which had originally joined her League of Delos against the menace of a recurrent Persian invasion? This was the out-spoken question or indignant charge put by every state outside the Athenian sphere of influence. . . . There is no doubt that, in exercising control over the external affairs of her confederate allies, Athens was outraging the accepted code of international Greek morality as it had existed from before the Persian wars."⁴⁶

41. J. K. Davies, Democracy and Classical Greece (Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey: Humanities Press, 1978), p. 78.

42. Bury, History of Greece, p. 356.

43. Idem.

44. Davies, pp. 87–88.

45. Ibid., pp. 88–90.

46. 46. David Greene, Greek Political Theory: The Image of Man in Thucydides and Plato (University of Chicago Phoenix Book, [1950] 1965), p. 43. Originally published as Thucydides explained the growth of the Athenian empire as a kind of natural or inevitable force rather than as one city's blatant grab for centralized power, but his words did not make it so. His explanation does, however, closely fit the presuppositions of modern historians and political theorists, who see the march of democracy and the rise of a secular one-world state as intertwined events. They love Thucydides. He seems so much like one of them.⁴⁷ So does Thucydides' version of Pericles, who has become a kind of precursor to U.S. President Franklin D. Roosevelt in the eyes of modern American scholars. Greene's description of Pericles deserves wider circulation: "Yet the democracy whose dynamic was greed and fear and whose might was the offspring of that greed and fear was held in check by a single autocrat whose rule it accepted because he was not as other men were. In this voluntary acquiescence of the vulgar, in this submission to the statesman who neither flattered nor feared them but who put heart into them or made them tremble with the witchcraft of his own aloof certainty. Thucydides may have seen the transcendence of the materialism in which he believed. Here was power as it truthfully was, based on fear, pride, and greed, yet it touched something too magical for measurement."⁴⁸

The political reality undergirding Pericles' rhetorical flourish did not survive the fall of Athens to Sparta, and the fall of both to Macedonia over the next 75 years. Academic defenders of this classic Greek mythology need to demonstrate the connection between (1) what a handful of Greek philosophers, mostly followers of Socrates, believed about civil law in the fourth century B.C., during which "Greece's" (Athens') relatively brief experiment with democracy was rapidly fading, and (2) the historical reality of Greek law in the city-states. The connection does exist, but it is publicly embarrassing for most defenders of Greek democracy—politically incorrect, we might say. One thing is certain: the Athenians of Socrates' day had very little in common with him and his students. Aristophanes' comedy, The Clouds, had Athenians howling derisively at the antics of Socrates and members of his academy. They condemned him to death in 399 B.C.

Yet there was a crucial connection between Athenian politics and Socratic political theory—something the textbooks always fail to mention. They shared a political opinion, as Finley has so accurately pointed out: political man, irrespective of the desires of the gods, can do whatever he can get away with.⁴⁹ There was no infallible revelation, written or verbal, in Greek religion.⁵⁰ Political man therefore had to fear other men, not the gods. Athens feared Socrates, whose commitment to Athenian citizenship was so strong that he preferred hemlock to exile.⁵¹ This presupposition of unbounded political authority is what connects the Athenian Greeks with today's disciples of human autonomy and political salvation.

Man in His Pride: A Study in the Political Philosophy of Thucydides and Plato.

47. He was no democrat; he preferred oligarchy. Ibid., pp. 54–55.

48. Ibid., p. 92.

Modern textbooks fail to mention the following two facts. First, it was not Socrates who persuaded the Greeks of this political worldview; he merely shifted its basis of authority from political tradition to political philosophy. Second, authors fail to admit openly that their textbooks are written in terms of this same philosophy of autonomous man, and usually also in terms of political salvation: the corporate healing power of politics. All of the other supposed connections between classical Greece and the modern world—judicial, analytical, or aesthetic—are either fanciful or else subordinate applications of the presuppositional one: political man is autonomous, and man is fundamentally political.

2. The Judicial Legacy

Leoni did not bother to show the Greek legal tradition was passed along to the Christian West. Contrary to Leoni, the Greeks of Periclean Athens left no judicial legacy to the West. Historian Joseph R. Strayer wrote: "But whatever their constitution, they did not develop a legal tradition that persisted in the West. The Greeks were deeply concerned with law, but since each small community had its own laws, tailored to fit the needs of that community, it was hard to develop general principles applicable to all of the Greek-ruled areas. By the time that the Greeks had developed such principles, they had been swallowed up by the Hellenistic monarchies, which, in turn, were swallowed up by Rome."⁵²

49. Finley, "Politics and Political Theory," pp. 23–24.

50. Ibid., p. 24.

51. Contrary to Plato's immortal but second-hand account at the end of the Phaedo dialogue, hemlock burns the mouth and abdomen. Nausea and vomiting are common. Hemlock drinkers do not wax philosophical as they slowly fade away. See William B. Ober, Boswell's Clap and Other Essays (New York: Harper & Row, 1988), ch. 10; cited by Otto Scott, "The Death of Socrates," Chalcedon Report (Aug. 1991), p. 4.

52. Joseph R. Strayer, "The Rule of Law," in Aspects of American Liberty: Philosophical, Historical, and Political (Philadelphia: American Philosophical Society,

Bury wrote much the same thing: contrary to Pericles' funeral oration, Athens did not become the school of Greece until after the collapse of the empire. Athens became influential through its philosophers and through its new position as a clearing house of cosmopolitan influences—in short, through its Hellenism. In fact, he argued, Athens had more influence through its theater than through anything else.⁵³ It was Hellenism, with its cosmopolitanism, that produced the famed Athenian individualism. The Athenian's covenantal bond to his city—his polis—had been broken. "The citizen of Athens has become a citizen of the world."⁵⁴ That is to say, he had become no citizen at all—no civic oath, no democratic sanctions, and no political or judicial legacy to pass on to posterity. Instead, he and his peers, to the extent that they left a judicial legacy to the future, did so by abandoning their inheritance from the past: the judicial ideal of the polis. The politically minded intellectuals among them—and there were fewer and fewer of them as the fourth century progressed—adopted a new ideal.

D. Stoic Natural Law Theory

This later Hellenistic intellectual development was Stoic natural law philosophy, which was the product of the collapse of the Greek city-states. Natural law theory was not the foundation of Athenian democratic politics. Stoic natural law theory was used to justify the new world empires of Macedonia and Rome. The Stoic concept of the rule of universal law was exclusively philosophical, not judicial. The foundation of Stoic philosophy was a denial of the Creator-creature distinction. Its outlook was summed up by Epictetus: "When a man has learnt to understand the government of the universe and has realized that there is nothing so great or sovereign or all-inclusive as this frame of things wherein man and God are united . . . why should he not call himself a citizen of the universe and a son of God?"⁵⁵

Stoicism offered no basis for political theory. Stoic man, as a citizen of the universe, did not regard participation in politics as the means of maintaining his universal citizenship. This citizenship was granted to him by natural law. Wolin has identified the elitism of such 1977), p. 17.

53. Bury, History of Greece, p. 560.

54. Ibid., p. 561.

55. Epictetus, Discourses, I:9; cited by Sheldon S. Wolin, Politics and Vision: Continuity and Innovation in Western Political Thought (Boston: Little, Brown, 1960), p. 80.

a view of citizenship, “a kind of invisible church of rational beings.”⁵⁶ Wolin cites the Stoic emperor (and persecutor of the church),⁵⁷ Marcus Aurelius, who defended the existence of common reason, common law, and common citizenship. This rational ideal became the foundation for empire, a one-world state and one-state world: “For of what other common political community will any one say that the whole human race are members?”⁵⁸

Citing the same passage, C. N. Cochrane is even more forthright regarding the pretensions of this absolute religion of reason: “In point of fact, it constitutes an audacious anthropomorphism, a kind of sky-writing⁵⁹ which projects upon the cosmos a merely human rationality and translates it into an account of nature and of God.”⁶⁰ Stoic natural law theory was a pagan attempt to restructure the universe in terms of man’s reason. It was the antithesis of biblical law, which places man under God’s absolute sovereignty, mediated by His revealed law. Stoicism’s command was “follow nature.”⁶¹ This means following autonomous reason.⁶² In contrast, the Bible’s command is “follow God” by obeying His law. By following nature, Classical man found himself divided, for nature was seen as an unstable combination of chance and luck on the one hand and impersonal necessity and fate on the other.⁶³ He was trapped either by the non-politics of anarchy or the submissive politics of passivity. In contrast, by following God by obeying His law, Christian man attaches himself judicially (covenantally) to the sovereign Creator of the universe in whom there is neither chance nor impersonal fate. The politics of justice becomes both a possibility and a moral imperative.

E. The Medieval Synthesis

The West derived its crucial judicial ideal of equality before the 56. Wolin, Politics and Vision, p. 80.

57. Justin Martyr died under his reign.

58. Idem.

59. An advertising device of the 1930s and 1940s in which a small airplane, spewing white smoke, would spell out words in the sky. In the 1939 movie, The Wizard of Oz, there is a scene where the witch sky-writes Dorothy in black smoke from her broom.

60. Charles Norris Cochrane, Christianity and Classical Culture: A Study of Thought and Action from Augustus to Augustine (New York: Oxford University Press, [1944] 1957), p. 167. (<http://bit.ly/cnccacc>). Reprinted by Liberty Press.

61. Ibid., p. 165.

62. Ibid., p. 166.

63. Ibid., pp. 158–59.

law from the Bible. Much later, in medieval legal theory, Roman jurisprudence (especially in the writings of the twelfth-century canon lawyers, the Decretists),⁶⁴ Aristotelian philosophy (especially in Aquinas: d. 1274), and Stoic natural law theory were added to justify this biblical ideal. But Western legal theory today denies the original theological foundation which undergirded the explicitly biblical idea of equality before the law: specially revealed law.

Under the influence of Greek philosophy, especially Stoicism, and Roman law, a new guild of Western legal theorists appeared in the twelfth century. They were early academics. They moved from the acceptance of customary tribal laws (civil) and penitential law (ecclesiastical) to the ideal of universal natural law in the guise of a revival of Roman imperial law.⁶⁵ This judicial transformation was accompanied by a parallel development among philosophers: an attempted fusion of the Greek concept of autonomous reason and the biblical ideal of God's revealed law. Scholasticism promised that Classical wisdom would be tamed by Christianity. But the conquest of Classicism by Christianity was not to be; the reverse was increasingly the case in intellectual affairs. Rationalist heresies invaded the universities, and they could not be removed.⁶⁶ Bolgar is correct: "Men found that they could not simply sort out the good and the bad, to treasure the former and discard the latter."⁶⁷

Scholasticism's philosophical synthesis was inherently both epistemologically and ethically unstable, and from the fourteenth century onward, it steadily disintegrated. Scholasticism left the church vulnerable to William of Ockham's nominalist dualism between reason (with authority over the realm of civil affairs and science) and revelation (with authority confined to the soul and the cloister).⁶⁸ Professor Eta Linnemann, a former defender of the higher criticism of the Bible and

64. Brian Tierney, Religion, law, and the growth of constitutional thought, 1150–1650 (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1982), ch. II. They were called Decretists because they were commentators on Gratian's Decretum (Concord of Discordant Canons, c. 1140).

65. Harold J. Berman, Law and Revolution: The Formation of the Western Legal Tradition (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983).

66. Friedrich Heer, The Medieval World, 1100–1350 (New York: World, [1961] 1962), chaps. 9, 10.

67. R. R. Bolgar, The Classical Heritage and Its Beneficiaries: From the Carolingian Age to the End of the Renaissance (New York: Harper Torchbooks, [1954] 1964), p. 205.

68. Gordon Leff, Bradwardine and the Pelagians (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1957).

a new convert to the faith, describes Scholasticism's attempted fusion of the Bible and Greek philosophy: "Scholasticism undertook 'to bring the new rational knowledge into agreement with the articles of faith'—an effort which set the tone for all the theological exertions of the High and Late Middle Ages. But it had made a weighty and fateful decision! Instead of bearing in mind that all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge lie hidden in Christ (Col. 2:3), it was assumed that man requires the worldly wisdom of paganism right alongside God's Word in order to make real intellectual progress. God's Word was reduced to just one of two focal points for determining wisdom and knowledge. The Bible came to be regarded as authoritative only in those areas touching on redemption and the Christian life. Aristotle, in contrast, became the source of all valid knowledge of the world, that is, for the realm of natural sciences, social analysis, and so on. From then on, in other words, God's Word was no longer regarded as reliable for these areas of knowledge. Later, Aristotelian philosophy would be replaced by newly developed sciences that hastily blamed the cosmological errors of Aristotle on God's Word."⁶⁹

F. The Modern Savior State

Natural law theory became secularized in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. From this secularized version of natural law theory in the late eighteenth century the West's constitutional theory moved to positive law: law as the voice of the sovereign People, as interpreted by officials of the state. But positive law has long been regarded as sovereign only within national boundaries. Traces of natural law theory have survived only in international law theory, which has few agreed-upon sanctions and is seldom honored by the more powerful nations when cases go against them. International law had no common agent of enforcement until the twentieth century. International order is today seen as an evolutionary development, not as the culmination of fixed principles of natural law.⁷⁰ The moral and institutional demands of the internationalists are therefore unbounded and open-

69. Eta Linnemann, Historical Criticism of the Bible: Methodology or Ideology?, trans. Robert W. Yarbrough (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, 1990), p. 24.

70. "International organization is a process; international organizations are representative aspects of the phase of that process which has been reached at a given time." Inis L. Claude, Jr., Swords Into Ploughshares: The Problems and Progress of International Relations, 2nd ed. (New York: Random House, 1959), p. 4.

ended.⁷¹ President John F. Kennedy stated the following messianic premises forthrightly in 1961 at the memorial service of Dag Hammarskjöld, the deceased Secretary General of the United Nations: "Political sovereignty is but a mockery without the means of meeting poverty and illiteracy and disease. Self-determination is but a slogan if the future holds no hope."⁷² The judicial link between political sovereignty and positive sanctions of physical and intellectual healing is explicit in Kennedy's statement; unless the state can heal, it has no legitimacy. The state must become a savior.

The issue is therefore final sovereignty. The international state becomes King of kings. In the absence of a higher court, the final earthly court of appeal necessarily must claim divine sovereignty, i.e., divine right: the final word beyond which there is no meaningful earthly appeal in history. The world state becomes the voice of authority. Today, this means the divine sovereignty of politics. This has been the career of natural law theory in the West: from the divine sovereignty of natural law to the divine sovereignty of politics—the voice of the people. President George H. W. Bush announced to the U.S. Congress in the fall of 1990:

A new partnership of nations has begun.

We stand today at a unique and extraordinary moment. The crisis in the Persian Gulf, as grave as it is, also offers a rare opportunity to move toward an historic period of cooperation. Out of these troubled 71. The New World Order, incarnated judicially in the League of Nations and then the United Nations, was proclaimed throughout the twentieth century by various humanists. This international legal order has not been defended theoretically in terms of natural law theory—which limits the state—but rather in terms of either the needs of man, which are inherently unlimited, or national self-interest, which is left undefined. Write two academic defenders of the United Nations regarding the failure of the League of Nations: "Yet for a decade and a half people throughout the world looked to the League as the instrument by which it might be possible to establish peace and stability in the world and to assist mankind in its uneven progress toward greater freedom and happiness." Leland M. Goodrich and Edvard Hambro, Charter of the United Nations: Commentary and Documents, 2nd ed. (Boston: World Peace Foundation, 1949), p. 3. Peace and stability, progress and happiness: these are unbounded goals. Wrote a prominent academic defender of international political order: "International organizations exist simply because they are needed; we belong to them simply because it serves our national interest to belong—and because it would damage our national interest to remain aloof." Richard N. Gardner, In Pursuit of World Order: U.S. Foreign Policy and International Organizations (New York: Praeger, 1964), p. xi.

72. John F. Kennedy, "An Address to the United Nations" (Sept. 25, 1961), in The United States and the United Nations, ed. Franz B. Gross (Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1964), p. 283.

times, our fifth objective—a new world order—can emerge: a new era, freer from the threat of terror, stronger in the pursuit of justice, and more secure in the quest for peace. An era in which the nations of the world, east and west, north and south, can prosper and live in harmony.

A hundred generations have searched for this elusive path to peace, while a thousand wars raged across the span of human endeavor. Today that new world is struggling to be born. A world quite different from the one we've known. A world where the rule of law supplants the rule of the jungle. A world in which nations recognize the shared responsibility for freedom and justice. A world where the strong respect the rights of the weak.⁷³

The Messianic State becomes covenant-breaking man's hoped-for lord and savior. Whenever it appears in history, the biblical concept of freedom is put on the defensive. But the Messianic State creates a series of problems that are unsolvable, given the presuppositions of autonomous man. Strayer has sketched some of the dilemmas of modern salvational politics, from the Renaissance to today. We are headed, he said, toward the breakdown in law, but in the name of law. "As in the sixteenth century, the state is intervening in areas that it had not touched before, but this time it is doing so not because it seeks to increase its power but because it is trying to satisfy its citizens. As in the sixteenth century, the new liberties are not yet merged with the old liberties, and it is difficult to reconcile the two. Is it proper, for example, to interfere with the right of free speech in order to advance the rights of minorities? The rule of law is threatened by the burdens that we place upon the law. We expect the laws to solve our problems when we ourselves have not agreed on acceptable solutions. We expect the laws to impose patterns of common responsibility for the welfare of a society so complex that no one knows what those patterns should be. We expect the laws to make us good, when the most that the law can do is to make it possible for us to seek the good. The result is complication, confusion, uncertainty in understanding the law, and intolerable delays in the administration of justice. This situation invites, as it did in the sixteenth century, arbitrary administrative decisions that by-pass ordinary legal procedures. It would be ironic if the forces that led to the establishment of the rule of law should be forces that lead to the breakdown of the law. But history is full of such ironies, and no society can be sure that it will escape them."⁷⁴

73. "Text of President Bush's Address to Joint Sessions of Congress," New York Times (Sept. 12, 1990).

One society can be sure of its ability to escape such destructive dilemmas: a biblical covenant society that remains faithful to the theological, moral, and judicial terms of the covenant. But modern man does not want to consider this option. He prefers the historical uncertainties and eternal certainties of a broken covenant.

Conclusion

Leoni argued that written civil law was the great legacy of Greece to the modern world. What he really meant was a particular kind of written civil law: written civil law in the absence of written revelation that is authoritative over civil law. He should have been more forthright. So should his humanist peers. The idea that law can and should be written down is quite ancient. The idea comes from a far more fundamental idea, namely, that God has revealed Himself to His people by means of law—first verbal, then written. God has spoken an authoritative primary word; man should therefore speak a secondary word that is in covenantal conformity to God's primary word. This assertion was the judicial foundation of ancient Israel. This was Israel's legacy to the Christian church, and this became the church's legacy to the West.

This legacy was challenged at the beginning of the church by the remnants of Classical Greece's essentially political legacy, but disguised as autonomous, philosophically neutral rationalism: the political autonomy of man and the primacy of politics. The Stoics abandoned this political faith, but only by seeking an escape from politics in an era of Roman tyranny. They capitulated intellectually.

The war in history between the kingdom of God and the kingdom of man is still being fought in terms of these rival creeds, these rival views of written civil law. It is a war over the correct way of salvation: through politics or grace. This war will continue until the final judgment.

74. Strayer, "Rule of Law," Aspects of American Liberty, p. 36.

Appendix E

THE COVENANTAL STRUCTURE OF JUDGMENT

Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty; but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour (Lev. 19:15).

A. Judgment: Analogical vs. Autonomous

We are called in this verse to exercise righteous judgment. This means that God has given us standards of righteousness. All judges are to be judged by the cosmic Judge of judges. We are required to regard God as the final Judge. When we exercise judgment, whether in the sense of self-government or in the sense of civil judgment, we must bear in mind that God is watching and recording all that we do. The creation of a righteous civil order is necessarily based on a presumption of God as the final Judge. The rejection of this presumption leads inevitably to the destruction of the judicial foundations of a righteous civil order.

Put another way, the ideal of civil theocracy—the public authority of God’s Bible-revealed law over the civil order—is an extension of the doctrine of God’s absolutely sovereign rule over history and eternity. This is why secular man rejects biblical theocracy; he prefers democracy: the rule of autonomous man. This is also why Christians who reject civil theocracy as a judicial ideal generally reject the Calvinist doctrine of the absolute sovereignty of God and increasingly reject any strong emphasis in preaching on the doctrine of eternal punishment.

The triumph of the Renaissance-Enlightenment ideal of autonomous man and autonomous politics has captured the minds of the vast majority of Protestant Christians. They are totally ashamed of the ideal of civil theocracy and somewhat embarrassed by the doctrine of hell.¹

1. An example of the post-World War II drift away from the Bible took place in Christ is acknowledged as King of kings and Judge of judges, but only in the world beyond the grave. Until then, they affirm, man is at least partially sovereign over history ("free will") and totally sovereign over politics.

The social order is not a product of the civil order. It is the product of religion.² It is much broader than politics. But the social order must be defended by law. This is why the civil order must be structurally and judicially consistent with the social order. If such consistency is lacking, there will be social conflict, leading ultimately either to tyranny or anarchy: the radical one or the radical many. There is such consistency in a biblical social order, which rests on the doctrine of the Trinity: the equal ultimacy of the one (the Godhead) and the many (three Persons). Rushdoony wrote of the Chalcedon creed (451 A.D.): "Thus the equal ultimacy of the one and the many was further defended. The truth about life was neither unity nor particularity, neither social atomism nor totalitarianism, but rather the equal importance of both the one and the many. The Trinity, three persons, one God, made impossible any legitimate Christian totalitarianism or atomism: the one and the many are equally ultimate in the triune God."³ This is why it is a denial of the biblical foundations of social order to allow those who do not publicly affirm by formal oath the existence of the God of May, 1989, at Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, near Chicago, Illinois. Trinity, with assistance from the National Association of Evangelicals, held a conference of 385 theologians, Christian leaders, and laymen: "Evangelical Affirmations/89." The goal of conference organizers Carl F. H. Henry and Kenneth Kantzer was to develop a document defining the word "evangelical." See Evangelical Affirmations, ed. Kantzer and Packer (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan Academic, 1990).

At this conference, a debate broke out over the doctrine of "annihilationism," also known as "conditionalism," a doctrine held by Seventh-Day Adventists, Jehovah's Witnesses, Christadelphians, etc. It teaches that there is only annihilation for unregenerate sinners in eternity—no hell or lake of fire. Theologian J. I. Packer adamantly pressed the assembly to adopt a statement affirming the traditional creedal position of eternal punishment, but to no avail. The voice vote was split, but the chairman declared that those refusing to include a positive statement (i.e., that hell exists) on such a negative idea (i.e., that God torments covenant-breakers) had been in the majority. In the section of the book that lists the evangelical affirmations, under "Second Coming and Judgment," there is no reference to the lake of fire. It states merely that "Unbelievers will be separated eternally from God" (p. 36). For an account of this conference, see World (June 3, 1989), p. 9.

2. R. J. Rushdoony, Foundations of Social Order: Studies in the Creeds and Councils of the Early Church (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1968] 1998). (<http://bit.ly/rjrfso>)

3. R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1971] 2007), p. 173. (<http://bit.ly/rjroam>)

the Bible to impose political and judicial sanctions on those who do.⁴

To understand the true nature of any social order, we must understand the covenantal structure of judgment. Because the biblical covenant has five parts, the structure of judgment is in five parts. This essay presents the biblical model that should be used to evaluate the judicial orders of rival societies.

B. The Absolute Sovereignty of God in Judgment

God is transcendent. He is not an aspect of the creation. He is present with it; He is not immanent or immersed in it. This is point one of the biblical covenant model: transcendence. God created the universe. It is dependent on Him. God is the final Judge because God is the Creator. He is sovereign over creation because He produced creation out of nothing. The autonomous power of His sovereign creative word created all things: "Let there be. . . ." Therefore, the autonomous power of His sovereign judicial word governs all things. The denial in the West of God's six-day creation, beginning in the eighteenth century, was followed decade by decade by a denial of God's law and sovereign judgeship. This development should surprise no one. That neo-evangelical theologians who never affirmed the six-day creation are today equally unwilling to affirm the doctrine of hell should also surprise no one.⁵

The structure of the creation reflects the very being of God: it is both one and many.⁶ The creation is diverse, yet it is unified under the sovereignty of one God. The creation was originally undeveloped, though originally perfect.

The creation is sustained by God: the doctrine of providence. Nature is not impersonal. It is totally personal.⁷ Men are to begin with God as the foundation of their social theories.

C. Constitutional Legitimacy

The second point of the biblical covenant model is hierarchy/ authority. God possesses lawful authority over man because God is the

4. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

5. See footnote #1.

6. Rushdoony wrote that "we have a temporal one and many in the created universe." Rushdoony, The One and the Many, p. 10.

7. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1.

Founder. He is the Founder of the covenant. He announces a binding covenant in history. In political theory, we call this fundamental covenant a constitution. The constitution sets forth the fundamental law of the society: point three of the biblical covenant model. The covenant is, in the words of Meredith G. Kline, the treaty of the great king.⁸ This constitution is the legal foundation of all subsequent legislation and judicial interpretation. It is the positive source of legitimacy of all civil government.⁹ It serves as a negative restraining factor in the administration of civil justice.¹⁰ That is, it provides judicial boundaries on state officials. It also provides the rules of interpretation that must govern all of the courts and juries in the land. These rules of interpretation are two-fold. First, they are moral: good vs. evil. Second, they are procedural: predictable vs. unpredictable.

There must be consistency between these two aspects of the judicial rules, and there must be widespread confidence in this consistency if people are to exercise self-government. On the one hand, if they believe that the judicial system is predictable (formally rational) but ethically corrupt, they will exercise self-government in ways that are inconsistent with the stated goals of the social order. They will seek ways to “beat the system” legally by using the formal rules of the judicial system to achieve their own personal ends—ends that are in conflict with the society’s stated ethical goals. A classic example of this was Vladimir Bukovsky’s successful attempt in the early 1970s, as a prisoner in a Soviet concentration camp, to use the camps’ formal rules of written protest to paralyze the operation of the camp.¹¹ On the other hand, if they perceive the legal system as ethical (substantively rational) but ju-

8. Meredith G. Kline, The Treaty of the Great King: The Covenant Structure of Deuteronomy (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1963).

9. According to Max Weber, “First, and in a positive sense, government must have a legitimate basis for its own jurisdiction; a modern government exercises its functions as a ‘legitimate’ jurisdiction, which means legally that it is regarded as resting on authorization by the constitutional norms of the state.” Max Weber, Economy and Society: An Outline of Interpretive Sociology, edited by Guenther Roth and Claus Wittich (New York: Bedminster Press, [1924] 1968), p. 644. This is the English translation of the fourth edition of Weber’s incomplete and posthumously published work, Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft.

10. Weber continued: “Secondly, and in a negative sense, the limitations on the power of the state by law and vested rights create those restraints upon its freedom of action to which it must adjust itself.” Idem.

11. He told this story in his book, To Build a Castle: My Life as a Dissident (New York: Viking, 1979), pp. 37–40. I summarize this incident in my book, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 19:C.

ditionally unpredictable and arbitrary, they will be unable to exercise self-government consistent with the stated goals of the social order. They will not trust the civil courts. They will not be able to understand the operations of the judicial system and its behavioral requirements for public order. They will not know what to expect from fellow citizens, since everyone is in the dark regarding what the courts will or will not enforce. Conclusion: for the maintenance of long-term social order, there has to be consistency between the fixed ethical requirements for social order and the court system's rules of procedure. Biblical law alone provides the judicial foundations of such a consistent legal order. Secularism does not.¹² Biblical law must provide legitimacy.

The issue of legitimacy is the most important aspect of social theory, political theory, and legal theory. Everything hinges on it. A social order cannot long exist without legitimacy: public confidence that the order is in basic conformity to fundamental ethical principles. Also needed is public confidence that right makes might, i.e., that righteousness will triumph institutionally in the long run. There must be widespread faith in the inherent rightness of the existing legal framework of society, and therefore faith that the social order will persevere through history as a result of its inherent rightness. In other words, there must be faith in the covenantal coherence of the social order: (1) a sovereign force (personal or impersonal) guarantees that if (2) those judicial agents who in history represent simultaneously both the force and the citizenry are faithful to (3) the force's revealed fundamental laws and norms, (4) bringing the state's negative sanctions against evil-doers, then there will be (5) long-term survival and prosperity for those under the society's jurisdiction. Where any of these aspects is lacking, or believed to be lacking, the social order suffers a decline in legitimacy. So does the political order that represents it judicially.¹³ (Amillennialism teaches right makes impotence.)

12. It was Max Weber's insight, as the premier humanistic social theorist of the twentieth century, that in modern secular society, there is no consistency possible in judicial rationalism. Substantive (ethical) rationalism is in permanent and irreconcilable dialectical tension with formal (procedural) rationalism. This is true not just in the legal order; it is equally true of the economic order, he argued. On his dialectical legal theory, see Weber, "Formal and Substantive Rationalization—Theocratic and Secular Law," Economy and Society, pp. 809–38. On the twin developments of capitalism and its relationship to a formal legal order vs. socialism and its relationship to a substantive legal order, see Economy and Society, pp. 100–7, 111, 224–25, 165, 856. On the whole question of Weber's dialectical analysis, see Gary North, "Max Weber: Rationalism, Irrationalism, and the Bureaucratic Cage," in North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1976), pp. 141–46.

This is why constitutional theory is central to both social and political order. The constitution enunciates the covenantal principles of the society. It is inescapably a judicial document. Moses, as the supreme representative agent, made a constitutional declaration in Deuteronomy 4. This declaration presented the legal foundations of Israel's legitimacy, both nationally and internationally (Deut. 4:1–10).

D. The Establishment of Legal Boundaries

A law necessarily excludes certain actions. It establishes moral boundaries: point three of the biblical covenant model—ethics. The biblical legislative model is the law which prohibited Adam's access to the tree in the garden: "No Trespassing!" When Adam violated this boundary, God extended its boundaries: the edges of the garden. "So he drove out the man; and he placed at the east of the garden of Eden Cherubims, and a flaming sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life" (Gen. 3:24). This boundary removed from Adam the ability to transgress it without dying on the spot. Both of these boundaries restricted Adam's legal sphere of action. The initial boundary served as a test of his covenantal faithfulness. The second one did not, or at least not to the same degree. The tree had no visible negative sanction attached to it; the doorway to the garden did.

1. Exercising Judgment

As the covenant-keeper matures judicially, he is supposed to apply the details of God's revealed law more self-consciously. Every area of life is to be brought progressively under covenant-keeping man's dominion. Why everything? Because of this inescapable fact: everything we think or do apart from redeeming grace is under the reign of sin. Therefore, everything we think or do is going to be judged at the final judgment. Nothing in history is outside of God's final judgment. Not what we do: "For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil" (Eccl.

13. Communist societies in Eastern (Central) Europe suffered a monumental and unprecedentedly rapid (for peacetime) public breakdown in late 1989, to a large degree because of the public's loss of faith in all five aspects of the covenantal order. Power alone could no longer maintain the Communist system. Might was visibly in conflict with right.

12:14). Not what we say: “But I say unto you, That every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment” (Matt. 12:36). Not what we think: “But I say unto you, That whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart” (Matt. 5:28).

But if everything is going to be judged by God at the end of time, then everything is under His comprehensive law today. There cannot be an infraction apart from a law against the act. Paul wrote: “For I was alive without the law once: but when the commandment came, sin revived, and I died. And the commandment, which [was ordained] to life, I found to be unto death. For sin, taking occasion by the commandment, deceived me, and by it slew me. Wherefore the law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good” (Rom. 7:9–12). God’s law is inherently unbounded: geographically, psychologically, institutionally. It applies to all of life. Redemption is also necessarily unbounded, just as sin is unbounded apart from grace. God’s grace is comprehensive—surely as comprehensive as sin’s present reign.¹⁴

This presents a problem. God’s law is concise. Life is infinitely complex. The written law does not and cannot spell out every conceivable application to every circumstance in history. Yet it applies to all of life. Thus, there will sometimes be a public action that appears to transgress the law when in fact it does not transgress it. Conversely, some acts may look legal when they are not. How can we make sense of this?

2. Gapless Law

To argue that every thought, word, and deed of every person in history is under God’s final sanctions is to argue that God’s law is gapless law. Nothing is outside it; everything is covered. Everything is inside the judicial boundaries established by God’s law. All acts are necessarily judicial acts; they are therefore inescapably personal acts. The law-order by which they are evaluated is equally personal. The law is binding on man because man is made in God’s image.

For a secular view of law to match biblical law’s comprehensive nature, it must assert the existence of an impersonal, uncreated, yet fully developed system of generalized legal propositions. Weber describes the nature of this assertion: "According to present modes of thought it represents an integration of all analytically derived legal propositions in such a way that they constitute a logically clear, internally consistent, and, at least in theory, gapless system of rules, under which, it is implied, all conceivable fact situations must be capable of being logically subsumed lest their order lack an effective guarantee. Even today not every body of law (e.g., English law) claims that it possesses the features of a system as defined above and, of course, the claim was even less frequently made by the legal systems of the past; where it was put forward at all, the degree of logical abstraction was often extremely low."¹⁵

14. Gary North, “Comprehensive Redemption: A Theology for Social Action” (1981), in North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>); Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

The modern form of this systematization, he said, was derived from Roman law.¹⁶ When Roman law was revived in the late medieval era, "it strengthened that tendency of the legal institutions themselves to become more and more abstract, which had begun already with the transformation of the Roman ius civile [civil law] into the law of the Empire. As Ehrlich has properly emphasized, in order for them to be received at all, the Roman legal institutions had to be cleansed of all remnants of national contextual association and to be elevated into the sphere of the logically abstract; and Roman law itself had to be absolutized as the very embodiment of right reason. The six centuries of Civil Law jurisprudence have produced exactly this result. At the same time, the modes of legal thought were turned more and more in the direction of formal logic."¹⁷ Step by step, brilliant summaries of the law were stripped of their context of specific cases and "raised to the level of ultimate legal principles from which deductive arguments were to be derived."¹⁸ A new ability was needed in order to apply this abstract law: the ability to "construe" the situation in a logically impeccable way.¹⁹ "In this way that conception of law which still prevails today and which sees in law a logically consistent and gapless complex of 'norms' waiting to be 'applied' became the decisive conception for legal thought."²⁰

To make plausible the existence of such a legal order, the logical

15. Weber, Economy and Society, p. 656.

16. Idem. Weber did his earliest academic work in the field of Roman law.

17. Ibid., p. 854.

18. Idem.

19. Ibid., p. 855.

20. Idem.

processes of the minds of judges have to be assumed to correspond on a one-to-one basis with the acts of men. There must be no gaps: within logic or between logic and the context of the specific act. That this requires a messianic view of man—or at least mankind's human judges—should be obvious. It means that the abstract principles of law must be as exhaustive as the contexts of all human action in every period and region, and the judge's mind must be equally exhaustive. That such a view of universal, abstract law was closely associated with the rise of the Roman Empire should not be surprising. Messianic men invariably attempt to establish messianic kingdoms. The assertion of man's exhaustive knowledge leads to the assertion of man's exhaustive authority, and vice versa.

There is also the problem of historical development. If the law is gapless, how can there be change? We are back to the old antinomy between Parmenides' unchanging, comprehensive reason and Heraclitus' ever-changing historical process. Long ago, Sir Henry Maine pointed to the legal fiction of gapless English law.

With respect to that great portion of our legal system which is enshrined in cases and recorded in law reports, we habitually employ a double language and entertain, as it would appear, a double and inconsistent set of ideas. When a group of facts come before an English Court for adjudication, the whole course of the discussion between the judge and the advocates assumes that no question is, or can be, raised which will call for the application of any principles but old ones, or of any distinctions but such as have long since been allowed. It is taken absolutely for granted that there is somewhere a rule of known law which will cover the facts of the dispute now litigated, and that, if such a rule be not discovered, it is only that the necessary patience, knowledge, or acumen is not forthcoming to detect it. Yet the moment the judgment has been rendered and reported, we slide unconsciously or unavowedly into a new language and a new train of thought. We now admit that the new decision has modified the law. The rules applicable have, to use the very inaccurate expression sometimes employed, become more elastic. In fact they have been changed. A clear addition has been made to the precedents. . . . The fact that the old rule has been repealed, and that a new one has replaced it, eludes us. . . .²¹

It is all a convenient legal fiction. "We do not admit that our

21. Sir Henry Sumner Maine, Ancient Law: Its Connection with the Early History of Society and its Relation to Modern Ideas, 5th ed. (New York: Henry Holt, 1864), p. 30. (<http://bit.ly/MaineLaw>)

tribunals legislate; we imply that they have never legislated; and yet we maintain that the rules of English common law, with some assistance from the Court of Chancery and from Parliament, are coextensive with the complicated interests of modern society.”²² There is no way theoretically to reconcile the theory of gapless law and the reality of historical development except by an appeal to the Creator as Lawgiver. Eventually, men reject what Maine calls a legal fiction. They adopt other explanations for the reliability of the “fit” between civil law and historical change: the sovereignty of the Parliament, or the Supreme Court, or the vanguard of the proletariat. Such is the fate of any legal theory that does not begin with the doctrine of cosmic personalism: the doctrine of creation.²³ The impersonal laws of the universe are said to produce the first true person in history: autonomous man.²⁴ Then man becomes the new god who legislates both morality and reality.²⁵ In legal theory, this leads to the idea of the sovereign lawmaker: either as legislator or judge. The absolutely sovereign law-giver is immanentized, and woe unto those who defy his will! The law-giver becomes totally arbitrary and highly personal. The only remotely consistent theoretical alternative is the ideal modern law-giver described by Weber: the judge as “an automaton into which legal documents and fees are stuffed at the top in order that it may spill forth the verdict at the bottom along with the reasons, read mechanically from codified paragraphs. . . .”²⁶ From cosmic impersonalism to judicial personalism and back to impersonalism: this is the vicious circle of judicial humanism. Such is the fate of any theory of gapless law in an autonomous universe. The only secular alternative is a theory of gap-filled law, which leads to the acceptance of the inevitability of judicial arbitrariness. Someone must fill the gaps.

This leads us to the next question: Who will fill these gaps in the civil law?

E. Fitting the Law and the Act

The jury or the judge must determine the closeness of the fit between formal legislation and a public act. This is point four of the biblical covenant model: sanctions. As I have said, written law cannot

22. Ibid., p. 32.

23. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 1.

24. Ibid., Appendix A.

25. North, Is the World Running Down, ch. 1.

26. Weber, Economy and Society, p. 979.

be exhaustive. Jurors determine this fit re-creatively; God determines it creatively. Jurors must exercise judgment in God's name. They must act representatively. They cannot act mechanically, for the law is not mechanical. They cannot act "digitally," as a computer does, for man thinks analogically: as a creature who images God.²⁷ More to the point, a computer program is not in danger of eternal damnation; man is. Personalism is inescapable in all civil judgment. This stems from the fact that there is an inescapable cosmic personalism in every aspect of history. Everything is under the historical decree of God and the absolute sovereignty of God.

How can men impose their judgments personally yet judicially? How can they "make the fit" between God's revealed law and a person's public action? No event is identical to any other; no point in history is identical to any other. Thus, establishing a "perfect fit" between ever-changing history and God's unchanging legal principles is impossible for a creature who is not omniscient. Judicial perfection eludes man. Alternatively, no historical act or event is totally unconnected with any other. There is no autonomy in the universe. The decree of God and the revealed law of God tie all events into a common history. How, then, can judges "make the fit"?

27. One of the most impressive intellectual failures in history was the attempt by mathematical genius Alan Turing to specify the conditions of a digital mechanical logic that would "think" as a human brain thinks. He died a suicide in 1954, although his homosexuality also probably contributed to his psychological demise. A comprehensive biography is Andrew Hodges' Alan Turing: The Enigma (New York: Touchstone, [1983] 1984). See especially Chapter 7. In debating with Turing, mathematician M. H. A. Newman appealed to man's analogical thinking in describing the role of imagination in mathematics. Ibid., p. 451.

1. Casuistry and Intuition

Casuistry is the art of applying general law to specific cases. Biblical casuistry declined rapidly in Protestant cultures after 1700, as rationalism spread into every area of life, especially judicial life.²⁸ Yet no one can avoid casuistry. We live under law—either God’s or someone else’s. We apply general rules to specific circumstances all day long. It is never a case of “casuistry vs. no casuistry.” It is always a case of some system’s casuistry.²⁹ Rendering judgment is always overwhelmingly an intuitive process, though grounded in some view of law and action. We do not think about the relationship between law and action in every decision we make daily. We act habitually. But our habits are shaped by an implicit casuistry.

A covenant-keeping individual is required by God to have extensive familiarity with the specific details of God’s law. He must also gain experience in making judgments in terms of this law. Judging begins with self-judgment. Making judgments is similar to making bread, making houses, or making anything else. Many of the skills—probably most of them—are too complex to be verbalized or written down. For example, there are no handbooks telling us how to ride a bicycle—safety requirements, yes, but not the actual skills. The skilled craftsman is in a position to exercise his skills in a way that an unskilled craftsman cannot, even though the unskilled craftsman may have read a lot of books on the topic, and the skilled craftsman may be illiterate. There are no handbooks that show people how to become professional craftsmen or athletes, as distinguished from amateurs. These unique differentiating degrees of skill can be gained over long periods of practice. They cannot be measured except by actual performance. Similarly with juries: in fitting a specific law to the actual public act that is being brought into consideration by the jury, the jurors must exercise an informed intuition in order to declare a person guilty or not guilty. This skill is not formally obtained in daily life, yet juries do their work effectively. How? Because Western civilization was originally Christian, and centuries of preaching on judicial Bible texts helped to transfer the fundamentals of biblical judicial intuition—wisdom in its widest sense—to large numbers of people. By applying God’s law in the family and the church, we are to become more skilled in serving as coven-antly faithful civil jurors. This is the art of biblical casuistry.

28. Thomas Wood, English Casuistical Divinity in the Seventeenth Century (London: S.P.C.K., 1952).

29. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 50:C.

Men must rely on intuition in order to make righteous judgments—casuistical judgments. Intuition cannot be rationally specified. There are creaturely limits on man's thinking and his language. There will never be a limitless creature. Only the Creator is limitless. Nevertheless, we can describe the effects of intuition's operations. We can glimpse it by looking at where it isn't. Intuition is that undefinable area in between semi-fixed habit and action, between judicial law and action, between moral principle and action—an area that cannot be specified logically or verbally. Why not? Because we cannot specify every step in any logical procedure or "chain of reasoning." The logical chain is not made up of discrete, interconnected "links." The "links" are not in fact interconnected, one to another. The chain of logic is not really a chain; it is a series of discrete, identifiable logical "markers" that we are capable of recognizing and manipulating, and which we assume are connected by inconceivably small units of logic that we cannot specify. These supposedly infinitesimal units we believe "fill in the gaps" between our leaps of reasoning, point to point. We have faith that there is a continuum linking the small mental steps that we can identify and connect analogically. The mathematician assumes that the structure of the arithmetical continuum is that of "beads on a string, but without the string."³⁰ He assumes what he cannot really prove or describe. So does the humanist legal theorist. There is continuity in life. This includes judicial life: law and action. This is what makes predictable law enforcement possible. The question is: What is the basis of this continuity? The Calvinist says: "The comprehensive decree of an omniscient, absolutely sovereign God." The humanist answers: "The evolving intuition of the hypothetical mind of sovereign collective man in an evolving universe."³¹

There is also discontinuity in life. Each action is to some degree—a scientifically unmeasurable degree—different from any other. This means that there is a discontinuity between actions. Also, each law is unique. This means that there is a discontinuity between laws. The "gap" between our discontinuous actions, as well as the "gap" between discontinuous laws, is the area that we must judge intuitionally. For

30. Nicholas Georgescu-Roegen, The Entropy Law and the Economic Process (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1971), p. 65. See his discussion of the continuum, time, being and becoming, mind, and "simple infinity": pp. 64–76.

31. The Arminian does not answer, since he does not bother himself with such "unspiritual" academic questions.

civil laws to judge the actions of individuals, there must be a “fit”: a comparative absence of gaps. The smaller the gap, the more predictable the judgment. The larger the gap, the more power is transferred to the state: arbitrary law enforcement. It is the jury’s task to decide behind closed doors and then publicly declare whether a particular judicial gap is sufficiently small to authorize a conviction.

(It is also the American jury’s task to determine the legitimacy of the law under which the state has brought its case, although American judges no longer instruct juries on this point and have not since the late nineteenth century. In fact, judges sometimes instruct jurors falsely, telling them that a jury has no right to judge the law, a lie that jurors tend to believe.³² Judges rarely allow defense attorneys to tell this to juries at any point in the proceedings.³³ A defense attorney can be held in contempt of court for ignoring the judge’s instruction to him to cease informing the jury of its Constitutional right to determine the legitimacy of any law. What was originally known as jury nullification—the common law authority of juries to nullify the application of a law in specific court cases—has been transformed to mean the right of judges to nullify the authority of juries in defiance of common law.³⁴ Excessive authority has thereby been transferred illegitimately to legislators, prosecutors, and judges. This process has accompanied and intensified the centralization of political power.)

2. Casuistry and Biblical Wisdom

Knowledge is a scarce economic resource. That is to say, at zero price there is more demand for it than the supply of it. Many, many errors in economic and social analysis rest on an unstated assumption

32. In a common law jury room, no one can tell the jury what to do. It is as autonomous legally as the U.S. Supreme Court.

33. The closing statement of Paul Newman in the movie, The Verdict, in which he reminds the jury of its right to consider the legitimacy of the law, was highly dramatic and altogether fictional. No judge would have permitted him to continue. The judge would have instructed the jury to disregard Newman’s remarks, not because they were false but because they were true.

34. In a Texas county courtroom in which I had been called as part of a large group to be a candidate to serve on a jury, the judge asked each prospective juror to stand up if he or she believed that a jury has the right to decide the law as well as the facts. He threatened to dismiss any juror who stood up. I refused to stand up because he had no moral authority before God to make such an inquiry. Any American juror has the right to remain silent until he gets into the jury room, and he then has the right to “hang” the jury—no verdict—if he believes that a law is immoral or unconstitutional. The juror is sovereign, not the judge.

that accurate knowledge is a zero-price resource.³⁵ On the contrary, it is expensive. This is why the advent of the computer and low-cost data storage, retrieval, and transmission has been a monumental breakthrough in men's pursuit of wealth. Management theorist Peter Drucker—arguably America's most insightful observer of trends, 1939–2005—has written: "The greatest challenge of the computer industry is to learn how to build information bases, not databases."³⁶ He is correct about something else, a secular adaptation of what the Bible announced in Solomon's day: "Today, the real and controlling resource and absolutely decisive factor of production is neither capital nor land nor labor. It is knowledge."³⁷

But we need more than knowledge; we need wisdom. Wisdom is grounded in the ethics of the word of God. We need more than techniques to convert the computer's digitally stored data into man's analogically interpreted information. Drucker comments: "We need an economic theory that puts knowledge into the center of the wealth-producing process."³⁸ The Austrian theory of entrepreneurship comes closest to performing this task. (Drucker was an Austrian economist, but not an Austrian School economist.) Yet even the Austrian theory of entrepreneurship, most notably Israel Kirzner's extension of it, places nonrational insight—Kant's noumenal realm—at the heart of the economic process. This noumenalism has become self-conscious irrationalism in the writings of G. L. S. Shackle and Ludwig Lachmann.³⁹ We need a breakthrough in man's ethical knowledge to accompany the technological breakthrough in digitally stored data-in-to-information. We need biblical casuistry—the application of biblical law to historical circumstances—and we need God's grace to conform our thoughts and actions to what we know to be true. If we do not get this, and on a widespread basis, then we face God's wrath in history:

35. Thomas Sowell, Knowledge and Decisions (New York: Basic Books, 1981). I regard this book as the single most important work in political economy of my generation. It shows the importance in so many different areas of the idea that there is a price for knowledge. Solomon's injunction, "get wisdom," is not a zero-price injunction. "Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom: and with all thy getting get understanding" (Prov. 4:7). "How much better is it to get wisdom than gold! and to get understanding rather to be chosen than silver!" (Prov. 16:16). "Wherefore is there a price in the hand of a fool to get wisdom, seeing he hath no heart to it?" (Prov. 17:16).

36. "According to Peter Drucker," ASAP [As Soon As Possible] (March 29, 1993), p. 90.

37. Ibid., p. 94.

38. Idem.

39. North, Authority and Dominion, Appendix H.

from those to whom much knowledge has been given much is expected (Luke 12:47–48).

3. Judicial Review

Because the constitution is the source of legitimacy for all subsequent legislation, there is no escape from the legal principle known as judicial review: point four of the biblical covenant model.⁴⁰ Someone in the hierarchy must announce the legitimacy or illegitimacy of specific pieces of legislation and also the legitimacy of the decisions of lower courts. Someone must act as the interpreter of the principles set forth as fundamental law in the constitution. There is no escape from final judgment after history, nor is there escape from the principle of judicial review in history.

The Founder has chosen a representative agent in history. This delegated agent is man. Man alone is made in God's image. He is a true, personal reflection of God. This is why he is the agent to whom God has delegated legitimate sovereignty. In calling Adam to serve as judge, God called a perfect man in history to serve as His agent. But that perfect man was immature. This means, among other things, that he was judicially immature. He had only one law that he had been given in order to serve as a restraint against him. That law was that he could not eat from a particular tree. God set a legal boundary around that tree. In order to gain maturity, Adam had to learn self-government under God. He needed time in order to mature judicially. He needed obedience to mature judicially. He needed experience to mature judicially. Obedience is a product of self-government under God. Experience to some extent must be based on one's learning the principles of judging others in one's capacity as a judge. Adam was put at the head of a household. He was given authority to exercise judgment in history over others. There can be no development of judicial maturity in history without holding some kind of office. This is why the church requires that elders in the church must be lawful rulers over their families (I Tim. 3:4–5).⁴¹

There is only one final judgment. There is only one final court of appeal. But both of these are outside of history. Thus, any judicial spokesman in history cannot be absolutely sovereign. His word cannot be final. No single earthly court can legitimately command absolute obedience. This is why the biblical doctrine of judicial review, being Trinitarian and therefore plural—family, church (local, regional, national, international), and state (local, regional, national, and international)—does not lead to the creation of absolute civil government. The decision of any supreme court can be appealed to the courts in the other lawfully sovereign realms. The decision of a final supreme court should be capable of being overruled by a combination of the legislative and executive powers. Whenever man seeks to create an institutionally unified earthly court that possesses a final word on the law, he acts messianically. The quest for a single supreme world court beyond which no appeal is legal, like the quest for a single national supreme court beyond which no appeal is legal, is a messianic quest: the quest for perfect justice.⁴² It inevitably leads to a widespread disrespect for law and subsequent evasion, tyranny, revolution, and judicial breakdown.

40. North, Political Polytheism, ch. 10.

41. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 4.

F. Judicial Precedents and Legal Predictability

If the court is not to become arbitrary in its judicial pronouncements, it must be under restraints. Restraints include the following: (1) the clarity and generality of the constitution; (2) the clarity and constitutional consistency of the written statutes; (3) the irreversible sovereignty of the jury in deciding innocence; (4) the threat of judicial review. But there is another restraint, one which is especially important in common-law countries: legal precedent. Judicial decisions are supposed to be cumulative and consistent. They are supposed to provide information to litigants regarding the ways in which courts have applied the law to specific past cases.

1. Concealed Legislation

Because the Anglo-American common law system is primarily law based on judicial precedents by judges, it is sometimes called judge-made law.⁴³ Selecting from judicial precedents becomes a disguised means of legislating. No one has stated this more forcefully (and perhaps cynically) than the great English legal historian, A. V. Dicey. "But the appeal to precedent in the law courts merely is a useful fiction by which judicial decision conceals its transformation into judicial legislation; and a fiction is none the less a fiction because it has emerged from the Courts into the field of politics or of history. Here, then, the astuteness of lawyers has imposed upon the simplicity of historians."⁴⁴ This fiction was maintained for many centuries in Great Britain and the United States. Write Murphy and Pritchett: "It was not until well into the nineteenth century that either the British Parliament or the American Congress began to pass many statutes dealing with the everyday affairs of private citizens."⁴⁵ It took centuries before Parliament dealt with such matters as trespass, property, wills, contracts, and obligations between employers and employees.⁴⁶

42. Macklin Fleming, The Price of Perfect Justice: The Adverse Consequences of Current Legal Doctrine on the American Courtroom (New York: Basic Books, 1974).

43. Walter F. Murphy and C. Herman Pritchett, Courts, Judges, and Politics: An Introduction to the Judicial Process, 2nd ed. (New York: Random House, 1974), p. 5.

It was assumed by the founders and practitioners of the common law that the law, while not gapless, could be determined by judges by a careful study of past decisions. The "fit" between a general legal principle and the specific case could be filled in by precedents stemming from similar cases. In other words, history has continuity. There is an evolutionary development over time: law becomes more precise and more predictable as cases pile up. The assumption, of course, is that the pile of cases is itself coherent, at least in the aggregate. The judge can therefore make judicially significant connections between the facts of the case before him and the results of many similar cases in the past. The past cases are assumed to be consistent. They are presumed to be an orderly pile, not chaos in the brickyard. But modern thought affirms only chaos in the brickyard.⁴⁷ The orderliness of the pile is now assumed to be the product of the judge's mind; there is supposedly no inherent order in the facts themselves. Judicial facts are regarded as no more coherent than any other facts. Any perceived coherence is the product of the human mind. This has made an epistemological jumble of legal precedents. They serve as a model of Heraclitus' dictum: everything flows. But where?

2. Time and Eternity

We find here a manifestation of an ancient philosophical antinomy: facts vs. logic. Common law formally clings to the legal fiction

44. A. V. Dicey, Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution, 8th ed. (Indianapolis, Indiana: LibertyClassics, [1915] 1982), p. cxxxvii.

45. Murphy and Pritchett, Courts, p. 5.

46. Ibid., p. 6.

47. Bernard K. Forscher, "Chaos in the Brickyard," Science (Oct. 18, 1963), p. 339.

of the autonomous relevance of historical fact. Civil law, meaning Roman law, clings to the legal fiction of the autonomous comprehensive mind of the statute writer. The war between the two concepts is as total as the war between Heraclitus' concept that "all is flux" and Parmenides' concept that "all is fixed logic." It is the war between timeless logic and changing history. This is one of the continuing themes in the apologetics of Cornelius Van Til. As Van Til asks with respect to the relationship between timeless principles and historical flux: "How then could you expect that time should suddenly be able and willing to submit to the ways of eternity? On the other hand, how could you expect that Eternity should suddenly feel at home when taken into the realm of time? Far easier could you bring under one roof an old bachelor and an old maid, both of them accustomed to a life of abstraction from one another, and expect that they would get along in harmony. . . ?"⁴⁸ Common law vs. Roman law: it is the age-old humanist epistemological war between the flowing stream and the ice cube.⁴⁹ Either the river freezes, ceasing to flow, or the ice cube melts, ceasing to exist as a separate entity.

At the heart of Roman civil law was the belief that "law was precisely what that term meant, a system, closed, self-contained, and self-sustained, a neatly ordered body of principles hierarchically arranged, with the less fundamental principles logically deduced from the more fundamental. Any judicial tampering with this system, even if only a charitable effort to ease the law's commands in a particular case, was bound to do more harm than good in the long run by destroying the intellectual integrity of the entire corpus."⁵⁰ But the threat to such a "corpus" is rigor mortis: unchanging bodies are dead. How can the fixed principles of law be made relevant in history? How can an unchanging hierarchy of hypothetically rational, gapless law be applied in ever-more predictable and ever-more ethical ways to a hypothetically gapless river of ceaseless, judicially undifferentiated change? Secularism provides no consistent answer.

Secular legal theory cannot solve the problem of judicial intruders and defenders. The Roman law statute-makers resented the intrusion of the judges. The common law judges in turn resented the intrusion of the statute-makers. According to legal historian Lawrence Fried-

48. Cornelius Van Til, A Survey of Christian Epistemology, vol. II of In Defense of Biblical Christianity (Den Dulk Foundation, 1969), p. 41.

49. Van Til's ice cube analogy is found in ibid., p. 35.

50. Murphy and Pritchett, Courts, p. 4.

man, "For a long time, the proud judges looked at statutes with great suspicion. Statutes were unwelcome intrusions on the law, and were treated accordingly. In Continental law, all law (in theory) is contained in the codes. In common law many basic rules of law are found nowhere but in the recorded opinions of the judges."⁵¹

3. Sanctification

The biblical solution to this dilemma is the doctrine of sanctification: definitive, progressive, and final. There is not only definitive sanctification in history—the morally perfect life, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ—there is also progressive sanctification: the increasing conformity of individuals and collectives to the fixed, gap-less legal order established by the Creator. Through the judicial maturation of covenant-keeping men, empowered by the Holy Spirit, society progressively conforms itself to the judicial requirements of God. What Paul said of the individual applies also to collectives.

For we are saved by hope: but hope that is seen is not hope: for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for? But if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it. Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our infirmities: for we know not what we should pray for as we ought: but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered. And he that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, because he maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God. And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose. For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brethren. Moreover whom he did predestinate, them he also called: and whom he called, them he also justified: and whom he justified, them he also glorified. What shall we then say to these things? If God be for us, who can be against us? He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things? Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth. Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us (Rom. 8:24–34).

The biblical view of civil law is that legislators may lawfully change 51. Lawrence M. Friedman, A History of American Law (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1973), pp. 17–18.

existing statutes, and courts may lawfully alter the body of precedents, but only if such nullification or modification is necessary to make an existing law or custom conform to the requirements of God's revealed law. Covenant-breaking formal rationalism—predictable evil laws—is not a valid substitute for biblical law. Neither is a legal system based formally on biblical law in which judges have the authority to refuse to apply it. The institutional hope, then, is for juries to be composed of well-informed, covenant-keeping people. We call such a civil order a theocracy.⁵²

Conclusion

Rendering civil or ecclesiastical judgment is a covenantal act. It rests on the doctrine of creation and the doctrine of man as the image of God. Man is capable of thinking God's thoughts after Him. This makes it possible for men to establish connection among: (1) general principles of biblical law (the Ten Commandments), (2) the biblical case laws, (3) judicial precedents, (4) assessing historical acts that are suspected of being crimes, and (5) restitution/restoration.

The theory of gapless law is correct, but only when applied to the mind of God. He alone is omniscient, which is the underlying presupposition of a theory of gapless law. To think analogously to God, men must use intuition that is the product of two things: their study of the Bible-revealed law of God and their experience in applying God's law to specific judicial cases involving public acts. This is why only judicial covenant-keepers, meaning church members, are allowed by God to serve as civil judges in a formally covenanted holy commonwealth. This is why theocracy—the rule of God—has political implications. The citizen is a judge. He must render civil judgment. Only covenant-keepers are allowed to do this in a covenant-keeping society. Any theory of citizenship that denies this is necessarily also a theory of civil justice that denies the continuing authority of God's Bible-revealed civil law in the New Testament era.

Christian legal theory is equally at war with common law and Roman law. Common law theory assumes that coherence will emerge from a long string of judicial precedents: the sovereignty of judges in history. Roman law theory assumes that coherence is imposed by the statute-makers: the sovereignty of legislators in history. Neither assumption is correct. Coherence in legal affairs in history begins with

52. North, Political Polytheism, ch. 2.

God's omniscience and ends with God's final judgment. Without the assumption of an omniscient God who imposes His ongoing judgments over time and eternity, autonomous man's hope for coherence and justice cannot be progressively realized. Without access to the God's constitution of liberty—His written revelation in the Bible—mankind will not escape bondage to tyrants.

Appendix F

RUSHDOONY ON “HYBRIDIZATION”: FROM GENETIC SEPARATION TO RACIAL SEPARATION

For the scripture saith, Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed. For there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek: for the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon him. For whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved (Rom. 10:11–13).

The New Covenant announces the restoration of the original judicial unity of covenant-keeping mankind. Under the New Covenant, the Mosaic barriers between Jew and Greek are erased forever (Acts 10). The unity of Trinitarian confession erases the judicial relevance of all other cultural and racial diversities among covenant-keepers. The unity of Trinitarian confession is the fundamental unity of the redeemed in history, for it will be their fundamental unity in eternity.

There is a great divide separating men: conflicting confessions. Men are either covenant-keepers or covenant-breakers. This division extends into eternity. All other disunities are secondary to this one: rival confessions regarding the person and work of Jesus Christ.

Men seek other forms of unity besides Trinitarian confession. There are rival confessions regarding religion, politics, language, and culture. But the most powerful of all rival unities through the ages is racial unity. This unity is declared as primary again and again in history. Skin of different colors, hair of different types, eyes differently shaped: here are the building blocks of racist social theories. Even the attraction between the sexes—a powerful biological drive—is said to be secondary to the importance of race. Interracial marriages are called “mongrelization,” as if men were animals.¹

1. The theology of the 1960s racist cult leader Wesley A. Swift is typical of this outlook. He wrote that “mankind violated the courses of divine law, by mongrelizing his

A. Confession Is Supreme

Christianity subordinates sexual bonding to confession. Racism subordinates sexual bonding to race. The Christian insists that a confusion of parental confessions places the children in eternal jeopardy. The racist insists that a confusion of parental races places the children outside the bounds of acceptable society: the half-breed as cultural nomad. The Christian announces a confessional covenant. The racist announces a blood covenant. The Christian denies the legitimacy of a blood covenant, save one: the judicial covenant based on Christ's shed blood. The racist may hedge his language in an attempt to make his blood covenant sound acceptable in a world of confessional covenants, or more important in modern times, political covenants. But the appeal of the racist's blood covenant continues through the ages, while other covenants rise and fall, save one variety: confessional covenants.

It is strategically crucial today for Christian Reconstructionists to affirm this principle of confessional covenantalism because of Reconstructionism's commitment to biblical law. The other movement similarly committed to biblical law is the Identity-Destiny-British Israel movement. These groups believe that white Anglo-Americans are the biological heirs of the 10 lost tribes of Israel, and this supposedly genetic covenant is still binding: the judicial basis for honoring biblical law today. Thus, these groups are tied to the idea of a blood covenant. In the more radical Identity groups, such as the white supremacist Aryans, this blood covenantalism can turn violent against members of other races, especially Jews and blacks. In the first major academic races. . . ." Swift, In the Beginning God, p. 1. Sermon, Feb. 5, 1967, published by the New Christian Crusade Church, Hollywood, California. The Mongolian race, he said, appeared 660,000 years ago; the Negro race appeared 73,000 years ago; and the white race appeared 7,400 years ago. Swift, God's Call to Race (Hollywood, California: New Christian Crusade Church, n.d.), p. 2. "After the fall of Lucifer, the areas of retrogression have generally been marked by their integration and mongrelization. The Negroid is one of the lowest species on the face of the earth, because he fell the furthest, and because, when he came to earth under the Luciferian design, he was used for the mongrelization of the ancient Asiatics and the interference with other races." Ibid., p. 5. Then what of the great flood in which all but one family perished? Swift's answer: there was no universal flood. Lots of other races survived the local flood in Noah's day. "There weren't any Negroes involved in the flood." Swift, Were All the People of the Earth Drowned in the flood? (Hollywood, California: New Christian Crusade Church, n.d.), p. 25. Swift's covenant was a racial covenant: "We think, when people understand these things, they will understand their divine responsibility which is to preserve their race and to carry out the directions of God." Idem.

study of the Identity movement, Michael Barkun correctly separates Reconstruction from Identity, but then offered a warning:

The theme of Bible-centered law cannot be left before examining one final element: the striking resemblance between the concept of Bible-centered law in British-Israelism and Christian Identity, on the one hand, and its counterpart among some contemporary evangelicals, on the other. These so-called "Reconstructionists" are part of the dominion theology movement that urges the reconstruction of society on Christian lines prior to the Second Coming. The Reconstructionists, including such figures as Rousas John Rushdoony, David Chilton, and Gary DeMar, consider biblical law binding and wish to see American law recast in biblical terms. There is, however, no evidence of any connection between the small but influential Reconstructionist movement and the British-Israel or Identity groups considered here. Indeed, there is no evidence that either is even aware of the other.² Where British-Israelism drew legal inferences from its claim of Israelite ancestry, Reconstructionism reflects a quite different Calvinist tradition transmitted through Dutch Reformed scholars and institutions. Nonetheless, should Reconstructionism expand beyond its currently small coterie, it may create a climate of opinion from which similar Christian Identity doctrines will inadvertently benefit. Since Reconstructionist leaders are trained intellectuals (something Identity figures are certainly not), the rigor of their approach may confer a halo of respectability on all ideas of Bible-centered law, including Identity's, despite the latter's completely separate origins.³

I take this warning very seriously. All traces of racist blood covenantalism in Christian Reconstruction must be forthrightly rejected on the basis of confessional covenantalism. This is my goal in this essay.

B. What Is a Hybrid?

In 1967, Rushdoony wrote: "In view of the complexity of the problem of defining species, the problem of hybrids is correspondingly difficult. The phenomenon is real, but what is it? . . . Does the present state of knowledge permit the extensive theorizing so prevalent on every side of the issue?"⁴ He made a good point. The whole question of hybrids and species was scientifically unresolved. He quoted an evolutionist, Irving W. Kornbloch, in what he described as "a very careful and conscientious survey of what is called 'The Role of Hybridization in Evolution' but is actually a survey of hybridization as such. . . ." Kornbloch had written: "If hybridization plays only a minor role in evolution, as some maintain, it is very strange indeed that there are so many vigorous, fertile hybrids in existence today, and more being found each year by those who earnestly search for them." Rushdoony's reply was narrowly focused: "To 'prove' hybrids is one thing, to 'prove' evolution is another." His point was well-taken: the two are not obviously the same.

2. This is incorrect. Rushdoony and I have relied on the work of a British Israelite, Curtis C. Ewing, with respect to the structure of the sabbath week of Mosaic Israel. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 134, 511, 830n. Ewing would occasionally attend conferences where Rushdoony or I would speak. He, like Rushdoony, kept the dietary laws. Rushdoony repeatedly cited the work of Howard B. Rand, Digest of the Divine Law (Merrimac, Massachusetts: Destiny Publishers, 1943). See Institutes, pp. 57, 106, 228, 528n.

3. Michael Barkun, Religion and the Racist Right: The Origins of the Christian Identity Movement (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1994), pp. 208–9.

Then Rushdoony went on to say something that he did not attempt to prove: an attempted neutralization of Kornbloch's assertion of beneficial hybrids. "Kornbloch has only demonstrated, in terms of a particular approach, that hybrids exist. More than that, he has not shown."⁵ Perhaps; I have not read Kornbloch's book. But Rushdoony's final retort was simply rhetorical agnosticism: "Does the present state of knowledge permit the extensive theorizing so prevalent on every side of the issue?"

Six years later, all of his previous agnosticism regarding hybrids had departed, although there had been no significant breakthrough in scientific evidence regarding the evils of most hybrids, as far as Rushdoony ever suggested in print. He elevated hybridization in society to the status of covenantal evil, making its eradication a foundational principle in his social theory. In doing so, he moved from covenantalism to racism, as we shall see.

C. Leviticus 19:19: Case Law of Separation

In Chapter 17, I provided an explanation of the case law against the interbreeding of cattle, mixing seeds in the same field, and not wearing clothing made of a linen-wool mixture (Lev. 19:19). I identified the underlying principle: temporary separation. I explained the first two prohibitions in terms of the mandatory separation of the tribes in Israel, and the third prohibition in terms of separating priestly status from non-priestly status. There had to be a policy of active separation of cattle breeds because of the normal tendency for cattle to interbreed. This means that the law had nothing to do with eliminating hybrids. The offspring of two breeds of cattle are not sterile. This was the reason why they had to be separated.

4. R. J. Rushdoony, The Mythology of Science (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1967] 2001), p. 154. (<http://bit.ly/rjrtmos>)

5. Idem.

Rushdoony explained Leviticus 19:19 in terms of a biblical principle that there must be no hybrids in society. He discussed this verse in a section he titled "Hybridization and Law."⁶ He concluded the section with this assertion: "Third, hybridization and unequal yoking involve a fundamental disrespect for God's handiwork which leads to futile experimentation, such as organ transplants, which represent sterile and limited gains in some areas, and a basic loss of moral perspective in every area."⁷ Given the fact that Greg Bahnsen was given at least an extra decade and a half of life and productivity because of a pig's valve that was sown into his heart, this conclusion by Rushdoony certainly needs exegetical evidence.⁸

With respect to mixed fabrics, Rushdoony said, "To bring diverse things together in an unnatural union is to despise the order of God's creation."⁹ This principle of interpretation—unnatural union—does not stem from Leviticus 19:19, nor is applicable to the passage. Such an interpretation reverses the meaning of the prohibition against the mixing of the seeds. What is normal within a local species is genetic mixing. Genetic separation within a species is abnormal: the result of environmental separation. In the case of the prohibition against mixing breeds of cattle or mixing crops in a field, the primary issue in Leviticus 19:19 was symbolic of the mandatory but unnatural preservation of the separate tribes of Israel until Shiloh came, the promised Seed. This is why this temporary prohibition ended when the promised Seed came, overcoming the judicial separation among Israel's tribes, and also between Jew and Greek, bond and free, male and female (Gal. 3:28). Within the confessional covenant of Trinitarianism, such separation is no longer mandated by God.

To the extent that Rushdoony's comment applies only to the pro-

6. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 253–62.

7. Ibid., p. 262.

8. Bahnsen's physician told him that the same sort of congenital heart defect that afflicted him had been invariably fatal a decade before Bahnsen received his first heart operation. There had been no known treatment. Bahnsen died the year after the first edition of Boundaries and Dominion (1994) was published.

9. Ibid., p. 87.

hibition regarding mixed fibers, we need to remember that clothing itself is unnatural. Clothing does not grow on trees or sheep. It is manufactured. The judicial issue of the third prohibition of Leviticus 19:19 was never the “unnatural” mixing of fabrics; all fabrics are unnatural. The issue was exclusively symbolic and ritualistic. The prohibition against wearing mixed wool-linen clothing had to do with priestly sacrifices and priestly clothing in a nation of priests. Wool makes people retain sweat on their bodies; linen does not. Thus, ritually speaking, the two fibers were at cross purposes. They are no longer at cross purposes because the New Covenant has abolished animal sacrifices. Priests today are not told by God what kind of fabric to wear. Sweat is no longer a matter of ritual importance. The new priesthood is clothed in Christ as a result of baptism (Gal. 3:27).

D. The Question of Sterility

Rushdoony’s entire subsection is titled, “Hybridization and Law.”¹⁰ In commenting on Leviticus 19:19, he reproduced a lengthy extract from Ellicott’s commentary, most of which was devoted to a consideration of genetic mixing. Only one sentence refers to mixing wool and linen. Rushdoony said that the hybrid comes at great costs—sterility—“and thereby violates God’s creation ordinance.”¹¹ He identified the prohibition against genetic mixing within a species as a creation ordinance rather than a temporary ordinance governing national Israel. Then he added that “the commandments clearly require a respect for God’s creation.”¹²

There never was any such creation ordinance, as Jacob’s experiment in miraculous breeding indicates. Jacob’s agreement with Laban allowed Jacob to obtain ownership of those sheep and goats that were born in his herds (Gen. 30:33). He used rods to separate his animals from Laban’s, and those conceived before the rods were stronger animals, although they were multi-colored and visibly less desirable. Laban wound up with feeble animals; Jacob with stronger (Gen. 30:42). There is no question that Jacob established a system of genetic manipulation. He allowed God to do the work, but he actively intervened in order to let God do the work: “And Jacob did separate the lambs, and set the faces of the flocks toward the ringstraked, and all the brown in the flock of Laban; and he put his own flocks by themselves, and put them not unto Laban's cattle" (Gen. 30:40). The Hebrew word translated cattle here can be translated as flock, herd, stock, or possession. It was not limited to bovines.

10. Ibid., p. 253.

11. Ibid., p. 255.

12. Idem.

Rushdoony was arguing that within a species, sexual mixing is unnatural and is therefore prohibited by biblical law. His argument makes no sense. first, what did he mean, "unnatural"? What is natural is interbreeding within a species. What is unnatural is separation. Second, if "hybridization" normally produces sterility, then it surely is a case of theological overkill to present the prohibition of hybridization as a fundamental principle of biblical law. Why would biblical law place the supposed principle of anti-hybridization into a position of importance if most hybrids are impotent? Hybrids are hardly a threat to social order. They cannot maintain their own uniqueness down through the generations. Their heirs lose any original unique characteristics as they interbreed. If anything, most hybrids become weaker over time: less able to compete in a natural environment. Their fruits are usually consumer goods, not long-term capital goods. Third, the scientific definition of a species is that cross-breeding is possible and normal among its members if they reside in the same environment. Rushdoony's assumption of the normality of genetic separation in nature is incorrect. The opposite is true. Genetic separation in nature, meaning the development of new breeds within a species, is produced by the interplay of reproduction and local environmental changes.¹³ Species do not evolve, but local variants of a species can change in response to environmental changes. One such environmental change is technology: men's development of specialized breeding techniques.¹⁴

Hybrids themselves were of no concern to the Mosaic law. What was of concern was the active scientific process of interbreeding inside the boundaries of Israel. The prohibition against interbreeding was a prohibition against the production of newer, more productive breeds within the boundaries of Israel. The Israelites could lawfully import new breeds, but then they had to keep them separate from the existing ones in the land. Interbreeding was lawful outside of Israel's boundaries. There was never any creation ordinance against interbreeding.

13. The ability of insects to adapt to pesticides is an example. A plant species' ability to develop resistance to blight is another.

14. Walter E. Lammerts, a pioneer in the Scientific Creation movement, was a highly successful breeder of roses. His roses won numerous international prizes. Lammerts, "The Scientific Creationist Movement in the United States: A Personal Account," Journal of Christian Reconstruction, I (Summer 1974).

Here is one additional piece of evidence that is worth noting: the mule. This is the classic animal hybrid: the normally sterile product of horse and donkey. It is a very strong work animal. It was used as a military animal in ancient Israel (I Chron. 12:40).¹⁵ Its presence in the household of the kings (II Sam. 13:29; I Kings 10:25) and the presence of 245 mules among those who returned to Jerusalem from Medo-Persia (Ezr. 2:66) indicate that there was never any creation ordinance against hybrids. If there had been, Ezra and Nehemiah would have kept such beasts out of the land when they returned to rebuild. Mules could be imported, even though it was not legal to breed horses and donkeys to produce them. The deliberate mixing of seeds was illegal, not the offspring as such. The judicial issue was representational, not biological: tribal separation in Mosaic Israel until the promised Seed came. Confessional unity in Mosaic Israel was subordinated to tribal unity only until this messianic prophecy was fulfilled. Considered from the point of the confessionalism of pre-Mosaic and post-Mosaic law, the law against the mixing of seeds was abnormal, i.e., not representative.

E. The Lure of Racism

Rushdoony's mistake regarding the importance of a law against "hybridization" was not some minor exegetical slip, nor is the application he makes with it. His identification of Leviticus 19:19 as a law prohibiting genetic intermixtures can produce serious theological and judicial consequences. It can lead directly to racism. Rushdoony's analysis and subsequent applications of Leviticus 19:19 are sufficient proof.

When applied to humanity, Rushdoony's argument is the once-familiar segregationist argument against racial mixing—"the mongrelization of the white race," as it is sometimes described.¹⁶ Rushdoony did not resort to such crass language, but his interpretation of Leviticus 19:19 insists that genetic separateness within a species is both normal in nature and universally required by biblical law. The man-imposed exceptions to this supposedly normal and normative process of sexual separation have been outlawed by God, he insisted. Man supposedly must not attempt to produce hybrids—a creation ordinance that is permanent in history.

15. It was still being used during the American Civil War (1861–65): an important beast of burden for military transport.

16. Such language is now confined to neo-Nazi cults, racist cults, and some of the more aggressive branches of British Israelism.

1. Inter-Racial Marriage

Rushdoony did not hesitate to apply this exclusionary principle to inter-racial marriages. first, he wrote that "St. Paul referred to the broader meaning of these laws against hybridization, and against yoking an ox and an ass to a plow (Deut. 22:10), in II Corinthians 6: 14."¹⁷ Broader meaning of the seed laws, yes; judicial specifics, no. Paul wrote: "Be ye not unequally yoked with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness?" The issue here is faith. Christian faith overcomes all other divisions, including the Mosaic seed laws. (Note: Deuteronomy 22:10 immediately precedes a parallel verse to Leviticus 19:19c—no mixing of wool and linen—indicating that Leviticus 19:19c refers to covenantal-confessional separation, not tribal separation.) Second, Rushdoony wrote: "But Deuteronomy 22:10 not only forbids unequal religious yoking by inference, and as a case law, but also unequal yoking generally. . . . The burden of the law is thus against inter-religious, inter-racial, and inter-cultural marriages, in that they normally go against the very community which marriage is designed to establish."¹⁸ Note his asserted equivalents: inter-religious marriages and inter-racial or inter-cultural marriages. He was not speaking here merely of civil law; he was speaking of biblical law in general.

The shift in his argument is both subtle and significant. He was not arguing that inter-racial marriages do not produce children. Such unions are not biologically sterile. Then are inter-cultural marriages genetically sterile? He did not argue that they are. So what has "hybridization" got to do with either type of marriage? Genetically speaking, not a thing. Rushdoony shifted his argument from genetics to race and culture. He moved from a case law of the Bible regarding cattle, planting, and clothing to a racial-cultural application. He invented a legal category of "hybridization" in order to apply it to inter-racial and inter-cultural marriages. What he was saying is that such marriages are covenantally sterile. The problem is, this is a denial of the New Testament doctrine of the gospel's power to break down the wall separating Jew from Greek, bond from free. His theology of sterility mixed a false interpretation of a case law with traditional hostility to "inferior races."

The standard of unequal covenantal yoking unquestionably applies to marriage. Rushdoony was correct on this point: Paul makes this clear in II Corinthians 6:14. This Pauline prohibition is universally believed by orthodox Bible commentators to apply to marriage covenant. Almost all commentators believe that it also applies to the church government, although expositors in the Erastian, state church tradition may choose to downplay this. Christian Reconstruction teaches that this biblical principle of covenantal separation must also apply to civil government: not in Christians' dropping out of political life, which is pietism's recommended solution to the "unequally yoked" dilemma in civil government, but in the eventual exclusion of non-Christians from the franchise and from all public offices, after a nation is overwhelmingly Christian in its public confession. (Late in his career, Rushdoony began to deny in public the obvious civil application of the "no unequal yoking" covenantal principle, preferring instead to defend traditional political pluralism's anti-Trinitarian U.S. Constitutional settlement.)¹⁹

17. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 256.

18. Ibid., pp. 256–57.

The judicial standard involved in the biblical concept of "yoking" is exclusively covenantal: public confession of Trinitarian faith, local church membership, the regular celebration of the Lord's Supper, and public obedience to God's law. For a Christian to deny salvation through faith in Jesus Christ is apostasy. To refuse to join the local church is an assertion of one's judicial autonomy. To refuse to celebrate the Lord's Supper is self-excommunication. To deny the law of God is antinomian. A Christian should not marry anyone who is remiss in any of these four areas. To be remiss in any of them is to break covenant with God. But marrying a Christian from another race or another culture is not covenant-breaking.

This principle of covenantal discrimination applies to each of the three institutional covenants: church, state, and family. "Equal yoking" means a public commitment of all covenantal participants to the Athanasian creed or some other Trinitarian creedal statement, as well as church membership. The judicial issue is faithfulness to the covenantal oath. "Equal yoking" is strictly a judicial concept. "Unequal yoking" is therefore also strictly a judicial concept; as such, it has nothing to do with race or culture: in family, church, or state.²⁰ It has nothing to do

19. See his explicit denial of theocratic politics in the transcript of his nationally televised interview with Bill Moyers, "God and Politics: On Earth as it Is in Heaven," Public Affairs Television (Dec. 23, 1987). MOYERS: "Is that the kind of society, where Christianity is the official religion, like it was in Armenia?" RUSHDOONY: "No." (Transcript, p. 7.)

20. Obviously, if two people cannot speak the same language, they may have future marital problems. This is not a valid covenantal objection to their marriage. The prewith community standards except to the extent that these derivative standards are confessionally Trinitarian—a product of the covenant.

2. The Marriage Covenant

Marriage is a covenant; it is governed by God's law. Rushdoony accepted this view of Christian marriage and used it to develop a theological defense of divorce based on the Mosaic law.²¹ The view of marriage as a lawful covenant established by oath between two individuals under God's authority leads to a significant conclusion: unless we abandon the Bible's identification of marriage as a covenant, we cannot legitimately say that "normally" marriages are this or that in a judicial sense. Marriages are either legal or illegal; there is no criterion of "normality" in a covenant bond except whatever is mandated by God's law. In the case of marriage, the law is indeed a creation ordinance (Gen. 1:26–28). To the extent that man's laws interfere with this biblical covenantal principle, the marriage covenant becomes inescapably antinomian and perhaps even pagan. Rushdoony fully understood this, which is why he attributed "creation ordinance" status to the principle of genetic separation in Leviticus 19:19, and then moved to cultural and racial applications. He sought to transform community opinions regarding race into a judicially binding category.

Marriage is a covenant under God. A covenant is inescapably judicial.²² Marriage is established by a binding oath.²³ Therefore, by applying any judicial criterion, including a supposed creation ordinance, to the question of the lawfulness of a marriage necessarily elevates this criterion to covenantal status. Rushdoony made it clear what this supposedly biblical criterion is: anything that goes "against the very community which [marriage, citizenship, or church membership] is designed to establish." Once this confessionally empty judicial criterion—community preference—is applied to one covenantal institution, we sumption is, one or both will learn the other's language. This is also true of churches. Members of churches cannot lawfully be excluded from the Lord's Supper because of a language barrier. Should a person be excluded from citizenship because of a language barrier? No. But he will have trouble being elected to public office. He can be barred from voting on the basis of functional illiteracy in the language on the ballot, but states that require secret ballots—only one person per booth at a time—can and should provide translations on the ballot for major linguistic groups.

21. Rushdoony, Institutes, pp. 401–15.

22. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987]1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

23. Ibid., ch. 8.

cannot easily restrict it to that institution. Community preference, once elevated to a fundamental judicial ideal, breaks all covenantal boundaries. Thus, if Rushdoony were consistent in his discussion of marriage as the basis of community and the community's preferences as judicially sovereign, he would have to apply this principle of "what the community wants" to the covenants of church and the state. His overall covenantal theology rejects the lawfulness of such community intervention. This indicates that his view of hybrids and race was anti-covenantal.

F. Compulsory Segregation vs. Biblical Law

He began writing Institutes of Biblical Law in the late 1960s, when the civil rights movement in the United States was in its radical phase. The word "integration" at that time had a very specific frame of reference: racial. Federal courts and troops had been forcing the racially segregated South to integrate its public institutions from the late 1950s through the 1960s. Rushdoony broadly defined "enforced integration" as any attempt by a higher judicial agency to overrule local community preferences. He wrote: "Unequal yoking means more than marriage. In society at large it means the enforced integration of various elements which are not congenial."²⁴ To say that southern white segregationists and black integrationists were uncongenial in the 1960s is putting it mildly.

1. Lynching

Lynching²⁵ of blacks by white mobs of varying sizes and motivations had been a familiar practice in the South for over a century: imposing the negative sanction of death apart from a civil trial. Prior to the Civil War, abolitionists had been lynched, sometimes in Northern states. In New York City's week of anti-draft riots (July 13–17, 1863), at least eleven blacks were murdered out of at least 105 people who died.²⁶ After the Civil War, lynchings took place in the Midwest and West, though rarely in the Northeast; over 80% of the victims were white.²⁷ The largest percentage of lynchings took place in the South; by 1900, the phenomenon was confined to the South. Far more black males were lynched in the South than before the Civil War. Before the war, most blacks were owned and came under legal protection. Lynching became a socially acceptable community practice in the post-Civil War South. One estimate places the number of lynchings in the South, 1880–1930, at almost 4,000: over 700 whites and over 3,200 blacks.²⁸ In 1880, 32% of the victims were white; in 1930, only 9% were.²⁹ Sometimes accompanying lynchings were acts of torture, burning, and even dismemberment, especially when mobs were large.³⁰ Lynchings were rituals.³¹ Judicially, there were few risks to these murderers. Trials for people accused of lynching blacks were rare in the South; convictions were virtually nonexistent. While the "strange fruit"³² of black men hanging on trees steadily disappeared after the 1930s and was almost gone by the 1950s, the lynching mentality still existed among the die-hard white segregationists.

24. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 257.

25. Named after Virginia judge Charles Lynch, who convicted and hanged Loyalists during the American Revolution. Walter F. White, Rope and Faggot: A Biography of Judge Lynch (Salem, New Hampshire: Ayer, [1929] 1969).

26. Iver Bernstein, The New York City Draft Riots: Their Significance for American Society and Politics in the Age of the Civil War (New York: Oxford University Press, 1990), p. 282 (blacks murdered), p. 5 (total deaths of 105).

The fact is, on racial matters (as on slavery matters prior to 1865), the South's community standards for civil justice for blacks were radically unbiblical: (1) denying the legal basis of slave marriages; (2) denying legal protection for the slave; and (3) no system of guaranteed redemption.³³ Thus, Rushdoony's critical comment on slavery in general applies to Southern slavery: "Modern man seeks to avoid the yokes of community life in Christ, and he falls under the heavy yoke of the state."³⁴ In this case, the state in question was local; neither state governments nor the national government had the means of enforcing justice in the American South prior to 1930. Local police forces and sheriffs enforced the law.³⁵ The local institutions of civil government in the South were sometimes tyrannical toward freed blacks after 1865.

27. W. Fitzhugh Brundage, Lynching in the New South: Georgia and Virginia, 1880–1930 (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1993), p. 8.

28. Monroe Work (ed.), The Negro Yearbook: An Annual Encyclopedia of the Negro, 1931–1932 (Tuskegee, Alabama: Negro Year Book Publishing, 1931), p. 293; cited in idem.

29. Idem.

30. Ibid., p. 42.

31. Ibid., ch. 2.

32. The title of a 1939 song made famous in the North and infamous in the South by black blues singer Billie Holiday.

33. Gary North, Tools of Dominion: The Case Laws of Exodus (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), pp. 232–44. (<http://bit.ly/gntools>)

34. R. J. Rushdoony, Law and Society, vol. 2 of Institutes of Biblical Law (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1982), p. 69.

35. Brundage, Lynching, p. 161.

The most blatant judicial forms of this local tyranny were abolished by the U. S. Supreme Court and Federal marshals and Federal troops, 1954–70. When Southern blacks once again got the right to vote,³⁶ local politicians in the South “felt the heat,” and therefore “saw the light.” They changed. When Southern blacks imposed the sanction of the vote, they were not trying to make Southern politicians better people; they were merely making them more responsive to a significant new political pressure group. The underlying covenantal issue was political sanctions, not political salvation, although the rhetoric of salvation was commonly employed by civil rights reformers.

2. Judicial Neutrality

Rushdoony attempted to skirt the covenantal issue by an appeal to judicial neutrality: neither a pro-segregation nor a pro-integration judicial standard. This line of argument is an implicit denial of his fundamental philosophical premise, namely, that there can be no neutrality. But in racial matters, he insisted, there can be such neutrality judicially. In 1971, he wrote:

Let us consider one aspect of that [class] conflict, the racial situation. The attempts to force integration and to force segregation by law are very old. With Assyria, forcible integration was a policy of state. All these attempts failed when the social conditions militated against them. If two peoples were relatively equal and religiously congenial, integration quickly followed, despite all legal obstacles. Where the differences were marked, neither opportunity nor law was able to bridge the gap. Neither legalized integration nor segregation accomplish anything more than to aggravate a situation. To introduce the state into an area of personal, religious, and moral decision is to abdicate the harmony of classes for a statist imposition. If a person or if a people are inferior, nothing can compel their rise; if they have a potential, why prevent their development? Where there are religious and social reasons against mixed marriages, nothing can further such marriages as long as the faith and the society are strong. If these factors are invalid or disappear through disbelief, nothing can prevent integration in the short or long run.³⁷

This line of reasoning is basically the same as the one Gamaliel took with respect to the civil suppression of the Jerusalem church by the Jerusalem rabbinical council. If the church is of God, he said, it will flourish despite persecution; if it is not, then it will fail (Acts 5: 34–39). It was an argument for toleration based on judicial inaction. But this argument departed from the Mosaic law's mandatory civil sanctions against a call to false public worship (Deut. 13). Gamaliel, in his call for civil neutrality, necessarily called the Jewish authorities to abandon Moses, for he did not call them to accept Jesus' testimony in the name of Moses, which Jesus had done (John 5:45–46). His call for religious toleration was not merely a call based on a theory of religious neutrality; it was a call to abandon the Mosaic law. We should not interpret either argument for state inaction—Rushdoony's or Gamaliel's—as judicially neutral. They are not neutral; they are accommodationist.

36. They possessed this right during Reconstruction, 1865–1877.

37. Chalcedon Report #68 (April 1971). Reprinted in Rushdoony, The Roots of Reconstruction (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1991), p. 746.

3. Rushdoony's Two Choices

In Rushdoony's case, he had only two choices: (1) come out against Federal laws against state laws that enforced segregation, or (2) come out in favor of Federal laws—and Federal troops—enforcing laws that abolished state laws that enforced integration. There was no third choice. Either state laws enforcing segregation would be enforced or they would not be. By denying the legality of state laws enforcing segregation, the Federal government's position was not inherently integrationist; rather, it was for social voluntarism—what Rushdoony said he believed in. People in the South would be allowed to marry whomever they pleased without state laws prohibiting this on the basis of race. But Rushdoony did not call for support of such Federal legislation and Supreme Court interpretations. He opposed the civil rights movement, as his writings from the era reveal. In 1966, he quoted favorably the words of Lyndon Johnson in 1948: "The civil rights program, about which you have heard so much, is a farce and a sham . . . an effort to set up a police state in the guise of liberty. I am opposed to that program. I fought it in the Congress. It is the province of the state to run its own elections."³⁸ Johnson was substituting state judicial sovereignty for Federal judicial sovereignty, i.e., the sovereignty of segregationist states in the South. He was promoting the view that negative political sanctions imposed by black voters would not be brought against white segregationist politicians like himself. When his political base changed—from U.S. Senator from Texas to President of the United States (1964–1969)—his view of sovereignty changed. He became an advocate of civil rights. Rushdoony criticized the later Johnson by quoting the earlier Johnson. But in doing so, he necessarily came down against Federal laws abolishing segregation.

38. Chalcedon Report No. 5 (Feb. 1, 1966), in Roots of Reconstruction, p. 551.

What if a local civil government has previously introduced a restrictive marital standard? What if it has made illegal all inter-racial marriages? What should a higher civil court do? Nothing? Then it accepts the local court's compulsory segregationist standard. It has not acted in a judicially neutral manner, for there is no judicially neutral manner. Should the higher court declare the law unconstitutional? Then it necessarily interferes with regional community standards. There is no escape from some judicial standard. There is no judicial neutrality.

Let us get this point clear: civil government-enforced racial segregation is biblically illegitimate. The state should not dictate to anyone that he must not marry someone, except in cases of incest or a previous marriage. A higher court must declare as invalid any local law that forbids marriages on the basis of race. This is a biblically mandatory restriction on any local community's authority to legislate laws governing the racial aspects of marriage. This is not a civil vote for or against inter-racial marriages; it is a civil vote of "no confidence" with respect to the state's authority to compel decisions in this area of life.

4. A Covenantal Issue

The issue here is covenantal. Rushdoony knew this, and this fact led him to modify his doctrine of community preferences to this extent: "The effects of integration have too often been studied only by proponents and opponents of integration. Unfortunately, both believe that enforced integration is possible. From the days of the Assyrians, who moved nations and peoples about to homogenize their empire, to the 20th century, such attempts have been failures. People do not inter-marry unless a common faith, culture, and standard brings them together. Then, they cannot be kept apart."³⁹ But if this is true of marriage, then there can be no valid civil or ecclesiastical law against inter-racial marriages if the partners share the same confession of faith, no matter what local community standards happen to be—the opposite of what he argues in the Institutes of Biblical Law.

There is a fundamental schizophrenia in Rushdoony's doctrine of the marriage covenant specifically and covenantalism generally. This schizophrenia stemmed in part from an incorrect interpretation of the Mosaic laws prohibiting genetic mixing. This led him to elevate community racial standards over biblical law in the name of a creation ordinance that never was.

39. Chalcedon Report #74 (October 1971); Roots, p. 769.

G. Standards for Exclusion

What criteria determine which group is excluded from what covenantal organization? Rushdoony had already made his view plain: community standards. Let me quote him again: "The burden of the law is thus against inter-religious, inter-racial, and inter-cultural marriages, in that they normally go against the very community which marriage is designed to establish."⁴⁰ But there are also church communities and political communities. Are they also autonomous from biblical law? Can they lawfully ignore a creation ordinance? Racism spreads. The concern of Rushdoony's analysis here is not with a specific biblical limit on state authority. His analysis rests on an all-inclusive principle: a creation ordinance. He announced the existence of a creation ordinance in order to justify a view of marriage based on community standards of order and propriety. Rushdoony's assertion of the existence of a creation ordinance of genetic separation led him to embrace in principle the humanistic theory of society that he elsewhere opposes so eloquently: John Dewey's view of community standards and community authority.⁴¹

In Christ, the only valid standards for judicial exclusion in a formally covenanted church, state, or family are: (1) denying the Trinitarian faith (or oath) and (2) repeatedly breaking God's law as a way of life. Race is not a valid standard for covenantal exclusion, and wherever race becomes such a means of exclusion within any organization that is bound by a common confession of faith, it works against the ideal of the biblical covenant. There is no earthly court-enforceable biblical law against personal separation from others outside of church, but there can be no valid judicial exclusion of any race from the rights and obligations of the ecclesiastical covenant. Any program of enforced racial segregation within a covenantal institution is judicially evil. Annuling such a program by higher law within that covenantal hierarchy is not itself a program of enforced racial integration. Rather, it is merely prohibiting a judicial evil: state-enforced racial segregation.⁴²

40. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 257.

41. On Dewey, see R. J. Rushdoony, The Messianic Character of American Education: Studies in the History of the Philosophy of Education (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1963), ch. 15.

It is true the national government in the United States has abolished state laws prohibiting inter-racial marriages. This is not the same as forcing racially different individuals to marry. To confuse the two is a monumental confusion. It is a confusion based on racism.

H. Judicial Review

The biblical judicial issue of race in the United States in the 1960s was not enforced integration, whatever the humanistic judicial issue was. The biblical issue was this: illegally enforced racial exclusion from the voting booth, i.e., access to civil covenant sanctions. Blacks were being kept from exercising their legitimate civil right of imposing civil covenant sanctions on civil rulers. They were being excluded by state and local laws from participating in a republican civil rite of covenantal renewal. The civil rights movement was judicially a civil rites movement. Senator Lyndon Johnson understood this in 1948. He affirmed his commitment to keep blacks away from this rite of covenant renewal—the imposition of civil sanctions.

The state has neither the authority nor the power to make men into better people. It cannot lawfully or successfully force people to have warm feelings toward their neighbors. But the state does have the God-given authority to impose sanctions against certain evil acts. For example, if a lower branch of civil government is excluding people from the civil franchise or from access to civil institutions on the basis of anything except their lack of a covenantal profession of allegiance or their legal status as criminals in prison, a higher civil court has the obligation to annul that exclusion. Such a judicial annulment is not inherently an example of forced integration, although it can be and has been an aspect of a larger program of forced integration. Rather, it is the judicial annulment of a covenantally illegal law that forcibly excludes people from the legitimate office of citizen—those who impose sanctions in the voting booth. The American South enforced such illegitimate laws for almost a century, 1877–1970. The national government, for political reasons, went along with this illegal covenantal exclusion. This cooperation between national and local civil governments ended in the decade of the 1960s.

42. This should not be understood as a legitimization of laws requiring businesses to serve people or hire employees irrespective of race. Economic discrimination is not a covenantal act. If a business decides to hire or not to hire people of a certain race, the state should remain silent. Civil laws prohibiting economic discrimination inevitably become laws mandating quotas. Bureaucrats, if they are to be restrained in their quest for power, must be provided with written numerical ratios as guidelines to determine whether or not racial (or other) discrimination is taking place. This means quotas.

The national government's application of new civil sanctions did change millions of white people's minds in the South, 1957–1970, unlike the application of far more rigorous military sanctions during Reconstruction, 1865–77. No one in the South today publicly laments the annulment of the various "Jim Crow" segregation laws; the climate of opinion has changed.⁴³ Jim Crow laws have gone the way of chattel slavery, but these laws were no less enthusiastically affirmed by white Christians in the South, 1890–1960. But the overall climate of moral and political opinion among the non-Christian, university-educated elite of the South regarding the locus of political sovereignty—Federal rather than state—had steadily changed during the twentieth century. Thus, the specific climate of opinion regarding segregation shifted rapidly, 1957–1970, when Federal sanctions were imposed. What the North's military governments of the Reconstruction era had not accomplished, 1865–76, humanistic public education, nationally marketed textbooks, college education, theological liberalism, and President Johnson's Civil Rights Act of 1964 did accomplish.

Rushdoony's misidentification of the judicial annulment of illegal racial segregation in public institutions as necessarily a product of "enforced integration" is a variation of a similar error on his part: identifying the Supreme Court's covenantal obligation to strike down bad or unconstitutional laws as an illegitimate attempt to make men good. That is, he rejected a court's decision to refuse to enforce a morally bad law or unconstitutional law because this would mean that the court is attempting to make men good. He wrote: "Second, we must remember that the Constitution can make no man nor nation good; it is not a moral code."⁴⁴ He confused the biblically legitimate concept of judicial review—annulling bad laws—with biblically illegitimate messianic acts of state healing: salvation by law. A messianic view of civil law

43. C. Vann Woodward, The Strange Career of Jim Crow, 3rd ed. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1974); I. A. Newby, Jim Crow's Defense: Anti-Negro Thought in America, 1900–1930 (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1965). Cf. Charles S. Mangum, Jr., The Legal Status of the Negro (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1940).

44. R. J. Rushdoony, "The United States Constitution," Journal of Christian Reconstruction, XII (1988), p. 22. For a discussion of Rushdoony's confusion on this distinction, see Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), pp. 687–91.

is at odds with the fundamental legal position of the Bible, which presents the state as God's monopolistic agency for the coercive suppression of public evil.⁴⁵ But if we reject the principle of judicial review in the name of anti-messianism, we are left without any means of judicial appeal (Ex. 18). If the mere annulment of a bad law is discussed as if it were inherently a case of imposing positive civil sanctions (which biblical law rejects), then there cannot be lawful judicial review. This would go far in destroying the judiciary.⁴⁶

The same principle of judicial review applies to hierarchical church courts. Any local church that excludes people from membership on the basis of race must be disciplined by its denomination or association. The local church must be excluded from the larger fellowship for its practice of unjustly excluding people from the local fellowship. It does not matter what the local church's "community" thinks. The issue is quite simple: What are the judicial terms of God's covenant? They are never racial in the New Covenant. They were never racial in the Old Covenant, either. For example, the exclusion of Ammonites and Moabites from citizenship for 10 generations (Deut. 23:3) was judicially based on the origin of both those nations in Lot's drunken incest with his daughters (Gen. 19:31-38). The descendants of bastards were also excluded for 10 generations (Deut. 23:2). The covenantal issue here was not race; it was covenantal rebellion. Biblical laws of exclusion are confessional and moral.

I. Sovereignty: From the Bible to the Community

Leviticus 19:19 commanded the Israelites to keep their breeds of cattle separated. This meant that they could not lawfully breed their cattle systematically. The law also required them to keep the seeds of different crops separate from each other in any given field. finally, they could not wear cloth of a linen-wool mixture.

These first two laws spoke of separation: separating the confessionally identical and culturally similar tribes of Israel. The third law required them to avoid clothing that symbolically testified to equality between priest and non-priest. None of this had anything to do with a prohibition of hybrids. None of this had anything to do with the separation of races and cultures. This had to do, first, with separating similar tribes until Christ, the promised Seed, came in history. Second, it had to do with the separation of God's priestly nation from non-priestly nations.

45. Chapter 16.

46. This does not mean that decisions by the courts should not be appealed to a combined review of the executive and legislative branches. See North, Political Polytheism, pp. 502–13. There should be no single institution that possesses final jurisdiction in history. Every doctrine of divine right challenges God as the only final court of appeal.

Rushdoony invented a supposed creation ordinance of hybridization. Then he applied this mythological judicial principle to inter-racial marriages—marriages between partners who may share the same covenantal confession. He identified local community standards of order as the standards that must govern marriages. This transfers sovereignty over the marriage covenant from God's law to the local community. This new sovereignty, which Rushdoony offered in the name of biblical law, cannot easily be restricted to the marriage covenant: unless there is some higher biblical principle to stop it, the doctrine of community sovereignty moves into church and state. We have seen where this leads: to humanism, both right-wing (Scottish Enlightenment Whiggery) and left-wing (totalitarianism).

Rushdoony invoked a creation ordinance. What higher principle is there than a creation ordinance? It is more fundamental than Mosaic law. Only a New Testament law possesses greater authority. There is such a law—no separation between Jew and Greek, free and bond—but Rushdoony ignored it. He wanted to keep superior races and inferior races separate until such time as local community standards approve of covenantal bonding, i.e., marriage under the authority of the local community's judicially autonomous covenant. Any appeal beyond this authority—whether to biblical covenant theology or the U.S. Supreme Court—Rushdoony rejected as marks of integrationism in the 1960s and 1970s. He never publicly abandoned this position.

Rushdoony concluded his discussion with these words: "Hybridization is an attempt to deny the validity of law. Its penalty is an enforced sterility. In every area, where man seeks potentiality by a denial of God's law, the penalty remains the same, limited gains and long-range sterility."⁴⁷ He moved from a biological phenomenon to a social metaphor. He took this metaphor very seriously—judicially seriously. His defense of biblical law therefore suffers.

Conclusion

Rushdoony's defense of a non-existent creation ordinance is a classic example of what Van Til identified as circular reasoning. Rushdoony's discussion of hybridization begins with a presupposition: genetic sterility is morally evil and therefore biblically prohibited. Yet the Bible says nothing about this sterility aspect of animal or plant breeding. It prohibits the mixing of seeds in one field, but it does not identify sterility as the reason for the prohibition. To make his case, Rushdoony had to ignore the fact that Israel brought mules—genetically sterile—into the land after the exile (Ezr. 2:66).

47. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 262.

Then he moved from genetic sterility, which he called hybridization, to social sterility. His argument implicitly assumes that certain practices he disapproved of are socially "sterile." These practices included inter-racial marriages between "inferior" and "superior" races, as defined by local community standards. He also rejected all organ transplants.⁴⁸ To make this case, he invented a creation ordinance that never existed—a law against hybridization—and then he transplanted this theological construct to practices he did not personally approve of. He was implying that the supposed creational prohibition against biological mixtures is the symbol of a prohibition against certain kinds of inter-racial marriages, among other practices. Such marriages must await community approval before they can become covenantally valid. He thereby subordinated the marriage covenant to community opinion. This is humanism, pure and simple. It is John Dewey disguised as John Calvin: community over confession. If taken seriously, it could all too easily become Martin Bormann disguised as Martin Luther: race over reformation.

This kind of biblical exposition is, as Rushdoony derisively called it elsewhere, eisegesis: reading into the text of Scripture things which the expositor dearly wants the text to say, despite the fact that the text says nothing of the kind. It is surely not exegesis: deriving from the text the message God wishes to communicate. That there are racial differences among men is obvious, an aspect of the worldwide division of labor (Gen. 11; I Cor. 12). But there is only one difference that matters covenantally in church, family, or state: theological confession. Here is the great dividing line. Rushdoony's discussions of biological hybrids and race relations have obscured this covenantal line of demarcation.

There was never a creation ordinance against hybrids. There was a temporary Mosaic seed law that symbolized the prohibition against marriages that crossed tribal boundaries inside Mosaic Israel. This law ended forever with the coming of the New Covenant and the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. There was no tribal inheritance to be preserved in Israel once the promised Seed had come. There was no tribal system in Israel after A.D. 70.

48. There is a lingering suspicion in my mind that he began with certain views on race and went looking for a biblical reason to justify them.

Appendix G

MALTHUSIANISM VS. COVENANTALISM

And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth (Gen. 1:28).

That in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore; and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies (Gen. 22:17).

And thou saidst, I will surely do thee good, and make thy seed as the sand of the sea, which cannot be numbered for multitude (Gen. 32:12).

The message is clear: the primary blessing in history is an expanding population of covenant-keepers. Man's dominion assignment from God mandates population growth. God's covenantal promise to Abraham involved a multiplication of his heirs. World dominion and population growth are linked.¹

This fact is no longer taken seriously by most Protestant Christians. It is, however, taken very seriously by the zero population growth movement, which sees man as the cancer of the world. Man's dominion over nature is seen as the ultimate threat to nature. Bill McKibben has stated this theology well: "We have deprived nature of its independence, and that is fatal to its meaning. Nature's independence is its meaning; without it there is nothing but us."² Nothing but man: this is blasphemy in the minds of modern pantheists and nature-worshippers.

Nature's meaning, like all meaning, is provided by God and His decree. Man is to represent God in history. Through covenant-keeping men, nature receives its God-given meaning. This is why population growth of covenant-keeping men is so important. Man is to fill nature, thereby subduing it: for God's glory, in His name, and by His law. Such a view of man and nature is horrifying to modern, covenant-breaking man.

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1985] 2012), ch. 1.

2. Bill McKibben, The End of Nature (New York: Random House, 1989), p. 58.

There is another factor to consider: the fixed number of demons. Satan's demonic followers constitute a numerically fixed host: no reproduction. Angels do not reproduce (Matt. 22:30). Therefore, as human covenant-keepers grow in numbers, the ratio of demons to covenant-keepers falls. The ability of Satan's host to influence events also falls. Like jugglers who try to juggle an ever-increasing number of oranges, so is Satan's host. The same is true of his earthly imitators, who adopt centralized economic planning as their means of prosperity and control—above all, control. As British philosopher and radical Bertrand Russell openly admitted in 1923, "Socialism, especially international socialism, is only possible as a stable system if the population is stationary or nearly so. A slow increase might be coped with by improvements in agricultural methods, but a rapid increase must in the end reduce the whole population to penury, and would be almost certain to cause wars."³

A. The Legacy of Malthus

The legacy of Malthus—or at least the Malthus of 1798—is still with us. He altered his thesis decisively after 1798, abandoning his scientifically unsupported rhetoric of a geometrically increasing human population bounded by arithmetical increases in food. His disciples, however, still cling to the myths of the original edition of his Essay on Population.⁴

Rev. Malthus was not committed to the Bible's message of the blessings of large families (Psalm 127) and the goal of population growth for covenant-keeping societies (Gen. 15:5). He was an opponent of what would be called the economics of growth. He contrasted Adam Smith's wealth of nations with what he called the happiness of nations, especially the laboring classes.⁵ He was concerned with improving what today is called the quality of life, which he, like his disciples, contrasted with “mere” economic growth. He defined economic growth in terms of an increase in the supply of things. Had he defined economic growth as “an increase in the number of choices at the same price as earlier,” he would have had to modify his suggested contrast between the quality of life and economic growth.

3. Bertrand Russell, The Prospects of Industrial Civilization, 2nd ed. (London: George Allen & Unwin, [1923] 1959), p. 273.

4. Thomas Robert Malthus, An Essay on the Principle of Population (New York: Penguin Books, [1798] 1982).

5. Ibid., ch. XVI.

Malthus worried greatly about population growth, not for what it supposedly will do to disrupt the environment, but because of the famines and wars that a growing population supposedly must produce in a finite world. He worried about the fate of man, not the fate of nature. While he would have agreed with the title of the 1972 book by Campbell and Wade, Society and Environment: The Coming Collision, his concern was with the environment’s effects on society, not society’s effects on the environment.

The Green movement, the ecology movement, and the zero-population growth movement are united in their commitment to the Malthusian mythology regarding the necessity for population control. But, unlike Malthus, they want the state to impose these restraints, including abortion.

The fundamental dividing issue between the biblical view of growth and the anti-growth movement’s view of growth is eschatological. The Bible predicts the end of the world. Time is inescapably bounded. The Bible affirms the moral legitimacy of growth in history, but it also affirms that history is bounded. Those who reject the biblical doctrine of the final judgment at the end of time offer a rival scenario: unbounded time and bounded growth. They understand that we cannot have unbounded time and unbounded growth in a finite world. They prefer a worldview based on unbounded time. They are not committed to overcoming the environmental limits to growth. They are committed to overcoming the eschatological limits to time. Given the biblical doctrine of the post-judgment lake of fire (Rev. 20: 9–10), this is understandable.

Christians who do not recognize the existence of this underlying eschatological dispute have been swept into the anti-growth movement by the power of its promoters’ rhetoric, not by the logic of their arguments. It is time to consider not only the arguments of the anti-growth movement, but also its hidden agenda: elitist, coercive power over the decisions of the vast majority of producers, better known as consumers.

B. The First Edition's Slogan

Malthus' concern over man's growing population began in the generation when the growth of England's population became visible to social analysts. One of the most famous phrases in the history of economics is the statement in the first edition of Rev. Thomas Robert⁶ Malthus' Essay on the Principle of Population (1798): "Population, when unchecked, increases in a geometrical ratio. Subsistence increases only in an arithmetical ratio."⁷ On the basis of these two supposed laws of nature, he concluded: "By that law of our nature which makes food necessary to the life of man, the effects of these two unequal powers must be kept equal. This implies a strong and constantly operating check on population from the difficulty of subsistence. This difficulty must fall somewhere and must necessarily be severely felt by a large portion of mankind."⁸ What is not generally known by those who cite Malthus' famous statement about comparative rates of growth, mankind vs. food supplies, is that he removed this scientific-sounding statement from later editions of his essay. He later recognized that it could not be supported by the evidence, and in fact was refuted by the evidence.

Like Marx and Engels' Communist Manifesto (1848), Malthus' most famous work was initially published anonymously.⁹ Malthus wrote it as a reaction to some of the more optimistic speculations of several Enlightenment and utopian thinkers. In the lengthy original title of his essay, he specifically identified the Marquis de Condorcet and the egalitarian William Godwin, the poet Shelly's father-in-law. His father, Daniel Malthus, was enamored of Godwin's thesis; Malthus wrote his essay to show why he renounced both egalitarianism and the doctrine of inevitable historical progress.¹⁰

Malthus was born in 1766 and died in 1834, the year that Cyrus McCormick perfected his mechanical reaper, which led to the huge increase of grain production in the American Midwest. In 1798, the year of the Essay, Jenner introduced vaccination against smallpox.¹¹ So, we

6. He was not called Thomas; he called himself Thomas Robert or T. Robert: William Petersen, Malthus (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1979), p. 21.

7. Malthus, Population, p. 71.

8. Idem.

9. Antony Flew, "Introduction," ibid., p. 9.

10. Ibid., pp. 9–10.

11. Petersen, Malthus, p. 2.

see in Malthus' day the foundations of both an increase of life expectancy and an increase in food production. Both processes have continued unabated.

C. Overpopulation?

Condorcet had raised the specter of overpopulation in his book, the Picture of the Progress of the Human Mind [Spirit] (1795), written in 1794 while he was in hiding from Robespierre's Terror, and published the year after the deaths of both Condorcet and Robespierre.¹² He believed in inevitable progress, but he recognized that there are limits to growth. There would come a time "when the increase in the number of men [surpasses] that of their means," with the result that there will be a "decrease in prosperity and population."¹³ What was his solution? The increase of progress in science and the arts. Mankind will learn that "if they have obligations towards beings who are yet to come into the world, they do not consist in giving them existence only, but happiness; . . ." There are limits on population, but these can be reached without that "premature destruction, so contrary to nature, and to social prosperity, of a portion of the beings who have received life."¹⁴ This, as Nisbet points out, is fairly close to the conclusion that Malthus was to reach in later editions of his essay.¹⁵

Godwin was a true utopian. He, too, recognized the problem of overpopulation. His solution, stated in Political Justice (1793), was to speculate that, in the future, mankind as a species will eventually attain immortality in this world, after which men will cease to procreate.¹⁶ That is, men will become like the angels. Christianity has always taught this regarding man's post-resurrection condition, but the theologians' expositions did not invoke either evolution or the idea of the perfectibility of man in history. Despite being the target of Malthus' essay, Godwin wrote him a glowing letter that congratulated Malthus, but he reasserted his faith that men would use their reason to supply a moral check on population growth. In subsequent editions of the Es-

12. Condorcet died a suicide. He poisoned himself with jimson weed the night he was arrested and put into prison. This was the account provided by his friend André Morellet, Mémoires inédits de l'Abbé Morellet de l'Académie Française, 10th ed. (Paris: Ladvocat, 1822), ch. 24; cited in Petersen, Malthus, p. 41.

13. Cited by Robert Nisbet, History of the Idea of Progress (New York: Basic Books, 1980), p. 212.

14. Idem.

15. Idem.

16. Ibid., p. 214.

say, Malthus gave full recognition to these moral checks.¹⁷ In subsequent editions, he moved from biological pessimism to a kind of moral optimism. Nisbet wrote: "We find Malthus the pessimist succeeded by Malthus the social democrat and believer in the forthcoming improvement in the human condition."¹⁸ But it is this Malthus of 1798 who is remembered. It is that Malthus who is revered by the zero population growth cultists.

Concern over the expansion of human population was common among writers in the two decades that preceded the publication of Malthus' essay. In 1781, the Abbé Theodore Augustin Mann read a memoir to the academicians of Brussels. He raised the question of population stability. He concluded that there can be no famine-free stable equilibrium between human population and the food supply because environmental limits will eventually thwart good morals. "This equilibrium is evidently impossible among a people with good morals, because population naturally increases in an indefinite progression, while the means of subsistence are necessarily limited by the soil."¹⁹ The limits of the physical environment are greater than the expansionary power of population growth, which he saw as the outcome of good morals. The Venetian monk Giammaria Ortes wrote a major study on population, Riflessione sulla Popolazione delle Nazioni per rapporto all'Economia Nazionale (1790). He, too, argued that human numbers seem to expand geometrically, while the goods necessary to sustain life expand more slowly. There is a conflict between man and nature.²⁰

Darwin's theory of evolution by natural selection rests on Malthus' observation on the growth of species. Independently of each other, Alfred Russel Wallace and Charles Darwin had accepted Malthus' thesis about population growth, namely, that a species will grow in number until its members run into an environmental barrier. They both concluded that a species survives when its members possess special characteristics that enable more of them to survive. The more progeny is issued by a particular pair in a species, the greater the likelihood that one of these progeny will possess the specific characteristics required for survival. It was Malthus' thesis that led them both to invent their

17. Ibid., p. 217.

18. Ibid., p. 218.

19. Cited by Charles Emil Stangeland, Pre-Malthusian Doctrines of Population: A Study in the History of Economic Theory (New York: Augustus M. Kelley, [1904] 1966), p. 323.

20. Ibid., p. 336.

mutually announced theory of evolution through natural selection.²¹ Wallace made the connection in 1858 while he was suffering a fever.²² Darwin claimed later to have read Malthus' original 1798 essay in 1838. He, too, said that it led to his discovery of evolution through natural selection.²³

One of the oddities of intellectual history is that Marx rejected Malthus,²⁴ yet enthusiastically accepted Darwin.²⁵ Marx saw Malthus as too pessimistic regarding the future of mankind. He was not alone in his assessment. The debate between demographic optimists (anti-Malthus) and pessimists (neo-Malthusians) raged throughout the nineteenth century.²⁶ It escalated rapidly after the mid-1960s. People ask: Can society escape the "Malthusian" disaster of famine?

D. The Debate Continues

Concern over population growth escalated in the 1960s, especially after the counter-culture movement appeared around 1965. A major news magazine in the United States announced in 1965: "The World's Biggest Problem." It asked: "How can the world feed all its people, at the rate the population is growing?"²⁷ This article had been preceded by "World Choice: Limit Population or Face Famine."²⁸ Even National Review, then the most influential conservative intellectual magazine in 21. They co-authored an essay, "On the Tendency of Species to form Varieties. . . ." Linnean Society Papers (1858); reprinted in Darwin: A Norton Critical Edition, edited by Philip Appleman (New York: Norton, 1970), pp. 83–97. Darwin cited Malthus: p. 83. On the Darwin-Wallace discovery, see Arnold C. Brackman, A Delicate Arrangement: The Strange Case of Charles Darwin and Alfred Russel Wallace (New York: Times Books, 1980).

22. Alfred Russel Wallace, My Life, 2 vols. (New York: Dodd, Mead, 1905), I, pp. 361–62.

23. Gertrude Himmelfarb, Darwin and the Darwinian Revolution (Gloucester, Massachusetts: Peter Smith, [1959] 1967), p. 66.

24. Ronald L. Meek (ed.), Marx and Engels on the Population Bomb, rev. ed. (Palo Alto, California: Ramparts, 1971).

25. Marx to Engels: Dec. 19, 1860; Marx to Lasalle: Jan. 16, 1861. Karl Marx and Fredrick Engels, Collected Works, vol. 41 (Moscow: Progress Publishers, 1985), pp. 232, 246–247. In 1866, Marx switched his allegiance to a crackpot ethnologist and racist, Pierre Trémaux. Marx to Engels: Aug. 7, 1866. Engels dismissed Trémaux. Engels to Marx: Oct. 2, 1866. Cited in Nathaniel Weyl, Karl Marx: Racist (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1979), p. 72.

26. E. P. Hutchinson, The Population Debate: The Development of Conflicting Theories up to 1900 (New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1967).

27. U.S. News and World Report (Oct. 4, 1965).

28. Ibid. (June 14, 1965).

the United States, got on the bandwagon in 1965.²⁹

1. Paul Ehrlich

In 1968, Dr. Paul Ehrlich's best-selling book, The Population Bomb, was published. In it, Ehrlich, a Stanford University professor of biology, warned: "The battle to feed all of humanity is over. In the 1970s the world will undergo famines—hundreds of millions of people are going to starve to death in spite of any crash programs embarked upon now. At this late date nothing can prevent a substantial increase in the world death rate. . . ." ³⁰ A far better estimate of the threat of worldwide famine was made in 1969 by Harvard University nutritionist Jean Meyer, who predicted that "food may at some time (20 or 30 years from now) be removed altogether as a limiting factor in population." ³¹ Meyer's viewpoint received very little publicity, although it was to prove correct within a decade.

The predicted famines did not occur in the 1970s or the 1980s. What did occur was a surplus of food. The apocalyptic critics in 1965 should have paid more attention to the statistics of food production. After 1950, worldwide grain production increased steadily. From 1950 through 1975, this increase was in the range of 25% to 40% per capita. ³² In the less developed countries (excluding Communist China), the increase was in the 13% range. Between 1950 and 1980, the world's supply of arable land grew by more than 20%, and it grew even faster in the less developed countries. From 1967 to 1977, the world's irrigated acreage grew by more than 25%. ³³ The price of seed, fertilizer, pesticides, and farm equipment also dropped in this period, in some cases by as much as half. ³⁴ In the 1980s, grain farmers all over the world suffered economic losses as a result of overproduction. While these trends may not be permanent, they did create a tremendous public relations problem for the heralded famine-predictors of the counter-culture era (1965–70).

29. "The Population Explosion," Special Article Section (July 27, 1965).

30. Paul Ehrlich, "Prologue," The Population Bomb (New York: Ballantine, [1968] 1970).

31. Jean Meyer, "Toward a Non-Malthusian Population Policy," Columbia Forum (Summer 1969), p. 5. This is published by Columbia University.

32. The United States Department of Agriculture estimated 40%; the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization estimated less than 30%.

33. All of these figures are found in Nick Eberstadt, "Hunger and Ideology," Commentary (July 1981), p. 43.

34. Ibid., pp. 43–44.

What also occurred was a dramatic fall of birth rates in undeveloped nations: a contraceptive revolution.³⁵ In 1979, Ehrlich referred back to his book and others like it that had prophesied rising birth rates in the 1970s: "But we were all dead wrong."³⁶ He still held that a crisis was coming: perhaps famine, or a pandemic, or nuclear war.³⁷ In 1980, he made a $1,000 bet with University of Maryland economist Julian Simon over the future price of five metals—a bet on the limits to growth. Simon predicted that prices would be lower. He proved correct; Ehrlich paid off the bet in 1990. He could easily afford to pay off; in that same year, he was granted a $345,000 MacArthur Foundation Prize and half of the $240,000 Craford Prize, the ecologists' version of the Nobel Prize.³⁸ Simon was unknown to the general public.³⁹ The media were overwhelmingly supportive of the apocalypics. Rival viewpoints on the population question, despite the overwhelming evidence, received little attention from the major opinion-makers. The opinion-makers were strongly opposed to population growth because they were strongly pro-abortion. The apocalypics seemed to provide scientific evidence for a looming catastrophe. This reinforced the legalization of abortion in 1973 (Roe v. Wade).

In 1942, Warren Thompson warned of the decline in the birth rate in Western Europe and its colonies, 1890–1940. "It is the most important demographic change of our time."⁴⁰ This decline in birth rates in the West has generally continued, although in the early 1990s, it was reversed in the United States.⁴¹ By the late 1980s, there was no Western European nation except Ireland⁴² with a birth rate anywhere near 35. Steven W. Sinding and Sheldon J. Segal, "Birth-Rate News," New York Times (Dec. 19, 1991).

36. Paul R. Ehrlich and Anne H. Ehrlich, "What Happened to the Population Bomb?" Human Behavior (Jan. 1979), p. 88.

37. Ibid., p. 92.

38. John Tierney, "Betting the Planet," New York Times Magazine (Dec. 2, 1990), pp. 52–53. Gold was in the $350/oz range.

39. Their debate went back to the original Earth Day in 1970, when, at a faculty party, Simon tossed a drink in Ehrlich's face. He called Ehrlich the author of work that lacked substance or scholarship. Ibid., p. 53.

40. Warren S. Thompson, Population Problems, 3rd ed. (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1942), p. 188.

41. By 1992, the U.S. birth rate had climbed to 2.05 children per family, up from 1.8 in 1987, much to the surprise of population forecasters. Lucinda Harper, "Census Bureau Lifts Population Forecast, Citing Fertility, Immigration, Longevity," Wall Street Journal (Dec. 4, 1992).

42. Ireland in this period experienced a rising population: 1.5% per year. "Irish Economy Dips After Big Decade," New York Times (Dec. 25, 1981). It is the one West

2.1 children per family—the family replacement rate.⁴³ Had Islamic birth rates been excluded, the birth rate figures would have been much lower in several nations. West Germany's birth rate had fallen so low by the late 1970s that the German population will die out in the year 2500 if the same birth rate is maintained.⁴⁴ (There will be plenty of Muslims, especially Turks, to replace them.) By the late 1980s, a new warning was being sounded: European life spans were lengthening, birth rates were dropping, and government retirement programs were facing a looming crisis: too many recipients, too few taxpaying workers.⁴⁵ Yet the apocalypticists continue to warn of an impending explosion, a population bomb.

2. Global 2000

In 1980, a Presidential Commission reported to the President of the United States on the impending crises. Unlike most reports from Presidential commissions, this three-volume report received worldwide publicity. It was titled, Global 2000 Report to the President, but became known simply as Global 2000. It was a deeply political document. It was also a classic Malthusian document, meaning the 1798 Malthus, not the more mature Malthus. It warned on page 1:

If present trends continue, the world in 2000 will be more crowded, more polluted, less stable ecologically, and more vulnerable to disruption than the world we live in now. Serious stresses involving population, resources, and environment are clearly visible ahead. Despite greater material output, the world's people will be poorer in many ways than they are today.

For hundreds of millions of the desperately poor, the outlook for food and other necessities of life will be no better. For many it will be worse. Barring revolutionary advances in technology, life for most people on earth will be more precarious in 2000 than it is now—unless the nations of the world act decisively to alter current trends.

Nothing like this happened. Two comments are relevant here. First, there has been no revolutionary technological development, for European nation with young people visible.

43. This includes both southern and northern Europe: "The Missing Children," The Economist (Aug. 3, 1991).

44. John Vinocur, "West Germans, Birth Down, Ponder Future, or Lack of It," New York Times (April 28, 1978).

45. "Grapppling With the Graying of Europe," Business Week (March 13, 1989).

example, along the lines of nanotechnology, where molecule-sized mechanical assemblers put together atoms and molecules in order to produce organic as well as inorganic substances in almost limitless quantities. This development, if it comes, will at last force a drastic revision of the legacy of Malthus. It looks technologically feasible sometime before the year 2070, but it has not happened yet.⁴⁶ Second, “the nations of the world”—read: national governments—poured tens of billions of dollars worth of aid into the third world in the 1980s, but in the handful of isolated socialist economies of Africa, things nevertheless grew worse.⁴⁷ Outside of these tiny socialist economies, which were also suffering from civil war, the predicted food crises did not take place.

This absence of crises was predicted by a group of scholars in a book published in 1984: The Resourceful Earth.⁴⁸ This book received very little attention from the press. Its editors offered another scenario: “If present trends continue, the world in 2000 will be less crowded (though more populated), less polluted, more stable ecologically, and less vulnerable to resource-supply disruption than the world we live in now. Stresses involving population, resources, and environment will be less in the future than now . . . The world’s people will be richer in most ways than they are today . . . The outlook for food and other necessities of life will be better . . . life for most people on earth will be less precarious economically than it is now.”⁴⁹ This prediction came true for all but North Korea and Cuba.

The Malthusian apocalypitics in 1980 dismissed as irrelevant two centuries of economic and technological progress: 1780–1980. They also ignored earlier periods of population growth in European history. Economic historian Karl Helleiner wrote:

The opinion, still widely held, that before the eighteenth century, Europe’s population, though subject to violent short-run fluctuations, remained stationary over long periods, or was growing only imperceptibly, is, I believe, no longer tenable. There is sufficient evidence to indicate that those oscillations were superimposed on clearly recognizable “long waves.” At least two periods of secular increase

46. Erik K. Drexler, Engines of Creation (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, 1986); K. Eric Drexler and Chris Peterson, Unbounding the Future: The Nanotechnology Revolution (New York: Morrow, 1991).

47. See below, “Foreign Aid: Government to Government.”

48. Julian L. Simon and Herman Kahn (eds.), The Resourceful Earth: A Response to Global 2000 (London: Basil Blackwell, 1984).

49. Simon and Kahn, “Introduction,” ibid., pp. 1–2. Ellipses are in the original.

can be tolerably well identified in the demographic history of medieval and early modern Europe, the first extending from about the middle of the eleventh to the end of the thirteenth, the second from the middle of the fifteenth to the end of the sixteenth, century. . . . In this sense the demographic development of the eighteenth century was not unique. What was unprecedented about it was the fact that the secular upward movement started from a higher level, and that it was able to maintain, and for some time even increase, its momentum. Population growth in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, unlike that of previous epochs, was not terminated or reversed by catastrophe.⁵⁰

Something changed after 1750. The world experienced what Adam Smith taught in The Wealth of Nations (1776): economic freedom produces rapid, long-term growth.

Economic freedom is necessary but not sufficient to produce long-term population growth. A religious worldview favorable to large families must accompany economic liberty. Men must believe what David wrote so long ago: "As arrows are in the hand of a mighty man; so are children of the youth. Happy is the man that hath his quiver full of them: they shall not be ashamed, but they shall speak with the enemies in the gate" (Ps. 127:4–5). The issue here is world dominion under God. This faith has faded rapidly in the humanist West. With falling birth rates among the populations of the industrialized world, rates of population growth are headed lower.⁵¹ When third-world nations industrialize, they almost certainly—a very dangerous phrase in demographics—will experience the same thing. (We must always add: unless people change their minds and then change their behavior.)

The Malthusians always talk about the burden of more mouths to feed. They never talk about the economic benefits of more hands to work and more minds to think creatively beginning two decades later.⁵² They ignore the long-term capital returns from a 15-year or 20-year capital investment in morality and education. That is, *they are present-oriented and therefore lower-class social theorists.*⁵³ Sadly, vocal

50. K. F. Helleiner, "The Vital Revolution Reconsidered," in D. V. Glass and D. E. C. Eversley (eds.), Population in History (London: Arnold, 1965), p. 86.

51. An "echo effect" can persist for several generations: despite birth rates below the family replacement rate of 2.1 births per family, total population continues to grow because of high birth rates in the past. A rising number of marriages produces a rising population even though family size decreases.

52. Julian Simon, The Ultimate Resource (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1981).

53. Class position is best understood in terms of time perspective, not money. See Christian intellectuals in the late twentieth century joined the camp of the Malthusians.

3. The Specter of Hunger Is Himself Very Thin

Are many people facing famine today? If so, what is the proper solution? If not, why are so many Western intellectuals convinced that famine is imminent? How could a supposedly serious pair of scholars have written a book in 1967 titled, *Famine—1975?*⁵⁴ The famine never appeared. Instead, food prices fell. Per capita consumption of food rose. Yet the myth of looming food shortages continues to be believed. From 1798 until the present, Malthus' predictions have been refuted by the facts, decade after decade. The West has experienced a growing population with increasing per capita consumption of food. Yet the myth still flourishes in the West. That starvation is possible in a major war is quite possible. The question is: If we avoid such a major war, is a famine inevitable? The apocalyptic's answer: yes. This answer has been proven incorrect for over two centuries, but generation after generation of apocalyptic's learn nothing from the evidence. Theirs is a religious worldview, impervious to the historical record. It is also an anti-biblical worldview, opposed to the dominion covenant.

E. An Age of Hunger?

Consider the anti-free market book written by a politically left-wing evangelical historian, Ronald J. Sider: Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger (1977).⁵⁵ This book was very popular among college-age Protestant evangelicals and neo-evangelical college professors for several years until the Institute for Christian Economics hired David Chilton to write Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators (1981). After that, Sider's name and influence faded rapidly.⁵⁶ The collapse of Edward Banfield, The Unheavenly City (Boston: Little, Brown, 1971), ch. 3.

54. William and Paul Paddock, Famine—1975! America's Decision: Who Will Survive? (Boston: Little, Brown, 1967).

55. Co-published by the neo-evangelical Protestant Inter-Varsity Press and the liberal Roman Catholic Paulist Press.

56. A second edition of Rich Christians was published by Inter-Varsity in 1984, one which promised on the cover to respond to Sider's critics. Inside, there was no reference to David Chilton's refutation, or to a dozen other published critics. Sider simply stonewalled; his influence began to disappear almost immediately. He rapidly fell out of favor with his left-wing evangelical supporters when he came out publicly against both abortion and homosexuality in the mid-1980s. The third edition of Rich Christians (Waco: Word, 1990) also made no reference to Chilton. Neither did the Communism in the late 1980s buried what little remained of his reputation as a social theorist—a fate shared by many of his humanist peers. It was not that most of them changed their minds after 1989. Rather, the public started laughing at them. This drove them into a snit of silence. Finally, in 1997, the fourth edition appeared. In it, Sider reversed many of his old opinions, adopted some of Chilton's conclusions, toned down his rhetoric, but still refused to mention Chilton or his book.⁵⁷ By then it was two decades too late. His original errors had become conventional thinking for a generation of academic neo-evangelicals.

Let us begin with Sider's initial assumption: our present age of hunger. The fact is, no era in man's history has been described more inaccurately as an age of hunger than the era in which Sider wrote his book. The near-universal conquest of hunger for most of the world's population, except those people caught in civil wars in backward African nations,⁵⁸ had been achieved by 1977. The 1980s accelerated this conquest. Like so many other academic jeremiads of the twentieth century, Sider's came after the supposed crisis had very nearly been solved⁵⁹—solved by free-market, profit-driven agriculture.

The extraordinary productivity of modern capitalist agriculture stands as a testimony to the possibilities for urbanization and suburbanization. Men prefer to live in cities and towns when they can afford to leave the farm. The division of labor—social, economic, intellectual, cultural—that urban life promotes makes almost inevitable net out-migration from exclusively rural areas. This is exactly what the jubilee land laws promoted. The nineteenth and twentieth centuries have seen this development as never before in man's post-Babel history.

What about the supposedly near-starvation conditions of the politically designated third world?⁶⁰ The poorest nations on earth in fourth edition in 1997.

57. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), Appendix F: "The Re-Education of Ronald J. Sider."

58. And, in the 1990s, in civil-war torn regions of former Communist domination in Europe and Asia.

59. "The owl of Minerva flies only at dusk."—Hegel.

60. The concept of the "third world" is uniquely political. It refers to those nations that seek government-to-government foreign aid. P. T. Bauer wrote: "The Third World is the creation of foreign aid: without foreign aid there is no Third World. The concept of an underdeveloped world eventually to become the Third World was invented after the Second World War. It did not exist before then. From its inception, the unifying characteristic has been that the Third World is in practice the aggregate

1983, the economies of sub-Saharan Africa, were producing on average 90% of the calories they needed. The three poorest nations on earth—Mali, Ghana, and Chad—produced two-thirds of the needed calories.⁶¹ The common characteristic of these African nations is that their governments have placed controls on farmers: heavy taxation, controls against private exporting of crops, price controls on agricultural products, and government monopoly purchases at prices well below world market prices. This observation was made by English economist Peter T. Bauer two decades before Sider's book appeared.⁶² Bauer was one of the foremost economic theorists in the area of economic development; he was elevated to the House of Lords for his work in the field. (He died in 2002.) A century before Sider's book appeared, Cornelius Walford had identified the same causes of famine in history that Bauer identified: (1) the prevention of cultivation and the willful destruction of crops; (2) defective agriculture caused by the communistic control of land; (3) governmental interference by regulation or taxation; (4) currency restrictions, including debasing of coins.⁶³

Sider ignored all this or else was unaware of it in 1977. By 1984, he was no longer unaware of it, for Chilton had presented Bauer's evidence and supporting academic evidence.⁶⁴ Nevertheless, Sider's second edition in 1984 refused to respond to Chilton's line-by-line critique, despite the fact that the new edition's cover promised that he would respond to his critics. He never mentioned a word about Chilton, Bauer, or Walford. This was not scholarship; this was naive of countries whose governments demand and receive Western aid. In all other ways the unity or uniformity is pure fiction." Bauer, Equality, the Third World and Economic Delusion (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1981), p. 87.

61. The World Bank, World Development Report 1986 (New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986), pp. 234–35, Table 28; cited in E. Calvin Beisner, Prospects for Growth: A Biblical View of Population, Resources, and the Future (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, 1990), p. 127.

62. P. T. Bauer, Economic Analysis and Policy in Under-Developed Countries (Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Commonwealth-Studies Center, published by Duke University Press and Cambridge University Press, 1957), pp. 83–84. Bauer published a detailed study of these government marketing boards as early as 1954: West African Trade: A Study of Competition, Oligopoly and Monopoly in a Changing Economy (New York: Augustus M. Kelley, [1954] 1963), Part 5.

63. Cited in E. Parmalee Prentice, Hunger and History: The Influence of Hunger on Human History (New York: Harper & Bros., 1939), p. 4.

64. David Chilton, Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators: A Biblical Response to Ronald J. Sider, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1982), pp. 127–31, 134–35, and especially 139, where he cited Walford's four causes of famine. (<http://bit.ly/dcsider>) socialist propaganda disguised as caring Christian scholarship.

In an important 1981 article, economist Nick Eberstadt noted that four myths contribute to our failure to deal with the intellectual problem of hunger, the myths of (1) widespread and growing hunger; (2) growing and inevitable agricultural scarcity; (3) ominous food deficits; (4) the superiority of socialist agriculture. He then went on to provide statistics to refute each of these four myths.⁶⁵ Sider promoted the first three myths and implicitly promoted the fourth by his attack on profit-seeking agriculture.

The worst famine in modern history, the Chinese famine of 1959–62, was caused by Mao's Great Leap Forward policies: a vast scheme of government-directed production. As many as 30 million people died as a result of this program. "Even as their policies were causing millions of their citizens to starve," Eberstadt wrote, "China's leaders denied that there was a crisis, refused all offers of international aid, and exported food."⁶⁶ In the late 1960s and early 1970s, a million ethnic Ibos died in a Nigerian famine. This was government policy: the Islamic Nigerians were trying to eliminate the rebellious Ibos. Similar government policies led to famines in Ethiopia, East Timor, and Cambodia.⁶⁷ Hunger is not the product of population growth, the West's meat consumption, or the failure of modern agriculture. The problem is socialist economics. Sider and his intellectual peers are making this problem worse. The problem is not rich Christians in an age of hunger. The problem is isolated socialist economies in an age of capitalist prosperity.

F. Foreign Aid: Government to Government

Did the West do nothing while third-world residents starved? Hardly. In 1982, the Organization of Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) estimated that the West sent about $18 billion to third-world countries. In addition, multilateral development agencies (government operated) provided an additional $8 billion. To that was added government and private investment and lending. The total, according to the OECD, was in the $80 billion range.⁶⁸ In one year! These

65. Nick Eberstadt, "Hunger and Ideology," Commentary (July 1981). Eberstadt was at the time a visiting fellow at Harvard University's Center for Population Studies.

66. Eberstadt, "Famine, Development, & Foreign Aid," Commentary (March 1985), p. 26.

67. Ibid., pp. 20–21.

68. The nominal dollars today (2012) would be more than double.

capital flows began in the early 1950s. From 1956 to 1982, the West sent $670 billion in aid (OECD estimate). In 1985 prices, this was over $1.5 trillion. Three-quarters of this money came from governments. Add to this the money sent from 1982 to 1985 plus the money sent in the first half of the 1950s, and the total is $2 trillion. How much wealth did this represent? *The combined value of all farms in the United States and all stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange in 1985.*⁶⁹ But this enormous transfer of wealth was insufficient to stop the famines in sub-Saharan Africa, and so it was equally insufficient to stop the critics of capitalism, who called for more compulsory aid and more sacrifices by Western taxpayers. This points to a conclusion that Bauer had made decades earlier, but which is unacceptable to modern statist: the primary shortage of capital in backward societies is moral capital, meaning people's attitudes and beliefs.⁷⁰ This crucial form of capital cannot be provided by government handouts.⁷¹

Did the recipient governments use this money to strengthen agriculture? Not often. Politicians and bureaucrats wanted to bypass agriculture in order to become leaders of industrial nations. Industrial nations have more prestige and more modern weaponry. Third-world economic planning programs deliberately starved the agricultural sector. In Peru and Mexico, less than 10% of gross national product was produced by farming in 1980, half of Germany's rate in the 1930s. Ecuador's percentage in 1984 was smaller than Holland's in 1950. Bolivia's rate was less than Greece's in 1984, yet Greece is considered a developed nation. Senegal, in the midst of the continuing Sahel famine, in 1984 produced at the same level of Japan in 1950.⁷² The problem is not lack of foreign aid. The problem is the misuse of this aid by recipient politicians and bureaucrats.

G. Other Ignored Factors

One of the familiar arguments of the semi-vegetarian social critics of capitalist agriculture is that Westerners eat too much meat. If we just ate more vegetables, the freed-up food resources could feed the

69. Ibid., p. 28.

70. P. T. Bauer, Dissent on Development (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1972), pp. 78–79.

71. Gary North, "Free Market Capitalism," in Robert Clouse (ed.), Wealth & Poverty: Four Christian Views of Economics (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1984), pp. 27–65. (<http://bit.ly/ClouseWap>)

72. Eberstadt, "Famine, Development & Foreign Aid," p. 29.

starving masses of the world. That is to say, if we ate less meat, our governments could tax the money we saved by eating soybeans and then send surplus soybeans to Africa (or wherever). I call this outlook soybean socialism.

1. Soybean Socialism

Sider's comments are typical. Notice his use of the pronouns we and our. "Undoubtedly the most striking measure of the gap between rich and poor is food consumption. . . . U.S. citizens consume almost five times as much grain per person as do the people in the developing countries. The major reason for this glaring difference is that we eat most of our grain indirectly—via grain-fed livestock and fowl."⁷³ What these guilt-manipulating critics always fail to mention is that the recipient nations suffer from a far worse situation: their animals eat huge quantities of grain, yet they escape a similar fate at the hands of man.

The sad fact is this: animals in under-developed countries consume vast quantities of poorly stored food, especially grains. I have covered this in Moses and Pharaoh,⁷⁴ but some of the facts are worth repeating. The "sacred cows" of India eat a lot of grain, but nobody eats them. Estimates of the number of such cows in India range between 175 million to over 200 million. They eat enough grain to feed 1.2 billion people. Robert Sassone wrote in 1972: "This means that India produced enough food, so that if you moved the cows out, you could move everybody in from the continents of Antarctica, Australia, Africa and Europe. You could also move in everybody from most of the other nations in the world. Then all those people could eat better than the people of India eat today."⁷⁵ India's rats also eat. In the early 1970's, rats and cows together consumed half of India's agricultural output.⁷⁶ It would have taken a train 3,000 miles long to haul all the grain eaten by rats in India each year.⁷⁷ Rats in other nations are also big eaters. In one year, rats in the Philippines consumed over half the corn and 90% of the rice crop.⁷⁸ Is this the fault of the "monopolistic" West?

73. Sider, Rich Christians, p. 42.

74. North, Moses and Pharaoh, pp. 341–42.

75. Robert L. Sassone, Handbook on Population, 2nd ed. (Author, 1972), p. 53.

76. Robert M. Bleiberg, "Down a Rathole," Barron's (Aug. 11, 1975), p. 7.

77. The estimate of Dr. Max Milner of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. "Over 40% of the World's Food Is Lost to Pests," Washington Post (March 6, 1977).

78. Idem.

2. The Green Revolution

Then there is the “green revolution” that transformed Asian agriculture in the 1960s. That revolution is continuing. Norman Borlaug, who won the Nobel Prize in 1970 for his high-yield dwarf wheat that rescued Asia from famine, in 1992 announced a program to save Africa from famine. With a grant provided by a private Japanese philanthropist, Borlaug’s program was tried on 150,000 African farms. The results were spectacular: yield increases of 2.5 to one, 1986–1992. Even after civil war ended his work in the Sudan, the Sudanese still harvested 800,000 tons of wheat, up from 160,000 in 1986. Former U.S. President Jimmy Carter, himself a farmer, told the World Bank in 1992: “Dr. Borlaug’s system works. I’ve been on the farms. I’ve seen it work.”⁷⁹ Yet Sider in 1977 dismissed the green revolution as a temporary phenomenon because “fantastic population growth almost matched increased agricultural productivity. When droughts and floods struck in 1971 and 1972, hunger returned.”⁸⁰

A major problem with Sider’s book is that he regarded short-term statistics produced by ideologically motivated pleaders as a convenient substitute for both economic theory and detailed historical research. In the second edition, he refused to respond to the first edition’s many errors pointed out in Chilton’s Productive Christians. The third edition (1990) failed to respond to Chilton’s third edition, which refuted Sider’s second edition line by line. There is no mass starvation in the world, but there is a vast market for guilt among intellectuals. Finally, in 1997, he gave up on the entire 20-year project. He accepted much of what Chilton had said. But he never mentioned Chilton once in any of the last four editions, including the 2005 edition.

H. Capitalist Guilt or Liberal Guilt?

Who is to blame for all this alleged starvation? Rich people in the West, said Sider in 1977. “Tragically, rising affluence in North America, Europe, Russia [!!!] and Japan had also tripled the cost of grain for export in the same short period.”⁸¹ What is Sider’s solution to the “problem” of the North American “monopoly” over food? “A new food policy now is one way to avoid such a dangerous situation. The constantly growing demand for food must stop—or at least slow down dramatically. That means reduced affluence in the rich nations and population control everywhere.”⁸²

79. Richard Critchfield, “Bring the Green Revolution to Africa,” New York Times (Sept. 14, 1992).

80. Sider, Rich Christians, p. 17.

81. Sider, Rich Christians, p. 17.

Sider’s analysis rests implicitly on what Mises called the Montaigne dogma: an increase in one person’s wealth always comes from a decrease in another person’s wealth.⁸³ Such a view is opposed to the biblical idea that God rewards covenant-keeping societies, in part so that other societies will praise God and adopt God’s laws (Deut. 4:5–8), thereby spreading wealth across the globe. Sider wants the West to feed the world’s starving poor. But when he said “the West,” he means Western governments. He means charity by compulsion—the destruction of charity.

Western governments have done enough damage already. The series of famines that began in the Sahel region of Africa in the 1970s were caused by ill-advised government foreign aid projects from the West. The Sahel region comprises about a fifth of the land area of Africa, stretching east to west, just south of the Sahara: from Mauritania on the west coast through Mali, Niger, Chad, the Sudan, and parts of Ethiopia and Somalia. The West’s project managers sank deep water wells in order to increase the water supply for agriculture. The nomads of the region then abandoned centuries-old wandering routes and settled close to the wells. The result should have been predicted but wasn’t: the nomads’ animals overgrazed the areas near the wells, multiplied rapidly, thus bringing regional famine. Meanwhile, the world development organizations continued to sink more wells, spreading the famine.⁸⁴

The majority of the cases of starvation today are in sub-Saharan Africa, north of South Africa. Very few people live there—fewer than a hundred million, with the AIDS plague rapidly spreading across the lower part of the that incontinent continent. How could the rest of the world be fed by the food supposedly forfeited by these people? Civil war is a major cause—perhaps the major cause—of starvation in Africa. The opposing military forces steal most of the food sent to civilians by foreign charities and civil governments. In December, 1992, the United States government sent 30,000 of its military troops into 82. Ibid., p. 214. This statement is missing in the 1984 edition.

83. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), p. 660. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

84. Claire Sterling, “The Making of the Sub-Saharan Wasteland,” Atlantic Monthly (May 1974).

Somalia, under the authority of a United Nations task force, in order to stop the civil war from curtailing civilian food supplies sent by the West. The U.S. government implicitly acknowledged the source of the famine in Somalia: civil war, not the Montaigne dogma.

The West's consumption of food has had nothing to do with the agricultural crisis of sub-Sahara Africa. Poorly designed Western government foreign aid programs and domestic civil wars are the primary causes. Socialist agriculture, demonism, and God's curses are also relevant. What socialist critics refuse to consider is that socialism always produces low agricultural output. What humanists refuse to consider is that God brings terrible negative sanctions on those who worship demons. What Christian intellectuals refuse to consider is that they should avoid becoming apologists for propaganda from socialists and humanists.

There is no evidence that population growth today threatens per capita food consumption. Whether or not famine occurs will be decided by economic policy and the ability of civil governments to provide conditions of peace, where trade can take place without threat of violence. The world is not facing famine. The growth of free market institutions around the world has lowered the price of food, and has therefore lowered the percentage of people's incomes spent on food. What creates famine are such factors as government-imposed price ceilings on food, government controls over agricultural production, government restrictions on food distribution, and civil war. Where the free market flourishes, people do not starve. Rather, the market for weight-loss programs expands.

I. The New Tower of Babel

From at least the time when the late eighteenth-century French pornographer and communist propagandist Restif de la Breton wrote The Year 2000, the year 2000 has been the focus of humanism's eschatological concern.⁸⁵ The goal of the socialists and humanists has been to engineer a new world order, a rival of the new world order established by Jesus Christ.

One of the means of gaining public acceptance for the humanists' political new world order has been an appeal to the need to protect the environment, which is by nature international: moving fluids (air and water). These moving fluids can easily be used as "free" dump sites by those seeking to transfer private costs to others. (The other major appeal has been to disarmament.)

85. Robert A. Nisbet, "The Year 2000 and All That," Commentary (June 1968).

In 1970, a wave of excitement swept academia: Earth Day. This celebration was organized politically. Rallies were held across the United States and the world. This took place within weeks of the visible end of the counter-culture movement, which had begun between 1964 and 1965. This had been an era of cultural rebellion, intellectual transformation, sexual license, occultism, drugs, anti-war riots, and an economic boom which ended only with the recession of 1969–1970.⁸⁶ For six years, waves of protest swept the United States and the world. They ended one month after Earth Day: at Kent State University in Ohio, where a National Guard unit shot and killed several students during a protest. Within weeks, the public manifestations of the counter-culture's revolutionary phase ended. But the world was no longer the same; much of the counter-culture had been permanently institutionalized and commercialized.

One American author more than any other gave an account of this movement: Theodore Roszak. In 1969, his book appeared, The Making of a Counter Culture.⁸⁷ It pictured a movement based on a philosophical rejection of the boundaries of Western rationality, morals, and behavior: beyond technocracy. Three years later, he wrote Where the Wasteland Ends.⁸⁸ The title of the second book is significant. The wasteland motif is significant. He returned once again to the contrast between two deeply religious symbols: the garden and the wasteland. The wasteland, he wrote, is what technology produces. It is the civilization of the machine.

1. The Establishment's New World Order

In between the publication of these two books, another author wrote an essay. He wrote it for the most influential journal in the world, Foreign Affairs, the official publication of the Council on Foreign Relations.⁸⁹ He wrote it for the April 1970 issue: Earth Day. The

86. Gary North, Unholy Spirits: Occultism and New Age Humanism (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1986), pp. 6–11. (<http://bit.ly/gnocultism>)

87. Theodore Roszak, The Making of a Counter Culture: Reflections on the Technocratic Society and Its Youthful Opposition (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1969).

88. Roszak, Where the Wasteland Ends: Politics and Transcendence in Postindustrial Society (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1972).

89. On the influence of the C.F.R. and its parallel organizations throughout the Anglo-American world, see Carroll Quigley, Tragedy and Hope: A History of the World in Our Time (New York: Macmillan, 1966), pp. 950–55.

author was George Kennan, one of the six "wise men" who shaped U.S. foreign policy from the Great Depression of the 1930s through the 1980s.⁹⁰ Kennan was the author of another article for Foreign Affairs, a 1946 anonymous essay that set forth the policy of containment: containing the Soviet Union geographically, a boundary strategy. This was the most influential and famous article on U.S. foreign policy written in the twentieth century. He died in 2005 at age 101.

Kennan's 1970 article was titled, "To Prevent a World Wasteland: A Proposal." This essay represented the assimilation of the counter culture's environmental vision by the masters of the technocratic Establishment. The Establishment's intellectuals had been ready and willing from the beginning to harness the pent-up forces of the revolt against the Establishment. They sought to re-channel these protests into rent-seeking, bureaucracy-expanding efforts to reduce human freedom. The state would be the beneficiary; those who controlled access to the most powerful positions within the state would benefit. The ultimate state is international.

Kennan began his observations with a quotation from the Secretary-General of the United Nations Organization, U Thant: "For the first time in the history of mankind, there is arising a crisis of world-wide proportions involving developed and developing countries alike—the crisis of human environment. . . . It is becoming apparent that if current trends continue, the future of life on earth could be endangered."⁹¹ Kennan observed that environmental problems normally become a concern first "within national boundaries. . . ." He immediately shifted his discussion to the international questions: polluted air, contaminated coastal waters, and wildlife.⁹² These phenomena are not respecters of national boundaries. As it is in the Book of Leviticus, so is it in Foreign Affairs: a question of boundaries. Kennan wanted these boundaries extended beyond nations.

Kennan called for the creation of "a body fortified by extensive scientific expertise" which will be able to measure the adequacy of "a considerable body of international arrangements" that deal with the environment. So far, he insisted, "it is evident that present activities have not halted or reversed environmental deterioration." There is no reason to suppose that they will stop.⁹³ He described the features that this new co-ordinating body must have: (1) facilities for the collection and dissemination of information (i.e., tools of control and propaganda); (2) co-ordination of “research and operational activities”; (3) the establishment of international standards in environmental matters, purely advisory; (4) international action governing the high seas, outer space, the Arctic and Antarctic, and the stratosphere.⁹⁴ This fourth requirement “consists simply of the establishment and enforcement of suitable rules for all human activities conducted in these media.”⁹⁵ In short, if a man breathes the air, swims in the sea, flies into outer space, or dwells on the ice caps, he is to be governed in all his activities by suitable rules. Kennan’s proposal is messianic.

90. They were Dean Acheson, Charles Bohlen, Averill Harriman, George Kennan, Robert Lovett, and John J. McCloy. Walter Isaacson and Evan Thomas, The Wise Men: Six Friends and the World They Made (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1986).

91. George Kennan, "To Prevent a World Wasteland: A Proposal," Foreign Affairs, XLVIII (April 1970), p. 401.

92. Idem.

Messianic programs require messianic enforcers. Kennan’s program is no exception. “Someone, after all, must decide at some point what is tolerable and permissible here and what is not; and since this is an area in which no sovereign government can make these determinations, some international authority must ultimately do so.”⁹⁶ There must be an international treaty or convention. “But for this there will have to be some suitable center of initiation, not to mention the instrument of enforcement which at a later point will have to come into the picture.”⁹⁷

Kennan called for a non-governmental agency of experts that can impose negative sanctions with civil authority. It must be a government beyond civil government and the boundaries of civil government. “This entity, while naturally requiring the initiative of governments for its inception and their continued interest for its support, would have to be one in which the substantive decisions would be taken not on the basis of compromise among governmental representatives but on the basis of collaboration among scholars, scientists, experts, and perhaps also something in the nature of environmental statesmen and diplomats—but true international servants, bound by no national or political mandate, by nothing, in fact, other than dedication to the work at hand.”⁹⁸

93. Ibid., p. 402.

94. Ibid., pp. 404–5.

95. Ibid., p. 405.

96. Idem.

97. Ibid., p. 406.

98. Ibid., pp. 409–10.

2. Russian Socialism

In January, 1994, a nationally circulated newspaper insert magazine, Parade, ran a three-page interview with Mikhail Gorbachev, the deposed ruler of the Soviet Union (1991), who immediately became the head of an environmentalist organization called the Green Cross. This worn-out Communist war horse was proclaiming the Kennanist line in preference to the Leninist line. Collectivist that he was, his enemy was still the same: the American consumer, who has too much wealth.

If we're going to protect the planet's ecology, we're going to need to find alternatives to the consumerist dream that is attracting the world. Otherwise, how will we conserve our resources, and how will we avoid setting people against each other when resources are depleted? . . .

America must be an example to the world. America should do what we have done—that is, to abandon any attempt to impose a certain model on other peoples. If we just say, “Xerox the American way and standard of living,” then we must answer the question, “What do we do about the fact that 260 million people in America use 40% of the world's energy resources, and the 5 billion people in the rest of the world use what's left?” America must be the teacher of democracy to the world, but not the advertiser of the consumer society. It is unrealistic for the rest of the world to reach the American living standard. The world can't support that. Even now, only one third of the world's population is provided for adequately. We should, therefore develop other models.⁹⁹⁰

He called for “a new consciousness based on environmental justice.”¹⁰⁰ There is no blueprint, but there must be action. A new evolution is upon us. “There is no clear answer, except that the old ideologies in our civilization must give way to the new challenges of our civilization. The growing environmental movement must be a vehicle for that.”¹⁰¹

What is worth noting is that only a few weeks before, on November 28, 1993, the New York Times “Op Ed” page published an essay by Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn in which he proclaimed an almost identical thesis. The article was titled, “To Tame Savage Capitalism.” If any person was responsible for destroying the reputation of Soviet Communism in the West, it was he. His three-volume study, The Gulag Archipelago, chronicled the terrorism of Soviet Communism from Lenin to the 1960s, and he was generally believed by Western intellectuals, who had rejected similar reports for over half a century. He was exiled from the USSR in 1974. The critic of the Soviet Union has also been the critic of Western capitalism. He now joins hands—or at least propaganda efforts—with Mr. Gorbachev, the protégé of Mr. Andropov, the former head of the KGB, the Soviet secret police that Solzhenitsyn despised.

990. Colin Greer, “The Well-Being of the World Is at Stake,” Parade Magazine (Jan. 23, 1994), pp. 5, 6.

100. Ibid., p. 6.

101. Idem.

In his essay, Solzhenitsyn decried the spiritual vacuum in the former Soviet Union, a vacuum that capitalism cannot fill. This has been a continuing theme in his writings: the failure of secularism, East and West.¹⁰² The West is now in trouble. It now faces “environmental ruin” and “the global population explosion.” The third world constitutes four-fifths of mankind, and will soon constitute five-sixths. It is “drowning in poverty and misery,” and it will soon “step forward with an ever-growing list of demands to the advanced nations.” He, too, rejected the growth model of Western capitalism. “The time is urgently upon us to limit our wants.” He attacked the United States without naming it for having resisted the demands of the 1992 Earth Summit in Rio de Janeiro. He did not mention what these demands were: to reduce industrial carbon dioxide emissions by government edicts in order to reduce global warming.

There are four major problems here. First, there is no clear-cut scientific evidence of global warming. When the temperature changes of the world’s oceans are included in the analysis, there is no evidence of directional change, 1890 to 1990. The evidence that temperatures have increased comes from temperature measurements taken at sites in or near cities, where temperatures have increased. In any case, the increase in carbon dioxide emissions accelerated after World War II, but temperatures have not risen since then.¹⁰³ Second, the major sources of carbon dioxide emissions are natural, most notably from termites, which contribute some 14 billion tons of carbon dioxide per year, compared to mankind’s supposed output of five billion tons—in an atmosphere of five quadrillion tons. Mankind's contribution is less than one millionth of the total atmosphere.¹⁰⁴ Third, there is no evidence that global warming is a bad thing. Plant life grows much faster in a high carbon dioxide environment.¹⁰⁵ (Scientific creationists have argued since 1961 that such environmental conditions probably existed under the pre-Flood canopy, when men's life spans were far longer.)¹⁰⁶ Fourth, it would be bad economics to invest heavily in anti-global warming technologies today when far cheaper technical solutions are likely to appear long before the supposed problem gets worse.¹⁰⁷ (As for atmospheric ozone, there was no increase or decrease, 1978 to 1991.)¹⁰⁸

102. A. Solzhenitsyn, “The World Split Apart,” his 1978 lecture to the graduating class of Harvard University, in Solzhenitsyn at Harvard (Washington, D.C.: Ethics and Public Policy Center, 1980), c. 3.

103. Wilfred Beckerman and Jesse Malkin, “How much does global warming matter?” The Public Interest (Winter 1994), p. 4.

In 1977, Ballantine Books, a popular paperback book company in the U.S., published The Weather Conspiracy: The Coming of the New Ice Age. The book began with this warning: "There is growing consensus among leading climatologists that the world is undergoing a cooling trend" (p. 5). But there was no temperature evidence for this frightening scenario, either.

Like Gorbachev, Solzhenitsyn repeated the oft-quoted statistic that the U.S. is a huge consumer of the world's resources. Gorbachev used the 40% figure; Solzhenitsyn used 50%. Neither figure is accurate. The U.S. share of world output/consumption has fallen slowly but steadily as other nations have increased their output and hence their consumption of resources. In 1989, the U.S. share of world output was in the range of 26%.¹⁰⁹ This information was available to the authors in 1993.

Solzhenitsyn complained: "When a conference of the alarmed

104. Peter Sawyer, Green Hoax Effect (Wodonga, Victoria, Australia: Group-acumen, 1990), p. 20.

105. Research findings on this subject are available from Dr. Arthur Robinson, Oregon Institute of Science & Medicine, P. O. Box 1429, Cave Junction, Oregon.

106. Henry M. Morris and John C. Whitcomb, The Genesis Flood: The Biblical Record and Its Scientific Implications (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1961), pp. 404–405.

107. Beckerman and Malkin, pp. 13–16.

108. Chart, Access to Energy, 21 (Nov. 1993), [p. 4]. See also Rogelio A. Maduro and Ralf Schauerhammer, The Holes in the Ozone Scare (Washington, D.C.: 21st Century Science Associates, 1992).

109. Statistical Abstract of the United States, 1993 (Washington, D.C.: U.S. Department of Commerce, Government Printing Office, 1993), Table 1388: Gross National Product in Current and Constant (1989) Dollars. Some 60 nations are compared with the U.S. There are other, smaller nations not listed in the table whose output would add to the total. This would reduce the U.S. share. Exchange rate correlations are complex; it may be that the actual share of U.S. productivity is underestimated, thereby making the U.S. share of world production higher.

peoples of the earth convenes in the face of unquestioned and imminent threat to the planet's environment, a mighty power, one consuming not much less than half the earth's currently available resources and emitting half its pollution, insists, because of its own present-day interests, on lowering the demands of a sensible international agreement, as though it did not itself live on the same earth. Then other leading countries shirk from fulfilling even these reduced demands. Thus, in the economic race, we are poisoning ourselves." We must therefore "learn to limit firmly our desires and demands, to subordinate our interests to moral criteria," or else "humankind" will "simply be torn apart, as the worst aspects of human nature bare their teeth."

He recommended no economic blueprint. Solzhenitsyn has resisted offering an economic blueprint—which he sees as Western and hence unspiritual—throughout his career. But he is opposed to capitalism.¹¹⁰ He has long opposed industrial growth and the ideal of economic progress.¹¹¹ He has cried out against the supposed depletion of economic resources.¹¹² He warned years ago against imminent Malthusian disaster: ". . . in all cases the population will be overtaken by mass destruction in the first decades of the twenty-first century. . . ."¹¹³ He did predict in 1974 that the creative West would eventually "set about the necessary reconstruction."¹¹⁴ But he offered no blueprint for this reconstruction, any more than Gorbachev did two decades later. Both men perceive capitalism as morally bankrupt despite—or perhaps because of—its enormous economic success. They damn it as immoral, but they propose nothing to replace it. This opens the door to the creation of a socialistic New World Order in the name of third world poverty, environmental ethics, and overcoming the population explosion. This means a larger, more powerful state with the international authority to bring sanctions against those nations and individuals who violate the new ethical order. The mild socialist (Solzhenitsyn) and the mild Communist (Gorbachev) are strongly opposed to the free market. In this, they are not alone.

110. On Solzhenitsyn's anti-capitalist economic views, see Mark W. Hendrickson, The Titan and the Marketplace: The Economic Thought of Alexander Solzhenitsyn (unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, International College, 1981), written under Hans Senholz.

111. Solzhenitsyn, Letter to the Soviet Leaders (New York: Harper & Row, 1974), p. 22.

112. Ibid., p. 23.

113. Idem.

114. Idem.

3. The Escalating War Against Christian Society

Shortly before he died, Professor Arthur Selwyn Miller of George Washington University completed the manuscript of a book, The Secret Constitution and the Need for Constitutional Change. It had been financed by the Rockefeller Foundation.¹¹⁵ He argued that the United States is governed by two constitutions, one formal and the other secret.¹¹⁶ The U.S. has always had an elite form of government, he said; “tiny minorities” make the basic decisions.¹¹⁷ This constitutional dualism is now leading to a constitutional crisis, he said. We must now restructure the U.S. Constitution in order to gain consistency between the two systems, he insisted. But how can this be done? “Extraordinary conditions demand extraordinary, even unique, remedies.”¹¹⁸ These remedies include the following: enforced stabilization of population;¹¹⁹ the restructuring of the economy;¹²⁰ the elimination of the threat of nuclear war;¹²¹ the redefining of national security as protection against “environmental degradation throughout the world”;¹²² the equitable distribution of material resources.¹²³ All of this will require the abandonment of Christianity:

The Biblical admonition that mankind should have dominion over everything that moves upon the earth (as well as matter that does not move, such as plants and minerals) must be replaced with a view that humanity has an inescapable “oneness” with nature and the natural world, and must act accordingly. Dominion under the tenets of Judeo-Christian theology has long been employed as a justification for relentless exploitation of the riches of the planet. This will have to be supplanted by an instruction, divine or otherwise, that humans must protect all of nature’s creatures, large and small.

The finite nature of the planet Earth and its natural resources must be recognized. There are limits to growth. Anyone who thinks that 115. Arthur S. Miller, The Secret Constitution and the Need for Constitutional Change (Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood, 1989), p. ix.

116. Ibid., p. 2.

117. Ibid., p. 3. The most detailed treatment of this minority control is found in Philip H. Burch, Jr., Elites in American History, 3 vols. (New York: Holmes & Meyer, 1981). Miller relied on this study: p. 3.

118. Ibid., p. 135.

119. Ibid., p. 81.

120. Ibid., p. 84.

121. Ibid., p. 86.

122. Idem.

123. Idem.

economic growth can continue indefinitely, says Professor Kenneth Boulding, is either a madman or an economist.¹²⁴

Miller called for a Planetary Constitutional Convention.¹²⁵ (This was not a new idea; a similar call was made for similar official reasons in 1974.)¹²⁶ “The world is spinning out of control. Chaos masquerades as order. There is a demonstrable destructive logic to human systems. Already the terrible reactions to crises, near and far, are appearing.” He listed crime, racism, famines, terrorism, and religious wars.¹²⁷ “Population cannot be brought under control, peace cannot be assured, pollution is not controlled, and poverty is everywhere. These situations signify a societal nervous breakdown.”¹²⁸

The rhetoric continued to escalate. In 1991, the year before Earth Summit in Rio, the Trilateral Commission, headed by David Rockefeller, published a book through Oxford University Press: Beyond Interdependence: The Meshing of the World's Economy and the Earth's Ecology.¹²⁹ The authors end their book with this rhetorical warning: “The Earth Summit will likely be the last chance for the world, in this century at least, to seriously address and arrest the accelerating environmental threats to economic development, national security, and human survival. It will certainly be the last major chance for the present generation of leaders and decision-makers to fulfill their basic obligations to their peers, today's youth, and future generations” (p. 128). This is the covenantal language of inheritance: point five of the biblical covenant model.¹³⁰

The question is this: Does this rhetoric reflect the magnitude of the crisis? In the past, it has not. What about today?

124. Ibid., pp. 86–87.

125. Ibid., p. 73.

126. Alfred L. Webre and Philip H. Liss, The Age of Cataclysm (New York: Capricorn Books, G. P. Putnam's Sons, [1974] 1975). This book was based on New Age religion: Edgar Cayce's predictions. Part II, ch. 3. The book included sections on Survival and Regeneration (Part III) and The Future World Society (Part IV). This section included the following chapters: Chaos, Millennium, The Federalist Party, A New Constitution, and Global Society.

127. Miller, Secret Constitution, p. 72.

128. Ibid., pp. 72–73.

129. By Jim MacNeill, Pieter Winsemius, and Taizo Yakushiji, who obviously represented the three blocs of the Trilateral Commission: North America, Europe, and Asia.

130. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

J. Rhetoric and Reality

Kennan, Gorbachev, and Miller used the rhetoric of crisis to further their elitist political design. The humanists' apocalyptic rhetoric of inescapable crisis begins with the idea of absolute limits to growth. There is no doubt that there are limits to growth; the fundamental limit is God's final judgment. There are historical limits, too.¹³¹ This is why there are prices. But to say that there are determinate limits to growth is very different from saying that any committee knows what and where these limits are, when they will call a halt to growth, and how society should operate after such limits are reached.

All talk about "spaceship earth" is specious and politically motivated.¹³² It invokes a military-bureaucratic metaphor—a spaceship—to describe the decentralized decision-making of men and the unplanned operations of nature.¹³³ Echoing Barbara Ward, Gorbachev used the now-commonplace imagery: Planet Earth and its crew.¹³⁴ But the symbol of a spaceship necessarily invokes the image of a captain. Denying the biblical doctrine of a sovereign, transcendent God—the ultimate captain—the socialist must identify other candidates for captainship. One thing is sure: those officers in the control room must be limited in number. They constitute an elite. All rule is hierarchical: either top-down (Ex. 1) or bottom-up (Ex. 18). But without a captain, the more that power is centralized, the greater the rewards for gaining absolute personal control, and the greater the risks of personal failure to do so. The worst will get on top.¹³⁵

In a world in which many prices fall¹³⁶—a world of expanding productivity, especially in agriculture—the economist must discuss relative prices, not absolute limits to growth. There are limits at the margin: I must give up this in order to obtain that. But most of these limits are temporary.¹³⁷ At some price, they can be overcome. The question

131. Gary North, "The Theology of the Exponential Curve," The Freeman (May 1970); reprinted in North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 8. (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>)

132. Barbara Ward, Spaceship Earth (New York: Columbia University Press, 1966); Garrett Hardin, Exploring New Ethics of Survival: The Voyage of the Spaceship Beagle (Baltimore, Maryland: Penguin, 1973).

133. Gary North, "The Mythology of Spaceship Earth," The Freeman (Nov. 1969); reprinted in North, Introduction to Christian Economics, ch. 23.

134. Parade (Jan. 23, 1994), p. 5.

135. F. A. Hayek, The Road to Serfdom (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1944), ch. 10: "Why the Worst Get on Top."

136. Assumption: a fixed money supply.

137. The main exception is energy: specifically, the supply of oil. Kenneth Deffeyes, is: At what price? The other question is: Who pays it? Economist Jacqueline Kasun wrote, "The doomsday literature of limits is shot through with the conceit of absolute capacity, which is alien to economics. . . . In the lifeboat, human beings are pure burdens, straining the capacity of the boat."¹³⁸

The world is almost empty. Fly across any of it and look down. The population apocalypitics of today are like those late Renaissance-era Roman Catholic scientists who refused to look into Galileo's telescope. Sitting next to us on a cross-country flight, the population apocalypitics offer us the same challenge that Groucho Marx offered when caught in the act in a famous scene: "Are you going to believe me or your own eyes?" They will see it when they believe it. As yet, they do not believe it. But hardly anyone believes them any more.

The propaganda of "spaceship earth" escalated in the 1960s. An early example was The Population Explosion and Christian Responsibility, published in 1960.¹³⁹ From 1965 on, book titles heralded an age of limits—not the traditional limits but absolute limits: Our Depleted Society,¹⁴⁰ Too Many Americans,¹⁴¹ *Famine—1975! America's Decision: Who Will Survive?*¹⁴² The Costs of Economic Growth,¹⁴³ The Biological Time Bomb,¹⁴⁴ The Limits to Growth (a best-seller),¹⁴⁵ The No-Growth Society,¹⁴⁶ The Overdeveloped Nations.¹⁴⁷ In 1972, a Presidential commission headed by John D. Rockefeller III, a long-time promoter of zero population growth,¹⁴⁸ was issued: Population and the American Future.¹⁴⁹

What was going on during the same period? By 1980, only about Hubbert's Peak: The Impending World Oil Shortage (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 2002). Hubbert's peak is the prediction by a Shell Oil geologist in the 1950s, M. King Hubbert, regarding the peak output of oil: before 2010.

138. Jacqueline Kasun, The War Against Population: The Economics and Ideology of Population Control (San Francisco: Ignatius, 1988), p. 32.

139. By Richard M. Fagley (New York: Oxford University Press, 1960).

140. By Seymour Melman (Holt Rinehart and Winston, 1965).

141. By Lincoln H. Day and Alice Taylor Day (New York: Delta, 1965).

142. By William and Paul Paddock (Boston: Little, Brown, 1967).

143. By Ezra J. Mishan (New York: Praeger, 1967).

144. By Gordon Rattray Taylor (New York: New American Library, 1968).

145. By Donella H. Meadows, Dennis L. Meadows, Jorgen Randers, and William W. Behrens III (New York: Universe Books, 1972).

146. Edited by Mancur Olson and Hans H. Landsberg (New York: Norton, 1973).

147. By Leopold Kohr (New York: Schocken, 1977).

148. John Ensor Harr and Peter J. Johnson, The Rockefeller Century (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1988), ch. 23.

149. New York: New American Library, 1972.

2% of the world's population was threatened with dangerous hunger.¹⁵⁰ What about the incursion of the cities on agricultural land? Mythical. From 1950 to 1960, there was an increase of 9% in total arable land in the 87 countries studied, nations constituting 73% of the world's total land area. There was an additional 6% rise in permanent, arable cropland worldwide, 1963 to 1977, a United Nations study concluded. By 1980 in the United States, under 4% of the nation's total land area was used for urban purposes.¹⁵¹ In short, the rhetoric of imminent crisis was contradicted by the reality of per capita economic growth.

Consider the year 1971. The U.S. had increased crop production by 13% over 1970. Canada had harvested over 50% more wheat. India's output was so great that it had a surplus of eight million tons of grain. India gave Bangladesh 10% of its surplus and averted a famine there.¹⁵² India's food production outstripped its population growth after 1948. Even so, if they had slaughtered all of their non-productive sacred cows in 1971, India's farmers could feed at least 1.2 billion extra people.¹⁵³

Overcrowding? In 1970, all the people on earth and their homes and local parks could have fit on 15% of the land area of the United States. If these four billion people had been willing to live in the same density of population that they accepted in New York City, the entire world's population would have fit in the state of Montana.¹⁵⁴ (But they would not have enjoyed the winters.) It would have been possible to fit everyone on earth inside the U.S. with the same density of population that prevailed in the state of New Jersey: 1,000 persons per square mile.¹⁵⁵ It is worth noting that the politicians of New Jersey have named it the Garden State.

K. Ethics and Life Style

The twentieth-century West exported the means of increasing poor people's lives. The food problem has been overcome repeatedly since the late eighteenth century. In many backward regions, birth rates remained high, death rates fell, and populations increased. But 150. Eberstadt, "Hunger and Ideology," Commentary (July 1981), p. 43.

151. Julian Simon, "Worldwide, Land for Agriculture Is Increasing, Actually," New York Times (Oct. 7, 1980); cited by Kasun, War Against Population, p. 37.

152. Sassone, Handbook on Population, pp. 51, 52.

153. Ibid., p. 53. In the 1970s, India tripled its food production by adopting free markets in agriculture. Science (Aug. 3, 1984), p. 463.

154. Ibid., p. 98.

155. Ibid., p. 100.

birth rates fall as wealth increases, people move to the cities, and families' net economic costs of rearing young children rise. Human behavior changes. This was a universal demographic experience in the twentieth century.

Those environmental determinists who have recognized that people do change their reproductive behavior have shifted the argument from population growth to style of life. The slowdown is insufficient. More is needed—more of less. Less is more. “Small is beautiful,” announced Buddhist, non-theistic social theorist E. F. Schumacher,¹⁵⁶ and humanists responded enthusiastically. Arnold Nash wrote: “The initial issue is the kind of life that we want to live on this earth as distinct from the number of people who are to live this life.”¹⁵⁷ He warned about an overcrowded earth which will bring “overwhelming chaos through the entire world in our social life. . . .” We were told that overcrowding in cities produces rising crime. The whole world may well be headed in the direction of Calcutta, “where more than half a million people eat, sleep, live, and die with no home other than the streets. . . .”¹⁵⁸ The critics never ask this question: Is what happens in a Hindu society representative of what must happen in a Christian, pro-growth society?

The problem with the city is not overcrowding as such; it is the widespread loss of faith that takes place in cities. The impersonality of the modern city raises the cost of policing crime; self-discipline becomes more important. The loss of faith produces evil consequences faster, since the costs of detection and policing are higher. But the problem is the loss of faith. It is the loss of faith and those communities that grow out of faith.¹⁵⁹ The medieval city was a covenantal association, based on common participation in the Lord's Supper.¹⁶⁰ The 156. E. F. Schumacher, Small Is Beautiful: Economics as if People Mattered (New York: Harper Colophon, [1973] 1975).

157. Arnold S. Nash, “Food, Population and Man's Environment,” in Ronald H. Preston (ed.), Technology and Social Justice (Valley Forge, Pennsylvania: Judson Press, 1971), p. 326.

158. Ibid., p. 327.

159. Jane Jacobs' criticisms of modern city planning are on target: the devastation of urban planning that destroys older neighborhoods. See especially her Death and Life of Great American Cities (New York: Random House, 1971). On the economic viability of cities, see Jacobs, The Economy of Cities (New York: Random House, 1969); Cities and the Wealth of Nations: Principles of Economic Life (New York: Random House, 1984).

160. Max Weber, Economy and Society: An Outline of Interpretive Sociology, edited by Guenther Roth and Claus Wittich (New York: Bedminster Press, 1968), p. 1247. This was part of Weber's incomplete Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft, written shortly be-modern city is not.

The problem is not, as Nash and many other commentators have insisted, man's growing control over nature. Nash brings this covenant lawsuit against dominion man: "What man has been doing in upsetting so violently the world's natural ecology is simply a prolongation of what he has been doing from the very dawn of his history. He has been trying to change the world of nature."¹⁶¹ Man is polluting the world. He is poisoning the atmosphere.¹⁶² "Mineral shortages will soon emerge."¹⁶³ And so on. Society and Environment: The Coming Collision announced the title of a 1972 collection of essays.¹⁶⁴ The End of Nature warned Bill McKibben's book title in 1989. Man the destroyer is destroying the natural world.

Step by step, the theology of the critics of economic growth has become more clear: radical humanism in an alliance with a new pantheism-animism. We are, in the words of Berit Kjos, Under the Spell of Mother Earth.¹⁶⁵ The literature of eco-animism is large and growing.¹⁶⁶ In June, 1992, the largest gathering of world leaders and media representatives since the founding of the United Nations Organization in 1945 met in Rio de Janeiro for the Earth Summit. Everything is moving toward a new Tower of Babel, all in the name of a common cause: to save the earth from man's productivity.

But where has this productivity come from? The ethical cause-and-effect relationship announced by God in His law is the answer. The growth of mankind's per capita productivity has come as a blessing from God in response to a growing willingness on the part of various societies to conform outwardly to His laws of private property and personal responsibility. Understand, this has not been merely a growth in productivity matching the increased numbers of men; it has been a system of increasing wealth per individual. The positive economic sanctions listed in Deuteronomy 28:1–14 have been experienced by the West for over two centuries. The power of our own hands has not pro-fore his death in 1920.

161. Nash, "Food," p. 327.

162. Ibid., pp. 327–28.

163. Ibid., p. 328.

164. Edited by Rex R. Campbell and Jerry L. Wade (Boston: Allyn and Bacon).

165. Victor Books, 1992.

166. Norman Myers (ed.), Gaia: An Atlas of Planet Management (New York: Doubleday Anchor, 1984); Frank Barnaby (ed.), The Gaia Peace Atlas (New York: Doubleday, 1988); Judith Plant (ed.), Healing the Wounds: The Promise of Ecofeminism (Philadelphia: New Society Pubs., 1989); Anuradha Vittachi, Earth Conference One: Sharing a Vision for Our Planet (Boston: New Science Library of Shambala, 1989).

duced this wealth (Deut. 8:17).¹⁶⁷

Conclusion

The ultimate resource in history is not man; on this point, Simon is wrong.¹⁶⁸ It is also not the good earth, as the eco-animists argue. The ultimate resource is the God of the covenant. But it takes God's grace, both special and common, to make this ultimate resource available to covenant-breakers. This gift of grace involves mankind's ethical transformation: the willingness and ability of large numbers of people to obey God. "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: Not of works, lest any man should boast. For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them" (Eph. 2:8–10).

Society today suffers not from overpopulation but from overregulation. We suffer not from a growing scarcity of resources but from a growing scarcity of freedom. Freedom does not come at zero price. In this sense, it is not natural. It is the product of accurate economic thinking and moral self-restraint. When Malthus wrote of moral self-restraint he had in mind was sexual activity. The moral self-restraint we need today is political restraint.

The lure of Malthus' incomparably inaccurate prediction regarding the overexpansion of human population in relation to food has blinded generations of pessimists and economic planners to the truth. What is the truth? This: economic liberty, when coupled with future-orientation of the part of many members of society, can and does lead to less hunger, less poverty, and more choices. Maximum economic growth is achieved when large numbers of people in a society voluntarily adopt the following worldview:

1. Faith that this world is not random, that it is governed by permanent moral principles (i.e., a non-Confucian, non-pragmatic ethic).
2. Commitment to serving consumers as the highest authority (i.e., few government regulations passed in order to favor producers: anti-mercantilism).
3. A political commitment to uphold predictable civil laws that defend private ownership ("Thou shalt not steal").

167. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 21.

168. Simon, Ultimate Resource.

4. A readiness to compete with all comers, i.e., open entry into the marketplace (anti-licensure, anti-bureaucracy).
5. Future orientation: optimistic people who are ready to invest (deferred consumption).

It is not the state's job to create widespread future-orientation; it is also not the state's job to subsidize the activities of others. The state's job is to bring negative sanctions against those who commit public evil. It is to defend the rights of owners over their property—owners' rights, not "property rights."

The problem for underdeveloped nations is not that they have received too little economic aid from Western governments but far too much. They have adopted the false ideas of three or more generations of Western intellectuals who do not believe that individuals can and should regulate their own affairs, bear their own burdens, and reap their own rewards. Instead, the critics of freedom regard the state as a sovereign agent that possesses sufficient knowledge and sufficient creativity to produce wealth for all. What the state has done is to impoverish those who have few economic reserves to make up for the disastrous decisions of government economic planners.

The world does not need fewer people; it needs fewer bureaucrats.

Appendix H

CONSPIRACY, FORGERY, AND HIGHER CRITICISM

For we have not followed cunningly devised fables. . . . (II Peter 1:16a).

I make an assumption when I come to the text of any biblical passage: it is consistent with all the other passages. I agree with Jesus: Scripture cannot be broken (John 10:35b). This distinguishes my approach from the higher criticism of the Bible, which assumes that there is no unity in the Bible, that every text will be found to contradict at least one other text, and that even within chapters, an astute critic can find lots of inconsistencies. Having identified these supposed inconsistencies, the traditional higher critic then attributes them to the supposed fact that different authors wrote the book, with long periods of time separating them. He makes this assumption regarding the Bible: “Different human authors = irreconcilable statements.” He transfers a methodological assumption from the world of literary criticism to the word of God, where it does not apply. He does this because he assumes that the Bible is just another book.¹ He assumes this, in turn, because he does not want to hear the consistent testimony of the God who brings final judgment against covenant-breakers. To stop his ears from hearing God’s testimony, he fills them with noise: academic incoherence.

What marks the arguments of traditional higher critics is an incoherence born of extraordinary precision. The higher critics of the Bible have sharpened their intellectual tools so precisely that the tools are useful only for splitting academic hairs.

As with any other discipline, higher critics are marked by differences in skill. There are varying degrees of precision and complexity in their arguments. Few scholars in the Anglo-American tradition can match the precision and complexity of the average German scholar. The average German higher critic could identify at least two authors in the words, "Mary had a little lamb; its fleece was white as snow." If given tenure in a major state-supported university, teaching no more than three graduate students in a single four-hour seminar each week, he could, over 10 or 15 years, write an entire volume on "Deutero Mary." Then at least five other German scholars would write a minimum of one book each refuting the first scholar, showing that more than two Marys were involved. The average Anglo-American critic cannot do this. He is not up to the challenge. To identify Deutero Mary, he would need an additional text: "And everywhere that Mary went, the lamb was sure to go."

1. Gary North, The Hoax of Higher Criticism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnhohc>)

Traditional higher critics base their case on the supposed incoherence—theological, judicial, and moral—of the Bible's texts. When we read the convoluted, unsubstantiated, jargon-filled, verbally constipated essays and books by higher critics, we get the impression that higher critics assume that the biblical texts are as incoherent as previous higher critics were—that is to say, monumentally incoherent. Higher critics spend at least as much time refuting previous higher critics as they do in explaining how and why the Bible's texts are supposedly jumbled. Traditional higher criticism is composed of layer upon layer of jumbled arguments, not reaching to heaven, like the Tower of Babel, but rather like layers found in an archeological dig: each level has been razed almost completely (but not quite) in order to provide a new foundation for the next critic's reputation. For a critique of the whole procedure, and also the paganism of the university system that has fostered it, see the marvelous book by a former higher critic, Eta Linnemann, Historical Criticism of the Bible: Methodology or Ideology? (1990).

A. Professor Hartley's Insight

The conservative Bible scholar is expected by his academic peers to genuflect whenever he visits the ever-expanding mausoleum known as the temple of higher criticism. He is expected to visit it whenever he writes an introduction to a Bible commentary, even if he only passes through briefly. A good example of this obligatory respect for the spiritually dead is found in John Hartley's 1992 commentary on Leviticus. Hartley's bibliography gives the impression that he has read everything ever written on Leviticus, even in Italian.

In the book's Introduction, he includes a seven-page section in small print on "Author and Origin." Guess what? "Views about the authorship and the origin of the Book of Leviticus vary widely." No kidding! He attributes this situation to two factors: (1) the "sparsity of materials available for reconstructing a history of Israelite worship and the priesthood," and (2) "divergent methodologies for interpreting ancient texts."² This is a scholarly, respectful way of saying: "There simply aren't enough documented facts to arrive at an unambiguous conclusion, so every covenant-breaking professor of Old Testament 'literature' who can read Hebrew, German, and English (let alone Italian) can safely propose any goofy theory he can dream up in his attempt to advance his academic career. If published—and in the arid field of Old Testament studies, it probably will be—the theory will have an academic half-life of about five years."

After surveying dozens of speculative, factually inconclusive, and mutually contradictory theories about who wrote Leviticus and when, Professor Hartley gives us his conclusion. Brace yourself. He said that the authors and revisers of Leviticus, whoever they may have been, and whenever they may have lived, surely influenced the Israelite community. But, he hastens to add, we need to recognize that the Israelite community surely influenced the authors and revisers. Specifically, he said that the text of Leviticus had an important role in "forming the ancient Israelite community." Nevertheless, higher criticism has provided us with "great benefits" by revealing to us "the significant role that the community had in shaping and interpreting the text. . . ."³

What does all this mean? It means that Professor Hartley, in order to cover his backside from carping academic critics, is still relying on his fading notes from a lecture on "Circular Social Causality in a Linear World" that he scribbled down long ago in some introductory sociology course. (I could be wrong, of course. I suffer from, as he puts it, "a sparsity of materials.")

B. How Did the Forgers Do It?

Hartley's positive view of the legacy of higher criticism is misplaced. The higher critics' theory of mutual interaction between text and community makes no sense. It assumes that many (if not all) specific texts were repeatedly revised in terms of later community standards. We need to think critically about such an assumption. First, everyone acknowledges that the Old Testament contains the only surviving written documents that record the history of Israel in detail from the exodus through the prophets. These texts survived only because the Jews were religious in their intense desire to preserve the texts from error. Copyists have long been governed by elaborate rules to preserve faithful copies. Even in our own day, the Orthodox Jewish community supports such work, despite the existence of photocopies, CD-ROM drives, and “write once-read many” magnetic memories. Working six hours a day, five days a week, a professional scribe takes a year and a half to copy 248 parchment sheets of the Torah (Genesis through Deuteronomy): almost two thousand hours. A newly certified scribe works hard to complete five lines an hour.⁴

2. John E. Hartley, Leviticus, vol. 4 of Word Bible Commentary (Dallas, Texas: Word Books, 1992), p. xxxv.

3. Ibid., p. xliii.

Second, the higher critics expect us to believe that later scribes successfully tampered with these texts—not just once, but many times—over many centuries. Third, they want us to believe that nobody outside the continuing conspiracy ever caught on. This is a conspiracy view of history that dwarfs all other examples of the genre. Somehow, all those painstakingly transcribed scrolls that were in the Israelite community disappeared, leaving only the fake one, only to be superseded by later fakes. Like the evolutionist’s theory of a mutant gene that somehow makes one member of a complex species uniquely fit to survive—in the face of the huge odds against positive mutation—so is the higher critics’ theory of the corrupted text: generation after generation, text after text, the forgeries survived and prospered for a time, re-shaping Israelite culture, only to be completely replaced by other forgeries.

Princeton Seminary’s Robert Dick Wilson was one of the most skilled scholars of the Old Testament in his day. He had a reading knowledge of some 45 languages. Despite his academic reputation, he occasionally indulged in sarcasm, even in his professional writing. (Too bad this practice is out of style in today’s Bible-believing academic circles; it would liven up things considerably.) Wilson wrote of the Mosaic law:

... the critics have undertaken the difficult task of proving that these laws constitute a series of forgeries, extending over a period of about 500 years, committed by more than seventeen different persons, all reformers of the highest ethical standards and all devoted to the service of Jehovah, the God of truth. Besides mirable dictu, the forgeries were all successful in that prophets, priests, Levites, kings, and people, were all alike induced to receive them as genuine and to adopt them as obligatory, as soon as they were made known to them. The Jews and the Samaritans, the Pharisees and the Sadducees, the Rabbis, Aristaeas, Josephus, Philo, Christ and the Apostles, all accepted the combined works as of real Mosaic authorship. But no amount of camouflage could deceive the critical eyes of the German professors and their scholars (all of whom agree with them; hence the phrase, "All scholars are agreed"). To them the imperfections of the codes and their disagreements, yes, even the particular half century in which each law was promulgated, are as clear as the spots on the sun, if only you will look through their glasses, and are not blinded by prejudice occasioned by faith in Jehovah, or Christ, or by the rules of evidence.⁵

4. Betsy Thatcher, “Special project: Scribe writing Torah Scroll,” Milwaukee Sentinel (Dec. 26, 1990).

Wilson indulged in ridicule. And why not? As Augustine wrote in The City of God (XVIII:40), ridicule is an appropriate response when dealing with ridiculous ideas. He was referring to the pagan theory that the world is much older than 6,000 years—a theory that most seminary professors and Christian college professors today take so seriously that they refuse to discuss the six-day creation, either in class or in print. This has been true for over a century. Even though the Westminster Confession of Faith specifies that the world was created in six days (IV:1), both Charles Hodge and his son A. A. Hodge rejected this doctrine despite their affirmation of the Confession, an untenable position that received considerable attention from the Presbyterian Church's theological liberals and biblical higher critics.⁶ Hodge, Sr., wrote: "The Church has been forced more than once to alter her interpretation of the Bible to accommodate the discoveries of science. But this has been done without any violence to the Scriptures or in any degree impairing their authority."⁷ He stated that the geological time scale is "unquestionable," revealing "a process of divinely regulated development consuming vast periods of time.”⁸ While the Bible’s account “is infallibly true,” we must recognize that “it was not designed either to prevent or take the place of a scientific interpretation of all existing phenomena, and of all traces of the past history of the world which God allows men to discover.”⁹

5. Robert Dick Wilson, A Scientific Investigation of the Old Testament (Chicago: Moody Press, [1926] 1959), pp. 39–40.

6. On Charles Hodge's age-day theory, see his Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, [1871]), I, p. 570. On A. A. Hodge's open rejection of the Confession in the name of uniformitarian geology, see his book, The Confession of Faith (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, [1869] 1992), pp. 82–83.

7. Charles Hodge, Systematic Theology, I, p. 573.

C. In Search of the Missing Original Texts

To prove that later scribes (i.e., forgers) (1) inserted new material into copies of the received judicial texts, and (2) this new material was consistent with the respective dominant worldview of each scribe’s era, the higher critic needs information about the judicial and theological content of these successive worldviews. The problem is, such detailed information is available today only in the Old Testament’s historical passages. But these texts, too, are thought to have been corrupted by later copyists. So, where is the fixed standard—the “autograph,” as it were—by which a higher critic can evaluate which corruption came during which era? If a judicial text was corrupted by a scribe, but the historical record of the scribe’s era was itself subsequently corrupted, how can the higher critic prove that a particular law was inserted by a particular scribe-forger at a particular point in Israel’s history? In other words, how can the critic prove that the text influenced the community, while the community influenced the text? Where is the untampered-with evidence? Where is the fixed textual standard that is necessary in order to identify which revision was made during which era?

No fixed textual standard exists today. If it did, it would be the long-denied “autograph”—the original biblical text to which defenders of biblical inerrancy have appealed for over a century. Denying the theory of a flawless autograph written down by a God-inspired scribe, each higher critic has been free to promote this or that law as the product of this or that much later scribe. But the critics do not agree on which laws were inserted when. Conclusion: without a fixed textual standard for the Pentateuch, and without uncorrupted historical texts, higher critics cannot identify which worldview assuredly belongs to which era, and therefore which era’s worldview led to the forging of which specific legal text. But they pretend that they can. Anyone who openly challenges this pretension in public will probably not be allowed to graduate from the prestige institutions of the academic world, all of which are controlled by the pretenders. Then the absence of such graduates will be presented by the pretenders as evidence that all serious (degree-holding) scholars agree with the pretension. They employ circular certification to validate their theory of circular causation: text and community.

8. Ibid., I, p. 82.

9. Ibid., I, p. 83.

1. Copyists' Known Errors Were Deliberately Preserved

Let me state unequivocally: there are errors in the surviving biblical texts. That is to say, the texts that have survived are not so perfect as the autographs were. Put another way, the transcribers were not guided by God in the same way and to the same degree that the original authors were. Let me state the obvious: those scholars who defend the infallibility of the original texts of the Bible do not defend the infallibility of the subsequent copyists.¹⁰ If they were to defend such a position, they would be denying the uniqueness of the originally infallible Bible. This would defeat their purpose, i.e., to defend the unique revelation of God in the Bible: one scribe per revelation.

The existence of obvious errors in the Bible testifies to the extraordinary faithfulness of the transcribers. Consider one exceedingly obvious contradiction: "Jehoiachin was eighteen years old when he began to reign, and he reigned in Jerusalem three months. And his mother's name was Nehushta, the daughter of Elnathan of Jerusalem" (II Ki. 24:8). "Jehoiachin was eight years old when he began to reign, and he reigned three months and ten days in Jerusalem: and he did that which was evil in the sight of the LORD" (II Chron. 36:9). Eight years old or eighteen? What copyist could ignore this discrepancy? But his job was not to correct the text, presumably by changing eight to eighteen in II Chronicles 36:9. He let the error in Second Chronicles stand, visible to all.

The defense of the inerrancy of the original written revelation should not also be a defense of the God-sustained perfection of every succeeding copyist. The miracle took place once per text, and only once. Mistakes then followed. That an early mistake would be retained, given the fanatical dedication of the Jewish scribes, is hardly surprising. What ought to be very surprising is the conclusion of the critics, namely, that later copies could have been successfully re-worked, except at one point in Israel's history: the discovery of a single copy of the law during Josiah's reign (II Ki. 22). A secondary opportunity existed at the return to Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 8), but this would not have solved the problem of the many texts left behind in Babylon, where a majority of Israelites remained.

10. On this point, the Westminster Confession is misleading: "The Old Testament in Hebrew (which was the native language of the people of God of old), and the New Testament in Greek (which, at the time of the writing of it, was most generally known among the nations), being immediately inspired by God, and, by His singular care and providence, kept pure in all ages, are therefore authentic; so as, in all controversies of religion, the Church is finally to appeal unto them." WCF, I:8 (emphasis added).

2. The Mysterious Disappearance of All Previous Copies

The higher critics, had they not overplayed their hand very early, might have retained the illusion of credibility if they had confined their theory of scribal re-writing to Josiah's era. But once the theory of successive forgeries is invoked, the old question raises its head: Where did all the previous copies go after a successful forger plied his trade? The higher critics deride inerrancy's theory of the missing autographs. Far more preposterous is the higher critics' theory of the instantly disappearing rival texts whenever a forgery was perpetrated by some editor or team of editors. In the higher critics' social evolutionary theory of the "textual survival of the fittest," the forgeries somehow gained dominance, while the older copies all "died out as a species." As with Darwin's missing links between species, the textual "missing links" remain missing. We are expected to believe that all of the older copies in many synagogues and households somehow perished, but the single forgery and its copies survived, just as we are expected to believe that a single prehistoric reptile triumphed over all of its scaly competitors within the particular species because it had a partially developed feather—not sufficiently developed to make it airborne, however—instead of a claw.¹¹ ("Take this," cried the mutant lizard as he smashed his opponent with his feather in their life-and-death battle for access to a female. "And that!")

The defender of the inerrant original texts admits that the perfect original copies disappeared very early. Then how did the common Masoretic Hebrew text become dominant? Why are the number of its internal discrepancies so limited? More important, why aren't there hundreds of competing versions with competing errors? Why did one version of imperfect copies survive, and almost all other flawed versions disappear? The only reasonable answer is this: the major errors must have occurred very early in the copying history of any given text. After that, competing new copies that failed to correspond with existing copies were burned or otherwise destroyed, as traditional Judaism's rules of copying require. That a copyist's error could occur shortly after the original appeared is conceivable. That a single late forgery could have replaced all the earlier versions is far less believable. The longer that an existing common text had been available, with its familiar errors, the less likely that any recently modified version could have triumphed so completely that all the older versions disappeared. The larger the number of successive forgeries required by the theory, and the longer the time period in which these totally successful forgeries took place, the less believable the theory is, except to men who prefer noise to God's judicial word in history.

11. Vic Lockman, Link Lizard Defeats Evolution, a children's cartoon tract that has yet to be answered by tenured university evolutionists.

D. Relativism Eats Its Own Children

I ask: Of what possible intellectual benefit is any theory of mutually reinforcing historical causation—text and revision—that is based on the shifting sands of higher criticism? The higher critics have no agreed-upon methodology—no hermeneutic—to resolve their own endless disputes. This is one reason why Professor Reventlow was correct in 1980 when he wrote: “Any attentive observer will note a considerable decline in the significance of biblical study within the general framework of Protestant theology as it is practised in universities and church colleges and as it affects the work of local church communities. . . . [H]istorical criticism and exegesis have come to take very much a back place.” The “vanishing role of biblical study in the wider context of theology is a failure of exegetes to reflect adequately on their methodology and the presuppositions, shaped by their view of the world, which they bring to their work.”¹² Meanwhile, the unity of theology has collapsed; its inner center has disappeared.¹³ And no wonder: relying on the presumption of textual disunity promoted by higher criticism, liberal theology could not maintain its own unity.

This is why there has been a shift of opinion occurring within theological liberalism since about 1960: a growing readiness to accept instances of thematic unity in the Bible's texts. Today's more innovative liberals search for literary unity in biblical texts, even though they do not regard literary unity as evidence of divine authorship. The critics still deny the Bible's theological unity, for theological unity points to an unchanging and judgmental God. Literary unity is becoming acceptable, for it supposedly points to anonymous authors with a taste for great literature, which is all that the critics want the Bible to be. The literary criticism of the Bible, which originally launched the literary criticism of secular texts, has now come full circle: modern critics of secular literature have brought to the Bible their practice of discovering common themes in literature. The emphasis today is increasingly on unity rather than diversity. The newer critics are still moral relativists, but at least they perceive some coherence in the world of literature. They have seen where absolute textual relativism was headed—into literary chaos—and some of them have turned back. (The literary “deconstructionists” have not.)¹⁴

12. Henning Graf Reventlow, The Authority of the Bible and the Rise of the Modern World (London: SCM Press, [1980] 1984), p. 1.

13. Idem.

American church historian Edwin Scott Gaustad has well described the relativistic worldview that undergirded the higher critics early in the twentieth century: “Everything had a history, even dogma, as the German Protestant Adolph Harnack had shown. Very little, if anything, was ‘the same yesterday, today, and forever.’ Very little, if anything, had been believed ‘by all men, always, everywhere.’ Very little, if anything, escaped the captivity of its own culture, the relativity of its own terminology, the perceptual limitations of its own advocates.”¹⁵ This relativism almost completely eroded the few remaining traces of methodological unity and coherence in the academic discipline of higher criticism. This is what has caused the reaction in recent years. About all that remained of traditional higher criticism by 1960 was the practitioners’ faith in the possibility of gaining academic tenure with their arcane skills. Frankly, they all sounded incoherent. But academic reputations are made by developing new approaches. So, to distinguish themselves from their incoherent competitors, some of the newer generation of critics came to a radical conclusion: the Bible’s texts do show traces of coherence!

In 1957, Old Testament scholar Edward J. Young pointed to the epistemological problem of his generation of higher critics: “Furthermore, if fallible human writers have given us a Bible that is fallible, how are we ourselves, who most certainly are fallible, to detect in the Bible what is error and what is not? . . . How shall we evaluate the God of Scripture? How do we know whether we can separate the wheat from the chaff in the Biblical teaching about God? The answer is that we simply cannot do so. . . . How then can we judge the Scripture? Judge the Scripture we cannot; we are left in a hopeless scepticism.”¹⁶ This has become true of the higher critics: they have been left without hope by their own skepticism. All that the best of them have today is a sense of satisfaction for having discovered continuity in a literary theme or two.

14. Harold Bloom, et al., Deconstruction and Criticism (New York: Continuum, 1979); Mark C. Taylor (ed.), Deconstruction in Context: Literature and Philosophy (University of Chicago Press, 1986).

15. Edwin Scott Gaustad, “Did the Fundamentalists Win?” in Mary Douglas and Steven Tipton (eds.), Religion and America: Spiritual Life in a Secular Age (Boston: Beacon, 1983), p. 171.

The discipline of biblical higher criticism is smoke and mirrors with footnotes. This has been visible to any intelligent observer for over a century. Yet still we find a smoke-inhaling commentator who is stumbling around in higher criticism’s hall of mirrors. Professor Hartley doffs his cap to “the great benefits” of the work of higher critics. He genuflects at the mausoleum of dead theories of multiple Pentateuchal authorship. He sings a brief hymn of praise to the circular sociology of knowledge: texts influencing culture, culture influencing texts. The spirit of higher criticism has him by the throat, yet he tries to sing its praises. We need a generation of Bible expositors who are not fooled by this nonsense.

E. One God, One Author, Once

I have worked with the texts from Genesis through Deuteronomy from 1973 to 2006. I have found exactly what I assumed from the beginning: the texts are part of a coherent whole. This unity exists because a coherent God revealed these texts to one inspired man, Moses. What has impressed me as I have worked through the Pentateuch is how the economic laws of God are part of an integrated judicial and theological system. The economics of the Pentateuch, Genesis through Deuteronomy, makes sense as a unit. This judicial unity enables the reader to make sense of the individual texts. The evidence continues to build: the law of God is not a patchwork of texts that were added and later modified by many anonymous authors over the centuries in a vain attempt to provide unity to an otherwise incoherent collection of mutually contradictory principles. In other words, the Bible was not written by successive teams of higher critics. This is difficult for higher critics to believe.

16. Edward J. Young, Thy Word Is Truth: Some Thoughts on the Biblical Doctrine of Inspiration (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1957), p. 76.

What has impressed me is the judicial unity of the Pentateuch's structure. I regard the religion of traditional higher criticism as a theology too fantastic for a careful reader to believe without a gigantic leap of nonrational faith. How could such unity have been achieved by a series of authors, each with a different outlook, each with a different agenda, each in a different historical era, over many centuries? How did they produce, retroactively, a document which is supposed to have been written by one man anywhere from five centuries to a millennium earlier, depending on which text was written by which anonymous author, and when? Here is E, the Elohist, rewriting J, the Jehovist (or was it the other way around?), only to be followed by D, the Deuteronomist, who adds his two shekels' worth. Finally P, the priestly redactor, shows up, who in the 1920s had been regarded by critical scholars as the first Elohist, but by 1943 was believed to have served as the Pentateuch's final copy editor.¹⁷

How did these four forgers do it? How did they hide their identities? How did all the other minor rewrite specialists hide their identities? How was the judicial unity of the variant texts preserved? More to the point, why did generations of Israelites fail to spot the jumbled nature of the Pentateuch's original legal order—the disunity that later rewriters somehow overcame? What I have found in the five books of Moses is economic unity. How did it get there? Equally worth asking, why do today's higher critics—academic layer 19? 27? 33?—refuse to acknowledge this remarkable economic unity? They are so busy identifying the supposed linguistic variations of the layers of texts that they cannot see the structural unity of the judicial order—not just a literary theme or two—presented in these texts.

Conclusion

Higher critics of the Bible have proposed a theory of biblical textual disunity. Their motivation has always been judicial: to escape the biblical doctrine of final judgment and the correlative doctrine of each individual's personal responsibility before God in terms of God's special revelation. From the beginning, they have opposed the biblical concept of fixed ethical standards.

17. Oswald T. Allis, The Five Books of Moses (Philadelphia: Presbyterian and Reformed, [1943] 1949), Introduction.

Their strategy of denial has always rested on the techniques and premises of literary criticism. This tradition began in the mid-seventeenth century, as Reventlow's detailed study of the early history of English higher criticism indicates. It accelerated during the first half of the nineteenth century, even in conservative Calvinistic circles in the United States.¹⁸ The acceptance of higher criticism was made far easier after 1859 as a result of Darwin's theory of evolution through natural selection: the survival of the fittest (texts). After 1875, the spread of higher criticism was unstoppable, despite a "guilty" verdict in 1893 in the most famous heresy trial of the nineteenth century, the Briggs case.¹⁹ Evolutionism is modern man's most widely shared alternative to fixed law: in social theory, legal theory, biology, geology, and ultimately cosmology. But cosmology really is primary: covenant-breaking man's denial of God's final judgment.

Evolutionary process when applied to the Bible mandates a theory of progressive rewrites of the texts of Scripture. This theory mandates a conspiracy theory of monumental proportions. The details of the operations of this conspiracy are rarely discussed in public. The theory is never called a conspiracy theory, for conspiracy theories are almost always officially out of favor in academic circles, but it is a conspiracy theory.

This multi-stage conspiracy theory proclaims the successive re-writing of the holy texts by numerous anonymous forgers. Successful forgers were not caught or even perceived. Unsuccessful ones, if any, have also left no traces. Each successful forger suppressed all traces of every previously forged copy of the holy texts. Each forger had a specific goal in mind: to rewrite the past in terms of the his goals for his social order and legal order. Without a convenient Orwellian memory hole, these forgers were somehow able periodically to re-centralize Israel's civil and priestly orders, suppress all rival judicial positions and all earlier texts, publish their new texts, get them accepted as supernaturally binding by the entire social order, and then de-centralize the social order once again, as required by the law's tribal order. Improbable? At least.

This improbability has not fazed the higher critics. Furthermore, 18. Jerry Wayne Brown, The Rise of Biblical Criticism in America, 1800–1870: The New England Scholars (Middletown, Connecticut: Wesleyan University Press, 1969), ch. 6.

19. Mark Stephen Massa, S.J., Charles Augustus Briggs and the Crisis of Historical Criticism (Minneapolis, Minnesota: Fortress Press, 1990).

this conspiracy theory is academically untouchable: no fundamental criticism of its presuppositions, methodology, or conclusions is tolerated. There are no prominent dissenters within the academic community. The scholarly world has swallowed this conspiracy theory to the same degree, and for the same reasons, that it has swallowed evolutionism. But while Darwinism's missing biological links perished completely through natural causes, leaving no traces, higher criticism's missing textual links were actually ferreted out and suppressed by an unknown number of conspirators. The successful operations of these Israelite conspirators are as improbable as the theory is universally accepted.

Biblical higher criticism is never identified as a conspiracy theory. What more could anyone ask of a conspiracy theory? Paraphrasing Saddam Hussein's late 1990 pre-war rhetoric, higher criticism of the Bible is the mother of all conspiracy theories. It began in Eden: "Hath God said?"

Appendix I

CRITICS OF THE FIVE-POINT COVENANT MODEL

In analyzing now the nature of Biblical law, it is important to note first that, for the Bible, law is revelation. . . . The law is the revelation of God and His righteousness. . . . The second characteristic of Biblical law is that it is a treaty or covenant. Kline has shown that the form of the giving of the law, the language of the text, the historical prologue, the requirement of exclusive commitment to the suzerain, God, the pronouncement of imprecations and benedictions, and much more, all point to the fact that the law is a treaty established by God with His people. . . . The third characteristic of the Biblical law or covenant is that it constitutes a plan for dominion under God.

R. J. Rushdoony (1973)¹

Rushdoony began The Institutes of Biblical Law by explaining biblical law in terms of a preliminary but undeveloped model of the biblical covenant: the first three of the five points. He cited as authoritative Meredith G. Kline's discussion of the parallels between the Mosaic law and the pagan suzerainty treaties of the second millennium B.C. But, having introduced a preliminary covenant model into this, his most authoritative and comprehensive work, he failed to pursue this insight. Ray Sutton did. In That You May Prosper (1987), he extended Kline's insights to demonstrate the Bible's comprehensive theonomic foundation. Kline does not approve of this theonomic application—or any other theonomic application—and has remained silent for two decades regarding Sutton's book. This is not surprising. Kline's premier opponent in the theonomy movement, Greg Bahnsen, did not appreciate works built on Kline's insights, and he remained unconvinced by Sutton's application. This is also not surprising. Because the development of the five-point model came out of Tyler, and because it places so much emphasis on the institutional church, Rushdoony remained silent. This, too, was not surprising. This has left me as the main promoter of Sutton's thesis.

1. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 6, 7, 8.

A. The Necessity for Systematic Theology

Charles Hodge's re-write of Francis Turretin's seventeenth-century theology² in the early 1870s will no longer suffice, assuming that it ever did. His system was a Protestant version of Roman Catholic Scholastic categories. It included theology proper (God), anthropology (man), hamartiology (sin), Christ (Christology), soteriology (redemption), ecclesiology (church), and eschatology (last things). There is nothing innately incorrect about these categories, but they were derived from Scholastic philosophy, not the texts of Scripture. Francis Landley Patton, who served as president of Princeton Seminary, 1902 to 1914, was not exaggerating when he referred to Turretin as the Thomas Aquinas of Protestantism.³ That was the problem: with Turretin and Old Princeton.

The Protestant church needs a systematic theology. It does not have one today. Such a systematic theology must incorporate the insights of biblical theology, i.e., the study of the uses and development of biblical symbolism (rhetoric) from Genesis to Revelation. In other words, systematic theology must incorporate the work of Geerhardus Vos and his disciples.⁴ At the same time, the speculations of Vos' disciples must be brought under the discipline of the judicial theology of the Bible. Those who follow Vos have been what economist F. A. Hayek has called "puzzlers" and "muddlers."⁵ There is more to theology than solving curious puzzles. Ecologists insist that we cannot change just one thing. The pieces of the biblical puzzle are part of a systematic whole. You cannot restructure just one piece.

2. Francis Turretin, Institutes of Elenctic Theology, 4 vols. (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1992–97).

3. Cited by Jack B. Rogers and Donald K. McKim, The Authority and Interpretation of the Bible: An Historical Approach (New York: Harper & Row, 1979), p. 281.

4. Geerhardus Vos, Biblical Theology—Old and New Testaments (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, [1948] 1992). Vos taught at Princeton Theological Seminary from 1892 to 1932.

5. F. A. Hayek, "Two Types of Mind" (1975), in Hayek, New Studies in Philosophy, Politics, Economics and the History of Ideas (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978), ch. 4.

Theology demands structure. There can be no theology without theological structure. It may be a hidden or implicit structure, but there will always be a structure. A Bible-affirming theology must proclaim a biblically derived structure. In contrast, modern critics of orthodox theology deny the existence of any consistent structure. For example, liberal higher criticism denies the theological unity of the Bible.⁶ The rise of dialectical theology, especially Barthianism,⁷ in the twentieth century has made it all the more imperative that Christians proclaim a Bible-based theological system. Barthians deny that the Bible provides us with propositional truth; the Bible is supposedly is a “witness to God’s word,” not God’s word itself. Rushdoony has put it well: “There can be no systematic theology if the God of Scripture is not a coherent unity, and if His word is not a coherent whole.”⁸ Christians must respond to allegations of the Bible’s disunity or incompleteness by affirming what the Bible says of itself: it is the authoritative source of propositional truth, suitable for doctrine, reproof, and correction, for it is inspired by God (II Tim. 3:16). It is not sufficient to defend the faith with some muddle-headed variant of “No creed but Christ, no law but love.”

What should be the structural principle undergirding systematic theology? It is my contention that a biblical systematic theology must be based on the covenant: that which binds God and man. Covenant theology reveals who God is: the transcendent yet immanent Creator. It reveals who man is: made in the image of God; under God and over nature, and now ethically fallen. It speaks of God’s law, God’s judgments, and the future. It is a comprehensive framework under which the fundamental doctrines of the faith are subsumed. It is, above all, a judicial framework.

Such a systematic theology has yet to be written, for traditional covenant theologians have yet to present a systematic biblical covenant model. Without a covenant structure or model, there is no covenant theology. There can of course be a theology that for tradition’s sake is called “covenant theology,” but it will just be Calvinism’s five points accompanied by the endless droning of the equivalent of a New Age mantra: “Covenant theology, covenant theology, covenant theology. . . .” What traditional covenant theologians need is a demonstrable, biblically derived definition of “covenant.” They need to answer these questions: What is a covenant? How do we recognize it? Where is it found in the texts of Scripture? What are its categories that are found in every occurrence of a covenant in the Bible? Covenant theologians have remained mute or incoherent regarding answers to these obvious questions for well over three centuries.⁹

6. Appendix H.

7. Cornelius Van Til, The New Modernism: An Appraisal of the Theology of Barth and Brunner (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1947); Van Til, Christianity and Barthianism (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1962). Presbyterian & Reformed is now located in Phillipsburg, New Jersey.

8. R. J. Rushdoony, Systematic Theology, 2 vols. (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1994), I, p. 67. He wrote this chapter in 1979. The entire manuscript was completed in 1984.

Calvinists, while publicly affirming covenant theology, have for over three centuries substituted other conceptual frameworks for systematic theology. Their six loci represent one attempt to define and explain the Calvinist faith. Another: the five points of Calvinism.

B. The Five Points of Calvinism

Calvinists accept the 1619 Synod of Dort’s five points of Calvinism. They would reject any assertion that these five points do not, in fact, define their position. No anti-Calvinist critic would be foolish enough to make such an assertion, since everyone loves a good whipping boy, which the five points appear to be in the eyes of Arminians and humanists. Some good Calvinist may ask, as Leonard Coppes asked, “Are five points enough?”¹⁰ but no one pays much attention. The better informed within Calvinist circles will even point out that all five points were developed in the early seventeenth century in response to the five points of Arminianism, Jacobus Arminius’ Trojan Horse gift to Protestant theology: the five points of Arminianism. What are Calvinism’s five points? In English, these:

1. Total depravity of man
2. Unconditional election by God
3. Limited atonement (particular redemption)
4. Irresistible grace
5. Perseverance of the saints

9. For an example of this lack of definition, see Louis Berkhof, Systematic Theology (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, [1949] 1963), p. 213. For my analysis, see “Publisher’s Preface (1992),” in Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), pp. xiv–xv.

10. Leonard J. Coppes, Are Five Points Enough? The Ten Points of Calvinism (Manassas, Virginia: Reformation Educational Foundation, 1980).

The acronym in English is TULIP, a Dutch-associated flower.

Calvinists are quite content to proclaim these points. The TULIP acronym helps them remember exactly what they believe that distinguishes them from their rivals. But then along comes Sutton, with his five-point model. “No, no,” the Calvinist critics cry. “His structure is imposed on the Bible!” So, let us consider Sutton’s five points, but in a different order:

1. Total depravity/Ethics (man’s)
2. Unconditional election/Oath (God’s)
3. Limited atonement/Hierarchy (representation)
4. Irresistible grace/Judicial imputation
5. Perseverance of the saints/Succession

To which the Calvinist critics reply (if at all): “Oh. A structure. A model. Five points. Hmmmm. Interesting. Yes, I see your point. In fact, I see five points. But. . . . But this proves nothing. Nothing!” The fact that Sutton’s model precisely fits all five points of Calvinism is dismissed as irrelevant. More than this: it is dismissed as proof that Sutton’s model is just too simple, just too universal, just too easy, just too good to be true. It therefore cannot be true. The Calvinist critics casually dismiss the huge theological benefit to them of the existence of a rigorously tight fit between the two five-point models. What benefit? If Sutton’s model is based on the exegesis of specific biblical texts, then the structure of the five points of Calvinism can be shown to be covenantal. This makes the five points of Calvinism structurally biblical, not just abstracts of five structurally disjointed theological conclusions.

There is no single text anywhere in the Bible that teaches the five points of Calvinism. Calvinists know that their beloved five points were derived from a number of different Bible texts, none connected structurally to the others (they suppose), none exhibiting a self-contained structure in itself (they suppose). The five points of Calvinism are regarded by their defenders as a system—not one derived structurally from the texts, however, but deduced from many texts and then imposed on theology as a whole. This theological imposition—this theological “Procrustean bed”—is regarded as legitimate by Calvinists. Why? Because they readily admit that their five-point system is not derived from any biblical text. This obvious apologetic weakness is regarded by them as Calvinism’s pre-eminent strength!

Then I came along using Sutton's discovery¹¹ and announced in effect: "Look, brethren, here it is at long last: an exegetical defense of our beloved five points. The structure of Calvinism's five-point model really is derived from the structure of God's word after all. Before Sutton, we had no proof of this wonderful fact, but now we do." Are they happy? Of course not. They much prefer to admit that Calvinism's five points are not found in any particular text. Then they insist that this fact makes their five points more reliable than Sutton's five points, which are found in many, many texts. It is a very strange business, this movement called Calvinism.

Traditional covenant theologians defend a deduced theological system that they claim is biblical, yet they are without a precise covenant model. They deeply resent and resist Sutton's fusing of Calvinism and the biblical covenant. Why? Two reasons. First, Sutton's model proclaims not only predestination (point one), but ecclesiastical hierarchy (point two), theonomy (point three), the Lord's Supper as an act of covenant renewal (point four), and postmillennialism (point five). One or more of the final four doctrines will bring howls of protest from almost any Calvinist defender of predestination, i.e., point one, God's absolute sovereignty. Second, Sutton discovered it first, and he was outside of academia at the time he discovered it. "Not discovered here" is the academician's reason for automatically rejecting any new idea or discovery.

C. The Four Points of Christian Reconstruction

Within the world of Calvinism has arisen an even more precise, even more theologically rigorous subset: Christian Reconstruction. The Reconstructionists also have a model that distinguishes them from everyone else. They are proud of it. It has four points:

1. Predestination¹²
2. Theonomic ethics
3. Presuppositional apologetics (Van Til)
4. Postmillennialism¹³

11. North, "Publisher's Preface (1992)," That You May Prosper, 1992 edition, p. xvi.

12. Rejected by would-be Arminian Reconstructionists.

13. Rejected by premillennial and amillennial theonomists, who sharply distinguish Christian Reconstruction from theonomy. There are very few of these people, and none has offered a theological defense of his system. See, for example, Peter Burden-Teh, "Theonomic and Historic Premillennialism," Calvinism Today (Jan.

The two rival camps—Tyler and Vallecito—were agreed on all four. But there is one additional point: the doctrine of the covenant itself, i.e., the five-point model. Where does it fit? It is point two in a revised Reconstructionist outline.

1. Predestination/transcendence
2. Covenant/hierarchies: church,¹⁴ state, family
3. Theonomy/ethics
4. Presuppositionalism/judgment
5. Postmillennialism/inheritance

The offensive point is point two: hierarchy. Among some Christian Reconstructionists, a rejection of the doctrine of the church's authority is common. Some theonomists want independent churches. Some want none, i.e., none with any judicial authority to excommunicate. They see clearly where Sutton's five points lead: toward a hierarchical church authority that brings lawful judgments in history, just as John Calvin insisted¹⁵ (point two: hierarchy/representation). This also implies that churches should offer frequent (weekly) communion, just as John Calvin insisted¹⁶ (point four: oath/sanctions). It means employing young child communion, retarded member communion, and Alzheimer's victims communion as a means of covenant renewal (point four).¹⁷ This view of the Lord's Supper is not acceptable to most Presbyterian Reconstructionists. They are quite content to accept the five points of Calvinism plus four points of Christian Reconstruction.

1994), and my response, "Eschatology and Social Theory," Christianity and Society (April 1994). Address: P. O. Box 1, Whitby, North Yorkshire, England.

14. With the church as primary or central, not the family: the major point of conflict between Tyler and Vallecito. See Appendix B: "Rushdoony on the Tithe: A Critique."

15. Calvin did not like the word "hierarchy." John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion (1559), IV:iv:4. But his doctrine of infant baptism rested on a doctrine of judicial representation by parents. Ibid., IV:xvi:7, 17–20. He believed in a similar judicial representation in church government. He defended the office of bishop if the bishop is under the judicial authority of the assembly. That is, he defended episcopacy while rejecting prelacy (rule by sovereign bishops). Ibid., IV:XI:6.

16. Ibid., IV:xvii:44.

17. If young children are not allowed to take communion because they do not understand its theological ramifications, what about retarded adults and people suffering from Alzheimer's disease? But if the latter may lawfully take communion, on what basis are young children excluded? Age? But what non-Baptist Calvinist church identifies age as such as the legal boundary between participation and exclusion?

They have not rushed to embrace Sutton's thesis. They are willing to adopt theological models, but only so long as these models are not presented as biblically authoritative.

D. A Biblical Structure for Biblical Theology

One of the problems I face in promoting the five-point covenant model is this: its theologically conservative critics do not like the thought that there is an authoritative model for theology that was discovered this late in church history. There is an innate suspicion among Reformed theologians that theological innovations are generally dangerous. I respect this attitude, but only as an initial presupposition. I agree: major theological innovations should be considered guilty until proven innocent. Even small innovations are suspect. The camel of heresy has repeatedly pushed its way into the tent of orthodoxy with small innovations. Nevertheless, each suggested innovation must be examined in terms of the Bible. The church does discover new biblical facts. There has been progress in church history. There has been progress in the development of the confessions and creeds of the church. The church does not still rely exclusively on the Apostles' Creed.

I have stated the case for the five-point model very strongly. I have argued that it is a major integrating theme in the Bible. The five-point model, I have argued, is the integrating model for understanding covenantal law and covenantal relationships. Therefore, to the extent that the biblical theme of covenantalism is essential to some passage, the judicial aspects of one's interpretation of this passage must be explored initially in terms of the five-point model. Not every passage in Scripture is visibly covenantal, but a lot more are covenantal than is admitted by non-covenant theologians.

The fact that non-covenant theologians should reject my sweeping use of the five-point model is understandable. They refuse to accept the idea that the covenant is a major theme in Scripture. What bothers me is that so many professed defenders of covenant theology reject the applicability of the five-point model beyond the Book of Deuteronomy. Meredith G. Kline, an early promoter of the Deuteronomy model in his book, Treaty of the Great King (1963), ignores it with respect to the New Covenant, the Decalogue, and a great deal more. Not only do covenant theologians reject the five-point model, they refuse to consider the evidence of its wide applicability in those texts of Scripture that Sutton examined in his monthly newsletter, Covenant Renewal, 1987–1993. The critics are either unfamiliar with this newsletter or pretend that it never existed.

That the five points fit Deuteronomy was not a revolutionary observation late in the twentieth century. What was rejected, and rejected strongly, was any suggestion that the structure of Deuteronomy is relevant for anything beyond Deuteronomy. I am showing, commentary by commentary, that the same five-point model that structures Deuteronomy also structures the Pentateuch itself. The five books of Moses, in their very arrangement, reflect the five points of the covenant. When I say reflect, I mean governed by. This is another way of saying that the Pentateuchal model is the archetype. Deuteronomy's structure is a subordinate application of this archetype. The same is true of the structure of Leviticus and Exodus.

It is not wrong to look for governing structures in the texts of the Bible. It is not automatically heretical or ill-informed to announce the discovery of a theme or structure in numerous texts. To discover and expound such patterns is one of the tasks of the discipline known as biblical theology. It is true that I cannot go to a verse in Scripture that says: "Lo, thou findeth the five-point model of Deuteronomy also in the structure of the five books of Moses." Writing biblical theology is not that easy. Try reading the works of Geerhardus Vos if you doubt me. But Vos was a master of the Scriptures, and it is a serious mistake to dismiss his methodology.¹⁸ Had the other Princeton theologians understood what Vos was doing, and had they used his insights to restructure their late-nineteenth-century version of Turretin's seventeenth-century Protestant Scholasticism,¹⁹ they might better have resisted the forces of theological liberalism that captured Princeton Seminary in 1929. Presbyterian liberals after 1875 used an imported version of biblical theology—higher criticism—to undermine men's confidence in traditional Calvinist orthodoxy.²⁰

18. A good introduction is Redemptive History and Biblical Interpretation: The Shorter Writings of Geerhardus Vos, edited by Richard B. Gaffin (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1980).

19. Hodge's Systematic Theology (1871–73) was adopted by Princeton because by that time, American students could no longer read Latin well enough to read Turretin.

20. Gary North, Crossed Fingers: How the Liberals Captured the Presbyterian Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1996), pp. 160–63. (<http://bit.ly/gncrossed>)

E. Then Came Fisher

Critics of the broad use of the five-point model now have a major problem: Milton Fisher's Foreword to the 1992 edition of That You May Prosper. Dr. Fisher at the time was without doubt the most thoroughly credentialed Bible-believing Old Testament scholar in the United States, and probably anywhere. He received his Ph.D. in Mediterranean studies from Brandeis University, written under the legendary Cyrus H. Gordon, and an M.A. from Johns Hopkins in oriental studies, completed under the equally legendary W. F. Albright. Dr. Fisher wrote the following:

The book you now hold in your hand is doubtless the clearest exposition of Bible-as-covenant (that is, Bible as meant to be understood) that you've ever read. That's because the author has spelled out in no uncertain terms the implications of historic reformational covenant theology in the light of current scholarship. . . . Its commanding logic demands your interaction with the flow of reasoning and its often surprisingly fresh suggestions will prove a stimulus and assistance to your formation of judgments of your own. . . . Fresh insights into God's Word are sure to be gained, to say the least, through Sutton's work. I found it to be so, after nearly half a century of serious study and teaching of the Bible. Thinking through this book will enable you to focus upon and relate by covenantal principles certain details which you have either overlooked or found puzzling. . . . So, a revived interest and excitement in Bible study is an assured byproduct of reading this book.

When you read criticisms raised by "Deuteronomy only!" critics, keep this question in the back of your mind: "How did poor old Milton Fisher get taken in so completely by such a misleading, overstated book as Sutton's?" Then ask yourself this question: "Or it is possible—indeed, highly probable—that the critic, in this case at least, does not know what he's talking about?"

F. Sola Scriptura

Anyone who believes that the acids of modernity have not seeped into the temple, let alone the gates of the city, need only consider the implicit relativism of many who today present themselves as the defenders of Sola Scriptura. They do exactly what the modernists did in their capture of the mainline denominations in the early twentieth century. The modernists also dismissed all creeds, confessions, and biblically derived models as convenient theories without binding theological, judicial, or ecclesiastical authority. The modernists sought to escape three things: the judicial authority of the churches, the theological boundaries of orthodoxy, and negative church sanctions. They were successful in this attempt. They inherited the conservatives' theological and financial legacies, denomination by denomination. (They did not, however, escape the sovereignty of God, His authority, His theological standards, and His eternal sanctions. As each modernist has crossed the biological boundary of death, he has been disinherited.)

Consider the Calvinist. If Calvinism's five points are just one more convenient but non-binding classification scheme among many, in what way are they theologically binding? Merely on the basis of personal taste? To most people, all five of Calvinism's points taste rotten. If theology is symphonic,²¹ what if someone wants to hum a new tune? What if the tune is really catchy? This is the question of theological standards (point three).

If Calvinism's five points are not textually derived, and if their "mere" theological status—their status as a theological model—makes them institutionally non-binding, how can anyone logically justify the establishment of a Calvinist church in terms of the five points? The question, "Are there more than five points?" can far more easily become: "Are there fewer than five points?"

What Calvinists need is a textually binding and theologically binding structure. And now we have it. But Calvinists do not want it.

There is inescapable evidence in Deuteronomy of a five-point structure.²² This is my starting point for any discussion of Sutton's five points. I ask, not altogether rhetorically: "Well, Mr. Calvinist Critic, which biblical book is structured in terms of the five points of Calvinism? Also, Mr. Theonomist Critic, which biblical text reveals the four points of Christian Reconstructionism?" The answer to both questions is none. Worse, the defenders of the "many theological models, but none with any binding authority" thesis like it this way. It somehow comforts them to know that what they believe with all their hearts is actually only a mental construct: a convenient but judicially disposable

21. Vern S. Poythress, Symphonic Theology: The Validity of Multiple Perspectives in Theology (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan, 1987).

22. Deuteronomy 1:1–5; 1:6–4:49; 5–26; 27–30; 31–34. Cf. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012).

theory, without a single book or text in the Bible that reveals its outline. Conclusion: if Sutton had only the Book of Deuteronomy, he would still be one book ahead of all of his critics except Meredith G. Kline, who has remained prudently mute on the thesis of That You May Prosper, despite its appendix on his theology.²³

G. Countering the Critics

In 1986, a year prior to the publication of That You May Prosper, I decided to undermine the legitimacy of what I knew would become the standard criticism of Sutton's thesis: "Deuteronomy only!" I hired Sutton to write a monthly newsletter, Covenant Renewal. Each issue discussed a specific biblical passage or text that is structured in terms of the five-point model. Each newsletter was the equivalent of 18 double-spaced typed pages. The first issue appeared in January, 1987. Only in the spring of 1993 did he cease writing it on a regular basis because of his duties as president of Philadelphia Theological Seminary, the seminary of the Reformed Episcopal Church.²⁴ There were over seventy issues of Sutton's newsletter, more than 1,200 double-spaced typed pages of evidence. This effort cost ICE a great deal of money: tens of thousands of dollars. Why did ICE go to this expense? Answer: to remove forever the legitimacy of the "Deuteronomy only!" argument.

The existence of Covenant Renewal has not silenced Sutton's many "Deuteronomy only" critics, nor did I expect it to. But these critics have systematically failed to mention the existence of Covenant Renewal. This deliberate silence has fooled most of their victimized followers, but it has also condemned these critics before God (ninth commandment: bearing false witness). This surely was worth ICE's money.

My publishing strategy has now led to another kind of criticism. It goes as follows: "Yes, Sutton's model fits all kinds of passages. This proves that it cannot possibly be biblical. It is just too convenient. It is just too good to be true. It is therefore an invention of man. The more passages it fits, the more clearly it has to be a counterfeit." I call this the "one size can't fit all, unless it is stretched out of shape" criticism, also called the "too good to be true" criticism. But it represents a major retreat from the "Deuteronomy only" criticism.

23. Sutton, Appendix 7: "Meredith G. Kline: Yes and No."

24. Sutton will tell anyone that the academic approval of That You May Prosper is what led to his presidency. He was awarded the Th.D. from the Central School of Religion in England in 1988, and this led to his new job.

These critics have a strategy, one described by Van Til in a fine analogy. They stand in front of what they regard as a bottomless pit. Each one holds a large shovel. "Throw any fact you like at us!" So we do. One critic after another takes his shovel and tosses the most recent fact over his shoulder into the pit. "Now throw us another. We dare you! We double-dog dare you!" This can go on for years, as I hope to prove. It is expensive to keep tossing the facts at them, but as the defenders age, those shovels will become increasingly heavy for them. They will also find that their brighter disciples are decreasingly impressed with this unproductive defensive strategy. The fact is, there are no bottomless pits in life. Even if there were, there is more to the defense of a position than shoveling facts into a pit. Those who adopt this strategy never move forward. Their disciples eventually conclude there is more to theology than bottomless pits, and more to eschatology than stationary shoveling. There is, in the final analysis, the Great Commission.²⁵

These critics never respond to specific presentations with specific refutations; they just shovel each new fact over their collective shoulders. This is regarded as first-rate scholarship by today's seminary faculties. This is why Christianity can be so easily dismissed by its critics as the faith of old women of both sexes. Christians are not taken seriously because most of them do not take ideas seriously. Calvinists always had one thing going for them within the Church International: they were Protestantism's scholars. No longer. The academic neo-evangelicals have replaced them. But these neo-evangelicals are defenders of theological mush—heavily footnoted mush. This leaves modern evangelical Protestantism as intellectually paralyzed as Israel's army was before Goliath. But when Sutton, like David, arrived from the pastoral hinterlands bearing his five stones, the army's officers were deeply resentful. They still are.

It is not sufficient to be a defender if a battle goes on indefinitely. The offense eventually wins. The longer the battle continues, the truer the old slogan: "The best defense is a good offense." It does little good for a critic to reject Sutton's thesis unless he has a better one to put in its place. All the critics—the "Deuteronomy only!" critics and the "One size can't fit all!" critics—are united in this confession: "All theories are equal, but one is more equal than others: our rejection of Sutton's five points.”

25. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

The assumption of the critics is that God has no integrated covenantal structure in His mind; at least, His revelation does not reveal such a structure. God’s mind supposedly operates without an identifiable pattern with respect to covenant theology: so the covenant theologians insist. When Sutton presents many passages in the Bible that conform to the five-point model, the critics automatically dismiss his discoveries as man-made “eisegesis”: reading a structure into the text. They are insistent: “Covenant theology has no biblically authoritative structure!” This, it should be pointed out, is exactly what myriads of critics of covenant theology have maintained for about three centuries.

H. Biblical Analogical Reasoning

The theoretical question is this: If man’s mind is analogous to God’s, thinking God’s thoughts after Him, then if man does not receive these patterns from God’s mind, how can man be said to be made in God’s image? If we cannot find intellectually and judicially binding patterns in the Bible, how can we render judgment in terms of God’s priorities? Are we stuck with Barth’s dialectical god: wholly concealed yet wholly revealed? Or has God revealed Himself clearly to creatures who are morally and judicially bound to speak His word in a creaturely but covenantally faithful manner?

In 1978, Rushdoony wrote: “The canon or rule of life and faith is either from God or from man. It is either the canon of covenant law, or it is the canon of man’s word as law.”²⁶ A year later, he published an essay denying the existence of any underlying master (humanist) principle. He insisted: “The quest for a master principle is in essence anti-Biblical and is destructive of Christianity.”²⁷ It is worth noting that he used a five-point argument in his attempt to prove this. Each of his five points conforms to one of the biblical covenant model’s five points, a fact Sutton noted in 1987.²⁸ Sutton’s critics face the dilemma of every covenant theologian who denies that God’s covenant has a fixed structure: without a structure, there can be no covenant.

If you do not have a theological model, you do not have a principle

26. R. J. Rushdoony, Infallibility: An Inescapable Concept (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1978), p. 26; Systematic Theology, p. 23.

27. Rushdoony, Necessity for Systematic Theology, p. 62; Systematic Theology, p. 108.

28. Ray R. Sutton, “The Inescapability of a Master Principle,” Covenant Renewal, 1 (June 1987). Rushdoony’s essay is titled, “The Search for a Master Principle,” ch. 16.

of biblical interpretation: a hermeneutic. Christians need a hermeneutic. The question is: What should it be? Theological liberals have one: "The Old Testament, but, above all, the Book of Leviticus, is judicially irrelevant." The problem is, most evangelicals share this opinion of the Old Testament, and especially of Leviticus.

I. The Substitution of Rhetoric for Evidence

My arguments and evidence regarding the broad applicability of the five-point Pentateuchal model are rarely commented on by critics except indirectly. I would put it even more strongly: the specifics of what I have written are never commented on; the blackout strategy is in force. Those few critics who seem to understand what I have written are universally unwilling to go into print with the specifics of their case against my arguments, as well as Sutton's text-by-text evidence. Instead, they resort to rhetoric, and misleading rhetoric at that.

1. Sandlin's Attack

Let us consider a representative case of this rhetorical strategy. Rev. Andrew Sandlin, at the time a Christian Reconstructionist, wrote of my broad application of the Pentateuchal-covenantal model:

What is objectionable about this insistence is that, like scholastic dispensationalism, five-point covenantalism when applied as a textual and theological construct is not exegetically derived. To extrapolate from Deuteronomy's patent covenantal structure to the view that Sutton's version thereof 'must serve as the necessary classification scheme for all orthodox Christian theology' is unwarrantable inasmuch as it is an implicit denial of the reformation principle of Sola Scriptura. To the Reformers Scripture itself is the ultimate authority; and when useful biblical models we develop begin to supersede the Scriptures themselves 'as the necessary classification scheme for all orthodox Christian theology,' we come dangerously close to a crypto-Catholicism in which the word of man competes with and dominates the word of God.²⁹

I was the target of his rhetoric. He called my exposition on the covenant an example of "overrefinement" and "confusion."³⁰ When a biblical scholar's exposition is not exegetically derived, is overrefined, 29. Andrew Sandlin, "Reservations on Tyler Reconstructionism," Calvinism Today, II (April 1992), p. 23.

30. Ibid., p. 24.

and is confused, it must be deeply flawed. The accuser presumably has considerable evidence to support his charges. Unfortunately, in the case of the most vociferous of my critics, they never do. They insist; they do not attempt to prove. They employ rhetoric; they do not offer evidence.

Sandlin also said that “North’s insistence introduces sectarianism into reconstruction.”³¹ He then compared me with militant fundamentalist Bob Jones II—which I find amusing, but Bob Jones III would not. (BJIII and I had a lengthy exchange of hostile letters in the late 1970s regarding the definition of fundamentalism). Nevertheless, his accusation regarding my concern about sectarianism was not off the mark. I am indeed doing my best to make the five points of the biblical covenant model a defining feature of Christian Reconstruction: specifically, point two of the five points (not just four) of Christian Reconstruction. Once again, these five points are: (1) the absolute sovereignty of the Trinitarian Creator God (Calvinism-Augustinianism); (2) the covenant itself, which is governed by the five points; (3) biblical law (theonomy); (4) Van Til’s presuppositional apologetic method; and (5) postmillennialism. The earlier version—points 1, 3, 4, and 5—was what Rushdoony and I pioneered from 1973 on.³² I have broken with Rushdoony on his refusal to add point two: the covenant. My explanation for his refusal to adopt it is this: he rejects it because it points directly to binding church hierarchy—the kind of authority that Calvin defended in Book IV of The Institutes.³³ Sandlin at the time was in Rushdoony’s camp. He recognized what I am trying to do, but he misinterpreted my intent. I am not trying to sectarianize Christian Reconstruction. I am trying to show that Rushdoony’s version of the position—anti-church to the core and therefore anti-covenantal—was deeply sectarian. I adhere to the traditional doctrine of the church and the sacraments; he has forthrightly rejected both. I am therefore distancing myself from Rushdoony’s sectarianism. Sandlin was unwilling to acknowledge Rushdoony’s sectarianism, and he responded by tarring me with that brush.

31. Ibid., p. 23.

32. I exclude Bahnsen here because Bahnsen has always argued that theonomy (biblical law) is not connected theologically with postmillennialism. Rushdoony and I have argued that the two are linked theologically. Since 1986, I have argued that point four of the covenant model—sanctions—supplies this link: covenant-breakers will get weaker as God’s kingdom unfolds, while covenant-keepers will become more influential. Bahnsen called himself a theonomist; he rarely if ever described himself as a Christian Reconstructionist.

33. See Appendix B.

The fact is, if the church at large never adopts either of our versions of Christian Reconstruction, or some development thereof, both camps will remain sectarian. Because I am a churchman, I can freely admit this. Because Rushdoony wasn't, he could not. Sandlin announced: "Reconstruction does not rest upon—and never has rested on—ecclesiastical polity."³⁴ This is indeed true of Rushdoony's version, which is why it is sectarian. But if by polity Sandlin means participating in the Lord's Supper as a local church member under the authority of elders, then Reconstructionism does indeed rest on ecclesiastical polity. Rushdoony stopped taking the Lord's Supper for over two decades; he refused to join a local church for the same period.³⁵ This is what separates my version of Christian Reconstruction from his.

2. Rhetorical Flourishes

Sandlin used very strong language to dismiss my position on the covenant, although I think "crypto-Catholicism" is choice, however off-target. We right-wing Americans of the 1950s era used to use "crypto-Communist" for similar rhetorical purposes. (The liberals never used "crypto-fascist." They just shouted "You fascist!" and let it go at that. They had no subtlety, no class.) But to say that a large portion of a Christian expositor's life's work—not to mention his enormous publishing expenses—is not exegetically grounded is a direct challenge either to his moral integrity or his intellectual capability. He is either a knave or an incompetent. While it is legitimate to make such a challenge on occasion, since the academic evangelical world today is filled almost to overflowing with theological knaves and incompetents, the accusation should always be supported by detailed, textually based evidence. I recommend David Chilton's book, Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators, as a representative model of how such a challenge should be presented. But this is what my published critics never offer. This is what annoys me. It leads me to do things that are considered unchristian in my day (though not Luther's and Calvin's day, and surely not in Cromwell's day), such as calling attention to the critics' naked backsides. It is now Sandlin's turn.

Sandlin was temporarily a theonomist of the Vallecito variety. I

34. Ibid., p. 24.

35. Gary North, Tithing and the Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994), ch. 10. (<http://bit.ly/gntithing>) single him out, not because I have anything against him personally, but because he was the first writer I have come across who has been willing to take me on in print regarding my broad use of the five-point covenant model.³⁶ Also, here was someone who employed rhetoric—which I sincerely do appreciate—though unfortunately at the expense of both logic and evidence. In a single passage, readers are terrorized with two traditional bogeymen: dispensationalism (which uses a model) and Catholicism (which also uses a model). Let me suggest another traditional model: the five points of Calvinism. That model, surely, is a lot closer in structure to the five-point covenant model. More to the point, the five points of Calvinism are in fact an application in the area of “theology proper” of the much broader five points of covenantalism. Whatever objections Sandlin had against my broad use of the five points of covenantalism should also be applied to the five points of Calvinism.

While no Calvinist dares to say that the five points of Calvinism are superior to Scripture, all of them say these five points are superior to the five points of Arminianism, which is where they came from in the first place. The Synod of Dort (1618–19) offered them in response to Arminius’ five points. The Calvinist says to the Arminian, “My five points are better than your five points.” I am indeed saying to the world, “Sutton’s five points of the covenant are better—more exegetically derived—than Calvinism’s five points.” The Pentateuch is not structured in terms of the five points of Calvinism. Neither is Deuteronomy. Neither is Leviticus. Neither is Exodus.

Had Sandlin challenged me to defend my assertion regarding the superiority of Sutton’s five points to the five points of Calvinism—which are a subset of the covenant’s five points—I would have no objection. That is what theological debate is all about. I would then engage him in a printed debate. I launched this debate when I decided to begin publishing Covenant Renewal months before That You May Prosper appeared. The ICE spent a lot of money publishing Sutton’s Covenant Renewal. My objection to Sandlin is that he used excessive rhetoric in order to imply that I have advocated heretical nonsense, i.e., his suggestion that my recommended theological model supersedes Scripture in the same way that dispensationalism’s model is assumed by its adherents to do, or Catholicism’s models. If I believed such a thing about theological models, I would indeed be a Roman Catholic in my hermeneutic. In short, he was not content to challenge me regarding my detailed defense of the covenant's five points against rival classification schemes regarding structure of the biblical covenant and its applications in covenantal matters. He made it sound as though I am opposed to Sola Scriptura. For rhetorical purposes, the man deliberately misrepresented me.

36. My critics tend to avoid interacting with me in print. Perhaps they recognize the old, pre-Internet rule: “Don’t get into a public confrontation with someone who orders ink by the barrel.”

At the most, his article was read by only a few hundred people. I respond here only because his rhetorical flourishes are representative of a broader class of contemporary would-be theological debate: verbal assault without theological interaction.

Before I reply in detail, I raise the following pair of not-quite rhetorical questions. First, are the creeds of the Christian church judicially binding as confessional models for church membership, i.e., membership in a covenantal institution? Second, are confessional statements of specific denominations judicially binding as confessional models for ordination to the ministries of the church? If Sandlin said yes to both questions, thereby placing himself within the orthodox tradition of the Christian church, his rhetorical assault on my broad use of Sutton's five-point backfires on him. He has now acknowledged that there can be judicially binding statements of faith—theological models, to use another word—that are under the authority of the Bible and over the church. That is to say, these theological models are covenantally binding. On the other hand, if he says no, he thereby places himself in the antinomian camp, with its constant claim: "No creed but the Bible, no law but love!" The logic of his own critique escaped Sandlin. This is always the risk of adopting strong rhetoric.

I presume that he affirms that the creeds and confessions are covenantally binding as ecclesiastical statements. But this is only the beginning. A creed is a brief statement of personal faith. It begins with credo, "I believe." But are there examples in the Bible of theologically binding structures of belief that are more than accurate summaries of certain theological conclusions? Put differently: Does the Bible itself present structured summaries of correct belief—summaries whose very structures govern the revelation of God in the Scriptures? Put differently still: Are the very structures of certain biblical passages themselves binding as representative systems of belief? Finally, are theological constructs sometimes actual biblical constructs?

3. Models: An Inescapable Concept

Sandlin implied that some systems of doctrine are autonomous creations of error-filled men who have sought to make these theological constructs superior to Scripture. This, he said, violates the Reformation principle of Sola Scriptura. On this point, he was quite correct. To which I reply: "So what? What has this traditional Protestant observation got to do with me?" The only answer supported by his article's evidence is this: not a thing. But his rhetorical implication was that this criticism of theological systems has everything to do with me. What he implied, but refused to prove from my writings or my use of evidence, is that I have elevated the five-point covenant model above the Bible. He wrote: "To the Reformers Scripture itself is the ultimate authority; and when useful biblical models we develop begin to supersede the Scriptures themselves as 'the necessary classification scheme for all orthodox Christian theology'"—the quoted phrase is mine—"we come dangerously close to a crypto-Catholicism in which the word of man competes with and dominates the word of God."³⁷ He said "we come dangerously close"; what he means is "North comes dangerously close."

He accepted the use of "useful biblical models." He rejected the use of models that "supersede the Scriptures themselves." I ask two questions. First, can there be useful biblical models that are not mandated by the Scripture? I see no judicially binding usefulness in any theological model that is not mandated by the Scriptures. Some literary model may be interesting or curious in a Vos-like sense, but in discussing the covenant, we must limit ourselves to judicially binding models. Second, are there theological models that go beyond the realm of pragmatism—mere usefulness—to become judicially binding on men's consciences? I have in mind the doctrines of the Trinity and the substitutionary atonement of Jesus Christ on Calvary. If so, then we should describe these biblical models—not merely "useful biblical models"—as being inherent in the very revelation of the Bible. To describe them in this way is not the same as saying that they "supersede the Scriptures themselves." Their authority is equal to the Scriptures because they are inseparable from the Scriptures. Or are the Jews correct in their insistence that the Trinity is a New Testament addition—a theological construct of men, one not grounded in God's authoritative self-revelation?

I am arguing that inherent in the very structuring of God's self-rev- elation in the texts of Scripture there are models. It is simply not true that every model or structure that a theologian (or anyone else) brings to the study of the Bible must always and inevitably be an autonomously derived construct that he seeks to impose on the Bible. There are constructs that were from the beginning imposed by God on the texts of Scripture. This is because it is impossible for men to think apart from models. We cannot know everything exhaustively—a major theme in Van Til’s system. We cannot relate every fact in the universe to every other fact. We therefore require accurate models in order to integrate the limited knowledge we have. These models must “do justice”—point four of the covenant model—to the facts. But where should we obtain such theologically authoritative models? The answer ought to be obvious: in the Bible.

37. Sandlin, "Reservations," Calvinism Today, p. 23.

It is our task to think God’s thought after Him as creatures. God communicates to us as creatures; His revelation is structured in terms of models that we can understand and employ in rendering theological judgments. For instance, God announced ten commandments, not eleven or nine. Accurate theological models are themselves biblically structured revelations from God. These models can be grammatical, theological, or symbolic. We cannot think apart from such structures. Our minds were created to think this way. The universe is also structured to match the structures of our minds. If this were not so, there could not be modern science. The astounding structure we call mathematics would not coincide with the regularities of the external world.³⁸

There is a kind of conservative theological relativism that says, or at least implicitly assumes, that all theological structures are the creations of men’s minds; none is imbedded in the texts or the structure of the Bible. This assumption is fatal to orthodoxy. It assumes man’s legitimate autonomy. It says, in good Kantian fashion, that there is no inherent order in the “thing-in-itself” (in this case, the Bible), and even if there were, man could not know this order directly. Thus, all of our knowledge of the Bible is properly ordered by man’s categorical structure of thought. We bring order to the Bible. We bring different orders. What we have here is symphonic theology. All tunes are equal (but some are more equal than others).

This assumption of the non-ordered nature of both the Bible and creation is wrong. Man can know the revelation of God covenantally, and God holds each man eternally responsible for the proper though subordinate understanding of it. This revelation is both general (the universe) and special (the Bible). The Bible's revelation has precedence over general revelation. We are required to structure our understanding of general revelation in terms of the structure of biblical revelation. This is the meaning of Van Til's presuppositionalism. This is why it is rejected: it places our knowledge of reality under the authority of the Bible. But if Van Til is correct, then we cannot avoid this conclusion: the Bible provides integrating structures for human thought. Put differently, it offers blueprints. These blueprints govern theology. This means that our theological models must be derived from the inherent structure—models—of the Bible itself. The only theological symphony we are allowed to play is the one provided by the Bible itself. We are not to bring theological models to the Bible from outside the Bible. But this means that we must go to the Bible in search of authoritative models. Models are an inescapable concept. It is never a question of models vs. no models. It is always a question of which models. This should be obvious to any follower of Van Til.

38. Eugene P. Wigner, “The Unreasonable Effectiveness of Mathematics in the Natural Sciences,” Communications on Pure and Applied Mathematics, XIII (1960), pp. 1–14. (<http://bit.ly/WignerMath>). Wigner won the Nobel Prize in physics.

With respect to the five-point covenant model, I say without any reservation that this model—this structure—is far more visible in the texts of the Bible than the Trinity is. This is not to say that it is more important because it is more visible. Belief in the five-point model is not on the same level as belief in the Trinity in terms of eternal consequences. The structure of God's covenantal relationships to man is not of the same consequence as God's eternal relationship with Himself: the aseity of God. We need God; He does not need us. But I am saying that in God's decision to reveal Himself to fallen man by means of written revelation, God has seen fit to reveal the structure of His covenantal relationship to man in the actual structure of numerous texts of Scripture. He has not done this with equal clarity when revealing His Trinitarian nature. I have seen attempts to find the Trinity in the structure of Scripture. I have not been impressed, and neither have most theologians through the ages.

I have not read this five-point structure into Scripture. God put into Scripture, and I am merely reading Scripture. In contrast, Sandlin has read it out of Scripture. It is there, but he refuses to admit this. Seeing, he will not see.

J. The Question of Exegesis

Sandlin misused his rhetorical gifts to suggest that my broad use of the five-point covenant model is illegitimate because it is not exegetically derived. He did not say that my exegesis is erroneous. That would have required direct citations from my writings and specific discussions of my errors. That would also have meant interacting with me and with the Bible. His language can be interpreted as implying that I have not attempted to derive my conclusions from the Bible. He was also very careful to avoid any mention of the (then) more than five years of specific applications of this model presented in Sutton's newsletter. He did not refer to my Preface to The Sinai Strategy: The Economics of the Ten Commandments, which shows that the Ten Commandments are structured into two parallel sets of the five points: one priestly, the other kingly. He did not refer to my commentaries to show that the Pentateuch is structured this way. I have been arguing this since 1987, beginning with my General Introduction in the revised edition of The Dominion Covenant: Genesis. He told his readers that my thesis is not exegetically derived, and then he remained silent about my lengthy exegetical defenses of my thesis.

I should be used to this sort of rhetoric by now. I should be, but I am not. I cannot seem to get used to it. I am a scholar and a Christian, and this sort of thing is considered a breach of integrity in both worlds. There is also the question of the Ninth Commandment. We are not to bear false witness. If you say that a Christian scholar has not rested his case on the Bible, when he has said repeatedly that his system does rest on the Bible, you have a moral obligation to present some evidence. If you do not have room to prove your case in one place, you (or someone reliable) should already have presented the case elsewhere. But Sandlin refused to do this. He authoritatively dismissed my work on the structure of the covenant as non-exegetical, and then went on to another topic: an attack on James Jordan. I have previously called this approach to theological debate hit-and-run scholarship: you drive over the targeted victim from behind and then speed away into the night.

He announced, without offering any evidence, that the five-point covenant model, if applied beyond Deuteronomy, is the theological equivalent of dispensationalism and Catholicism because it is not exegetically based. Therefore, he implied rhetorically, defenders of the covenant model implicitly assume that this model is superior to the Bible. But such an assumption is a denial of Sola Scriptura. Sandlin's argument rests completely on an assumption: that my broad use of the model is not exegetically based. His "proof" of this statement is his refusal to acknowledge the existence of Covenant Renewal and everything I have published on the five-point model.

My point from 1986 on—my blatantly obvious point—is not that Sutton's classification scheme is above Scripture. I am arguing two very different things. First, and most important, Sutton's proposed model is in fact derived from the structure that was built into the Bible by God—not above the Bible, but in the Bible. Deuteronomy reflects it, not because only Deuteronomy reflects it, but because Deuteronomy reflects the Pentateuch, which is structured by the five-point model. Second, and far less important, I have argued that the five-point covenant model is a whole lot better, and a whole lot more exegetical, than traditional Scholastic Calvinism's (i.e., Turretin's) loci.

If Sandlin is incapable of challenging me theologically on these two points, he should keep his rhetorical flourishes to himself. Rhetoric is not a valid substitute for theological disquisition and detailed, comprehensive exegesis. Not to put too fine a point to it: one half of a single brief essay is not a valid substitute for a major text in theology (That You May Prosper), six years of newsletters, and a growing shelf of Bible commentaries.

K. Sandlin vs. Biblical Theology

Having said all this, let me make one last observation about the professed concern of Sandlin regarding the supposed lack of exegetical support for my broad application of the five-point model. What I have argued, and what Sutton also argued, is that theology must be both systematic and biblical, i.e., dogmatic and exegetical. Orthodox theology must acknowledge the historical development of God's revelation, Genesis to Revelation, as well as affirm the doctrinal constancy in God's progressive revelation, which undergirded and shaped this revelation. Why must both be affirmed? Because man is an historical creature. Mankind develops in wisdom and knowledge, and this will continue in eternity. God is infinite; man is not. Therefore, our knowledge of God will grow for all eternity. Because I simultaneously defend the idea of fixed, unchangeable truth in the mind of God and the idea of the finitude of man, I defend both systematic theology (fixed theological categories) and biblical theology (progressive revelation in the Bible). There is equal ultimacy here: fixed truth in the mind of God and God's progressive revelation to mankind. Once the canon of Scripture was closed, man's systematic theology could not remain absolutely fixed because man's knowledge of God cannot remain constant. Finite man cannot comprehend—encompass—an infinite God. There has been progress theologically in history precisely because the church has moved forward to maturity.

Sandlin clearly distrusts biblical theology as a separate academic discipline. He is far more enamored with Turretin's Scholastic theological system than he is with modern biblical theology, which is more closely tied to the exposition and exegesis of specific texts than post-Turretin systematic theology has ever been. He defends Turretin and attacks biblical theology: "The shift from a dogmatic and confessional theology of Turretin's sort to a purely exegetical and biblical theology, however, tends to result in heterodoxy. . . ." ³⁹ What did he mean, "purely exegetical"? He did not say. Is there something suspicious about exegetical theology? Isn't his formal criticism of my use of the five points the fact that my theology is not exegetical? Could it be that his real objection to my use of the five-point Pentateuchal-covenantal model has more to do with my rejection of Turretin's system as a judicially binding model than with my supposed lack of exegetical evidence?

Surely exegetical and biblical theology did not shift to heterodoxy in the hands of Geerhardus Vos. Furthermore, historically speaking, the Princetonians' defense of their only slightly modified Turretinian theology collapsed under the weight of Kant, Darwin, and modernism early in the twentieth century, if not before. Van Til was correct: the Princetonians' attempt to tie Calvinism to rationalism—in Princeton's case, Scottish common sense rationalism—was doomed to failure, as are all attempts to unite Jerusalem and Athens. The categories (loci) of Turretin's covenant theology were established in response the categories of Roman Catholic Scholasticism, not in terms of the Bible's actual covenant structure. They could not survive the collapse of Catholic Scholasticism. In fact, they collapsed first. ⁴⁰ By "collapsed," I do not mean that they became incorrect. I mean that they became irrelevant to the culture around them, including the American Presbyterian Church itself. This is the fate of every theological construct grounded in man's logical categories rather than in explicitly biblical categories.

39. Andrew Sandlin, "Review of Institutes of Elenctic Theology, by Francis Turretin," Christianity and Society, IV (April 1994), p. 30. This is the re-named Calvinism Today.

40. I would date the beginning of the collapse of Rome's Scholasticism with Pope John XXIII (1958–1963); the demolition was completed by his successor, Paul VI.

What Sutton and I have argued is that biblical theology should be governed by biblically revealed theological categories. Only the Bible is simultaneously unchanging and relevant to history. Therefore, only the Bible's categories are reliable as fixed theological standards to govern the exegetical insights derived from biblical theology. Biblical theology should always be structured by biblical categories. The five-point covenant model is by far the most comprehensive biblical structure, for it is simultaneously creational, judicial, and eschatological. It, not Protestant Scholasticism's seven loci, should govern the presentation of the Trinity, the atonement, and other explicitly revelational concepts. In the task of providing a judicial framework to biblical theology, the five points of the covenant have far greater Scriptural authority than Scholastic Calvinism's seven loci. The five points are actually found in the texts of Scripture. The Scholastic loci are found only in the minds of theologians. This does not make the loci incorrect, but it does make them less reliable, long term, than the covenant's five points, in developing a covenant theology. The seven loci are mental constructs that are derived from passages in Scripture, but they are never found as a unit in Scripture. The seven loci are the imposition of a logically contrived structure over the texts of Scripture, not a structure present in the texts themselves.

What I perceived in 1994, after I had read Sandlin's 1994 defense of Turretin, is that his 1992 public criticism regarding my supposed lack of exegesis may have been more rhetorically motivated than I had suspected. I am calling for the adoption of a Bible-revealed structure to govern biblical theology. Sandlin did not really want biblical theology at all. He did not trust it. He wanted good, old fashioned, rationalistic, seventeenth-century Calvinism. To which I respond: "We've been down that road already. It leads to a dead end."

Without both biblical theology and systematic theology, we will not recover lost ground. Both must be developed in terms of the Bible. Biblical theology must always be governed by the terms of systematic theology in order to keep biblical theologians from flying into the "wild blue yonder" through unrestrained interpretive maximalism. But the governing categories of systematic theology should not be the categories of seventeenth-century Protestant Scholasticism. The categories of systematic theology must be explicitly biblical, including the actual structure of the texts. There is circularity here, but of a biblical kind.⁴¹

L. Sandlin Departs

In any case, the Sandlin of 1992 is no more. A year after he went off the payroll of Chalcedon, in December, 2002, he publicly cast off the restrictive shackles of the Christian Reconstruction movement (CRM). He wrote a farewell piece for the Razormouth site: "Saying goodbye to Christian Reconstructionism." He wrote: "So, I say farewell to the CRM, and my spirit is not 'Good riddance,' but rather, 'Thanks for the memories.'"⁴² But this was not enough to satisfy him. One year later, on December 16, 2003, he posted an essay on Razormouth. He criticized John MacArthur's statement that the central doctrine of the gospel is salvation by faith alone. No, no, no, said Sandlin. "The main issue of the New Testament is not justification by faith alone (vital though it is) but rather, as Oscar Cullmann demonstrates, the Lordship of the risen, ruling Savior, Jesus of Nazareth. MacArthur's view, under the sincere attempt to preserve a gracious soteriology, truncates the Biblical picture of the work of Christ."⁴³ Oscar Cullmann? Oscar Cullmann? Oscar Cullmann???? Oscar Cullmann was the German Lutheran theologian who spent his career in the ecumenical movement. The World Council of Churches issued this obituary in 1999:

Everything marked Cullmann out for ecumenical commitment; he came from Strasbourg, the city of the Reformation figure Martin Bucer, he was bilingual and he was passionate about the "essence" of the Christian faith. He became involved in interconfessional talks as early as the 1920s. Without repudiating his Lutheran background, he taught for many years at the Reformed Faculty in Basle. After the Second World War his teaching activities extended to Paris and Rome. The time spent at the Waldensian Faculty in Rome gave him the opportunity to make many Roman Catholic contacts. His uncomplicated, salvation history-oriented theology was also well-received in Rome. His book "Peter—Disciple, Apostle, Martyr" (1952) paved the way for an objective discussion on a sensitive subject in relations between the confessions. At a time when contacts at the highest level were unusual, he was received by the Popes Pius XII, John XXIII, and above all, Paul VI. Karl Barth used to say teasingly, "Oscar, on your gravestone it will say 'Here lies the adviser to three Popes'". Tease he might, but years later, when times had changed, Barth himself made a high-profile visit to Rome. Cullmann was personally invited as an observer to the Second Vatican Council and his voice was heeded by many. His conversations with Paul VI gave rise to the plan for an ecumenical institute in Jerusalem.⁴⁴

41. On biblical circular reasoning, see Cornelius Van Til, A Survey of Christian Epistemology, volume II of In Defense of Biblical Christianity (Den Dulk Foundation, 1969), p. 12.

42. P. Andrew Sandlin, "Saying Goodbye to Christian Reconstructionism," Razormouth (Dec. 10, 2002). The site is now a how to make money site. The original article is now posted here: <http://www.garynorth.com/SandlinFarewell.pdf>.

43. Sandlin, "The Biblical Perspective on Paul." This appeared on Sandlin's site: The document is gone as of 2011.

He was the twentieth-century neo-orthodox theologian (1902–1999) of whom Cornelius Van Til warned in 1970:

If evangelical Christians take a second look at Cullmann, they will see that he works in the line of Bultmann and of Barth rather than in the line of Luther and Calvin. Cullmann has in common with both Bultmann and Barth, the assumption of human autonomy as it has found its modern expression in Kant. This assumption of human autonomy results in an absolute dualism between the world of science as the world of abstract impersonal law, and the world of faith as the world of wholly unknown and wholly non-rational forces. This second world is called the world of the noumenal by Kant and the world of person-to-person confrontation by his theological followers. By the powers of sheer postulation and assertion the second world is then placed above the first. The meeting point of the two worlds is called the Christ. Somehow this Christ is supposed to be more intelligible than the Christ of Chalcedon!⁴⁵ . . .

A recently written article on The Relevance of Redemptive History gives some evangelical Christians occasion to remark that Cullmann is now, more obviously than before, on the side of the Evangelicals in the Great Debate Today. However, the framework of Cullmann's thinking remains the same throughout his writings. It is because of his essentially post-Kantian framework of thought that Cullmann finds it possible to be as "ecumenical" as he is. His sympathy with Roman Catholic thinking springs from the fact that in it, as well as in his own post-Kantian views, the ideas of human autonomy, of abstract logic, and of brute contingent factuality, have a controlling place.⁴⁶

To add insult to injury, in Sandlin's December 22 posting, "Biblio-

44. World Council of Churches, Office of Communications, Press Release (21 January 1999), "Oscar Cullman (1902–1999)." (<http://bit.ly/CollmanWCC>)

45. Cornelius Van Til, The Great Debate Today (Nutley, New Jersey: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1970), pp. 39–40.

46. Ibid., pp. 41–42.

phile's Year-End Top Ten Favorite Books Read in 2003," we find this at the top of the (alphabetical) list: "Barth, Karl. Evangelical Theology: An Introduction." I ask: What in the name of orthodoxy has anything written by Karl Barth contributed to Sandlin's thinking? Has he not read and understood Van Til's The New Modernism (1947) or Christianity and Barthianism (1962)? This book recommendation came from a man who had written one year earlier, "I've been identified by some on the left and even some on the right as R. J. Rushdoony's intellectual (if not institutional) heir, but I neither deserve nor desire that mantle."⁴⁷ Not quite: the left-right sources that he linked to did not mention his intellectual heirship. They noted—inaccurately—that he was the head of Chalcedon. He was not. Still, just like Julius Caesar in Shakespeare's play, he refused the crown, even though (unlike Caesar) only he offered it. Given where he has headed since then, I think this was wise.

Conclusion

The Book of Deuteronomy is structured in terms of a five-point model. Meridith Kline's Treaty of the Great King (1963) makes this clear. But this same five-point biblical structure is visible in far more passages in the Book of Leviticus than in Deuteronomy. Not only is Leviticus structured in terms of the covenant model, the five-point structure appears again and again in its subsections.⁴⁸ So, those critics who say "Deuteronomy only!" have another large problem to add to their Exodus problem: the Leviticus problem. This will not faze them, of course. They will still carry on about the non-existence of this five-point pattern except in Deuteronomy. But anyone who has read this commentary, plus Tools of Dominion and The Sinai Strategy, will expect more proof than the repeated assurances of critics who steadfastly refuse to comment on anything that Sutton and I have written since 1987, or on what Gary DeMar⁴⁹ and George Grant⁵⁰ wrote in the Biblical Blueprints series, or on what Ken Gentry wrote in 1990 in The Greatness of the Great Commission, which is structured by the five-point model.

47. Sandlin, "Saying goodbye to Christian Reconstructionism."

48. James Jordan, Covenant Sequence in Leviticus (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/jjcovseq>)

49. Gary DeMar, Ruler of the Nations (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), which is structured by the five-point model. (<http://bit.ly/gdmruler>)

50. George Grant, The Changing of the Guard (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), which is structured by the five-point model. (<http://bit.ly/GrantGuard>)

Rhetoric is not a legitimate substitute for textual analysis, and the “Deuteronomy only!” critics have offered nothing so far except rhetoric. They do not respond to the evidence. Their pit is filling up. I conclude that it is now up to the “it’s too good to be true, because we seem to find it everywhere” critics to defend the camp of traditional covenant theology against a covenant theology with a textually derived structure. If there is one thing that traditional covenant theologians cannot tolerate it is a textually derived theological structure.

I have said it before, and I shall say it again: the vocal critics of Christian Reconstruction have a moral obligation to produce detailed Bible commentaries that show why mine are incorrect. These commentaries must also demonstrate what is correct, both theologically and in terms of applying the Bible to the modern world. The critics no doubt prefer to confine their efforts to a an occasional negative book review in some small-circulation magazine, but such protests are not substitutes for the hard and expensive work of producing commentaries and comprehensive treatises built on commentaries. A three-page negative review is little more than a wail: “I just don’t like this, and neither should anybody else!” Wailing against God’s law in the face of an encroaching humanist civilization is an exercise in futility. Without an explicitly biblical alternative to God’s law, such wailing constitutes a surrender to humanism.

What I say here about the critics of Christian Reconstruction applies equally well to those Reconstructionists who deny the five-point covenant model. The four points of Christian Reconstruction are not found in any passage in Scripture. The five points are. Repeatedly.

End of Volume 4

SANCTIONS AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON NUMBERS

Other Books by Gary North

An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)

Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)

An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)

Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)

Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)

Government by Emergency (1983)

Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)

75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)

Coined Freedom (1984)

Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)

Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)

Honest Money (1986)

Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)

Dominion and Common Grace (1987)

Inherit the Earth (1987)

Liberating Planet Earth (1987)

Healer of the Nations (1987)

The Pirate Economy (1987)

Is the World Running Down? (1988)

When Justice Is Aborted (1989)

Political Polytheism (1989)

The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)

Victim's Rights (1990)

Westminster's Confession (1991)

Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar

The Coase Theorem (1992)

Salvation Through Inflation (1993)

Rapture Fever (1993)

Tithing and the Church (1994)

Crossed Fingers (1996)

The Covenantal Tithe (2010)

SANCTIONS AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON NUMBERS

GARY NORTH

Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers

Copyright © Gary North, 2012

2nd Edition

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

This book is dedicated to

TABLE OF CONTENTS

| | |
|--|-----|
| Preface | vii |
| Introduction | 1 |
| 1. Mustering the Army of God (Num 1:1–4) | 11 |
| 2. Military Planning vs. Central Planning (Num. 1:2–3) | 22 |
| 3. The Hierarchy of Service/Sanctions (Num. 3:5–10) | 44 |
| 4. The Firstborn (Num. 3:11–13) | 65 |
| 5. Blessing and Naming (Num. 6:22–27) | 79 |
| 6. The Altar Offering (Num 7:1–3) | 91 |
| 7. Progressive Whining (Num. 11:1–3) | 99 |
| 8. Deferred Gratification (Num. 15:2–5) | 111 |
| 9. Evaluation and Sanctions (Num. 16:12–14) | 118 |
| 10. Tithe and Sanctions (Num 18:1–4) | 124 |
| 11. The Lure of Magic (Num 20:10–12) | 138 |
| 12. The Psychology of Victory (Num. 21:14) | 151 |
| 13. The Office of Court Prophet (Num. 24:10–13) | 160 |
| 14. Dividing the Inheritance (Num. 26:52–56) | 171 |
| 15. Bloodline Inheritance (Num. 27:6–11) | 183 |
| 16. Oath and Sanctions (Num. 30:2) | 192 |
| 17. War Brides (Num. 31:7–11) | 211 |
| 18. The Spoils of Holy Warfare (Num. 31:26–27) | 218 |
| 19. Land to Match Men’s Skills (Num. 32:1) | 222 |
| 20. Sanctions and Inheritance (Num. 33:51–53) | 233 |
| 21. Cities of Refuge (Num. 35:9–13) | 238 |
| 22. Tribal Inheritance (Num. 36:6–9) | 248 |
| Conclusion | 254 |
| APPENDIX—How Large was Israel’s Population? | 264 |

PREFACE

I began writing my economic commentary on Genesis in the spring of 1973. I wrote one chapter per month for the Chalcedon Report, beginning in May, 1973. I accelerated the process in August of 1977: ten hours a week, 50 weeks a year. Even so, it took me until 1982 to publish The Dominion Covenant: Genesis. I immediately began working on Exodus. That project occupied eight years and three volumes of commentary, plus four books that served as appendixes to the third volume.¹ Moses and Pharaoh: Dominion Religion vs. Power Religion took three years (1982–85); The Sinai Strategy: The Economics of the Ten Commandments took a year (1985–86); and Tools of Dominion: The Case Laws of Exodus took four years (1986–90). Leviticus: An Economic Commentary, a short version (about 800 pages) of Boundaries and Dominion, took almost five years (1990–94). Yet when I began Leviticus, I had thought that I might do Leviticus and Numbers in one volume.

It took me about six months to write the first draft of this book. I began in January of 1995. I completed the first draft in late June. It took another six months to revise, correct, typeset, and proofread it. By that time, I had finished Chapter 29 of my commentary on Deuteronomy, which went through Deuteronomy 12. The Deuteronomy manuscript was already longer than the entire commentary on Numbers. I had not expected much trouble in writing Sanctions and Dominion, but I had not expected it to be as easy as it turned out to be, not counting the appendix, which was a challenge.

A. The Five-Point Covenant Model

Deuteronomy completes book five of the Pentateuch, which in turn follows the five-point structure of the biblical covenant model.²

1. Dominion and Common Grace (1987), Is the World Running Down? (1988), Political Polytheism (1989), Millennialism and Social Theory (1990).

2. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992). (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

When I began writing this economic commentary on the Bible, I was unaware of this structure's all-pervasive importance for understanding the Pentateuch. I had read Meredith G. Kline's Treaty of the Great King (1963) years earlier, but I had forgotten its thesis regarding the precise number of points in the covenant. I did not recognize its implications for this project until late 1985, when Ray Sutton first presented his version of the model, based on the earlier research by Kline. Sutton's version was more precise—exactly five points, not five or six—and it was more explicitly judicial. Most important, he brought the covenant model into the New Testament era, unlike Kline, who had relegated it to the Mosaic economy only. Kline's goal was to seal off the Mosaic law from the New Testament era. Sutton's goal was to demonstrate the continuity of the covenant's structure in both testaments.

First, I saw that the Ten Commandments are structured in terms of two parallel sets of five points each, priestly (1–5) and kingly (6–10).³ This verifies the Protestant version of the numbering of the Decalogue, in contrast to the Roman Catholic and Lutheran⁴ arrangement. It also lays to rest Calvin's peculiar 4–6 structuring of what he regarded as the two tables of the law: 1–4 (piety) and 5–10 (justice).⁵ The traditional 5–5 structuring had been suggested as early as Josephus' first-century history of the Jews.⁶ That structuring is correct, although Josephus' thesis that the two tablets had five commandments written on each of them probably is not.⁷ Second, I realized that the Pentateuch itself is structured in terms of the same five points: Genesis (God's transcendence/presence), Exodus (God's authority and Israel's deliverance), Leviticus (God's law), Numbers (God's historical sanctions), and Deuteronomy (Israel's inheritance). On these points, I have gone into greater detail in the General Introduction in Sovereignty and Domin-

3. Preface, Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), vol. 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986).

4. Conservative Lutherans do not like to be referred to as "Protestants," which they equate with the Swiss Calvinistic Reformers. Their version of the Decalogue reinforces this preference. Their view of justification by faith does not.

5. John Calvin, Commentaries on the Four Last Books of Moses Arranged in the Form of a Harmony, 4 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker, [1563] 1979), III, p. 6.

6. Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews, III:V:5.

7. Ibid., III:V:8. I accept Kline's thesis: there were two complete sets of ten commandments each that were placed inside the Ark of the Covenant as testimonies: one was God's receipt; the other was Israel's. Meredith G. Kline, The Structure of Biblical Authority, rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1975), Part II, ch. 1.

ion and in the Preface to Boundaries and Dominion, my commentary on Leviticus. There is no need to repeat myself here.

The Book of Numbers extends the Bible's covenant model through a consideration of Israel's post-exodus, pre-conquest wilderness history. As the fourth book in the Pentateuch, its overarching theme is sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant model.⁸ God brought negative sanctions on the exodus generation because that generation had refused to bring negative sanctions against Canaan immediately after the return of the spies. When the next generation brought negative sanctions against cities on the wilderness side of the Jordan River, its members proved that they were covenantally ready to escape from the wilderness. The historical events of the wilderness era were, above all, a manifestation of God's corporate covenantal sanctions in history: negative against Israel.

B. New Heavens and New Earth: Prophesied Sanctions

We come now to the passage of the Bible that amillennialists resist commenting on, the passage that categorically and forever testifies against amillennialism. The crucial issue is sanctions: specifically, the historical sanction of extremely long life. Isaiah wrote of God's work in his day:

For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people: and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying. There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed (Isa. 65:17–20).

Consider these highly specific words: "There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed." These words are clear; they are also prophetically binding. They tell us that in this sin-cursed world, where death still reigns, the reign of death will someday be challenged by a revolutionary increase of life expectancy. This has not happened yet; it must be in the future. This prophecy cannot possibly apply to the post-resurrection world of eternity, for death will still exist, the text says. This passage is literal and eschatological. The promised blessings are both literal and future. These blessings are the kinds of blessings that postmillennialists and premillennialists⁹ expect during a literal, future era of millennial blessings. These historical blessings cannot be allegorized away without compromising the text, yet allegorizing is the only exegetical option for an amillennialist. This passage unquestionably destroys the case for amillennialism. No wonder amillennial Bible commentators and theologians grow hyperbolic and allegorical on those exceedingly rare occasions when they deign to offer comments on this, their position's exegetical Achilles' heel.¹⁰ The positive sanction of long life is just too positive for their would-be future realm of Satanic persecution of the church. Sinners who die at age one hundred will be accounted as children: early death. Covenant-keepers will live much longer than this. But these demographic conditions reverse the prophesied amillennial future, where evil always increases in strength and receives external blessings, while righteousness is increasingly confined to the persecuted ghettos of life.

8. Milgrom refers to "the difficulties of finding the book's inner cohesion." Jacob Milgrom, The JPS Torah Commentary: Numbers (New York: Jewish Publication Society, 1990), p. xiii. This inner cohesion becomes obvious when it is seen as book four in the Pentateuch, with the Pentateuch structured by the covenant model.

The historical sanctions of God during the final phase of the New Heaven and New Earth, as described by Isaiah, conform to the post-millennial system: righteousness is rewarded with greater wealth and power in the long run, while evil becomes increasingly impotent. Such a view of the future, we are assured by amillennialists, is heretical. It is obvious who ought to be the chief heretic in the canon of amillennialism: the prophet Isaiah.¹¹

9. What destroys the premillennial system is Matthew 13, the chapter on historical continuity between the first advent of Christ and His second advent.

10. Amillennialist Archibald Hughes, in a book titled A New Heaven and a New Earth (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1958), refused to comment directly on this passage, despite the fact that the phrase "New Heaven and New Earth" first appears here. He mentioned the passage only in passing, along with other verses, saying that it refers to eternal life, despite the fact that it discusses long life, not eternal life (pp. 138–39). There is no other comment anywhere in his book on this, the key problem passage in the Bible for amillennialists. This sort of evasive scholarship reveals a deep-seated weakness of the amillennial position.

11. For a detailed study of the eschatological and social implications of Isaiah 65:17–20, see Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

My main point here is that God's historical sanctions are indissolubly connected to the process of corporate inheritance and disinheritance in history. That is, eschatology and historical sanctions are indissoluble covenantally. To discuss either without reference to the other is to commit a major exegetical error.

C. Covenantal Sanctions and the Protestant Reformation

The issue of oath-bound sanctions served as the great dividing issue theologically in the Western church from the Protestant Reformation until the late nineteenth century, when eschatology replaced sanctions as the primary dividing issue within the Protestant community.¹² Martin Luther broke with Rome over the practical question of the sale of indulgences. He asked: Does the Papacy possess the authority to annul God's eternal sanctions in exchange for cash? The underlying theological issue here was salvation from hell's negative sanctions: By faith or by works? But the theoretical issue of the judicial basis of salvation came as a spin-off of the practical question of the sale of indulgences. It was Tetzel's sales program that led to Luther's 95 theses.

There were two other covenantally related issues that came to the forefront in the Reformation, neither of which has ever been settled: vows and sacraments. The Roman Church accused Luther and his allies of being vow-breakers, which indeed they were. This accusation was reasserted eloquently as recently as 1993 by E. Michael Jones in his study of the sexual debauchery of modern art, Degenerate Moderns.¹³ He traced the degeneracy of modern art to the sexual debauchery of the artists. Then, without warning in the final chapter, and without offering any historical evidence for subsequent connections, he identified the origin of modern sexual debauchery in Western art and culture as Luther's undermining of priestly and monastic vows. Jones argued that Luther wanted sex; the priests and nuns wanted sex; they broke their vows to get sex; and that led to Picasso. This line of reasoning may seem a bit tenuous to Protestants, but so ingrained is the centrality of the vow of celibacy in the thinking of traditionalist Roman Catholics that the emptying of Northern European nunneries and monasteries, 1520 to 1540, constitutes for some of them the crucial turning point in Western civilization. Everything evil in Western male-female relations stems from that event. They believe that it did more than merely undermine the church's ministry; it destroyed Christendom. The monstrous evil that Renaissance humanism's Papacy had become by 1517 is somehow beside the point; better the Borgias than Luther, we are still implicitly (though never explicitly) assured. The Borgias bribed people, poisoned people, and led totally debauched lives, but Luther broke his vow of celibacy. The latter act is seen as the essence of the great rebellion, not the former.

12. In the early church, the initial divisive issue was sovereignty: the doctrine of God. This was settled by the great Trinitarian creeds of the early church councils. It was the only issue that ever was settled. Then the debate moved to authority: church vs. state. The Eastern Church placed the state at the top of the hierarchy in history. The Western Church proclaimed the equal ultimacy of church and state under God. That issue came to the forefront in the West in 1076: the Papal Revolution. The next dividing issue in the West began immediately: the doctrine of law. The Scholastics attempted to fuse Roman law and canon law into one theoretical system. They failed; the two legal orders separated: rational law (state) vs. spiritual law (church). The modern world has inherited this ethical dualism.

13. San Francisco: Ignatius Press.

The other issue, the sacraments, was also the issue of covenantal sanctions. Luther asked: How many sacraments are there? Who has the authority to admit laymen to these sacraments? Who has the right to excommunicate whom? All of these sacramental issues were tied to the overriding issue of oath-bound ecclesiastical sanctions. A series of excommunications and counter-excommunications began in Northern Europe in the 1520s; they led to civil wars over the next century.

Because the West was Christian, the entire social order was oath-bound in 1517: church, state, and family. Only the Jews lived outside rule of law established by covenantal Trinitarian oaths, and they lived in separate ghettos with their own legal order. In the West, these ghettos were literally sealed off at night. In Poland, Jews lived in enclaves in the cities owned by the nobility, exempt from many gentile urban economic laws. This ghetto system benefitted the rabbis, for it transferred civil power to them over other Jews.¹⁴ But Jews were the great exception; everyone else was under Trinitarian covenantal oaths. Thus, the Reformation's schism over the legitimacy of existing oaths led in the sixteenth century to dynastic persecutions, burnings at the stake, and wars in Northern Europe, followed by a series of civil wars in the seventeenth century. The devastating Thirty Years War in Germany (1618–48), the English-Scottish war (1638–41), the English Civil War (1642–49), Cromwell's Lord Protectorship (1652–58), and the restoration of Charles II in 1660, were all struggles over the content of the civil oath.

14. Israel Shahak, Jewish History, Jewish Religion: The Weight of Three Thousand Years (London: Pluto, 1994), pp. 54, 60–63.

The theoretical reconciliation of this covenantal issue in civil affairs after 1700 marks the triumph of Enlightenment political pluralism over a pietistic Protestantism. Newtonian natural law theory replaced the Bible and Scholastic natural law theory as the new basis of social ethics and civil law. Protestants abandoned civil institutions to what they believed was a legitimate common-ground morality. Today, almost all Protestant theologians defend this dualism between revealed religion and civil authority. According to Enlightenment political theory, civil authority is not governed by Trinitarian oaths; it is governed by common-ground confessions of loyalty to a religiously neutral state. This confession of faith is accepted by Protestant theology, though with increasing doubts regarding the underlying myth of neutrality. As the myth of neutrality fades, so does the theoretical foundation of modern political pluralism.

D. The Renunciation of God's Historical Sanctions

To maintain the legitimacy of civil oaths without Trinitarian content, pluralism's Christian defenders have had to renounce the concept of predictable supernatural sanctions in history, i.e., sanctions invoked by corporate covenantal oath. This denial of the presence in the New Testament era of God's predictable covenantal sanctions has left Protestantism without any means of defending the ideal of Christendom. Lutheranism was always dualistic, but Calvinism was originally cultural-civilizational. Unofficially after 1700, and formally after 1787, American Calvinism adopted Lutheranism's dualistic view of society.¹⁵

Without the concept of covenantal sanctions in history, original Calvinism's comprehensive world-and-life view has been truncated to encompass little or nothing outside church and family. Attempts to revive Calvinism's once confident worldview, but on a pluralistic basis, most notably Abraham Kuyper's attempt in the late nineteenth century Netherlands, and more recently Francis Schaeffer's in the United States, have all failed, and for the same three reasons. First, without an appeal to a uniquely biblical law-order that encompasses politics, there is no way to distinguish Christendom from common-ethics Enlightenment humanism. Second, without the threat of God's predictable direct sanctions in history—sanctions lawfully invoked by covenantal oath—Christians cannot provide a biblically grounded defense of the right of the state to enforce the Bible-mandated sanctions attached to biblical law. The state imposes its sanctions as God’s minister (Rom. 13:4). If God does not bring sanctions in history in terms of His covenant law, neither should the state. Civil law then becomes humanistic law. Third, without a predictable historical separation of cultural inheritance and disinheritance in terms of God’s law and biblical sanctions, the meek cannot inherit the earth. Covenant-breakers will. Modern pluralistic Calvinism denies all three.¹⁶ Thus, it cannot suggest a uniquely Calvinist or even vaguely Trinitarian social theory. It merely baptizes the reigning humanist pluralist worldview and then rushes to embrace some crackpot liberal economic reform scheme that the liberals abandoned as hopelessly out of date ten years earlier.

15. The Reformed Presbyterian Church of North America ("Covenanters") long resisted this, but how much of the older view is shared today in this tiny denomination is questionable. Much depends on the theological commitment of the faculty of its denominational college, Geneva College.

The Lutherans have always been ethical dualists. Luther defended a theory of two completely separate legal orders, one for Christians and the other for the inherently non-Christian state.¹⁷ For Luther, there was no possibility of Christendom.¹⁸ The Anabaptists have also remained consistent: they renounced the ideal of Christendom and its mandated Trinitarian civil oaths in the aftermath of the failed Munster communist rebellion in 1535. In both views, Christian passive resistance to state tyranny is all that is allowed by God. This quietism was not Northern American Presbyterianism’s view until after the defrocking of J. Gresham Machen in 1936 and his death six months later, when Presbyterianism finally succumbed to eschatologies analogous to Lutheranism’s amillennialism¹⁹ and Anabaptism’s premillennialism.²⁰ Quietism was not Southern Presbyterianism’s view until after the Civil War, when the denomination went pietistic-fundamentalist on the few social issues it formally discussed: gambling, liquor, and prostitution, but not tobacco.²¹ American Presbyterianism in the twentieth century

16. Gary Scott Smith, The Seeds of Secularization: Calvinism, Culture, and Pluralism in America, 1870–1915 (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Christian University Press, 1985). This publishing house is a subsidiary of William B. Eerdmans.

17. Martin Luther, “Temporal Authority: To What Extent It Should Be Obeyed” (1523), in Luther’s Works (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1962), vol. XLV.

18. Charles Trinkaus, “The Religious Foundations of Luther’s Social Views,” in John H. Mundy, et al., Essays in Medieval Life (Cheshire, Connecticut: Biblo & Tannen, 1955), pp. 71–87.

19. Westminster Seminary was dominated by Dutch theologians after 1936.

20. Carl McIntire’s Faith Seminary after 1936 and the Bible Presbyterian Church after 1938.

21. The Virginia and Carolina economies were closely tied to tobacco.

has abandoned its Scottish roots, thereby becoming either Lutheran-amillennial or pietist-premillennial in its social outlook. Pessimillennialism, when coupled with the ethical dualism of modern political pluralism, has transformed Calvinism into something barely distinguishable from its old Protestant rivals: Lutheranism and Anabaptism.

E. Sanctions and Eschatology: Calvin vs. Kline

John Calvin believed that God enforces His law in history through the imposition of predictable sanctions. This was basic to his worldview. Without this faith in historical sanctions, Calvinism would have become another version of Lutheran dualism or Anabaptist quietism. Calvin's comments on the fifth commandment's promise of long life and blessings to those who obey their parents is indicative of his outlook. He knew, as David knew (Ps. 73), that bad things happen to good people, and good things happen to bad people. But this does not negate the law of God and its attached sanctions, Calvin insisted. There are times "where God works variously and unequally," Calvin said, but this does not make His promises void. There are always compensating rewards in heaven. More important for our understanding of his outlook, however, is what he adds: "Truly experience in all ages has shown that God has not in vain promised long life to all who have faithfully discharged the duties of true piety towards their parents. Still, from the principle already stated, it is to be understood that this Commandment extends further than the words imply; and this we infer from the following sound argument, viz., that otherwise God's Law would be imperfect, and would not instruct us in the perfect rule of a just and holy life."²² In other words, the sanctions of the fifth commandment are still in force. God's visible sanctions in history in general are not random; they reflect His commitment to defend and extend His law in history.

Calvin's comments on the fifth commandment were put into final form by the author in 1563, the year before his death, and therefore represent the culmination of his thinking. A century later, in the aftermath of the Restoration of Charles II, his spiritual heirs began to abandon this outlook. They began to lose faith in the covenantal predictability of God's sanctions in history, especially positive sanctions for covenant-keepers.²³ In our day, Meredith Kline devoted his academic ca-

22. Calvin, Harmonies, III, p. 11.

23. The turning point in New England was marked by the publication in 1662 of reer to persuading Calvinists to abandon Calvin on this point. If Calvin was correct here, then Kline's denial of the continuing New Covenant authority of the Mosaic law-covenant²⁴ would represent the abandonment of Calvinism in the name of Lutheranism, which I contend is exactly what Kline's theology represents.²⁵

Both European Calvinist traditions—Dutch and Scottish—produced their formative documents in an era in which civil sanctions were assumed mandatory in the protection of church doctrine and liturgy. Two centuries later, Anglo-American Calvinism officially renounced the ideal of Christendom in the revision of the Westminster Confession of 1787–88. It adopted the Enlightenment's ideal of political pluralism. The Synod was timed to match the Constitutional Convention of May, 1787. The two meetings overlapped briefly in Philadelphia; the Synod was ending on a Monday as the Convention was beginning.²⁶ Meanwhile, Continental Calvinism had almost no influence outside of Holland after 1700. After 1800, right-wing Enlightenment social theory was substituted by the theologians for the older theocratic ideal. Calvinist social theory after 1800 has been indistinguishable from conservative humanism's social theory. It has been some variant of Whig political theory.

Kline offered a dualistic theology in the name of Calvin. Kline's theology rests openly on his denial of the presence of humanly predictable covenantal sanctions in New Testament times. According to Kline, ethical cause and effect in history are, humanly speaking, essentially random. In this, he challenged Calvin at the very core of Calvin's ethical theory. He wrote: "And meanwhile it [the common grace order] must run its course within the uncertainties of the mutually con-

Michael Wigglesworth's two poems, The Day of Doom and God's Controversie With New England. In England, the imposition of the Act of Uniformity (1662) and the expulsion of some two thousand Calvinist pastors from their pulpits were equally devastating to older Calvinism's faith in the future and in God's positive sanctions in history.

24. Kline, Structure of Biblical Authority, Part 2, ch. 3: "The Intrusion and the Decalogue."

25. Kline's former student and full-time disciple Michael Horton is far more open regarding this quest for a Lutheran-Calvinist reconciliation. The judicial basis of such a reconciliation is Calvinism's acceptance of Lutheranism's ethical dualism, which Horton seems to accept. In a letter to Christian News (Nov. 13, 1995), a conservative Lutheran publication, he wrote of his organization, CURE, that "we are building a co-operative effort between the Reformed and Lutheran Christians in an effort to restore a Reformation witness." Horton left the Reformed Episcopal Church and joined the Christian Reformed Church in 1995.

26. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), pp. 543–48. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

ditioning principles of common grace and common curse, prosperity and adversity being experienced in a manner largely unpredictable because of the inscrutable sovereignty of the divine will that dispenses them in mysterious ways.”²⁷ Calvin, in stark contrast, dismissed such a view of historical causation as pagan to the core. Yes, he said, following David, good things sometimes happen to bad people and bad things to good people, but this is merely Satanic deception. “When such is the state of matters, where shall we find the person who is not sometimes tempted and importuned by the unholy suggestion, that the affairs of the world roll on at random, and as we say, are governed by chance?”²⁸ With respect to his theory of visible cause and effect in history, Kline succumbed to the temptation.

The theological contrast between Kline and Calvin could not be sharper. In the name of Calvin, Kline has abandoned Calvinism and has substituted an ethical dualism consistent with Lutheranism, Anabaptism, and, for that matter, Enlightenment humanism. His theory boils down to this: in this world, God does not defend or extend His law by means of humanly predictable corporate sanctions. On this point, covenant-breakers are in full agreement with Kline. (So, from what I can see, are most of his colleagues at Westminster Seminary.)²⁹

27. Meredith G. Kline, “Comments on an Old-New Error,” Westminster Theological Journal, XLI (Fall 1978), p. 184.

28. John Calvin, Commentary on the Book of Psalms (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker, [1557] 1979), III, p. 122.

29. Gary North, Westminster’s Confession: The Abandonment of Van Til’s Legacy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991). (<http://bit.ly/gnwc>)

F. The Christian Ghetto: Living Under Humanism's Sanctions

Couple Kline's view of God's unpredictable corporate sanctions in history with the amillennialism of sixteenth-century Calvinism, and the result is ghetto Christianity: the mentality of a defensive community of besieged and culturally doomed Christians—"cannon fodder for Christ." Its unofficial slogan is: "Of the ghetto, by the ghetto, for the ghetto!" With respect to Christian civilization, these ghetto theologians deeply believe, "Once lost, always lost." Christianity must remain a strictly defensive operation culturally. Although Christians created Western civilization, once the humanists conquered it in the eighteenth century, this supposedly set in historical concrete humanism's position as the reigning covenant-breaking social order. Any attempt to re-conquer culture for Christ is heretical, we are assured.

It is true that sixteenth-century Calvinists were hostile to the idea that the gospel would eventually convert most of mankind. On this point, they adhered strictly to the dominant tradition of Roman Catholic eschatology. Calvin himself was ambivalent on the issue; there were elements of what would later become postmillennialism in his thinking.³⁰ The others were outright hostile. (So were the Lutherans.) But Calvinists also believed that Protestant Christians, although a permanent minority group worldwide, had the right and moral obligation to defend their local majority positions in sections of Northern Europe by means of the sword. They were all theocrats in the traditional meaning of the word. They believed in the imposition of civil sanctions in the name of Jesus Christ and His earthly kingdom.

Not so today. Their spiritual heirs, as Enlightenment pluralists, have abandoned sixteenth-century Calvinism's theocratic ideal, but not its amillennialism. Today, Christians are in the minority everywhere. So it must stay forever, announce the theologians of the Protestant ghetto. So it was always intended to be. Writes Protestant Reformed Church theologian-editor, David J. Engelsma: "The ungodly always dominate. The world's rulers always condemn the cause of the true church. The wicked always oppress the saints. The only hope of the church in the world, and their full deliverance, is the Second Coming of Christ and the final judgment. This is Reformed doctrine."³¹ On

30. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, Appendix D: "Calvin's Millennial Confession." Cf. Gary North, "The Economic Thought of Luther and Calvin," Journal of Christian Reconstruction, II (Summer 1975), pp. 104–106.

31. Editorial, "A Defense of (Reformed) Amillennialism. 3. Apostasy and Persecuthe contrary, this is merely ghetto theology's doctrine.

The sixteenth-century Reformers believed no such thing regarding the perpetual subordination of Christians to covenant-breakers, which was why Calvin consented to the execution of Servetus. Christians, the Calvinist Reformers universally believed, are not to accept as final any temporary triumph of their enemies in the social order. This is why the Calvinist Reformers all invoked the sword as a means of preserving the hegemony of Protestant Christianity in the West. Every Calvinist theologian agreed on this, right down to the days of Oliver Cromwell. Nor did Calvin teach that Protestant rule in all parts of Northern Europe was necessarily doomed eschatologically. Yet his spiritual heirs have substituted the political doctrines of the Enlightenment's common-ground humanism for Calvin's theocratic worldview. They defend cultural surrender and ghetto living as Calvinism in action, i.e., inaction. They have interpreted Calvin's doubts concerning a future, universal, worldwide rule of Christianity in every society as if Calvin had in some way affirmed the universal, worldwide rule of covenant-breakers over covenant-keepers in every society. Let me put it as clearly as I can: modern Calvinists have adopted Servetus' view of the political order, and they have done so in the name of Calvin. This ought to be regarded as the greatest irony in the history of applied Calvinism. Meanwhile, Calvinist defenders of the permanent cultural ghetto are ready, figuratively speaking, to burn at the academic stake any postmillennial Calvinist who calls attention to this remarkable irony.

Permit me to invoke a familiar phrase: it is never a question of civil sanctions vs. no civil sanctions. It is always a question of whose civil sanctions. It is a question of who imposes sanctions against which public evils. It is a question of whose laws define the public evils for which civil sanctions are legitimately imposed. In short, there is no neutrality.

Second, let me restate the obvious: the history of man is a war between covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers. Marx was wrong: history is not the history of the class struggle. It is the history of the covenantal struggle. Thus, there are two possible choices for building a civilization: Christendom or anti-Christendom. We now get to the famous bottom line: "He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth abroad" (Matt. 12:30). There are tion," The Standard Bearer (May 1, 1995), p. 365.

Christians who want to limit this two-fold distinction to individual souls, families, and churches. They categorically deny that this division applies to the civil covenant. They do so because they are opposed to the ideal of Christian civilization. Officially, they affirm the existence of a freedom-enhancing, creedally neutral civil law. Unofficially, they either prefer to live under anti-Christian civil laws rather than biblical law, or else they seek a peace treaty with humanism because they are convinced that the only alternative to this is the open persecution of the church and the nearly total destruction of all traces of Christian culture. They believe that their unofficial peace treaty with covenant-breakers can gain Christians limited zones of neutral freedom under “mild” anti-Christian civil sanctions. They prefer life in a Christian cultural and emotional ghetto to the comprehensive responsibilities associated with the Great Commission.³² To put it in historical terms, their theory of civil government borders on the Amish view. In this sense, Protestant political theory has become Anabaptist, beginning with Roger Williams and continuing in Westminster Seminary’s faculty.³³ It relies on some combination of natural law, natural revelation, natural rights theory, and common grace to protect Christians from tyranny.

The issue is sanctions. Anti-Christendom Christians believe that anti-Christians will not impose harsh civil sanctions on Christians if Christians agree publicly not to impose any civil sanctions on anti-Christians. They have adopted as a New Testament theological doctrine Sam Rayburn’s political dictum: “You’ve got to go along to get along.”³⁴ More to the point, they have adopted the strategy of preemptive surrender. They think they can settle for Finlandization: a degree of independence from a powerful neighbor. They forget that Finland achieved Finlandization in 1940 only by fighting Stalin’s forces and inflicting so much havoc on his troops that it paid Stalin to settle with them. The Finns did not start out with a policy of Finlandization; otherwise, they would have wound up like Latvia, Estonia, and Lithu-

32. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

33. North, Westminster’s Confession. See also North, “‘I’ve Been Framed!’ A Study in Academic Positioning” (Dec. 1995). (<http://bit.ly/gnframed>)

34. Rayburn was Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives longer than anyone in history, 17 years, 1940 to 1961, excepting only 1948–49 and 1953–55, when the Republicans were in power. He was America’s second most powerful politician after the President. He was a House member from 1912 to his death in 1961, also a record.

ania.

But it is even worse than this. Christian defenders of neutral politics, neutral civil law, and the pre-emptive surrender of Christians, as Christians, in the political order do not believe that Stalin, Mao, Hitler, Khomeini, and Saddam Hussein are representative of consistent covenant-breaking in operation. They think loveable old Ben Franklin is.

G. Engelsma vs. the Mosaic Sanctions

As I argue in this book and argue in greater detail in my commentary on Deuteronomy, the issue of covenantal sanctions cannot be separated theologically from the issue of eschatology. Positive and negative sanctions in eternity—heaven vs. hell, the New Heavens and New Earth vs. the lake of fire—are reflected in history: kingdom of God vs. kingdom of Satan. What divides most conservative Christian expositors today is their assessment of which kingdom visibly reflects God's positive corporate sanctions in history: God's or Satan's. The vast majority of those who call themselves Christians today believe that the answer is clearly "Satan's." God's positive corporate sanctions in history are showered on covenant-breakers, we are told. God's negative corporate sanctions in history are progressively imposed on the church, we are also told. Only one view of eschatology denies this with respect to the New Covenant church age: postmillennialism. This view is dismissed as heretical by premillennialists and amillennialists.

1. Engelsma vs. Chrstendom

Consider the inflammatory rhetoric of amillennialist Engelsma. He dismissed "the carnal kingdom of postmillennialism" as "injurious, if not disastrous." Postmillennialism raises "practical nightmares." He invoked a code word of the pietist-Anabaptist tradition: "worldly." He went on: "Reformed men and churches make strange, forbidden, wicked alliances in order, by hook or by crook, to build the earthly kingdom of Christ."³⁵ Christian Reconstruction introduces the "fundamental heresy of Judaizing" by calling for "a vast array of Old Testament laws. . . ."³⁶ As for J. Marcellus Kik's book, An Eschatology of Victory (1971), it is heretical, as is Christian Reconstructionism. "By heresy, I mean not only a serious departure from the teaching of the Scriptures

35. David J. Engelsma, "Jewish Dreams," The Standard Bearer (Jan. 15, 1995), pp. 173–74.

36. Ibid., p. 174.

but a grievous corruption of the gospel. The error is that the spiritual kingdom revealed and realized by the gospel is changed into a carnal kingdom, and the spiritual triumph of the exalted Christ in history is changed into an earthly triumph.”³⁷ This is very strong judicial language. Is he correct?

Here, I offer the reader an explanation. I devote the remainder of this Preface to answering Rev. Engelsma. Yet he is not a well-known critic of Christian Reconstruction. He is a leader in a small Dutch-American denomination, the Protestant Reformed Church.³⁸ Then why single him out? First, because he keeps singling me out in his denominational magazine, calling me one of America’s most dangerous heretics. But this accusation does not mean too much. To identify me as a heretic requires only that you get at the tail end of a long line. Hal Lindsey, Dave Hunt, and Constance Cumbey (the Hidden Dangers of the Raindow lady) are up at the front; Rev. Engelsma is a comparative late-comer with a very limited readership.

Second is the fact that Rev. Engelsma and his colleague Rev. Hanko³⁹ are among the very few remaining Dutch-American Calvinist defenders of traditional amillennialism who are willing to go into print on the topic. I have previously referred to their eschatology (and to premillennialism) as ghetto eschatology.⁴⁰ Rev. Engelsma admitted that there are not many defenders of the Dutch amillennial tradition: “De-Mar may well be right when he says that the number of Reformed and Presbyterian amillennialists ‘is steadily declining.’ The reason, in part, is the great apostasy now fulfilling the apostle’s prophecy in II Thessa-

37. Ibid. (March 15, 1995), p. 295.

38. It was founded in 1923 in reaction to the Christian Reformed Church’s position on common grace, namely, that God shows some degree of favor and love to all men. The PRC has denied the very existence of God’s common grace, thereby abandoning Calvin and the entire history of Reformed theology. Their theologians cannot easily explain I Timothy 4:10: “For therefore we both labour and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, specially of those that believe.” What did Paul mean, specially, if special grace does not contrast with common grace? Salvation in this general context of God’s universal salvation means healing, not eternal life. See Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), p. 57. (<http://bi.ly/gndcg>)

39. For an intellectually devastating refutation of Rev. Hanko’s writings on eschatology, see Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1992), Appendix B. (<http://bit.ly/klghshd>)

40. Gary North, “Ghetto Eschatologies,” Biblical Economics Today, XIV (April/May 1992). (<http://bit.ly/gnghetto>)

lonians 2:3. This falling away is due, in part, to the failure of Presbyterian and Reformed churches, ministers, theologians, and editors of religious periodicals”—he is a minister, theologian, and editor of a religious periodical—“vigorously to defend amillennialism and equally vigorously to expose and condemn postmillennialism.”⁴¹ He and Rev. Hanko believe that the church is now in the end times, a belief which they share with most dispensational premillennialists.

In recent years, a growing number of Calvinistic amillennialists have preferred to identify themselves as “optimistic amillennialists.” I think this repositioning has had something to do with the Reconstructionists’ success in identifying amillennialism as a philosophy of self-conscious historical retreat and psychological paralysis: a permanent remnant psychology.⁴² No one likes to be tarred and feathered with this kind of imagery, even if it happens to fit. The amillennialist, like the premillennialist, seeks a cultural stalemate today, since he sees the only eschatological alternative as persecution for the church.⁴³ For an amillennialist or a premillennialist, a cultural stalemate would constitute a major victory, however temporary for the church. In earlier versions of amillennialism, its defenders were perfectly content to accept cultural defeat and persecution, in order to assure the imminent return of Jesus Christ in final judgment. “The worse things get, the better we feel: our deliverance draweth nigh!” No one so far has set forth an exegetical case for optimistic amillennialism, i.e., an eschatology of permanently stalemated forces, good vs. evil. But so few theologians today are ready to defend with real conviction and enthusiasm the original amillennial pessimism, that Rev. Engelsma and Rev. Hanko have staked out a kind of operational monopoly: the last really enthusiastic defenders of the older Dutch amillennial tradition. I think they correctly perceive that they face declining public interest in their message of inevitable defeat and persecution for God’s church: no victory and no secret rapture. This is not what most people would call an inspiring message.

As we shall see, one thing that bothers Rev. Engelsma is the inescapable reality of the Old Testament’s mandated civil sanctions against adultery and homosexuality. The issue is sanctions. He argued that there is supposed to be no trace of the Old Testament's legal order in New Testament era civil law. "The New Testament reality of the nation of Israel, the real kingdom of God in the world, does not legislate and execute the civil laws of the Old Testament. It has no use for the civil laws of the shadow-nation."⁴⁴ This means one of two things: (1) the real New Testament kingdom of God has no civil aspect, and hence does not legislate, or (2) the real New Testament kingdom does have a civil aspect, but some other source of civil law has been substituted by God. What other source, he refused to say.

41. Engelsma, “Another Letter and Response on Jewish Dreams,” The Standard Bearer (March 15, 1995), p. 296.

42. R. J. Rushdoony, Van Til (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1960), p. 13.

43. Gary North, Backward, Christian Soldiers? An Action Manual for Christian Reconstruction (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), ch. 11: “The Stalemate Mentality.” (<http://bit.ly/gnsoldiers>)

Reconstructionists ask: "Where should Christians seek accurate definitions of law and crime?" Engelsma prudently remained silent on this point, except to say where we should not search: the Old Testament. He and Rev. Hanko have remained silent on this matter for 25 years in their intermittent attacks on Christian Reconstruction. In this respect, they share a great deal with all of Reconstructionism's critics. Reconstructionists have offered a comprehensive ethical system in the name of Christ; meanwhile, our critics resort to rhetoric. They yell, "Heretics!" This is not a legitimate substitute for detailed biblical exegesis: criticism based on biblical texts. This is why I devoted 26 years to writing detailed commentaries on the economics of the Pentateuch. Our critics have yet to respond with an equally detailed series of commentaries on any aspect of the Pentateuch. As time goes on, the disparity between our commentaries and our critics' rhetoric will become more pronounced.

2. Kingdom Sanctions

Notice that Rev. Engelsma spoke of "the real kingdom of God in the world." He did not say exactly what this phrase means. I need to make two additional observations. First, if he was defining this "real kingdom" strictly and solely as the institutional church, he had abandoned a fundamental tenet of the Protestant Reformation, which denied that the institutional church constitutes the whole of the kingdom of God in history. The New Testament kingdom encompasses the institutional church, but it is far more. On this issue, I appeal to Geerhardus Vos, a respected theologian in the Dutch Reformed tradition, who also held a faculty position for over four decades at Princeton Theological Seminary. He wrote of the kingdom of God: "There is a sphere of science, a sphere of art, a sphere of the family and the state, a sphere of commerce and industry. Whenever one of these spheres comes under the controlling influence of the principle of the divine supremacy and glory, and this outwardly reveals itself, there we can truly say that the kingdom of God has become manifest. . . . On the one hand, his [Christ's] doctrine of the kingdom was founded on such a profound and broad conviction of the absolute supremacy of God in all things, that he could not but look upon every normal and legitimate province of human life as intended to form part of God's kingdom. On the other hand, it was not his intention that this result should be reached by making human life in all its spheres subject to the visible church."⁴⁵ The institutional church is narrower than God's kingdom. This has always been the Reconstructionists' view of the kingdom.⁴⁶ It is quite conventional in Reformed circles, contrary to Rev. Engelsma's suggestion.

44. Engelsma, "Jewish Dreams," op. cit., pp. 174–75.

Second, if Rev. Engelsma was not defining the kingdom as the institutional church alone, then he needed to offer reasons why the Mosaic civil laws governing adultery and homosexuality are no longer valid. It is not enough for him merely to say that they are not valid; he must show us why. He refuses to do this, however. He immediately moved from the question of civil law to the church, calling on the church to exercise only the power of excommunication. This is an illegitimate line of argument. The two systems of covenantal sanctions are judicially separate: state vs. church. Any discussion of church sanctions as if these in some way constitute the whole of the kingdom's earthly sanctions is in error. If the kingdom is more than the institutional church, which it is, then a covenant theologian must discuss civil sanctions in terms of covenantal law. But Rev. Engelsma, whose theology becomes pietistic at this point, preferred to discuss only church sanctions. He wanted his readers to imagine that only church sanctions possess the legitimate designation of kingdom sanctions in history. He wrote: "For the church is a spiritual realm. She does not, e.g., put adulterers and homosexuals to death. Where there is public, impenitent practice of these sins, the church exercises discipline, which is a spiritual key of the kingdom of heaven. Her purpose is the repentance of the sinner, so that she may again receive him into her fellowship."⁴⁷

45. Geerhardus Vos, The Teachings of Jesus Concerning The Kingdom and the Church (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1958), p. 88.

46. See R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 69–70, for a discussion of this point which relies on Vos.

47. Engelsma, "Jewish Dreams," op. cit., p. 175.

This logically irrelevant comment deflects the reader's attention from the crucial judicial issue: the function of civil sanctions in a Christian commonwealth.⁴⁸ No author in the Reconstructionist camp has suggested or implied that the institutional church has the authority to impose civil sanctions.⁴⁹ The issue of criminal sanctions is a state matter. It is here that Christians, as Christians, are required by God to suggest explicitly biblical definitions of crime. But Rev. Engelsma had already ruled out any appeal to the Mosaic law as a possible standard for definitions of crime. Why? He offered no exegetical or hermeneutical reasons; he just did not like the Mosaic law.

Notice: if we substitute the words "sexual molestation of children" or "murder" or any other crime for "adultery" and "homosexuality," Rev. Engelsma's subtle shift from a discussion of Mosaic civil sanctions (supposedly annulled in our era) to ecclesiastical excommunication (always open to removal upon repentance) would strip Christians of the biblical authority to call for biblically defined state sanctions against crime. The twin issues here are definition and sanctions. Definitions of criminal behavior and the appropriate legal sanctions are found in the Mosaic law. But Rev. Engelsma rejected the Mosaic law. His theological position leads, step by step, to the necessary acceptance by Christians of humanist definitions of crime. His open and defiant rejection of the Mosaic law and its civil sanctions in principle delivers Christians into the tender mercies of covenant-breaking man, which is exactly where Rev. Engelsma says Calvinism teaches that we must be until Christ comes again. For those of us who think that we are not morally obligated or eschatologically condemned to such a state of affairs, Rev. Engelsma has a description: "heretics."

What is the kingdom of God? In this book and throughout my writings, I offer this simple definition: the civilization of God, i.e., Christendom. God's kingdom comprises redeemed hearts and redeemed institutions. It is neither exclusively spiritual nor exclusively material-social, neither exclusively eternal nor exclusively temporal. The kingdom of God is paralleled by the kingdom of Satan. What are the former's boundaries? Wherever sin presently operates, there Christians should seek to extend the boundaries of the kingdom of God. Its definitive boundaries are the whole creation. "And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth" (Matt. 28:18). Its operational boundaries are being extended through time, but not in a straight line. Territory is gained; then it gets surrendered. The question is: Can the whole world be subdued to God's glory? Not perfectly, but progressively, the postmillennialist says. Not in history, the amillennialist says. Only after Jesus comes with His angels to rule the earth in person, the premillennialist says.

48. Kenneth L. Gentry, "Civil Sanctions in the New Testament," in Theonomy: An Informed Response, ed. Gary North (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/gntheon>)

49. Gentry, "Church Sanctions in the Epistle to the Hebrews," ibid., ch. 7.

The pessimillennialist, whether premillennial or amillennial, resists my definition of the kingdom, for it extends long-abandoned and long-denied areas of responsibility to Christians. It announces the need for comprehensive evangelism as part of God's mandated program of comprehensive redemption.⁵⁰ Pessimillennialists seek to escape these added kingdom responsibilities. It is all that the pietistic theologian can do to maintain biblical relevance inside the narrow confines of the Christian ghetto. Defending the Bible's relevance in the frightening world outside this ghetto is more than he chooses to bear.

3. Orwellian Newspeak

Rev. Engelsma's eschatology denies the transforming power of the gospel in history. It does not present Christianity a world-transforming, evangelizing, spiritual leaven (Matt. 13:33). It implies that the presence of the Holy Spirit will not transform our world. He saw Satan's earthly kingdom as possessing the only comprehensive, world-changing program in history. His implicitly humanistic social theory and his defeatist eschatology justify life in a defensive Christian ghetto. For Rev. Engelsma and theologians who share his views, the doctrine of Christ's bodily ascension in history to the right hand of God remains an irrelevant doctrine for social theory. In fact, these men deny the very possibility of Christian social theory, precisely because of their ghetto eschatology. They spend their careers rewriting the plain meaning of the Great Commission: the discipling of all nations.⁵¹ The Great Commission cannot mean this, Rev. Engelsma's theology implicitly insists; therefore, it must mean gathering the elect out of these nations, not placing them over these nations through successful evangelism. The promised victory of Christ is re-defined as Satan's permanent defeat of the Great Commission in history.

50. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C: "Comprehensive Redemption: A Theology for Social Action." (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

51. Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission.

Rev. Engelsma understood that Christians resist being labeled pessimists and retreatists, especially when they really are pessimists and retreatists. He therefore adopted the language of postmillennial optimism to describe the amillennial defeat of Christ's Great Commission in history. In this sense, he is a faithful practitioner of what George Orwell called "newspeak" in his novel, 1984. "Freedom is tyranny Peace is war." For Rev. Engelsma, defeat is victory. Christ supposedly has predestined that His church must fail in fulfilling the terms of the Great Commission. This failure must be regarded by Christians as a great victory, he believed, since the church has and will continue to participate in its cultural suicide mission.

Amillennialism believes that the gospel is now, will be, and always has been "successful" (we prefer to say, "victorious") on earth. Its triumph on earth is its accomplishment of the purposes of the risen Christ with the gospel. These purposes are the gathering of the elect out of all nations and thus the saving of the nations in them; the preservation of the elect in faith and holiness; the empowering of the elect believers and their children to live obedient lives to the Lord Christ in all spheres of earthly life; the building of the church; and the hardening of the reprobate. This victory is worldwide.⁵²

So, he said, Christ empowers His people "to live obedient lives to the Lord Christ in all spheres of earthly life." I ask: "What constitutes Christian obedience to Christ in the realm of politics?" Political reform? He answered emphatically, no; rather, we must retreat more deeply into our Christian ghetto, self-consciously and openly abandoning the entire social and political world to the devil. This is God's plan for the ages, he said. "But Satan does have 'complete control over the nations of the world.' Of course, he is not the almighty sovereign. The triune God is sovereign. But Satan controls the nations of the world as to their spiritual condition."⁵³ This is not merely a temporary condition that Christians must work to reverse. On the contrary, we must learn to live with it. "Until the personal return of Christ, the nations under the government of the kings of the earth make war against Him as He is present in His church by His Word."⁵⁴ The old phrase that

52. Engelsma, "An Open Letter to Gary North (Part One)," The Standard Bearer (March 1, 1996), p. 246.

53. Engelsma, "A Defense of (Reformed) Amillennialism. 3. Apostasy and Persecution," ibid. (May 1, 1995), p. 343.

54. Engelsma, "A Defense of (Reformed) Amillennialism. 2. Revelation 20," ibid. (April 15, 1995), p. 366. April 15 is tax-filing day in the United States: appropriate for Ben Franklin recommended as America's national slogan—"Resistance to tyrants is obedience to God!"—has been in effect reworked by Rev. Engelsma: "Resistance to tyrants is disobedience to God!" Our goal is to be let alone by the humanists in our little ghettos. Otherwise, our task is to serve as martyrs. There is no legitimate hope in Christian social transformation. We are little more than sheep for the slaughter. He calls this theology "victorious." Indeed, it is . . . for Satan.

Conclusion

The seventeenth century brought the beginnings of postmillennial optimism to Protestantism, and accompanying this postmillennialism, for the first time in man's history, came the ideal of long-term economic growth, compounded. This economic growth ideal eventually transformed England; it was in England that the Industrial Revolution began in the late eighteenth century. What was first believed to be possible in the seventeenth century began to take place a century later: long-term growth without permanent reversal.

Anglo-Scottish-American Presbyterianism was postmillennial until the late nineteenth century. Only with the spread of liberalism and pietism in the Northern Church and pietism in the Southern Church after 1900 did conservative American Presbyterianism move into pre-millennialism and amillennialism, when Scofield in the South and Westminster Seminary's mostly Dutch faculty in the North after 1936 replaced the postmillennial tradition of the Hodges, Warfield, Thornwell, Dabney, and Machen. But all of them, on the question of sanctions, agreed with the Anabaptists: God does not bring predictable corporate sanctions in history in terms of societies' adherence to or defiance of His Bible-revealed law. They were right-wing Enlightenment Whig humanists on the question of civil oaths.⁵⁵

To maintain such a Whig worldview, you must abandon the Book of Numbers. The Book of Numbers is the Pentateuch's book of sanctions. The refusal of the Israelites of the exodus generation to impose negative military sanctions against Canaan brought God's negative sanctions against them: death in the wilderness. This indicates that sanctions are an inescapable concept. It is never a question of sanctions vs. no sanctions. It is always a question of whose sanctions. As

Dr. Engelsma's tirade against all Christian political reform.

55. Gary North, Crossed Fingers: How the Liberals Captured the Presbyterian Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1996). (<http://bit.ly/gncrossed>)

Lenin so graphically put it, “Who, whom?” There is no escape from this question in eternity; there is also no escape from it in history, as the exodus generation learned to their great discomfort.

INTRODUCTION

Behold, the days come, saith the LORD, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah: Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day that I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt; which my covenant they brake, although I was an husband unto them, saith the LORD (Jer. 31:31–32).

Harden not your heart, as in the provocation, and as in the day of temptation in the wilderness: When your fathers tempted me, proved me, and saw my work. Forty years long was I grieved with this generation, and said, It is a people that do err in their heart, and they have not known my ways: Unto whom I sware in my wrath that they should not enter into my rest (Ps. 95:8–11).

The Psalmist offers as a warning the Israelites' wilderness experience, which is the central focus of the Book of Numbers. The wilderness experience was a curse: a negative sanction. This curse was announced in God's wrathful oath that the exodus generation would not inherit the Promised Land. They would die in the wilderness. Thus, what might have been a temporary transition period in the lives of the exodus generation became their lifetime experience. The Promised Land was associated with rest from their labors. Israel would not gain this rest during their lifetimes. "So I sware in my wrath, They shall not enter into my rest."

This passage offers important information for a correct assessment of the primary theme of the Book of Numbers: oath/sanctions. This theme is point four of the biblical covenant model.¹ The Book of Numbers is the Pentateuch's book of sanctions. Had the exodus generation been faithful to God, this book would have been the book of conquest: the victory of Israel (positive sanctions) over Canaan (negative sanctions). Instead, it is the book which chronicles Israel's rebellion against

1. Ray Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

God through rebellion against Moses, and of God's negative sanctions imposed in response to their rebellion.

Actually, this is an overstatement. Numbers does not chronicle most of the wilderness period. It chronicles about four years: two at the beginning of the wandering and two at the end.² It provides historical information on the reasons for God's imposition of corporate negative sanctions on the exodus generation (1–17); then it provides more historical information regarding the removal of these sanctions from their children, (21–36). Two chapters are devoted to certain priestly laws (18, 19). The central passage is chapter 20, which records the death of Miriam, the sin of Moses in striking the rock, God's judgment against Moses—he shall not enter the land—and Aaron's death. This marks a transition: from wrath to grace for Israel.

Numbers reveals the covenantal basis of historical progress: positive sanctions for covenant-keeping and negative sanctions for covenant-breaking. This covenantal cause-and-effect relationship serves as the foundation of the theory of economic growth. Profits (positive sanctions for accurate forecasting),³ wages, and interest-rent⁴ can be invested. If these investments are based on accurate forecasts of the future, and if they are implemented on a cost-effective basis, they produce an expansion of capital, which is a tool of dominion. With greater capital, more of the earth can be brought under mankind's dominion. The positive feedback of compound growth, if extended over time, becomes the basis of economic transformation and the conquest of nature, or as economic historian John U. Nef put it, the conquest of the material world.⁵ We conclude that one of the foundations of mankind's fulfillment of the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:26–28) is long-term economic growth. Without the possibility of reinvested earnings and the growth of capital—above all, accurate information and the social means of implementing it—there would be no way for mankind to extend God's kingdom across the face of the earth, transforming

2. R. K. Harrison, Numbers: An Exegetical Commentary (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker, 1992), p. 431.

3. Frank H. Knight, Risk, Uncertainty and Profit (Boston: HoughtonMifflin, 1921). (<http://bit.ly/KnightRUP>)

4. Rent is another word for interest. It arises from the same phenomenon: the discount which all men apply always in the present to the value of expected future income. See Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. 19. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>) nature to reflect the covenantal, hierarchical rule of God in history through His ordained agent, man.

5. John U. Nef, The Conquest of the Material World: Essays on the Coming of Industrialism (Cleveland, Ohio: Meridian, [1964] 1967).

The idea of an “unspoiled nature” that has not been influenced by man and reshaped by man in terms of man’s desires and needs is an anti-biblical concept. God made it plain to Israel: better the rule of covenant-breaking Canaanites than the rule of nature. “And I will send hornets before thee, which shall drive out the Hivite, the Canaanite, and the Hittite, from before thee. I will not drive them out from before thee in one year; lest the land become desolate, and the beast of the field multiply against thee. By little and little I will drive them out from before thee, until thou be increased, and inherit the land” (Ex. 23:28–30). In other words, God’s negative sanctions against Canaan were to be delayed so that the land would not fall under the negative sanctions of the animals. The reappearance of autonomous nature was regarded by God as being a more fearful negative sanction against the land than continuing dominion by covenant-breaking mankind.

The modern environmental movement denies this view of nature by elevating the supposed needs of impersonal, autonomous nature over the goals of man.⁶ Such a view of nature is pagan to the core. Increasingly, environmentalism has become pantheistic and even occult: earth as “Gaia”—a living spirit.⁷

A. The Covenantal Structure of the Exodus-Wilderness Books

The Book of Exodus presents the story of God’s deliverance of the Israelites. The true king delivered them out of their former bondage to a false king. God intervened in history to demonstrate His power in history. “For I will at this time send all my plagues upon thine heart, and upon thy servants, and upon thy people; that thou mayest know that there is none like me in all the earth. For now I will stretch out my hand, that I may smite thee and thy people with pestilence; and thou shalt be cut off from the earth. And in very deed for this cause have I

6. A manifesto of such a view of autonomous nature is Bill McKibben’s book, The End of Nature (New York: Random House, 1989).

7. Even when cloaked in scientific terminology, any attempt to revive the name of the Greek goddess Gaia in relation to “mother nature” is indicative of an anti-biblical religious impulse. See Gaia: An Atlas of Planet Management, ed. Norman Myers (New York: Doubleday/Anchor, 1984); The Gaia Peace Atlas: Survival into the Third Millennium, ed. Frank Barnaby (New York: Doubleday, 1988). For a detailed critique of the politics and religion of environmentalism, see Michael S. Coffman, Saviors of the Earth? (Chicago: Northfield Publishing, 1994).

raised thee up, for to shew in thee my power; and that my name may be declared throughout all the earth" (Ex. 9:14–16). This is point two of the biblical covenant model: hierarchy.⁸ The evidence of God's power was His ability to impose negative sanctions on Pharaoh and those whom he represented. The deliverance of Israel began with sanctions that led to a transfer of inheritance. "And the LORD gave the people favour in the sight of the Egyptians, so that they lent unto them such things as they required. And they spoiled the Egyptians" (Ex. 12:36). This structure of redemption in history was to serve as a model for the exodus generation and all succeeding generations. Inheritance and disinheritance are linked by sanctions: positive for the inheritors, negative for the disinherited.

From Exodus we move to Leviticus: the book of holiness, where the laws of holiness appear. This is point three of the biblical covenant model: ethics.⁹ The goal of God's deliverance is the restoration of covenantal obedience on the part of those delivered. This message was to become part of the Passover's ritual, an opportunity to teach respect for God's law to each successive generation. "Then thou shalt say unto thy son, We were Pharaoh's bondmen in Egypt; and the LORD brought us out of Egypt with a mighty hand: And the LORD shewed signs and wonders, great and sore, upon Egypt, upon Pharaoh, and upon all his household, before our eyes: And he brought US out from thence, that he might bring us in, to give us the land which he swore unto our fathers. And the LORD commanded us to do all these statutes, to fear the LORD our God, for our good always, that he might preserve us alive, as it is at this day. And it shall be our righteousness, if we observe to do all these commandments before the LORD our God, as he hath commanded us" (Deut. 6:21–25).

The Book of Numbers is clearly concerned with point four of the covenant model: sanctions. The Israelites repeatedly rebelled against Moses in the wilderness. Moses was God's representative. God therefore repeatedly brought corporate negative sanctions against the generation of the exodus. Their rebellion ultimately cost them their inheritance. Godly inheritance—point five¹⁰—is based on faithfulness to the stipulations of the covenant. The sons of the rebellious generation lawfully claimed the inheritance. The Epistle to the Hebrews extends the theme of the Psalmist by describing this inheritance in terms of rest.

8. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 2.

9. Ibid., ch. 3.

10. Ibid., ch. 5.

“But with whom was he grieved forty years? was it not with them that had sinned, whose carcasses fell in the wilderness? And to whom swore he that they should not enter into his rest, but to them that believed not? So we see that they could not enter in because of unbelief” (Heb. 3:17–19). The transfer of the right of inheritance was based on sanctions: negative against the generation of the exodus, positive for the generation of the conquest. The actual transfer was also based on sanctions: positive for the Israelites, negative against the Canaanites. The preliminary phase of this transfer began in Numbers 21: the disinheritation of King Arad.

B. From Point Four to Point Five

The Book of Numbers has relatively little to say about the details of economics, at least when compared to the other four books of the Pentateuch. Numbers is concerned with sanctions, but always in terms of the promised inheritance. The main sanctions the book discusses are military and liturgical. The book begins with a numbering of the people, which was in fact a mustering of God’s holy army. Excluded from this initial mustering was the tribe of Levi. This tribe was the priestly tribe, i.e., the tribe that was in charge of the sacrificial system. The sacrificial system was a system of sanctions.

The economic issues dealt with in the Book of Numbers mainly have to do with the distribution of the spoils of war. Military spoils were an important topic because Israel was preparing for the conquest of Canaan. The military victory of Israel would constitute the disinheritation of Canaan’s nations. That is, the disinheritation of Canaan by Israel was to be the basis of Israel’s inheritance. The sanctions were simultaneously positive and negative. This God-mandated disinheritation would be an extension of what Israel had already experienced in Egypt. God’s disinheritation of Egypt’s firstborn sons had been the historical basis of Israel’s initial inheritance: “Speak now in the ears of the people, and let every man borrow of his neighbour, and every woman of her neighbour, jewels of silver, and jewels of gold” (Ex. 11:2). The Egyptians were ready to surrender what would have been the inheritance of the firstborn because of the trauma of the final plague.

The promise of military spoils was designed to motivate the Israelites to greater fervor (Num. 32:17–18; Josh. 17:13–18). The promise of victory¹¹ was insufficient to motivate the exodus generation. The Book

11. “By little and little I will drive them out from before thee, until thou be inof Numbers provides a grim history of that generation. The book's Hebrew title is bemidbar, "in the wilderness": the fourth word in the first verse.¹² Israel's wilderness experience was the product of Israel's refusal to believe God, obey God, and become the sanctions-bringing agent of God. The long-promised inheritance began only when all the members of the exodus generation except Moses had died (Num. 20). At that point, the conquest generation began the process of disinheritance through conquest on the wilderness side of the Jordan River (Num. 21).

C. The Promised Land

The promise given to Abraham was that in the fourth generation after the descent into Egypt, Israel would conquer the inhabitants of Canaan (Gen. 15:16). This promise was conditional: the Israelites had to remain a people. The visible covenantal mark of this unity was circumcision. The failure of the Israelites of the exodus generation to circumcise their sons required the mass circumcision of Israel at Gilgal after they had crossed the Jordan (Josh. 5:5). Israel had to experience the negative sanction of shed blood before the nation could lawfully shed the blood of the Canaanites who occupied the Promised Land. The negative sanction of circumcision preceded the negative sanction of disinheriting Canaan militarily. Military disinheritance, in turn, had to precede the positive sanction of national inheritance: "But we ourselves will go ready armed before the children of Israel, until we have brought them unto their place: and our little ones shall dwell in the fenced cities because of the inhabitants of the land. We will not return unto our houses, until the children of Israel have inherited every man his inheritance" (Num. 32:17–18).

This should alert us to the two-fold nature of covenantal sanctions: positive and negative. It should also alert us to the two-fold nature of covenantal inheritance: inheritance through disinheritance.

The exodus generation wanted their inheritance without the obligation of disinheriting others. They wanted the benefits of the covenant without the costs: circumcision, obedience, and risk. They died in the wilderness because they refused to accept the risk of negative sanctions. Because they feared death more than they desired the inheritcreased, and inherit the land" (Ex. 23:30).

12. Timothy R. Ashley, The Book of Numbers (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1993), p. 1.

ance on God's terms, God gave them death without the inheritance. They sought God's positive sanctions apart from the threat of negative sanctions. This had been Adam's desire, too: to be as God without the threat of death. The result in both cases was death.

D. Military Sanctions

The Book of Numbers has less to say about economics, because it is concerned with military sanctions. In war, the winners gain victory at the expense of the losers. The winners gain spoils at the expense of the losers. This is what economists call a zero-sum game. There is no increase in total wealth; the gains of the winners are paid for by the losers. The free market allows mutual benefits through voluntary exchange. Each party to a transaction seeks to better himself by exchanging one set of circumstances for another. Market exchange is not based on the military principle of "beggar thy neighbor." It is based on the principle of mutual benefit.¹³ Because Canaan was to be placed under God's total ban—hormah—Israel's inheritance had to be based on violence: specifically, military conquest. The mandated process of inheritance could not be a market process. There had to be a forcible disinheritance. Canaanites were not to gain by Israel's presence in the land. They were not to be allowed to enter into a mutually profitable economic relationship with Israel. This is why the Book of Numbers is not much concerned with economics. Its focus is military sanctions: a system of "winner take all." Israel was not to expand its borders through conquest after the Canaanites had been expropriated. The boundaries of the Promised Land were fixed by the original distribution of land. The sacrificial system prevented any extensive growth in 13. An exception is a futures contract, in which two parties agree with each other either to buy or sell a specified quantity of goods in the future at a fixed price. Whatever profit one party gains is supplied by the other party. The benefit to each party is the freedom of each to affirm his assessment of the economic future by means of an investment tied to that assessment. There are also benefits for the society in general: the best assessments of participants with capital are brought to bear on pricing scarce resources. The presence of the various futures markets brings valuable information into play in the economy. Prices respond faster to the expected conditions of supply and demand. That is, the most accurate information is assimilated faster into the economy by means of the price system. This information transfer costs nothing to the vast majority of the participants in the economy. These costs are born by the participants in the futures markets. What is a zero sum game for the two parties to the contract has positive benefits for the economy as a social system. The futures market when considered in the context of society's quest for better information at low prices, is not a zero sum game.

Israel's geography, since the men of Israel who dwelt in the land had to walk to a central location three times a year, minimum, in order to participate in the national feasts and sacrifices. Violence was not to become the basis of wealth creation in Israel. The military conquest of Canaan was to be a one-time event.

E. A Fool in His Folly

Martin Noth, who died as he was completing his commentary on Numbers, was (and remains) one of the most respected academic commentators on the Old Testament. Yet any normal person who picks up his Numbers commentary and reads two pages will think to himself: "This book is utterly incoherent. No one in his right mind would waste his life writing something as useless as this. Noth must have been a German." Indeed, he was. He was a German's German: enormously learned, enormously liberal, and enormously unreadable. His commentary on Numbers does not bother with the mundane task of explaining what any passage means. Instead, it goes on and on about which traditions or late-date authors' interpolations found expression in Numbers, producing a definitively chaotic book. The Book of Numbers is a jumble without any integrating theme, Noth argued, because of these later insertions. Noth wrote:

From the point of view of its contents, the book lacks unity, and it is difficult to see any pattern in its construction.¹⁴

There can be no question of the unity of the book of Numbers, nor of its originating from the hand of a single author. This is already clear from the confusion and lack of order in its contents.¹⁵

Numbers participates only marginally in the great themes of the Pentateuchal tradition.¹⁶

Martin Noth was a liberal higher critic who denied that the Pentateuch is the inspired, authoritative, morally binding word of God. Put more biblically, Martin Noth was a fool. "The wise in heart will receive commandments: but a prating fool shall fall" (Prov. 10:8). "He that trusteth in his own heart is a fool: but whoso walketh wisely, he shall be delivered" (Prov. 28:26). He adopted and applied the hermeneutic of higher criticism, namely, that many people wrote the Pentateuch a millennium after it says it was written. He invoked the evidence offered by higher criticism: the alleged chaos of the Pentateuchal texts. Then he assured his readers that Numbers is incoherent and without unity. But his conclusion had nothing to do with Numbers; it had everything to do with Noth's blindness. Noth and his academic peers are blind.

14. Martin Noth, Numbers: A Commentary (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1968), p. 1.

15. Ibid., p. 4.

16. Ibid., p. 5.

And in that day shall the deaf hear the words of the book, and the eyes of the blind shall see out of obscurity, and out of darkness (Isa. 29:18).

His watchmen are blind: they are all ignorant, they are all dumb dogs, they cannot bark; sleeping, lying down, loving to slumber (Isa. 56:10).

Let them alone: they be blind leaders of the blind. And if the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch (Matt. 15:14).

Contrary to Noth, the Book of Numbers is integral to the Pentateuch, and its overriding theme reflects this: sanctions. The book is placed exactly where it should be: book four, which corresponds to point four of the biblical covenant model. Had Noth understood the covenant, respected it, and paid attention to it, he might not have concluded that Numbers possesses no unity and "participates only marginally in the great themes of the Pentateuchal tradition." But Noth was a fool who did not heed Solomon's counsel: "Even a fool, when he holdeth his peace, is counted wise: and he that shutteth his lips is esteemed a man of understanding" (Prov. 17:28) He went into print to be hailed around the academic world by less notable fools who have shared his hermeneutic.

What is disheartening is to read a supposedly conservative commentator—a Dutchman who, like so many Dutch theologians, feels compelled to imitate German scholarship—who spouts the same Party Line: "... Numbers is not a literary unit but acquired its present form over a period of time."¹⁷ Or Timothy Ashley, who did his best to avoid the most blatant theses of the higher critics, especially the incoherent-text theory, who wrote: "Moses may be seen as having a key role in the origin of some of the material in Numbers, though we have no way of knowing how much of it goes back to him."¹⁸ I suggest this percentage of the Book of Numbers that was written by Moses: one hundred.

17. A. Noordtjij, Numbers (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan, 1983), p. 13.

18. Ashley, Numbers, p. 7.

“And Moses wrote their goings out according to their journeys by the commandment of the LORD: and these are their journeys according to their goings out” (Num. 33:2).

Conclusion

The Book of Numbers, book four in the Pentateuch, conforms to point four of the biblical covenant model: oath/sanctions. The message of the book is clear: when covenant-keepers rebel against God in history, the blessings—positive sanctions—associated judicially with covenantal faithfulness will be removed; God’s negative corporate sanctions will be imposed. This does not mean that the heirs of covenant-keepers are permanently disinherited. On the contrary, their heirs will surely inherit. The negative corporate sanctions are not permanent down through the generations. The promise will be fulfilled. The structure of the covenant cannot be broken. “For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth. For yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be: yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall not be. But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace” (Ps. 37:9–11).

The New Covenant in no way reverses this structure of inheritance. On the contrary the New Covenant reaffirms it. “Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth” (Matt. 5:5). The New Covenant was marked by a transfer of inheritance from Israel to the church. “Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof” (Matt. 21 : 43). This transfer was visibly imposed by God through Rome’s destruction of the temple in A.D. 70.¹⁹

The Book of Numbers has stood as a warning down through the ages: the basis of covenantal inheritance is corporate covenant-keeping. Numbers calls on men and nations to repent, to turn back to God in search of the standards of righteousness. If God was willing to disinherit the exodus generation because of their constant complaining and their lack of courage, how much more should the spiritual heirs of the Canaanites take heed!

19. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

1

MUSTERING THE ARMY OF GOD

And the LORD spake unto Moses in the wilderness of Sinai, in the tabernacle of the congregation, on the first day of the second month, in the second year after they were come out of the land of Egypt, saying, Take ye the sum of all the congregation of the children of Israel, after their families, by the house of their fathers, with the number of their names, every male by their polls; From twenty years old and upward, all that are able to go forth to war in Israel: thou and Aaron shall number them by their armies. And with you there shall be a man of every tribe; every one head of the house of his fathers (Num. 1:1–4).

The theocentric issue here is God as the sanctions-bringer. God told Moses to number the fighting men of Israel. This message came to Moses in the wilderness. “In the wilderness” (bemidbar) was the original Hebrew title of the fourth book of the Pentateuch. The title of this book in the Septuagint, the Greek translation of the Hebrew Scriptures (275 to 100 B.C.), was Arithmoi,¹ from which we get the English word, arithmetic. The English title, Numbers, is related to arithmoi. The book begins with God’s command to number the people. This was a military numbering, i.e. a mustering of troops.² Every man above age 19 was mustered, even though some were physically unfit for duty, e.g., the aged. The principle here was that the army of Israel was a holy army of all the men of the nation. Those who could not fight were represented by those who could. This was analogous to the distinction between front-line troops and those on duty far from the battlefield. All were in the army, but some did the fighting. All were “in uniform,” but not all carried weapons. All were under the chain of command.

What may seem astounding in today’s world of bureaucratic delays, Moses and Aaron assembled the congregation, and the designated tribal leaders then mustered the entire nation, on the same day that God ordered the mustering: the first day of the second month. "And they assembled all the congregation together on the first day of the second month, and they declared their pedigrees after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, by their polls" (Num. 1:18).³ That was a remarkable chain of command.

1. Jacob Milgrom, The JPS Torah Commentary: Numbers (New York: Jewish Publication Society, 1990), p. xi.

2. Milgrom, Excursus 2, “The Census and Its Totals,” ibid., p. 336.

The Israelites had departed from Egypt a little over a year earlier: on the fifteenth day of the first month, the day after Passover (Ex. 12:18). Exactly one month later, they arrived in the wilderness at Sin (Ex. 16:1). In the third month, they came to Sinai (Ex. 19:1).⁴ There they ratified their national covenant with God. God recounted verbally what He had done for them in delivering them from Egypt; then He demanded an oath of obedience.

Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself. Now therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people: for all the earth is mine: And ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation. These are the words which thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel. And Moses came and called for the elders of the people, and laid before their faces all these words which the LORD commanded him. And all the people answered together, and said, All that the LORD hath spoken we will do. And Moses returned the words of the people unto the LORD (Ex. 19:4–8).

God had imposed negative corporate sanctions on Egypt. This was the basis of the Israelites' deliverance. There was a message here: negative corporate sanctions are the concomitant of positive corporate sanctions in the struggle for covenantal supremacy in history. In this sense, the struggle is analogous to a military struggle, not a free market transaction in which both parties benefit. God's grace preceded His law. Now He called the nation to obedience. He set forth a conditional promise: if they obeyed Him, He would make them a kingdom of

3. Milgrom cited Numbers 10:11 in his attempt to prove that it took 20 days. "And it came to pass on the twentieth day of the second month, in the second year, that the cloud was taken up from off the tabernacle of the testimony." I see no connection between this event and the mustering. Ibid., p. 337,

4. Jewish tradition says that this was 50 days after the Passover, i.e., on the very first day of Pentecost, which was formalized ritually in Mosaic Israel as the firstfruits feast. Alfred Edersheim, The Temple: Its Ministry and Services As They Were in the Time of Jesus Christ (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, [1874] 1983), p. 261.

priests. Moses informed the elders and the people of what God had said, and they swore allegiance to Him. The Book of Numbers is a history of how they repeatedly broke their agreement, and the consequences thereof.

A. The Exodus Numbering

Approximately nine months after this corporate act of national covenant renewal, Israel had completed the construction of the tabernacle: “And it came to pass in the first month in the second year, on the first day of the month, that the tabernacle was reared up” (Ex. 40:17).⁵ We are not told how long it took them to construct the tabernacle, although it could not have been much more than three months. Construction did not begin until after Moses returned with the second writing of the tables of the law (Ex. 34:29). He had been on Mt. Sinai the first time for 40 days (Ex. 24:18) and 40 days the second time (Ex. 34:28). In between was another 40-day period in which he fasted without water. This fast took place after he cast down the original tablets of the law (Deut. 9:18).⁶ We are not told how much time separated his second return from Sinai and the beginning of construction, but it seems to have been brief. The nation’s voluntary offering for the construction of the tabernacle followed his second return (Ex. 35). Then construction began (Ex. 36). Subtracting 120 days (40 X 3 = 6 months) from nine months leaves three months for the construction of the tabernacle.

1. Atonement

To build the tabernacle, the people had donated gold and silver that they had taken from the Egyptians (Ex. 33:4–6; 38:24–25). This voluntary mass donation was accompanied by a mustering of Israel: “A bekah for every man, that is, half a shekel, after the shekel of the sanctuary, for everyone that went to be numbered, from twenty years old and upward, for six hundred thousand and three thousand and five hundred and fifty men” (Ex. 38:26).

Mustering was an aspect of priestly atonement (Ex. 30:15). The na-

5. In 1611, “reared” referred to buildings, while “raised” referred to children (Gen. 38:8; Ex. 9:16; Josh 5:7). By 1900, American grammar had reversed the usage. Hardly anyone except English teachers in the United States says “reared” these days.

6. Moses went without food and water for a total of 120 days, or four months: on Sinai the first time (Deut. 9:9), after the golden calf incident (Deut. 9:18), and on Sinai the second time (Ex. 34:28).

tion was supposed to be numbered—literally: mustered—prior to holy warfare. There is an element of negative sanctions associated with the Hebrew word for numbering used here: paqad. It does not mean mere counting.⁷ “When thou takest the sum [count] of the children of Israel after their number [paqad] , then shall they give every man a ransom for his soul unto the LORD, when thou numberest [paqad] them; that there be no plague among them, when thou numberest them” (Ex. 30:12). The same word is sometimes translated as visit. “Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them: for I the LORD thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me” (Ex. 20:5). This visitation implies negative sanctions: “Thus saith the LORD unto this people, Thus have they loved to wander, they have not refrained their feet, therefore the LORD doth not accept them; he will now remember their iniquity, and visit [paqad] their sins” (Isa. 14:10). The word can mean punish. “And I will punish [paqad] the world for their evil, and the wicked for their iniquity; and I will cause the arrogancy of the proud to cease, and will lay low the haughtiness of the terrible” (Isa. 13:11).

The nation faced no military enemy at the time of the Exodus mustering. No one is said to have ordered this mustering, yet the nation voluntarily consented to it: “And the silver of them that were mustered of the congregation was an hundred talents, and a thousand seven hundred and threescore and fifteen shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary: A bekah for every man, that is, half a shekel, after the shekel of the sanctuary, for everyone that went to be numbered, from twenty years old and upward, for six hundred thousand and three thousand and five hundred and fifty men” (Ex. 38:25–26). This corresponded to the required payment of half a shekel of silver per man (Ex. 30:14–15). This was in addition to their voluntary offerings of gold and brass, which they brought in such abundance that God ordered Moses to tell them to stop (Ex. 36:5–7).⁸ While the final accounting appears in Exodus 38, it was recorded here after the construction of the tabernacle had begun. The donations had come at the time of the mass presentation (Ex. 35:20–29). The same tally lists the gold (Ex. 38:24), yet this gold would not have been donated after God had told them to stop. So, the donations must have come in prior to the prohibition.

7. James B. Jordan, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), p. 227. (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>)

8. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 56.

These numbers reinforce the text's estimates of the size of the Israelite population. The Babylonian system of monetary units roughly paralleled the Israelite system. The Babylonians used a hexadecimal system: 60 shekels to a mina, 60 minas to a talent. The Israelite system was based on 50 shekels to the mina, 60 minas to the talent.⁹ The same system was still in force in the Israel of Christ's day.¹⁰ The scholars' estimate of the Israelite shekel as one-3,000th of a talent is derived from Exodus 38. Thus, to avoid relying heavily on circular logic, I argue only that this account provides a rough confirmation of size of the Israelite population. What can be said with confidence is that the monetary units of Israel and Babylon were similar, so the account of the money collected reinforces the picture of a large Israelite population. At 50 shekels per mina, there were 3000 shekels to the talent. The 100 talents of silver totalled 300,000 shekels, plus 1,775 additional shekels, or 301,775 shekels. Multiplied by two, this totals 603,550, the number of those mustered. Conceivably, these estimates could have been inserted by a later forger, but there is internal consistency of the account. Had there been an inconsistency, the higher critics would have pounced on it centuries ago.

God had told Moses: "Speak unto the children of Israel, that they bring me an offering: of every man that giveth it willingly with his heart ye shall take my offering. And this is the offering which ye shall take of them; gold, and silver, and brass" (Ex. 25:2–3). He did not tell Moses to muster them. The tally in Exodus 38 specifies that they gave silver in terms of the mustering requirements. So, with respect to silver, they donated in terms of the mustering requirement; with respect to gold and brass, there were no required amounts. The gold and brass constituted their voluntary excessive giving.

As we learn from the Book of Numbers, every adult fighting man of Israel must have participated in this first mustering, since exactly the same number of men were mustered at this time as were mustered about four months later: 603,550 (Num. 1:46).¹¹ So, no eligible male re-

9. "Money," A Dictionary of the Bible, ed. James Hastings, 5 vols. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1900), vol. III, p. 419; "Weights and Measures," The International Standard Bible Encyclopaedia, ed. James Orr, 5 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, [1929] 1943), vol. V, p. 3080.

10. Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews, XIV:vii:1, III:viii:10; cited in "Money," idem.

11. If the Exodus mustering took place immediately before the beginning of the tabernacle's construction, then it took no more than three months for the tabernacle to be completed. The tabernacle was completed on the first day of the first month of fused to participate. This identical number indicates that Israel was in a condition of zero population growth: as many men had entered the ranks of those eligible to be mustered as those who had died.

Joshua and Caleb soon served as spies who entered Canaan (Num. 13:6, 8). This means that they had been mustered, since they were part of a military reconnaissance unit. Caleb was 40 years old at the time (Josh. 14:7). Toward the end of the conquest, he spoke of being 85 yet physically strong (Josh. 14:10–11). This strength was some sort of special miracle—an aspect of God’s promise to him (Num. 14:24)—or so he seemed to indicate. But he was not Moses’ age, who was 120 at the time of his death just before the conquest (Deut. 34:7), when Caleb was almost 80. He must have been in the generation that followed Moses. Surely Joshua was, for Joshua died an old man “a long time after that the LORD had given rest unto Israel from all their enemies” (Josh. 23:1). So, God’s promise to Caleb and Joshua should not be interpreted as having singled them out as unique survivors among Moses’ generation, but as survivors of the wilderness experience in general.

2. Why the Exodus Mustering

The mustering in Exodus was judicially unique: Israel faced no imminent military confrontation, and no judicial compulsion is mentioned in the text. The tabernacle was not uniquely associated with warfare, i.e., Israel in its judicial capacity as God’s holy army. Each man presented a half shekel of silver (Ex. 38:26). This silver had been required for making the implements of the tabernacle (Ex. 26:19, 25, 32; 27:17), and was so used (Ex. 38:27–31). Some of the offerings were voluntary (Ex. 25:2), but with respect to silver, the offerings were tied to the mustering. Why was the nation numbered?

Perhaps this first mustering had nothing to do with atonement. In such a case, they did not plan to bring exactly the amount of silver per person that God required whenever they made atonement at a mustering. This possibility seems farfetched. Why didn’t they bring more silver than what was required to make atonement? They brought so much wealth that God told Moses to tell them to stop. But with respect to silver, they brought exactly the amount required to make atone-the second year (Ex. 40:17). The second mustering (the first Numbers mustering) took place a month later: the first day of the second month of the second year (Num. 1:1,18).

ment.

For what action were they making atonement? This mass donation of money took place after the golden calf incident (Ex. 32). Perhaps the people were making retroactive atonement payments for themselves. They had gone to war with God. They had lost. The Levites had become the enforcing army of the Lord, killing 3,000 men (Ex. 32:28). This was what had changed Levi's judicial status from a family under a curse (Gen. 49:5-7)¹² to God's firstborn, priestly family (Num. 3:12); no other judicially relevant act on their part is mentioned. The text does not say that the golden calf incident was the cause of the mustering; the context only suggests that this was the case. All we know for sure is this: the half shekel paid at a mustering was atonement money. Atonement was a ransom or a judicial covering for some infraction. The most obvious infraction even remotely associated with war's bloodshed was the golden calf incident.

The number of men slain was not a large percentage of the total male population, if the Israelites numbered 600,000 fighting-age males: about one-half of one percent. But if the number of Israelites was a fraction of 600,000, the death toll was more significant. This point becomes important in the Appendix, where I discuss the possibility that the bulk of those mustered in Exodus 38 were adoptees out of the mixed multitude that had fled with Israel. If they were adopted after the sanctions were applied because of the golden calf incident, then the 3,000 deaths constituted a significant fraction of the Israelite nation. As I show in the Appendix, this conceivably may have been close to 10 percent of the adult male population.

B. Numbers' Two Musterings

God required Moses to muster the men of Israel twice in the wilderness: once at the beginning of the wilderness period and once at the end (Num. 26). There were three musterings: these two and the prior one in Exodus.¹³ The problem here is to discover a judicial link among the three events. I think it is associated with the shedding of man's blood.

The mandatory mustering in Numbers 1 took place just before the nation was ready to begin its march toward Canaan. Had they not

12. The cause was the illegitimate negative sanction of war that Levi and Simeon had imposed on the Shechemites after they had been circumcised (Gen. 34:25–30).

13. Gordon J. Wenham, Numbers: An Introduction and Commentary (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1981), pp. 57, 59.

sinned subsequently by refusing to listen to Joshua and Caleb (Num. 14), they would have begun the war of conquest in Canaan. Thus, the mustering in Numbers 1 was preparatory for war.

Mustering required the payment of atonement money (Ex. 30:15–16). No reason for the need for atonement is stated. Jordan believed that it was God's presence that mandated the payment.¹⁴ I would add that it was God's presence in His covenantal capacity as sanctions-bringer. When God is present in His office as sanctions-bringer, the unholy man is profane: a boundary violator.¹⁵ Prior to holy warfare, God approached the nation of Israel as the sanctions-bringer: positive and negative. "For the LORD thy God walketh in the midst of thy camp, to deliver thee, and to give up thine enemies before thee; therefore shall thy camp be holy: that he see no unclean thing in thee, and turn away from thee" (Deut. 23:14). God would then bring sanctions against whichever army was not holy. The payment of atonement money judicially set apart God's assembled army as the holy army. This is why the Israelites of Joshua's day had to be circumcised before they could begin the conquest (Josh. 5:5). They could not be covenantally holy inside the boundaries of the holy land apart from circumcision. God's presence in their midst in his capacity as sanctions-bringer would destroy them, just as the angel of the Lord had almost destroyed Moses' uncircumcised son Gershom when Moses brought him across the border into Egypt (Ex. 4:24–26).¹⁶

The second mustering came after a series of successful wars outside of Canaan (Num. 21). Why didn't God muster the nation prior to these wars? Because they were defensive wars. The Canaanites had initiated them. After the treachery of the Midianites, however, God told Moses to vex them (Num. 25:17). Then the mustering took place. The conquest of Midian and then Canaan were offensive wars for Israel. They were holy wars in God's name. They involved violating the national boundaries of societies that had been set apart by God for judgment.

14. Jordan, Law of the Covenant, pp. 228–29.

15. On the distinction between common and profane, see Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 6.

16. On the angel's attack on Gershom rather than Moses, see Gary North, "The Marriage Supper of the Lamb," Christianity and Civilization, 4 (1984), p. 220. See also George Bush, Notes on Exodus (Minneapolis, Minnesota: James & Klock, [1852] 1976), I, p. 67.

C. No Population Growth

One month after the tabernacle's completion, the size of Israel's militarily eligible male population was exactly the same as it had been approximately four months earlier at the Exodus mustering: 603,550 men (Ex. 38:26; Num. 1:46). This indicates that Israel's population had reached zero growth. Thirty-nine years later, God ordered another mustering. The population was essentially unchanged at this second compulsory mustering: 601,730 (Num. 26:51); so was the number of Levites (Num. 3:39:22,000; Num. 26:62:23,000). Israel suffered from zero population growth in the wilderness.

The approximately 600,000 fighting-age males in the first two musterings comprised two generations: Moses' and Joshua's. The conquest generation and their adult-age sons replaced the 600,000 men who had been over age 19 at the time of the first mustering. If the top two generations were 300,000 each (population replacement-rate mode), then a family of Joshua's generation produced on average one son and grandson age 20 or older by the time of the second Numbers mustering. But should we assume a stagnant population prior to the exodus? The textual evidence is against this: families with more than two children. If population was growing, then Joshua's generation was larger than Moses'. This growth process was reversed in the wilderness, where most Israelites had even smaller families than two children. The nation moved from grace to curse. Why?

The early chapters of the Book of Numbers record a series of complaints and rebellions on the part of the Israelites. They afflicted Moses with their murmuring. The exodus generation was continually looking backward longingly at Egypt, despite the fact that they had been in bondage there. They were a present-oriented people who looked to the past with nostalgia. They had short memories.

God had delivered them, not to dwell in the wilderness, but to dwell in Canaan. He expected them to be future-oriented. But these ex-slaves could not shake off their mental chains. They looked backward to their lives of bondage and saw only prosperity and security. They resented freedom because they resented responsibility. They were not an operational army; they were a psychologically dependent assembly.

God had to raise up a new army. He had to wait for the children of Joshua's generation and their children to mature. Joshua's generation had to learn patience. They would grow up in a wilderness, not an empire. They would have no illusions regarding the wonders of life in the wilderness. They would not look backward to Egypt, where they had lived only as children or not at all. They would look forward to Canaan.

The ex-slaves did not multiply in the wilderness. They stagnated. One by one, they died; one by one, they were replaced. The army of the Lord was not short on numbers; it was short on leadership, courage, and faith. Its failure was not based on its lack of size. God did not honor them by expanding the army's size, which would have retroactively affirmed the legitimacy of their fears in refusing to invade Canaan. The next generation would conquer the land with the same size army.

Population stagnation is a curse in the Bible, though not so great a curse as population reduction. There was a slight reduction in the wilderness era. The nation was under a curse. We could say that He placed the nation "on hold." The exodus generation would have to content themselves with being nomads rather than pilgrims. Pilgrims have a destination; nomads simply wander in circles. Only to the extent that members of the exodus generation could look forward covenantally to victory through their children could they become pilgrims. They had been told that they would die in the wilderness. To the extent that they were mentally bound to a time horizon no longer than their own lifetimes, they became nomads.

These nomads were not ready to fight a war with the Canaanites. Their pilgrim children would be. The pilgrim wants rest in the place of his dreams. His life's walk is linear even though he may wander in circles for a time. He has a goal, so the fact of his circular wandering is not a disaster. He knows that he will eventually break out of his familiar pattern.

The stagnation of Israel's population matched the stagnation of vision of the exodus generation. Present-oriented people discount the future at a higher interest rate than future-oriented people do. The present value of a future achievement is lower for a present-oriented person than for a future-oriented person. The estimated payoff for thrift and sacrifice in the present is lower. The present-oriented person wants immediate gratification. The conquest generation had no choice but to defer their gratification. They were under the authority of present-oriented people. Their deliverance was still in the future; their parents' deliverance had been in the past. In the interim, the nation stagnated.

For those members of the conquest generation who longed for deliverance from the stagnation of the wilderness, God's curse was real. But it offered hope. In the fourth generation, they would gain their promised inheritance. In the meantime, the governing principle of their existence was the army's rule: "Hurry up and wait."

Conclusion

The three musterings of Israel were military actions. They were aspects of holy warfare. The mustered Israelites had to pay the priests atonement money in preparation for the shedding of blood. This bloodshed was covenantal: an aspect of God's negative sanctions against covenant-breaking nations. The Exodus mustering probably was a retroactive payment for the Levites' sanctions in God's name and the nation's name against 3,000 representative Israelites for the golden calf. The first Numbers mustering was in preparation for the conquest of Canaan, which was postponed because of Israel's rebellion (Num. 14). The second Numbers mustering took place just before the holy war against Midian.

The conquest generation had to learn patience for 39 years. They had to learn about deferred gratification. They would conquer Canaan, but only after their parents and grandparents had died in the wilderness. Their inheritance would have to wait. This was the result of the present-oriented, fear-driven rebellion of the exodus generation. The army of the Lord was a defeated army psychologically. Until this changed through generational attrition and replacement, the holy army wandered in the wilderness.

2

MILITARY PLANNING VS. CENTRAL PLANNING

Take ye the sum of all the congregation of the children of Israel, after their families, by the house of their fathers, with the number of their names, every male by their polls; From twenty years old and upward, all that are able to go forth to war in Israel: thou and Aaron shall number them by their armies (Num. 1:2–3).

This commandment was theocentric. God was the military head of Israel. He gave them victories as well as defeats, as they would learn after their rejection of the testimony of Joshua and Caleb (Num. 14:45). He was in no need of a military census. Why did He require one? The first reason was that He delegates authority to creatures who are not omniscient. They must find substitutes for omniscience. Number is one of the most useful substitutes for comprehensive knowledge—an extraordinary tool.¹ Second, there was the matter of an atonement payment. This also required a census.

A. Church and State in Wartime

Man is not God. No numerical census will ever equal God's omniscience. No substitute for omniscience will ever approach God's omniscience as a statistical limit. No expenditure of economic resources in data-gathering will ever replace reliance on God's covenantal sanctions in history. The creature will remain a creature. The quest for omniscience is therefore an unholy quest. Omniscience is an illegitimate goal. This is one reason why God placed strict limits on mustering. It was not a normal event. It was done only prior to holy warfare, except for the instance of the mustering in Exodus 38, which may have been a retroactive atonement for the golden calf.

1. Eugene Wigner, "The Unreasonable Effectiveness of Mathematics in the Natural Sciences," Communications on Pure and Applied Mathematics, XIII (1960), pp. 1–14. (<http://bit.ly/WignerMath>). Wigner was a Nobel Prize-winning physicist.

God told Moses and Aaron to muster the entire adult male population, family by family. Aaron's presence was mandatory. Mustering in Mosaic Israel was an act preparatory to holy war. No holy war could be called without the consent of the high priest, for the Aaronic priests had to blow the silver trumpets that assembled the nation (Num. 10:2, 8). Blowing only one trumpet gathered the princes (v. 4). Both trumpets had to be blown to assemble the whole nation at the tabernacle (v. 3). This twin trumpet signal sounded the alarm. A second blowing of both trumpets by the priests launched the army on its march (vv. 5–6). Without the participation of the priests, no holy war could lawfully be launched. This gave the priesthood a veto over national military action. No military mustering was legal without their participation.

Moses was present in his capacity as a civil ruler. He was the representative of the nation in its judicial capacity. So, in the case of holy warfare, the supreme civil commander functioned in a priestly capacity, even though he was not a priest. We might call this quasi-priestly authority: legitimate power over life and death. The entire nation is at risk. In wartime, the senior military commander lawfully possesses such quasi-priestly authority. He does not possess it in peacetime, except in preparation for war.

The armies were tribal affairs, and under them, family affairs. This meant that warfare was intensely personal. If a section of the army was overrun, whole families would die, whole communities would be emptied of men. This happened in the American Civil War (1861–65), where the fighting-age male population of entire towns sometimes disappeared. Town regiments signed up as units and were kept as units throughout the war. This built a closeness of spirit, but it involved great risk to the community. Enlistment policies were changed in subsequent wars to prevent this. In World War II, brothers were allowed to enlist together, but when all five Sullivan brothers died on a sinking ship, the rule was changed. A modern army is far less personal, with senior officers required to rotate regularly through various commands. The bureaucratic impulse has replaced the personal impulse as warfare has become more rationalized. Such was not the case in Mosaic Israel. The localism of Mosaic Israel was reflected in their military formations.

The army was a federation. Each tribe supplied warriors. In mustering the armed forces, a tribe might refuse to participate, as was the case when Deborah called the army together to fight Sisera: several tribes refused to send anyone (Judg. 5:16–17).

B. Mustering and Atonement

There was an exemption in this tribal mustering: Levi. This was the priestly tribe. The rules governing tribal mustering seem to be in conflict. At first, God forbade Moses to number the Levites. “For the LORD had spoken unto Moses, saying, Only thou shalt not number the tribe of Levi, neither take the sum of them among the children of Israel” (Num. 1:48–49). “But the Levites were not numbered among the children of Israel; as the LORD commanded Moses” (Num. 2:33). God later told Moses to number them (Num. 3:15). “All that were numbered of the Levites, which Moses and Aaron numbered at the commandment of the LORD, throughout their families, all the males from a month old and upward, were twenty and two thousand” (Num. 3:39). Children were numbered. Why were the Levites numbered differently from the other tribes?

God gave this as His explanation for not mustering them: “But thou shalt appoint the Levites over the tabernacle of testimony, and over all the vessels thereof, and over all things that belong to it; they shall bear the tabernacle, and all the vessels thereof; and they shall minister unto it, and shall encamp round about the tabernacle” (Num. 1:50). They possessed a unique geographical responsibility; it was a capital crime for non-Levites² to approach the tabernacle while the Levites assembled and disassembled it whenever the nation moved (v. 51).

Furthermore, when the fighting men paid their half shekel at the time of their mustering, they paid it as atonement money (Ex. 30:15). This was an ecclesiastical payment. “And thou shalt take the atonement money of the children of Israel, and shalt appoint it for the service of the tabernacle of the congregation; that it may be a memorial unto the children of Israel before the LORD, to make an atonement for your souls” (Ex. 30:16). This money must have been paid to the tribe of Levi, for they alone served in the tabernacle. They did not pay atonement money; they received it. Thus, when they counted the money, they did not declare a shortfall when money from the tribe of Levi did not appear in the total. The mustering process referred to in Numbers 1 was related to the Levites’ collection of the atonement money: a half shekel per warrior. But the Levites were not to be mustered in this way; they did not owe the atonement money.

2. The Hebrew word is transliterated zoor. The same root is translated “strange” in the case of the strange fire offered by Nadab and Abihu (Num. 3:4). A stranger (zoor) was any person who could not lawfully cross an ecclesiastical boundary. “There shall no stranger [zoor] eat of the holy thing; a sojourner of the priest, or an hired servant, shall not eat of the holy thing” (Lev. 22:10). A hired servant could be an Israelite, yet he was kept away. The boundary around the priest’s table included even his married daughter, though not if she was no longer married and without a child. “But if the priest’s daughter be a widow, or divorced, and have no child, and is returned unto her father’s house, as in her youth, she shall eat of her father’s meat: but there shall no stranger [zoor] eat thereof” (Lev. 22:13). Her child made her part of her husband’s family, even though he was no longer her husband.

1. Banners and Battles

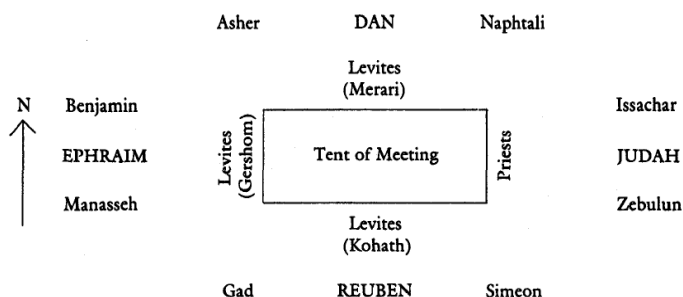

Each of the other tribes had a standard, meaning a military identification banner. The other tribes were required to pitch their tents around their respective banners (Num. 1:52). The Levites had no such standard around which to pitch their tents. “But the Levites shall pitch round about the tabernacle of testimony, that there be no wrath upon the congregation of the children of Israel: and the Levites shall keep the charge of the tabernacle of testimony” (v. 53).

The Hebrew word for standard is translated “banner” only once in the King James Version—oddly enough, in the Song of Solomon: “He brought me to the banqueting house, and his banner over me was love” (Song 2:4). This was meant to be hyperbolic: not a battle flag but a love flag. The banners are mentioned in Numbers 2 and 10, both cases when the Israelites marched. “On the west side shall be the standard of the camp of Ephraim according to their armies: and the captain of the sons of Ephraim shall be Elishama the son of Ammihud” (Num. 2:18). “In the first place went the standard of the camp of the children of Judah according to their armies: and over his host was Nahshon the son of Amminadab” (Num. 10:14). These identifying flags are common in infantry maneuvers. A general in the field can see from a high emplacement where his armies are located on the battlefield.

The Levites had no battle flag. They were not to be placed in the field as a separate tribe. Their job was to guard the tabernacle and the Ark of the Covenant.³ Their battle marker was the Ark of the Covenant. When the nation moved, it moved in military formation. The Levites carried the portable tabernacle and the Ark. They were guarded on all four sides by the other tribes. Military commanders knew exactly where the Levites were during battle: in the middle of the formation. James Jordan provided a diagram in Through New Eyes.⁴ This diagram is found in Wenham's commentary.⁵ It is reprinted exactly in Milgrom's commentary right down to its typography: which tribal names to place in capital letters.

3. Milgrom wrote: “The most important function of the Levites, one that invests their entire adult life, is to guard the sanctuary against encroachers. In fact, they are identified by this function—‘guardians of the tabernacle of the Lord’ (31:30, 47).” Jacob Milgrom, The JPS Torah Commentary: Numbers (New York: Jewish Publication Society, 1990), p. xl. Cf. Milgrom, p. 341.

(Jordan has revamped this; he now believes that the corners were symbolically the most important. He places the lead tribes there rather than the center.)

The Ark of the Covenant had to be separated from the other tribes by 2,000 cubits in Joshua's day (Josh. 3:4), or about 1,000 yards (914 meters). Numbers 2 describes the peacetime formation. Judah led it in wartime (Num. 10:14). The priests were protected by the other tribes; they in turn defended the tabernacle from enemies, including invaders from the other tribes. In other words, at the very center of the formation was the Ark of the Covenant, the dwelling place of God. This had to be protected by the nation, at the cost of their lives. The last defensive barrier was the tribe of Levi.

This meant that the Levites did not put themselves at risk as a tribe in the initial confrontation with the enemy. Only if the enemy broke through the lines did the Levites go into battle. From the point of view of military risk, the Levites were protected by the structure of the army's formation.

4. James B. Jordan, Through New Eyes: Developing a Biblical View of the World (Brentwood, Tennessee: Wolgemuth & Hyatt, 1988), p. 205. (<http://bit.ly/jjneweyes>)

5. Gordon J. Wenham, Numbers: An Introduction and Commentary (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity, 1981), p. 67.

6. Milgram, Numbers, p. 340.

2. Defending the Tabernacle

Because members of the other tribes could not approach the tabernacle when it was being moved by the Levites (Num. 1:51), they probably would have hesitated to pursue invaders who had broken through the lines and who were approaching the tabernacle. It is not said that God held non-Levites responsible for approaching the tabernacle as its would-be defenders, but this silence would have produced psychological hesitancy—often fatal to military defenders. In all likelihood, they were not allowed to approach the tabernacle in wartime, even for the sake of defending the Ark. The later example of Uzzah, who reached out to steady the Ark as it was being moved, indicates that this was the case: when he touched it, he was killed by God on the spot (II Sam. 6:6–7). So, once the outer lines were breached by the enemy, the Levites would have fought alone. This made them even more dependent on the other tribes. The Levites were warriors, but their task was different: to defend the tabernacle, not to defend the land.

A military commander has the obligation to estimate what his forces are. Mustering was a pre-war event. Because they were warriors with a defensive assignment, to protect the tabernacle, it was lawful for the Levites' commander to number them. The list of mustered tribes does not include the Levites in either instance in Numbers; this population figure is always given separately. "But the Levites after the tribe of their fathers were not numbered among them" (Num. 1:47). Moses and Aaron later numbered them (Num. 3:39). As the senior representative of the tribe, Aaron had the right to know the number of warriors under his command.

This does not mean that Israel's senior military commander possessed this authority over Levites. The Levites were not part of his forces. They could not be called into military service for the defense of the land. They were called into ecclesiastical service by the high priest to defend the tabernacle. They lawfully bore the sword, not as civil agents but as ecclesiastical agents. They were the anointed defenders of God's house.

The Levites were not the first line of military defense. They were at lower risk in battle. They did not pay atonement money. They seemed to have all the advantages. So, God imposed a disadvantage: they had no inheritance in the land. "At that time the LORD separated the tribe of Levi, to bear the ark of the covenant of the LORD, to stand before the LORD to minister unto him, and to bless in his name, unto this day. Wherefore Levi hath no part nor inheritance with his brethren; the LORD is his inheritance, according as the LORD thy God promised him" (Deut. 10:8–9). This disadvantage would have had the effect of reducing any murmuring against the Levites by those who were at greater risk, since the potential critics would inherit rural land.

3. Landed Inheritance

There was a relationship between ministering to God and landed inheritance. The Levites had no rural landed inheritance. Their immediate commitment was not to land but to God. They did not guard the land; they guarded the dwelling place of God. They were not to spend the bulk of their time improving the land. This is why they were entitled to the tithes of the other Israelites. "The priests the Levites, and all the tribe of Levi, shall have no part nor inheritance with Israel: they shall eat the offerings of the LORD made by fire, and his inheritance" (Deut. 18:1). The other tribes were guardians of the land; hence, they had a landed inheritance.

The Levites were numbered in the sense of merely counting them. They were not numbered in the sense of collecting atonement money from them. They were numbered as defenders of the tabernacle. They were not numbered as defenders of the land. They had no battle flag. They had no landed inheritance as a tribe. Grammatically, the numbering process was the same: mustering. Covenantally, there were two separate numbering processes: one for those who possessed a landed inheritance and who owed atonement money prior to national battle; the other for those who did not have a landed inheritance and did not owe atonement money.

If the payment of Exodus 30 had been a civil head tax, then there is no reason why the Levites should not have paid it, since it would have gone to the State. But it did not go to the State for civil purposes; it went to the Levites for the service of the tabernacle.⁷ The obligatory payment or non-payment of this money was central to the numbering

7. My target here is Rushdoony, who argues that the atonement money of Exodus 30 was in fact the only civil tax in Mosaic Israel. He argues specifically that the temple collection was a civil tax. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 281–82. For my previous rebuttal, see North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Pt. 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 58.

(counting) and yet non-numbering (civil mustering) of Levi.

Levites were citizens. They paid civil taxes, whatever these taxes were and however they were collected. Levites did not pay atonement money. They were not to inflict offensive military sanctions against Israel's enemies; rather, they were to inflict defensive ecclesiastical sanctions against invaders who might break through the lines of the other tribes. Their task was to keep boundary violators from profaning the sacred space of the tabernacle, whether Israelites or non-Israelites.

C. Citizenship and Military Service

Citizenship in Mosaic Israel was tribal. Each of the 12 non-priestly tribes was required to supply a representative to monitor the numbering process. The Levites were represented by Aaron. Each of the dozen representatives had to be the head of his father's household, i.e., the senior patriarch or most respected officer. "These were the renowned of the congregation, princes of the tribes of their fathers, heads of thousands in Israel" (v. 16). For example, the representative of Judah was Nashon (v. 7). His son Salmon would marry Rahab; his descendants included Boaz and David (Ruth 4:20).

Citizenship was by a dual oath: civil and ecclesiastical. The judicial issue was two-fold: hierarchy (point two of the covenant) and sanctions (point four).⁸ There was a hierarchy of civil appeals courts (Ex. 18). A person who was not bound by oath under covenantal sanctions could not lawfully impose these sanctions on others. A citizen was a civil judge. A judge could impose civil sanctions as a lawful agent of the state. Every citizen was under the stipulations of two of God's covenants: civil and ecclesiastical. Apart from being bound by a pair of self-maledictory oaths under these two covenantal institutions, a person did not possess lawful authority to impose civil sanctions in Mosaic Israel.

Mosaic civil sanctions were exclusively negative. They were defensive: discouraging evil acts. The results were positive—a reduction in public evil—but the sanctions were negative. The model for civil sanctions was military defense: imposing physical sanctions against invaders. Those who were outside the national covenant and also outside the holy land were to be kept from invading, which would have been a boundary violation: a profane act. God's holy army was supposed to keep a rival army from transgressing the nation's geographical boundaries, i.e, profaning the land. The mandatory mark of citizenship was eligibility for service in God's holy army.⁹ Keeping out unauthorized, non-sanctioned invaders from outside the land and from outside the national covenant was central to citizenship.

8. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), chaps. 2, 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

Does this mean that the Levites were not citizens? An expositor could argue this way, since they were not numbered as civil warriors. Their assignment was ecclesiastical: defending the tabernacle at the center of the military formation. I argue that they were members of their tribe, and they had judicial authority within their tribe. They did not have civil judicial authority in their place of residence if they were not living in a Levitical city. In a Levitical city, they possessed permanent legal claims on family-owned real estate that was part of the jubilee (Lev. 25:32–33), so they must have had civil authority there. They were the only permanent residents. I see the Levites as citizens who were not numbered for military service as warriors. They were the exception to the rule governing citizenship because of their special legal situation: defenders of the tabernacle rather than defenders of the land.

1. Citizen Warriors

What about an old man who was no longer capable of fighting? Did his physical incapacity disqualify him as a judge? The Mosaic law did not mandate this. There were old men who served as judges. Barzillai, who was 80 years old, pleaded that he could no longer discern good from evil, and therefore should not accompany David on his triumphal journey back to Jerusalem (II Sam. 19:34–35). Yet he had fed the king and his men when they fled from Jerusalem during Absalom's revolt (II Sam. 17:27). While in Barzillai's house, David had numbered those fighting men still with him. Barzillai was not numbered by David (II Sam. 18:1). Yet David later regarded him as fit to travel at his side in a place of honor. Barzillai had pleaded age, not with respect to his fighting ability, which was obviously nil, but with respect to his powers of judicial discernment. David granted him his request; he stayed behind. That he had been a loyal citizen was obvious. He had aided David in the latter's capacity as supreme civil judge. Yet he was no longer fit for military service. This in no way restrained David from asking him to accompany him after the defeat of Absalom. The issue was Barzillai's powers of judgment.

9. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 30, section on "Holy War, Citizenship, and Liberty." Deborah was a judge; she also led God's holy army.

Similarly, Joshua in his old age called the judges of Israel to hear his final words. He instructed them as Moses had instructed him before the conquest, invoking a similar message. Moses had said: "Be strong and of a good courage: for thou shalt bring the children of Israel into the land which I swear unto them: and I will be with thee" (Deut. 31:23). Joshua told the judges: "Be ye therefore very courageous to keep and to do all that is written in the book of the law of Moses, that ye turn not aside therefrom to the right hand or to the left" (Josh. 23:6). Both invoked military imagery with respect to the law of God. Yet Moses was no longer fit to serve in the military, and neither was Joshua. Both were judges when they delivered their final addresses.

I conclude that citizenship for all but Levites was based on eligibility for service in the military at some point in life, but not in old age. Moses and Joshua had served in the military, yet were still judges in their old age. Barzillai had once been eligible for the military, and his decision to aid David at the risk of his life was clearly a military act. Only his self-declared mental incapacity kept him from serving as an honored judge at David's side.

D. Military Sanctions

Mustering was an act preparatory to the imposition of God's legitimate covenantal sanctions in history. It was an act under priestly sanctions. Those who were not under priestly sanction in Mosaic Israel were not allowed to impose holy sanctions. They could not become members of the army. The biblical principle of covenant membership is this: those who impose sanctions must be under them. This is the principle of the rule of law. These holy military sanctions were positive for the winners and negative for the losers. The primary historical sanction of war is death. To begin preparing for a war is to begin preparing for someone's death, possibly one's own. Death stalks every battlefield.

Mustering was part of military planning. It was mandatory prior to a war. More than this: the military census is the biblical model for all other forms of planning.

For which of you, intending to build a tower, sitteth not down first, and counteth the cost, whether he have sufficient to finish it? Lest haply [it happen], after he hath laid the foundation, and is not able to finish it, all that behold it begin to mock him, Saying, This man began to build, and was not able to finish. Or what king, going to make war against another king, sitteth not down first, and consulteth whether he be able with ten thousand to meet him that cometh against him with twenty thousand? Or else, while the other is yet a great way off, he sendeth an ambassage, and desireth conditions of peace (Luke 14:28–32).

There is more to military planning than numbering the army. There is also the question of the army's willingness to fight: mental preparedness. This applied both to the army and the civilian population. Moses sent spies into the land and awaited their reports (Num. 13–14). God did not order this (Num. 13:2) in order to evaluate the strength of the enemy; He did this in order to test the spies' willingness to evaluate the land's blessings and military strength in terms of the Israelites' willingness to fight. A fearful man was not to fight, for his fear might spread to those around him (Deut. 20:8). Gideon dismissed 22,000 people who admitted that they were afraid to fight (Judg. 7:3).

In Mosaic Israel prior to the Babylonian captivity, the male civilian population above the age of 19 was the army (Num. 1:20). The Book of Numbers records the history of the wilderness period in terms of a central theme: military preparedness, i.e., the ability of God's covenant people to impose military sanctions. God brought the holy nation/army under a series' of sanctions in the wilderness, including military sanctions, in order to enable Moses to evaluate the military preparedness of the nation prior to the conquest of Canaan.

Moses began with a rag-tag army of civilians. In every sense of the word, this was an army of conscripts. They had been thrown out of Egypt by the Egyptians (Ex. 12:33). Moses had not taken them out by way of Philistia for fear that they would turn back toward Egypt in the face of war (Ex. 13:17). They had never fought a battle prior to the war with Amalek, and Moses had to stand with his arms above his head for them to win (Ex. 17:8–13). They had been placed in bondage by the Pharaoh of the oppression because he was fearful that they might someday fight a battle alongside Egypt's invading enemies (Ex. 1:10). They had been bullied for a generation by Egyptian taskmasters, as well as taught submissiveness by their own civil representatives. In Egypt, they had been fearful of any confrontation with authority (Ex. 5:20–21), let alone a war. This Egyptian training had been remarkably successful. Except for Moses' slaying of the taskmaster, during the entire era only the Hebrew midwives had been courageous enough to resist. Their non-violent actions of self-conscious deception of the civil authorities had saved the nation (Ex. 1:19–20). They lied to a false god (Pharaoh) in the name of the true God, and God blessed them for this, dwelling specially with them (Ex. 1:20a). Israel had been delivered by women. This had taken place 80 years before the exodus—a distant memory testifying to the long-term submission of Israel's males to pagan military power.

E. A Strictly Civil Census

God required Moses to muster the people shortly after the exodus, before the nation had sinned by bringing negative sanctions against Joshua and Caleb (Num. 14). God had not yet forbade this generation from entering the Promised Land. The second mustering took place just prior to the next generation's invasion of the land. Mustering was related to the payment of blood money to the priests (Ex. 30:13); both were religiously holy acts. The ritual payment of atonement money ceased with the demise of the Mosaic priesthood. Mustering was associated strictly with that priesthood. Abram had not been required to make such a payment to Melchizedek prior to his battle with Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14).

1. David's Sin

Such mustering was not lawful apart from the threat of war and a payment to the Levites. When God was angry with the people of Israel, He caused David to muster the nation, so that He could bring judgment against them. "And again the anger of the LORD was kindled against Israel, and he moved David against them to say, Go, number Israel and Judah" (II Sam. 24:1). This mustering was illegal, as Joab understood:

For the king said to Joab the captain of the host, which was with him, Go now through all the tribes of Israel, from Dan even to Beersheba, and number ye the people, that I may know the number of the people. And Joab said unto the king, Now the LORD thy God add unto the people, how many soever they be, an hundredfold, and that the eyes of my lord the king may see it: but why doth my lord the king delight in this thing? Notwithstanding the king's word prevailed against Joab, and against the captains of the host. And Joab and the captains of the host went out from the presence of the king, to number the people of Israel (II Sam. 24:2–4).

God did this to David, and through his representative covenantal leadership, to Israel, by way of Satan, who acts as an intermediary in such matters.

And Satan stood up against Israel, and provoked David to number Israel. And David said to Joab and to the rulers of the people, Go, number Israel from Beersheba even to Dan; and bring the number of them to me, that I may know it. And Joab answered, The LORD make his people an hundred times so many more as they be: but, my lord the king, are they not all my lord's servants? why then doth my lord require this thing? why will he be a cause of trespass to Israel? Nevertheless the king's word prevailed against Joab. Wherefore Joab departed, and went throughout all Israel, and came to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 21:1–4).¹⁰

I have reproduced both passages in full so there can be no doubt: they describe the same incident.

Joab falsified his report by refusing to number the tribes of Benjamin and Levi (I Chron. 21:5–6). No military agent of the nation was ever allowed to number Levi (Num. 1:49). By refusing to muster Benjamin, Saul's tribe, the smallest tribe in Israel (I Sam. 9:21), Joab made certain that the mustering was not of the entire nation. By not mustering all of the non-priestly tribes, Joab silently declared that this was not a holy war, for the priesthood had not authorized it by blowing the twin trumpets, nor had the entire nation been mustered.

Immediately upon receiving Joab's report, David knew he had

10. May we legitimately say that Satan and his followers sometimes do God's work of deception? The Bible repeatedly affirms that this is the case. "And the LORD said, Who shall entice Ahab king of Israel, that he may go up and fall at Ramoth-gilead? And one spake saying after this manner, and another saying after that manner. Then there came out a spirit, and stood before the LORD, and said, I will entice him. And the LORD said unto him, Wherewith? And he said, I will go out, and be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets. And the LORD said, Thou shalt entice him, and thou shalt also prevail: go out, and do even so. Now therefore, behold, the LORD hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of these thy prophets, and the LORD hath spoken evil against thee" (II Chron. 18:19–22). "And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie: That they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness" (II Thess. 2:11–12). Nevertheless, we must not blame God for what God uses Satan to do. This is illogical by the standards of autonomous man (meaning also the standards of Gordon Clark), but it is required that we hold both positions—God's absolute sovereignty and Satan's full responsibility—in order to avoid making God the author of sin. On this point, see Romans 9:14–23.

done a sinful thing. “And David said unto God, I have sinned greatly, because I have done this thing: but now, I beseech thee, do away the iniquity of thy servant; for I have done very foolishly” (I Chron. 21:8). God then gave David three terrible choices (v. 12). David told God to decide (v. 13); so, God brought a plague against the people, killing 70,000 of them (v. 14). This was consistent with the law of mustering. When thou takest the sum of the children of Israel after their number, then shall they give every man a ransom for his soul unto the LORD, when thou numberest them; that there be no plague among them, when thou numberest them” (Ex. 30:12). Plague came because David mustered the people without collecting the mandatory atonement money for the priests. This mustering invited God into their midst as the sanctions-bringer, but they made no payment. They thereby became profane.

Why did Joab know that the mustering was wrong? Because no priest had consented to it. No blood money had been paid to the priesthood. The act was dearly sacrilegious: a profane act because it violated a sacred boundary. But what could that boundary have been? It had something to do with the nonpayment of blood money. It had something to do with the priesthood. Mustering was to precede a holy war. David was not facing a holy war, yet he mustered Israel’s fighting men. This was an assertion of a priestly authority that he possessed only as the national military leader in a time of war. David was the senior military commander, the one under whom blood would be shed. He was the senior priest of the military, under the authority of the high priest. He did not possess this mustering authority as senior civil magistrate. This authority was priestly, not kingly. Thus, it was illegal for the civil government to conduct this census. It was an assertion of priestly authority that was legitimate only prior to a holy war.

Joab told the king: “Now the LORD thy God add unto the people, how many soever they be, an hundredfold, and that the eyes of my lord the king may see it.” It would be a blessing for God to multiply the military might of the nation, he said, so that David could see this. Spoken like a true soldier. The cost of supporting an army a hundred times larger, however, would have to be borne by someone. In a war, a large army is a clear blessing; in peacetime, it isn’t. Joab’s point was that David should not be counting the nation on his own authority. To experience an increase in the army large enough for its commander to see is a fine goal in, wartime, but to muster the nation apart from a looming battle was wrong.

2. The New Covenant

The issue was ecclesiastical: atonement money and the shedding of blood. Under the New Covenant, the Mosaic priesthood is gone forever, as the Epistle to the Hebrews teaches. Numbering prior to a war is no longer mandatory. The question is this: Is such numbering (counting) legitimate?

Taking a careful accounting of one's assets is legitimate for an individual, and was compared by Jesus with taking a military census. Should the state be prohibited from doing what an individual should do and the senior military commander had to do under Mosaic law prior to a war? Can it lawfully number its fighting forces even though no war is imminent? I see no reason not to allow this. Maintaining defensive forces is designed to prevent war, i.e., prevent the shedding of blood. This is a valid goal of the state, which has a legal monopoly on imposing physical negative sanctions.

But what about other forms of census-taking? Has God given the state lawful authority over planning except with respect to planning for a war, i.e., the legitimate imposition of God's physical sanctions against covenant-breakers who have violated the law? There is no biblical warrant for such indiscriminate data collection. The state may lawfully count the policemen under its authority, since the state is God's designated covenantal agent in a war against crime. But the state is not given the authority to conduct prying investigations into the lives of law-abiding private citizens.

Wherever the state asserts authority which is not warranted by the Bible, it imitates David's illegal mustering. It asserts for itself power that God has not delegated to it. Such an unlawful arrogation of power is the mark of a Pharaonic state. It claims ownership—legal control—over the allocation of assets not lawfully under its sphere of legitimate authority. One of the marks of state control is its census-taking activity. Whenever the state numbers things not lawfully under its legitimate authority, it becomes Pharaonic.

Jesus was born in Bethlehem because Joseph had travelled there to be enrolled in a census conducted by Augustus Caesar (Luke 2:1–5). This was not a tax, as the King James Version misleadingly says; it was a census. Augustus was following the lead of Julius Caesar, who had compiled a detailed statistical record of the empire, the descriptio orbis. Augustus had sent 20 trained agents throughout the empire to compile a similar work, which he wrote in his own hand, Breviarium totius imperii.¹¹ To manage a centrally planned empire, the emperor needed statistical data.

F. Statistics and Government Planning

One of the great evils of an income tax is that it mandates reporting to the state of a family's income, capital, and financial dealings. The state assembles huge, detailed dossiers on individuals, families, and businesses, which only tax officials are allowed to inspect for accuracy.¹² The income tax has been the great engine of statistics-gathering by the modern state. The census is the other. Both are compulsory in the United States. A resident can be fined for refusing to cooperate with the census-taker. Statistics pour into the U.S. Department of Commerce, the Department of Labor, the Internal Revenue Service, and many other agencies: federal, state, and local.

Some of these statistics are sold to the public in data banks or in printed government reports. But only rarely are they used by businesses for strategic planning, especially small businesses. They are rarely delivered in a useful form. They do not tell most businesses what business managers need to know. In any case, they are old; they are at best snapshots of past behavior. Nonexistent is the firm that goes bankrupt or sustains a major loss because of its heavy reliance on faulty government statistics. This is because no business management team would be so foolish as to rely on government statistics for making major decisions. They hire specialized market testing organizations that seek out and analyze the highly specific and narrow information needed by business managers.

Each year in the United States, the government releases a 1000-page book, Statistical Abstract of the United States. It is jointly produced by the Department of Commerce, the Bureau of the Census, and the Economics and Statistics Administration. It is a convenient government subsidy to such professional groups as historians, economists looking for factual support for almost any theory, editorial writers, and students writing term papers. Politicians' assistants use it to ghostwrite speeches and reports.

Statistics are records of the past that have been summarized in the 11. Frederick Louis Godet, Commentary on the Gospel of Luke, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan, [1887]), I, pp. 120–21.

12. "IRS to expand secret data base on people's lives," Dallas Morning News (Jan. 20, 1995), p. 1. This data base is closed to the general public. It was set up in order to facilitate more efficient tax collection.

form of numbers. Economist Ludwig von Mises wrote: "Statistics provides numerical information about historical facts, that is, about events that happened at a definite period of time to definite people in a definite era. It deals with the past and not with the future. Like any other past experience, it can occasionally render important services in planning for the future, but it does not say anything directly valid about the future."¹³ Furthermore, "what the statistics of human action really show is not regularity but irregularity. The number of crimes, suicides, and acts of forgetfulness . . . varies from year to year."¹⁴ The biologist, wrote sociologist-historian Robert Nisbet, can predict future changes in some environmentally controlled population, but "It is very different with studies of change in human society. Here the Random Event, the Maniac, the Prophet, and the Genius have to be reckoned with. We have absolutely no way of escaping them. The future-predicters don't suggest that we can avoid or escape them—or ever be able to predict or forecast them. What the future-predicters, the change-analysts, and trend-tenders say in effect is that with the aid of institute resources, computers, linear programming, etc. they will deal with the kinds of change that are not the consequence of the Random Event, the Genius, the Maniac, and the Prophet. To which I can only say: there really aren't any; not any worth looking at anyhow."¹⁵

Government statistics are used by economic planners, including the central bank, to regulate the national economy. Not that these statistics are accurate or even useful. Older data are constantly being revised. But they create the illusion that government planners are capable of making effective representative decisions for consumers on the basis of an overall economic plan. The planners supposedly are capable of devising comprehensive, scientific, economic input-output grids, inserting the latest data, and presto: an accurate picture of the economy emerges. This picture then supposedly enables them to forecast the future effects of their official decisions. This is a politically convenient myth. Academic studies of government forecasting repeatedly conclude that flipping a coin would be as accurate (perhaps more accurate) as the forecasts of government economists; so would

13. Ludwig von Mises, The Ultimate Foundation of Economic Science (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1962), p. 56. (<http://bit.ly/MisesUFES>)

14. Ludwig von Mises, Theory and History: An Interpretation of Social and Economic Evolution (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1957), pp. 84–85. (<http://bit.ly/MisesTAH>)

15. Robert A. Nisbet, "The Year 2000 and All That," Commentary (June 1968), p. 66.

making the simple assumption that this year will be pretty much the same as last year.

Faith in the power of statistics to convey relevant economic information to government planners is visible in a statement by Eugene Rostow. He assumed that it is an altruistic civil government, not the profit-seeking decisions of consumers and producers in a free market, which is truly rational. Government planners alone can see the big picture and rationally guide the overall economy for the benefit of others, or so we are told. “The policy of maintaining high levels of employment therefore implies a policy of seeking to make the current output of the economy a maximum—that is, to obtain as valuable a yield as possible from the intelligent current use of the nation’s capital resources, and its inheritance of capital, organization, skill, and habit. This goal is the first economic problem of any responsible government.”¹⁶ This faith lodges initiatory and final economic sovereignty in the state, and in those who are ordained by the state to conduct its planning activities.

In contrast to the god of socialism, this god of the mixed economy is not an earthly version of Calvin’s predestinating God, but it is surely an immanent Arminian kind of god. It does not predestinate, but it makes incentives available to those who conform to its laws. It nudges history along its orderly path. But a blind god is not much of a god (Deut. 4:28), so this immanent god must be said to be able to see clearly. He must be given eyes. Samuel Ruggles, the American delegate to the International Statistical Congress of 1863, was an early prophet of the statistical millennium: “Statistics are the very eyes of the statesman, enabling him to survey and scan with clear and comprehensive vision the whole structure and economy of the body politic.”¹⁷ Such confident rhetoric is not so evident today, but the underlying faith is still widespread. Rostow asserts that “the development of the statistical series which provide rough tools of accounting for the current economic performance of the economy has improved our opportunities for studying the behavior of the economy, and for making both private and public policy decisions more rational and effective.”¹⁸ He was a 16. Eugene V. Rostow, Planning for Freedom: The Public Law of American Capitalism (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1959), p. 69.

17. Cited in Murray N. Rothbard, “Fact-finding is a proper function of government,” Clichés of Politics, ed. Mark Spangler (Irvington, New York: Foundation for Economic Education, 1994), p. 93n. The essay was first published in The Freeman in June, 1961: “Statistics: Achilles’ Heel of Government.” (<http://bit.ly/RothbadStats>)

18. Rostow, Planning for Freedom, p. 69.

professor of law, not an economist, but his faith in the planned economy was very great. Freedom through state compulsion: here was the twentieth-century liberal's number-one official economic goal. (His number-one goal, unofficially, is the quest for power: a very ancient goal.)

Apart from coercively collected, tax-funded statistics, the government planning priesthood and their academic allies could not easily maintain the myth of their ability to predict the economic future and then create incentives through tax policy and monetary policy to overcome the supposed inefficiency of voluntary economic exchange, i.e., the free market social order. Rothbard was correct: "If the government received no railroad statistics, for example, how in the world could it even start to regulate railroad rates, finances, and other affairs? How could the government impose price controls if it didn't even know what goods have been sold on the market, and what prices were prevailing? Statistics, to repeat, are the eyes and ears of the interventionists; of the intellectual reformer, the politician, and the government bureaucrat. Cut off those eyes and ears, destroy those crucial guidelines to knowledge, and the whole threat of government intervention is almost completely eliminated."¹⁹

In a 1960 article, Rothbard surveyed the history of economists' opinions on the collection of government statistics since the mid-nineteenth century. In case after case, the economists who praised such statistical work had as a motive the creation of a planned economy. The Fabian socialists in England in the late nineteenth century are the models.²⁰ Richard T. Ely, one of the founders of the American Economic Association, and Lester Frank Ward—sociologist, government bureaucrat, and the first major apologist for central planning in the U.S.—both defended the collection of such data.²¹ Wesley C. Mitchell, one of the pioneers in statistical inquiry in economics in the early twentieth century, said that "the type of social invention most needed today is one that offers definite techniques through which the social system can be controlled and operated to the optimum advantage of its members."²² His wife wrote of his work at mid-century that "he envisaged the great contribution that government could make to the un-

19. Rothbard, "Fact-finding," p. 92.

20. Murray N. Rothbard, "The Politics of Political Economists: Comment," Quarterly Journal of Economics, 74 (Nov. 1960), p. 660.

21. Ibid., pp. 660–61.

22. Ibid., p. 662.

derstanding of economic and social problems if the statistical data gathered independently by various Federal agencies were systematized and planned so that the interrelationships among them could be studied. The idea of developing social statistics, not merely as a record but as a basis for planning, emerged early in his own work.”²³ The Bureau of the Budget in 1954 announced: “National growth and prosperity demanded an enlightened conduct of public affairs with the aid of factual information. The ultimate responsibility of the Federal Government for underwriting the health of the national economy has always been implicit in the American system. . . .”²⁴ The accelerating growth of U.S. government data collection came, the Bureau said, during the Great Depression of the 1930s, as a means for the government to combat the Great Depression.²⁵

It is not just that statistics require constant tinkering, both theoretically²⁶ and in terms of their proper collection.²⁷ It is also that they establish the indispensable theoretical foundation for coercive government intervention into the economy. The Bible is unalterably opposed to such coercive intervention. It is therefore opposed to the collection of statistics that are not part of its war-making authority, including the war against crime.

Rothbard noted in 1960 that the collection of statistics by the government leads to greater intervention: “. . . the growth of statistics, often developed originally for its own sake, ends by multiplying the aven-

23. Lucy Sprague Mitchell, Two Lives (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1953), p. 363. Cited in idem.

24. Economic Statistics, Hearings Before the Subcommittee on Economic Statistics of the Joint Economic Committee on the Economic Report, 83rd Congress, July 12, 1954 (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1954), p. 10; ibid., p. 663.

25. Idem.

26. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 19, section on “Intuition and Measurement.” Cf. Oskar Morgenstern, On the Accuracy of Economic Observations, 2nd ed. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1963). Morgenstern wrote a book on game theory with John von Neumann, one of the most gifted mathematicians of the twentieth century. Morgenstern was aware of the limits of mathematics as a tool of economic analysis. A more recent treatment of the problem is Andrew M. Kamarck’s Economics and the Real World (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1983). See also Thomas Mayer, Truth versus Precision in Economics (Hampshire, England: Elgar, 1993).

27. Examples taken from my files in 1989—a small sample of two decades of my files on the topic: “America Counts on Its Numbers,” Insight on the News (May 22, 1989); Richard Lipkin, “Painting policy by the numbers: Imprecise art?” Washington Times (May 23, 1989); “Getting Physical,” The Economist (Aug. 26, 1989); Jonathan Fuerbringer, “Rusty Statistical Compass for U.S. Policy Makers,” New York Times (Oct. 30, 1989).

ues of government intervention and planning.”²⁸ Furthermore, when pragmatic social reformers go looking for problems to solve by government action, they use statistics. “The pragmatist looks for areas where the economy and society fall short of the Garden of Eden, and these, of course, abound.”²⁹

Conclusion

The Book of Numbers begins with the mandated mustering of the fighting men of Israel. This was an aspect of Israel as the holy army of the Lord. It was an aspect of negative civil and ecclesiastical sanctions—specifically, the military conquest of Canaan. It was a priestly activity. The priesthood had to sanction every holy war that involved the whole nation.

God is omniscient. Man is not. God allows men to pay for data-gathering in order to make better private decisions, but mankind cannot become omniscient. The state, as the most powerful covenantal agency, is not allowed by God to pursue data-gathering in an unholy quest of God-like omniscience or omnipotence.

When David mustered the people when no war was being contemplated, God judged him by killing 70,000 Israelite males by a plague. This indicates that legitimate mustering by the civil government was regarded by God as a unique event, something associated with authorized combat and the threat of death in battle: the shedding of blood.

Those who were eligible for mustering, and hence for battle, were citizens in Mosaic Israel. Prior to the Babylonian captivity, their eligibility to serve in the army of the Lord was their primary proof of citizenship.

The rise of the modern planning state was associated with the rise of government statistics. The two developments were intimately and necessarily associated. Governments began collecting statistics before the ideology of central planning was widespread. Once begun, however, coercive data gathering became part of the larger process of extending state authority over the decision-making of all those under its authority. The quest for ever more detailed, accurate, and recent statistical data is an aspect of man’s attempt to become God. The messianic state, if it is to bring its promised healing, must imitate God. It must pursue omniscience, which in turn becomes the supposed basis of its representative (statistically significant) omnipresence and, ultimately, its omnipotence. Because Mosaic Israel was founded on a public repudiation of Egypt's messianic state, its legal order made impossible the civil government's collecting of statistics that were unrelated to the defense of the nation against covenant-breakers. There is nothing in the New Covenant that altered the Old Covenant's view of the messianic state. Thus, there is no reason to believe that government data-gathering is legitimate except in the specified areas of national defense and crime prevention. It can lawfully collect taxes, but taxes that mandate the collection of information on private citizens are inherently suspect. Such data must not be used for manipulating the economy; they are to be used only for legal purposes, to prove that someone has or has not paid his taxes.

28. Rothbard, “Comment,” p. 663.

29. Ibid., p. 664.

3

THE HIERARCHY OF SERVICE/SANCTIONS

And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, Bring the tribe of Levi near, and present them before Aaron the priest, that they may minister unto him. And they shall keep his charge, and the charge of the whole congregation before the tabernacle of the congregation, to do the service of the tabernacle. And they shall keep all the instruments of the tabernacle of the congregation, and the charge of the children of Israel, to do the service of the tabernacle. And thou shalt give the Levites unto Aaron and to his sons: they are wholly given unto him out of the children of Israel. And thou shalt appoint Aaron and his sons, and they shall wait on their priest's office: and the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death (Num. 3:5–10).

The English word “hierarchy” comes from the Greek word for priest (hierus). We think of a hierarchy of command in terms of an image: a vertical chain. This hierarchy may be judicial; it may be merely functional. It is associated with point two of the biblical covenant model: hierarchy or representation.¹

This law, as with all the other Mosaic laws, was theocentric. In this case, however, the theocentric character of the law was manifested geographically. This law governed the Aaronic priesthood. The central—literal and figurative—service of the Aaronic priesthood was associated with the holy of holies. The holy of holies marked the central focus of Israel: the earthly dwelling place of God, the place of His name. The holy of holies was the geographical link between heaven and earth. In it rested the Ark of the Covenant.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

A. Guardians

The Mosaic priesthood guarded the boundaries associated with the holy of holies. The priests in the narrow sense were those who officiated in the sacrifices: the sons of Aaron. In a broader sense, the priesthood was the tribe of Levi. In the broadest sense, Israel was a nation of priests (Ex. 19:6). They all were to guard the tabernacle by imposing physical sanctions on those who violated a series of concentric boundary markers: from the holy of holies to the nation's boundaries.

Priests were the assigned agents of bloodshed inside the sacrosanct boundaries associated with the holy of holies. The narrowly defined priests shed the blood of animals to placate God. The more broadly defined priesthood defended the tabernacle from profane invaders who had no lawful access. The most broadly defined priesthood was the army of the Lord, a holy army, which defended the nation because the nation was God's sanctified dwelling place.

The legal basis of the Levitical priesthood of pre-exilic Mosaic Israel had begun in the wilderness with the golden calf incident (Ex. 32). First, there was an act of corporate rebellion in which the high priest, Aaron, had participated. Aaron's act of rebellion had been a re-capitulation of the original sin of Adam, who ate a forbidden covenantal meal as mankind's representative high priest. This corporate act of rebellion involved the whole nation. God required a bloody sacrifice to atone for it. There is no atonement apart from the shedding of blood (Heb. 9:22).

Second, the Levites gained their tribal office as the Mosaic priesthood because they had atoned for their sin by wielding the sword without mercy (Ex. 32:26–29). This atonement extended retroactively to their earlier sin, which had been a merciless wielding of the sword: the slaying of the Shechemites and the looting of their assets (Gen. 34:25–27), an act cursed by Jacob (Gen. 49:5). Imposing mortal sanctions on their biological brothers brought their sanctification, thereby offsetting their curse for having imposed the same sanctions against the Shechemites, their newly adopted brothers. The covenant is far more important than brotherhood. Levi had violated this principle with Shechem; his heirs honored it in the wilderness.

The golden calf incident was a prelude to the next act of priestly rebellion, the strange fire incident (Lev. 10:1–2). The first incident led to the elevation of the Levites to priestly office when they joined Moses and executed 3,000 Israelites. The second incident led to the substitution of a new pair of priests due to the deaths of the two original officers. Bloodshed marked the Mosaic priesthood from the beginning.

The priestly office was sacrificial before God, meaning that it involved the imposition of the negative sanction of death. The threat of sanctions was hierarchical: on the animals as representatives, on those whom they represented if the nation continued in their rebellion, and directly on those who acted as the mediatorial agents of sacrifice.

Because the priests performed the ritual acts of substitutionary atonement—judicially representative deaths—they were under the threat of more immediate and more direct negative sanctions than the people were. They stood on holy ground. The closer that men came to the most comprehensive act of representative sacrifice—the yearly sprinkling of blood inside the holy of holies—the more dangerous was the ground. Holy ground was bloody ground, judicially speaking. It was the place of negative sanctions.

B. Hierarchy and Inner Circles

The old rule governing the organization of a workshop applied to priestly service: “a place for everything, and everything in its place.”

1. The Ark of the Covenant

At the center of Israel were the contents of the Ark of the Covenant: two tables of the law, a golden pot of manna, and Aaron’s rod (Heb. 9:4). The manifestation of God’s law and the implements of His sanctions were linked spatially: the tablets (law), the manna (bread), and the rod (sanctions). Man needs law and bread in order to live. “And he humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know; that he might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the LORD doth man live” (Deut. 8:3). The rod served as a warning: violate the boundaries of the Ark, and negative sanctions will be applied, just as they were applied on Pharaoh by means of this rod.² These three items were en-

2. Exodus 7:9–10, 19; 8:5, 16. There has been a long debate among the Jewish commentators as to whether this rod was Moses’ or Aaron’s. The twentieth-century editor and Chief Rabbi of the British Empire J. H. Hertz includes a gloss by David Levi and Isaac Delgado, late eighteenth-century commentators: “. . . the rod of Moses used by Aaron at the bidding of Moses.” Hertz (ed.), The Pentateuch and Haftorahs (2nd ed.; London: Soncino, [1937] 1987), p. 236. The mid-nineteenth-century Orthodox Jewish commentator Samson Raphael Hirsch wrote: “There is absolutely no necessity to be-cased inside the Ark and were never supposed to be viewed by any person in history.³ This was the ultimate inner sanctum of Israel: “For God’s eyes only.” It was closed to man, just as the tree of the knowledge of good and evil had been closed to man. A boundary protected this inner sanctum: the walls of the Ark.

A series of concentric circles of holiness encased the Ark. The Ark was placed behind a curtain, creating the holy of holies, into which only the high priest came once a year to offer sacrifice (Lev. 16:14–15). The high priest had this job; no one else did (v. 17). “Now when these things were thus ordained, the priests went always into the first tabernacle, accomplishing the service of God. But into the second went the high priest alone once every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself, and for the errors of the people” (Heb. 9:6–7). This annual event conformed to the five-point biblical covenant model. The requirement mandating judicial representation (point two) in the offering of one representative annual sacrifice of blood (point four) overcame the otherwise absolute sanctity (point three) of the holy of holies, the dwelling place of God (point one), thereby enabling the Israelites to survive as a nation (point five).

Like the garden of Eden, where only the tree of the knowledge of good and evil was declared off-limits to man, so was Mosaic Israel. Only the interior of the Ark was declared completely off-limits. But Adam had proven that man does not honor God’s verbal boundaries, so God placed a series of “No Trespassing” signs in front of men as they approached the Ark’s sacred space. He placed swords – not flaming—into the hands of the Levites to guard the last few hundred feet (Num. 1 :51). The basis of this authority was their previous willingness to use the sword against their brothers (Ex. 32:27).

The closer to the inner circle of holiness in Mosaic Israel—the implements inside the Ark of the Covenant—the higher the level of ecclesiastical authority. The greater the danger was of violating a sacred boundary, the higher the ecclesiastical authority. With respect to the sacred, inner meant higher. This relationship was unique to the church lieve that this was Moses’ staff and not Aaron’s. (Some of the commentators put themselves to considerable effort to try and prove it must have been Moses’ staff). It is much more reasonable to take it, as the verse clearly says, as Aaron’s staff.” Hirsch, The Pentateuch, 5 vols. (Gateshead, London: Judaica, 1989), II, p. 78. I believe that the same rod was used by both men, even as Aaron spoke for Moses.

3. I am assuming here that the mercy seat which sat above the Ark was a lid (Ex. 25:21). The Hebrew word used for “mercy seat,” kapporeth, comes from kaphar, meaning “covering.”

covenant. It did not apply to the civil hierarchy. There was no other place that was geographically sacrosanct outside of the areas associated with the throne room of God. The holy of holies housed the highest of highs, associated with God's mountain.⁴ Like Mt. Sinai, where God gave the law to Moses, so was the tabernacle. Jordan wrote: "The boundary around the mountain correlates to the boundary inside the courtyard that kept the people from approaching the altar. In this way, then, the Tabernacle (and later the Temple) were models of the ladder to heaven, of the holy mountain. . . . The Tabernacle was God's portable mountain."⁵

2. Circles of Authority

The association of the inner circles of the tabernacle with hierarchy, secrecy, and authority was to make the sacred space of the tabernacle foreboding to outsiders. The sense of power was inescapable. The circles of authority grew more diffuse as they moved away from the tabernacle. Hierarchy meant access to power; centralization meant access to power. To be a part of the inner circle meant access to power.

God closed access to these inner circles to those not part of specific families: Aaron, Kohath, Gershon, and Merari. Apart from adoption into one of these families, which involved the surrender of a man's inheritance in the land, and also involved the payment of an entry fee,⁶ access to these inner circles was closed. There could be no competition for such access between excluded families.

The Levites lived in a camp separated from the other tribes by 2,000 cubits⁷ (Josh. 3:4). Non-priestly Israelites were to be kept away from the inner courts of the tabernacle by the Levites, who were to kill intruders. The Mosaic law dearly separated land ownership from sacred space. During wartime, it kept political authority at arm's length—at least 1,000 yards—from the sanctuary of the highest ecclesiastical hierarchy. After all of the copies of the Mosaic law had disappeared for generations, a copy was found in the temple (II Kings 22:8). The op-

4. James B. Jordan, Through New Eyes: Developing a Biblical View of the World (Brentwood, Tennessee: Wolgemuth & Hyatt, 1988), pp. 85, 155–163, 212–13. (<http://bit.ly/jjneweyes>)

5. Ibid., p. 213.

6. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 36.

7. About 1,000 yards (914 meters).

pression of covenant-breaking kings had not stripped the land of every copy. The temple's inner sanctuary had provided a safe hiding place for the lost copy. The symbolic point was this: God's law is beyond the authority of kings to re-write. The hierarchy that declared the law was not under the king, nor did the king have lawful access to the inner sanctum where the law rested. God's law was higher than the king. The tablets representing God's law were housed in the inner sanctum of the tabernacle, not in the king's household. There should be no mistake about this: the church was the central institution in pre-exilic Mo-saic Israel because the Ark of God was guarded by the church.⁸ The swords of the Levites took precedence over the sword of the king.

C. Hierarchy and the Division of Labor

There was a Levitical division of labor established by family membership. This division of labor was associated with tasks that were performed separately in a series of concentric circles with the Ark at their center.

Aaron was the high priest of Israel. On his shoulders rested the responsibility of performing those rituals that only the high priest was allowed to perform as a judicial representative of the nation. His yearly entrance into the holy of holies was the primary ritual (Ex. 30:10). The high priest was closest to the inner circle.

To perform his duties successfully, he needed assistance. Under him were his two sons, Eleazar and Ithamar, who had replaced the two older sons, Nadab and Abihu (Lev. 10:12; Num. 3:4), who had been burned by fire from the altar when they offered strange fire (Lev. 10:1–2; Num. 3:4). “And to the office of Eleazar the son of Aaron the priest pertaineth the oil for the light, and the sweet incense, and the daily meat offering, and the anointing oil, and the oversight of all the tabernacle, and of all that therein is, in the sanctuary, and in the vessels thereof” (Num. 4:16). The sons of Aaron had access to areas that were off-limits to the other Kohathites: “But they shall not go in to see when the holy things are covered, lest they die” (Num. 4:20).

The Kohathites were required to tend to the implements that were inside the boundaries of these outer coverings but outside the inner coverings of the structure, i.e., outside of the holy of holies (Num.

8. After the exile, despite the absence of the Ark, the church no longer had any serious competition from the state with respect to its social centrality. The state in Israel was part of a foreign hierarchy: Medo-Persian, Hellenic, or Roman.

3:31). They were allowed to minister closer to the inner circle than the Gershonites were. The Gershonites were required to tend to the hanging coverings of the tabernacle (Num. 3:25–26). These were the implements of separation: boundary markers inside the structure. The sons of Merari were required to tend to the outer structure itself (Num. 3:36–37). All the Levites were under Eleazar’s supervision whenever they performed ritual activities inside the sanctuary (Num. 3:32). Otherwise, they were under Ithamar’s authority (Num. 4:28, 33; 7:8).

The next set of differentiating tasks was associated with moving the tabernacle. The corporate job of Aaron’s sons in times of travel was to cover the Ark of the Covenant (or Testimony) with the veil of the tabernacle (Num. 4:5), and then cover the other holy implements (Num. 4:6–14). This was the task of separation: preserving the boundaries of holiness associated with the sacrifices.

Once these vessels were covered, the Kohathites came to assist the sons of Aaron by moving the covered vessels (Num. 4:15). The coverings preserved the visual sanctification of the objects. The Kohathites were warned not to touch any holy object (v. 15b). The objects were carried on poles (“staves”)⁹ inserted through rings¹⁰ or carried on top of bars (vv. 10, 12). God also warned the sons of Aaron not to do this task. “And the LORD spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying, Cut ye not off the tribe of the families of the Kohathites from among the Levites: But thus do unto them, that they may live, and not die, when they approach unto the most holy things: Aaron and his sons shall go in, and appoint them everyone to his service and to his burden: But they shall not go in to see when the holy things are covered, lest they die” (Num. 4:17–20). Kohathites were to be kept away from these objects until the sons of Aaron took down the hanging walls of separation, so that there was no longer any “in” to go into.

The Gershonites were prohibited from doing the work of the Kohathites. Their assignments related to the next circle outward: bearing the curtains of the tabernacle. They disassembled and reassembled the tabernacle’s coverings and the associated furnishings (Num. 4:22–28). They were under the jurisdiction of Ithamar (v. 28).

Similarly, the sons of Merari had their tasks associated with the next outward circle: bearing the boards and pillars (Num. 4:29–33).

9. Numbers 4:6, 8, 11.

10. “And thou shalt put the staves into the rings by the sides of the ark, that the ark may be borne with them. The staves shall be in the rings of the ark: they shall not be taken from it” (Ex. 25:14–15).

They were required to do the same with the outer support structure of the tabernacle (Num. 4:29–33). Each item was assigned to one man by name (v. 32). They, too, were under the jurisdiction of Ithamar (v. 33). The Hebrew word, massaw, indicates carrying or portering. They used oxcarts to transport the various materials (Num. 7:7).

The Levites transported the Ark on a cart in David's day, which was clearly in violation of the law. They were supposed to carry the Ark on poles. This infraction led to the death of Uzzah, who reached out and touched the Ark in order to steady it, and God killed him (II Sam. 6).

If we were to draw a map of authority within the tribe of Levi, it would look like this: the high priest at the center; Eleazar as his servant, in charge of ritual; Ithamar in charge of supervising the other families in non-ritual affairs; followed by Kohath, Gershon, and Merari. Because the Merari family guarded the outer boundaries of the temple, its members bore the sword against intruders. With respect to hierarchy, we can understand this through the analogy of a military chain of command: commanding officer, chaplains, general staff, field grade officers, officers, and enlisted men. All would be in uniform, and only they could lawfully wear these uniforms.

These tasks did not require all of the family members of each of the three Levitical families to serve at the central place of worship all of the time. Presumably, the Aaronic families of Eleazar and Ithamar did remain at the tabernacle full time. Those Levites who were not employed full-time at the tabernacle dwelt in the Levitical cities and in other cities. During war-time, all of the Levites would have returned to the tabernacle to guard it as the last line of defense against foreign invaders.

The Mosaic law did not assign special tasks to those Levites who lived away from the tabernacle. In other words, when outside the sacred boundaries of the tabernacle, the Levites could do whatever they wanted to do. They might teach, provide legal counsel for elders in the gates, farm, engage in trade, or whatever else they had the skills to do. They were not permitted to buy rural farmland, but they could lease it.

D. The Hierarchical Flow of Funds and Service

The language of the texts indicates the subordination of service. The high priest ruled. The sons of Aaron were to serve the high priest; the Kohathites were to serve the sons of Aaron; the Gershonites served the Kohathites; and the sons of Merari were the Levites who served the other families by protecting the perimeter. They bore the sword. The imagery is that of an upward flow of service.

This upward flow of service was paralleled by an upward flow of funds. The Levites collected the tithes of the people; the priests collected the tithes of the Levites. The separation of the family of Levi from any normal inheritance in the land established its moral claim on income from those who enjoyed landed inheritance (Num. 18:20–30). Levi became Israel's substitute for the firstborn son, and therefore he was entitled to the double portion (Deut. 21:17): automatic income. But this double portion eliminated their inheritance in the land.

Authority flowed outward from the throne room in which the tables of the law were housed to the borders of the nation and beyond (Jonah). Funds flowed inward toward that inner circle. The judicial declaration of the law and the ritual purification of the nation had to be paid for. Priestly service was ultimately representative service to God. God dwelt in the inner circles of Israel. He was the highest authority.

1. Tithe of the Tithe

The law established that Levites paid a tithe to Aaron. This referred to the high priest. I find it difficult to believe that one percent of the nation's net increase went each year to one man to cover his basic living expenses. Did this money go only to the sons of Aaron, namely, the priests who offered the sacrifices? The text does not say.

To find the answer, we must ask ourselves: Is the laborer worthy of his hire (Luke 10:7)? If he is, then those Levites who were in full-time service at the tabernacle must have been paid by the high priest. We do not get something for nothing; there are no free lunches. The Mosaic law does not indicate that these servants were self-funded or funded as some sort of family obligation. This is indicated by the text in Nehemiah: "And the priest the son of Aaron shall be with the Levites, when the Levites take tithes: and the Levites shall bring up the tithe of the tithes unto the house of our God, to the chambers, into the treasure house. For the children of Israel and the children of Levi shall bring the offering of the corn, of the new wine, and the oil, unto the chambers, where are the vessels of the sanctuary, and the priests that minister, and the porters, and the singers: and we will not forsake the house of our God" (Neh. 10:38–39). Again, we read: "And all Israel in the days of Zerubbabel, and in the days of Nehemiah, gave the portions of the singers and the porters, every day his portion: and they sanctified holy things unto the Levites; and the Levites sanctified them unto the children of Aaron" (Neh. 12:47).

Who were the priests who received the tithe of the Levites in pre-exilic times?¹¹ Answer: those who were serving God full-time in sacramental activities at the tabernacle. This included those Levites who were serving their tour of duty at the tabernacle. In the tribal division of labor, they could not spend time working at other jobs.

2. Tithe-Exempt

The Levites' tithe to Aaron is specified as a tithe of everything they collected from the other tribes. "Thus speak unto the Levites, and say unto them, When ye take of the children of Israel the tithes which I have given you from them for your inheritance, then ye shall offer up an heave offering of it for the LORD, even a tenth part of the tithe. And this your heave offering shall be reckoned unto you, as though it were the corn of the threshingfloor, and as the fulness of the winepress" (Num. 18:26–27). The phrase, "as though it were the corn of the threshingfloor," indicates that those Levites who made incomes from non-sacramental services paid a tithe on this increase to the priests.

Those at the top of the hierarchy did not pay a tithe. They paid in full-time service to God and to the other tribes. They were judicial intermediaries. Because they devoted all of their time to the service of God and the other tribes, they were not required to pay a tithe to themselves. This indicates that they were not to spend time in commercial ventures, agriculture, and other income-generating activities. Full-time service was defined as sacramental service that was associated with sacrifices and cleansing. It was tied geographically to the tabernacle and/or the holy of holies (when the Ark of the Covenant was not inside the tabernacle, as it was not in the era after Eli and before David brought it back to Jerusalem, the city of David).¹² Such service was closed to those who were not ordained to it. It was explicitly ecclesiastical service. The mark of full-time service was personal exemption from the tithe. It was therefore a mark of total dependence on the tithes of others. The greater the degree of service, the greater the degree of economic dependence. The most authoritative ruler in Israel—the high priest—was the most dependent servant: dependent on God’s grace with respect to the correct performance of his duties and the duties of those priests under his jurisdiction,¹³ and dependent on the people to pay their tithes.

11. This changed in post-exilic times because so few Levites returned and so many priests did. Accompanying Zerubbabel were 4,289 priests (Ezra 2:36–39) and 341 Levites (Ezra 2:40–42). Extra-biblical evidence, mainly from Josephus, indicates that the tithe was divided so that the priests were supported more directly by the fruits of the people. See Life of Flavius Josephus, 15; Antiquities of the Jews, XI:V:8; XX:VIII:8; ix:2. Against Apion 1:22; cited in "Tithe," in Cyclopaedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature, eds. John M'Clintock and James Strong, 12 vols. (New York: Harper & Bros, 1894), X, p. 436.

12. Jerusalem was known as the city of David (II Sam. 5:6–7). David brought the Ark back to his city (II Sam. 6:12).

This principle has not changed. Ministers of independent churches do not owe a tithe to the church on their income gained from the church. There is no need for an accounting game of “pay the minister’s tithe,” with the church paying him a larger salary so that he has enough money to live on after the tithe, which goes back to the church. Those working in what is euphemistically called full-time Christian service owe a tithe to the local church unless they are employed by the church. Salaries received from the church in exchange for services to the church are not to be tithed. This, of course, does not apply to profit-seeking businesses that sell goods or services to the church. This rule applies to individuals who are paid by a local church to perform services associated with that church’s official tasks, if they are also members of this church. If they are members of another local church, then their tithe goes to the other church.

This exemption from the tithe applies only to employment by the church, which possesses a lawful sacerdotal monopoly. It does not apply to employment by parachurch organizations. For example, a person who is employed by a parachurch organization who then tithes his income back to this organization is doing more than playing economically meaningless accounting games; he is rebelling against God. He owes the tithe to his local church.

E. Holiness and the Division of Labor

The priesthood was hierarchical. Different branches within Levi performed different tasks. This separated authority hierarchically within the tribe of Levi, and it separated Levitical authority to declare the law hierarchically to the other tribes.

Korah was a member of the family of Kohath. He was Moses’ cousin: the son of Moses’ uncle, Izhar (Ex. 6:18–21). He led a democratic revolt against Moses. “Now Korah, the son of Izhar, the son of Kohath, the son of Levi, and Dathan and Abiram, the sons of Eliab, and On, the son of Peleth, sons of Reuben, took men: And they rose up before Moses, with certain of the children of Israel, two hundred and fifty princes of the assembly, famous in the congregation, men of renown: And they gathered themselves together against Moses and against Aaron, and said unto them, Ye take too much upon you, seeing all the congregation are holy, everyone of them, and the LORD is among them: wherefore then lift ye up yourselves above the congregation of the LORD?” (Num. 16:1–3). Korah’s revolt rested judicially on the basis of the supposed equality of authority within Israel. God disposed of them appropriately: by causing the earth to open up beneath them (Num. 16:31–33). They had lifted themselves up; God would pull them down. But not immediately.

13. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 4.

For Korah to make such a democratic claim, he had to enlist the cooperation of members of at least one other tribe. His claim would have made no sense had he limited his recruiting to the tribe of Levi. To have done so would have pointed to the existence of hierarchy in Israel: Levi over all the others. This would have undermined his claim. Therefore, Korah had to approach the sacred center of Israel accompanied by non-Levites. He also had to participate in a profane act: the transgressing of a sacred boundary.

Moses’ prophetic test of equality was both geographical and liturgical: to have all claimants to priestly authority light fires. Those who did not possess lawful hierarchical authority to perform such a liturgical act would be placed under God’s direct negative sanctions. Their fire would be declared strange fire. Moses proposed a test based on sacrilege, which in turn was based on the division of labor. “And he spake unto Korah and unto all his company, saying, Even to morrow the LORD will shew who are his, and who is holy; and will cause him to come near unto him: even him whom he hath chosen will he cause to come near unto him. This do; Take you censers, Korah, and all his company; And put fire therein, and put incense in them before the LORD to morrow: and it shall be that the man whom the LORD doth choose, he shall be holy: ye take too much upon you, ye sons of Levi” (Num. 16:5–7). The holiness of separation would soon prove to be total.

Moses criticized Korah for the latter’s refusal to be content with the high degree of authority that God had given to the Levites: “And Moses said unto Korah, Hear, I pray you, ye sons of Levi: Seemeth it but a small thing unto you, that the God of Israel hath separated you from the congregation of Israel, to bring you near to himself to do the service of the tabernacle of the LORD, and to stand before the congregation to minister unto them? And he hath brought thee near to him, and all thy brethren the sons of Levi with thee: and seek ye the priesthood also?" (Num. 16:8–10). But Korah wanted even more authority.

Moses declared himself to be a prophet in terms of God's immediate application of negative sanctions: "And Moses said, Hereby ye shall know that the LORD hath sent me to do all these works; for I have not done them of mine own mind. If these men die the common death of all men, or if they be visited after the visitation of all men; then the LORD hath not sent me. But if the LORD make a new thing, and the earth open her mouth, and swallow them up, with all that appertain unto them, and they go down quick into the pit; then ye shall understand that these men have provoked the LORD" (Num. 16:28–30). The Old Covenant prophet was a prophet because God's negative sanctions predictably followed the prophet's declaration of a covenant lawsuit. This is why the office no longer exists under the New Covenant, and also why the negative civil sanction of capital punishment for false prophecy (Deut. 18:20–21) no longer applies. The Old Covenant's rigorous temporal predictability no longer exists.

God's visible judgment against Korah made it clear that the Mosaic Covenant's hierarchy of priestly authority was a hierarchy of power. This is because it was a hierarchy of sacramental holiness. This hierarchy of holiness was the basis of a division of labor in the service of God. Not everyone had the authority to approach God's inner sanctum by passing through the concentric circles of holiness that surrounded it. Korah had proclaimed the doctrine of equal holiness. God pronounced visible judgment against this doctrine by destroying him and those allied with him. The division of labor in Israel would be retained.

These concentric circles ended definitively at the crucifixion, when the veil of the temple was rent, top to bottom (Matt. 27:51). That this tearing began at the top of the veil indicated that God had initiated it. Nevertheless, what was definitive judicially took a generation to fulfill. The high priest still possessed a sacrosanct position, which Paul acknowledged when he apologized for having berated him, not knowing that he was the high priest (Acts 23:4–5). Not until the fall of Jerusalem and the burning of the temple by the Romans did the Mosaic law's degrees of priestly holiness finally cease. The fires of the altar ended forever when God burned the temple. The altar's fire had become strange fire through Old Covenant Israel's rebellion. The priesthood ended, thereby ending the influence of the Sadducee party. The Pharisees—defenders of the oral law, unlike the Sadducees¹⁴—replaced them as the leaders of the new religion of Judaism.¹⁵

F. Monopoly Services and Economic Dependence

The Levites provided teaching services and judgment to the nation. They also carried the tabernacle from place to place. Both forms of service involved holiness. The Levites had been set aside by God for these purposes. These services were tribal monopolies. As monopolies, they could have become opportunities for economic oppression. God placed economic limits on the Levites in order to limit their economic return from the possession of these monopolies: a limit of ten percent of any increase in wealth by the people and the Levites' requirement to provide free freight hauling services. Those who were involved in transporting the tabernacle became priests for the duration of the journey: full-time priestly servants of God. The free market's pricing principle—high bid wins—did not apply to the ecclesiastical services performed by the Levites. The tithe did.

The Mosaic Covenant clearly established the principle of tribal interdependence. In Mosaic Israel, the tribes other than Levi were covenantally incapable of serving God sacramentally by themselves. They became covenantally dependent on members of the tribe of Levi to serve as intermediaries between them and God. The inter-tribal link among the other dozen tribes was the tribe of Levi, which served all the others and collected tithes from them.

The Levites were heavily (though not exclusively) dependent economically on the other tribes for their income. They were more dependent in the early stages of Mosaic Israel's history than God intended them to be as time went on. God made them economically dependent initially by way of the laws of landed inheritance: they did not participate in the original distribution, nor could they buy up rural land or inherit it.¹⁶ As the nation grew in numbers and wealth, how-

14. Herbert Danby, "Introduction," The Mishnah (New York: Oxford University Press, [1933] 1987), pp. xviii–xix.

15. The key figure in this transition was Johanan ben Zakkei. Ibid., pp. xxx–xx. On Judaism as a post-A.D. 70 religion, see Jacob Neusner, Judaism and Scripture: The Evidence of Leviticus Rabbah (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986), Preface.

16. With this exception: "And if he will not redeem the field, or if he have sold the ever, this economic dependence would have been reduced by the increasing value of urban property in relation to rural land. Mosaic law was biased against capital in rural land, for the law favored population growth: fewer miscarriages (Ex. 23:26) and longer life spans (Ex. 20:12) for covenantal obedience. Population growth in the context of a fixed supply of rural land, with all male heirs inheriting, leads to ever-smaller family allotments.¹⁷ Under such conditions of covenantal blessing, the Levites, who could own inheritable real estate in the cities, would have seen their income sources less dependent on tithes based on the agricultural productivity of the other tribes.

Levites were not prohibited from owning urban businesses, so their economic dependence on the other tribes would have been reduced over time, at least when the nation was covenantally faithful to God. This was an economic incentive for the Levites to teach and enforce God's law. God's positive corporate sanction to Israel—urban growth—would have served as a subsidy to the Levites, who would have been more likely to buy urban real estate prior to this demographic shift. They were more likely to be early residents of cities, since they could not lawfully inherit rural land.

There could have been another factor in the decreasing economic dependence of Levi: the growing size of the tribe in comparison to the numbers involved in full-time priestly service. When the need to transport the tabernacle ended with the completion of the temple, this reduced an important aspect of priestly service. This Levitical service was replaced by singing (I Chron. 15:15–16). Also, it is possible that the number of priests required for the sacrifices would not have grown proportionately to the tribe of Levi. That would have depended on the demand for sacrifices by the general population. It is possible that the growth in demand for sacrifices would have required many more priests. We do not know. We do know that far more priests returned from the exile than Levites (Ezra 2:36–42).

There was a dual monopoly in Mosaic Israel: control over sacrifice by the Levites and control over rural land by the other tribes. Members of the other tribes had no hope of obtaining the guaranteed income of the tithe unless they were adopted into a Levite family (Lev. 27:2–8). The Levites had no hope in agricultural inheritance. The dozen other field to another man, it shall not be redeemed any more. But the field, when it goeth out in the jubile, shall be holy unto the LORD, as a field devoted; the possession thereof shall be the priest's" (Lev. 27:20–21). See North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 37.

17. Ibid., ch. 34.

tribes had to be fed spiritually by the Levites. The Levites were to be fed literally by the other tribes. Each of the monopolists knew that what he possessed was incomplete, that he would have to supply services to others in order to prosper.

G. Mobility at Some Price

As men approached the holy of holies, there was increasingly limited lawful geographical mobility. This limited mobility was based on the presence of sacred boundaries. Transgression of these boundaries was not a violation of etiquette; it was a violation of sacred space: profanity.

Israelite society was not characterized by a fixed hierarchy, especially a hierarchy of inheritance. The sacred hierarchy was confined to a single tribe. This opened the possibility of social mobility for those outside the tribe of Levi. There were no economic guarantees outside of Levi, but there were also no significant restraints on what a free man could earn or do with his capital, including time. There was the jubilee law (Lev. 25), but this law was to be applied infrequently; Economically speaking, its effects would have become decreasingly significant over time in a covenantally faithful society, as a result of the decreasing economic relevance of agricultural landed property.

The sacred boundaries for Israelites were limited to the area close to the tabernacle. Beyond this geographical limit, men could go where they would. They could rise as high as their talents would allow when God's law was enforced. There was no caste system that specified that a man, family, or tribe had to perform this or that service. Service was contractual. With the exception of those services identified by God's law as inherently immoral, each person could offer his services for sale without restriction. Because Israelite society was not sacred, service was not fixed. Sacred boundaries applied only to the sacramental realm of the sacrifices. Had Mosaic society been universally sacred, these sacred boundaries would have encased men and their talents within tight legal and geographical boundaries.

Beyond the sacred space of the tabernacle, and outside of any sacred services performed by local Levites, men were free to move. So, they were free to choose. They could offer to buy their way into whatever position was for sale, whether they used their labor or their money as the appropriate currency of access. Every hierarchy other than the hierarchy of ecclesiastical service, which included the king's office as military priest in times of holy warfare, was temporary. Because men possessed the legal right of mobility, upward and downward, the hierarchies that existed at any point in time were mobile.

The covenantal hierarchy of the priesthood was sacred: a matter of life and death. The covenantal hierarchy in the army was quasi-priestly: control over life and death. The respective chains of command were necessary for the performance of oath-bound service. The hierarchical structure of both of these hierarchies could lawfully be defended by the threat of violence. Outsiders could not gain lawful access apart from adoption and/or oath. The same is true in a family, another oath-bound institution. But there is no fourth institution lawfully established by means of a covenantal oath.

With the annulment of the Mosaic priesthood, neither birth nor family adoption is necessary to gain access to the mediatorial ecclesiastical office of minister. Only a wife¹⁸ and a ministerial oath is mandated. Even in the case of the military services, access to the top positions has generally been open to men of lower classes during wartime. The man who repeatedly wins battles “buys” his way into senior military positions normally closed in times of peace. The currency of upward mobility during wartime is victory. This is why, in Tocqueville’s opinion, the non-commissioned officer in a democratic army favors war.¹⁹ Exemplary service in battle, coupled with the high death rate of officers, are his ways of gaining permanent promotion.

This stands as a warning: in a non-covenantal hierarchy, those who seek to use violence against others in order to maintain their places against those who wish to compete lawfully for office, income, or position have violated God’s law. If they invoke the state as their agent of coercion, they have sinned. The free market principle of “high bid wins” must be honored. The right to bid for place is fundamental to biblical liberty. Others must be allowed to buy their way into any non-covenantal hierarchy if access is for sale—and access is almost always for sale, although the terms may be unofficial and concealed.

In modern democracy, political incumbents establish new layers of bureaucracy and reinforce old layers in order to seal off outsiders from access to civil authority. The Italian theorist Robert Michels called this the iron law of oligarchy.²⁰ This sociological law may be iron-like, but any use of force to preserve the benefits of an oligarchy is biblically illegitimate. A society that allows such acts to become widespread and then endemic will eventually come under God's judgment in history. The nearly bloodless collapse of Communism's bureaucracies in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and its satellites, 1989 to 1991, is the most graphic display in modern history of the reality of this cause-and-effect relationship. Communism literally went bankrupt.²¹ This economic bankruptcy after seven decades had caught up with Communism's theoretical bankruptcy,²² which in turn had created moral bankruptcy.²³ The Soviet hierarchy, established by force,²⁴ collapsed. Or better put, its members found new ways of imposing force and surviving, but without the ideology of international Communism to justify the use of force.

18. “This is a true saying, If a man desire the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work. A bishop then must be blameless, the husband of one wife, vigilant, sober, of good behaviour, given to hospitality, apt to teach” (1 Tim. 3:1–2).

19. Alexis de Tocqueville, Democracy in America, ed. J. P. Meyer, 2 vols. (Garden City, New York: Anchor, [1966] 1969), II (1840), ch. 23, p. 654.

H. The Inevitability of Hierarchy

Hierarchy is an inescapable concept, built into the creation through the dominion covenant: man's exercise of dominion over the creation. God acts through intermediaries. The husband exercises headship over his wife and children, for whom he is responsible. The general exercises authority over his troops, for whom he is responsible. Hierarchy is an outworking of representative responsibility: God holds leaders more responsible than followers for the outcome of events, even though followers, corporately, are the intermediate source of a leader's authority. Authority is distributed by God from the top down and from the bottom up simultaneously.²⁵ Nevertheless, God holds leaders more responsible than followers: with greater authority comes greater responsibility (Luke 12:47–48).

Hierarchy in Mosaic Israel was based on the sacrosanct yet limited 20. Robert Michels, Political Parties: A Sociological Study of Oligarchical Tendencies of Modern Democracy (New York: Free Press, [1908] 1949).

21. Judy Shelton, The Coming Soviet Crash: Gorbachev's Desperate Pursuit of Credit in Western Financial Markets (New York: Free Press, 1989).

22. Gary North, Marx's Religion of Revolution: Regeneration Through Chaos (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1968] 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnmrror>)

23. Konstantin Simis, USSR: The Corrupt Society: The Secret World of Soviet Capitalism (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1982).

24. Michael Voslensky, Nomenklatura: The Soviet Ruling Class (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1984); Davis K. Willis, KLASS: How Russians Really Live (New York: St. Martin's, 1985).

25. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 4.

extent of the sacred. The sacred did not encompass everything in Israel; on the contrary, it encompassed very little, and the narrow boundaries of sacred space were evidence of this. While ethical transgression was common, necessitating sacred sacrifices, profaning sacred boundaries was rare, for profanation was frequently fatal. It was rarely repeated by the same person. Fear of sacred space was widespread.

The fixed hierarchical boundaries of the Levites were tied to the fixed concentric structure of sacred boundaries. When these boundaries were annulled by the New Covenant, the old tribal hierarchy was annulled with it. The torn veil of the temple pointed to the torn condition of tribal boundaries. The Mosaic priesthood ended, and with it, the tribal separations.

What the Bible denies is the legitimacy of judicially fixed hierarchies in non-covenantal institutions. The Bible does not promote equality. There is no equality in heaven (I Cor. 3:14), nor is there equality in hell (Luke 12:47–48). There is a bedrock individualism in biblical sociology because there is an inescapable individualism in final judgment. No person can transfer responsibility to another person and thereby escape the consequences of his actions (Gen. 3:12–13). Yet there is also a bedrock corporate element in biblical sociology: final judgment is announced to two great collectives: sheep and goats, saved and lost (Matt. 25).

I mention this because, as a late twentieth-century social theorist, I am well aware of the conflict between liberalism and conservatism, a conflict that cannot be mediated by radicalism. Conservative sociologist Robert Nisbet has described it well: "If the central ethos of liberalism is individual emancipation, and that of radicalism the expansion of political power in the service of social and moral zeal, the ethos of conservatism is tradition, essentially medieval tradition. From conservatism's defense of social tradition sprang its emphasis on the values of community, kinship, hierarchy, authority, and religion, and also its premonitions of social chaos surmounted by absolute power once individuals had become wrenched from the contexts of these values by the forces of liberalism and radicalism."²⁶ The twentieth century saw the fruition of conservatism's fears: two world wars, Communism, Nazism, and the alienation and despair produced by individual moral debauchery. Yet we should not ignore an insight of the mischievous libertarian humorist, P. J. O'Rourke. If you think the good old days were good, think of one word: dentistry.

26. Robert A. Nisbet, The Sociological Tradition (New York: Basic Books, 1966), p. 11.

In opposition to the individualism of liberalism, the collectivism of radicalism, and the traditionalism of conservatism, I offer biblical covenantalism: a sovereign God whose decree governs history, who has been revealed in history by the Bible and Jesus Christ, both called the word of God, who have announced God's unchanging standards. I proclaim God's predictable visible corporate sanctions in history, leading to the progressive triumph of His elect representatives in history. Covenantal social theory has a place for the conservative ideals of community (church), kinship (family), hierarchy, and authority. But it also has a place for the liberal ideals of individualism, progress, science, peaceful political change (democracy), and economic growth. What is needed today, and will be needed in a thousand years, is a theoretically coherent and practical integration of these ideals which preserves personal liberty without sacrificing the bonds of community, and also preserves sufficient political power to repel military invaders and suppress domestic disturbers of the peace. Without sanctions, there is no hierarchy; there is only opinion. Point four and point two of the biblical covenant model are intimately linked.

Conclusion

The hierarchy of sacred service in Mosaic Israel involved a hierarchy of authority. The high priest was at the pinnacle of this hierarchy. He had far greater responsibility than those under him. Below him came the sons of Aaron. Then came the other Levites: Kohath, Gershon, and Merari. Below them came the other tribes. The closer that a man's service came to the Ark of the Covenant, the more dangerous it was. This system of geographical holiness kept each man in his place. As a man approached Israel's central holy place, he in effect approached God's holy mountain, and like Mt. Sinai, where God met with Moses to establish the covenant and deliver the law, it was a capital offense for insufficiently holy Israelites to cross its boundary (Ex. 19:12–13).

Participants in Israel's holy commonwealth knew that they could not operate alone. They knew also that services had to be paid for. There were no free lunches in Israel, although the presence of the manna in the Ark at the very center of the nation testified that there had been partially subsidized lunches in the wilderness. The curse of the ground had been removed for a season.

There was no possibility of equality in Israel; the society was hierarchical. The closer to the Ark that a man operated lawfully, the greater his sacerdotal authority and responsibility, and also the greater his economic dependance on the economic success of others and their obedience to the law. While the high priest in Israel would probably never go hungry, he risked God's sanctions every time he performed a mandated ritual. The fiery testimony of Nadab and Abihu was sufficient warning. No one could lawfully trade places with him, and no one who wanted to live would have tried.

Priestly service was governed by the workshop rule: a place for everything, and everything in its place. But the farther away from the holy of holies, the less that Israel was governed by this narrowly circumscribed law. The office of high priest was unique. There could only be one high priest at a time. The farther away from the Ark, the less that any man had a specific mandated service or required place. Put differently, priestly service is judicially more specific than non-priestly service.

Let us consider the most successful of all the non-biblical systems of sacred hierarchy in man's history: Hinduism. The Hindu system of permanent religious castes is the product of a religious worldview that extends the principle of priestly service to all of life. A man born into one caste cannot advance himself or his family if such advancement is dependent upon his performing services that are monopolies of another caste. Social stagnation in Hindu society is correlative to its vision of the proper maintenance of religious tradition, even to the point of denying the cosmic reality of linear change.

Life is religious. It is also judicially protected by God. There is a right to life under God's law, but this is not a sacred right, for life is not a sacred rite. To argue otherwise is to move in the direction of Hinduism's caste society.

By confining sacred service within narrow geographical and tribal boundaries, God opened Mosaic society to the possibility of upward social mobility and progress. Sacred hierarchy there was, but it was tightly bounded, both for its own protection and the protection of the society around it.

4

THE FIRSTBORN AND NEGATIVE ECONOMIC SANCTIONS

And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, And I, behold, I have taken the Levites from among the children of Israel instead of all the firstborn that openeth the matrix among the children of Israel: therefore the Levites shall be mine; Because all the firstborn are mine; for on the day that I smote all the firstborn in the land of Egypt I hallowed unto me all the firstborn in Israel, both man and beast: mine shall they be: I am the LORD (Num. 3:11–13).

The theocentric focus of this law is God's ownership. This passage announced God's unique proprietary claim on the Levites because of their position as the sacrificial substitutes for the firstborn sons of Israel. As Creator, God owns everything, but He established here a special claim on the firstborn, including animals. This special claim had its origin in God's execution of the firstborn sons of Egypt.

God hallowed (kawdash) the firstborn. The Hebrew word kawdash means holy or sanctified. The word is also used with respect to the sabbath. "And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified [kawdash] it: because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made" (Gen. 2:3). "Remember the sabbath day, to keep [kawdash] it holy [kawdash]" (Ex. 20:8). "For in six days the LORD made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the LORD blessed the sabbath day, and hallowed [kawdash] it" (Ex. 20:11). The word means set apart. God is the Lord of each day of the week (general claim), yet He has set apart one day as His special holy day (special claim). There are six common days and one holy day. This distinction between common and holy applied to the Levites' position among the tribes of Mosaic Israel. The law of the firstborn's redemption appears immediately prior to the law of the sabbath (Ex. 34:20–21).

A. Firstborn Sons

Did firstborn refer only to a son? Both text and context indicate that it did. First, in relationship to covenantal inheritance, God designated the nation of Israel as His firstborn son. God told Moses: “And thou shalt say unto Pharaoh, Thus saith the LORD, Israel is my son, even my firstborn: And I say unto thee, Let my son go, that he may serve me: and if thou refuse to let him go, behold, I will slay thy son, even thy firstborn” (Ex. 4:22–23).

Second, the subsequent system of sacrifice mandated sacrifices for firstborn sons, not daughters. “But the firstling of an ass thou shalt redeem with a lamb: and if thou redeem him not, then shalt thou break his neck. All the firstborn of thy sons thou shalt redeem. And none shall appear before me empty” (Ex. 34:20; emphasis added). The interpretation of biblical passages that are less specific should be governed by passages that are more specific. This one is less specific: “Sanctify unto me all the firstborn, whatsoever openeth the womb among the children of Israel, both of man and of beast: it is mine” (Ex. 13:2). This one is more specific: the Israelite father’s words to his inquiring son. “And it came to pass, when Pharaoh would hardly let us go, that the LORD slew all the firstborn in the land of Egypt, both the firstborn of man, and the firstborn of beast: therefore I sacrifice to the LORD all that openeth the matrix, being males; but all the firstborn of my children I redeem” (Ex. 13:15; emphasis added). The father acts as God did: slaying firstborn male animals (reflecting Egypt’s loss) and redeeming his firstborn son (reflecting Israel’s gain).

Third, when requiring the substitution of Levites for firstborn Israelites, God specified firstborn sons: “And the LORD said unto Moses, Number all the firstborn of the males of the children of Israel from a month old and upward, and take the number of their names” (Num. 3:40). When the sex of the firstborn child is not specified, the Bible assumes the child is masculine: “And it shall be, that the firstborn which she beareth shall succeed in the name of his brother which is dead, that his name be not put out of Israel” (Deut. 25:6; emphasis added). This is how the Book of Nehemiah interpreted firstborn: “Also the firstborn of our sons, and of our cattle, as it is written in the law, and the firstlings of our herds and of our flocks, to bring to the house of our God, unto the priests that minister in the house of our God” (Neh. 10:36).

Fourth, when the judgment came on Egypt, it was a judgment against the nation's strength: "He smote also all the firstborn in their land, the chief of all their strength" (Ps. 105:36). This corresponds to Jacob's identification of firstborn Reuben as his might, strength, and power (Gen. 49:3). This was what made David's position unique: the eighth son of Jesse was the heir who became the strong man and king (1 Sam. 17:12, 14).

Fifth, prior to the substitution of the Levites for the firstborn sons of the other tribes, the nature of the redemption system was unstated. "Thou shalt not delay to offer the first of thy ripe fruits, and of thy liquors [vintage]: the firstborn of thy sons shalt thou give unto me" (Ex. 22:29). This involved some sort of formal dedication, but God did not say what this dedication was. This law pointed to the nation's need of a system of redemption, but it did not offer specifics. Israelites were to look forward to the establishment of a redemption system; until then, they were mentally to set apart their firstborn sons. Having set apart (made holy) their firstborn sons, the parents had to wait upon God to tell them what to do next, just as Abraham had to wait upon God for further details in the sacrifice of Isaac. They were to set apart their firstborn; then they were to wait for God to tell them what to do next. But they were not willing to wait on God; instead, they "rose up to play" (Ex. 32:6). In response, God had Levi impose the negative sanction of death on their representatives (Ex. 32:28).

Sixth, only firstborn sons were entitled to a double inheritance (Deut. 21:15–17). There was no similar provision for firstborn daughters when all of the children were girls. Daughters in such a household had a right of landed inheritance in Israel, so long as they did not marry outside their tribe (Num. 36). But the absence of any reference to double inheritance indicates that the double portion was related to the extension of a man's name and strength in Israel. Not being entitled to the unique covenantal blessing, the firstborn daughter was not under the unique covenantal burden.

B. Passover, Sanctions, and Succession

God said, "for on the day that I smote all the firstborn in the land of Egypt I hallowed unto me all the firstborn in Israel, both man and beast: mine shall they be: I am the LORD" (v. 13). Something had happened on the first Passover night to change the previous legal relationship between God and the firstborn. The question is: What?

The firstborn prior to the first Passover had been exclusively a positive sanction from God. The firstborn was entitled to a special blessing from his father, which is why Jacob deceived Isaac regarding his identity: he wanted the blessing that would have gone to Esau (Gen. 27:19), had God not revealed to Rebekah that Jacob was the chosen son (Gen. 25:23), and had not Esau sold his birthright to Jacob (Gen. 25:33). The firstborn was the extension of the father's might, dignity, and power. The firstborn was God's sign that through succession, the father's name and rule would extend into the future. After the Passover, however, there was a negative sanction associated with the firstborn, both of sons and male animals. "And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, Sanctify unto me all the firstborn, whatsoever openeth the womb among the children of Israel, both of man and of beast: it is mine" (Ex. 13:1-2). Why was there the imposition of a negative economic sanction?

This had something to do with the judicially representative character of the firstborn. The firstborn represented the future: a family's future and, corporately, a nation's future. God placed a unique claim on this inheritance after the death of the firstborn of Egypt. He called the firstborn His. He did not limit this to humans; it included the animals, too. To enforce His claim of ownership after the first Passover, God imposed a system of negative sanctions. As we shall see, clean animals had to be slain, unclean animals redeemed with a money payment, and sons redeemed with a money payment.

No Egyptian family escaped the negative sanction of the death of the firstborn (Ex. 12:29-30). When Israel departed, the Israelites took with them much of the wealth of Egypt (Ex. 12:35).¹ All the firstborn sons of Egypt were dead. Israel, God's firstborn son, therefore inherited what would have been the inheritance of the firstborn Egyptians. This transfer of inheritance, family by family, was the result of God's negative sanctions against the original heirs. The spoils of Egypt repaid Israel for decades of slavery—the kidnapping of God's firstborn—but in a unique form: wealth gained as a direct result of the death of the firstborn sons of Egypt. What is important here is the link between negative sanctions—the death of Egypt's firstborn—and disinheritance. God's provision of an inheritance for Israel (positive) was based on His disinheritance of Egypt (negative). The historical means of Egypt's disinheritance was the death of Egypt's firstborn. In short, the sanction of death was the historic basis of the subsequent disinheriance-inheritance. This covenantal process of sanctions/inheritance-disinheritance was to be repeated in the conquest of Canaan a generation later.

1. This wealth was sufficient to enable 600,000 men to pay the half shekel of silver three times in the wilderness.

The Mosaic penalty for kidnapping was death: “And he that stealeth a man, and selleth him, or if he be found in his hand, he shall surely be put to death” (Ex. 21:16). God found His son in the hands of the representative agent of the kidnappers: Pharaoh. Pharaoh’s accomplices were given an opportunity to renounce the crime and escape bloodguilt by placing the blood of a lamb on their doorposts, but no Egyptian family complied. This led to the comprehensive disinheritance of Egypt: “And it came to pass, that at midnight the LORD smote all the firstborn in the land of Egypt, from the firstborn of Pharaoh that sat on his throne unto the firstborn of the captive that was in the dungeon; and all the firstborn of cattle” (Ex. 12:29).

The Passover was required of the Israelites to remind them of the night in which God’s wrath passed over the families of Israel. The shedding of a lamb’s blood had protected each family. But Israel was not to forget the negative sanction imposed on Egypt: “That ye shall say, It is the sacrifice of the LORD’s passover, who passed over the houses of the children of Israel in Egypt, when he smote the Egyptians, and delivered our houses. And the people bowed the head and worshipped” (Ex. 12:27). The positive sanction of national deliverance was accomplished through the negative sanction of corporate execution. The shedding of blood preceded this deliverance: the shedding of the lambs’ blood. Either a lamb’s blood was shed or else the firstborn son perished in the households of Israel and Egypt.²

At the first Passover, firstborn sons became uniquely representative of the future: the future of Egypt and the future of Israel. So representative was the firstborn son at the first Passover that he died unless he had a blood covering: firstborn animals and firstborn sons. The Passover brought a negative sanction: death. The outcome of this sanction determined succession and inheritance in Egypt: the Egyptians’ second-born sons (if any) were disinherited by the departing Israelites. This indicates that point four of the biblical covenant model—sanctions—is judicially bound up with point five: succession.

2. I do not think lambs’ blood was necessarily mandatory for the non-Egyptian, non-Israelite slaves. See Appendix I.

C. Firstborn Rites

Immediately following the recapitulation of the law of the Passover (Ex. 13:3–10), we read:

And it shall be when the LORD shall bring thee into the land of the Canaanites, as he sware unto thee and to thy fathers, and shall give it thee, That thou shalt set apart unto the LORD all that openeth the matrix, and every firstling that cometh of a beast which thou hast; the males shall be the LORD'S. And every firstling of an ass thou shalt redeem with a lamb; and if thou wilt not redeem it, then thou shalt break his neck: and all the firstborn of man among thy children shalt thou redeem. And it shall be when thy son asketh thee in time to come, saying, What is this? that thou shalt say unto him, By strength of hand the LORD brought us out from Egypt, from the house of bondage: And it came to pass, when Pharaoh would hardly let us go, that the LORD slew all the firstborn in the land of Egypt, both the firstborn of man, and the firstborn of beast: therefore I sacrifice to the LORD all that openeth the matrix, being males; but all the firstborn of my children I redeem. And it shall be for a token upon thine hand, and for frontlets between thine eyes: for by strength of hand the LORD brought us forth out of Egypt (Ex. 13:11–16).

As in the case of the Passover, they were to do this as a means of instructing each generation in the story of their deliverance from Egypt. Firstborn animals were either to be slain or redeemed with money. Leviticus 27 specified that the firstborn of clean animals had to be sacrificed: “. . . no man shall sanctify it; whether it be ox, or sheep: it is the LORD'S” (v. 26b). That meant that it had to die. The firstborn of an unclean animal had to be redeemed by paying their market value plus one-fifth (v. 27).

The one exception was the donkey: it had to be slain by breaking its neck, or else it could be redeemed by the sacrifice of a lamb. We shall consider the reason for this exception later in this chapter. The donkey and the horse were unclean animals. They had hooves, but these hooves were not cloven. To be a clean beast with hooves, it had to have cloven hooves and also chew the cud (Lev. 11:3–7). Horses were comparatively rare in Israel; the donkey was the commonly used beast of transport for man.

As in the case of the Passover feast (Ex. 12:26–27), sons were expected to ask what the meaning of this practice was. The meaning here was the same as the meaning of Passover: (1) the family's deliverance (positive sanction) through the shedding of a lamb's blood (negative sanction); (2) collecting the inheritance of Egypt (positive sanction) through the death of Egypt's firstborn (negative sanction).

As already mentioned, unclean animals were not to be killed; they were instead redeemed by a payment. "Every thing that openeth the matrix in all flesh, which they bring unto the LORD, whether it be of men or beasts, shall be thine: nevertheless the firstborn of man shalt thou surely redeem, and the firstling of unclean beasts shalt thou redeem" (Num. 18:15). A money payment had to be substituted for Israelite firstborn males and unclean animals. Was the link here based on Israelite firstborn as judicially unclean? No, but they, like unclean beasts, were not eligible to serve as literal sacrifices. So, a substitute payment was mandatory. After the rebellion of the golden calf incident, the required sacrifice was specified by God as economic. It had not been specified prior to this incident.

The firstborn son, who before the revolt was the son who extended the father's strength, became an economic liability compared to his brothers. The rejoicing of fathers was reduced by the expense of this sacrifice. God had delivered His firstborn son on the night of the first Passover. After the rebellion at Sinai, something associated retroactively with the deliverance from Egypt led to God's imposition of a cost associated with the firstborn.³ The close association of this law with the Passover regulations (Ex. 13:2–3) pointed to the Passover as the definitive event.

D. The Levites as Substitutes

When Israel in the wilderness abandoned the God of their deliverance and pressured Aaron to construct a golden calf, the nation allied itself spiritually with a false god. The Levites subsequently came to the defense of God's name by joining Moses in imposing the sanction of blood. They executed 3,000 men (Ex. 32:28). This became the basis of their blessing from God: "For Moses had said, Consecrate yourselves to day to the LORD, even every man upon his son, and upon his brother; that he may bestow upon you a blessing this day" (Ex. 32:29). Their deliverance from the curse of Jacob (Gen. 49:7) was made possible by their participation in the shedding of blood. The 3,000 executions were representative sacrifices that placated God's wrath against the nation. The Levites became the nation's priestly tribe because of their willingness to participate in what was in part an atoning sacrifice and in part a defense of God's name.

3. This points to a fundamental biblical principle: God must sacrifice something when He delivers His people. He sacrifices what Abraham was asked to sacrifice: His son. Abraham was offered a substitute to save his son: a ram (Gen. 22:13). Israel on Passover night was offered a substitute to save a firstborn son: a lamb. These substitutions were possible only because God did not substitute a lesser sacrifice for His son.

They gained a unique inheritance because of this. They would henceforth receive redemption money from the other tribes. This substitute payment benefitted the other tribes, who were released from an obligation that would otherwise have bound firstborn sons. The theological debate is over what that obligation was, as we shall see. What is clear is that the Levites did not pay this redemption money to themselves or to the priests, since they had been chosen by God to serve Him as representatives of the nation. They did not make a substitute payment, for they had become the substitute payment.

The Levites became the priestly tribe after the golden calf incident. They also became substitutes for the firstborn sons. The question is: Why did the firstborn sons need substitutes? The traditional Jewish answer is that firstborn sons would have had to become priests if the Levites had not replaced them. Rashi,⁴ the eleventh-century commentator, argued along these lines.⁵ Samson Raphael Hirsch, the intellectual founder of what in his day came to be called Orthodox Judaism, wrote in the nineteenth century: "By the transference of the service of the Sanctuary from the firstborn to the Levites, the consecration of the firstborn is not removed. They remain, unaffected by the transference, consecrated to God."⁶

The problem with this argument is that the context does not indicate sacrifice in the sense of personal service to God. The context indicates sacrifice in the sense of execution. The firstborn animals were not given to the priests for their use; on the contrary, they were either killed or redeemed. Unclean animals had to be redeemed with money. Why? Because they could not serve as sacrificial substitutes.

There is nothing in the texts governing the firstborn to indicate that the firstborn son had some unique claim on priestly service. The Bible never says that a firstborn son under the Old Covenant would automatically have become a family priest in the household of his fath-

4. Rabbi Solomon (Shlomo) Yizchaki.

5. Rashi, Chumash with Targum Onkelos, Haphtaroth and Rashi's Commentary, trans. A. M. Silbermann and M. Rosenbaum, 5 vols. (Jerusalem: Silbermann Family, [1934] 1985 [Jewish year: 5745]), IV, p. 11 (Num. 3:12–15).

6. Samson Raphael Hirsch, The Pentateuch, 5 vols. (Gateshead, London: Judaica Press, [1875?] 1989), IV, Numbers, p. 29 (Num. 3:13).

er. Both Cain and Abel offered priestly sacrifices, not just Cain (Gen. 4:3–4). By the time a man reached 30 years old, the age of Mosaic priestly service (Num. 4:47), he would probably have been the head of his own family.

Someone had to serve as a priest, but this office was not said to be a monopoly of firstborn sons. Prior to the golden calf incident, Moses used young men of Israel as assistants: “And Moses wrote all the words of the LORD, and rose up early in the morning, and builded an altar under the hill, and twelve pillars, according to the twelve tribes of Israel. And he sent young men of the children of Israel, which offered burnt offerings, and sacrificed peace offerings of oxen unto the LORD” (Ex. 24:4–5). Non-Levites originally had duties associated with offering sacrifices.

The rabbis are correct about one thing: the firstborn sons were indeed consecrated by God. They were consecrated in the same way that firstborn sons in Egypt had been consecrated: as covenantal representatives of the nation's future. The mark of their unique status was their inheritance of a double portion. Their judicially consecrated status became an enormous threat to them at the golden calf incident. Because of the rebellion of their parents, the firstborn sons of Israel became the judicial equivalent of the firstborn sons of Egypt: under a curse. These sons were in need of another blood atonement: the judicial equivalent of Passover lambs.

God substituted others in order to save the firstborn sons: 3,000 of their fathers. The Levites served as the priests in this atoning sacrifice. They slew 3,000 men, who became the judicial equivalent of Passover lambs. The Levites became executioners because the men had become idolaters, just as the Egyptians had been. Had the Levites not acted to execute 3,000 representatives of Israel, God would have slain the firstborn sons. The firstborn sons of Israel, apart from the bloody service of the Levites, were as deserving of death as the firstborn sons of Egypt had been. God substituted the Levites and the redemption payment system, not for the sake of some hypothetical, God-consecrated priestly role for Israel's firstborn, but for the sake of the firstborn sons' judicial status as condemned representatives of the nation's future: point four of the biblical covenant—sanctions—in relation to point five, succession.

As in the case of Egypt, Israel's inheritance would have been cut off had God imposed this negative sanction. If the Israelites on the pre-adoption Passover night were in replacement-rate mode, then the future of the nation would have been completely cut short apart from a program of adoption. Only daughters would have remained. They would have had to marry adopted sons of the mixed multitude. But more to the point covenantally, the destruction of firstborn sons would have left the Ark of the Covenant undefended in the next generation.

E. Bloodless Execution

A redemption payment was mandatory for the firstborn sons. It was also mandatory for unclean animals. The exceptional case was the donkey. Here, the owner had a choice: break its neck or redeem it with a slain lamb. This is repeated twice in Exodus. “And every firstling of an ass thou shalt redeem with a lamb; and if thou wilt not redeem it, then thou shalt break his neck: and all the firstborn of man among thy children shalt thou redeem” (Ex. 13:13). “But the firstling of an ass thou shalt redeem with a lamb: and if thou redeem him not, then shalt thou break his neck. All the firstborn of thy sons thou shalt redeem. And none shall appear before me empty” (Ex. 34:20). What was the reason for the link between a redemption payment for donkeys and men?

First, consider the fact that the donkey had to be killed in a special way: a broken neck. No other sacrifice in the Mosaic Covenant was by broken neck. What was the relevance of a broken neck? It was execution without bloodshed. Every other animal sacrifice involved the knife. The sacrificed animal’s blood was used in the ceremony as a sign of atonement. But this animal sacrifice was unique: no blood. It was therefore not a means of atonement. It was a sacrifice strictly in the sense of an economic loss.

Second, this law was given prior to the Mosaic dietary laws. But there was an earlier dietary law in force. If an animal remained in a bloodless condition, its carcass became valueless; its flesh could not be eaten. No animal could be eaten lawfully with its blood still in it. The context of this dietary law was God’s covenant with Noah—specifically, the provision dealing with the killing of men. “But flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall ye not eat. And surely your blood of your lives will I require; at the hand of every beast will I require it, and at the hand of man; at the hand of every man’s brother will I require the life of man. Whoso sheddeth man’s blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made he man” (Gen. 9:4–6). So, the sacrifice of the firstborn donkey was exclusively a negative economic sanction. Neither the owner nor the priest could eat it or use its carcass if it remained in an uncut state. The implication was that it could not be skinned after its death, for it was to be killed with its blood intact.

Third, the substitute for the firstborn donkey was a lamb. This is the only case in the Mosaic law of an animal's substituting for the first-born. Clean animals had to be slain; firstborn sons had to be redeemed by a payment of five shekels; unclean animals had to be redeemed by a money payment of its market value plus one-fifth—the payment associated with the Levitical redemption payments.⁷ But the donkey was unique: its redemption required the sacrifice of a lamb.

Fourth, the sacrifice of the donkey was symbolic of the Passover in two ways. First, the death of the firstborn sons of Egypt was bloodless. God executed them directly without the use of any implement. This was not a ritual execution in the normal sacrificial sense, for there had been no knife. It was also not warfare in the traditional sense, for there had been no weapons. It was uniquely the intervention of God. Second, without the covering of a lamb's blood on the doorposts, the firstborn of Egypt perished. But so would the firstborn of Israel. The life of the firstborn sons of Israel on the Passover night in Egypt was spared only by shedding a lamb's blood.

Fifth, the slain lamb could be eaten by the priest. This substitution converted an unmitigated economic loss (slain donkey) into a benefit for the priest (slain lamb).

All this leads me to a conclusion. Any firstborn son who was not redeemed by a money payment was considered to be the judicial equivalent of a donkey with a broken neck. But the firstborn Egyptians had also been the judicial equivalent of donkeys with broken necks: bloodless victims of God's wrath. This symbolism pointed to an unredeemed firstborn son as the judicial equivalent of a firstborn Egyptian: under God's wrath. He would therefore not have been entitled to be circumcised. He would have become a disinherited son. If his father circumcised him anyway, the son would thereby have been placed under the negative sanctions of the covenant. He would then have had his ecclesiastical membership taken away: excommunication. This would have left him without citizenship.⁸ He would not have been allowed to inherit his share of his father's land—the double portion (Deut. 21:17).

7. Leviticus 5:16; 6:5; 27:9–15, 19, 27, 31.

8. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Pt. 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 54:F.

F. The Firstborn Sons of Levi

The firstborn son received a special inheritance (Deut. 21:17). The presence of such an inheritance is what identified the recipient as a firstborn son. Because of their firstborn legal status, the Levites were entitled to payments from the other tribes for every firstborn son (Num. 3:47). Because of their firstborn legal status as God's firstborn (Ex. 4:22), the Israelites were entitled to restitution payments for their forced servitude in Egypt, which they collected from inheritances that would otherwise have gone to the dead firstborn sons of Egypt (Ex. 12:35–36). It is in this context that we should interpret Numbers 5:5–8:

And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, When a man or woman shall commit any sin that men commit, to do a trespass against the LORD, and that person be guilty; Then they shall confess their sin which they have done: and he shall recompense his trespass with the principal thereof, and add unto it the fifth part thereof, and give it unto him against whom he hath trespassed. But if the man have no kinsman to recompense the trespass unto, let the trespass be recompensed unto the LORD, even to the priest; beside the ram of the atonement, whereby an atonement shall be made for him.

This law was an extension of the law of restitution found in Leviticus 6:5. It was a law that penalized sin by requiring a restitution payment of 20 percent. But it also rewarded voluntary confession, since the penalty for theft was normally double restitution (Ex. 22:4), and could be four-fold (dead or sold sheep) or five-fold (dead or sold ox) (Ex. 22:1).⁹

This extension of the law specified the priest as the final claimant to both the replacement and restitution payments. If the victim could not be located or was dead, then his relative would receive the payment. If the relative could not be located, then the priest received it. There was no escape from the trespasser's liability. By identifying the priest as a person with a final claim on the property, the Mosaic law made clear the legal status of the priests: God's firstborn sons among the Levites. *Their responsibility before God was greater than that of any other judicially representative group in Israel.*¹⁰

There is no New Covenant principle that would remove this first-

9. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 6.

10. Ibid., ch. 4, section on "The Priestly Office."

born legal status of the institutional church. As the guardian of the civil oath, the institutional church still performs a judicial function of the Mosaic priesthood. It is this function that entitles the church to payments from convicted criminals.¹¹

G. Monetary Policy

In Numbers, God specified the firstborn son's redemption price: five shekels of the sanctuary (Num. 3:47). Five shekels of silver were also the entry price for a male child adopted into the tribe of Levi (Lev. 27:6).¹² Because the judicial intent in both cases was related to Levitical inheritance, the shekels must have been of the same value.

A currency unit could be called a shekel, but the priestly shekel was mandatory for making payments to God's ecclesiastical agents. In times of widespread monetary debasement (Isa. 1:22), God could not be lawfully cheated by those who would have offered a shekel of lower value, even if both currency units were called "shekel." It would have been a profane act to offer such a debased payment to the Levites.¹³ Every time the shekel of the sanctuary is mentioned, the text says that it weighs 20 gerahs.¹⁴ This informed the nation what the sanctuary's shekel weighed. People could then compare the market's shekel with the sanctuary shekel. This would keep the moneychangers more honest. The priesthood also would have greater difficulty debasing their shekel. If this judicial connection is correct, then the priestly shekel was originally intended by God to become the standard for the weight and fineness of silver for the other currency units specified as shekels.

Conclusion

God's slaying of Egypt's firstborn identified Him as the nation's blood avenger—the kinsman-redeemer—on their behalf. Only a slain lamb would have protected the Egyptians. God executed the firstborn of Egypt in a bloodless manner, just as Israelites were subsequently required to kill every firstborn donkey that they chose not to redeem with a slain lamb. The firstborn male donkey was symbolic of the first-born sons in Egypt, whether Egyptian or Israelite. Only the shed blood of a lamb could save them.

The Israelites owed the Levites payment because the Levites had

11. Ibid., ch. 6.

12. On the entry price system, see ibid., ch. 36.

13. This would explain the presence of money-changers in the temple area (John 2:14–15).

14. Exodus 30:13; Leviticus 27:25; Numbers 3:47; 18:16; Ezekiel 45:12.

shed blood on their behalf. The Levites had saved Israel from the judgment of God (Ex. 32). God separated them from the other tribes because they were His agents of wrath as well as His agents of sacrificial substitution: blood avengers and kinsman-redeemers. They were the agents of sacrifice, both as recipients of the sacrificial funds and as guardians of the place of sacrifice. They were holy.

God brought sanctions on Passover night: positive for Israel and negative for Egypt. This changed the judicial status of firstborn sons in Israel. Before the first Passover night, the birth of the firstborn son was exclusively a positive event: the extension of a man's strength. After the first Passover night, the firstborn sons of Israel were set apart by God. They were His. They were His, not in the sense of priestly servants, but in the sense of being destined for execution, yet unfit as altar sacrifices. This was the symbolic negative sanction hanging over the head of every family: the threat of disinheritance by execution. To save the firstborn son's double inheritance after the golden calf incident, each family had to redeem the firstborn son with a payment of five shekels to the Levites. Without this, the firstborn son forfeited his inheritance in Israel: a mark of God's curse on the family. This law was imposed only after the construction of the tabernacle. This sanctified the Levites as permanent substitutes for the firstborn sons.

The specification of five shekels of silver paid to the Levites as the Levitical adoption entry price, as well as the redemption price for firstborn sons, indicates that the shekel of the sanctuary was to serve as a standard for Israel's money payment system. The five shekels referred to silver. Any debasing of the currency would be detected. The shekel of the sanctuary was to remain a monetary standard that was free from political control. This unit of exchange was not to be tampered with by the priests; thus, it would condemn any other currency that was called a shekel but which did not contain 20 gerahs of silver.

The New Covenant has substituted baptism for circumcision. There is no longer any difference between sons and daughters with respect to their required subjection to a covenant sign. The annulment of Passover and the transfer of covenantal sanctions to the Lord's Supper ended the judicial discontinuity in Israel's history that Passover imposed on Israel. This law was unique to Mosaic Israel. The unique covenantal threat to firstborn sons no longer exists.

5

BLESSING AND NAMING

And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto Aaron and unto his sons, saying, On this wise [in this way] ye shall bless the children of Israel, saying unto them, The LORD bless thee, and keep thee: The LORD make his face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee: The LORD lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace. And they shall put my name upon the children of Israel; and I will bless them (Num. 6:22–27).

The theocentric focus of this law is obvious: God is the source of predictable covenantal blessings in history, i.e., positive sanctions. The Israelites were required to accept God's name as marking their family status among the nations: God's firstborn son (Ex. 4:22–23). Aaron and his sons publicly placed (invoked: NASB) God's name on the people of Israel. This invocation of the blessing was linked to their authority to invoke God's name on the sons of Israel. If the people remained faithful to God's covenant law, they would receive the positive sanctions that God promised to bring upon them (Lev. 26:3–12). Naming them placed them formally under the sanctions.

The sanctions listed here were positive. The specific one was peace (v. 26). This was the exodus generation's number-one goal. They did not want to fight. They wanted peace. God told them how to attain it: not by avoiding the conquest of Canaan but by avoiding evil. They viewed peace as the absence of negative sanctions. This was wrong. Peace is the extension of God's kingdom in history. "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given: and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even for ever. The zeal of the LORD of hosts will perform this" (Isa. 9:6–7). Peace therefore necessarily involves the imposition of negative sanctions on evil: Satan's kingdom of man.

Peace with God comes through covenantal faithfulness. By explicitly invoking positive sanctions, the priests were implicitly also invoking negative sanctions. Presumably, the main one was war: the absence of peace for God's enemies. There is no escape from the two-fold nature of God's covenantal sanctions. To place yourself under His blessings, you must also place yourself under His cursings. Both blessing and cursing come in terms of His law (Lev. 26; Deut. 28).

The sanction of peace was visible. It was important for this sanction to be universally respected and sought after, for it was to serve as a testimony to pagan nations. The Psalmist wrote: "God be merciful unto us, and bless us; and cause his face to shine upon us; Selah. That thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving health among all nations. Let the people praise thee, O God; let all the people praise thee. O let the nations be glad and sing for joy: for thou shalt judge the people righteously, and govern the nations upon earth. Selah" (Ps. 67:1–4). The positive covenantal sanction—"saving health" or "salvation" (yeshuw'ah)—was to remind men of the reality of God's covenantal stipulations: "thy way." God judges the nations of the earth; they are all bound by the cross-boundary stipulations¹ of His covenant; He brings predictable corporate sanctions in terms of these stipulations.

Who was under God's special covenantal sanctions, as distinguished from His common-grace, cross-boundary sanctions (e.g., Nineveh in Jonah's day)? That person who was under oath-bound covenantal authority and who therefore bore God's name. Who invoked the name of God and the name of the person? The sons of Aaron and those with priestly authority who were operating under their jurisdiction. Had their invocation of God's blessings not been followed by covenantal blessings, this would have called into question their authority to name the people. This is why one sign of forfeited authority by the priesthood was the failure of the blessings to appear. This surely was what the drought in Elijah's day was all about: the failure of the gods invoked by the priests of Ahab's Israel to bring corporate blessings.

Why did these blessings have to be invoked publicly by the sons of Aaron? First, because Aaron's sons were the guardians of the four cov-enantal oaths of society: marital (Num. 5), personal (Num. 6), civil,² and ecclesiastical. Second, they were God's highest judicial representatives between God and man, which is why they conducted the altar's sacrifices, and why their family representative, the high priest, alone had lawful access to the inner sanctum of the tabernacle: the holy of holies (Ex. 30:10). As such, they interpreted God's word authoritatively. The ordained representatives of a society serve as the interpreters of the law. They possess lawful authority to enforce the law. Enforcement involves the imposition of sanctions. Without sanctions, their interpretations are mere opinion.

1. On cross-boundary laws, see Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), Conclusion:C4.

A. Sanctions and Law

The sons of Aaron could lawfully invoke God's positive covenantal sanctions in history because they possessed priestly authority. The biblical state lawfully imposes only negative sanctions. It bears the sword, but it is not a God-designated agency of healing.³ The church, however, is an agency of positive sanctions. It does not possess the sword; it cannot lawfully impose punishment on all those living within specified geographical boundaries. It cannot lawfully impose physical punishment. It imposes its judgments judicially and verbally: speaking in God's name as His agent.

Here is a fundamental judicial principle: no sanctions—no law. If the state cannot lawfully impose sanctions on those who have violated a civil law, then this law is nothing more than one opinion among many. It is not a civil law.

He who speaks officially in the name of the law must be able either to impose or invoke predictable sanctions in terms of this law. If he cannot do this, then his authority is compromised. If there are no sanctions attached to his interpretation of the law, then his authority is specious. He is not to be taken seriously as a representative; at best he is an insightful commentator.

Invocation is verbal. The invocation calls forth God's sanctions, either in history or eternity. If God has not authorized this invocation, then the invoker is either a charlatan or very confused about his authority in this instance. We can see this most clearly in the two Mosaic laws governing prophets.

2. Ibid., ch. 6: "Guardian of the Civil Oath."

3. A state that claims the right to impose positive sanctions has become messianic. Its healing comes from its exercise of monopolistic power: the sword and wealth collected by means of the sword. The messiah's healing power does not come from confiscated wealth. This is why the messianic state is a pretender. It exercises power in the name of healing through coercion.

If there arise among you a prophet, or a dreamer of dreams, and giveth thee a sign or a wonder, And the sign or the wonder come to pass, whereof he spake unto thee, saying, Let us go after other gods, which thou hast not known, and let us serve them; Thou shalt not hearken unto the words of that prophet, or that dreamer of dreams: for the LORD your God proveth you, to know whether ye love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul. Ye shall walk after the LORD your God, and fear him, and keep his commandments, and obey his voice, and ye shall serve him, and cleave unto him. And that prophet, or that dreamer of dreams, shall be put to death; because he hath spoken to turn you away from the LORD your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt, and redeemed you out of the house of bondage, to thrust thee out of the way which the LORD thy God commanded thee to walk in. So shalt thou put the evil away from the midst of thee (Deut. 13:1–5).

But the prophet, which shall presume to speak a word in my name, which I have not commanded him to speak, or that shall speak in the name of other gods, even that prophet shall die. And if thou say in thine heart, How shall we know the word which the LORD hath not spoken? When a prophet speaketh in the name of the LORD, if the thing follow not, nor come to pass, that is the thing which the LORD hath not spoken, but the prophet hath spoken it presumptuously: thou shalt not be afraid of him (Deut. 18:20–22).

The false prophet was marked by either of two ways: (1) he prophesied an event, it came to pass, and then he told people to worship another god; (2) he foretold the future in God's name, but the event did not come to pass. A false prophet had to be executed. This is why the false priests on Mt. Carmel were executed by Elijah (I Kings 18:40): they had prophesied the falling of fire on the sacrifice, but nothing happened; they had also called people to worship false gods. The agent of the sanction of execution, Elijah, had prophesied that the fire would fall on the sacrifice when he invoked God's name; it did. He had called on the people to decide: worship God or Baal (I Kings 18:21).

The reason why these two Mosaic laws no longer apply under the New Covenant is that the special office of prophet no longer exists. Men can lawfully speak prophetically in God's name of sanctions in general following sins in general, but they are not given accurate insights into the future. We see the future as through a glass darkly today (I Cor. 13:12). Because no one can legitimately claim the lawful prophetic authority to direct the imposition of negative civil sanctions under the New Covenant, which was not the case in Elijah's day, the Mosaic Covenant's negative civil sanctions against false prophets no longer apply. Because the Old Covenant office of prophet has been annulled with the completed text of the Bible, the civil laws governing false prophecy have also been annulled. Excommunication by the church has replaced execution by the state in the matter of false prophecy. If there were still prophets among us, then we would still need the negative sanction of capital punishment to protect society from false prophecy.

Under the Mosaic Covenant, God's sanctions visibly followed the spoken word of a true prophet. This was the basis of his authority to demand the imposition of civil sanctions: to deflect God's corporate negative sanctions. (The same justification undergirds civil sanctions everywhere, in every era.) A false prophet was under the threat of execution: his invoked heavenly sanctions might not come to pass. He who claimed the authority to invoke heavenly sanctions also could invoke civil sanctions; he was therefore under these sanctions. As a false prophet, he was also a false witness. The penalty for being a false prophetic witness in God's name was death, for such testimony invoked God's name in an evil cause: a violation of the third commandment (Ex. 20:7).⁴ If there had been no covenantal correlation between sanctions invoked and sanctions perceived, the Mosaic civil law governing the false prophet (Deut. 18:20–22) would not have been enforceable. Guilt or innocence was determined by the presence of cause and effect: verbal cause followed by visible effect. This is no longer the case in the New Covenant because the New Covenant has not retained the covenantal connection between heavenly sanctions invoked and heavenly sanctions imposed. This is because covenantally authoritative revelation ceased with the closing of the canon of Scripture.⁵

Numbers 5 established the law of the accused wife. Her husband accused her of sexual immorality; under oath she denied it. She took a loyalty oath before her husband, the priest, and God. The priest then subjected her to a rite. If she was guilty, there would be visible mani-

4. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Pt. 2, Decalogue and Dominion, ch. 23.

5. Revelation from God in the sense of unique personal insights still exists because the Holy Spirit guides individual men into truth, but such revelation is not covenantally authoritative.

festations in her body. If she was innocent, nothing would happen. The visible results testified to her guilt or innocence. She and her husband had to accept these results as judicially binding. This jealousy testing had meaning only within the context of a covenantally predictable cause-and-effect relationship binding the oath, rite, and visible sanctions.

B. Natural Law, Random Events, and Dialecticism

There are three ways of denying the covenantal relationship that unites God's Bible-revealed law, man's formal oath, and God's predictable historical sanctions. One is to appeal to an unbreakable natural law which admits no deviations and therefore no miracles. Second, appeal to a realm of chance in which every event is infused with an element of randomness. Third, appeal to law and chance simultaneously. The twentieth century manifested all three approaches, with the third becoming more popular since the discovery of quantum physics in the late 1920s. But the theoretical conflict between impersonal fate and impersonal chance has always been with mankind. So have attempts to put the two together in a dialectical relationship.

Throughout history, men have asked themselves at key points in history: Is this God's special intervention or merely causes familiar to man? Under the Old Covenant, men devised tests that would tell them whether God was specially involved. The most famous incident in the Bible was Gideon's testing of the fleece: wet fleece, dry ground; dry fleece, wet ground (Jud. 6:37–40). But there were others. Moses' challenge to Korah and Dathan was one. "And Moses said, Hereby ye shall know that the LORD hath sent me to do all these works; for I have not done them of mine own mind. If these men die the common death of all men, or if they be visited after the visitation of all men; then the LORD hath not sent me. But if the LORD make a new thing, and the earth open her mouth, and swallow them up, with all that appertain unto them, and they go down quick into the pit; then ye shall understand that these men have provoked the LORD" (Num. 16:28–30).

There were times when God's intervention in history was understood even by covenant-breakers. When the inhabitants of each successive Philistine city in which the stolen Ark of the Covenant resided came down with boils, the civil rulers recognized their problem. They came to the priests for counsel. The priests recommended a test: "Now therefore make a new cart, and take two milch kine, on which there hath come no yoke, and tie the kine to the cart, and bring. their calves home from them: And take the ark of the LORD, and lay it upon the cart; and put the jewels of gold, which ye return him for a trespass offering, in a coffer by the side thereof; and send it away, that it may go. And see, if it goeth up by the way of his own coast to Beth-shemesh, then he hath done us this great evil: but if not, then we shall know that it is not his hand that smote us; it was a chance that happened to us” (I Sam. 6:7–9). It was not chance; it was God.⁶ The oxen walked into Israel (v. 12).

In the depths of philosophical despair, the author of Ecclesiastes wrote: “All things come alike to all: there is one event to the righteous, and to the wicked; to the good and to the clean, and to the unclean; to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not: as is the good, so is the sinner; and he that sweareth, as he that feareth an oath. This is an evil among all things that are done under the sun, that there is one event unto all: yea, also the heart of the sons of men is full of evil, and madness is in their heart while they live, and after that they go to the dead” (Eccl. 9:2–3).⁷ This way lies madness, as he understood. He returned to law and sanctions at the end: “Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil” (Eccl. 12:13–14).⁸

C. The Place of God’s Name

To name a thing is to assert authority over it. Adam named the animals; he also named Eve. The sons of Aaron placed God’s name on the Israelites: “And they shall put my name upon the children of Israel; and I will bless them” (Num. 6:27). They were asserting their authority over the people. As priests who were lawfully invested by God with this authority, they could lawfully invoke God’s blessings in history on those under their authority, which meant under God’s authority.

The sons of Aaron could lawfully draw close to the dwelling place of God. This was their special authority. The dwelling place of God was the dwelling place of God’s holy name. “Then there shall be a place which the LORD your God shall choose to cause his name to dwell there; thither shall ye bring all that I command you; your burnt offerings, and your sacrifices, your tithes, and the heave offering of your hand, and all your choice vows which ye vow unto the LORD" (Deut. 12:11). King Darius also recognized this: "And the God that hath caused his name to dwell there destroy all kings and people, that shall put to their hand to alter and to destroy this house of God which is at Jerusalem. I Darius have made a decree; let it be done with speed" (Ezra 6:12).

6. Gary North, Autonomy and Stagnation: An Economic Commentary on Ecclesiastes (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 33.

7. Ibid., ch. 45.

8. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 13.

Proximity to the heavenly throne of God is proximity to His sanctions, both heavenly and earthly (Job 2; Rev. 6:10). Proximity to His earthly dwelling place means proximity to His earthly sanctions. The sons of Aaron were in closest proximity to God's earthly throne: the Ark of the Covenant. Thus, they were closest to His earthly sanctions. They could lawfully invoke His positive sanctions because they lived in proper fear of His negative sanctions. They knew what had happened to Nadab and Abihu: strange fire had brought consuming fire (Lev. 10:1–2). Those who submitted themselves to the authority of the sons of Aaron submitted themselves to God's name. This was the judicial basis of their participation in the predictable corporate blessings of God under the Mosaic Covenant. What was this name? With respect to His general authority over history, His is the self-existent name: "And Moses said unto God, Behold, when I come unto the children of Israel, and shall say unto them, The God of your fathers hath sent me unto you; and they shall say to me, What is his name? what shall I say unto them? And God said unto Moses, I AM THAT I AM: and he said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you" (Ex. 3:13–14). With respect to His special manifestations within Israel's history, He was the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. He was, judicially speaking, the God of the covenant. This covenant extends across time. At the close of his life, Moses told the generation of the conquest:

That thou shouldest enter into covenant with the LORD thy God, and into his oath, which the LORD thy God maketh with thee this day: That he may establish thee to day for a people unto himself, and that he may be unto thee a God, as he hath said unto thee, and as he hath sworn unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob. Neither with you only do I make this covenant and this oath; But with him that standeth here with us this day before the LORD our God, and also with him that is not here with us this day (Deut. 29:12– 15). . . . Lest there should be among you man, or woman, or family, or tribe, whose heart turneth away this day from the LORD our God, to go and serve the gods of these nations; lest there should be among you a root that beareth gall and wormwood; And it come to pass, when he heareth the words of this curse, that he bless himself in his heart, saying, I shall have peace, though I walk in the imagination of mine heart, to add drunkenness to thirst: The LORD will not spare him, but then the anger of the LORD and his jealousy shall smoke against that man, and all the curses that are written in this book shall lie upon him, and the LORD shall blot out his name from under heaven (Deut. 29:18–20).

When a person under the oath-bound covenant has God's name removed from him, his name is blotted out in history. The curses will come on him if he fails to repent and take up God's name again. This is the structure of biblical law. But who formally removed God's name from a person under the Mosaic Covenant? The final earthly authority to do this was the priesthood, with the sons of Aaron comprising the high court prior to the exile.

When the sons of Aaron departed into apostasy under Eli, the nation lost the war with the Philistines. The Ark was lawfully removed from the tabernacle in times of war. But in Eli's day, it was captured on the battlefield by the Philistines (I Sam. 4). After the Philistines sent the Ark back by cart, it was not immediately returned to the tabernacle. The sons of Aaron no longer offered sacrifices in the presence of the Ark. Only under David's kingship was the Ark returned to Jerusalem (II Sam. 6:17).

D. Good News from False Prophets

For the priests to have blessed Israel when Israel was in rebellion would itself have been an act of rebellion. This would have been a public manifestation of the nation's covenantal rebellion. To call down God's blessings on rebellious people is to break covenant with God. The mark of a false priesthood was the invocation of God's blessing of peace on a nation in ethical rebellion. Even Ahab, the consummate evil king of Israel, understood this. He knew the difference between a prophet who told him what he wanted to hear and a prophet who told him the truth. He just refused to listen to the truth.

And all the prophets prophesied so, saying, Go up to Ramoth-gilead, and prosper: for the LORD shall deliver it into the king's hand. And the messenger that was gone to call Micaiah spake unto him, saying, Behold now, the words of the prophets declare good unto the king with one mouth: let thy word, I pray thee, be like the word of one of them, and speak that which is good. And Micaiah said, As the LORD liveth, what the LORD saith unto me, that will I speak. So he came to the king. And the king said unto him, Micaiah, shall we go against Ramoth-gilead to battle, or shall we forbear? And he answered him, Go, and prosper: for the LORD shall deliver it into the hand of the king. And the king said unto him, How many times shall I adjure thee that thou tell me nothing but that which is true in the name of the LORD? And he said, I saw all Israel scattered upon the hills, as sheep that have not a shepherd: and the LORD said, These have no master: let them return every man to his house in peace. And the king of Israel said unto Jehoshaphat, Did I not tell thee that he would prophesy no good concerning me, but evil? (1 Kings 22:12–18).

Micaiah then went on to warn the king regarding the supernatural source of the good news announced by the king's official prophets:

And he said, Hear thou therefore the word of the LORD: I saw the LORD sitting on his throne, and all the host of heaven standing by him on his right hand and on his left. And the LORD said, Who shall persuade Ahab, that he may go up and fall at Ramoth-gilead? And one said on this manner, and another said on that manner. And there came forth a spirit, and stood before the LORD, and said, I will persuade him. And the LORD said unto him, Wherewith? And he said, I will go forth, and I will be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets. And he said, Thou shalt persuade him, and prevail also: go forth, and do so. Now therefore, behold, the LORD hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these thy prophets, and the LORD hath spoken evil concerning thee (1 Kings 22:19–23).⁹

9. North, Disobedience and Defeat, ch. 23. That this spirit was evil is clear from the context. Prior to Christ's ministry, Satan had access to the court of heaven (Job 2). After the crucifixion, he no longer had such access. "And there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought and his angels, And prevailed not; neither was their place found any more in heaven. And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent, called the Devil, and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world: he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him. And I heard a loud voice saying in heaven, Now is come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Christ: for the accuser of our brethren is cast down, which accused them before our God day and night. And they overcame him by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony; and they loved not their lives unto the death. Therefore rejoice, ye heavens, and ye that dwell in them. Woe to the inhabitants of the earth and of the sea! for the devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time" (Rev. 12:7–12).

The true prophet announced that God had sent a lying spirit to deceive both the false prophets and the king. God did this to false prophets under the Mosaic Covenant, in order to destroy them publicly as testimonies to the nation. “And if the prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the LORD have deceived that prophet, and I will stretch out my hand upon him, and will destroy him from the midst of my people Israel” (Ezek. 14:9). Not every false prophet was a lying prophet; some reported accurately the messages of lying spirits. They were deceived prophets. Micaiah graciously revealed the true source of the false prophecy to the king. One of the prophets struck him (I Kings 22:24). Micaiah pronounced a curse on him (v. 25). Then the king brought the negative sanction of imprisonment against Micaiah (vv. 26–27). The truth of the matter would be revealed in terms of whose negative sanctions prevailed.

There had been sufficient covenantal awareness on the part of the king to know that he needed another opinion. He had also recognized that Micaiah had been lying to him by giving him the initial good news. Micaiah had deliberately uttered false words to him, just as God had lied to Ahab’s new set of priests—the first set had perished on Mt. Carmel (I Kings 18:40)—through the lying spirit. Micaiah at first told him what he wanted to hear. But the king knew better. He recognized false words when he heard them in the mouth of a prophet of God. This was no court prophet hired by the king and his wife. Ahab knew what Micaiah’s God was planning for him; he had been warned by Elijah: “And thou shalt speak unto him, saying, Thus saith the LORD, Hast thou killed, and also taken possession? And thou shalt speak unto him, saying, Thus saith the LORD, In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth shall dogs lick thy blood, even thine” (I Kings 21:19). He was determined to prove Elijah and Micaiah wrong.

Ahab commanded his guards to imprison Micaiah. Micaiah then offered another word of prophecy, also connected to God’s visible sanctions in history: “And Micaiah said, If thou return at all in peace, the LORD hath not spoken by me. And he said, Harken, O people, everyone of you” (I Kings 22:28). The positive sanction of peace would be the public test. If peace came to Israel, Micaiah was the false prophet and therefore had to be executed (Deut. 18:20–22). If peace did not come, then the court prophets were deserving of execution.

Ahab took the prophet’s words seriously enough to disguise himself before going into battle (I Kings 22:30). This did him no good. He did not return alive. “And a certain man drew a bow at a venture [in his simplicity], and smote the king of Israel between the joints of the harness: wherefore he said unto the driver of his chariot, Turn thine hand, and carry me out of the host; for I am wounded" (v. 34). There was nothing random about this event, despite the bowman's lack of knowledge regarding the identity of his target. Ahab died. "And one washed the chariot in the pool of Samaria; and the dogs licked up his blood; and they washed his armour; according unto the word of the LORD which he spake" (1 Kings 22:38). Three prophecies had come to Ahab regarding his end; two were true and one was official. He knew the difference. He sought to kill the first unofficial prophet (Elijah) and imprisoned the second (Micaiah). But he knew the difference. He sought to bring negative sanctions against those true prophets who invoked God's name and His curses. He listened—i.e., decided his course of action—to false prophets who invoked God's name and His blessings. God then brought negative sanctions against him, as prophesied.

Conclusion

Aaron and his sons invoked God's name and God's positive sanctions on the nation. They could do this lawfully only because they were the highest anointed ecclesiastical representatives between God and Israel. This invocation of God's name publicly placed Israel under the terms of God's covenant: His law. This was an act of corporate covenant renewal, for Israel as a nation had already covenanted with God in Exodus 19. God's name was already on them. They were supposed to understand that when the blessing of peace came, this was not an impersonal event, either random or by the nation's military power. It was God's gift to the nation, either in response to their covenantal faithfulness or as a prelude to His negative sanctions against their pretended autonomy: "And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth" (Deut. 8:17).¹⁰

10. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 21.

6

THE ALTAR OFFERING

And it came to pass on the day that Moses had fully set up the tabernacle, and had anointed it, and sanctified it, and all the instruments thereof, both the altar and all the vessels thereof, and had anointed them, and sanctified them; That the princes of Israel, heads of the house of their fathers, who were the princes of the tribes, and were over them that were numbered, offered: And they brought their offering before the LORD, six covered wagons, and twelve oxen; a wagon for two of the princes, and for each one an ox: and they brought them before the tabernacle (Num. 7:1–3).

The theocentric issue here is lawful sacrifice. The builders completed the tabernacle on the first day of the first month (Ex. 40:17). Moses then finished the interior (Ex. 40:18–30). Numbers 7 begins with the completion of the tabernacle. There can be no doubt: this is the same event.¹ So, Numbers 7 backtracks 30 days, for the events of Numbers 1 took place on the first day of the second month (Num. 1:18).

The princes or chieftains of Israel delivered the offering to Moses. God instructed Moses to distribute the carts and oxen to the families of Gershon and Merari, but not to Kohath, which was Moses' family. Kohath was closest to the Ark of the Covenant. This created a special holiness burden. "But unto the sons of Kohath he gave none: because the service of the sanctuary belonging unto them was that they should bear upon their shoulders" (Num. 7:9). The closer to the inner circle, the greater the ritual responsibility, the greater the danger of profanity, and the greater the holiness of those serving. In contrast, the closer a Levite was to the non-Levitical tribes, the larger the required physical burden of sacrifice on behalf of these tribes.

1. Milgrom saw a major problem here. If the text is taken at face value, the donations began on the day the tabernacle was completed. This was the first day of the first month (Ex. 40:17). Passover began on the 14th day (Ex. 12:18). This means that if the offerings brought by the chieftains were actually sacrificed on the day they were presented to the priests, the priests had to do the work. But they had not yet been consecrated. Thus, he concludes, the phrase "in the day" is mistranslated. It should be merely "when"—an indeterminate timing. The sacrifices were made after Passover. Jacob Milgrom, The JPS Torah Commentary: Numbers (New York: Jewish Publication Society, 1990), pp. 362–64. A simpler way to solve this problem is to say that the offerings were not immediately sacrificed when presented. They were kept by the priests for subsequent sacrifice.

Levite families that were closer to the outer rings of holiness bore the brunt of the physical burdens: transporting the implements of the tabernacle and defending the Ark from the first wave of any attack on the holy of holies. The two families in the outer rings of holiness were given the primary burden of transporting the implements of sacrifice, for they lawfully bore the implement of defense: the sword. They were the sanctions-bringers against invaders: Merari first and then Gershon. Twice as many wagons filled with offerings went to Merari as to Gershon (Num. 7:7–8) because Merari had to transport twice as much. Merari served in the outer ring of the three concentric circles of authority.² The last line of defense was Kohath. More of the Kohathites would survive an unsuccessful attack than the Gershonites; more of Gershon would survive than Merari. Conversely, God would kill more of the Kohathites than the Gershonites for profane acts, while Gershon was more at risk than Merari.

A. Equal Tribal Assessments

This offering was the offering for the altar. The earlier offering had been for the construction of the tabernacle (Ex. 36:3). Numbers 7 recounts in detail the same story a dozen times: one day per tribe. It lists what each of the tribal princes placed in the wagons. Each prince represented one tribe; each offering was the same.

And his offering was one silver charger, the weight thereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them were full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering: One spoon of ten shekels of gold, full of incense: One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering: One kid of the goats for a sin offering: And for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year (Num. 7:13–17a).

There was no distinction sacrificially among the 12 tribes in terms of their wealth or population. They all owed four of the five sacrifices:

2. Chapter 3:B:2.

whole burnt offering (point one), meal (tribute, allegiance)³ offering (point two), peace offering (point three), and sin (purification) offering (point four). They did not owe a guilt (reparation) offering (point five), which has no corporate aspect.⁴ The Israelites had not sinned against men; they had sinned against God.

The offering was delivered to the tabernacle by princes, i.e., men who served as civil officers. The text does not say how they had apportioned the required offering among the families. We know only that they brought an equal offering for each tribe. This means that larger tribes paid less per capita⁵ than smaller tribes did. Poorer tribes per capita paid as much as wealthy tribes. The principle of proportional taxation did not apply in this instance, i.e., the principle of the tithe. In this case, the assessment was tribal, not personal. It was not a tax; it was an offering. It had to do with the body of the nation as a called-out body of believers. They were represented by princes, probably not in the latter's legal capacity as civil officers but in their capacity as warrior-priests. The nation had been numbered already, before the building of the tabernacle (Ex. 38:25–26). The holy army was now in service.

In the case of atonement offerings, each fighting man was numbered, and each paid a half shekel of silver (Ex. 38:26). In the case of the altar offering, each tribe paid the assessment owed by every other tribe. In the language of modern economics, these assessments were regressive: they weighed more heavily on the poor than the rich.⁶ This was also true of the individual assessments at each national mustering. Of course, because the wealth of the Israelites at this time had been ex-

3. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 2:A.

4. Sacrificial offerings had to be male; personal offerings could be female. The purification offering had to be female (Lev. 4:28, 32). Milgrom, Numbers, p. 363. Milgrom neglected to mention that the ruler's reparation offering had to be male (Lev. 4:23). It was the common person's offering that had to be female. Masculinity under the Mosaic covenant was associated in the civil covenant with rulership, femininity with subordination. North, Boundaries and Dominion, p. 93.

5 Technically, per caput: singular.

6. This analysis assumes that we can make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility, which we cannot do scientifically; we can only do this as ethicists, which is what economists officially want to avoid at all costs, or at least very high marginal costs. Unofficially, the only way they can make any practical recommendations is to assume that they can make such comparisons. See Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 5:B; North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Appendix H (1990): "The Epistemological Problem of Social Cost."

tracted from the Egyptians as their lawful restitution for having been made slaves, we do not know what the original distribution of wealth was. Perhaps it was close to equality. It is extremely important to point out that, because these offerings were not civil taxes, they throw no light on proper civil tax policy.⁷

B. Cleansing Before Service Begins

After the gifts were delivered to Moses, he spoke to God. God told him to light the lamps, which Aaron did (Num. 8:1–3). Then came the next step: “And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, Take the Levites from among the children of Israel, and cleanse them. And thus shalt thou do unto them, to cleanse them: Sprinkle water of purifying upon them, and let them shave all their flesh, and let them wash their clothes, and so make themselves clean” (vv. 5–7). Once they were cleansed, it was time for a meat (meal) offering (v. 8a), the offering associated with priestly authority,⁸ and a sin or purification offering (v. 8b). This was to take place in front of the assembly (v. 9), who were the representatives of the congregation.⁹ First, however, the transfer of representative authority had to pass from the assembly to the Levites by laying on of hands. “And thou shalt bring the Levites before the LORD: and the children of Israel shall put their hands upon the Levites” (v. 10). This is a very important principle: biblical authority flows downward from God and upward from the people. The Levites represented the people before God and represented God before the people. Their authority was mediatorial. God’s acceptance of their sacrifices judicially sealed the first; the laying on of hands judicially sealed the second.

Aaron offered the Levites as a tribute offering to God: “And Aaron shall offer the Levites before the LORD for an offering of the children of Israel, that they may execute the service of the LORD” (v. 11). To confirm this sacrificial offering of an entire tribe—the representative firstborn—the Levites transferred their offenses symbolically to the two bullocks: one for the whole burnt offering (their judicially dead legal status),¹⁰ the other for their sin offering. “And the Levites shall lay their hands upon the heads of the bullocks: and thou shalt offer the one for a sin offering, and the other for a burnt offering, unto the LORD, to make an atonement for the Levites. And thou shalt set the Levites before Aaron, and before his sons, and offer them for an offering unto the LORD” (vv. 12–13). Once cleansed ritually, the Levites were ready to be offered to God:

7. Rushdoony’s arguments to the contrary have colored the theonomist movement for four decades. He designated as a civil poll tax what was a priestly atonement assessment on all members of God’s holy army. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 281–82. Cf. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 58.

8. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 2.

9. Ibid., ch. 4:F.

Thus shalt thou separate the Levites from among the children of Israel: and the Levites shall be mine. And after that shall the Levites go in to do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation: and thou shalt cleanse them, and offer them for an offering. For they are wholly given unto me from among the children of Israel; instead of such as open every womb, even instead of the firstborn of all the children of Israel, have I taken them unto me. For all the firstborn of the children of Israel are mine, both man and beast: on the day that I smote every firstborn in the land of Egypt I sanctified them for myself. And I have taken the Levites for all the firstborn of the children of Israel. And I have given the Levites as a gift to Aaron and to his sons from among the children of Israel, to do the service of the children of Israel in the tabernacle of the congregation, and to make an atonement for the children of Israel: that there be no plague among the children of Israel, when the children of Israel come nigh unto the sanctuary (vv. 14–19).

First, they washed their clothes (v. 21a); second, Aaron made an atonement offering for them (v. 21b). Only then did they go into full-time service (v. 22).

The Levites had to serve Aaron and his sons for a period of 20 years: from age 30 to age 50.¹¹ After age 50, they still served as assistants, presumably doing lighter physical labor and guard duty.¹² “This is it that belongeth unto the Levites: from twenty and five years old and upward they shall go in to wait upon the service of the tabernacle of the congregation: And from the age of fifty years they shall cease waiting upon the service thereof, and shall serve no more: But shall minister with their brethren in the tabernacle of the congregation, to keep the charge, and shall do no service. Thus shalt thou do unto the Levites touching their charge” (vv. 24–26).

10. James Jordan wrote: “What the sacrifice removes is not sin but death, the judgment for sin. Death having been removed, it is now possible to live a righteous life.” Cited in ibid., ch. 1:A.

11. Numbers 4:3, 23, 30, 35, 39, 43, 47. The reading 25 years appears only in Numbers 8:24. There is no textual reconciliation of this problem; commentators from the rabbis to the present have suggested no convincing answer.

12. Gordon J. Wenham, Numbers: An Introduction and Commentary (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1981), p. 97.

The Levites would have served under the priests during the three major feasts, when there was need for many servants. In other times, they probably served on a rotating basis. The Levitical cities had Levites as residents; they were not all permanent dwellers living close to the Ark of the Covenant.

All of this took place before the second numbering, for the next section states: “And the LORD spake unto Moses in the wilderness of Sinai, in the first month of the second year after they were come out of the land of Egypt, saying, Let the children of Israel also keep the passover at his appointed season.” (Num. 9:1–2). The Passover was celebrated that month (v. 5), before the second numbering a month later.

The dedication of the gifts took 12 days. Then came the cleansing and dedication of the Levites. It is not clear whether this took place on day 12 or day 13. It did not take place on day 14, since that was the start of Passover: the 14th day of the first month (Num. 9:5).

C. The Secondary Passover

It was at this time that the question was raised concerning ritual cleanliness and distant journeys. Certain men came to Moses and asked him regarding their contact with a dead body. They had not been allowed to make an offering associated with the Passover—presumably, the sacrificial lamb. They were ritually defiled. Moses enquired of God.

And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, If any man of you or of your posterity shall be unclean by reason of a dead body, or be in a journey afar off, yet he shall keep the passover unto the LORD. The fourteenth day of the second month at even they shall keep it, and eat it with unleavened bread and bitter herbs. They shall leave none of it unto the morning, nor break any bone of it: according to all the ordinances of the passover they shall keep it. But the man that is clean, and is not in a journey, and forbeareth to keep the passover, even the same soul shall be cut off from among his people: because he brought not the offering of the LORD in his appointed season, that man shall bear his sin (Num. 9:9–13).

This indicates that the Passover was the only mandatory annual feast. In the case of the firstfruits (Pentecost) and tabernacles/booths, a man could stay away if he was on a journey or had been in contact with a dead body. In the case of Passover, however, he was expected to attend. This would have kept journeys from extending too far or too long. It placed commerce under temporal boundaries. Under such strict limits, the only possible justification for a journey that kept a man away from both Passovers would have been a distant missionary journey.¹³

The existence of such a provision in the original law code of Israel indicates that profitable foreign trade was a very real possibility. This in turn points to the existence of foreign trade as a separate occupation, especially for those tribes that had cities on the Mediterranean eastern coast. One modern academic interpretation of the Egyptian, Hittite, and Mesopotamian empires is that these inland empires in the second millennium B.C. did not engage directly in foreign trade, but worked through neutral intermediaries along the Mediterranean's eastern coast.¹⁴ If this interpretation is correct, then this dynastic practice placed Israel in a geographically strategic position, along with the Phoenicians to the south and the trading cities north of Tyre and Sidon, such as Ugarit, which served as a conduit between Greece and the Near Eastern cultures.¹⁵ (Professor Gordon believed that the alphabet went from Ugarit to the Hebrews and Phoenicians to the Greeks.)¹⁶ The costs of land transportation were too high to be profitable except for jewels and other high value commodities, i.e., money assets. This was as true in the ancient world as it was until the invention of the railroad. Not having access to any river that led into the great inland empires, Israel's coastal tribes would have to become

13. To argue that Passover was more important than foreign missions is to misconstrue the importance of ritual in Old Covenant Israel. Righteousness was always more important in God's eyes than ritual when honoring a ritual would have interfered with righteousness. "For a multitude of the people, even many of Ephraim, and Manasseh, Issachar, and Zebulun, had not cleansed themselves, yet did they eat the passover otherwise than it was written. But Hezekiah prayed for them, saying, The good LORD pardon everyone that prepareth his heart to seek God, the LORD God of his fathers, though he be not cleansed according to the purification of the sanctuary. And the LORD hearkened to Hezekiah, and healed the people" (II Chron. 30:18–20).

1414. Robert B. Revere, "No Man's Coast': Ports of Trade in the Eastern Mediterranean," in Trade and Market in the Early Empires: Economies in History and Theory, eds. Karl Polanyi, Conrad M. Arensberg, and Harry W. Peterson (Chicago: Regnery, [1957] 1971), ch. 4.

15. Cyrus H. Gordon, The Common Background of Greek and Hebrew Civilizations (New York: Norton, 1965), ch. 5.

16. Ibid., p. 130.

world traders in order to prosper. This appears to be what they did.¹⁷

Conclusion

Sinful men cannot make acceptable offerings to God apart from mediation. In this case, a whole system of intermediaries was in operation. The families gave gifts to the tribal leaders; the tribal leaders delivered them to Moses; Moses delivered them to the Levites; the Levites delivered them to Aaron; Aaron delivered them to God as sacrifices for the Levites. The animals and meal were used by Aaron to make an offering in the name of the Levites. The Levites had to be cleansed through washing and sacrificial offerings in order for them to serve as mediatorial substitutes for the nation.

The family of Kohath received none of the altar offerings from the tribal princes. The family of Gershon received half of what the family of Merari received (Num. 7:7–8). Merari had greater responsibilities for transporting the tabernacle's instruments than Gershon had. Merari also had greater responsibility in defending the holy of holies from attackers. Merari was the first line of military defense within the confines of the tabernacle area. Merari was less holy than Gershon; Gershon was less holy than Kohath. The tribe that was most holy received none of the altar offering.

Because the sacrificed animals that were not whole burnt offerings could be eaten by the priests, Gershon and Merari had to share their food offerings with Kohath. The princes had brought no sacrifices for the Kohathites to offer and therefore to participate in a meal. Those who were less holy owed an offering to those who were more holy: from the 12 tribes upward to the Kohathites. The Kohathites were the most holy; so, the other tribes owed sacrifices to them.

17. See North, Boundaries and Dominion, Introduction:K.

PROGRESSIVE WHINING AND FINAL ACCOUNTING

And when the people complained, it displeased the LORD: and the LORD heard it; and his anger was kindled; and the fire of the LORD burnt among them, and consumed them that were in the uttermost parts of the camp. And the people cried unto Moses; and when Moses prayed unto the LORD, the fire was quenched. And he called the name of the place Taberah: because the fire of the LORD burnt among them (Num. 11:1–3).

The theocentric reference of this passage is God's impatience with Israel's pattern of behavior. They were without faith in Him as the deliverer. They had substituted complaining for faith. They had found that by complaining to Moses about their external conditions, they could get what they wanted. They did not pray; they complained. They did not exercise patience; they whined. Because of God's grace, they had gotten what they asked for. This time, they got more than they asked for.

The Israelites were not satisfied with what they possessed in the wilderness.¹ But their problem was not the wilderness. Their problem was their fear of responsibility. They feared freedom. This fear had become visible when Moses and Aaron first challenged Pharaoh to allow the people to go. Pharaoh ceased delivering straw to them for brick-making. "And the officers of the children of Israel did see that they were in evil case, after it was said, Ye shall not [di]minish ought from your bricks of your daily task. And they met Moses and Aaron, who stood in the way, as they came forth from Pharaoh: And they said unto them, The LORD look upon you, and judge; because ye have made our savour to be abhorred in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of his servants, to put a sword in their hand to slay us" (Ex. 5:19–21).

1. The Rolling Stones' 1965 song, Satisfaction, made them world-famous. It began with and returned to this ungrammatical complaint: "I can't get no satisfaction." They spoke for the quail-feasting twentieth-century West.

A. A List of Priorities

This was only the beginning. When fleeing from Pharaoh's army on Egypt's side of the Red Sea, they complained again. "And when Pharaoh drew nigh, the children of Israel lifted up their eyes, and, behold, the Egyptians marched after them; and they were sore afraid: and the children of Israel cried out unto the LORD. And they said unto Moses, Because there were no graves in Egypt, hast thou taken us away to die in the wilderness? wherefore hast thou dealt thus with us, to carry us forth out of Egypt? Is not this the word that we did tell thee in Egypt, saying, Let us alone, that we may serve the Egyptians? For it had been better for us to serve the Egyptians, than that we should die in the wilderness" (Ex. 14:10–12). God delivered them by the miracle of the divided waters.

Then they faced a food crisis: "And the whole congregation of the children of Israel murmured against Moses and Aaron in the wilderness: And the children of Israel said unto them, Would to God we had died by the hand of the LORD in the land of Egypt, when we sat by the flesh pots, and when we did eat bread to the full; for ye have brought us forth into this wilderness, to kill this whole assembly with hunger. Then said the LORD unto Moses, Behold, I will rain bread from heaven for you; and the people shall go out and gather a certain rate every day, that I may prove them, whether they will walk in my law, or no" (Ex. 16:2–4). God gave them manna.

This pattern pleased them: whining to Moses followed by gifts from God. So, they repeated it. "And all the congregation of the children of Israel journeyed from the wilderness of Sin, after their journeys, according to the commandment of the LORD, and pitched in Rephidim: and there was no water for the people to drink. Wherefore the people did chide with Moses, and said, Give us water that we may drink. And Moses said unto them, Why chide ye with me? wherefore do ye tempt the LORD? And the people thirsted there for water; and the people murmured against Moses, and said, Wherefore is this that thou hast brought us up out of Egypt, to kill us and our children and our cattle with thirst? And Moses cried unto the LORD, saying, What shall I do unto this people? they be almost ready to stone me" (Ex. 17:1–4). God gave them water out of the rock (v. 6).

They were in a situation in which they were totally dependent on God: the wilderness. It should have been clear to them that God was sustaining them. The natural environment surely wasn't. Yet they still complained. They thought they deserved more blessings. They insisted that the blessings in Egypt had been greater than the blessings in the wilderness. But they had been slaves in Egypt. This fact they ignored. They placed liberty low on their personal scale of values; their memory of leeks and onions was high on the list. So, the absence of the leeks and onions loomed large in their consciousness. Their liberty under Moses required God's sustaining grace, best manifested in the manna. They deeply resented this mark of their dependence.

Their problem was not the absence of leeks and onions. Their problem was their list of priorities. Each person makes decisions in terms of his list of priorities. A man exchanges a bit of this for more of that. God had provided them with water from rocks and manna from the ground, and this had cost them nothing: free grace. They should have responded with thanksgiving. But they could not swallow the manna contentedly because they could not enjoy the blessings of liberty under God contentedly. They placed liberty at the bottom of their list of priorities; they placed food at the top. Paul wrote of this mentality: "Whose end is destruction, whose God is their belly, and whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things" (Phil. 3:19).

1. Values and Choice

Modern free market economic theory is individualistic. It begins with the individual's goals, his list of priorities. In theory, there is no way for an economist to speak of a collective list of priorities, because there is no scientific way to make comparisons of different people's value scales.² Nevertheless, such value scales do exist because men act corporately to achieve corporate goals. This is what social policy is all about.

The covenantalist begins with God's covenant, not with the individual or the collective. God's law provides the value scale. His ethical standards for individual behavior tell us what to place where on our personal scale of values. His ethical standards for corporate behavior tell us what to place where on society's scale of values. The story of the exodus and the wilderness stands as a warning beacon to men through the ages: the blessing of liberty under God is ethically preferable to the promise of security under man. The promise of security under man is a trap leading into slavery: an illusion.

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 5. This summarizes the debate in the 1930s between Lionel Robbins (an individualist) and Roy Harrod (a Keynesian).

We make choices in terms of four things: what we value (a scale of preferences), what we have (capital), how much time we think we have, and what we know about the relationships among them (a plan). This decision-making procedure operates under God's sovereignty. He, too, has a scale of preferences,³ capital (including mankind),⁴ a time scale (history),⁵ and a plan (decree).⁶ Men choose analogous to God, as creatures. Men act re-creatively, not creatively.

B. Negative Sanctions Applied

Numbers 11 begins with another complaint. We are not told what it was. We are told that God had finally had enough. He began a series

3. "Will the LORD be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? shall I give my firstborn for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul? He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the LORD require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God? (Mic. 6:7-8). "Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven" (Matt. 6:10). Cf. Matthew 23:23.

4. "The earth is the LORD'S, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein" (Ps. 24:1). "For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills" (Ps. 50:10).

5. "And I heard the man clothed in linen, which was upon the waters of the river, when he held up his right hand and his left hand unto heaven, and sware by him that liveth for ever that it shall be for a time, times, and an half; and when he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished" (Dan. 12:7). "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away. But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only" (Matt. 24:35-36).

6. "For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts. For as the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater: So shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth: it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it" (Isa. 55:9-11). "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, vvho hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ: According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love: Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will" (Eph. 1:3-5). "For we which have believed do enter into rest, as he said, As I have sworn in my wrath, if they shall enter into my rest: although the works were finished from the foundation of the world" (Heb. 4:3).

of lessons that never made any lasting impression on the exodus generation. He responded to their complaint with supernatural fire. This sanction matched His emotion: “His anger was kindled; and the fire of the LORD burnt among them” (v. 1) The people cried out to Moses for relief. Moses prayed to God, and the fire stopped.

The next verse indicates how little they had learned: “And the mixt multitude that was among them fell a lusting; and the children of Israel also wept again, and said, Who shall give us flesh to eat? We remember the fish, which we did eat in Egypt freely; the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlick: But now our soul is dried away: there is nothing at all, beside this manna, before our eyes” (4–6). God had answered their request for food a year earlier. They had grown bored with this miracle. They wanted more. Moses wanted out:

Then Moses heard the people weep throughout their families, every man in the door of his tent: and the anger of the LORD was kindled greatly; Moses also was displeased. And Moses said unto the LORD, Wherefore hast thou afflicted thy servant? and wherefore have I not found favour in thy sight, that thou layest the burden of all this people upon me? Have I conceived all this people? have I begotten them, that thou shouldest say unto me, Carry them in thy bosom, as a nursing father beareth the sucking child, unto the land which thou swarest unto their fathers? Whence should I have flesh to give unto all this people? for they weep unto me, saying, Give us flesh, that we may eat. I am not able to bear all this people alone, because it is too heavy for me. And if thou deal thus with me, kill me, I pray thee, out of hand, if I have found favor in thy sight. . . (vv. 10–15a).

God was angry with the people; Moses had a right to be weary. God was patient with Moses. God had Moses bring 70 elders near. “And I will come down and talk with thee there: and I will take of the spirit which is upon thee, and will put it upon them; and they shall bear the burden of the people with thee, that thou bear it not thyself alone” (v. 17). God promised to give the people flesh to eat the next day (v. 18). But this promise of blessing was to be delivered by Moses in the language of cursing: “Ye shall not eat one day, nor two days, nor five days, neither ten days, nor twenty days; But even a whole month, until it come out at your nostrils, and it be loathsome unto you: because that ye have despised the LORD which is among you, and have wept before him, saying, Why came we forth out of Egypt?” (vv. 19–20).

This time, Moses showed the lack of faith that was later to cost him entrance into the Promised Land. He asked God rhetorically where all this flesh would come from. His language was reminiscent of Abraham's response to God's promise of a child at age 99. "Shall the flocks and the herds be slain for them, to suffice them? or shall all the fish of the sea be gathered together for them, to suffice them? (v. 22).⁷ God's response was short and to the point: "Is the LORD's hand waxed short? thou shalt see now whether my word shall come to pass unto thee or not" (v. 23). So, God responded to Moses with a challenge: "See if my word comes true." He thereby announced His own prophetic status. "See if my positive sanctions match my promise."

God brought birds in droves, and more than droves. This was an extension of the nation's experience when the manna first appeared: "And it came to pass, that at even[ing] the quails, came up, and covered the camp: and in the morning the dew lay round about the host [camp, NASB]" (Ex. 16:13). Before, they had seen the birds. This time, they would feast on them. Briefly. "And there went forth a wind from the LORD, and brought quails from the sea, and let them fall by the camp, as it were a day's journey on this side, and as it were a day's journey on the other side, round about the camp, and as it were two cubits high upon the face of the earth. And the people stood up all that day, and all that night, and all the next day, and they gathered the quails: he that gathered least gathered ten homers: and they spread them all abroad for themselves round about the camp" (vv. 31–32).⁸ They began to eat. They had enough food for a month; they would not enjoy it for an hour. "And while the flesh was yet between their teeth, ere it was chewed, the wrath of the LORD was kindled against the people, and the LORD smote the people with a very great plague" (v.

7. The phrasing of this seemingly rhetorical question is another piece of evidence that Israel numbered about 2.4 million people. Moses would not have used the rhetoric of all the fish in the sea to describe the requirements of feeding a few thousand people.

8. The Hebrew words "cubits face earth" were translated as "two cubits high upon the face of the earth." This translation cannot be correct. A pile of dead quail three feet high in an area in the range of 713 miles would constitute billions of quail. If it was a day's journey across the camp—say, 30 miles—then the radius was 15 miles. The formula $\pi \times r^2$ gives 731 miles. The phrase "cubits face earth" should be translated as "cubits above the face of the earth," i.e., the height at which the quail flew into the camp: about three feet, where they could be hit with any heavy implement. This was the interpretation of Rashi: "This means that they were flying at a height of two cubits from the ground so that they reached just up to a man's breast. . . ." Rashi, Chumash with Targum Onkelos, Haphtaroth and Rashi's Commentary, A. M. Silbermann and M. Rosenbaum, translators, 5 vols. (Jerusalem: Silbermann Family, [1934] 1985 [Jewish year: 5745]), IV, p. 58 (Num. 11:31).

33). They got more than they had bargained for.

C. Aaron and Miriam

Moses' brother and sister were not satisfied with their authority. "And they said, Hath the LORD indeed spoken only by Moses? hath he not spoken also by us? And the LORD heard it" (Num. 12:2). God brought the three of them into the cloud at the door of the tabernacle. Then He identified Moses as far more than a prophet: "And he said, Hear now my words: If there be a prophet among you, I the LORD will make myself known unto him in a vision, and will speak unto him in a dream. My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all mine house. With him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently [openly, NASB], and not in dark speeches; and the similitude [likeness] of the LORD shall he behold: wherefore then were ye not afraid to speak against my servant Moses?" (vv. 6–8).

God removed the cloud. Miriam was now leprous. Biblical leprosy was a disease of God's judgment.⁹ God did not strike Aaron, who was a man and had a high office. Miriam was a woman and had no office. Her sin was greater than Aaron's: less justification for demanding authority. Aaron immediately repented before God in both of their names (v. 12). Moses cried to God to heal her, which He did, but not without an additional negative sanction: "And the LORD said unto Moses, If her father had but spit in her face, should she not be ashamed seven days? let her be shut out from the camp seven days, and after that let her be received in again" (v. 14). There is no doubt that the people knew all about this; the camp did not move until her week was over (v. 15).

D. Send in the Spies

The time had come to test the nation's readiness for the conquest of Canaan. "And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, Send thou men, that they may search the land of Canaan, which I give unto the children of Israel: of every tribe of their fathers shall ye send a man, everyone a ruler among them" (Num. 13:1–2). Men with leadership ability would make the decision about the wisdom of invading Canaan. They would make their decision only after first-hand reconnaissance. They would see with their own eyes the land and its inhabitants. They would calculate with their own minds the risk-reward ratio. Then they would decide. "And Moses sent them to spy out the land of Canaan, and said unto them, Get you up this way southward, and go up into the mountain: And see the land, what it is; and the people that dwelleth therein, whether they be strong or weak, few or many; And what the land is that they dwell in, whether it be good or bad; and what cities they be that they dwell in, whether in tents, or in strong holds; And what the land is, whether it be fat or lean, whether there be wood therein, or not. And be ye of good courage, and bring of the fruit of the land. Now the time was the time of the first ripe grapes" (vv. 17–20). They searched the land for 40 days (v. 25).

9. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 9.

Their report was delivered in the familiar form: "We've got good news and bad news." First, the good news: "And they told him, and said, We came unto the land whither thou-sendest us, and surely it Howeth with milk and honey; and this is the fruit of it" (v. 27). Then the bad news: "Nevertheless the people be strong that dwell in the land, and the cities are walled, and very great: and moreover we saw the children of Anak there" (v. 28).

Then came Caleb, who proclaimed, in effect, "The bigger they are, the harder they fall." "And Caleb stilled the people before Moses, and said, Let us go up at once, and possess it; for we are well able to overcome it" (v. 30).

E. Faith, Facts, and Actions

At this point, the spies' story changed. The bad news was all true; worse, even. "And there we saw the giants, the sons of Anak, which come of the giants: and we were in our own sight as grasshoppers, and so we were in their sight" (Num. 13:33). Meanwhile, the good news disappeared. The land was nothing; worse, even. "And they brought up an evil report of the land which they had searched unto the children of Israel, saying, The land, through which we have gone to search it, is a land that eateth up the inhabitants thereof; and all the people that we saw in it are men of a great stature" (v. 32).

Caleb and Joshua believed Israel could win; the others believed they could not. When it looked as though Caleb's report might place them in jeopardy militarily, they revised their report. The potential reward was just not worth the risk. Better to wander; better to eat manna; best of all, to have died. "And all the congregation lifted up their voice, and cried; and the people wept that night. And all the children of Israel murmured against Moses and against Aaron: and the whole congregation said unto them, Would God that we had died in the land of Egypt! or would God we had died in this wilderness!" (Num. 14:1–2). Life was their burden; they feared to lose it in battle. Better to return to slavery: "And wherefore hath the LORD brought us unto this land, to fall by the sword, that our wives and our children should be a prey? were it not better for us to return into Egypt? And they said one to another, Let us make a captain, and let us return into Egypt" (vv. 3–4).

Moses and Aaron fell on their faces before the representative assembly (v. 5). Joshua and Caleb remained on their feet and spoke out. The land is good; God will give it to us if He favors us; do not rebel against God or fear the Canaanites (vv. 7–9). Their words were negative sanctions against the people and the other ten spies. The people were ready to respond with more direct sanctions: "But all the congregation bade stone them with stones" (v. 10a).

At that point, God appeared. He was ready to impose comprehensive negative sanctions: "And the LORD said unto Moses, How long will this people provoke me? and how long will it be ere they believe me, for all the signs which I have shewed among them? I will smite them with the pestilence, and disinherit them, and will make of thee a greater nation and mightier than they" (vv. 11–12). Moses intervened and offered the most effective prayer there is: an appeal to God's reputation. "And Moses said unto the LORD, Then the Egyptians shall hear it, (for thou broughtest up this people in thy might from among them;) And they will tell it to the inhabitants of this land: for they have heard that thou LORD art among this people, that thou LORD art seen face to face, and that thy cloud standeth over them, and that thou goest before them, by daytime in a pillar of a cloud, and in a pillar of fire by night. Now if thou shalt kill all this people as one man, then the nations which have heard the fame of thee will speak, saying, Because the LORD was not able to bring this people into the land which he swore unto them, therefore he hath slain them in the wilderness" (13–16). Be merciful, therefore; pardon their iniquity (vv. 18–19).

So, God did just that (v. 20). Then He announced another negative sanction: "Because all those men which have seen my glory, and my miracles, which I did in Egypt and in the wilderness, and have tempted me now these ten times, and have not hearkened to my voice; Surely they shall not see the land which I swore unto their fathers, neither shall any of them that provoked me see it" (vv. 22–23). He also announced a positive sanction: "But my servant Caleb, because he had another spirit with him, and hath followed me fully, him will I bring into the land whereinto he went; and his seed shall possess it" (v. 24). Then He returned to graphic language: "Your carcasses shall fall in this wilderness; and all that were numbered of you, according to your whole number, from twenty years old and upward, which have murmured against me" (v. 29). But Joshua and Caleb will enter the land (v. 30).

The rebels' children would be placed under a great burden. "And your children shall wander in the wilderness forty years, and bear your whoredoms, until your carcasses be wasted in the wilderness" (v. 33). The adults would die off during these years, matching their 40 unproductive days in the wilderness (vv. 34). To verify His words, God slew the ten cowardly spies who had slandered the land, thereby slandering God's promise regarding the land: "And the men, which Moses sent to search the land, who returned, and made all the congregation to murmur against him, by bringing up a slander upon the land, Even those men that did bring up the evil report upon the land, died by the plague before the LORD" (vv. 36–37).

Always before, when the people repented, the negative sanctions had stopped: Once again, they made a brief repentance (vv. 39–40). Moses understood their chicanery: they planned to show God wrong, again. They would defeat their enemies on their terms. "And Moses said, Wherefore now do ye transgress the commandment of the LORD? but it shall not prosper. Go not up, for the LORD is not among you; that ye be not smitten before your enemies. For the Amalekites and the Canaanites are there before you, and ye shall fall by the sword: because ye are turned away from the LORD, therefore the LORD will not be with you" (vv. 41–43). They refused to listen. They attacked Amalekites and Canaanites who lived in the area. They were soundly defeated (vv. 43–45).

Israel believed the reports it wanted to hear. When the people heard of the good land filled with big people, they discounted the message of the good land. The spies then revised their initial report: bad land, big people. When God told them they were not able to win a relatively minor battle, they refused to believe Him. They trusted in themselves. They did not trust themselves enough to defeat Canaan. They did trust themselves enough to defeat Amalek. Had they listened to Joshua and Caleb, they would not have had to bother with Amalek; they would have marched straight into Canaan. They lost a minor battle, yet they could have won a major battle. The issue was their faith in God's word, not comparative size of armies. Faith in God's word is what they lacked.

Conclusion

Evaluation is an aspect of point four of the biblical covenant: sanctions/judgment. The people were supposed to evaluate their situation in terms of God's word, as confirmed by His acts of deliverance in recent history. They refused to believe God's word; therefore, they evaluated their situation incorrectly. They interpreted the historical facts in terms of covenant-breaking standards. They did not use God's word as their standard of evaluation. God brought corporate judgments against them because of this open disbelief.

The Israelites had fallen into a bad habit: whining to Moses to get what they wanted from God. By God's grace, this whining initially resulted in positive sanctions. The problem was, they did not recognize that it was God's grace, not their whining, that had gained them the objects of their desires. Their whining was a public testimony of their lack of faith in God's promises. They focused on the negative side of their journey, ignoring or denying the positive. This was reflected in the spies' revised report: bad land, big people.

The land was good; the land was theirs for the taking. It was not theirs for the asking. They had to take risks on the battlefield. God was going to bring negative sanctions against Canaan; this was an inescapable aspect of His original promise: "But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full" (Gen. 15:16). God would bring His judgment when the iniquity of the Amorites was full. The Israelites wanted the positive sanction of the land without the negative sanctions associated with battle. The land was not available on these terms. So, Israel rebelled. They wanted the land on their terms; failing that, they did not want the land at all. So, they did not inherit.

Manna was not good enough; they wanted quail. So, they cried out that manna was bad. The land was not good enough; they wanted it empty of resistance. So, they cried out that the land was bad. What was good they evaluated as bad. They brought formal public judgment against manna and the land. God then brought a covenant lawsuit against them.

They were willing to return to Egypt, thereby disinheriting their children. In reply, God disinherited them, skipping a generation. It was the parents who were disinherited by God, not the children.

God did not intend that they dwell in the wilderness forever. He wanted them in the Promised Land. But to gain their promised inheritance, they had to have faith in God and then bear the risks of warfare. This is why God begins the Book of Numbers (bemidbar: “in the wilderness”) with a military numbering. It pointed to their present condition (wilderness) and the way to a better condition (warfare). Not willing to bear the burden of the risks of warfare, they forfeited their inheritance. They refused to honor the covenantal principle that underlies godly inheritance: “no pain, no gain.” They wanted gain without pain, inheritance without negative sanctions. Anything less than this was not good enough for Israel. They forgot the obvious, which the sacrificial system announced clearly: apart from the means of grace, Israel was not good enough for God.

8

DEFERRED GRATIFICATION

Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye be come into the land of your habitations, which I give unto you, And will make an offering by fire unto the LORD, a burnt offering, or a sacrifice in performing a vow, or in a freewill offering, or in your solemn feasts, to make a sweet savour unto the LORD, of the herd, or of the flock. Then shall he that offereth his offering unto the LORD bring a meat offering of a tenth deal of flour mingled with the fourth part of an hin of oil. And the fourth part of an hin of wine for a drink offering shalt thou prepare with the burnt offering or sacrifice, for one lamb (Num. 15:2–5).

The theocentric focus of this passage is God's ownership of the Promised Land. When making an offering, the Israelite would have to offer oil, bread, and wine to God. This representative or token offering pointed to God's ownership of the source of bread and wine: the land. This law would come into force only after the inheritance had been delivered. The law did not apply in the wilderness.

Who is the giver of gifts? God. He reasserted His claim on Israel by reminding them of the inevitability of the Promised Land. He promised again to give the land to them. It would be the land of their habitation. This means that it would be the land of God's habitation. Obviously, the wilderness was not to be their place of habitation. It was merely a transitional residence for the younger generation. For the exodus generation, it was a permanent residence. They would die and be buried in the wilderness they hated.

This law was therefore aimed at the generation of the conquest. It was given to the exodus generation early in the wilderness experience, yet it did not relate to them. They knew this in Numbers 15. This is why this section of Numbers 15 is a problem passage. It did not relate to the lives of those who were old enough to obey it.

A. Additional Sacrifices

In Wenham's words, this section of Numbers 15 "baffles commentators."¹ It deals with offerings: burnt offerings, peace offerings, and sin (purification) offerings. God required that meal, oil, and wine accompany these offerings. This requirement did not appear in Leviticus 1–7. Why were these requirements added in Numbers 15?

A fairly simple explanation for this change is the fact that the land would offer benefits that the wilderness did not. There was no way for the Israelites to enjoy wine in the wilderness except by trade with nations that were in nearby lands. There is no record of such trade. Oil was also a problem: no olive trees. The oil offerings in the wilderness were limited. Not so in the Promised Land. There they were required with other sacrifices.

The general principle here is that man sins in the face of an environment that testifies to God. The greater the testimony of God's benefits to man, the greater is man's sin. From that person to whom much has been given, much is expected (Luke 12:48).

The Promised Land was flowing with milk and honey; the wilderness was not. God would be entitled to a share of the fruit of the land when the people entered the land. This applied not just to tithes and voluntary offerings but also to mandatory offerings to cover sin.

This is additional testimony to the fact that God does not call upon man to make huge sacrifices. He warns men that they must not attempt to buy their way out of God's judgment by means of enormous sacrifices. Man does not possess sufficient assets to placate God. To act as though he does is itself sinful.² What God does call man to do is to acknowledge that with greater blessings from God there is greater responsibility to God. Their entrance into the land will be a blessing, God announces in Numbers 15. The people should know that the land will bring blessings because there will be additional requirements for the mandated sacrifices, as well as for the voluntary peace offering (Num. 15:9–10).

The parents had just rebelled against God and had been locked out of the Promised Land. What were they going to miss? A lot, God announced. The new requirements for the various offerings testified to the fact that life would be filled with blessings in the land: meal, wine, and oil. The people had rebelled against God by complaining about the insufficiency of manna. In the Promised Land, there will be far more than manna, God was reminding them here.

1. Gordon J. Wenham, Numbers: An Introduction and Commentary (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1981), p. 126.

2. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 1.

There will be a new aspect of the offering. “Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye come into the land whither I bring you, Then it shall be, that, when ye eat of the bread of the land, ye shall offer up an heave offering unto the LORD” (Num. 15:18–19). The heave offering will be of the threshingfloor (v. 20). Previously, the heave offering by the people was animal: “And the right shoulder shall ye give unto the priest for an heave offering of the sacrifices of your peace offerings” (Lev. 7:32; cf. Lev. 10:15). When they have land, they will have farms. A small portion of agricultural output must go to the heave offering. But not yet—not until they arrive in the land.

B. Willing to Wait

The promise of land was sanctioned by the requirement of additional offerings. The generation of the conquest had been told from the early days of the wilderness wandering that the land would come to them. Their parents did not sacrifice as their children would eventually sacrifice. Their parents were under lesser requirements because their parents were recipients of reduced blessings. The present and future distinction between the required sacrifices testified to the present and future condition of Israel. God would ask for more in the Promised Land. This was proof that God would fulfill His promise. He would become the beneficiary of His own gift of land: greater sacrifices, more pleasing aromas drifting up to heaven. Why wouldn't the younger generation expect the fulfillment of the promise of land? The God of Israel would be a beneficiary.

Their parents were not patient. The sanction against impatience was appropriate: the imposition of the necessity of deferred gratification. God would teach the younger generation a lesson. He would remain patient, not demanding greater sacrifices in the present; so should members of the younger generation remain patient.

This would pressure them to adopt the mentality of upper-class people. Lower-class people are not patient. They resist any suggestion of deferred gratification in life. In contrast, upper-class people are willing to wait to be gratified.³ This is why upper-class people are more thrifty, make long-range plans, and remain in school longer than lower-class people. The generation of the exodus was a lower-class generation. Their children were not to imitate them. The very structure of the sacrifices reminded them that God was willing to wait for His lawful rewards. They were, too.

3. Edward C. Banfield, The Unheavenly City: The Nature and Future of our Urban Crisis (Boston: Little, Brown, 1970), ch. 3.

C. Planning Ahead

The law of the sabbath was specific: no work was to be done on the sabbath. "Ye shall keep the sabbath therefore; for it is holy unto you: everyone that defileth it shall surely be put to death: for whosoever doeth any work therein, that soul shall be cut off from among his people. Six days may work be done; but in the seventh is the sabbath of rest, holy to the LORD: whosoever doeth any work in the sabbath day, he shall surely be put to death" (Ex. 31:14–15; cf. 35:2). The law was specific, but what constituted lawful labor? A case-law application was needed here. Israel soon got one:

And while the children of Israel were in the wilderness, they found a man that gathered sticks upon the sabbath day. And they that found him gathering sticks brought him unto Moses and Aaron, and unto all the congregation. And they put him in ward, because it was not declared what should be done to him. And the LORD said unto Moses, The man shall be surely put to death: all the congregation shall stone him with stones without the camp. And all the congregation brought him without the camp, and stoned him with stones, and he died; as the LORD commanded Moses (Num. 15:32–36).

The stick-gatherer was working on the sabbath. Perhaps he was planning to start a fire. This was illegal on the sabbath. "Ye shall kindle no fire throughout your habitations upon the sabbath day" (Ex. 35:3). Perhaps he had run low on fuel. This also was no excuse. In fact, running low on fuel was Jesus' model of the well-intentioned soul who does not plan ahead regarding the final judgment: the parable of the ten virgins, half of whom forgot to store up oil for the time when the bridegroom would return (Matt. 25:1–13). Perhaps he was doing this to re-sell the sticks later. In this case, he was working commercially. One thing was sure: the stick-gatherer was working. The judges were not sure if the sabbath death penalty extended to this seemingly minimal daily task. It did.

The stick-gatherer could have gathered sticks on the previous six days. He did not gather a sufficient number. A penalty had to be paid:

either a lack of sticks or an excess of stones. He refused to regard as legally binding on him either of these negative sanctions against stick-gathering on the sabbath. God, however, did regard the law as binding on him.

1. Sabbath and Fuel

The gathering of sticks is a fine example of Hebrew case law as applied in the light of a general requirement of the Decalogue. It shows, perhaps, better than any other instance, the implications of the fourth commandment for the Hebrew nation. Consider the economic implications. What was involved in the gathering of sticks? Sticks could be used for at least four purposes:

1. Heating the home
2. Lighting the home
3. Cooking the meals
4. Selling for uses 1–3

As far as actual use was concerned, the case in Numbers 15 applied more to the daily life of Hebrew women than it did to the men of the family. It is more often the man and his work which are the focus of modern sabbatarian concern, but this was not necessarily the case in a rural, pre-industrial community. The gathering of sticks was more likely to be the task of children; women were to use them for household tasks, once gathered. Men were to reap the benefits of both the gathering and actual use of the sticks, but in general they would not have much to do with the actual handling of sticks. There could be a few exceptions, of course, but one exception seems to be far more likely, namely, that of the professional stick-gatherer. His work would be most in demand on the sabbath, precisely the day on which the prohibition against work was enforced. A woman who failed to gather sticks earlier in the week could buy some from a professional.

We are not told that the man in Numbers 15 was such a professional, but the severity of the punishment clearly would have made it far more dangerous for such a class of professionals to have come into existence. There was a need for a harsh penalty, men and women being what they are. There is always a delight in violating God's commandments if one is a sinner; if that violation also brings with it certain superficial benefits above and beyond the mere pleasure of defiance, so much the better. Sabbath prohibitions involved heavy costs for the obedient; enforcement of the sabbath required stiff penalties, thus burdening violators with high costs in the form of high risk.

What were the costs of the sabbath? For the man, it was the forfeiture of all income—monetary (less likely in a pre-modern rural society), psychological, or in physical property—for that day. But women also paid. They had to gather all sticks earlier in the week. It meant more work during the week, either in longer days or by increasing the intensity of the working day—or both. Had the working day not been lengthened or intensified, then other tasks which it was desirable to accomplish would have to have been foregone, and that, as any wife knows, also involves costs (especially if a husband or a mother-in-law notices the failure in question). There would always be a temptation to forego the gathering of sticks during the week, especially if a professional would come by with a load of wood on the sabbath for a reasonably cheap price. If his price was less than the woman's estimation of the costs involved in gathering the wood earlier in the week, a bargain was to be expected. By imposing a rigorous and permanent form of punishment on the violator, the community was able to force up the price of the sticks; risks would be so high that few professionals could survive. How many women could or would pay the costs? It would be cheaper to buy them or gather them earlier in the week. Stick gathering was made an unlikely source of profitable employment on the sabbath. Since the market for sticks on the sabbath was restricted because of the high prices for the sticks (due to the risks involved), the opportunities for temptation were thereby reduced to a minimum. It did not pay anyone to violate the sabbath, and it was too expensive to hire someone to violate it.

Conclusion

The present-oriented person is less willing to plan ahead than the future-oriented person. The stick-gatherer was obviously present-oriented. He did not plan ahead during the previous week. He acted on the spur of the moment on the sabbath. Short of sticks, he sought more. On the sabbath, he retroactively evaluated the previous week's work and found it lacking. He decided that he could make up for lost time. He was wrong. He lost all remaining time. Time ran out for him.

Time runs out for everyone. That is time's curse in a world under God's negative sanction of final judgment. The goal, then, is to make good use of our allotted time while it is available. The sabbath reminds us of this requirement. To honor it means that we must plan ahead. We must work harder during the week to avoid having to work on the sabbath.

Time orientation is important for distinguishing societies. The biblical concept of history is linear: creation, fall, redemption, and consummation. It has a beginning and an end. Men are told to pay attention to the end of time. While this emphasis is minimal in the Old Testament, the last three verses of Daniel being the main exception, the emphasis on the shortness of man's days is continual. Men are to look ahead to their old age, death, and future generations.

The wilderness experience was designed to teach the younger generation patience, daily trust in God (manna), and faith in the good land to come. They were to acknowledge that all good things come on schedule. So do all bad things. That future era would bring good things to Israel and bad things to Canaanites, whose iniquity would at last be filled (Gen. 15:16). They were to imitate God, who was willing to wait for his extra sacrifices until they entered the Promised Land.

The man who gathered sticks on the sabbath failed to honor the deferred gratification principle of the Old Covenant sabbath: rest at the end of the week. He chose to disparage that future rest by failing to plan ahead. He was present-oriented, and this cost him dearly on the day of rest.

9

EVALUATION AND SANCTIONS

And Moses sent to call Dathan and Abiram, the sons of Eliab: which said, We will not come up: Is it a small thing that thou hast brought us up out of a land that floweth with milk and honey, to kill us in the wilderness, except thou make thyself altogether a prince over us? Moreover thou hast not brought us into a land that floweth with milk and honey, or given us inheritance of fields and vineyards: wilt thou put out the eyes of these men? we will not come up (Num. 16:12–14).

I have already commented on the confrontation between Moses on one hand and Korah and Dathan on the other.¹ Korah, a member of the family of Kohath, was Moses' cousin (Ex. 6:18–21). He was joined by Dathan and Abiram, members of the tribe of Reuben (Num. 16:1). They complained that Moses had arrogated too much authority to himself. There was no distinction among Israelites, they said. All were equally holy (v. 3). Moses called for a test of these democratic claims: a test of fire (v. 18).

The rebels had this complaint: Moses was a false prophet. He had told them that God would lead the nation into a land of milk and honey. But where were they? In the wilderness (bemidbar). Everyone could see this: wilderness, wilderness all around them. No milk, no honey. We are not blind, they said. "Wilt thou put out the eyes of these men?"

But the accusers went beyond this. Not only were they not in a land of milk and honey, Moses had led them out of a land of milk and honey. Moses had promised them something better than what they had enjoyed in Egypt. He had lured them out of a good land with the promise of a better land. But now they found themselves in a worse land.

This had been the constant theme of the exodus generation since before the parting of the Red Sea: the positive blessings of Egypt. The nation believed in the message of Korah and Dathan. They had voiced it themselves repeatedly. The people's complaint had not been political, however. It had been economic: Where is our water? Where is our meat? This time, the complaint was more political and ecclesiastical: Where is our authority? But the complaint was supported by an appeal to economic conditions. They were saying to Moses: "Your interpretation of God's plan was incorrect. There is no reason for you to elevate yourself above us."

1. Chapters 3 and 5.

A. In Hope of Plenty

Moses had come before Pharaoh with a demand: let the Israelites go three days' journey into the wilderness. Pharaoh rejected this demand. Then came a series of confrontations between Moses and Pharaoh. In none of these was the question of Israel's permanent emigration ever raised. God had told Moses that this was His intention (Ex. 3:8, 17), but not until after the Passover did Moses inform the people about this (Ex. 13:5). They knew they were leaving Egypt, for they spoiled the Egyptians, but they did not know where they were going unless they remembered God's promise to Abraham (Gen. 15:16).

When Moses raised the hope of plenty, it caught their imagination. The early confrontations in the wilderness centered around the disparity between the wilderness and the promise, and between the past and the promise. They wanted to be effortlessly delivered by God into the Promised Land. By the time of the rebellion of Korah, the generation of the exodus knew that they would not enter the Promised Land. Having been denied the fulfillment of their promise, they reinterpreted Egypt as the retroactive Promised Land. They had no sense of inheritance. Egypt, the land of bondage, where their children had been condemned to perpetual servitude to foreigners, became the Promised Land. Since that generation would not inherit the real Promised Land, it was obviously not worth inheriting.

This was their present-orientation in action. They were revisionist historians who, less than two years after the exodus, were re-writing the history of their recent experience in Egypt: not bondage but a golden age. They had short memories in public.

Had these political rebels really forgotten about their lives in Egypt? This seems highly unlikely. Their appeal to revisionist history was rhetorical. It was an appeal to the people regarding the unpleasantness of the present wilderness condition. "Just give us a reformed administration, and the wilderness will become more bearable. We suffer in a wilderness as subordinates; let us suffer the wilderness as equals. Egyptian slavery involved subordination; the wilderness involves subordination; let us put an end to subordination!"

This appeal invoked the hope of plenty. This hope had been thwarted by Israel's sin and their fear of confrontation with Canaan. But Korah made no mention of the true causes for the delay of milk and honey. He only mentioned Moses' original promise. He failed to mention that this promise had been conditional on their obedience. He also failed to mention that their children would inherit. They wanted instant fulfillment of the promise of milk and honey.

Milk and honey: this is a familiar political promise by the politician who seeks authority in the name of equality. Wealth is a valid goal: God gave this goal to Moses; Moses gave it to the people. Milk and honey are aspects of kingdom blessings: positive sanctions for covenantal faithfulness. The model is the New Heaven and the New Earth (Isa. 65:17–20). The politician and power-seeker who plans to replace the incumbent finds that an appeal to more milk and more honey is a powerful appeal. "The incumbent has promised to deliver the goods; he has failed to deliver; so, elect me."

Korah could not offer the promised plenty of Canaan. God had been very clear about this. That generation would not inherit. What were the obvious options? First, they could return to Egypt, that other land filled with milk and honey. But Egypt had been wiped out: its firstborn sons were dead. It was probably in chaos—or under the rule of invaders. Second, they could stay in the wilderness under Moses' rule. Third, they could stay in the wilderness under a new system of political and ecclesiastical rulers, but in the name of equality. The rebels recommended the third option. But their appeal was to economics: the absence of milk and honey under Moses' rule. "If we can't get what we had been promised under the old regime, let us establish a new regime."

The judgment of God against the rebels was total. This included their wealth. "And the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up, and their houses, and all the men that appertained unto Korah, and all their goods" (Num. 16:32). All of their goods disappeared into the pit. Their assets became as cursed as Jericho's would be in the next generation: total (hormah). "And he spake unto the congregation, saying, Depart, I pray you, from the tents of these wicked men, and touch nothing of theirs, lest ye be consumed in all their sins” (Num. 16:26).

B. Poor Evaluation, Large Losses

Did Israel learn its lesson? No. “But on the morrow all the congregation of the children of Israel murmured against Moses and against Aaron, saying, Ye have killed the people of the LORD” (Num. 16:41). They had seen the fire from heaven consume the 250 who had offered sacrifice (v. 35). This did not make an impression on them. The Israelites interpreted all of this in terms of their desire for equality with Moses and Aaron. Their representatives, who had acted to elevate the people, had been destroyed. It was not God who had done this; it was Moses and Aaron. God’s immediate response to this accusation was to send a plague on them (v. 47). Only the active intervention of Aaron saved the nation, but 14,700 of them died (v. 49).

Chapter 17 is really an extension of chapter 16. God established one more test and one more evaluation. He had Moses instruct the tribes to bring one rod per tribe. The name of the prince of the tribe was to be written on the tribe’s rod. These men were political representatives, not priests. Then He had Moses write Aaron’s name on Levi’s rod. When these rods were placed before God in the tabernacle and left overnight, Aaron’s rod blossomed (v. 8). The other rods did not. Moses brought each man’s rod back to him (v. 9). “And the LORD said unto Moses, Bring Aaron’s rod again before the testimony, to be kept for a token against the rebels; and thou shalt quite take away their murmurings from me, that they die not” (v. 10). “And the children of Israel spake unto Moses, saying, Behold, we die, we perish, we all perish. Whosoever cometh any thing near unto the tabernacle of the LORD shall die: shall we be consumed with dying?” (vv. 12–13). This ended the rebellion of the people in seeking to become priests or to send their agents to become priests.

C. The Basis of Evaluation

The people did not suffer from physical blindness; they suffered from moral blindness. They refused to interpret what they saw by means of what God told them through Moses. They were in revolt against God. They were in revolt against Moses. Moses’ words were automatically rejected by them. Thus, his evaluation of reality was also rejected by them. They were consistent. They rejected God, Moses, and the reality imposed by God and explained by Moses.

Reality was what Moses said it was. God's visible sanctions came predictably in terms of Moses' evaluation. The people could ignore their own eyes and ears, and did. After the destruction of the rebels, the people blamed Moses. The true god had been represented by the rebels; Moses must have represented a false God. So, God gave them another dose of reality.

Still, God knew this was not enough. He imposed the test of the blossoming rod. This finally persuaded them. They were now afraid to approach the tabernacle. But it had taken negative sanction after negative sanction to persuade them. Seeing, they would not see. This willful blindness brought a series of negative sanctions on them, just as it had with Pharaoh. They were not myopic; they were Pharaonic.

They could have avoided the negative sanctions at every step, had they listened to Moses: prior to the golden calf incident, prior to the spies' return, prior to the quail, prior to Korah's rebellion, prior to their attribution of righteousness to the late Rev. Korah. Had they listened to Moses, they would have seen reality. Refusing to listen to Moses, they refused to see reality. This was reaffirmed by Jesus in the parable of Lazarus and Dives: "Then he [Dives] said, I pray thee therefore, father [Abraham], that thou wouldest send him to my father's house: For I have five brethren; that he may testify unto them, lest they also come into this place of torment. Abraham saith unto him, They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them. And he said, Nay, father Abraham: but if one went unto them from the dead, they will repent. And he said unto him, If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead" (Luke 16:27–31). Hell is preliminary to the ultimate negative sanction, the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14–15) yet not even the testimony of one resurrected from the dead can persuade Moses-rejecting men of hell's reality or of the way of escape. The way of escape from the negative sanctions, Abraham said, was a willingness to listen and conform to Moses and the prophets prior to the imposition of the sanctions. This, the generation of the wilderness steadfastly refused to do. And so the negative sanctions kept coming.

Conclusion

The people had looked at their wilderness condition, had compared it with the promise of milk and honey, and had sanctioned the rebels retroactively. Korah had asked rhetorically, "Wilt thou put out the eyes of these men?" But these men could not see. They were judicially blind. Seeing, they would not see.

The nation saw what they wanted to see. They saw Moses and Aaron as tyrants, despite the fact that it had been, and soon would be again, the active intervention of Moses and Aaron that allowed them to survive. They saw the wilderness, but did not see liberty. They saw their children, but did not see the inheritance, which is why they refused to circumcise their sons (Josh. 5:5). They had seen Egypt's tyranny, but viewed it as a land of plenty.

Evaluation is associated with judgment. To evaluate something is to judge it. The test of what an evaluator says is how closely his words match what God has decreed. As Moses said before God's judgment between Moses and Korah, "Hereby ye shall know that the LORD hath sent me to do all these works; for I have not done them of mine own mind. If these men die the common death of all men, or if they be visited after the visitation of all men; then the LORD hath not sent me. But if the LORD make a new thing, and the earth open her mouth, and swallow them up, with all that appertain unto them, and they go down quick into the pit; then ye shall understand that these men have provoked the LORD" (vv. 28–30). But the people did not understand this; they chose not to understand. So, the negative sanctions came on them.

Reality imposes sanctions. Evaluation must match reality in order to be successful. Those who evaluate reality accurately reap rewards. Those whose evaluations fail to match reality suffer losses. This is the great law of entrepreneurship: those who forecast the future accurately and act accordingly prosper; those who do not forecast accurately and act accordingly lose. Assets move from those who evaluate properly to those who evaluate improperly.

10

TITHE AND SANCTIONS

And the LORD said unto Aaron, Thou and thy sons and thy father's house with thee shall bear the iniquity of the sanctuary: and thou and thy sons with thee shall bear the iniquity of your priesthood. And thy brethren also of the tribe of Levi, the tribe of thy father, bring thou with thee, that they may be joined unto thee, and minister unto thee: but thou and thy sons with thee shall minister before the tabernacle of witness. And they shall keep thy charge, and the charge of all the tabernacle: only they shall not come nigh the vessels of the sanctuary and the altar, that neither they, nor ye also, die. And they shall be joined unto thee, and keep the charge of the tabernacle of the congregation, for all the service of the tabernacle: and a stranger shall not come nigh unto you (Num. 18:1–4).

The theocentric principle here is God's holiness and man's God is set apart from man: holiness.¹ This required the creation of a series of concentric circles of holiness around the Ark of the Covenant, where God dwelt with Israel. Someone had to take personal responsibility for guarding² these zones of holiness from trespassers whose very presence would profane the sacred space. So, God transferred to the sons of Aaron the responsibility of guarding the sanctuary. Because of man's sin, any iniquity within the sanctuary's boundaries had to be dealt with ritually. This was the task assigned to Aaron and his sons by God: to guard the sanctuary and cleanse it. They bore the responsibility for any violations of the holiness of the sanctuary's sacred boundaries.

God's goal was the elimination of the effects of sin in Israel. He desired to remove the nation from the judgment of sin. By creating a system of ritual acts of cleansing, God made possible life apart from the imposition of His negative sanctions: "And ye shall keep the charge of the sanctuary, and the charge of the altar: that there be no wrath any more upon the children of Israel” (v. 5).

1. Point three: ethics.

2. Point four: sanctions.

Boundaries had to be respected in Israel. But boundaries, like law, to which sanctions are not attached are merely opinion. The boundaries of the Ark of the Covenant were not mere opinion. God’s sanctions enforced the boundaries associated with His dwelling place. Because it is better to fall into the hands of angry men than an angry God,³ He appointed defenders. They would impose preliminary sanctions to guard the sacred space associated with the Ark. “And I, behold, I have taken your brethren the Levites from among the children of Israel: to you they are given as a gift for the LORD, to do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation. Therefore thou and thy sons with thee shall keep your priest’s office for every thing of the altar, and within the vail; and ye shall serve: I have given your priest’s office unto you as a service of gift: and the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death” (vv. 6–7).

A. A Meat-Eating Priesthood

The sons of Aaron could lawfully claim certain offerings as food: “This shall be thine of the most holy things, reserved from the fire: every oblation of theirs, every meat [meal] offering of theirs, and every sin offering of theirs, and every trespass offering of theirs, which they shall render unto me, shall be most holy for thee and for thy sons. In the most holy place shalt thou eat it; every male shall eat it: it shall be holy unto thee” (vv. 9–10). These sacrifices were not regarded as the care and feeding of God—a common belief among pagan societies.⁴ Rather, they served as legal coverings for the donors and as food for the priests. The priests received the heave offerings (v. 11). They received the best, not the dregs: “All the best of the oil, and all the best of the wine, and of the wheat, the firstfruits of them which they shall offer unto the LORD, them have I given thee” (v. 12). But to receive these offerings, the priest had to be clean before God: “And whatsoever is first ripe in the land, which they shall bring unto the LORD, shall be thine; everyone that is clean in thine house shall eat of it” (v. 13). The primary goal was holiness; the secondary goal was the support of

3. “And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell” (Matt. 10:28).

4. Jacob Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16, vol. 3 of The Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday, 1991), p. 59. Cf. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia; Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), p. 35.

priests.

“Every thing devoted in Israel shall be thine” (v. 14). A devoted item was the most holy of all. It could not be repurchased by the donor, unlike the dedicated object. The dedicated item could be repurchased by an additional payment of 20 percent (Lev. 27:15); not so the devoted item (Lev. 27:28–29).⁵

Second, the priest received a payment for the firstborn male in every family, as well as firstborn males of unclean beasts (v. 15). The payment was five shekels of the sanctuary (v. 16). The firstborn males of cows, sheep, and goats could not be redeemed; they had to be offered to the priests, who then sacrificed them.

This raises the question of transport. These animals had to be taken to Jerusalem to be sacrificed. They were not the property of the Levites; they belonged to the sons of Aaron. “And the flesh of them shall be thine, as the wave breast and as the right shoulder are thine. All the heave offerings of the holy things, which the children of Israel offer unto the LORD, have I given thee, and thy sons and thy daughters with thee, by a statute for ever: it is a covenant of salt for ever before the LORD unto thee and to thy seed with thee” (vv. 18–19). The costs of transportation were high. Presumably, the animals did not have to be delivered immediately. As they fattened up, they became more valuable as food. The priests would become the owners of more valuable animals. A man with a large herd would have driven the designated animals to Jerusalem at one of the mandatory festivals. This would have made the trip more difficult. It also would have filled the roads with droppings, which presumably would have been collected by farmers whose properties were close to the roads.

Four of the five primary sacrifices (v. 9) had to be eaten in the holy place (v. 10). The first primary offering, the whole burnt offering (Lev. 1), was exclusively God’s; the priest retained only the hide (Lev. 7:8). Verse 10 specifies “every oblation” (corban), which means every sacrifice. This is comprehensive language: “every oblation” was substituted for the whole burnt offering. This means that the priests alone had access to all of these holy offerings. The question arises: What about the heave offerings (v. 8)? Could they be shared with the other Levites? The language of the texts indicates that the offerings placed on the altar were the exclusive responsibility of the priests and therefore the exclusive property of the priests. These offerings could not be shared, for they had to be consumed in the holy place.

5. Ibid., ch. 36.

Every firstborn male born of a clean animal had to be brought to Jerusalem. The priests had to eat this meat in the holy place. The other families of Levi therefore could not partake, for they had no access to the innermost part of the tabernacle. Even their wives could not participate: “every male shall eat of it” (v. 10). There must have been a lot of unconsumed meat; the greater Israel’s prosperity, the greater the waste. The excess had to be disposed of, presumably outside the camp, as was required of the sin offering for the priesthood (Lev. 4:12; 8:17; 9:11).

1. God’s Law vs. Vegetarian Virtue

This law makes it clear that the priests of Israel were meat eaters. Eating meat on a regular basis was a mark of their holiness in a society in which meat was a comparative luxury. They represented God, and God is described in the Bible as one who delights in the odor of burning flesh (Ex. 29:18; Lev. 1:9). The tabernacle-temple was a place of mouth-watering odors, where a barbecue was in progress day and night. Those who approached the holy place could not have avoided this smell. It reminded them of God’s judgment: either a substitute goes on God’s altar or else the person does.

The unconsumed meat was a form of holy waste. God shared the roasted flesh of animals only with the sons of Aaron. They ate their meals in the presence of God. Representatively, they feasted well in the presence of God, just as sin-free man is to feast well in the presence of God. The exclusive nature of this feast pointed to the grace of God in bringing sinful men into His presence.

It is one of the marks of God’s blessing in the modern world that an ever-increasing percentage of men are able to afford to eat meat on a regular basis. This fact of free market capitalism is deeply resented by those who can legitimately be described as soybean socialists. They cry out against the sinfulness of the West, and especially the United States, for consuming so much meat. They bring their version of a covenant lawsuit against Americans who enjoy eating beef. Ronald J. Sider’s book, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger (1977), is a representative example. This book became a best-seller among neo-evangelical Christians in the late 1970s until I hired David Chilton to write Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators (1981), after which Sider’s book faded into oblivion, as politically liberal fads generally do.⁶

Sider blamed Third World poverty on the meat-eating West. Residents in the United States consume five times more grain per capita than those living in developing nations, he observed. This blessing he regarded as a moral infraction. It is impoverishing the Third World. "The major reason for this glaring difference is that we eat most of our grain indirectly—via grain-fed livestock and fowl. . . . Why is that important? Because it takes many pounds of grain to produce just one pound of beef. . . . Beef is the cadillac of meat products. . . . It is because of this high level of meat consumption that the rich minority of the world devours such an unfair share of the world's available food."⁷ He repeated this accusation, almost word for word, in the ignored and now nearly forgotten third edition of his book.⁸ His language of guilt manipulation is evident: "devours," "unfair share." We can almost hear Korah and Dathan railing against Aaron: "You and your sons are eating an unfair share of our beef. You are devouring our fields by your lust for meat, especially beef. You are no more holy than we are. Let us all publicly demonstrate our commitment to equality by eating nothing but grains from now on."

Not only did the priesthood feast on beef and other clean meats, they were required to throw away every ounce that they did not eat. This was holy wastefulness, and it was commanded by God. Any complaining about this procedure on the part of the non-priestly families of Levi, let alone any other tribe, was an assault on the integrity of the sacrificial system. Sinners were to bring their special offerings to God, and the priests alone benefitted directly. It unquestionably paid to be a priest.

The fat was to go to God: "And the priest shall burn them upon the altar: it is the food of the offering made by fire for a sweet savour: all the fat is the LORD'S. It shall be a perpetual statute for your generations throughout all your dwellings, that ye eat neither fat nor blood" (Lev. 3:16–17).⁹ This was a mark of God's sovereignty; it also was a form of dietary protection for the priests. If they did not honor this legal claim by God, and they ate the fat, then there would be negative consequences in their arteries. But the idea that eating meat in large

6. It was co-published by Inter-Varsity Press and the Paulist Press.

7. Ronald J. Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger: A Biblical Study (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1977), pp. 42–44.

8. Waco, Texas: Word, 1990, pp. 22–23.

9. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 3.

quantities should be universally avoided, irrespective of individual metabolisms and budgets, flies in the face of God's sacrificial system. Was it a curse to be a priest? Did God bring His loyal priesthood under the negative sanction of poor diet and bad health? Did He provide a daily miracle in cleaning the arteries of the priesthood? The texts reveal nothing like this. What they do reveal is a national sacrificial system that mandated an overflow of meat into the tabernacle.

We are no longer under the rules of this system. We can lawfully eat meat or chicken or even tofu burgers, as we see fit. Whether we should eat lots of beef depends on our incomes and our metabolisms. The issue is not to be decided by an appeal to morals; it is a personal matter of taste, cost, and health. Just as the righteous priests' constant feasting on meat was a mark of their position of great responsibility, authority, and blessing, so is the West's abundance of meat.¹⁰

B. Implications of This Inheritance

The Levites had no landed inheritance outside of Levitical cities: "And the LORD spake unto Aaron, Thou shalt have no inheritance in their land, neither shalt thou have any part among them: I am thy part and thine inheritance among the children of Israel. And, behold, I have given the children of Levi all the tenth in Israel for an inheritance, for their service which they serve, even the service of the tabernacle of the congregation" (Num. 18:20–21). This law had important implications for both the social order and the political order of Israel.

1. Social Implications

There is always the problem of envy and jealousy in a society. The jealous person thinks: "You have something I want. I will take it from you." This was the sin of Korah and Dathan. The envious person thinks: "You have something I want. I cannot get it from you. I will destroy it so that neither of us can enjoy it." This had been the sin of the Philistines in regard to Abraham: "For all the wells which his father's servants had digged in the days of Abraham his father, the Philistines had stopped them, and filled them with earth. And

10. The fact that McDonald's hamburger restaurants have become in our day the most visible sign of America's cultural presence in foreign nations is altogether appropriate. The company's universally recognized corporate representative, Ronald McDonald, is a clown with a smiling face. Theologically speaking, soybean socialists are clowns with angry faces. I prefer the smiling Ronald to the nagging Ronald.

Abimelech said unto Isaac, Go from us; for thou art much mightier than we. And Isaac departed thence, and pitched his tent in the valley of Gerar, and dwelt there. And Isaac digged again the wells of water, which they had digged in the days of Abraham his father; for the Philistines had stopped them after the death of Abraham: and he called their names after the names by which his father had called them" (Gen. 26:15–18). The Philistines were envious: better to fill up these wells with dirt rather than retrieve water from them today but risk having Abraham or his heirs claim them later and benefit from them.¹¹

The system of Levitical inheritance kept jealousy and envy at a minimum. The Israelites were required to pay tithes to the Levites, but the Levites could not inherit rural land. Only later, if Israel became a predominantly urban society, would this restriction on rural land ownership fade as a major restraint on the wealth of Levi. The Levites had to be supported by the nation, but only in proportion to the prosperity of the nation.

There is no doubt that God deliberately established offsetting inheritances: tithes vs. land. "But the tithes of the children of Israel, which they offer as an heave offering unto the LORD, I have given to the Levites to inherit: therefore I have said unto them, Among the children of Israel they shall have no inheritance" (Num. 18:24). If the Israelites grumbled about the arrangement, this grumbling would be completely illegitimate. The Levites bore the sins of the nation if they did not guard the tabernacle from defilement: "But the Levites shall do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation, and they shall bear their iniquity: it shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations, that among the children of Israel they have no inheritance" (v. 23). The Levites were compensated for the risk they bore. The closer that men drew to the tabernacle, the greater their risk.

2. Political Implications

The Levites had no inheritance in the land. They lived in 48 designated Levitical cities which were distributed throughout the land (Num. 35:7). This meant that they could serve as legal counsellors and literate specialists. No other tribe had a monopoly claim on these services. The Levites were unlikely to become operational agents of any single tribe, since their sources of prosperity and the locus of their influence were distributed across the nation. If the tribe of the king sought an alliance with the Levites of Jerusalem, there were Levites living inside the boundaries of the other tribes whose interests were local. These Levites of the cities provided counter-weights to Levites living near the king's palace. There might be court priests in Israel, but there would be country Levites to offset their influence.

11. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 27.

At the same time, the Levites could not amass landed wealth for their families. This meant that tribal leaders did not have to worry about a political consolidation resulting from economic consolidation for as long as Israel remained predominantly agricultural. Local leaders could seek alliances with the Levites against the central government without feeling threatened. This acted as a restraint on political centralization.

The Levites received their income from local residents. This made them dependent on the prosperity of local populations. If residents in one region had wanted to establish restrictions on the export or import of goods, the local Levites might have approved. But there were Levites in other regions who had different interests. The priests would decide the limits of ecclesiastical interpretation, but there would have been a tendency for the national priesthood to balance the interests of all in order to keep peace in the tribe. This would have tended to favor the development of a national body of legal precedents that did not benefit one region at the expense of another. This would have consolidated legal opinion in ecclesiastical matters, but not on the basis of one regionally dominant tribe's interests. This consolidated body of precedents would have reflected the opinions of all the regions, since Levites resided in each region. The regionalism of the tribes was offset by the nationalism of Levi. At the same time, the potential regionalism of the priesthood in Jerusalem was offset by its economic interests. The priesthood maximized its income and its political independence by maximizing the income of the whole nation, since the priesthood was paid a tithe of the tithes received by the Levites (vv. 26–28).

C. Fee for Sacred Services Rendered

The Levites were forbidden to cheat the priesthood by sending the dregs of their produce. They had to send the best: "Out of all your gifts ye shall offer every heave offering of the LORD, of all the best thereof, even the hallowed part thereof out of it" (v. 29). The priests were to be well-paid. They were the senior representatives of the nation before God. To cheat them was to cheat God. If the nation did this, God would bring negative sanctions against them: “Will a man rob God? Yet ye have robbed me. But ye say, Wherein have we robbed thee? In tithes and offerings. Ye are cursed with a curse: for ye have robbed me, even this whole nation” (Mal. 3:8–9).

The tithe was the designated system of payment. It was priestly. The tithe burdened every member of society the same. The rich paid 10% of their net income from rural land; so did the poor. There were no exempted classes except the priests themselves. No one was too poor or too rich to escape paying. Had the payment been a fixed quantity of goods or money, the poor would have been burdened excessively, and the rich would have paid a token. The tithe meant that each income group would be equally burdened.

The tithe governed giving to the Lord’s priestly representatives. The tithe was a matter of life and death—eternal life and death. In matters of eternal life and death, the tithe principle governs payments. No one is able to buy his salvation; at the same time, no one is able to escape his lawful acknowledgment of his need for an intermediary institution that represents God: a priesthood. Man can be saved apart from such a priesthood, but no saved man is supposed to abandon his biblically mandatory economic support of God’s priesthood, i.e., those who possess a lawful monopoly over the administration of the sacraments: God’s sanctions in history. Those who guard the sacraments are entitled to a tithe on each covenant-keeper’s net income.¹²

The principle of the tithe is not the free market’s auction principle of “high bid wins.” Salvation is not in fixed supply, to be allocated by a central distributor on the basis of competitive bidding. Salvation is not part of the curse; it is the overcoming of the curse. Salvation is not governed by the law of economic scarcity, i.e., “at zero price, there is greater demand than supply.” But the supply of priestly guardians is not infinite. Their services must be paid for. So, the tither is not buying his salvation; he is supporting the representatives whose task it is to declare the way of salvation and to allocate access to the sacraments. Tithing is therefore a sacramental function; it is a payment for sacred services rendered. This does not mean that tithing is mandatory in order to receive the sacraments. The sacraments are not for sale for money. They are allocated, however. Those who do not profess faith in the God of the Bible are not allowed access to the sacraments. Also,

12. Gary North, Tithing and the Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994). (<http://bit.ly/gntithing>)

those who have been excommunicated because of their flagrant sinning do not have lawful access. In Israel, access to Passover was limited to circumcised males and their families. The phrase “cut off from his people” appears regularly in the Mosaic law. This was a judicial cutting off. A judicially consecrated representative of the church must decide who has lawful access to the sacraments. His services must be paid for. The tithe is the mode of payment mandated by God. Those who pay less fall short of God’s requirements (Mal. 3:8–9).

D. The Politics of Plunder

God did not designate this system of equal percentage giving as unfair. Twentieth-first-century man does. First, his designated sovereign agency is the state, not the church. To cheat the taxman is to cheat the state: the highest relevant court of appeal in history. Second, modern man points to an equal percentage payment system and calls it regressive: an excessive burden on the poor. The tithe principle is in fact proportionate, but modern man dismisses proportionate taxation as regressive, thereby condemning it in the name of a supposedly higher morality: one opposed to oppressing the poor. Modern man calls for progressive taxation, i.e., graduated tax brackets. The rich should pay a greater percentage of their income, we are told. Modern man does not identify what percentage of income taxation constitutes a boundary beyond which the state cannot lawfully go. Establishing such boundaries is understood as wholly arbitrary: a matter of political power. Those who pay a lower percentage of their income, because they constitute a majority, establish the upper limits of taxation.

Modern taxation is justified in terms of a messianic view of the state: the state as healer. The state requires support from the people in order to accomplish its tasks. These tasks are said to be inherently unbounded: as extensive as man’s pain and vulnerability. They are defined through political power. One of these tasks is the redistribution of wealth, officially from rich to the poor; in fact from the wealthy and upper middle classes to the middle classes in the name of the poor. The middle classes, like the Mosaic priests, staff the bureaucratic posts that administer the funds and enforce the regulations. They are understood as the agents of healing. They represent the middle class in the name of all the people, and they distribute the funds officially on behalf of the poor. Yet almost every study of government legislation and its tax burdens reveals that the middle class receives the lion’s share of the State's benefits.¹³ They exercise a majority, and their political representatives do not openly thwart their interests.

In 1945, Beardsley Ruml gave a speech to the American Bar Association (ABA). Ruml was never a well-known man, and he is long forgotten today, even among professional historians, but his influence in the United States for a generation was enormous. In 1922, he was hired to run the Laura Spelman Rockefeller Fund. He had previously been employed as an assistant to the president of the Carnegie Corporation. He was 26 years old.¹⁴ He later served as dean of the Social Sciences Division of the University of Chicago. From 1923 on, he ran the Rockefeller-funded Social Science Research Council, assisted by his older academic colleague, University of Chicago political scientist Charles E. Merriam.¹⁵ Through this organization after 1928, Ruml funded large segments of the American social science community to promote the ideology of the government-regulated economy. As Donald Fisher wrote: "A bargain was struck between social scientists, Rockefeller philanthropy, and the State that has since become an accepted part of the way we organize social life."¹⁶ In 1954, the Reece Committee investigations on tax-exempt foundations concluded: "The Social Science Research Council is now probably the greatest power in the social science research field."¹⁷ He drafted part of the Social Security Act in 1935, and he was the driving force in 1942 behind the introduction of Federal income tax withholding, which began in 1943.¹⁸ This dramatically increased the collection of individual income taxes: from $3.2 billion in 1942 to $19.7 billion in 1944.¹⁹ Ruml was on the board of 13. George J. Stigler, "Director's Law of Public Income Redistribution," Journal of Law and Economics, 13 (April 1970). Aaron Director was Milton Friedman's brother-in-law.

14. Don Fisher, Fundamental Development of the Social Sciences: Rockefeller Philanthropy and the United States Social Science Research Council (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1993), p. 32.

15. Barry D. Karl, Charles E. Merriam and the Study of Politics (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1974), p. 182.

16. Fisher, Preface.

17. Tax-Exempt Foundations, Report, House of Representatives, 83rd Congress, 2nd session, Report 2681, Dec. 16, 1954 (Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1954), p. 47. Cf. pages 47–51.

18. Patrick D. Reagan, "The Withholding Tax, Beardsley Ruml, and Modern American Public Policy," Prologue: Quarterly of the National Archives, 24 (Spring 1992), p. 23. Cf. Randolph E. Paul, Taxation in the United States (Boston: Little, Brown, 1954), pp. 328–36.

19. Historical Statistics of the United States: Colonial Times to 1970 (Washington, D.C.: Department of Commerce, Bureau of the Census, 1975), p. 1122.

the New York Federal Reserve Bank from 1937 to 1947; he served as chairman during the final six years. This is the dominant Federal Reserve Bank among the dozen regional branches of America's central bank. No one reaches this post who is not fully trusted by the highest levels of banking and government.

He announced to the ABA that, with the creation of a U.S. central bank (1913) and the suspension of domestic gold payments in exchange for dollars (1933), the United States no longer needed to levy taxes for revenue purposes. With the power to create money, he said, the ultimate revenue source is the nation's central bank. Taxes have become means of redistributing wealth among groups and to express public policy "in subsidizing or in penalizing various industries and groups."²⁰ "The second principal purpose of federal taxes is to attain more equality of wealth and of income than would result from economic forces working alone. The taxes which are effective for this purpose are the progressive individual income tax, the progressive estate tax, and the gift tax. What these taxes should be depends on public policy with respect to the distribution of wealth and of income."²¹ The mechanism of taxation had become an important means of pursuing national policy objectives, not a means of providing the state with revenue. Put differently, the inflation tax of fiat money creation by the central bank had become the revenue source; other forms of state taxation were means of wealth redistribution. His opinion has not been shared by many officials, but in theory, the distinction could be applied. In practice, the central bank's inflation tax and other forms of state taxation are used as both revenue sources and as social policy tools.

Such a view of the state transforms politics. Politics becomes the politics of plunder rather than the defense of individual liberty, the defense of property rights, and protection against violence. The civil government moves from being an agency that imposes negative sanctions against criminals on behalf of their victims²² to an agency that provides positive economic sanctions to favored members of the community²³ at the expense of negative economic sanctions imposed on others in the community. Control over taxation and economic regulation has in 20. Beardsley Ruml, "Taxes for Revenue Are Obsolete," American Affairs, 8 (Jan. 1946), p. 36. (<http://bit.ly/RumlTaxes>)

21. Idem.

22. Gary North, Victim's Rights: The Biblical View of Civil Justice (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnvictim>)

23. Or outside the community, e.g., State-to-State foreign aid.

the twentieth century become a three-fold matter: the exercise of presumed messianic power, the suppression of one's class enemies, and economic self-defense. Jack Douglas put it well: "... the welfare states in the most Christian Western states have strongly emphasized their supposed enactments of the Christian virtues—compassion, charity, forgiveness, kindness, and so on, even when they have simultaneously been rabidly pursuing the seven deadly sins."²⁴ In fallen man, power tends to corrupt, and absolute power corrupts absolutely—Lord Acton's famous dictum.²⁵ This applies to taxation, for the power to tax involves the power to destroy—Chief Justice John Marshall's equally famous dictum.²⁶

Israel's priesthood was not to become a battlefield of wealth redistribution among classes. God placed explicit limits on what the Levites could lawfully request in God's name: the tithe. The Levites were under God's law. Men might pay them less than a tithe, but this would bring God's negative sanctions in history. Individuals might pay more, but this extra giving was not called a tithe; it was a voluntary offering.

The Levites were restricted by a boundary, the tithe. The tithe was not a means of income redistribution among classes. The tithe was the inheritance of the Levites. It was owed to them by the tribes. This was not a matter of choice among those who were under the covenant.

Conclusion

The tithe is grounded legally in the sovereignty of ordained officials over the administration of the sacraments. It is the biblically mandated payment for sacramental services rendered. In Mosaic Israel, these services involved animal and other sacrifices. They also involved Passover and the two other mandatory national feasts. The Levites were guardians of the tabernacle area, while the Aaronic priests were the guardians of the Ark of the Covenant. This guardianship had to be paid for. The Levites received a tithe of the net income of the Israelites; the priests received a tithe of the income of the Levites. Income

24. Jack D. Douglas, The Myth of the Welfare State (New Brunswick, New Jersey: Transaction, 1991), p. 11.

25. Letter to Mandell Creighton (April 5, 1887); reprinted in Selected Writings of Lord Acton, 3 vols. (Indianapolis, Indiana: LibertyClassics, 1986), II, p. 383. The context of this remark was his rejection of the authority of the Papacy to use the state to impose physical torture and execution against heretics. Acton was a Roman Catholic.

26. McCulloch v. Maryland (1819); reprinted in John Marshall's Defense of McCulloch v. Maryland (Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1969), p. 46.

flowed up the chain of ecclesiastical command.²⁷

By giving the Levites a tithe rather than rural land as the tribe's inheritance, God balanced both the social order and the political structure of Mosaic Israel. Levites served as legal advisors in every region. They had local allegiances economically, but they also had a national allegiance judicially: the priesthood. Neither the king nor local tribal leaders could exercise primary influence over the Levites as a tribe. Levites owed their allegiance to a different chain of command, ecclesiastical rather than political.

The Israelites were not buying their salvation with their tithes. They were paying for human services associated with the operation of the sacrificial system. The tithe was not a market price, i.e., high bid wins. Rather, it was a priestly price: proportional giving. The poor man and the rich man paid the same proportion. This made sure that the day-to-day administration of the sacrificial system involved an equal economic sacrifice for all. This form of equality was the equality of the percentage of forfeited income, not the equality of price. The equality of price—one price for all men—would have burdened the poor more than the rich. It would also have created the illusion that salvation was for sale on a competitive market. This would have implied a scarcity of salvation. Unlike a scarce resource, salvation is available to all at zero price. What is scarce is not salvation but rather the guardians of the sacraments.

Priestly pricing is proportional pricing. The closer we get to life-and-death services, the closer we approach priestly pricing. The free market pricing principle of high bid wins does not apply equally to every occupation and service. It specifically does not apply to the guardians of the sacraments.

The law of the sacrifices mandated a flow of meat to the sons of Aaron. There was no vegetarianism in Israel. Most of the sacrifices were clearly meat-based. The sweet savor of soybean cakes and tofu may have impressed Cain, but Abel's sacrifice was accepted by God. Abel's blood-based sacrifice continued as the standard in Mosaic Israel.

27. Chapter 3:D.

11

THE LURE OF MAGIC

And Moses and Aaron gathered the congregation together before the rock, and he said unto them, Hear now, ye rebels; must we fetch you water out of this rock? And Moses lifted up his hand, and with his rod he smote the rock twice: and the water came out abundantly, and the congregation drank, and their beasts also. And the LORD spake unto Moses and Aaron, Because ye believed me not, to sanctify me in the eyes of the children of Israel, therefore ye shall not bring this congregation into the land which I have given them (Num. 20:10–12).

The theocentric issue here is covenantal cause and effect. The chapter begins with the death of Miriam (v. 1). It closes with the death of Aaron (v. 28). Aaron died at age 123 (Num. 33:39). This was in the fortieth year after the exodus (Num. 33:38). Moses died at age 120 (Deut. 34:7). He died just before Israel's entry into the land; so, he was 80 years old at the time of the exodus.

The events of this chapter were important for the nation because they mark the late stages of the transfer of inheritance. The generation of the exodus had been told by God that they would not enter the land; they would die in the wilderness (Num. 14:32). Miriam had just died. Moses and Aaron were old men. Time was visibly running out on the few remaining members of the exodus generation. But their legacy of rebellion still survived. The Israelites once again complained to Moses regarding the faithlessness of God.

And there was no water for the congregation: and they gathered themselves together against Moses and against Aaron. And the people chode with Moses, and spake, saying, Would God that we had died when our brethren died before the LORD! And why have ye brought up the congregation of the LORD into this wilderness, that we and our cattle should die there? And wherefore have ye made us to come up out of Egypt, to bring us in unto this evil place? it is no place of seed, or of figs, or of vines, or of pomegranates; neither is there any water to drink (Num. 20:2–5).

Moses and Aaron once again went to God for a solution. “And Moses and Aaron went from the presence of the assembly unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and they fell upon their faces: and the glory of the LORD appeared unto them” (Num. 20:6). This time, God promised another deliverance. He would provide water out of a rock a second time. The first time, shortly after the exodus, God had commanded Moses to strike a rock with his rod. “Behold, I will stand before thee there upon the rock in Horeb; and thou shalt smite the rock, and there shall come water out of it, that the people may drink. And Moses did so in the sight of the elders of Israel” (Ex. 17:6). This time, however, He commanded Moses only to speak to the rock in public: “Take the rod, and gather thou the assembly together, thou, and Aaron thy brother, and speak ye unto the rock before their eyes; and it shall give forth his water, and thou shalt bring forth to them water out of the rock: so thou shalt give the congregation and their beasts drink” (Num. 20:8).

A. Moses Rebels Against God

Moses took the rod (v. 9), gathered the assembly before the rock (v. 10), spoke a word of condemnation to them (v. 10), and struck it twice (v. 11). The water gushed forth, but so did God’s voice. God told Moses that Moses had not believed Him. His act did not sanctify God before the people (v. 12).

God’s prophecy regarding the future of their generation as a result of the false reports of the ten spies had been clear: only Joshua and Caleb would enter the Promised Land as conquerors. Moses and Aaron were not singled out as survivors. But they had not participated in the false reporting. God dealt with Moses subsequently as if he had not been guilty of any terminal infraction. The spies had brought the condemnation on their generation, but apparently not on Moses and Aaron. Nevertheless, Moses and Aaron had not been listed by God as survivors. It should have been clear that something they would do later would keep them out of the Promised Land, because they were neither exempted by God’s condemnation nor were they responsible for the false reports. They should have understood this. They should have been better prepared for this final testing of their faith. They should have known that God’s prophecies of negative sanctions are both ethical and conditional: “unless you turn from your evil ways and obey me.” A prophecy that something negative must happen in history is a warning that the recipient of the bad news must turn from his evil. It is never a prophecy that something must happen irrespective of God’s sovereign, initiating grace of redemption and man’s subordinate repentance. Jonah learned this after his ministry to Nineveh had been successful. God did not destroy Nineveh.

B. A Matter of Causation

Moses was familiar with rocks that produce water. God had previously told him to take the rod and strike a rock. He had done as he was told, and this act of obedience was followed by the flow of water. The people had seen this miracle (Ex. 17:6). Nevertheless, this had not changed their hearts. Neither had the subsequent miracles and the plagues. God’s negative sanctions had not registered on their ethical consciousness. They were still complainers. They still came before Moses with this complaint: “What has God done for us lately?” They wanted further positive sanctions despite their rebellion.

Moses, deep down inside, remained a man of his generation. He did not fully believe God’s prophetic word. He had doubts—not so grave as the people’s doubts, but serious enough so that he hesitated to rely on God’s word alone. Moses had spoken with God. He had seen God do mighty things through him. What he should have learned from all this was that God’s word is true. Men can rely on it. God spoke the world into existence (Gen. 1). When God says that something will come to pass, it will come to pass unless man’s repentance intervenes—always an aspect of His negative prophetic word. When God instructed an Old Covenant prophet to speak a positive prophetic word before the people, the prophet could rest assured that whatever God told him to say would come to pass. A negative prophecy was always qualified—“unless you repent”—but a positive word was sure. The people were given the benefit of the doubt. The bad prophetic news was qualified; the good news was not. There is no case of a positive prophetic word’s being overturned by man’s rebellion.

The Israelites refused to accept this. They kept complaining to Moses that God had promised them an inheritance of milk and honey. They deliberately refused to count: four generations to the conquest (Gen. 15:16); Moses’ generation was generation three. But their rebellion in the incident of the spies had been the secondary cause of their disinheritance. The fourth generation had a positive word from God, and it would surely be fulfilled. This prophetic structure should be understood as a promise to the recipients of the promise of landed inheritance that they would not rebel, that God's grace would surely sustain them. A negative prophecy could be overcome by God's grace of redemption, while a positive prophecy could not be overcome by man's rebellion, although it might be postponed, since God would in this case overcome man's natural proclivity to rebel. This structure of prophecy is an aspect of God's grace. Grace tends toward blessings in history.¹

Moses should have believed God's positive promise unconditionally, but he did not. He did not believe that his mere speaking to the rock would result in a flow of water. God did not tell him to tap the rock. God told him only to take the rod, assemble the people, and speak before the rock. There was a required plan, but it did not involve striking the rock. There was visible cause and effect, but it did not involve striking the rock. The system of cause and effect was supernatural. Speaking to a rock in public was surely not the normal way to provide large quantities of water in a wilderness. To speak water out of a rock is surely a miracle worth recording. But Moses did not believe God to this degree. He wanted two intermediate steps: striking the rock twice.

In Genesis 1, God spoke the world into existence. There was no intermediary causation. God spoke; events consistent with His word immediately took place. The time interval in each step was less than one day. There was no uniformitarian continuity of time, with events taking place slowly in a cosmic process of evolutionary development. God spoke the world into existence. His word was sufficient.

Men do not normally possess such a word of authority. They speak, but only those who hear and understand can bring to pass what is spoken. The tower of Babel is the consummate example. When a breakdown occurred in corporate communication, men ceased to build. Without the cause and effect of the continuity of speech, men cannot work together. The division of labor breaks down.

When a man who possesses authority speaks, his words initiate a process of cause and effect. But man's words have no effect directly on inanimate objects. Mind over matter is God's prerogative, not man's; so is word over matter. We do not think and grow rich merely by thinking. We do not gain it when we "name it and claim it" merely by speaking. There must be intermediary causation: possibly supernatural, probably natural, but never automatic.

1. This is an argument against both amillennialism and premillennialism. This argument rests on the covenantal connection between sanctions and inheritance.

To speak an event into existence apart from human, animal, or electrical-mechanical intermediation is to rely on supernatural causation. A supernatural being who hears and understands what a man has spoken then transforms that realm which is external to both the speaker and the hearer. The speaker's words initiated the transformation; they did not cause it.

Moses recognized the supernatural nature of the event. There was no question that only God could bring it to pass. The question facing Moses was this: On what basis would God bring it to pass? By a publicly spoken word alone? Or by an additional causative step or steps? What was binding: God's word or a ritual act? What were the means of grace: words and taps or merely words?

Moses relied on ritual. He would speak and tap the water out of the rock. The ritual was of his design: not just one tap, as had been the case at Horeb, but two. Why two? The text does not say. But two it had to be, Moses decided. One tap would not do. A spoken word alone would not do.

This reliance on ritual is a familiar pattern in history. Men find that ritual enhances the authority of words. The ritual makes the words more likely to be obeyed. The ritual in fact is thought to invest the words with power. The words are thought to be impotent without an accompanying ritual. The ritual distinguishes authoritative words from non-authoritative words.

In what way does ritual invest words with power? There are three answers, each corresponding to one of the three rival views of causation in history: magical (realism), traditional (nominalism), and judicial (covenantalism). The realist believes that ritual infuses words with power. There is a separate realm of power that can be tapped into by man through a mixture of words and ritual. Ritual is what connects words to power. The nominalist believes that rituals persuade men that words have greater authority. Men are more likely to believe in the words because of the presence of ritual. The judicialist believes that ritual invokes or calls down power when the words are lawfully spoken. It is the judicial legitimacy of the words in the context of historical circumstances that invests the words with power.

C. Adam's Transgression²

The best way biblically to answer this debate over the nature of causation is to consider Adam's transgression. When God announced a judicial boundary around the forbidden tree, did He invest the tree and its fruit with special properties that would automatically produce certain results if touched or eaten? Or was the tree merely symbolic, having no express judicial relationship with God, but only giving Adam an opportunity to prove himself faithful or not? Or was the tree set apart as a unique place of communion, a place declared by God as off-limits to Adam? We need to consider the three views of causation and their respective analyses. The first two answers conform to the philosophical categories of realism and nominalism. Both are incorrect. The third position conforms to the biblical category, covenantalism.

1 Metaphysical Boundary

We know that their eyes were immediately opened after they ate. They recognized their own nakedness and guilt. Was the fruit itself the source of their discontinuous change of perception? Was the tree a gateway to cosmic forces of illumination, a "cosmic tree," to use the language of pagan mythology?³ Did it mark "the center of the world," the supreme sacred space?⁴ Could Adam and Eve somehow manipulate these cosmic forces to gain further knowledge or power? Was the forbidden tree a microcosm that offered man power over the macrocosm, analogous to the voodoo doll's supposed power to produce analogous effects in the thing represented by the doll? Could Adam and

2. This section appeared originally in Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 6.

3. The cosmic tree was related to the idea of the cosmic mountain: the axis mundi or axis of the world—the line drawn through the earth which points to the pole star. It was the link between heaven and earth. See Mircea Eliade, Patterns in Comparative Religion (New York: Sheed & Ward, 1958), p. Ill; cf. 266–67, 271, 273–74. On the axis mundi, see the extraordinary, complex, and cryptic book on ancient mathematics, myth, and cosmology, Hamlet's Mill: An essay on myth and the frame of time, by Giorgio de Santillana and Hertha von Dechend (Boston: Gambit, 1969). It should be obvious what the source of these cosmic tree and cosmic mountain myths was: the garden of Eden, itself located on a mountain or raised area, for the river flowing through it became four rivers (Gen. 2:10).

4. Eliade writes: "The tree came to express the cosmos fully in itself, by embodying, in apparently static form, its 'force', its life and its quality of periodic regeneration." Patterns, p. 271.

Eve achieve “unity of being” with the universe through subsequent forbidden feasts? Could they achieve self-transcendence? In short, could they become mini-gods, as the serpent had promised Eve (Gen. 3:5)?

The Genesis account of their transgression informs us that immediately after their eyes were opened, the forbidden tree was no longer the focus of their interest. They did not seek additional fruit. They did not invoke cosmic forces to protect them or do their bidding. They paid no further attention to the tree. They did not act as though they believed the tree possessed any special properties other than its fruit, which was admittedly good to view and good to eat. Even the serpent said nothing further to them. There was no need for him to say anything. His words and work were over. Adam and Eve had performed the profane act. It was an act of judicial transgression: a trespass.

It is clear that their new-found self-awareness was the product of self-judgment: they had evaluated their act of rebellion in the light of their new interpretation of God’s word.⁵ They did not rush to discover a chemical formula for an antidote to poison fruit. They also did not rush to discover a magical formula to protect themselves from the cosmic forces that the fruit had unleashed. They correctly understood that the fruit was not their problem; God’s promised judgment was. The tree had meaning to them only in terms of God’s legal boundary around it, which they had transgressed. The fruit was of no further interest or use to them. They referred to it again only under God’s subsequent cross-examination.

2. Symbolic Boundary

What about the tree’s unique symbolic status? Was the response of Adam and Eve merely the product of an increase in their self-awareness, a perception induced solely by their act of transgression? In other words, was the tree merely a symbolic agency in the transformation of their own self-awareness, something like an ethical mirror? Was the transformational power of the tree merely psychological? In short, had the transformational power of the tree merely been imputed to it by Adam and Eve?

If the tree served solely as a symbol of man’s ethical condition, then on what basis did the radical and discontinuous increase of their mutual self-awareness take place? What was it about eating forbidden fruit that produced their perception of nakedness? Their immediate concern was not that they feared that God would bring judgment against them sometime in the future; it was that they were immediately discomforted by their own nakedness. It was not that the now-partially denuded tree pointed symbolically to their completely denuded judicial condition in the eyes of God; it was that they experienced shame in their own eyes as judges. God had assigned a necessarily judicial task to them when He told Adam to guard the garden.⁶ Adam's task was to announce preliminary judgment against Satan, for Satan had testified falsely regarding the character of God. "Hath God said?", the serpent had asked. But Adam and Eve had served instead as false judges, rendering judgment implicitly against God and explicitly against God's word.⁷ Immediately, they recognized that they were wearing no "robes"—the mark of lawful judicial authority. They were judicially uncovered before each other. Their perceived dilemma had nothing further to do with the tree. Now the primary symbol of their spiritual condition was their own naked flesh. They sought to cover this revelation with fig leaves.

5. That it was a new interpretation is seen in their response: sewing fig leaf aprons rather than confessing their sin in prayer and seeking God’s forgiveness.

God was not judicially present in the garden immediately after their sin. He did not shout a warning to them: "I said not to touch that!" He gave them time to respond, either as covenant-breakers or covenant-keepers. They responded as covenant-breakers. They knew that His negative sanctions were coming, but their immediate concern was not their nakedness in His eyes; it was nakedness in their own eyes. Later, they hid themselves from God when they heard Him coming; in the meantime, they felt a compulsive need to hide their flesh from each other.

They reacted as though the psychological effects of eating from a merely symbolic tree—their sense of shame regarding their own personal nakedness—could be successfully covered by the leaves of another fruit-bearing tree. A representative of the plant kingdom had been a crucial aspect of this crisis of perception, so they covered themselves with leaves. They did not slay the serpent or some other animal in their quest for a covering. They dealt with their sin symbolically: the tree had become to them a symbol of their transgression, and so their required coverings should be of a similar kind. (Their son Cain was to make a similar evaluation of his judicially uncovered condition when he brought a sacrifice of the ground rather than an animal sacrifice [Gen. 4:3].)

6. "And the LORD God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden to dress it and to keep [shawmar: guard] it" (Gen. 2:15).

7. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Appendix E (1987): "Witnesses and Judges."

They were wrong. Their problem was judicial, not symbolic. They had not transgressed a mere symbol; they had transgressed the boundary surrounding God's restricted property. They had been involved in a boundary violation. It is not that some sacred object serves merely as man's ethical mirror; it is Instead God's law that serves as the mirror.⁸

3. Judicial Boundary

"And the eyes of them both were opened, and they knew that they were naked" (Gen. 3:7a). The use of the passive voice here is significant. By whom were their eyes opened? Either by God directly or by their own consciences as God's image-bearers. We are not told which. What we are told is that prior to their act of transgression, their eyes were not open; afterwards, they were. This must mean that "open eyes" in this sense was judicial. They saw what they had done. They evaluated their new condition in the light of God's warning. They understood at least some of the consequences. But, being in sin, they misjudged what would be required to cover the effects of their sin. They twisted their own self-judgment. They made it seem less important than it was, as if it were a sin suitable for self-atonement.

The tree served as a symbol only to the degree that it was set apart (sanctified) by God as His exclusive property. The tree did not reflect man or man's psyche; it represented God as sovereign owner of the cosmos. Its status as a visible symbol (i.e., judicial evidence) of man's covenant status was relevant only in terms of its own designated status as a sanctified object. It had been judicially and verbally set apart by God. The tree was therefore sacred. It was not to be touched or eaten by man until God removed the restriction. To violate this sacred object was to profane it. To eat from it meant death, not in the sense of a poison apple, nor in the sense of a prohibited metaphysical doorway to overwhelming cosmic forces, nor in the sense of a means of man's self-realization of his own inherent evil, but in the sense of inevitable historical and eternal sanctions imposed by an absolute personal God.

8. "For if any be a hearer of the word, and not a doer, he is like unto a man beholding his natural face in a glass [mirror]: For he beholdeth himself, and goeth his way, and straightway forgetteth what manner of man he was. But whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed" (James 1:23–25).

Eating from the tree changed man's judicial status. This was a profane act. Adam became profane: entering the judicial status of God's declaration, "Guilty as charged." He became sacrilegious.

As we shall see, so did Moses.

D. Moses, the Would-Be Magician

Moses was acting as a realist, i.e., as a magician. His ritual act of tapping the rock was a magical act: a power-infusing component of a supernatural pattern of causation. His words supposedly would not stand alone; they required an infusion of supernatural power, which only ritual could supply. Following tradition was surely not the deciding issue here, i.e., nominalism. Speaking to a rock in a traditional manner would not bring forth the water. There was no traditionalist cause-and-effect pattern associated with speaking to a rock. Furthermore, if Moses had been acting as a judicialist, he would not have tapped the rock. The tapping ritual added nothing of substance to his words, and it subtracted from the authority of his words, for God had commanded him only to speak publicly to the rock, not tap it.

Pagan magical religion sees the priest as an intermediary between a realm of supernatural power and the realm of man's daily affairs. This supernatural realm may be personal or impersonal, but selected men access it through defined rituals. The boundary between supernatural power and natural causation is controlled by the priest because he is the master of ritual. Even his spoken words can take on the character of ritual. They become formulas of power rather than prayers of supplication.

In tapping the rock, Moses acted as a pagan priest. When he relied on the rod as the means of bringing water from the rock, he adopted the mentality of the magician. This rod had served him as an implement of sanctions, both negative (the Nile's cursed water) and positive (Horeb's blessed water).⁹ Moses had become psychologically dependent on this rod. In his mind, it became a tool of supernatural power rather than a symbol of supernaturally delegated judicial authority. He did not regard God's word as authoritative; rather, it was God's word plus: the rod. As a prophet, Moses was to speak events into existence by repeating God's word. It was God's word that was the basis of

9. "And the LORD said unto Moses, Go on before the people, and take with thee of the elders of Israel; and thy rod, wherewith thou smotest the river, take in thine hand, and go" (Ex. 17:5).

Moses' authority, not the visible implement of authority. But because Moses had repeatedly used this visible indicator of his prophetic authority as a means of invoking the predictable historical sanctions associated with the Old Covenant's prophetic office, he adopted the mentality of a pagan priest. He moved from biblical covenantalism to pagan realism. He moved from judicial invocation to magical manipulation.

This move was not absolute. Moses still brought a judicial invocation against Israel: "Hear now, ye rebels; must we fetch you water out of this rock?" (v. 10b). He identified them as rebels who relied on public displays of God's power rather than His promises. But in saying this, he condemned himself, for he, too, relied on public displays of God's power rather than His promises. That was why he tapped the rock. God had promised Moses to bring water in response to Moses' public verbal invocation. Moses and Aaron did not believe Him, which God stated explicitly: "... because ye believed me not" (v. 12a).

E. Negative Sanction: Disinheritance

God announced that Moses and Aaron would not lead the nation into Canaan. This had also been His negative sanction against the generation whose tribal representatives had sought to stone Caleb and Joshua. God had not specifically announced that Moses and Aaron would die in the wilderness, but it had been implied by the fact that he singled out only Caleb and Joshua. God's sanctions are judicially associated with inheritance and disinheritance. The ultimate negative sanction is eternal disinheritance. When God told Moses and Aaron that they would not live to lead the next generation into Canaan, He was bringing a major negative sanction against them.

God in His grace provided water out of the rock. The people in their rebellion would have water to drink. Nevertheless, that generation was doomed to die in the wilderness. God in His grace also allowed Moses and Aaron to live long enough to lead the nation through the wilderness. But their fate would be the same as their sister Miriam's (v. 1): they would die in the wilderness. They would not share in the inheritance.

Moses and the people shared too many presuppositions. This is why they shared the same curse: disinheritance. First, Moses trusted in ritual over God's spoken word. He acted as a magician rather than as a prophet. Similarly, the people expected God's blessings irrespective of His verbal judgments against them. They expected the promised inheritance (v. 5) apart from their covenantal faithfulness to His revealed word.

The Old Covenant prophet's word was ethically conditional. Jonah is the archetype. Jonah announced publicly that Nineveh would perish in 40 days (Jonah 3:4). The nation immediately repented. God spared them for this repentance. The prophecy was conditional: destruction unless you repent. Jonah had not announced the conditional clause, but it was implicit in Jonah's message. It is even possible that Jonah had not understood the conditionality of his message, for he sulked when God did not destroy Nineveh 40 days later (Jonah 4).

The Israelites kept reminding Moses that God's promise to them had not come true. This was the heart of their rebellion. They had not paid attention to the details of His promise to Abraham: the fourth generation would inherit. While some of them would have participated in the inheritance had they not rebelled, their sons would lead the army. When Moses promised to lead them into a land of milk and honey, he meant covenantally: their sons would receive what Abraham had promised. The parents would inherit through the actions of their sons. They forfeited their co-participation through their rebellion in Numbers 14. They had attempted to stone the representatives of the generation of the conquest, Caleb and Joshua.

They viewed the prophetic office as a pagan priesthood: infusing words with power through ritual irrespective of the judicial content of the words. They wanted signs and wonders; Moses provided this for them. By succumbing to the temptation of tapping the rock, he acted as Aaron had in the golden calf incident: pandering to the people. They wanted a magical religion of ritual without ethics, rewards without obedience. God disinherited them for acting consistently with this pagan worldview. God told Moses to remove Aaron's robes of authority and place them on Eleazar, which Moses did (vv. 26–28). Aaron immediately died (v. 28). Chapter 20 begins with Miriam's death; it ends with Aaron's death and the month of national mourning. The sanction of disinheritance had been applied by God in full public view.

Conclusion

When Moses tapped the rock twice in order to coax water out of it, he publicly proclaimed a magical religion. He added a ritual of his own to the word of God. Without this ritual, he decided, either God would not honor His word or the people would not be moved to faith in the God who speaks events into existence. Moses and Aaron displayed a lack of faith in such a God. They therefore suffered the same negative sanction that burdened their generation: disinheritance.

Cause and effect in history are covenantal. God decrees whatever comes to pass. History is governed by God in terms of God's will, both hidden (Deut. 29:29) and revealed. God told Moses to speak His words to the people. God did not tell Moses to add any ritual in order to verify God's words or to infuse power into the supernatural nature of the event that followed: water out of a rock. God's word was sufficient. But Moses did not believe this. His actions publicly testified to his disbelief.

Magic is a religion that substitutes ritual for ethics. It invokes power through ritual acts. Even its words take on the character of ritual: formulas. Magic is a religion of manipulation: ritual acts that supposedly produce predictable changes in the world outside the sacred priestly realm. This is not biblical religion. Biblical religion has rituals, but these rituals are judicial, not magical. They do not enable the priest to tap into a realm of power irrespective of the ethical content of men's acts. Biblical ritual is judicial, bringing men under the terms of God's law and the sanctions attached to it. The sanctions are real, i.e., historical, but they are the outcome of a cause-and-effect system that rests on ethics rather than ritual. "Will the LORD be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? shall I give my firstborn for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul? He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the LORD require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" (Mic. 6:7-8).

12

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF VICTORY

Wherefore it is said in the book of the wars of the LORD, What he did in the Red sea, and in the brooks of Arnon (Num. 21:14).

The theocentric issue here is God as the sanctions-bringer. The book of the wars of the Lord is one of several missing books that are referred to in the Bible. These include the book of Jasher (Josh. 10:13; II Sam. 1:18), the book of the acts of Solomon (I Kings 11:41), the books of Samuel the seer, Nathan the prophet, and Gad the seer (I Chron. 29:29), the prophecies of Ahijah the Shilonite and Iddo the seer (II Chron. 9:29), the book of Shemaiah the prophet (II Chron. 12:15), and the chronicles of the kings of the Medes and Persians (Esth. 10:2). This is the first biblical reference to a now-missing book.

The text informs us that these wilderness wars began at the border of the wilderness, the Red Sea, where God destroyed the army of Pharaoh. The missing chronicles continued at least until the war listed in this chapter: the war at Arnon, the border of Sihon's kingdom. The victories associated with the defeat of Sihon became part of Israel's folk heritage: proverbs of destruction. "Wherefore they that speak in proverbs say, Come into Heshbon, let the city of Sihon be built and prepared: For there is a fire gone out of Heshbon, a flame from the city of Sihon: it hath consumed Ar of Moab, and the lords of the high places of Arnon" (Num. 21:27–28).

The question arises: When did this final series of wars begin? Did the generation of the exodus initiate them? Or was it the generation of the conquest? It was the latter. Miriam and Aaron were dead by the time the battles began. They died in the fortieth year after the exodus (Num. 33:38). By this time, all of the older generation had died off except Moses. They had died during the 38 years from the exodus to Israel's arrival at Kadesh-barnea (Deut. 2:14). This took place prior to the journey to Mt. Hor (Num. 33:36–37), where Aaron died.

Moses was old. It was he who would announce the terms of the inheritance to the next generation: the Book of Deuteronomy is a record of these terms. This second giving of the law (deutero, nomos) was preparatory to national covenant renewal: the circumcision of the conquest generation (Josh. 5:7). God's prophecy to Abraham regarding the inheritance of the fourth generation (Gen. 15:16) was about to be fulfilled. What we see in this chapter is the manifestation of a new psychology of victory in Israel. There was one final rebellion. After this, open rebellion ended until after the conquest.

A. Hormah

Hormah was the city where the Israelites had suffered a major military defeat. They had attempted to prove Moses wrong regarding their inability to prosper militarily after their attempted stoning of Joshua and Caleb. "Then the Amalekites came down, and the Canaanites which dwelt in that hill, and smote them, and discomfited them, even unto Hormah" (Num. 14:45). That legacy of defeat would now be reversed.

Chapter 21 is an account of several wilderness wars. The first was the war with king Arad the Canaanite. He lived in the south, outside the borders of Canaan (Josh. 12:6–7, 14). He started a war with Israel, and he took some of them prisoner (Num. 21:1). "And Israel vowed a vow unto the LORD, and said, If thou wilt indeed deliver this people into my hand, then I will utterly destroy their cities. And the LORD hearkened to the voice of Israel, and delivered up the Canaanites; and they utterly destroyed them and their cities: and he called the name of the place Hormah" (vv. 2–3).

Israel's counter-attack was preceded by a vow. A biblical vow is a promise sworn to God that if God performs a specific act in history, the vow-taker will perform another act or series of acts. This is a lawful oath before God. Such an oath is an aspect of point four of the biblical covenant model: oath/sanctions. The vow implies that God will impose negative sanctions on anyone who takes such a vow and subsequently fails to perform his side of the bargain. "If a man vow a vow unto the LORD, or swear an oath to bind his soul with a bond; he shall not break his word, he shall do according to all that proceedeth out of his mouth" (Num. 30:2). "When thou shalt vow a vow unto the LORD thy God, thou shalt not slack to pay it: for the LORD thy God will surely require it of thee; and it would be sin in thee. But if thou shalt forbear to vow, it shall be no sin in thee" (Deut. 23:21–22). The vow is therefore a self-maledictory oath: calling down God's negative sanctions in history for failing to abide by the terms of the oath.

Israel promised to destroy utterly the cities under Arad's authority. This they did. The area of devastation Israel called Hormah. The word hormah is derived from the Hebrew word for "devoted." A thing devoted by a vow to the Lord could not be bought back (Lev. 27:28–29).¹ The hormah was the ban.² It was the judicial equivalent of a whole burnt offering. All of it belonged to God. It was fit for burning, under a curse, like Jericho: "And the city shall be accursed, even it, and all that are therein, to the LORD: only Rahab the harlot shall live, she and all that are with her in the house, because she hid the messengers that we sent" (Josh. 6:17; emphasis added). The Hebrew root word is the same in both cases: devoted or accursed.

B. The Serpent as Negative Sanction

After the defeat of Arad and prior to the next phase of the wilderness wars, Israel rebelled one last time. Their complaint was the same old complaint: God had failed to live up to His promise. This had been the complaint of the exodus generation: God supposedly had broken His vow to Israel. As always, that generation failed to acknowledge that the prophecy had been to Joshua's generation. The exodus generation had rebelled against God by rejecting the testimony of Joshua and Caleb, representatives of the fourth generation, and by seeking to impose the sanction of death on them: stoning (Num. 14). The next generation now repeated their complaint. "And they journeyed from mount Hor by the way of the Red sea, to compass the land of Edom: and the soul of the people was much discouraged because of the way. And the people spake against God, and against Moses, Wherefore have ye brought us up out of Egypt to die in the wilderness? for there is no bread, neither is there any water; and our soul loatheth this light bread" (Num 21:4–5). Early in the wilderness period, God had brought positive sanctions on the nation when they had offered this complaint: manna (Ex. 16) and water from the rock (Ex. 17). But later on, He had brought negative sanctions against them for their complaining: fire (Num. 11:1–2) and plague (Num. 11:33). It should have been clear to them that if they persisted in this complaint—comparing Egypt's bondage conditions favorably with life in the wilderness—He would impose further negative sanctions. They had not learned this lesson, yet they had been wandering for several decades. Like children who repeatedly commit the same infraction, despite previous punishments, so was Israel. They needed another lesson. "And the LORD sent fiery serpents among the people, and they bit the people; and much people of Israel died" (Num. 21:6). The people then repented: "Therefore the people came to Moses, and said, We have sinned, for we have spoken against the LORD, and against thee; pray unto the LORD, that he take away the serpents from us. And Moses prayed for the people" (v. 7).

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 36:A; ch. 36:B:1–2.

2. Ibid., pp. 622–23.

1. The Brass Serpent

At this point, an event took place that raises difficult questions regarding symbolism in the ancient Near East, as we shall see. "And the LORD said unto Moses, Make thee a fiery serpent, and set it upon a pole: and it shall come to pass, that everyone that is bitten, when he looketh upon it, shall live. And Moses made a serpent of brass, and put it upon a pole, and it came to pass, that if a serpent had bitten any man, when he beheld the serpent of brass, he lived" (vv. 8–9). This took place sometime in the second half of the fifteenth century before the birth of Jesus Christ.

The brass serpent was attached to a pole. This image still marks the guild of physicians: a serpent entwined around a pole. A similar symbol, two serpents entwined around a pole, goes back to Sumeria. The Sumerian god Ninazu was the god of healing. The son of this god, Ningishzida, was represented by the two snakes and pole.³ This is known today as the caduceus: in Greek mythology, the wand of Hermes. The symbol of a snake on a pole is also associated with Asklepius, the Greek god of healing. This god was the Greek deity most frequently represented in snake form.⁴ The Phoenecians' healing god, Eshmun, was represented by a snake.⁵ The snake-pole symbol was part of the crest of the Surgeon General of the United States until 1871.

3. E. A. Wallis Budge, Amulets and Talismans (New Hyde Park, New York: University Books, [1930?] 1961), pp. 488–89.

4. John Cuthbert Lawson, Modern Greek Folklore and Ancient Greek Religion: A Study in Survivals (New Hyde Park, New York: University Books, [1910] 1964), pp. 274–75.

5. Jacob Milgram, The JPS Torah Commentary: Numbers (New York: Jewish Publication Society, 1990), p. 459.

The caduceus replaced it in 1871.⁶

Did God select a symbol familiar as a sign of healing in the pagan Near East in Moses' day? Or was this event the origin of this Near Eastern symbol of healing? The conventional academic dating systems place the events of the exodus late in the second millennium, B.C. The earliest clay tablets containing Sumerian literary history are dated as having been written late in the third millennium. Large numbers of these clay tablets are dated as having been written in the first half of the second millennium.⁷ By revising the conventional academic chronologies of the ancient Near East, which insert a mythical Dark Age era, 1200 BC to 700 BC,⁸ we may be able to identify the caduceus symbol as contemporary with Israel's wilderness era. To determine which came first, the wilderness event or the Sumerians' caduceus snake-pole symbol, we must first determine the date of the earliest appearance of the symbol. This task still lies ahead of us. "Clearly, a colossal amount of work lies ahead in building new detailed chronologies for individual areas," wrote revisionist Peter James.⁹

The sanction facing the bitten Israelite was death. To escape it, the victim had to take a ritual step: to look at the elevated symbol of deliverance. This symbol became the archetype of the sinner's access to spiritual healing: "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness,

6. "Caduceus," Grolier Encyclopedia (1990).

7. Samuel Noah Kramer, History Begins at Sumer (Garden City, New York: Anchor, [1956] 1959), p. xix.

8. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Appendix A (1985): "The Reconstruction of Egypt's Chronology." My book appeared in the same year that the authors of Centuries of Darkness first met at the London Institute of Archeology. They found that they had all become skeptical regarding chronologies of the ancient Near East, i.e., that "the 'centuries of darkness' inserted into the histories of so many areas between 1200 and 700 BC were largely illusory." Peter James, Centuries of Darkness: A challenge to the conventional chronology of Old World Archeology (New Brunswick, New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, 1993), p. xviii. The authors believe that the general inflation is more like 250 years than 500 (p. xxi). The modern source of this call for a revised Near Eastern chronology was Immanuel Velikovsky, whose reconstruction proved to be, writes James, "disastrously extreme" (p. xxi). An attempt to revise ancient chronologies was pursued for three decades by Isaac Newton. His book, published without his permission, was The Chronology of the Ancient Kingdoms Amended (1725). Cf. Frank Manuel, Isaac Newton, Historian (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1963). The most detailed revisionist study I have read on the topic of Egypt's chronology in relation to Israel's is an unpublished, 89-page, singlespaced personal letter sent to me by Brad Sparks in 1986. It should be updated and published, but I no longer know where Sparks is.

9. James, Centuries of Darkness, p. xxii.

even so must the Son of man be lifted up: That whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life" (John 3:14–15). These words precede the widely quoted verse, "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life" (John 3:16). The ultimate negative sanction, the second death (Rev. 20:14), is removed through a man's willingness to acknowledge the reality of the eternal effects of the serpent's sting in his life, and to subordinate himself to God by acceding to the means of grace. The serpent, as the original earthly agent of man's evil and rebellion, symbolizes man's broken covenant with God. What was placed on both the pole and the cross, symbolically and judicially speaking, was sin: "For he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him" (II Cor. 5:21). The pole and the cross represent the sanction of death: God's permanent negative sanction against the serpent and its effects. By lifting up an image of the serpent, Moses identified the agency of the negative sanction against man: sin. The man who failed to acknowledge this means of deliverance was doomed.

This healing by the elevated serpent was the positive sanction that transformed Israel from a nation of psychologically defeated nomads into a nation of pilgrims on the march. This time, Israel at long last learned its lesson. Never again did Israel bring the accusation against Moses that God had brought them into the wilderness to die, and that Egypt had been a better place to live. The only instance even remotely similar to the old complaint was Joshua's prayer to God after Israel's defeat at Ai. He complained that it would have been better to have remained on the far side of the Jordan. But his complaint was not that Israel was better off outside the land. He appealed to the holiness of God's name: "For the Canaanites and all the inhabitants of the land shall hear of it, and shall environ us round, and cut off our name from the earth: and what wilt thou do unto thy great name?" (Josh. 7:9). Israel's defeat would reflect badly on His name. God then told him of the infraction that had polluted Israel: the theft of something from Jericho, which had been placed under the total ban of hormah.

C. Sanctions and Inheritance

Israel's wanderings continued (Num. 21:10–13). They came to Beer. Here the leaders of the nation were instructed by Moses to dig a well. "And from thence they went to Beer: that is the well whereof the LORD spake unto Moses, Gather the people together, and I will give them water. Then Israel sang this song, Spring up, O well; sing ye unto it: The princes digged the well, the nobles of the people digged it, by the direction of the lawgiver, with their staves" (vv. 16–18a). This took place shortly before Israel's initial occupation of the land outside Canaan. When the nation's leaders dug the well, they were visibly serving the needs of those whom they represented judicially. They personally expended scarce resources on behalf of the nation as a whole. The idea of political leadership as public service became part of Israel's folklore, encapsulated in the song of the well.

Then Israel journeyed to the border area between the Amorites and Moab. Moab had been born through the incestuous union of Lot and his daughter (Gen. 19:37). Moab and his brother Ammon had always displayed the mark of Sodom: sinful rebellion. It took ten generations of circumcision and profession of faith for a Moabite or an Ammonite to gain citizenship in Israel (Deut. 23:3), compared to three generations for an Edomite or an Egyptian (Deut. 23:8). The Amorites had conquered Moab and had appropriated much of Moab's land (Num. 21:26). There was a proverb regarding this defeat: "Woe to thee, Moab! thou art undone, O people of Chemosh: he hath given his sons that escaped, and his daughters, into captivity unto Sihon king of the Amorites" (v. 29). The defeat of the Moabite god Chemosh was revealed in his surrender of the Moabites to the Amorites. This was the meaning of a military defeat in pagan antiquity: the surrender of the gods of the defeated army.¹⁰ It was only Israel that renounced this theology of local gods, for God promised to allow their enemies to defeat them if they disobeyed Him (Lev. 26:17, 25, 33). He would remain with them spiritually in any captivity. Israel asked Sihon, king of the Amorites, to allow Israel to pass through his territory on the king's highway. Sihon not only refused, he assembled his army against Israel. This was an unnecessary act of war. Israel had asked Edom the same thing, and had gone another way when Edom refused (Num. 20:14–21). Edom had assembled an army, but this was a defensive operation (Num. 20:20). Sihon attacked Israel without provocation (Num. 21:23). This led to his complete destruction in battle (v. 24). Israel took possession of all of the Amorite cities (v. 25). "Thus Israel dwelt in the land of the Amorites" (v. 31). This land became the inheritance of two and a half tribes. "And Moses gave unto them, even to the children of Gad, and to the children of Reuben, and unto half the tribe of Manasseh the son of Joseph, the kingdom of Sihon king of the Amorites, and the kingdom of Og king of Bashan, the land, with the cities thereof in the coasts, even the cities of the country round about" (Num. 32:33).

10. Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955), Bk. III, Ch. XV.

Moses had been told by God that by making the request to pass through the cities under Sihon's jurisdiction, he would provoke the king to imitate the Pharaoh and launch a suicidal confrontation. Deuteronomy 2 records in greater detail God's strategy of conquest. "Rise ye up, take your journey, and pass over the river Arnon: behold, I have given into thine hand Sihon the Amorite, king of Heshbon, and his land: begin to possess it, and contend with him in battle. This day will I begin to put the dread of thee and the fear of thee upon the nations that are under the whole heaven, who shall hear report of thee, and shall tremble, and be in anguish because of thee" (Deut. 2:24-25). The war was preceded by Moses' attempt to initiate peace: "And I sent messengers out of the wilderness of Kedemoth unto Sihon king of Heshbon with words of peace. . ." (v. 26). God dealt with Sihon as He had dealt with Pharaoh: He hardened Sihon's heart. "But Sihon king of Heshbon would not let us pass by him: for the LORD thy God hardened his spirit, and made his heart obstinate, that he might deliver him into thy hand, as appeareth this day" (v. 30). This was the beginning of Israel's inheritance: "And the LORD said unto me, Behold, I have begun to give Sihon and his land before thee: begin to possess, that thou mayest inherit his land" (v. 31). Israel also gained the inheritance of Moab by conquering Sihon. In Numbers 22 through 25, we read of Moab's attempts to reclaim this forfeited inheritance: first by a military alliance with Midian and by prophetic cursing by Balaam, then by physical and spiritual seduction.

Moses used this initial conquest to extend Israel's power: "And Moses sent to spy out Jaazer, and they took the villages thereof, and drove out the Amorites that were there" (Num. 21:32). The first group of spies sent out by Moses had returned from Canaan with negative reports (Num. 14). This time, their reports furthered the conquest of Canaan. This was the preliminary series of conquests designed to teach the generation of the conquest that God was faithful, that Israel could win in battle. City by city, the inheritance was built up. Israel began to move from a people on a pilgrimage to a people with roots in the land. The next confrontation was with Og, king of Bashan. He, too, was utterly defeated (v. 35). Thus did Og join Sihon in the folklore of

Israel's conquests.¹¹

Conclusion

Numbers 21 records a series of corporate capital sanctions: against Arad the Canaanite, against the people of Israel, against Sihon the Amorite, against the cities of Jaazer, and against Og of Bashan. Negative sanctions against Moab had already been applied by God through Sihon. Arad and his cities did not become part of Israel's inheritance. They became hormah: a whole burnt offering to God. This pattern of conquest was repeated by the next generation: Jericho became hormah. In neither case was Israel allowed to appropriate the land or property of these cities.

Israel was ethically transformed by the serpent experience. The nation ceased complaining about the wilderness as a promise unfulfilled by God. Shortly thereafter, God began to deliver into their hands parts of the land outside the boundaries of the Jordan. At first, this was the result of an offensive attack by Sihon, but after possessing Sihon's inheritance, Moses began an offensive campaign modeled after the failed campaign of Numbers 13–14. He sent spies out; then Israel conquered a city, Jaazer. Then Og launched a war against them, which he lost. Israel's mentality changed as a result of these initial battles. Israel began to occupy defeated nations' land. Israel's psychology of defeat began to change to a psychology of victory. The tribes began to secure an inheritance for themselves and their heirs through a series of military victories. The positive sanction of victory became the basis of Israel's inheritance.

What had produced this change? We can blame the serpents' sanctions, but this is only a minor part of the story. Their complaint was a recapitulation of the sin of the generation of the exodus. This was the same old complaint. The beginning of inheritance began soon after the serpents did their covenantal work. Israel had not occupied king Arad's land, for it was under the ban, as Jericho would be. But the next military victories allowed Israel to cease wandering. These victories changed the psychology of the nation. The old complaint that God had not fulfilled His promise to Israel regarding the Promised Land received a death blow: down payments on the victory to come.

11. Numbers 32:33; Deuteronomy 1:4; 29:7; 31:4; Joshua 2:10; 9:10; Nehemiah 9:22; Psalm 135:11.

13

THE OFFICE OF COURT PROPHET

And Balak's anger was kindled against Balaam, and he smote his hands together: and Balak said unto Balaam, I called thee to curse mine enemies; and, behold, thou hast altogether blessed them these three times. Therefore now flee thou to thy place: I thought to promote thee unto great honour; but, lo, the LORD hath kept thee back from honour. And Balaam said unto Balak, Spake I not also to thy messengers which thou sentest unto me, saying, If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the commandment of the LORD, to do either good or bad of mine own mind; but what the LORD saith, that will I speak? (Num. 24:10–13).

The theocentric issue is God as the sanctions-bringer. Men must conform their judgments to God's judgment. At this stage of his career as a prophet, Balaam was still serving as God's representative. He understood what God had promised. He was still refusing to curse Israel. He also understood that Israel was no longer under the curse of God that had made nomads out of the exodus generation, wandering in circles. "He hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, neither hath he seen perverseness in Israel: the LORD his God is with him, and the shout of a king is among them" (Num. 23:21). Israel was immune to divination, incantations, and other paraphernalia of magic: "Surely there is no enchantment against Jacob, neither is there any divination against Israel: according to this time it shall be said of Jacob and of Israel, What hath God wrought!" (Num. 23:23).

A. "Every Man Has His Price!"

Balak, king of Moab (Num. 22:4), realized that he had a monumental problem on his hands. He had seen the Israelites defeat Sihon and thereby gain the inheritance of Moab that Sihon had collected from Moab (Num. 21:26). The Israelites had then gone on to defeat the city of Jaazer and Og of Bashan. They were no longer the defeated people who had been routed by the Amalekites and Canaanites (Num. 14:45). Their numbers were vast. They were a company, Balak informed the Midianites (Num. 22:4), as in multitude (Gen. 28:3).

Balak had formed an alliance with Midian. Moab was the heir of Lot. Midian was the heir of Abraham through Keturah (Gen. 25:1–2). Moses had fled from Egypt to Midian (Ex. 2:15). He had been given an inheritance in Midian through his wife and his children. Now, a generation later, Midian had allied itself with Moab against Moses. Soon, Midian would participate in a joint action with Moab to undermine Israel's faith by worshipping the gods of Moab (Num. 25:1–2, 6). Midian came under negative sanctions because of this (Num. 25:17).

1. Court Prophets

What Balak needed, he decided, was a court prophet who would curse Israel in the name of God. Prophets could be purchased, Balak believed. "He sent messengers therefore unto Balaam the son of Beor to Pethor, which is by the river of the land of the children of his people, to call him, saying, Behold, there is a people come out from Egypt: behold, they cover the face of the earth, and they abide over against me. Come now therefore, I pray thee, curse me this people; for they are too mighty for me: peradventure I shall prevail, that we may smite them, and that I may drive them out of the land: for I wot that he whom thou blessest is blessed, and he whom thou cursest is cursed" (Num. 22:5–6).

Balak believed in the power of verbal curses when delivered by an official representative of God. Negative sanctions in history could be successfully invoked by means of a curse. This required a prophet, whose word was authoritative because what he said would surely take place. A prophet prophesied. For a price, Balak believed, Balaam would prophesy evil against a king's enemies. His curses were for sale. The positive sanction of money could purchase the negative sanction of God's curse in history. Such were the religious convictions of Balak.

"And the elders of Moab and the elders of Midian departed with the rewards of divination in their hand; and they came unto Balaam, and spake unto him the words of Balak" (Num. 22:7). Balaam inquired of God, and God told him not to go with them, for Israel is blessed (v. 12). At first, Balaam refused to appear before the king (v. 13). Balak sent another group, this one even more honorable than the first (v. 15).

This indicates that Balak was trying to negotiate a low price; he had not sent his most prestigious representatives the first time. He was persuaded that “every man has his price,” but also that it is not shrewd to offer your top price early in the negotiations. Having failed in his first attempt to lure Balaam into his court, he raised his price: “For I will promote thee unto very great honour, and I will do whatsoever thou sayest unto me: come therefore, I pray thee, curse me this people” (v. 17). But Balaam refused again: “And Balaam answered and said unto the servants of Balak, If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the word of the LORD my God, to do less or more” (v. 18). He inquired again of God, and this time God told him to go with them.

2. Balaam's Price

This raises a difficult question: Why did God tell him to go this time? God did not want him to go. Balaam went with them. “And God's anger was kindled because he went: and the angel of the LORD stood in the way for an adversary against him” (v. 22a). God had already told Balaam that Israel was sacrosanct: beyond negative sanctions. He had also told him not to go with the first group of emissaries (v. 12). For a prophet of God, this revelation should have been sufficient. But Balak knew his man. Balaam had a price. That price was determined in stages. This is why Balaam came to God again (v. 19). Maybe this time God's answer would be different. And so it was: “And God came unto Balaam at night, and said unto him, If the men come to call thee, rise up, and go with them; but yet the word which I shall say unto thee, that shalt thou do” (v. 20). Balaam was like a moth flitting around an open flame. When Balak's price rose, so did Balaam's interest. Perhaps God would give him a new word of knowledge. At some price, maybe God would change His mind.

Balak and Balaam shared the same view of prophecy; they disagreed only regarding the price. Balak believed that the prophet could be bought off. The words of the prophet supposedly had power within themselves; God was either an afterthought or a tool of the prophet. Balak did not want the prophet to serve as an intermediary, speaking God's word as God's representative (point two of the biblical covenant model). What Balak wanted was an invocation of negative sanctions against Israel. God was unwilling to impose these sanctions. He told Balaam to tell this to Balak, which Balaam did: “How shall I curse, whom God hath not cursed? or how shall I defy, whom the LORD hath not defied? For from the top of the rocks I see him, and from the hills I behold him: lo, the people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations" (Num. 23:8–9). But Balak's response was to recommend a change of perspective: "And Balak said unto him, Come, I pray thee, with me unto another place, from whence thou mayest see them: thou shalt see but the utmost part of them, and shalt not see them all: and curse me them from thence" (Num. 23:13).

Balak was a manipulator. He believed that man, not God, is sovereign. He believed that the prophet's power stemmed from himself or from some impersonal cosmic repository of power. If he could persuade the prophet to declare a word of power, then the cosmos would respond and impose that curse. God had nothing to do with the curse; Balaam was sovereign, not God. And Balaam had a price. The answer Balak wanted to know was what this price was. If he could ascertain Balaam's price and pay it, he would become sovereign over Israel on the battlefield. He might even regain Moab's lost inheritance, which Israel occupied.

Balaam insisted that he was not in a position to deliver what the king wanted. "God is not a man, that he should lie; neither the son of man, that he should repent: hath he said, and shall he not do it? or hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good? Behold, I have received commandment to bless: and he hath blessed; and I cannot reverse it" (Num. 23:19–20). Israel was going to win: "Behold, the people shall rise up as a great lion, and lift up himself as a young lion: he shall not lie down until he eat of the prey, and drink the blood of the slain" (v. 24).

This concerned Balak. He had asked for a prophetic word; he did not like what he heard: a blessing for Israel. He wanted to return to the status quo ante: "And Balak said unto Balaam, Neither curse them at all, nor bless them at all" (v. 25). But he was too late: the prophetic word had been spoken. "But Balaam answered and said unto Balak, Told not I thee, saying, All that the LORD speaketh, that I must do?" (v. 26). So, Balak suggested another change of perspective: "And Balak said unto Balaam, Come, I pray thee, I will bring thee unto another place; peradventure it will please God that thou mayest curse me them from thence. And Balak brought Balaam unto the top of Peor, that looketh toward Jeshimon" (vv. 27–28).

This is the classic sign of a manipulator: "Just keep your options open until you see things my way." He wants a particular outcome. If he cannot get what he wants by approaching the evidence from one perspective, he approaches it from another. He is not involved in a search for truth. He is buying a preconceived outcome. Balaam cooperated again. "And Balak did as Balaam had said, and offered a bullock and a ram on every altar" (v. 30). It was obvious that he was caught between two opposing forces, and he wanted to escape the pressure. He wanted temporal rewards from Balak, but he did not want punishment from God. He kept the process open-ended for as long as he could. He sought God in the wilderness through a trance (Num. 24:1, 4). The revelation was the same, only more so: "How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and thy tabernacles, O Israel! As the valleys are they spread forth, as gardens by the river's side, as the trees of lign aloes which the LORD hath planted, and as cedar trees beside the waters. He shall pour the water out of his buckets, and his seed shall be in many waters, and his king shall be higher than Agag, and his kingdom shall be exalted. God brought him forth out of Egypt; he hath as it were the strength of an unicorn [wild bull]: he shall eat up the nations his enemies, and shall break their bones, and pierce them through with his arrows" (vv. 5–8). Then came God's promise of sanctions for Balaam: "He couched, he lay down as a lion, and as a great lion: who shall stir him up? Blessed is he that blesseth thee, and cursed is he that curseth thee" (v. 9).

At this unpleasant news, Balak rejected Balaam and sent him home. He rebuked Balaam for having failed to deliver the curse he wanted (v. 10). It was all God's fault. "Therefore now flee thou to thy place: I thought to promote thee unto great honour; but, lo, the LORD hath kept thee back from honour" (v. 11). Before, Balak had expected Balaam to perform as requested, on Balaam's own authority. Now, however, Balak ridiculed Balaam by pointing out that God had decided to keep Balaam from receiving the honors which the king had planned to bestow on him. God was obviously being vindictive against Balaam; this had nothing to do with Israel's protected covenantal status.

3. At What Price?

The economist shares Balak's view of pricing. He may not argue that every man has his price, but he argues that at the decision-making margin, every man will evaluate a price. The decision-maker will count the cost of saying no to the offer. His cost of saying no is whatever he might have gained by saying yes, minus whatever it would cost him to say yes and fulfill his contract.

If a future-oriented individual believes that God will impose negative sanctions on a scale beyond calculation, he will refuse to say yes to an offer that endangers his future. Jesus asked: "For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" (Mark 8:36). By this He meant that the cost-benefit ratio of a soul-threatening decision is overwhelmingly on the side of righteousness. The cost of doing evil is too high. The magnitude of the discrepancy is so great that gaining the whole world would be a bad bargain. This understanding had governed His own response to Satan's temptation: "Again, the devil taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain, and sheweth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them; And saith unto him, All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me. Then saith Jesus unto him, Get thee hence, Satan: for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve" (Matt. 4:8–10).

What this means is that for some decision-makers, the net cost of saying no to evil is so minuscule as not to be a factor. The person's fear of God is so great that the price offered does not register on his scale of values. At what price will a mother murder her infant son? For some mothers, no such price exists. For others, it does—a prophetic mark of covenant-breaking.¹

If no price is sufficiently high to register on her scale of values, then the price can be said to be economically irrelevant. It is not an economic factor for her. There is no choice to be made. A clever economist can then define the problem out of existence: "Since there can be no choice, there is no trade-off; without a trade-off, there is no economically relevant marginal price." A morally wise economist, however, will say that some people do not have a price.

Sin being what it is, and present-orientation being what it is, in most decisions most men will have a price. The covenant-breaker believes that this area of decision-making is wider than it really is, for there are people who believe that the price of disobedience to God is too high. The economist, rarely being a covenant-keeper, and also a methodological atheist—though usually a self-declared morally neutral agnostic—finds it difficult to believe that there are people who act irrespective of price. He may re-define the array of prices to include men's beliefs in the hereafter, but in practice, the typical economist presumes what Balak presumed: every man has his price. The humanistic economist rejects or ignores the ultimate law of sociology: "Some do; some don't."

1. "Then I will walk contrary unto you also in fury; and I, even I, will chastise you seven times for your sins. And ye shall eat the flesh of your sons, and the flesh of your daughters shall ye eat" (Lev. 26:28-29). "And the king said unto her, What aileth thee? And she answered, This woman said unto me, Give thy son, that we may eat him to day, and we will eat my son to morrow. So we boiled my son, and did eat him: and I said unto her on the next day, Give thy son, that we may eat him: and she hath hid her son. And it came to pass, when the king heard the words of the woman, that he rent his clothes; and he passed by upon the wall, and the people looked, and, behold, he had sackcloth within upon his flesh" (II Kings 6:28-30).

B. Donkey, Prophet, and King

The story of Balaam's journey to meet the king is better known than the circumstances of the event. Balaam was initially told by God not to accompany the two kings' representatives (Num. 22:12). Balaam did not want to take no for an answer.

God knew this. Balaam told the representatives that he would not come with them, but he left a way of escape. This is the classic answer of the bureaucrat: announce a negative at the first request, but leave a way of escape. The bureaucrat who retreats from yes to no alienates some politician's constituent. A bureaucrat who retreats from no to yes placates the constituent.

Next, God allowed him to go with the representatives, but God did not want him to go. He knew Balaam's heart, which was evil. On the journey, the angel of the Lord appeared to Balaam's donkey, but Balaam did not see it. Three times the donkey refused to go forward. Three times, Balaam struck the donkey for disobedience. Finally, the angel revealed himself to Balaam, informing him that "I went out to withstand thee, because thy way is perverse before me" (Num. 22:32b). Balaam then offered to turn back (v. 34). "And the angel of the LORD said unto Balaam, Go with the men: but only the word that I shall speak unto thee, that thou shalt speak. So Balaam went with the princes of Balak" (v. 35).

The best-informed participant was the donkey, who saw the angel from the beginning. Less informed was Balaam, who saw the angel only after the donkey did, and only after he had beaten the donkey three times (v. 32). Least informed was Balak, who refused three times to accept God's word through Balaam that God had a special relationship with Israel. "And Balak's anger was kindled against Balaam, and he smote his hands together: and Balak said unto Balaam, I called thee to curse mine enemies, and, behold, thou hast altogether blessed them these three times” (Num. 24:10). Balaam three times had tried to persuade the donkey to do things his way; he used negative sanctions, but these failed. Balak three times had tried to persuade Balaam to do things his way; he used positive sanctions, but these failed. The donkey was a better servant of God than Balaam was; Balaam was a better servant of God than Balak was. The donkey defied Balaam in order to protect Balaam from the angel; Balaam defied Balak in order to protect himself from God. The donkey was not self-interested; Balaam was. This incident reveals that covenant-breakers in their rebellion do not have the common sense of a donkey. A donkey serves its master better than a covenant-breaker serves God (Isa. 1:3). The words of Balaam to the donkey should warn covenant-breakers of the wrath to come: “I would there were a sword in mine hand, for now would I kill thee” (Num. 22:29b). If Balaam was ready to kill his faithful donkey out of personal pride, what is God ready to do with covenant-breakers who resist Him out of this same pride?

C. Balaam’s Motivation

Balaam did not want Balak to have the last word in this matter. He revealed another prophecy that he had been given in the vision (Num. 24:16). He presented the king with a messianic prophecy: “I shall see him, but not now: I shall behold him, but not nigh: there shall come a Star out of Jacob, and a Sceptre shall rise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab, and destroy all the children of Sheth. And Edom shall be a possession, Seir also shall be a possession for his enemies; and Israel shall do valiantly. Out of Jacob shall come he that shall have dominion, and shall destroy him that remaineth of the city” (vv. 17–19). He prophesied the extinction of the Amalekites and the Kenites (vv. 20–22). Then he departed (v. 25). But as we learn in Numbers 31, Balaam’s last word was an incomplete word. He remained the king’s agent rather than God’s.

The account of Balaam’s prophecy indicates that he was weak, hoping that he might profit from his position as a court prophet, but strong enough to resist Balak’s request that he utter a curse against Israel in God’s name. He refused to say no each time that Balak asked him to reconsider or to look at the matter from a new geographical perspective. He played with fire, but he initially avoided getting burned. The problem was, he could not stop playing with fire. His seeming immunity led to his eventual destruction. He refused to utter a false prophecy against Israel, but he then devised the plan by which the Midianite allies of Moab seduced the Israelites. "Behold, these caused the children of Israel, through the counsel of Balaam, to commit trespass against the LORD in the matter of Peor, and there was a plague among the congregation of the LORD" (Num. 31:16). For this, Moses ordered him executed, after the military defeat of Midian (v. 8).

Balaam's plan involved the use of Moabite and Midianite women as temptresses. "And Israel abode in Shittim, and the people began to commit whoredom with the daughters of Moab. And they called the people unto the sacrifices of their gods: and the people did eat, and bowed down to their gods" (Num. 25:1-2). This was the first time that Israel is said to have openly worshipped foreign gods; it would not be the last. This false worship angered God (v. 3). There is no doubt that this had been Balaam's plan. He believed that God supported Israel because of Israel's righteous behavior. "He hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, neither hath he seen perverseness in Israel: the LORD his God is with him, and the shout of a king is among them" (Num. 23:21). What he had misunderstood was that God did not see iniquity in Israel because of its absence in Israel. He failed to see it judicially. God looked at the judicial coverings that He had provided Israel: the sacrifices, the system of cleansing, and the other boundaries that separated Israel from the other nations. He had chosen Israel despite Israel's sins. He was building up Israel as His people. Thus, any attempt to undermine Israel's commitment to God would not result in the defeat of Israel but the defeat of the perpetrators. Balaam had prophesied: "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his!" (Num. 23:10b). His words subsequently condemned him. He died the death of the unrighteous.

There is no indication that Balaam was paid for having suggested this strategy of subversion. Paid or not, Balaam wanted to be part of the establishment. He wanted to be an insider, part of the inner ring. As C. S. Lewis remarked before a group of university students: "Of all passions the passion for the Inner Ring is most skillful in making a man who is not yet a very bad man do very bad things."² The king of Moab had sent representatives of Moab and Midian to recruit him (Num. 22:7). This was proof of his importance to the leaders of the alliance. Access to power is a strong lure. Balaam would not sell a false prophecy to Balak, though he refused to turn down the king's request definitively at the very beginning of the negotiations. Balak believed that every man has his price. Balaam did have a price, but that price seems not to have been money. The price was access to power, to importance within the inner ring. He thought of himself as a master strategist. He believed that he could undermine the basis of Israel's support by God. This way, he would be able to announce a true prophecy that was favorable to Balak's cause.

2. C. S. Lewis, "The Inner Ring" (1944), in Lewis, The Weight of Glory and Other Addresses (New York: Macmillan, 1980), p. 103. (<http://bit.ly/LewisRing>)

Balaam was formally a true prophet. He refused to utter a false prophecy, i.e., a judicially binding curse in God's name. "And Balaam answered and said unto the servants of Balak, If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the word of the LORD my God, to do less or more" (Num. 22:18). Ethically, however, he was a false prophet. He used his knowledge of God's covenantal relationship with Israel—a covenant grounded in ethical stipulations—to lure Israel into adultery in the broadest sense. Balaam had a surface understanding of biblical covenantalism. He understood that God's corporate sanctions in history enforce His covenant's stipulations. Balaam believed that if he could lure Israel into the judicial status of a covenant-breaking nation, God would impose negative corporate sanctions on Israel. These, he believed, would weaken Israel, allowing the alliance to defeat Israel. He could then invoke a curse against Israel. He would thereby establish himself as both a true prophet and a court prophet.

God did impose sanctions on Israel: 24,000 died in a plague (Num. 25:9). More would have died had it not been for the representative judicial action of Phinehas, the son of Eleazar (v. 7), who executed an Israelite man and Midianite woman in their act of debauchery (v. 8). But Israel's sin did not break the covenant permanently. God's grace covered the transgression. God then called Israel to battle Midian (v. 17). It was Midian that lost the war, not Israel (Num. 31).

Conclusion

Balaam was the classic court prophet. The court prophet in Israel served the king, not God. The king paid him to speak the word of the king in the name of God. Whether he declared the future accurately was irrelevant to his status as a court prophet.

Covenant law is intended to lead sinners to repentance. Balaam did not call Balak to repentance before God. Instead, he sought a way to lure Israel into sin. He misused his knowledge of God's covenant.

He sought a perverse end by means of the law itself. In this sense, he adopted Satan's strategy with Eve in the garden and Jesus in the wilderness: partial citations of the law in order to undermine the intent of the law, i.e., covenantal faithfulness to God. Balaam announced God's commitment to Israel because of Israel's righteousness, and then he devised a strategy to make Israel unrighteous. For this, God placed him under the negative sanction of execution.

14

DIVIDING THE INHERITANCE

And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, Unto these the land shall be divided for an inheritance according to the number of names. To many thou shalt give the more inheritance, and to few thou shalt give the less inheritance: to every one shall his inheritance be given according to those that were numbered of him. Notwithstanding the land shall be divided by lot: according to the names of the tribes of their fathers they shall inherit. According to the lot shall the possession thereof be divided between many and few (Num. 26:52–56).

The theocentric focus of this law is the familiar theme of ownership: God was the owner of the Promised Land. He delegated to Israelite tribes and then to families inter-generational stewardship over certain plots of land. He served as the original agent of distribution by means of the casting of lots. Tribes were to serve as the secondary agents of distribution: allocating ownership in terms of family size. The question to be resolved was ethical: To what extent was the allocation of land based on considerations of equity—family size and need—and to what extent on the question of equality of family inheritance? That is, was the allocation based more on family size or tribal inheritance rights? This problem has baffled rabbinic commentators for almost two thousand years.

This command to allocate portions of the land followed the second wilderness numbering of Israel (Num. 26:1–2). The nation had already been involved in a series of defensive wars against Canaanites who dwelt outside the boundaries of the Jordan. Israel did not initiate them. (The conquest of Jazeer may have been an exception.) Israel was victorious over these nations and had begun to occupy large tracts of real estate, but only because the previous holders had attacked Israel rather than allowing Israel access through their lands. This was the down payment on Israel's inheritance, prophesied by Abraham: "But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet fun" (Gen. 15:16). Now, the iniquity of the Amorites had become full. The Amorite tribes outside of the boundaries of Canaan had launched a pair of offensive campaigns against Israel (Num. 21 :23, 33), which they lost. This marked the beginning of the conquest.

A. By Lot or by Need?

The nation numbered 601,730 men of fighting age (v. 51), which was very close to what it had been a generation earlier. Once this was ascertained, God laid down the law of spoils. First, it was by family size. "To many thou shalt give the more inheritance, and to few thou shalt give the less inheritance: to everyone shall his inheritance be given according to those that were numbered of him" (v. 54). Second, it was by lot. "Notwithstanding the land shall be divided by lot: according to the names of the tribes of their fathers they shall inherit" (v. 55). Taken at face value, these two rules are inconsistent. If distribution is strictly by lot, then there is no way to allocate property in terms of "larger families—more land." A plot of land will go to the family selected by lot.

Pre-modern rabbinical commentators were not agreed on a way to resolve this. Some, following Rashi, argued that the Holy Spirit (Ruach Hakodesh) allocated unequal portions to the families. "Although the portions were not of equal area because, as we have now said, in all cases they assigned the portions according to the numerousness of the tribe, yet they did so only by aid of the lot, but the lot fell by the utterance of the Holy Spirit, as is explained in Baba Bathra (122a)."¹ The problem here was the text's indication that Israel's leaders had to consider the size of the tribes. If God was in solely in charge of this, why did Moses mention this problem in the rules governing allocation? It seems as though the rules placed this responsibility on the rulers.

Nachmanides rejected this interpretation: ". . . it is explicitly stated in the Gemara [Baba Bathra 11 7b] that the meaning of [this section] according to the Sages was not to distinguish in any way between [the portion given to] each particular tribe [since they each received an equal portion]. . . . [T]he Rabbis expressly came to the conclusion that the Land was not divided according to the heads of men, [i.e., according to the overall population], but it was divided among [all] the tribes [equally]. Thus they divided it into twelve equal parts, and each tribe took that part which was assigned to it by lot”² The rabbis debated about whether the inheritance went to the sons at the time of the second wilderness numbering as individual warriors or whether they inherited their shares in terms of what God had allocated at the exodus to their fathers.³

1. Rashi, Chumash with Targum Onkelos, Haphtaroth and Rashi's Commentary, A. M. Silbermann and M. Rosenbaum, trans., 5 vols. (Jerusalem: Silbermann Family, [1934] 1985 [Jewish year: 5745]), IV, p. 129 (comment on verse 53).

Isaac ben Judah Abravanel (1437–1508), an Iberian rabbinic commentator, offered a third possibility. The lots for the tribes identified the region of the nation in which a tribe would ultimately dwell, but the size of these tribal plots was based on tribal population. Some tribes might receive less fertile land, so they would be granted larger territories within the general region. The modern commentator, Jacob Milgrom, thinks that this is the correct approach, with this modification: the families, too, would receive their plots in terms of their size, not by lot.⁴ But is he correct?

If allocation was strictly by lot to each family, then the presumption is that the plots allocated were all the same size. But the allocation was not strictly by lot. There was also a consideration of family size. The question is: Which family? Was a family determined on a “one numbered warrior, one family plot” basis? Or was it based on the family name within each tribe? Or was it some sort of mixture?

B. Individual Plot or Tribal Plot?

In the second Numbers mustering, each tribe’s census was broken down into families, and each family was named. In the first Numbers mustering, only Levi’s report was broken down by family names (Num. 3:17). The other tribal families were not named. After each tribal name, this phrase occurs: “. . . after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war.” The distinguishing mark of this earlier numbering is this phrase: “according to the number of the names.” In the numbering described in Numbers 26, this phrase does not occur. Instead, the name of each family appears. This

2. Nachmanides, Commentary on the Torah, 5 vols. (New York: Shilo, [1267?] 1975), III, p. 313.

3. Samson Raphael Hirsch, The Pentateuch, 5 vols. (Gateshead, London: Judaica Press, [1875?] 1989), IV, Numbers, pp. 446–48.

4. Jacob Milgrom, The JPS Torah Commentary: Numbers (New York: Jewish Publication Society, 1990), p. 481.

points to the importance of family name in the second wilderness numbering. Each family knew that it would be a part of a victorious military campaign. Each knew what the terms of the inheritance were. Each had its name recorded in anticipation of the victory.

By identifying family names, meaning the names of the sons of the twelve patriarchs (Joseph's two sons initially counting as one family), the elders of each tribe knew that larger family units would have to be allocated more land. The question was: More land out of what sized tribal portion?

1. Plot Size

If this command from God was to be honored, there had to be a fixed reference point. The problem facing the commentator is to identify this fixed reference point. Was it the size of the family plot, with the same sized plot distributed by lot to each warrior? Was the tribal plot size fixed, with the allocation of plots within this fixed unit determined by the size and number of the families belonging to the tribe? Or was the constant factor the general geographical location of the land rather than the size of the allocation? If so, was this confined to the tribes' allocation, or were family plots also governed by the "general location" principle?

First, if each family plot was the same size, with allocation based on the number of holy warriors within each tribe, then the tribes' inheritances would not have been equal in size. Larger tribes would have received larger allocations. This was Rashi's opinion. Second, if each tribal allocation was the same size, then the individual warriors' inheritances would have varied in terms of the number of families in the tribe: members of larger tribes received smaller family inheritance on average. The families would then have been granted larger or smaller plots in terms of their size. This was Nachmanides' opinion, and he cited rabbinical tradition. This would have meant that members of small tribes with few families would have been granted larger plots, on average, than members of populous tribes.

There is a problem with Nachmanides' interpretation: a subsequent clarification of the law. "And ye shall divide the land by lot for an inheritance among your families: and to the more ye shall give the more inheritance, and to the fewer ye shall give the less inheritance: every man's inheritance shall be in the place where his lot falleth; according to the tribes of your fathers ye shall inherit" (Num. 33:54). It appears as though the casting of lots was also used to divide up tribal real estate among each tribe's families: "every man's inheritance shall be in the place where his lot falleth." It also sounds as though larger families received larger portions: "And ye shall divide the land by lot for an inheritance among your families: and to the more ye shall give the more inheritance, and to the fewer ye shall give the less inheritance." What did these phrases mean? Did "allocation by lot" apply both to the tribes and families? Did the "allocation by population" also apply to both? If so, how? How did God's allocation by lot integrate with the rulers' allocation in terms of population and presumed economic need?

2. Dual Allocations

The language of Numbers 33:54 indicates that both systems of allocation governed the initial allocation, first to tribes and then to families. How might this have worked? Let us consider Abravanel's suggestion. The land was divided up into eleven regions, but initially there were no fixed boundaries assigned to these large plots. Then lots were cast to determine which tribe would live in which region. Variations in the land's productivity would not become matters of inter-tribal conflict except in the tribes' border areas. The falling of the lot would govern the distribution. Then the question of tribal size became an issue. Here the rulers would have to decide. The Levites would probably have played an important role here because they were not given any rural land. Levites would live in cities in all regions. They had no self-interest in favoring one tribe over another. By using the lot method to allocate land regionally, and by using population to establish boundaries, the system reduced tribal conflict over the regional assignments, yet it honored considerations of equity: not favoring the members of small tribes by granting them family plots that were larger on average than the plots inherited by populous tribes.

If this dual allocation system was established as a way to reduce the number of inter-tribal conflicts regarding general location, yet to preserve equity based on family plot size, then the same dual allocation system would have worked in the same way to reduce the number of intra-tribal conflicts. The casting of lots determined each family's legal claim to a piece of property in a region within the tribe's inheritance, but the boundaries of the plots were determined by considerations of family size in relation to the land's expected productivity.

The decision facing the rulers was comparable to the decision facing the parents of several children. They have inherited a piece of property which, for some reason, they cannot legally sell. It is time to build a home. Should they tell the architect to build all of the rooms the same size? If they do, then the older children will complain, "But I need more room. The younger children have rooms as large as ours. It's not fair!" If they build different-sized rooms, the complaint from the younger children will be: "But the older one's rooms are bigger. You're not treating us the same. It's not fair!" What should the parents tell the architect to design? Then there is the additional question of where the rooms are to be placed, given the design of the house. Will one room look out on a lovely back yard, while another room face the blank side of the next door neighbor's house?

The language of Numbers 33:54 governing the distribution of both tribal land and family plots seems to indicate that both principles of allocation had to be honored. If the two systems of allocation were in force, we can better understand how this system worked by using the analogy of the home. Casting lots will determine which part of the home each child will live in: facing the back yard, front yard, or the next door neighbor's house; close to the kitchen or close to the joint bathroom; etc. "Don't complain to us; the lots decided your location." Once this general placement of the children's rooms is decided, the size of the rooms are designed in terms of the needs of older children vs. younger children.

The analogy breaks down in one crucial respect: older children grow up and move out. This leaves their rooms available for younger children who have also grown. In Israel, once a family was assigned its plot of ground, it could not permanently move out or buy more, except to move inside a walled city, where the jubilee land law did not apply.

C. Joshua's Allocations

Subsequent revelation provides us with additional evidence regarding the actual allocation of tribal land. "And the lot of the children of Joseph fell from Jordan by Jericho, unto the water of Jericho on the east, to the wilderness that goeth up from Jericho throughout mount Bethel, And goeth out from Bethel to Luz, and passeth along unto the borders of Archi to Ataroth, And goeth down westward to the coast of Japhleti, unto the coast of Beth-horon the nether, and to Gezer: and the goings out thereof are at the sea. So the children of Joseph, Manasseh and Ephraim, took their inheritance” (Josh. 16:1–4). The first thing to consider is the highly specific territory described here. The borders of this inheritance were already fixed. This seems to call into question Abravanel’s interpretation. But maybe not, as we shall see.

The second point is the singular word: lot. One lot fell to the children of Joseph. There had been an existing unit of land. The lot associated with this unit of land fell to the two tribes of Joseph. This means that the lot was associated with one patriarch. This led to a complaint:

Yet it came to pass, when the children of Israel were waxen strong, that they put the Canaanites to tribute; but did not utterly drive them out. And the children of Joseph spake unto Joshua, saying, Why hast thou given me but one lot and one portion to inherit, seeing I am a great people, forasmuch as the LORD hath blessed me hitherto? And Joshua answered them, If thou be a great people, then get thee up to the wood country, and cut down for thyself there in the land of the Perizzites and of the giants, if mount Ephraim be too narrow for thee. And the children of Joseph said, The hill is not enough for us: and all the Canaanites that dwell in the land of the valley have chariots of iron, both they who are of Beth-shean and her towns, and they who are of the valley of Jezreel. And Joshua spake unto the house of Joseph, even to Ephraim and to Manasseh, saying, Thou art a great people, and hast great power: thou shalt not have one lot only: But the mountain shall be thine; for it is a wood, and thou shalt cut it down: and the outgoings of i shall be thine: for thou shalt drive out the Canaanites, though they have iron chariots, and though they be strong (Josh. 17:13–18).

The heirs of the two sons of Joseph believed that they had been short-changed by the lot allocation system. They appealed to their might, i.e., their greater numerical strength, over the other tribal units. They deserved more land because they were in fact two family units, not one. In other words, the two tribes were calling for a revision based on population size. This seems consistent with Abravanel’s view: lot first, then reallocation based on population. But the two tribes were also raising a judicial point: they were two tribes. They had obviously been allocated only one tribal unit.⁵

5. These two tribes received their inheritance from Jacob one generation later than the other sons did, for they were grandsons of Jacob. So, their population expansion began later, biologically speaking. This would have made a considerable difference in their size at the time of the conquest. They would have been much smaller than the other tribes. Where, then, did they get their extra numbers? From adoptions. The sons of Joseph in the early years would have attracted more volunteers, since Joseph was Joshua's response was both clever and critical of their claim. He understood their request as a judicial claim rather than a population claim: "one lot only." They wanted another lot. There were twelve non-Levitical tribes, not eleven. He told them, "You may have more land," he said. "Just go do your job and conquer the Canaanites whom you have allowed to occupy the land. You may claim another tribe's share of the inheritance by finishing what neither your tribe nor the other tribe has been able to complete: the conquest." In other words, he said: "All right, you self-proclaimed mighty men of war, you tough guys: go out and exterminate some really tough guys who are armed with iron chariots. Mighty is as mighty does. Put your muscle where your mouths are." Did they have a legitimate legal claim? Let them prove their claim on the battlefield.

The heirs of Joseph had a plausible legal case: they were in fact two families. They had been counted as two families in the musterings. Joshua took this into consideration. But he did not grant them their request irrespective of what they would do to enforce their claim. Combined, they were larger than other tribes. But numbers are as numbers do. They had to prove their case by evicting Canaanites. That is, they had to do something extra in order to validate their claim. They could keep any extra ground they conquered. This answer was Joshua's way to head off criticism from the other tribes. The other tribes might come back and complain: "Joseph was entitled to one share, just like the rest of us. He could not lawfully bequest what was not his to give. Let the heirs of his two sons accept this without trying to get their hands on our land." Joshua would have an answer: "They did not take away your land; they took away Canaanites' land. They earned their extra portion on the battlefield. It is only fair that they should share in a larger inheritance."

This was a special case: legal rather than demographic. The next seven casts were not special.

And there remained among the children of Israel seven tribes, which had not yet received their inheritance. And Joshua said unto the children of Israel, How long are ye slack to go to possess the land, which the LORD God of your fathers hath given you? Give out from among you three men for each tribe: and I will send them, and they shall rise, and go through the land, and describe it according to the inheritance of them; and they shall come again to me. And they shall di-the Pharaoh's agent. I am indebted to David McCalman for this insight. This is additional evidence for the presence of the adoption process early in Israel's stay in Egypt.

vide it into seven parts: Judah shall abide in their coast on the south, and the house of Joseph shall abide in their coasts on the north. Ye shall therefore describe the land into seven parts, and bring the description hither to me, that I may cast lots for you here before the LORD our God (Josh. 18:2–6).

This indicates that these seven tribes already had received their inheritances. Joshua announced the regions that Judah, Ephraim, and half the tribe of Manasseh would occupy.⁶ We know from the previous chapter that Joseph had received his land by lot. This indicates that the tribal lots for all of the tribes had already been cast. Each tribe knew approximately where its land would be. Each tribe would send out surveyors. So far, this is consistent with all three approaches to the allocation problem: Rashi's, Nachmanides', and Abravanel's.

The men were sent out in teams of three with instructions to survey the land. This indicates that the wars of conquest were over. The surveyors were not told to do an extensive survey in terms of the actual numbers of families in their tribes. Upon their return, they were to place before Joshua the descriptions of the boundaries of each of the seven tribal units.⁷ The text does not indicate that the seven plots were equal.

He had told them to bring back their descriptions "that I may cast lots for you here before the LORD our God" (v. 6). So, there was still a further allocation of land remaining. This indicates clearly that two separate castings of lots had to take place. The first was tribal. The second applied to clans or smaller family units. We are not told how the surveyors knew precisely which land belonged to which tribe, nor are we told if there had been, or would be, a demographics-based reallocation after the tribal lots were cast (Abravanel). We are not told whether a postsurvey reallocation took place. What we are told is that there had been a previous casting of lots, as indicated by the complaint by the heirs of Joseph, as well as by the fact that the surveyors knew generally where their tribes' inheritances were. We also know that another casting of lots lay ahead.

Rashi argued that God would have decided where the lots fell, with

6. This indicates that Ephraim and half the tribe of Manasseh had been successful in removing the Canaanites. The text says "their coasts" not "his coast" with respect to the tribe of Joseph.

7. This indicates that the Israelites had learned in Egypt how to survey. The highly sophisticated skills of the Egyptians in this regard are rarely noted in textbooks. See the appendix by Livio Stecchini in Peter Tompkins, Secrets of the Great Pyramid (New York: Harper & Row, 1974).

large tribes receiving large inheritances. His view is theologically conceivable, though not very plausible. (Why had Moses brought up the family size issue if God would decide all this?) Nachmanides argued that the tribal plots were equal. Abravanel argued that only the tribal regions were determined by lot.

Nachmanides' position has to be rejected, at least with respect to family plots. His approach assumed tribal plots of equal size and allocated by lot, with family plots that varied in size in terms of family size. But why would there have to be an additional round of lot-casting? If the clan or family allocations were based strictly on need, what role did lot-casting play? With respect to family plots, we are left with some variation of Abravanel's approach: lot-casting to determine general location, plus a subsequent reallocation in terms of family size.

This still does not answer the question: Were the tribal allocations equal in size? Ethically speaking, if it was proper to reallocate land for families after the lots had been cast, then there seems nothing wrong with applying this principle to tribes. This does not mean that this was done.

We are not told whether tribal territorial units were equal in area. We are told that family units were unequal. Joshua's comment indicates that lot-casting in some way applied to the secondary, intra-tribal allocations. What, then, is meant by Numbers 33:54? "And ye shall divide the land by lot for an inheritance among your families: and to the more ye shall give the more inheritance, and to the fewer ye shall give the less inheritance: every man's inheritance shall be in the place where his lot falleth; according to the tribes of your fathers ye shall inherit." The principle seems to be that demographic considerations apply to families. A general allocation principle governed family inheritance: "to the more ye shall give the more inheritance, and to the fewer ye shall give the less inheritance." I conclude that this principle applied to the tribal territories, too. I side with Abravanel, though with this modification: the dual lot-demographics allocation system applied to tribes and families alike, not just to tribes.

How could this allocation system have applied to the Levites? Levi received a portion of the land: 48 walled cities (Num. 35:7), plus suburbs around them for their cattle (Num. 35:4). The height of each of these suburbs was fixed: 2,000 cubits (3,000 feet). "And ye shall measure from without the city on the east side two thousand cubits, and on the south side two thousand cubits, and on the west side two thousand cubits, and on the north side two thousand cubits and the city shall be in the midst: this shall be to them the suburbs of the cities” (Num. 35:5). The diagram suggests one way that this might have been laid out.⁸

The size of each city would have been different. The area of a plot with a 2,000-foot side of a city wall would have been larger than a plot with a 1,500-foot side. Thus, the size of the Levites' combined plots would have been different, city by city.

We are not told how each Levitical family was assigned residence in a particular city, but lot-casting would have been an obvious means. The cities, like the tribal plots (if either Rashi or Abravanel was correct, and Nachmanides was wrong), varied in size. Once assigned to a city, a family would have received its plot by lot, but the principle of family size would probably have governed the final allocation.

Conclusion

The second Numbers mustering of Israel was preliminary to the conquest of Canaan. Tribal families were named because they would soon become the recipients of the post-conquest distribution of land. The tribes may have received equal portions of land, but probably there were post-lot reallocations based on the land's productivity and the size of the tribes. This surely was the system governing families.

8. C. J. Ellicott, Numbers (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan, 1961 reprint), p. 214.

The tribes had to fight the Canaanites before receiving their land. Even Reuben, Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh, who had received their inheritance on the far side of the Jordan (Num. 34:14), would not inherit until they and the other tribes had conquered Canaan (Num. 32). Ephraim and half the tribe of Manasseh had to fight in order to claim a two-plot inheritance. There could be no final allocation of the spoils until all the land was conquered. God would reward each tribe according to His good pleasure.

Joshua administered the casting of lots that governed family allocations (Josh. 18:6). He probably left to tribal leaders the final reallocation based on family size and need. There was an equity consideration here: the number of mouths to feed. There was also a military input consideration: the number of warriors provided by each tribal family. It seems unreasonable that a tribe that had contributed large numbers of warriors received an equal share of the spoils. This would have penalized the warriors of the larger tribes: smaller plots, on average. A large family in a small tribe might have received more land than a large family in a large tribe if all tribal territories were equal. This would have constituted an economic penalty on large tribes. Joshua's answer to the heirs of Joseph indicates that the more that a tribe contributed to the victory, the more land it deserved in the post-conquest allocation.

The distribution of family plots was by lot and by post-lot reallocation on the basis of family size. It seems likely that this same system governed the allocation of tribal territory. The lot determined the general region of one's inheritance: tribal territory and family plots. The question of need in relation to population governed the family allocation procedure and probably governed the tribal.

15

BLOODLINE INHERITANCE

And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, The daughters of Zelophehad speak right: thou shalt surely give them a possession of an inheritance among their father's brethren; and thou shalt cause the inheritance of their father to pass unto them. And thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel, saying, If man die, and have no son, then ye shall cause his inheritance to pass unto his daughter. And if he have no daughter, then ye shall give his inheritance unto his brethren. And if he have no brethren, then ye shall give his inheritance unto his father's brethren. And if his father have no brethren, then ye shall give his inheritance unto his kinsman that is next to him of his family, and he shall possess it: and it shall be unto the children of Israel a statute of judgment, as the LORD commanded Moses (Num. 27:6–11).

The theocentric focus of this law is ownership: God was the primary owner of the Promised Land. He would soon delegate to Israelite families the inter-generational secondary ownership of certain plots of land. These families were to serve as stewards in the administration of God's land.

Stewardship is a hierarchical function: point two of the biblical covenant model. The steward is a legal representative of the owner. The steward must apply the owner's principles of administration (point three) to the assets entrusted to him. Stewardship also involves sanctions: profit and loss. If he fails, he will be placed under negative sanctions by the owner. Jesus' parable of the talents is the New Testament summary of this arrangement (Matt. 25:14–30).

Milgrom argues that the case of the daughters of Zelophehad marks off a separate section of the Book of Numbers. The first encounter opens the new section (Num. 27); the second encounter closes it (Num. 36). The chapters that follow the second Numbers mustering (Num. 26) differ sharply with the preceding ones. The earlier chapters display the murmurings of the exodus generation; the second section displays the faithfulness of the conquest generation.¹

Five daughters of Zelophehad came to Moses with a problem. They had no brothers. Their father had died. They asked a question: "Why should the name of our father be done away from among his family, because he hath no son? Give unto us therefore a possession among the brethren of our father" (v. 4). The judicial issue here was a man's name. The economic issue was inheritance. A righteous man's name was supposed to be preserved in Israel. His inheritance in the land was proof of his righteous status. The daughters were careful to identify their father as having been in the company of the saints: "Our father died in the wilderness, and he was not in the company of them that gathered themselves together against the LORD in the company of Korah; but died in his own sin, and had no sons" (v. 3).

Korah's name had become tainted. His family had forfeited his goods: "And the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up, and their houses, and all the men that appertained unto Korah, and all their goods" (Num. 16:32). But his sons must have broken with the sin of their father, for they survived the judgment: "And the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up together with Korah, when that company died, what time the fire devoured two hundred and fifty men: and they became a sign. Notwithstanding the children of Korah died not" (Num. 26:10–11). They remained active priests. "And Shallum the son of Kore, the son of Ebiasaph, the son of Korah, and his brethren, of the house of his father, the Korahites, were over the work of the service, keepers of the gates of the tabernacle: and their fathers, being over the host of the LORD, were keepers of the entry" (I Chron. 9:19). Zelophehad's daughters seemed to be arguing that if Korah's evil name had not passed to his sons, who retained a priestly inheritance, how much more should five daughters of a righteous man have an inheritance in the land.

1. Jacob Milgrom, The JPS Torah Commentary: Numbers (New York: Jewish Publication Society, 1990), p. xiii.

A. Preservation of the Seed

This inheritance law was an aspect of the seed laws of Israel. The messianic promise set forth by Jacob was that Judah would bear the sword in Israel until Shiloh came (Gen. 49:10). The tribes had to be kept separate until the fulfillment of this prophecy. The seed laws and inheritance laws were an aspect of this separation. I wrote in the Conclusion of Leviticus:

Land laws and seed laws were laws associated with God's covenantal promises to Abraham regarding his offspring (Gen. 15–17). There was a chronological boundary subsequently placed on the seed laws: Jacob's prophecy and promise. "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be" (Gen. 49:10). After Shiloh came, Jacob said, the scepter would depart from Judah. The unified concept of scepter and lawgiver pointed to the civil covenant: physical sanctions and law. Jacob prophesied that the lawful enforcement of the civil covenant would eventually pass to another ruler: Shiloh, the Messiah.

The Levitical land laws were tied covenantally to the Abrahamic promise regarding a place of residence for the Israelites (Gen. 15:13–16). These land laws were also tied to the Abrahamic promise of the seed. "In the same day the LORD made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates" (Gen. 15:18). The mark of those included under the boundaries of these seed laws was the covenantal sign of circumcision (Gen. 17:9–14). Circumcision established a personal covenantal boundary. There were also family and tribal boundaries tied to the laws of inheritance. The ultimate inheritance law was above all a land law: the jubilee law (Lev. 25).²

In Numbers 36, the case of the daughters of Zelophehad reappeared. Given two facts—the jubilee law and the judicial status of a wife as an adoptee into her husband's family and tribe—the daughters' land would pass into the tribes of their husbands if they inherited land and then married men who were outside their tribe (Num. 36:3). This would have created a parcel of one tribe's land within the boundaries of another tribe. Moses then announced a modification of the jubilee law: "This is the thing which the LORD doth command concerning the daughters of Zelophehad, saying, Let them marry to whom they think best; only to the family of the tribe of their father shall they marry. So shall not the inheritance of the children of Israel remove from tribe to tribe: for everyone of the children of Israel shall keep himself to the inheritance of the tribe of his fathers" (vv. 6–7). The landed inheritance was tied more to the tribe than to the family. Upon marrying into another tribe, a daughter surrendered her inheritance to her sisters. Each tribe had a legal claim to the land within its borders. This claim was exercised through judicial representatives: families. Each family was under the jurisdiction of its tribe. It gained its lawful authority over its land through the tribe.

2. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), pp. 637–38.

This modification of the jubilee land inheritance law was designed to keep the tribes geographically separated. This prevented any tribe from becoming dominant outside its own sphere of geographical authority. Loyalty would be to the tribe, region by region. This tribal decentralization would restrain the development of nationalism except as an aspect of Israel's priesthood. Even a king would be restricted from amassing rural land and houses for his heirs. For all the evil that Ahab did, it was his theft of Naboth's vineyard that brought God's final sanction against him. God told Elijah: "And thou shalt speak unto him, saying, Thus saith the LORD, Hast thou killed, and also taken possession? And thou shalt speak unto him, saying, Thus saith the LORD, In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth shall dogs lick thy blood, even thine" (I Ki. 21:19).³

The land inheritance law elevated family name over economic productivity, love, or power. The land owner could not disinherit his family by selling his rural inheritance to the highest bidder. The tribal name was elevated over family name. To preserve each family's name in a specific tribe, and to preserve the numerical strength of each tribe, God established a land inheritance system for rural property that subsidized the heirs of the conquest generation.

B. Old Covenant Inheritance-Disinheritance

There was covenantal disinheritance in Israel: civil, ecclesiastical, or familial. A father was not allowed unilaterally to disinherit just one son. A father had to follow strict rules of inheritance. "If a man have two wives, one beloved, and another hated, and they have born him

3. This was fulfilled in 1 Kings 22:38. For Jezebel, who had planned the evil act (I Ki. 21:5–9), it would be worse: the dogs would actually eat her. "And of Jezebel also spake the LORD, saying, The dogs shall eat Jezebel by the wall of Jezebel" (I Kings 21:23). This was fulfilled in II Kings 9:35.

children, both the beloved and the hated; and if the firstborn son be hers that was hated: Then it shall be, when he maketh his sons to inherit that which he hath, that he may not make the son of the beloved firstborn before the son of the hated, which is indeed the firstborn: But he shall acknowledge the son of the hated for the firstborn, by giving him a double portion of all that he hath: for he is the beginning of his strength; the right of the firstborn is his" (Deut. 21:15–17).⁴

The eldest son received a double portion. The question is: Why? There are two reasons: judicial and economic. Judicially, the eldest son was the first son to bear his father's name. He was a testimony from God to the man that God had decided to bless the man's name in Israel. The son would have a place in the national covenant in the next generation. He would rule over his brothers until they departed from the family's land. Isaac blessed Jacob, thinking that Jacob was Esau, his firstborn: "Let people serve thee, and nations bow down to thee: be lord over thy brethren, and let thy mother's sons bow down to thee: cursed be everyone that curseth thee, and blessed be he that blesseth thee" (Gen. 27:29). This was a matter of judicial authority. The firstborn normally replaced his father's rule over the family. Second, economic: with greater blessings come greater responsibilities. This is a basic biblical principle of personal responsibility. The eldest son presumably had to bear the primary responsibility in supporting his feeble parents in their old age. The Bible does not say this explicitly; it is a conclusion based on the fact of the double portion. This conclusion is consistent with the principle announced by Christ: "For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more" (Luke 12:48b).

The only way that a man could unilaterally disinherit a son was to disinherit all of his children: to cut off his family's name in the tribe. He could do this by pledging his land to a priest and then breaking the pledge by remaining in control of the land and its income. At the jubilee, the land went to the priest if the man failed to redeem the land from the priest (Lev. 27:19–21).⁵ This was the only way that a priest could become a land owner in rural Israel. It was also the only time that a tribe forfeited its legal claim over rural land, and then only to a member of the one tribe that was scattered throughout the nation and had no tribal landed inheritance. This tribe's authority was not dependent on its possession of rural land, nor would its sporadic inheritance of scattered plots provide it with a means of extending its influence. Its national influence was tied to its very inability to extend power through the accumulation of land. So was its financing: the tithe.

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012).

5. North, Boundaries and Dominion, pp. 608–11.

Geographically, disinherited sons were cut off from their tribe. They could reside in a city or rent land in the country, but the family's name ceased to be a permanent legacy in the tribe except by adoption into a city. The elders of a city could reverse any son's loss of tribal connection, but they could not reclaim his forfeited land. That had passed permanently to a priest.

How could just one evil son be disinherited under the Mosaic Covenant? First, by civil execution. "If a man have a stubborn and rebellious son, which will not obey the voice of his father, or the voice of his mother, and that, when they have chastened him, will not hearken unto them: Then shall his father and his mother lay hold on him, and bring him out unto the elders of his city, and unto the gate of his place; And they shall say unto the elders of his city, This our son is stubborn and rebellious, he will not obey our voice; he is a glutton, and a drunkard. And all the men of his city shall stone him with stones, that he die: so shalt thou put evil away from among you; and all Israel shall hear, and fear" (Deut. 21:18–21). Second, by ecclesiastical excommunication. If a priest excommunicated a man, he could not inherit from his father.⁶ He was "cut off from his people." In both cases, the father could not unilaterally disinherit just one son. Either the elders or a priest would have to take formal action to validate the disinheritance.

C. New Covenant Inheritance-Disinheritance

With the transfer of the kingdom from Israel to the church (Matt. 21:43), the laws of inheritance were transformed. With a new priesthood came a new legal order. This biblical principle of judicial transformation was announced by the author of the epistle to the Hebrews: "For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law. For he of whom these things are spoken pertaineth to another tribe, of which no man gave attendance at the altar. For it is evident that our Lord sprang out of Juda; of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood. And it is yet far more evident: for that after the similitude of Melchisedec there ariseth another priest, Who is made, not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life. For he testifieth, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec" (Heb. 7:12–17). The Mosaic land inheritance laws ceased with the advent of the new priesthood. There was no longer any need to keep the tribes geographically separate. The church recognized this, of course, but so did the Jews. After the fall of Jerusalem and the burning of the temple, Judaism replaced the Old Covenant religion. Judaism is not the religion of Old Covenant Israel, a fact that Jews who are familiar with their tradition readily admit.⁷

6. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Pt. 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 54:E:1.

In Mosaic Israel, a father could not unilaterally disinherit his son; under New Covenant law, he is allowed to. This transfers economic authority to the father. The threat of economic disinheritance is a hammer that he holds over wayward children. He is not compelled by New Covenant law to subsidize evil. He was not compelled by law to subsidize evil under the Mosaic law, but his authority to make this assessment was shared with civil or ecclesiastical authorities.

The law of the double inheritance of the eldest son no longer binds anyone biblically. Younger sons no longer are expected to reside on the land of their fathers under the authority of the eldest brother. This is why the law of the levirate marriage no longer applies: an unmarried brother who lives on his father's land with his brother is no longer required to marry his dead brother's widow if he died without children (Deut. 25:5–6). Neither land ownership nor family name confers covenantal status in the New Covenant. There are no tribes, so inheritance has nothing to do with tribal boundaries. A family's name in Israel is no longer judicially relevant. When Shiloh came, any prophetic function of a family's name ceased. Through adoption into God's family, His name alone remains covenantally relevant (John 1:12; Eph. 1:5). Daughters receive the covenant sign of baptism as a binding judicial mark of this adoption; they can lawfully inherit with sons.

A father is allowed to establish other systems of hierarchical authority over the family's inheritance: trustees, general partners, and so forth. He is allowed to choose the best person for the job of administering the family's assets. Ethics and competence count for more than family name. Any attempt to elevate family name above Christian confession is cultic. Biblical familism was relevant only with respect to the prophecies regarding the coming Messiah. Biblical familism under the

7. Jacob Neusner, Judaism and Scripture: The Evidence of Leviticus Rabbah (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986), Preface.

Mosaic law was tied to the tribes. When tribal authority disappeared with the fall of Jerusalem, so did biblical familism. Any attempt to revive familism in the name of Old Covenant law is therefore cultic. This is seen most clearly in the British Israelite movement, which self-consciously ties familism to tribalism. Familism is a traditional alternative to covenantalism, especially in politically conservative circles.⁸ Jesus warned against familism in no uncertain terms: “For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter in law against her mother in law. And a man’s foes shall be they of his own household. He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me: and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me” (Matt. 10:35–37). He never said anything so harsh as this against the state.

New Covenant biblical inheritance and disinheritance rest on formal confession and ethics. The true son is the son who confesses and then obeys God the Father by conforming himself to God’s Son, Jesus Christ. He is entitled to a double portion or more if his brothers and sisters are less faithful than he is. The New Covenant goal is to build up the kingdom of God in history by multiplying the inheritance over time. “And everyone that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my name’s sake, shall receive an hundredfold, and shall inherit everlasting life” (Matt. 19:29).⁹ Entry into the family of God is established by confession, as manifested in baptism: a self-maledictory oath taken under God, which incorporates a person into God’s family. Family membership is maintained by outward obedience to God’s moral law and by regular covenant renewal, as manifested in the sacrament of the Lord’s Supper. The New Covenant’s extension of family inheritance in history has visibly shifted from tribalism to confessionalism. Shiloh has come.

Conclusion

Bloodline inheritance had a political function in pre-exilic Mosaic Israel: the separation of families within the tribes and also of tribes within the nation. This was to insure that no family or tribe was able to centralize power or wealth by means of land purchases. The jubilee law returned a family’s rural land to the heirs of the conquest generation. Tribal decentralization preserved liberty in Mosaic Israel prior to the exile. After the exile, those who returned to Israel were a handful compared to the numbers that inherited at the time of the conquest. Israel became a captive nation. National preservation, not decentralization, became the primary political goal. This became a priestly function rather than a tribal function.

8. Gary North, Baptized Patriarchalism: The Cult of the Family (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994). (<http://bit.ly/gnbap>)

9. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 39.

After the exile, the land inheritance law changed. Inheritance was still governed by the jubilee, but this was to include pagans who resided in the land at the time of Israel's return. "Thus saith the Lord GOD; This shall be the border, whereby ye shall inherit the land according to the twelve tribes of Israel: Joseph shall have two portions. And ye shall inherit it, one as well as another: concerning the which I lifted up mine hand to give it unto your fathers: and this land shall fall unto you for inheritance" (Ezek. 47:13–14). "So shall ye divide this land unto you according to the tribes of Israel. And it shall come to pass, that ye shall divide it by lot for an inheritance unto you, and to the strangers that sojourn among you, which shall beget children among you: and they shall be unto you as born in the country among the children of Israel; they shall have inheritance with you among the tribes of Israel. And it shall come to pass, that in what tribe the stranger sojourneth, there shall ye give him his inheritance, saith the Lord GOD" (Ezek. 47:21–23).¹⁰ If the jubilee was actually honored, which we do not know, it was to be honored in a new way. Gentiles were to be given access to the land. Genocide was no longer part of the Old Covenant order. This post-exilic law was to serve as a herald of a New Covenant order to come, where Jews and gentiles would inherit the kingdom together in terms of confession and ethics, not blood.

10. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 20120, ch. 22.

16

OATH AND SANCTIONS

If a man vow a vow unto the LORD, or swear an oath to bind his soul with a bond; he shall not break his word, he shall do according to all that proceedeth out of his mouth (Num. 30:2).

The theocentric focus is the covenant oath. The oath constitutes point four of the biblical covenant model: oath/sanctions.¹ Oath and sanctions are linked judicially. A covenantal oath is a self-maledictory oath. It formally invokes God's negative sanctions in advance, should the oath-taker not perform the details of his oath. Without the threat of God's negative sanctions, there is no valid covenantal oath. Putting this another way, where it is not valid to invoke such sanctions, a biblical oath is not valid. Putting it even more specifically, a self-maledictory oath is valid only when sworn under the judicial authority of an institution that has been authorized by God to impose or accept such an oath. There are three such institutions: church, family, and state. This is the reason why secret societies misuse the power of the oath when they impose initiatory oaths of secrecy that invoke negative sanctions. Such oaths are not valid, nor are the unsanctioned institutions that require such oaths of their members. Those who have bound themselves by such an oath are formally part of a covenantal order that seeks to replace God's kingdom.

A biblical oath is made to God. It may be made to God directly, such as a promise to obey Him, or through the authority of others who have been designated by God as His covenantal agents. The oath is secured by taking it officially under the authority and sanctions of God. This authority must not be invoked haphazardly. God's name is not to be misused. It is not some sort of universal judicial seal for every conceivable personal promise. It is limited to those uses and those institutions that God has authorized. "Thou shalt not take the name of the LORD thy God in vain; for the LORD will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain" (Ex. 20:7).²

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

A. Laws Governing Biblical Oaths

The Mosaic laws governing vows to God were rigorous. The man who made a personal vow to God could do so in private. The vow's details were between him and God. In contrast, the person who made a vow to a covenantal institution did so in some public ceremony. His oath was a matter of public record. God noted it; other men noted it. This oath was enforceable by the institution administering it. It was a vow which proceeded out of a person's mouth. A mute person presumably wrote down the details of his oath if he could write. If he could not write, he must have made some other visible response to specific questions.

1. A Woman's Vow

Most of chapter 30 deals with vows made by women. The Mosaic law allowed women to make vows, but with the exception of the widow or the unmarried daughter of a deceased man, her vows did not become valid if vetoed by the head of her household: either her husband or her father. A woman was under masculine authority, and this authority had the right to annul her vow. God did not recognize as judicially binding the unilateral vow of a woman who was under masculine authority.

If a woman also vow a vow unto the LORD, and bind herself by a bond, being in her father's house in her youth; And her father hear her vow, and her bond wherewith she hath bound her soul, and her father shall hold his peace at her: then all her vows shall stand, and every bond wherewith she hath bound her soul shall stand. But if her father disallow her in the day that he heareth; not any of her vows, or of her bonds wherewith she hath bound her soul, shall stand: and the LORD shall forgive her, because her father disallowed her. And if she had at all an husband, when she vowed, or uttered ought out of her lips, wherewith she bound her soul; And her husband heard it, and held his peace at her in the day that he heard it: then her vows shall stand, and her bonds wherewith she bound her soul shall stand.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Pt. 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 23.

But if her husband disallowed her on the day that he heard it; then he shall make her vow which she vowed, and that which she uttered with her lips, wherewith she bound her soul, of none effect: and the LORD shall forgive her. But every vow of a widow, and of her that is divorced, wherewith they have bound their souls, shall stand against her. And if she vowed in her husband's house, or bound her soul by a bond with an oath; And her husband heard it, and held his peace at her, and disallowed her not: then all her vows shall stand, and every bond wherewith she bound her soul shall stand. But if her husband hath utterly made them void on the day he heard them; then whatsoever proceeded out of her lips concerning her vows, or concerning the bond of her soul, shall not stand: her husband hath made them void; and the LORD shall forgive her. Every vow, and every binding oath to afflict the soul, her husband may establish it, or her husband may make it void. But if her husband altogether hold his peace at her from day to day; then he establisheth all her vows, or all her bonds, which are upon her: he confirmeth them, because he held his peace at her in the day that he heard them. But if he shall any ways make them void after that he hath heard them; then he shall bear her iniquity. These are the statutes, which the LORD commanded Moses, between a man and his wife, between the father and his daughter, being yet in her youth in her father's house (Num. 30:3–16).

The head of the household had to be informed of the woman's vow in order for it to become operational. The vow did not become binding until one day after he heard it and allowed it to stand. The head of household exercised veto power. As a legal intermediary between God and a woman, the male head of the household bore the responsibility of authorizing her vow. This was the judicial issue. The economic issue was that the resources required for her to fulfill her vow would come out of the family's resource base. For every minute that it cost her to fulfill her vow, that minute could not be allocated to assisting her husband, which was her assigned task as a wife or daughter. The head of the household would have to estimate in advance whether this additional cost was too high.

The fact that a widow's vow required no further authorization indicates that a vow was an act of the head of a household. The widow did not have an intermediary. With her marriage, she had substituted a new head of household for her father. With the death of her husband, she was elevated to his office as household head. This office possessed God-given authority independent of the gender of the holder. Her vow before God required no intermediary to confirm it. Judicially, her word was binding; economically, she had to make the authoritative estimate regarding the family cost of fulfilling it.

Except for a widow, a woman was represented judicially by a man. The representative had to validate the oath of the person represented. Presumably, such an arrangement also extended to male children under age 20. A young man could take an oath, but it had to be confirmed. The hierarchical nature of covenantal representation governed the invocation of oaths.

2. New Testament Alterations

Has this masculine-dominant hierarchical structure changed in the New Testament? Regarding the ecclesiastical oath, there has been a fundamental change. Baptism is a covenant oath-sign.³ Females are baptized. They are allowed to take an oath of allegiance to God through membership in His church without asking permission from their husbands or fathers. In fact, they are required to make such a covenant in defiance of this authority. “Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter in law against her mother in law. And a man’s foes shall be they of his own household. He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me: and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me” (Matt. 10:34–37).

Has a woman’s access to baptism changed anything in family authority? The New Testament does not indicate any major change in the family, other than the elimination of the Mosaic law’s easy divorce (Deut. 24:1; Matt. 5:31–32⁴). The husband is still the head of his household (I Tim. 3). Yet the story of Jael indicates that a wife could lawfully break the vow of her husband when his vow was illegitimate. Her husband had sworn peace with Sisera (Judg. 4:17). She killed Sisera anyway. She did this under the general authority of Deborah, who was a national judge in Israel and under whose leadership the Israelite army was bringing sanctions against Sisera. Jael did not violate her husband’s oath on her own authority; she did so under a superior covenantal civil authority. She respected the civil hierarchy by disobeying a subordinate hierarchy. Her rebellion against her husband was part of

3. Meredith G. Kline, By Oath Consigned: A Reinterpretation of the Covenant Signs of Circumcision and Baptism (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1968), ch. 5.

4. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), Appendix A:D.

Israel's rebellion against Sisera, and is so celebrated in Deborah's song. She was promoted in honor among women. "Blessed above women shall Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite be, blessed shall she be above women in the tent" (Judg. 5:24).

3. The Civil Oath

In the area of civil government, women are not under any biblical restrictions regarding oath-taking. They may lawfully become citizens; they may swear and then testify in a court of law. They may also vote: the imposition of judicial sanctions, a form of covenant renewal. What was an historically unique case with Deborah became common in the twentieth century: female judgeship. In no area of life has there been a more fundamental break with classical civilization, where women had no role to play in civil government because they had no role to play in the rites of the city, which were the legal basis of citizenship. The legacy of Greece and Rome was one of exclusion of women from all things civil. Kitto wrote of Athens: "Women were not enfranchised: that is, they could not attend the Assembly, still less hold office. They could not own property: they could not conduct legal business: every female, from the day of her birth to the day of her death, had to be the ward, so to speak, of her nearest male relative or her husband, and only through him did she enjoy any legal protection."⁵ Women in the late Roman Republic were far more emancipated socially than their Athenian predecessors had been,⁶ but they could not vote.⁷ They could not appear in court as witnesses.⁸ They were not even answerable to the state; their families alone had the right to judge them.⁹ "Among the ancients," writes Fustel, "and especially at Rome, the idea of law was inseparably connected with certain sacramental words. . . . [W]hat placed a man under obligation in the ancient law was not conscience, or the sentiment of justice; it was the sacred formula."¹⁰ Women, not having access to the religious rites of the city, could not lawfully invoke this formula.

5. H. D. F. Kitto, The Greeks (Baltimore, Maryland: Penguin, 1951), p. 221.

6. F. R. Crowell, Cicero and the Roman Republic (Baltimore, Maryland: Penguin, [1948] 1964), pp. 280–82.

7. Ibid., p. 187.

8. Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955), Bk. II, Ch. VIII, p. 92.

9. Ibid., p. 93.

10. Ibid., III:XI, p. 191.

It took over three millennia for the Bible's principle of the oath-bound female judge to be honored on a widespread basis in society. Women in the West received the civil franchise in the years following the First World War (1914–18), the war that also ended kingship in the West. Kingship was allowed by the Mosaic Covenant (Deut. 17),¹¹ but it was a less preferred judicial order than rule by judges (I Sam. 8).¹² A female judge was in general preferable to a king under the Mosaic system, but it took the enormous social disruption of World War I for the West to acknowledge this politically by driving out its kings and giving women the vote. Bible-believing churches resisted this political development. Pagan suffragettes—freethinkers and Spiritualists¹³—and their masculine, liberal, and radical political allies first promoted it on a national level in England and the United States. The women's suffrage movement in the United States was secular.¹⁴ In the United States in the late nineteenth century, there was an alliance in the North and West between anti-liquor temperance societies, dominated by women and including Protestant evangelicals, and the women's suffrage movement, but the national leaders of the evangelical churches did not support women's right to vote. In the American South, the suggestion was resisted strongly.¹⁵

When the church and Christians refuse to extend God's kingdom principles in history, covenant-breakers may decide to do so. When they do, they will gain authority over the Christians for a time. God brings positive sanctions to those who uphold His law, even at the expense of His covenant people's authority. While covenant-breakers cannot indefinitely uphold God's law, since it testifies against them, during the period when they do uphold it, they gain external blessings.¹⁶

11. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press: [1999] 2012), ch. 42.

12. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 14.

13. Richard J. Carwardine, Evangelicals and Politics in Antebellum America (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1993), p. 32. He cited Anne Braude, Radical Spirits: Spiritualism and Women's Rights in Nineteenth-Century America (Boston: Beacon, 1989).

14. Eleanor Flexner, Century of Struggle: The Woman's Rights Movement in the United States, rev. ed. (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1975).

15. Robert Handy, A Christian America: Protestant Hopes and Historical Realities, 2nd ed. (w York: Oxford University Press, 1984), pp. 80–81.

16. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/gngrace>)

4. Paying Off a Vow

The payment of a vow could not be made out of a person's second-best capital, unlike a voluntary offering to which no promise was attached. "And whosoever offereth a sacrifice of peace offerings unto the LORD to accomplish his vow, or a freewill offering in beeves or sheep, it shall be perfect to be accepted; there shall be no blemish therein. Blind, or broken, or maimed, or having a wen, or scurvy, or scabbed, ye shall not offer these unto the LORD, nor make an offering by fire of them upon the altar unto the LORD. Either a bullock or a lamb that hath any thing superfluous or lacking in his parts, that mayest thou offer for a freewill offering; but for a vow it shall not be accepted" (Lev. 22:21–23). A person could lawfully give a priest an animal that was not suitable for the altar, but when it came to an animal to be sacrificed on the altar, its blemish-free condition was required.

This rule governed all vow payments. It extended back to the economic source of the asset: "Thou shalt not bring the hire of a whore, or the price of a dog, into the house of the LORD thy God for any vow: for even both these are abomination unto the LORD thy God" (Deut. 23:18). This is why prostitutes were not citizens of Israel. They had the legal status of uncircumcised strangers. They could not bring their tithes and offerings to God, so they could not be members of the church. This separated them from citizenship in the holy commonwealth. They could not serve as judges, as Deborah did. But they were not threatened with civil sanctions so long as they did not consort with married men, and so long as they were not daughters of a priest.¹⁷ Polluting a priest's household brought pollution into God's presence. This was a sacred boundary violation: profaning the temple. This violation of household authority was a capital crime. "And the daughter of any priest, if she profane herself by playing the whore, she profaneth her father: she shall be burnt with fire" (Lev. 21 :9). Her harlotry put the nation at risk of God's negative sanctions.

B. Voluntary but Irrevocable

"When thou shalt vow a vow unto the LORD thy God, thou shalt not slack to pay it: for the LORD thy God will surely require it of thee; and it would be sin in thee. But if thou shalt forbear to vow, it shall be no sin in thee. That which is gone out of thy lips thou shalt keep and perform; even a freewill offering, according as thou hast vowed unto the LORD thy God, which thou hast promised with thy mouth" (Deut. 23:21–23). A personal vow is not required by God, although in order to gain lawful access to judicial authority in church, family, and state, a vow is required. When a person swears a vow to God, or to other men who are allowed by God to accept such a vow, he must fulfill the terms of his vow. God does not hold him guiltless who breaks his vow. God also does not relegate to second-class status a person who does not swear a vow.

17. A non-virgin who married a man without informing him of her status risked stoning as a whore (Deut. 22:21).

A publicly sworn vow had to be paid publicly. "I will pay my vows unto the LORD now in the presence of all his people" (Ps. 116:14). So vowed David. This is especially true for men who hold public office. They must set a judicial example, as David understood. He repeated this vow four verses later. His son Solomon also understood the importance of adhering to the vow's stipulations: "When thou vowest a vow unto God, defer not to pay it; for he hath no pleasure in fools: pay that which thou hast vowed. Better is it that thou shouldest not vow, than that thou shouldest vow and not pay. Suffer not thy mouth to cause thy flesh to sin; neither say thou before the angel, that it was an error: wherefore should God be angry at thy voice, and destroy the work of thine hands?" (Eccl. 5:4–6).¹⁸

Why take a vow? One reason is to ask for positive sanctions from God. "And Jacob rose up early in the morning, and took the stone that he had put for his pillows, and set it up for a pillar, and poured oil upon the top of it. And he called the name of that place Bethel: but the name of that city was called Luz at the first. And Jacob vowed a vow, saying, If God will be with me, and will keep me in this way that I go, and will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on, So that I come again to my father's house in peace; then shall the LORD be my God: And this stone, which I have set for a pillar, shall be God's house: and of all that thou shalt give me I will surely give the tenth unto thee" (Gen. 28:18–22).¹⁹ This act of dedication invoked God's name, and God later identified Himself to Jacob by referring back to this event: "I am the God of Bethel, where thou anointedst the pillar, and where thou vowedst a vow unto me: now arise, get thee out from this land, and return unto the land of thy kindred" (Gen. 31:13).

18. Gary North, Autonomy and Stagnation: An Economic Commentary on Ecclesiastes (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 16.

19. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 29.

The vow could be corporate as well as personal: “And when king Arad the Canaanite, which dwelt in the south, heard tell that Israel came by the way of the spies; then he fought against Israel, and took some of them prisoners. And Israel vowed a vow unto the LORD, and said, If thou wilt indeed deliver this people into my hand, then I will utterly destroy their cities. And the LORD hearkened to the voice of Israel, and delivered up the Canaanites; and they utterly destroyed them and their cities: and he called the name of the place Hormah” (Num. 21:1–3).

A vow that called down God’s positive sanctions in exchange for the payment of a future vow is easy to understand. God was expected to pay in advance. If He did not deliver what the vow-taker had asked for, the oath was not inaugurated. But the vow-taker could show thanks to God, and devotion to God, by taking a vow after a deliverance by God. The crew of the boat on which Jonah was travelling made such a post-deliverance vow: “Wherefore they cried unto the LORD, and said, We beseech thee, O LORD, we beseech thee, let us not perish for this man’s life, and lay not upon us innocent blood: for thou, O LORD, hast done as it pleased thee. So they took up Jonah, and cast him forth into the sea: and the sea ceased from her raging. Then the men feared the LORD exceedingly, and offered a sacrifice unto the LORD, and made vows” (Jonah 1:14–16). These vows were made by men who were not formally covenanted to God—a biblical example of common grace in operation.

The stranger could lawfully invoke a vow. The priests were required to participate in the fulfillment of a vow that involved priestly activities. “Speak unto Aaron, and to his sons, and unto all the children of Israel, and say unto them, Whatsoever he be of the house of Israel, or of the strangers in Israel, that will offer his oblation for all his vows, and for all his freewill offerings, which they will offer unto the LORD for a burnt offering” (Lev. 22:18).

C. New Testament Oaths

Hierarchy is still part of every covenantal institution. Oaths are still valid. No covenant can be ratified apart from the invocation of the member’s oath. The oath is the required means for a person to establish a lawful judicial claim on the benefits—positive sanctions—of membership in the covenant institution. There has to be formal subordination to the covenant in order for the sanctions to become operative. There is nothing in the New Testament that indicates that an oath to join a church, establish a new family through marriage, or receive citizenship from a civil government are invalid. On the contrary, there can be no binding covenantal membership apart from such a oath. It is the oath that seals the covenant judicially. For example, the difference between fornication and marital sexual union is not physical; it is judicial. The presence of a judicially binding public oath differentiates the latter from the former.

The New Testament sometimes seems to be hostile to oaths, but the context of these passages indicates that public oaths of covenant ratification and renewal were not an issue. Oaths invoked in noncovenantal relationships were the issue. Jesus said:

Again, ye have heard that it hath been said by them of old time, Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths: But I say unto you, Swear not at all; neither by heaven; for it is God's throne: Nor by the earth; for it is his footstool: neither by Jerusalem; for it is the city of the great King. Neither shalt thou swear by thy head, because thou canst not make one hair white or black. But let your communication be, Yea, yea; Nay, nay: for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil (Matt. 5:33–37).

Jesus referred here to a traditional practice of publicly promising to perform some act and covering his promise with the veneer of additional authority invoking supernatural authority. This practice was never valid. There are lawful public oaths taken to covenantal institutions; there are lawful private oaths to God; but there are never private oaths to other men that are lawfully invoked by an appeal to God or the supernatural. A person who seeks to establish a unique degree of authority for his promise to another person by invoking supernatural hierarchy and supernatural negative sanctions is misusing the oath. He is covering his personal testimony with the aura of covenantal authority. This is a violation of the commandment not to take God's name in vain. It is a boundary violation: profanation.²⁰ The New Testament Greek word for oath is horkos: fence.²¹

There was an example of such an oath in the persecution of Paul by a group of Jewish fanatics. "Then the chief captain took him by the hand, and went with him aside privately, and asked him, What is that

20. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 6.

21. The third commandment relates to boundaries: point three of the biblical covenant model. It parallels the eighth commandment, which prohibits theft.

thou hast to tell me? And he said, The Jews have agreed to desire thee that thou wouldest bring down Paul to morrow into the council, as though they would enquire somewhat of him more perfectly. But do not thou yield unto them: for there lie in wait for him of them more than forty men, which have bound themselves with an oath, that they will neither eat nor drink till they have killed him: and now are they ready, looking for a promise from thee" (Acts 23:19–21). The Greek word for "oath" in this case meant anathematizing, i.e., self-maledictory. It was an invalid oath, and those who took it either broke it or starved themselves to death. They did not kill Paul.

The Christian's word is so bounded by authority that his words should be trusted apart from any invocation of supernatural hierarchy. The Pharisees did this on a regular basis. They also adopted peculiar rules regarding what words constituted a valid invocation.

Woe unto you, ye blind guides, which say, Whosoever shall swear by the temple, it is nothing; but whosoever shall swear by the gold of the temple, he is a debtor! Ye fools and blind: for whether is greater, the gold, or the temple that sanctifieth the gold? And, Whosoever shall swear by the altar, it is nothing; but whosoever sweareth by the gift that is upon it, he is guilty. Ye fools and blind: for whether is greater, the gift, or the altar that sanctifieth the gift? Whoso therefore shall swear by the altar, sweareth by it, and by all things thereon. And whoso shall swear by the temple, sweareth by it, and by him that dwelleth therein. And he that shall swear by heaven, sweareth by the throne of God, and by him that sitteth thereon (Matt. 23:16–22).

Jesus challenged all such man-made rules. The word of a covenant-keeper should be simple and direct. There must be no verbal tricks, no counterfeit oaths subsequently declared null and void because of an imprecise formula. James repeated this warning: "But above all things, my brethren, swear not, neither by heaven, neither by the earth, neither by any other oath: but let your yea be yea; and your nay, nay; lest ye fall into condemnation" (James 5:12).

A covenant oath does not invoke surrogate phrases for heaven. It invokes God's name. This oath is a direct verbal appeal to God because it is taken under a unique institution that has been authorized by God to impose sanctions in His name: church, family, or state. This authority to impose God's sanctions in history is what identifies the institution as covenantal.

D. Social Contract Theory

Four biblical covenants—personal, ecclesiastical, familial, and civil—have served as models for other relationships and institutions. The corporate covenants linking God, man, and other men have been imitated by atheistic contracts. A contract is analogous to a covenant, but with God's name removed from the formal agreement. It does not invoke God's name or His sanctions in enforcing the agreement's stipulations.

1. From Covenant to Contract

The civil covenant under God has become a civil contract among men. There is no historical evidence that such an act of contracting ever took place. This historical event is completely hypothetical. This was well understood by Rousseau, whose Social Contract (1762) was preceded by his earlier study of the subject, his dissertation on inequality. In that essay, he wrote of the state of nature, the hypothetical pre-contractual judicial condition: "Let us begin then by laying facts aside, as they do not affect the question."²² Enlightenment political theory, both right wing (Whig) and left wing (Rousseau) operated on the assumption that this hypothetical social contract is the judicial foundation of civil government's assertion of a right to inflict violence in defense of civil law. The state created by this contract then becomes the enforcer of its implicit stipulations: natural law. There is no appeal beyond the state. Covenantalism under God becomes contractualism: a man-created, man-based social order.

The family covenant under God then becomes the marriage contract under the state. The justification of divorce becomes social: what is good for society as interpreted by the state. So does the justification for disciplining children. The family then comes under the jurisdiction of the state because God is no longer taken seriously as one of the participants in the arrangement. The state replaces God as the supreme sanctioning agent.

Economic contracts are also analogous to the covenant. The state becomes the ultimate guarantor of a contract's stipulations. The contract's participants agree to perform certain duties in exchange for money or other assets. The mutuality of the contract brings benefits to both signers. The state threatens negative sanctions for a violation of the contract, thereby increasing the likelihood of performance. Contractualism had been an aspect of Western political theory since the late Middle Ages.²³ The Scholasticism of Thomas Aquinas was the major source.²⁴ Contractualism was developed as a comprehensive social philosophy—not just for civil government but for society—by Enlightenment thinkers of the eighteenth century. The Scottish Enlightenment was decentralist, emphasizing the bonds of society before and more comprehensive than the state. The European Enlightenment tended to reverse this; its focus was statist, with the state as the organizing principle of society. The Scottish Enlightenment's outlook became the social philosophy of English Whiggism. Scottish Enlightenment political thought was a deistic version of seventeenth-century Scottish Presbyterianism's covenant theology: government as an appeals court system that intervenes when all other human governments and associations fail to settle a dispute. Continental Enlightenment political thought was a deistic version of the Jesuit order's hierarchy: civil government as centrally directed, highly disciplined social order. "Citizen" became for the French Revolutionaries what "brother" was for the Jesuits. (Among Communists a century later, "comrade" replaced "citizen.")

22. Rousseau, "A Dissertation on the Origin and Foundation of the Inequality of Mankind" (1754), in Jean Jacques Rousseau, The Social Contract and Discourses, Everyman's Library (New York: Dutton, [1913] 1966), p. 161.

Nineteenth-century English liberalism abandoned even the weak deistic elements of Whiggism.²⁵ Nothing substantive remained except the stipulations of the two contracts: private and civil. The sanctions upholding the stipulations of the contract were said to be exclusively secular. Nineteenth-century Continental liberalism also abandoned the doctrine of God. Anti clericalism became a new religion.²⁶

2. Darwinism and the State

Darwinism had a transforming impact on both Anglo-American and Continental social thought. In the two decades after the publication of The Origin of Species (1859), Darwinism was used by the disciples of Herbert Spencer to bolster the free market by asserting the legitimacy of unguided economic competition as the means of the sur-

23. Sir Ernest Barker, "Introduction," in Barker (ed.), Social Contract: Essays by Locke, Hume, and Rousseau (New York: Oxford University Press, 1962), p. vii.

24. Ibid., pp. viii–ix.

25. Owen Chadwick, The Secularization of the European Mind in the 19th Century (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1975), ch. 2.

26. Ibid., ch. 5.

vival of the fittest individuals and businesses. Over the next two decades, intellectual opinion shifted dramatically: Darwinism was increasingly used to support statism, in which state economic planning was invoked by Darwinists to defend the survival of the fittest society through scientific planning. Rather than viewing society as analogous to nature—red in tooth and claw—the new social Darwinism viewed society as analogous to a plant breeder’s greenhouse, with the scientific elite serving as the breeder. The directionless, anti-teleological free market was dismissed as anachronistic, even as a directionless, anti-teleological nature was also dismissed. Both were understood as having been superseded by planning, teleological man, meaning a scientific elite acting in the name of mankind. The primary theorist who announced this new social Darwinism was Lester Frank Ward.²⁷

Darwinism undermined Whiggism by undermining Newtonianism. Whiggism had been undergirded by a Newtonian view of the universe: mathematical and mechanical. Newton’s Unitarian god supposedly created it and sustained it. By 1850, such a god was no longer regarded as necessary to social theory, but the social fruits of that god’s authority still lingered: faith in the coherence of a social system established through a myriad of voluntary contracts. Society was believed to be the result of human action but not of human design—Scottish Enlightenment theorist Adam Ferguson’s worldview a century earlier.²⁸

The Newtonian worldview was essentially mechanical. In Newtonianism, mathematics rules the cosmos. To the extent that physics became the ideal model for men’s social theories, the quest for social order became the quest for the mathematically fixed laws of society.²⁹ Natural law was understood as governing historical processes, bringing order to these processes. This worldview collapsed under the weight of a reforming social Darwinism, which relied increasingly on the state as an agent of social change, scientific planning, and ethical action. In Europe, this new social outlook was called social democracy. In the United States, it was called Progressivism.

No better statement of the transformation can be found than liberal Presbyterian elder Woodrow Wilson’s 1908 book, Constitutional

27. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Appendix A:N.

28. F. A. Hayek, “The Results of Human Action but not of Human Design,” in Hayek, Studies in Philosophy, Politics and Economics (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1967), ch.6.

29. Louis I. Bredvold, Brave New World of the Enlightenment (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1961), ch. 2.

Government of the United States. In 1907, Wilson openly moved from laissez-faire Jeffersonianism to Progressivism. He was the president of Princeton University at the time. He wrote Constitutional Government as a thinly disguised fat campaign tract for the Democratic Party's 1908 nomination for the Presidency. The book was published in the year of the Presidential election. Fundamentalist Presbyterian elder and radical political populist William Jennings Bryan received the nomination for the third time; Wilson had to wait four more years to attain his goal. He was elected President in 1912 and again in 1916.

His book praised the Presidency as the central political office: head of the party. This was a self-conscious break from the U.S. Constitution's view of the office. The Constitution does not mention political parties, and the Framers had hated political factions in 1787. They also hated big government (Hamilton excepted). They inserted checks and balances into the Constitution in order to prevent the growth of a large central government. Wilson, having switched to Progressivism, had to undermine this older political faith. He turned to Darwin for the solution. The Framers had been Whigs because they had been Newtonians, he correctly argued. This Newtonian Whig worldview is incorrect, he insisted, and so is the Constitutional order that assumes it. "The government of the United States was constructed upon the Whig theory of political dynamics, which was a sort of unconscious copy of the Newtonian theory of the universe. In our own day, whenever we discuss the structure or development of anything, whether in nature or in society, we consciously or unconsciously follow Mr. Darwin; but before Mr. Darwin, they followed Newton. Some single law, like the law of gravitation, swung each system of thought and gave it its principle of unity."³⁰ This shift in outlook from Newtonianism to Darwinism in social theory was basic to the American Progressivism. It justified the creation of a planned economy.

The checks and balances built into the federal government by the Constitution had become a hindrance to effective political action, he said. This language of balances reflects mechanism. We need to overcome this mechanical way of thinking, Wilson insisted:

The trouble with the theory is that government is not a machine, but a living thing. It falls, not under the theory of the universe, but under the theory of organic life. It is accountable to Darwin, not to Newton.

30. Woodrow Wilson, The Constitutional Government of the United States (New York: Columbia University Press, [1908] 1961), pp. 54–55. (<http://bit.ly/WilsonCG>)

It is modified by its environment, necessitated by its tasks, shaped to its functions by the sheer pressure of life. No living thing can have its organs offset against each other as checks, and live. On the contrary, its life is dependent upon their quick cooperation, their ready response to the commands of instinct or intelligence, their amicable community of purpose. Government is not a body of blind forces; it is a body of men, with highly differentiated functions, no doubt, in our modern day of specialization, but with a common task and purpose. Their cooperation is indispensable, their warfare fatal. There can be no successful government without leadership or without the intimate, almost instinctive, coordination of the organs of life and action. This is not theory, but fact, and displays its force as fact, whatever theories may be thrown across its track. Living political constitutions must be Darwinian in structure and in practice.³¹

This was the Progressives' worldview: the state as a centralized agency of reform in which sufficient political power is concentrated to overcome the economic power of large corporations. The state becomes society's coordinator, analogous to the central nervous system-brain connection: organic.

3. Three Choices

The biblical view of society is neither mechanistic nor organic. It is covenantal. It is based on the binding nature of covenants established by oaths under God—oaths that invoke sanctions in history. Covenant theology is personalistic, for God created the universe and sustains it by His sovereign power. Covenant theology is also judicial. It insists on broad historical predictability in terms of Bible-revealed covenantal laws to which are attached corporate sanctions. It is the predictability of these corporate sanctions that make possible a distinctly Christian social theory. Without predictable corporate sanctions, there cannot be social theory. When Christians deny the predictability of God's corporate historical sanctions in terms of covenant law, they necessarily place themselves under the rule of humanist law and a humanist social order. They must then choose between (1) the individualistic contractualism of a social order sustained by faith in Darwinian competition or (2) the statist contractualism of a social order sustained by faith in Darwinian central planning.

The statist offers these criticisms of contractualism. First, there is no comprehensive ethical basis for contractualism other than individual self-interest, which can be radically anti-ethical. Second, the predictable, socially beneficial results of the free market's sanctions—profit and loss—are suspect. Market profitability at best reflects the producer's performance in meeting the temporary desires of economically successful buyers, not the economic system's performance in meeting the true needs of the broad mass of citizens. Third, the contractalist social system evolves over time without rational direction or predictability. Who is to say that it will not evolve into socialism? So, why wait? Adopt socialism now.

31. Ibid., pp. 56–57.

The contractualist offers these criticisms of statism. First, the ethics of power-seeking politicians and bureaucrats are highly suspect. In any case, these ethics will evolve over time; Darwinism offers no permanent ethics. Any appeal to social ethics as superior to individual ethics is a smoke screen for the self-interested plans of power-seekers. Second, the predictable results of unchecked, monopolistic political power over other men's decisions are evil. "All power tends to corrupt, and absolute power corrupts absolutely." Third, the economic system behaves irrationally under central planning because central planners have no rational success indicators in a socialistic economy: prices that reflect the true state of supply and demand.

From the late seventeenth century until the present, Christian social theorists have chosen between these two broad social theories: statist and individualist. They have not offered an outspokenly biblical alternative. They have baptized one or another of humanism's theories. The suggestion that Christianity offers a separate social theory superior to humanistic theories is inherently theocratic, and Protestantism since 1700 has been anti-theocratic.

With each revolution in Western epistemology—from Platonism to Aristotelianism to Cartesianism to Newtonianism to Darwinism—there has been a corresponding revision of operational Christian social theory. The church has played catch-up, following a generation or two later, dutifully repeating its formula: "Yes, the Bible is consistent with this prevailing theory of civil government. Forget what Christians said back then."

Conclusion

Taking a vow is a serious matter. It is always sworn to God. It may be sworn directly, but it also may be sworn to a covenantal agency lawfully representing God. Because it necessarily invokes God's negative sanctions for failure to perform its stipulations, a covenant oath is called self-maledictory. Because the invocation of negative sanctions brings a special judicial authority to the oath, the use of it is restricted by God. His name may not lawfully be invoked to authenticate a personal oath in public unless there is a covenantal agency empowered by God to bring negative sanctions against the oath-taker: church, family, or state. A personal oath to God apart from a sanctioning agency must not be sworn in public. It must be sworn in private.

Under the Mosaic covenant, a wife or daughter had to have her oath confirmed by her husband or father in order for it to be binding, unless she governed her own household. The widow was the representative independent woman: head of her own household. In New Covenant times, because of baptism's lawful application to both sexes, adult daughters are legally independent; so, they possess this covenantal authority. When a judicially independent woman pays for the fulfillment of her oath, she can lawfully take a vow. God will hold her to it.

A promise that does not invoke God's name or sanctions is a contract. The presence of a self-maledictory oath under God's sovereign authority distinguishes a covenant from a contract. A contract does not possess the sanctified status of a covenant. Breaking a contract that results in harm to another person is a sin, but it is not of the same magnitude as breaking an oath-invoked covenant. Contracts are not to be elevated to the status of covenants. Covenants are not to be debased to the level of contracts. Covenantalism is the biblical basis of contractualism, not the other way around. Whig political theory since Adam Smith has failed to understand this crucial aspect of causality: from covenant to contract. Whig social theory places contractualism at the center.

The civil government is a covenantal institution. While contractualism is valid for explaining economic relationships—the quest for mutual self-interest by means of the division of labor—it is not valid as a form of political theory, despite the presence of personal self-interest and the division of labor in political affairs. Civil government has the God-given monopolistic authority to impose physical sanctions on evil-doers: the sword. The free market does not legitimately authorize any agency to impose physical sanctions. Its sanctions are not lawfully invoked by covenant oath.

The focus of political theory should be the proper imposition of negative sanctions: suppressing evil, not increasing net economic productivity. The biblical goal of civil government is the suppression of evil. Any increase in economic productivity is a positive effect of suppressing evil.

WAR BRIDES

And they warred against the Midianites, as the LORD commanded Moses; and they slew all the males. And they slew the kings of Midian, beside the rest of them that were slain; namely, Evi, and Rekem, and Zur, and Hur, and Reba, five kings of Midian: Balaam also the son of Beor they slew with the sword. And the children of Israel took all the women of Midian captives, and their little ones, and took the spoil of all their cattle, and all their flocks, and all their goods. And they burnt all their cities wherein they dwelt, and all their goodly castles [fortresses], with fire. And they took all the spoil, and all the prey, both of men and of beasts (Num. 31:7–11).

The theocentric focus of this passage is God as the sanctions-bringer. Midian had tempted Israel by sending women to marry them and then lure them into the worship of false gods. “And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, Vex the Midianites, and smite them: For they vex you with their wives, wherewith they have beguiled you in the matter of Peor, and in the matter of Cozbi, the daughter of a prince of Midian, their sister, which was slain in the day of the plague for Peor’s sake” (Num. 25:16–18). Yet in this passage, Moses allowed the Israelites to marry Midianite women. Why the apparent discrepancy?

Marriage is a covenantal institution. It is governed by laws of the covenant. The Mosaic law established laws for marrying foreign women. These laws were explicit. The only foreign women who could lawfully be married by an Israelite were survivors of a military conflict in which Israel annihilated a foreign city outside the Promised Land (Deut. 20:14),¹ or converts to the faith (e.g., Rahab, Ruth).

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 48.

A. The Destruction of Midian

The destruction of Midian was now covenantally complete. The cities were burned. All the males were slain. But this was not hormah. The unmarried young women and girls were lawfully taken captive as spoils; so were animals and precious metals. "And Moses said unto them, Have ye saved all the women alive? Behold, these caused the children of Israel, through the counsel of Balaam, to commit trespass against the LORD in the matter of Peor, and there was a plague among the congregation of the LORD. Now therefore kill every male among the little ones, and kill every woman that hath known man by lying with him. But all the women children, that have not known a man by lying with him, keep alive for yourselves" (Num. 31:15–18).

This sanction of mass execution was in accord with the law of foreign warfare that God subsequently revealed to Israel. "And if it will make no peace with thee, but will make war against thee, then thou shalt besiege it: And when the LORD thy God hath delivered it into thine hands, thou shalt smite every male thereof with the edge of the sword: But the women, and the little ones, and the cattle, and all that is in the city, even all the spoil thereof, shalt thou take unto thyself; and thou shalt eat the spoil of thine enemies, which the LORD thy God hath given thee. Thus shalt thou do unto all the cities which are very far off from thee, which are not of the cities of these nations" (Deut. 20:12–15).²

The women were legal as spoils; the Israelites were allowed to marry them. But first the women had to go through a rite of covenantal transition, of purification.

When thou goest forth to war against thine enemies, and the LORD thy God hath delivered them into thine hands, and thou hast taken them captive, And seest among the captives a beautiful woman, and hast a desire unto her, that thou wouldest have her to thy wife; Then thou shalt bring her home to thine house; and she shall shave her head, and pare her nails; And she shall put the raiment of her captivity from off her, and shall remain in thine house, and bewail her father and her mother a full month: and after that thou shalt go in unto her, and be her husband, and she shall be thy wife. And it shall be, if thou have no delight in her, then thou shalt let her go whither she will; but thou shalt not sell her at all for money, thou shalt not make merchandise of her, because thou hast humbled her (Deut. 21:10–14).

2. Idem.

The Israelite could not marry a foreign woman until she had shaved her head. This was a visible mark of her new covenantal subordination. She had been under another culture's authority before; now she was under a new authority. The removal of the mark of her subordination, her hair,³ and its re-growth in a new household testified to her new legal condition. She was also to bewail her father and mother for a month. This was a ritual break with the old conditions of her existence: the authority of her parents' household. Clearly, this woman had not been anyone's wife. She would not be a woman seeking revenge against her new husband for having killed her first husband. She would not bring the children of another man into her new household.

This is another reason why Israel was required to kill the sons, including infant sons, of the defeated nation. There would be no warriors or sons of warriors of a defeated culture inside the gates of Israel. The survival of the young women was a positive sanction—grace—for the defeated culture. The negative sanction of annihilation was normative. Moses made it clear that there was to be mercy shown to some and none to others: "Now therefore kill every male among the little ones, and kill every woman that hath known man by lying with him. But all the women children, that have not known a man by lying with him, keep alive for yourselves" (Num. 31:17–18).

B. The Defeat of Paganism's Gods

These women were pagans by profession of faith and lifestyle, yet they were eligible to become wives. How could the purity of marriage be maintained? Because these women were captives who were no longer under the covenantal authority of pagan gods. The gods of the pagan world were local gods, gods of the city-state. When a city was defeated, so were its gods. When a city was utterly wiped out, so were its gods. These captive women now had no ritual connection with the gods of their city.⁴ Those gods had been wiped off the face of the earth. Israel was instructed to destroy foreign cities and every male inside its walls. This was the proof of the defeat of the city's local gods.

3. "But every woman that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered dishonoureth her head: for that is even all one as if she were shaven. For if the woman be not covered, let her also be shorn: but if it be a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven, let her be covered" (I Cor. 11:5–6).

4. They may not have had any connection before, except through their fathers. This was the case in Greece and Rome. Women did not participate in the rites of the city, only in household rites.

When the gods of a pagan city outside of Canaan fell to Israel, Israel was to have no fear of them again. In contrast, the gods of Canaan were a continuing threat, since they were tied to the land itself. To spare anyone in those cities in which Israel intended to dwell was not allowed. "But of the cities of these people, which the LORD thy God doth give thee for an inheritance, thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth: But thou shalt utterly destroy them; namely, the Hittites, and the Amorites, the Canaanites, and the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites; as the LORD thy God hath commanded thee: That they teach you not to do after all their abominations, which they have done unto their gods; so should ye sin against the LORD your God" (Deut. 20:16–18).

The virgin who had been taken from her city, which was then burned to the ground, had been stripped of her covenant. This did not make her a covenant-keeper, but it placed her under the covenantal jurisdiction of an Israelite. Mosaic law did not recognize the necessity of a captive wife to confess faith in Israel's God. There was no rite of covenantal access for women. Circumcision was for males only. For that matter, males who were purchased from abroad had to be circumcised and then given access to Passover, even if they made no confession of faith. "He that is born in thy house, and he that is bought with thy money, must needs be circumcised: and my covenant shall be in your flesh for an everlasting covenant" (Gen. 17:13). The judicial issue was not their confession; rather, it was the confession of the head of the household that was determinative.

The judicial issue was sanctions. The head of the household imposed family sanctions. Those under his authority were counted as covenant-keepers because they were under the authority of a covenant-keeper. These subordinates could not lawfully recruit household members into idolatry. To do so was a capital crime.

If thy brother, the son of thy mother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend, which is as thine own soul, entice thee secretly, saying, Let us go and serve other gods, which thou hast not known, thou, nor thy fathers; Namely, of the gods of the people which are round about you, nigh unto thee, or far off from thee, from the one end of the earth even unto the other end of the earth; Thou shalt not consent unto him, nor hearken unto him; neither shall thine eye pity him, neither shalt thou spare, neither shalt thou conceal him: But thou shalt surely kill him; thine hand shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterwards the hand of all the people. And thou shalt stone him with stones, that he die; because he hath sought to thrust thee away from the LORD thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage. And all Israel shall hear, and fear, and shall do no more any such wickedness as this is among you (Deut. 13:6–11).

The threat of this civil sanction was regarded by the Mosaic law as sufficient to warrant marriage to a female survivor of an annihilated foreign culture.

C. Two Forms of Liberating Subordination

Forcible covenantal subordination of foreigners was possible in two ways: by purchase (slavery) and by captive marriage. The covenantal goal in both cases was the servant's separation from bondage to pagan gods. Slavery was a form of evangelism: when successful, far better than eternity spent in hell. The captive woman who entered a household by marriage was not to be treated as a slave. She could not be sold by her husband. She had been humbled once by the shaving of her head, the paring of her nails, and her physical status as a wife. She could not lawfully be humbled a second time by the same man. She had made the transition out of paganism through marriage; she therefore could not be made a slave by the man who had brought her out of paganism. This indicates that the covenantal purpose of both the permanent servitude of, and marriage to, captive women was liberation out of paganism. A pagan could be liberated in either way, but not both. Liberation was a one-time act.

This means that an ex-pagan wife could not become a permanent slave in Israel unless she was divorced by her husband and later married a permanent slave or a pagan who then became a permanent slave through crime or debt. Her status as a free woman had been guaranteed by her first husband. She could give up this status through marriage to a man who did not possess it, but it could not be removed from her by law without her consent unless she was excommunicated for cause and then committed a crime whose restitution payment required her sale into slavery. Even this limit to her status is implied; it is nowhere stated. It is implied because being cut off from the covenant was a judicial sanction against an Israelite male who broke a major law, including a public denial of God. Biblical law does not subsidize evil. It does not create a class of criminals beyond the law's negative sanctions. But for a rejected captive wife to be subjected to the threat of permanent servitude, she either had to commit a crime as an excommunicant or else subordinate herself to a pagan, who was, or who later became, a permanent slave.

D. Land Laws and Civil Jurisdiction

The law governing the marriage of captive women was a land law. We know this because the parallel law governing warfare within the boundaries of Canaan was different: every human resident of Canaan was to be killed.

The Mosaic covenant was a geographical covenant. It established judicial differences between Jew and Greek, as well as between male and female. Circumcision was the physical mark of the difference between Jew and Greek, as well as between men and women.

The threat to Israel came from the gods of Canaan. Because the gods of paganism were geographically based, and because God's dwelling place was inside the boundaries of Israel, the threat of distant foreign gods was reduced. This is why God established in His law the negative sanction of national captivity for Israel (Deut. 28:41). Captivity to gods outside of the Promised Land would not destroy Israel because Israel would seek to escape this bondage and return to the Promised Land. After their return from the exile, Israel did not again worship the gods of Canaan. But Israel also did not again go out to conquer foreign cities. Israel remained under political bondage to foreign empires.

The Mosaic laws of conquest no longer apply today in the area of religion. We are not told to execute every male inside the gates of another city. The universality of the gospel transcends political groupings. It crosses borders. This was true in the post-exilic era, too. Jews spread throughout the empires of the Near East, residing under the civil rule of many gods. The Mosaic laws of warfare ended with the end of Israel as a separate civil jurisdiction. The total annihilation of Canaan was a one-time genocidal requirement. The Mosaic laws of near-annihilation also ended when the boundaries of Israel no longer served to identify the monopolistic civil jurisdiction of God within the confines of a single nation.

Conclusion

The destruction of Midian involved the capture of virgin girls. These women were marriageable. Their eligibility for marriage was what authorized Israel to spare their lives. They were no longer seen as a threat to Israel's covenant. The gods of their cities were covenantally dead. The captives recognized this. They had no covenantally significant religion to invoke against Israel.

18

THE SPOILS OF HOLY WARFARE

Take the sum of the prey [booty: v. 32] that was taken, both of man and of beast, thou, and Eleazar the priest, and the chief fathers of the congregation: And divide the prey into two parts; between them that took the war upon them, who went out to battle, and between all the congregation (Num. 31:26–27).

The theocentric issue here is God as the sanctions-bringer. The 12,000 warriors (v. 5) who battled Midian were at greater risk, statistically speaking, than those who had not been selected to fight. Actually, the combatants were at zero risk: every one of them survived, a miraculous result (v. 49). But they did not know this outcome prior to the war. The post-war division of the spoils reflected the fact that the warriors had placed themselves at greater risk. They kept half of the booty.

From their half was taken a small payment: one out of 500 of the living captives, women and animals (v. 28). This portion was given to Eleazar the priest as a representative of the Aaronic priesthood (v. 29). This was booty for all of the priesthood. Eleazar had no need for 32 new wives (v. 40). From the half of the proceeds given to the congregation, one out of 50 of the living captives was given to the Levites (v. 30).

The Israelites who did not participate in the war were required to pay ten times the quantity of goods paid by the warriors who did fight: one out of 50 vs. one out of 500. This means that those who had not been at risk had to pay ten times the tribute of those who had been at risk. This payment was only 20 percent of a tithe: one in 50 vs. one in 10. It was more like a firstfruits offering than a tithe: a token payment. The tithe would have been owed after the distribution of the booty, when each recipient knew exactly what he had received. But because the required tithe on living animals was paid only on the net increase in the herd, with the tenth animal owed to God when it passed under the rod (Lev. 27:32),¹ it was possible that God would not receive a tithe on the booty. The net increase of each herd might not have been ten beasts that year. If nine or fewer animals had been added to a herd during the year, the herd's owner owed nothing. This was a likely situation in the wilderness. So, God's priestly tribe did get paid something "off the top" prior to receiving tithes from individuals.

A. Taxes vs. Spoils

The fact that those who were at risk paid one-tenth of the tribute owed by those who were not at risk seems to indicate that the modern principle of graduated taxation is anti-biblical. Those who receive more income, i.e., entrepreneurs who are at greater risk of losing their wealth, are today required to pay to the state a higher percentage of their income than those who earn less income. In the case of the spoils of Midian, those at risk paid only ten percent of what was required from those who were not at risk. Those who had been at risk forfeited half of the spoils to those who had not been at risk. This was not a tax. It was not paid to the state.

Tribal warriors had been chosen as covenantal representatives of Israel to wage holy war against a national foe. The war's outcome was predetermined. God would surely destroy Midian. This war had been initiated by God, not by Israel (v. 3). Military spoils were therefore part of the nation's judicial-covenantal system. This was not a case where a man was working on behalf of his family, seeking a private return on his labor. On such an increase, he would have owed first fruits plus a tithe—nothing more. He would not have been required to share half of his income with other Israelites. In contrast, a man chosen to fight Midian was working as a national covenantal agent. He was bringing destruction to a military enemy. He was wielding the sword on behalf of God: a bringer of God's negative corporate sanctions. This was a priestly act and also a military act. It was holy warfare. The laws governing the allocation of military booty were different from the laws governing the tithe.

B. A Voluntary Offering

This had been a miraculous victory. "And they said unto Moses, Thy servants have taken the sum of the men of war which are under our charge, and there lacketh not one man of us" (v. 49). Their enemies had been completely wiped out, yet not one warrior had died. This, concluded the captains, required a special payment to God. "We have therefore brought an oblation for the LORD, what every man hath gotten, of jewels of gold, chains, and bracelets, rings, earrings, and tablets, to make an atonement for our souls before the LORD" (v. 50).

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 38.

Each of the warriors had taken booty on his own behalf (v. 53). This was legitimate. They violated no law. They had divided the living goods with the other Israelites, but they were not required to share their inanimate booty. Nevertheless, the captains decided to give all of the inanimate booty to God. This was an act of devotion: economically meaningful thanks for having been protected as an army. It was also a kind of life insurance premium. If they publicly acknowledged by such sacrificial giving that they had received miraculous protection from God, they might receive similar protection in the upcoming battles in Canaan. This battle was a kind of military exercise in preparation for the conquest. If word spread to Canaan that not one Israelite had perished in the victory over a large, rich nation like Midian, fear would also spread in Canaan. Fear was already spreading there, as Rahab testified later to the spies. "For we have heard how the LORD dried up the water of the Red sea for you, when ye came out of Egypt; and what ye did unto the two kings of the Amorites, that were on the other side Jordan, Sihon and Og, whom ye utterly destroyed. And as soon as we had heard these things, our hearts did melt, neither did there remain any more courage in any man, because of you: for the LORD your God, he is God in heaven above, and in earth beneath" (Josh. 2:10–11). This was surely to the advantage of Israelite warriors.

Normally, this atonement money would have been paid prior to the battle at the time of the numbering (Ex. 30:13). This had not been required because the nation had already been numbered in preparation for the conquest of Canaan (Num. 26:2–51). Immediately after this, God revealed a system for allocating the land (vv. 52–56). Because the battle over Midian was preparatory for the conquest, God did not require them to be numbered again. They did not pay the half shekel of silver to the Levites. But when it became clear in retrospect that they had not really been at risk during the battle, they decided to forfeit any personal economic gains they had made as individuals. They concluded: "No pain, no gain."

Their payment of atonement money was voluntary. It was a public admission that this had not been a normal military encounter. They paid the atonement money, not as a judicial covering for having killed Midianites, but as an acknowledgment that they had been physically covered by God during the battle. They did not keep the booty as a personal reward for having put their own lives at risk when their lives had not been at risk.

Moses and Eleazar accepted this payment on behalf of God. “And Moses and Eleazar the priest took the gold of the captains of thousands and of hundreds, and brought it into the tabernacle of the congregation, for a memorial for the children of Israel before the LORD” (v. 54). This memorial would remain as a testimony to the protecting hand of God in battle, but also as a public acknowledgment that the men who had received God’s special protection had acknowledged this by a voluntary gift.

Conclusion

The military spoils of Midian were unique. The whole nation had not been directly involved in the battle. Only a small, covenantally representative force had been chosen to fight. This would not be the case in Canaan. This was a preliminary campaign designed to prove to Israel that God was with them in a special, miraculous way. Not one Israelite died in battle.

The representative character of this force was manifested in the requirement that the participating warriors forfeit half of their animate spoils to the nation. The nation made a small tribute payment to the Levites; the warriors paid a tenth of this tribute to the Aaronic priests through Eleazar. Those who had entered the battle at greater risk statistically paid less than those who remained behind.

The miraculous outcome of the battle—no Israelite deaths—so impressed the warriors that they voluntarily gave their inanimate booty to Moses and Eleazar. They had not in fact been at risk, so they decided not to keep the booty that was normally the reward of any soldier who could take it in battle. The riskreward ratio of normal combat had been overcome in this battle by God’s intervention. The statistical improbability of the campaign testified to God’s special presence among them. The combatants publicly acknowledged that there had been no risk by surrendering their personal rewards to the covenantal representatives of the God who had removed the risk.

19

LAND TO MATCH MEN'S SKILLS

Now the children of Reuben and the children of Gad had a very great multitude of cattle: and when they saw the land of Jazer, and the land of Gilead, that, behold, the place was a place for cattle (Num. 32:1).

The theocentric issue here was inheritance. The inheritance would be based on military conquest: sanctions. Where did the Reubenites and the Gadites get their cattle? Israel had been wandering in the wilderness for almost four decades. What kind of wilderness was it? Was it a place where cattle multiplied? Or were these cattle the spoils of war? Or were they the fruit of trade?

Some of these cattle could have come from Egypt, for the Israelites took cattle out of Egypt (Ex. 12:38). This raises the question: Where did the Egyptians get these cattle? Hadn't their flocks been depleted by the hail and then by the death of the firstborn (Ex. 12:29)? It seems clear that before the hail, many Egyptians feared Moses' words: "Send therefore now, and gather thy cattle, and all that thou hast in the field; for upon every man and beast which shall be found in the field, and shall not be brought home, the hail shall come down upon them, and they shall die. He that feared the word of the LORD among the servants of Pharaoh made his servants and his cattle flee into the houses: And he that regarded not the word of the LORD left his servants and his cattle in the field" (Ex. 9:19–21). Obviously, a lot of people brought in their cattle and stayed inside themselves. Second, the Israelites, though slaves, did own cattle in Egypt. "Our cattle also shall go with us; there shall not an hoof be left behind; for thereof must we take to serve the LORD our God; and we know not with what we must serve the LORD, until we come thither" (Ex. 10:26). Conclusion: there must have been grass in the wilderness.

Some of these cattle came from the victory over Bashan. "But all the cattle, and the spoil of the cities, we took for a prey to ourselves" (Deut. 3:7). Previously, the Israelites had destroyed the cities of King Arad. These cities were called hormah (Num. 21:3), which implies total destruction. There is no indication that the Israelites took spoils from Arad's cities. This military victory was more like a whole burnt offering comparable to the subsequent total destruction of Jericho. So, the cattle did not come from Arad. We know that Israel confiscated Sihon's cattle (Deut. 2:35). The Israelites collected considerable cattle from Midian (Num. 31 :33, 44). Some of the cattle may have come from the another Amorite nation: Jaazer (Num. 21 :32).

All of the tribes also participated in the spoils. These two tribes may have traded their inanimate wealth to members of the other tribes in exchange for cattle. These two tribes must have had special interest in cattle and special skills related to herding. They viewed the ownership of cattle as of greater value to them than the ownership of other forms of wealth that they possessed. A profitable exchange was possible if the cattle owners in the other eleven tribes wanted what the two tribes possessed.

A. Capitalizing One's Productivity

The leaders of the two tribes approached Moses and Eleazar with a proposition: an exchange. They were willing to give up any legal claim on the land inside Canaan's borders in exchange for the land that Israel had already conquered beyond the Jordan. "Even the country which the LORD smote before the congregation of Israel, is a land for cattle, and thy servants have cattle" (Num. 32:4). They sought a match between the land and their preferred form of capital: cattle. They believed that they would possess greater wealth if this specialized land became theirs rather than the agricultural land of Canaan.

This was an economic decision which acknowledged the reality of the division of labor. The output of land varies. The output of people varies. If land and labor match, the result is greater wealth for those who own the land. That is, those people who have skills associated with a certain type of productivity can capitalize the value of these skills by owning the land through which these skills can maximize economic output. As the value of their output rises, in part as a result of their control over land with special characteristics, the value of the land also rises. But ownership and control are different. A man may rent land and thereby control it, but any increased value that his actions impart to the land may later be claimed by the land's owner. So, if a person possesses the specialized skills and knowledge to make a certain plot of land rise in value, he would be wise to purchase this land before the land's existing owner recognizes the producer's ability to raise the value of the land's output, and therefore before the owner can respond to this information by raising the land's price. In other words, by purchasing the land, the producer appropriates the value of his future productivity. He capitalizes his productivity by owning the land that appreciates because of this productivity.

Probably the best examples of this capitalization process in the second half of the twentieth century are Disneyland and Disney World, the world-famous amusement parks. In the early 1950s, when Walt Disney's company built Disneyland, he bought up enough land to build the park in what was then a less sparsely populated area in Southern California: before the regional freeway system was completed. Neither he nor anyone else knew if this venture would be successful. No one had ever built a family theme park before. The result was successful beyond anyone's wildest imagination. The tourists streamed into the city of Anaheim. The price of land located close to Disneyland skyrocketed. Others bought it, built hotels and other businesses on it, and reaped the reward. Disneyland made them rich.

Disney did not make the same mistake twice. Disney World is located on a huge tract of land near Orlando, Florida: 27,000 acres,¹ or 42 square miles. The Disney organization has drained the swamps and built hotels on the property as well as two other theme parks: Epcot Center and the MGM movie theme park. The company's goal is to get tourists to come there for a week and spend every penny within the confines of the Disney theme park system. Nevertheless, successful rival theme parks have been built in Orlando. But the lion's share of the increase in land value located close to Disney World has gone to the Disney organization, which capitalized its knowledge and its name by buying up the surrounding land before it became expensive. Disney locked in ownership of land needed for future expansion. He bought it at a pre-Disney World price. He bought it more cheaply per acre because he bought so much land at one time. The Disney company received a discount for volume. Disney believed that the total return on this investment would be greater than the forfeited interest return on the money the company tied up in buying and holding the land.

The two tribes saw an opportunity. They were cattlemen. If they could gain ownership of recently conquered land that was more suitable for cattle ranching than farming, they would reap an entrepreneurial reward. Because they knew that members of the tribes legally would not be allowed to buy or sell land to non-members—the jubilee land law (Lev. 25)—they understood that capitalization in their case would go from the land to their cattle ranching skills. Land ownership in Israel would be less mobile than cattle ownership. To maximize the value of their skills in cattle ranching, they needed ownership of specialized land. They would not be allowed to buy comparably specialized land after the conquest. This land's highest valued use, they believed, was for cattle ranching. Anyway, for their purposes, this was its highest valued use. They could best capitalize their cattle raising skills by owning this land rather than tracts of land across the Jordan. So, they made their offer to Moses.

1. This is 10,800 hectares.

The subsequent land distribution indicates that the two tribes represented half the tribe of Manasseh. "And Moses gave unto them, even to the children of Gad, and to the children of Reuben, and unto half the tribe of Manasseh the son of Joseph, the kingdom of Sihon king of the Amorites, and the kingdom of Og king of Bashan, the land, with the cities thereof in the coasts, even the cities of the country round about" (Num. 32:33). Thus, we should conclude that half of Manasseh also had reasons for preferring Gilead. They may have been cattle specialists. They may have had another reason. In any case, they preferred to join their brethren on the wilderness side of the Jordan.

B. Covenant Before Contract

Moses had a ready reply. It was the reply of a military commander. "And Moses said unto the children of Gad and to the children of Reuben, Shall your brethren go to war, and shall ye sit here? And wherefore discourage ye the heart of the children of Israel from going over into the land which the LORD hath given them?" (vv. 6–7). He understood that the cost of conquest was the shedding of blood. God had given the Israelites their assignment: to impose the maximum sanction in history, i.e., genocide. "And thou shalt consume all the people which the LORD thy God shall deliver thee; thine eye shall have no pity upon them: neither shalt thou serve their gods; for that will be a snare unto thee" (Deut. 7:16). He knew that there would be negative effects on the morale of the other tribes if these two tribes were given the land before the conquest. The whole nation had defeated the tribes beyond the Jordan. Why should just two tribes reap the entire nation's present spoils without putting themselves at further risk?

The tribal leaders had a reasonable solution to Moses' concern: "We will build sheepfolds here for our cattle, and cities for our little ones: But we ourselves will go ready armed before² the children of Israel, until we have brought them unto their place: and our little ones shall dwell in the fenced cities because of the inhabitants of the land. We will not return unto our houses, until the children of Israel have inherited every man his inheritance. For we will not inherit with them on yonder side Jordan, or forward; because our inheritance is fallen to us on this side Jordan eastward" (Num. 32:16b–19). In other words, they would more than place themselves at risk alongside of the other tribes; they would serve as the advance guard. The negative sanctions of death and injury would place them at risk. They would receive no economic reward until the risks of warfare were behind them.

Moses agreed to these terms: "And Moses said unto them, If ye will do this thing, if ye will go armed before the LORD to war, And will go all of you armed over Jordan before the LORD, until he hath driven out his enemies from before him, And the land be subdued before the LORD: then afterward ye shall return, and be guiltless before the LORD, and before Israel; and this land shall be your possession before the LORD" (Num. 32:20–22). He made no mention of their offer to serve as an advance guard, which had been their original offer, which demonstrated that fear of combat was not the issue. He reduced their required level of commitment. If they broke the terms of this less rigorous covenant, Moses said, there would be negative sanctions: "But if ye will not do so, behold, ye have sinned against the LORD: and be sure your sin will find you out" (v. 23). We know this agreement was a covenant rather than a contract because of the threat of God's negative sanctions.

Was their offer sincere? The layout of the nation's military formation indicates that it was. Reuben and Gad marched side by side. Manasseh was on the right flank.³

2. Hebrew word: paniym. It can be translated many ways, but among these are "face," "forefront."

3. James B. Jordan, Through New Eyes: Developing a Biblical View of the World (Brentwood, Tennessee: Wolgemuth & Hyatt, 1988), p. 205. (<http://bit.ly/jjneweyes>)

If the nation subsequently marched into battle with the "south" quadrant leading the attack, Gad and Reuben would take the brunt of the initial resistance. Simeon would also be exposed. Manasseh would be on the right flank. If half the tribe of Manasseh joined Simeon's ranks, Simeon would receive additional support, thereby compensating for its increased risk.

To accept this offer, Moses would have had to sacrifice Judah's role as the "point man" of the nation, the primary sword-bearer in battle, a position consistent with Jacob's prophecy: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be" (Gen. 49:10). Judah had led the nation during the wilderness wanderings. "In the first place went the standard of the camp of the children of Judah according to their armies: and over his host was Nahshon the son of Aminadab" (Num. 10:14). Milgrom calls the army's eastern flank the choicest position, since Moses and Aaron camped at the entrance of the tabernacle.⁴ So, in this sense, the offer was an offer by the eldest brother (Reuben) to replace Judah in the conquest. This was in fact the way the tribes marched into Canaan. Reuben, Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh crossed the Jordan before their brethren (Josh. 4:12).

4. Jacob Milgrom, The JPS Torah Commentary: Numbers (New York: Jewish Publication Society, 1990), p. 340. He cited Numbers 3:38: "But those that encamp before the tabernacle toward the east, even before the tabernacle of the congregation eastward, shall be Moses, and Aaron and his sons, keeping the charge of the sanctuary for the charge of the children of Israel; and the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death." He says that the southern flank (Reuben, Gad, Simeon) was the next most important position when the army was marching east, since the rotation was to the right. Ibid., p. 341.

The curse of Jacob against Reuben was that he was unstable. “Reuben, thou art my firstborn, my might, and the beginning of my strength, the excellency of dignity, and the excellency of power: Unstable as water, thou shalt not excel; because thou wentest up to thy father’s bed; then defiledst thou it: he went up to my couch” (Gen. 49:3–4). By becoming one of the point tribes in the conquest, Reuben removed this curse, even as Levi had removed his curse by bearing the sword against the tribes after the golden calf incident. In Joshua 22, the last section of the book, we read of the suspected idolatry of the trans-Jordan tribes, which turned out not to be idolatry but an affirmation of the covenant. In Judges, we read of Reuben’s presence with Deborah and Barak in the war against Sisera, when other tribes were absent (Judg. 5:15–16). Reubenites obviously had become stable in their ways.

C. Structuring a Persuasive Offer

Moses then assembled representatives of the other tribes to announce the terms of this covenant (v. 28). He told them the options. He structured the options in such a way that the other tribes could hardly refuse. “And Moses said unto them, If the children of Gad and the children of Reuben will pass with you over Jordan, every man armed to battle, before the LORD, and the land shall be subdued before you; then ye shall give them the land of Gilead for a possession: But if they will not pass over with you armed, they shall have possessions among you in the land of Canaan” (vv. 29–30). If the two tribes fought alongside the other ten non-Levitical tribes, they would surrender their share of the Promised Land to the other ten tribes. This was clearly a benefit to the other tribes. The other tribes would trade any future claims on the land of Gilead to the two tribes and half the tribe of Manasseh (v. 33). On the other hand, if the two tribes refused to fight, they would still inherit their share of the land of Canaan.

Was this fair? Why should these two and a half tribes receive part of the spoils of war if they refused to fight? Because of the promise to Abraham: his seed would inherit the land. This promise was qualified in only one way: circumcision. Without this covenantal mark, this seed and land prophecy would not come to pass. This is why the sons of Israel had to be circumcised after they crossed the Jordan but before they conquered Jericho (Josh. 5:7). The two and a half tribes could not be kept out of the land if they agreed to fight. In fact, it seemed impossible to keep them out even if they refused to fight. They were entitled to their share of the land.

So, the offer was structured in such a way that the positive sanctions of the two and a half tribes' participation favored the other tribes: their forfeiting of any claims to land inside the Jordan River's boundaries. Reinforcing this offer was the fact that a negative sanction would be imposed on the other tribes if the two and a half tribes refused to cross over: sharing equal portions in the division of the lands. Every tribe would receive 26% more land if the two and half tribes fought. The other tribes would give up this benefit if they refused to agree to the arrangement, and the two and a half tribes then sat on their hands in Gilead. There was no legal way to keep the nonparticipants out of the spoils.

Moses knew he had a problem. The two and a half tribes were strongly committed to the idea that they should inherit Gilead. If he rejected their offer, they might refuse to cross over the Jordan out of spite. Because of their cattle, they had a special desire to possess Gilead—a desire not shared equally by the other tribes. If they refused to cross over, this might start a mass defection among the other tribes. In any case, some tribes might experience defections. Militarily, it was Moses' task to keep the tribes together. They had marched out of Egypt in military array (Ex. 13:18: NASB).⁵ They were supposed to march into Canaan the same way. So, Moses structured the sanctions in such a way that the other tribes were unlikely to reject the offer.

1. Free Riders

There was a risk accompanying this offer. It resulted from what economists call the free-rider problem. If the nature of a goal is inherently collective—a successful military campaign is such a goal—but not all participants are required to provide working capital in order to receive the benefits, then it pays some people to sit on the sidelines. They ride free of charge alongside paying customers. This creates a shortage of the scarce service, i.e., a shortage at a price that most people would be willing to pay if everyone were required to pay the same price. If no one is going to be penalized for not paying his fair share—whatever other participants regard as fair⁶—why should any-

5. Literally, five in a rank. James B. Jordan, The Sociology of the Church: Essays in Reconstruction (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Ministries, 1986), p. 215. The root word is derived from the Hebrew word for five (II Sam. 2:23; 3:27; 4:6; 20:10). (<http://bit.ly/jjchurch>)

6. In a collective effort, there is no scientific way of determining a fair share. This is one participate? If no one participates, the collective goal cannot be achieved.

This is the logical justification for the imposition of civil compulsion in certain collective efforts. This free rider argument lies behind the creation of an analytic economic category called public goods. Edwin Dolan described public goods as “goods or services having the properties that (1) they cannot be provided to one citizen without being supplied also to that citizen’s neighbors, and (2) once provided for one citizen, the cost of providing them to others is zero. Perhaps the best example of a public good is national defense.”⁷ A missile-defense system protects everyone in the region whether or not one person pays. But if anyone so protected can legally escape paying, then the missile-defense system will probably not be built.

The free market offers a solution in most areas of resource allocation: no participation in the end result for those who refused to participate in the effort—“no pain, no gain.” A legal boundary is placed around the end product, i.e., a property right is established. The legal system authorizes property owners to exclude free riders. But exclusion from God’s covenant with Israel was not allowed merely for failure to participate in military service. Deborah could not legally force Barak to lead the army against Sisera (Judg. 4:8). Similarly, she could not force the tribes to participate. This is why she included ridicule against some non-participating tribes in her song of victory (Judg. 5:16–17, 23). She used the negative sanction of retroactive ridicule because she had no civil negative sanction at her disposal. Moses also refused to establish an extra-biblical legal basis of exclusion from the covenant of Israel.

If other tribes demanded some sort of additional reward for their participation in the conquest, they might defect if Moses refused to grant it. The army of Israel might be depleted. So, Moses took a risk. Announcing a negative sanction against the other tribes—sharing their inheritance in Canaan with these non-combatants if they refused to accept the two tribes’ offer might backfire on him. He had two counter positions: one stated, the other implied. First, he offered a pos-another application of a central dilemma for theoretical economics: the impossibility of making interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. See Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982 2012], ch. 5; North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Appendix H (1990).

7. Edwin G. Dolan, Basic Economics, 2nd ed. (Hillsdale, Illinois: Dryden, 1980), p. 56.

itive sanction: a 26% increase in post-war land allocation for the other nine and a half tribes. They would receive a larger percentage of land that was more suitable for farming than Gilead, which was presumably what the other tribes preferred. They were not cattlemen. Second, he implied a negative sanction. He would call off the invasion. He did not say this, but if there were mass defections—too many free riders sitting on the sidelines—this was the implication. This would have meant dividing up Gilead among all twelve tribes: a major reduction in tribal spoils.

The representatives of the other tribes assessed the offer and decided to accept it. The rewards outweighed the costs. By consenting to the offer, they would gain the military cooperation of the two and a half tribes. They would also gain a significant increase in the post-war land distribution inside Canaan by forfeiting land outside Canaan that was more beneficial to cattlemen than to other agricultural producers. This land would probably be even less valuable after the conquest, for it would be more distant from whatever city God would choose inside Canaan as the city of the tabernacle. This would mean longer and more expensive journeys to attend the three annual feasts. It is not surprising that they agreed to the offer.

It is also not surprising that the Israelites had trouble displacing all of the Canaanites. The inability of Joshua to transfer any of the inheritance of one tribe to another because of the former's military non-participation or its failure to overcome the Canaanites probably hampered his overall military campaign. It took six years for Israel to conquer the land of Canaan,⁸ and the task was never fully completed (Josh. 15:63; 17:12–13). There was one period in which the inheritance was delayed for seven tribes: "And there remained among the children of Israel seven tribes, which had not yet received their inheritance. And Joshua said unto the children of Israel, How long are ye slack to go to possess the land, which the LORD God of your fathers hath given you?" (Josh. 18:2–3). He may have had a free rider problem.

Conclusion

Reuben and Gad possessed lots of cattle. The land of Gilead out-

8. Israel wandered 40 years in the wilderness (Josh. 5:6). The first numbering in Numbers took place in the second year after the exodus (Num. 1:1). Moses sent in the spies shortly after this numbering. Caleb was age 40 at the time Moses sent in the spies; he was 85 when he began his final campaign in Canaan (Josh. 14:6–7, 10). Thus, Caleb was victorious in year six of the conquest, 46 years after the exodus.

side of Canaan was better suited to cattle raising than Canaan. These tribes realized that Gilead was better suited to their occupations than anything they might conquer in Canaan. They wanted to capitalize the value that they would bring to the land as cattlemen. They approached Moses with an offer: an inheritance in Gilead in exchange for an inheritance in Canaan. This was a contract.

Moses made sure that the covenant came first: the inheritance of Israel as promised to Abraham by God. They would have to put their lives on the line in the national war effort inside Canaan before they could inherit outside Canaan. They had to stake their claim to Canaan before they could stake their claim to Gilead. Moses also invoked God's negative sanctions against the two tribes if they failed to participate. They apparently took this covenantal threat seriously (v. 23). Once everyone had inherited his property in Canaan, they would be allowed to return to their land in Gilead. They agreed.

Moses made a persuasive offer to the other ten tribes: inherit the land of two and a half tribes in exchange for land outside the Promised Land that the nine and a half tribes did not really want, plus gain the military support of these tribes, or else (unstated) forfeit this additional land in Canaan and maybe not get aid from the two and a half tribes. This offer was strong enough to keep defectors from refusing to invade Canaan, even though a person, family, or tribe could not be excluded from inheritance inside Canaan for non-participation in the conquest.

20

SANCTIONS AND INHERITANCE

Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye are passed over Jordan into the land of Canaan; Then ye shall drive out all the inhabitants of the land from before you, and destroy all their pictures, and destroy all their molten images, and quite pluck down all their high places: And ye shall dispossess the inhabitants of the land, and dwell therein: for I have given you the land to possess it (Num. 33:51–53).

The theocentric issue here is inheritance through the application of negative sanctions at God's command. God instructed Moses to repeat the command given to the generation of the exodus: exterminate the Canaanites. This work of extermination was to mark them as a covenant people.

And he said, Behold, I make a covenant: before all thy people I will do marvels, such as have not been done in all the earth, nor in any nation: and all the people among which thou art shall see the work of the LORD: for it is a terrible thing that I will do with thee. Observe thou that which I command thee this day: behold, I drive out before thee the Amorite, and the Canaanite, and the Hittite, and the Perizzite, and the Hittite, and the Jebusite. Take heed to thyself, lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land whither thou goest, lest it be for a snare in the midst of thee: But ye shall destroy their altars, break their images, and cut down their groves: For thou shalt worship no other god: for the LORD, whose name is Jealous, is a jealous God: Lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land, and they go a whoring after their gods, and do sacrifice unto their gods, and one call thee, and thou eat of his sacrifice; And thou take of their daughters unto thy sons, and their daughters go a whoring after their gods, and make thy sons go a whoring after their gods (Ex. 34:10–16).

The exodus generation did not honor God's command. They preferred to wander in the wilderness, hoping against hope to be allowed to return to Egypt. They believed that God would not impose the same kinds of negative sanctions on Canaan that He had imposed on Egypt. They did not want to become the military agents who would impose His negative sanctions, any more than they had wanted Moses to impose negative sanctions against Pharaoh (Ex. 5:20–23).

The next generation of Israelites was ready to play the role of sanctions-bringer. They had recently imposed negative sanctions on Arad, Og, Sihon, and Midian. God had upheld them miraculously in the war on Midian: not one life lost (Num. 31 :49). They had wielded the sword effectively. They had experienced the taste of victory. They liked it. They wanted more.

A. The Spoils of War

Moses offered them positive sanctions: land. “And ye shall divide the land by lot for an inheritance among your families: and to the more ye shall giv(e the more inheritance, and to the fewer ye shall give the less inheritance: every man’s inheritance shall be in the place where his lot falleth; according to the tribes of your fathers ye shall inherit” (Num. 33:54). Their tribes’ general location would be established by lot, i.e., not by politicians or priests. God would give each tribe its due. The actual boundaries were probably decided in terms of tribal size, as with family allocations. But the rulers would allocate the actual parcels in terms of the size of the families.¹ This way, those who had better fulfilled the dominion covenant mandating large families (Gen. 1:28) would not be initially penalized by less land per family member.²

God also cautioned them regarding negative sanctions if they refused to impose total annihilation against the Canaanites. “But if ye will not drive out the inhabitants of the land from before you; then it shall come to pass, that those which ye let remain of them shall be pricks in your eyes, and thorns in your sides, and shall vex you in the land wherein ye dwell. Moreover it shall come to pass, that I shall do unto you, as I thought to do unto them” (Num. 33:55–56). The Israelites were not immune from God’s negative sanctions in history. To the degree that they adopted the religion of Canaan, they would be treated

1. Chapter 14.

2. Over time, large families would mean smaller plots of land. This is why the jubilee land law tended toward urbanization, where the jubilee inheritance law did not apply. See Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 24:G.

analogously. The judicial issue was therefore not bloodline but confession of faith and obedience to the terms of the covenant. The sanctions were covenantal.

B. First War, Then Peace

The pattern of victory over Canaan was Old Covenant sabbatical: first work, then rest. The sabbath commandment is the fourth commandment.³ It has to do with the negative sanction of work and the positive sanction of rest. Israel had to wage war for six years before gaining its rest.⁴

Israel was not told in advance that the removal of the Canaanites would take six years. God did tell them that it would not be an overnight process, since the animals of Canaan were not to be allowed to escape from the domination of mankind. “I will not drive them out from before thee in one year; lest the land become desolate, and the beast of the field multiply against thee. By little and little I will drive them out from before thee, until thou be increased, and inherit the land” (Ex. 23:29–30).

Moses began his public presentation to the conquest generation by listing the places where Israel had rested along the way. They had wandered, rested, and wandered again. They had found no permanent rest. They had moved 33 times from the time of the exodus to the death of Aaron on Mt. Hor (Num. 33:5–38). Aaron’s death occurred in the fortieth year after the exodus (v. 38). Then they began a final series of wanderings: eight resting places in less than one year (vv. 41–49).

These final wanderings were different: Israel defeated major enemies. This time, they were not driven out; rather, they drove out others. They were able to build up both their confidence and their land holdings through force of arms. They had been attacked repeatedly; they had won repeatedly. This began a psychological transformation of the nation: from a defensive to an offensive mentality. They had not initiated these wars, but they had won them. This was in preparation for their crossing of the Jordan River: the move to total offense.

The exodus generation had maintained the peace by fleeing whenever challenged. Their solution to an external challenge was a retreat. They had been told by Moses that God was not going to give them a

3. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Pt. 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 4.

4. Chapter 19, footnote 8.

definitive victory in their lifetimes. This made them defensive. They did not want trouble. Their inheritance was cut off. They had no intention of placing their lives at risk for the sake of the inheritance of their children. They demonstrated this one-generation time perspective by refusing to circumcise their children (Josh. 5:7). The mark of a legal claim on the inheritance that had been promised to Abraham was circumcision. The exodus generation refused to impose the mark of the covenant on their heirs. They were saying, in effect, "If we cannot inherit, then why should our sons inherit?"

The generation of the conquest had lived as wanderers because of their parents' rebellion and cowardice. They had seen the consequences of rebellion and cowardice. They had lived all of their adult lives under negative sanctions. They had grown tired of this pattern of behavior. They wanted their inheritance, and they were willing to pay for it on God's terms: military conquest. This was risky, but it was better than living as wanderers.

God warned them that if they refused to drive out the Canaanites, they would fall under the same negative sanctions that Canaan was about to experience. The threat of negative historical sanctions is inherent in the biblical covenant. Canaan was about to learn this firsthand. So was Israel. But Israel had gained positive sanctions—land—by becoming God's agency of negative sanctions: a holy army.

This army was being taught a lesson: the trustworthiness of God's promises. This was an important lesson for the nation prior to the conquest. The victors' positive sanctions in warfare were gained through the losers' negative sanctions. Positive and negative sanctions are military corollaries. Warfare is a zero-sum activity: losers supply the winnings of the winners. This makes warfare different from the free market, where both trading partners expect to gain through a voluntary exchange.

Conclusion

Moses made it clear to the conquest generation that the terms of success in history are judicial. The Israelites were required to maintain their commitment to God's law. This included the one-time law of annihilation. The gods of Canaan were local gods who exercised their authority within the geographical boundaries of the promised inheritance. This is why the nations of Canaan had to be destroyed. Military conquest alone would destroy the authority and jurisdiction of the gods of Canaan. The defeat of those gods would mark the victory of God. The historical issue was sanctions.

God announced: "I have given you the land to possess it" (Num. 33:53). But to collect what He had already given, they had to dispossess the Canaanites and their gods. Israel's inheritance was not delivered on a silver platter. They had to earn it. Yet it had been promised to Abraham (Gen. 15:16). There was a promise; there were also conditions. One of these conditions was circumcision. The other was military conquest. There was promise; there was also deliverance. To collect on the promise, Israel had to impose negative sanctions against Canaan. The iniquity of the Amorites was at long last full (Gen. 15:16). Their day of reckoning had come. Israel was God's designated agent for this imposition of God's judgment in history.

God's promise to Abraham looked forward to the day of judgment on Canaan. This promise was eschatological with respect to Canaan: last things. The victory of Israel involved the imposition of negative sanctions on Canaan. These sanctions were necessary conditions for the fulfillment of the promise. Moses told the leaders of Reuben and Gad that they had to participate in the war in order to receive their inheritance on the wilderness side of the Jordan: no warfare-no inheritance. They had already benefited from the victories of the holy army of Israel; they would have to contribute to the victory within Canaan's boundaries.

With respect to the eschatology of Canaan and the inheritance of Israel, sanctions were a necessary part of the fulfillment of God's prophecy: "But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full" (Gen. 15:16). It was not possible for Israel to separate sanctions from the inheritance. Similarly, it was not possible for Israel to separate sanctions from eschatology, i.e., Canaan's eschatology. The victory of Israel over Canaan involved the imposition of negative sanctions. Israel's victory was Canaan's defeat. More to the point, the visible victory of Israel's God was the visible defeat of Canaan's gods. The covenantal victory of God was the necessary corollary of the covenantal defeat of Canaan's gods. It is not covenantally legitimate to discuss eschatology apart from sanctions, any more than it is to discuss God's law apart from the law's specified sanctions. They are a covenantal unit: law, sanctions, and eschatology. Modern Christian theology denies this unbreakable covenantal unity. So did the exodus generation.

21

CITIES OF REFUGE

And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye be come over Jordan into the land of Canaan; Then ye shall appoint you cities to be cities of refuge for you; that the slayer may flee thither, which killeth any person at un-awares. And they shall be unto you cities for refuge from the avenger; that the manslayer die not, until he stand before the congregation in judgment. And of these cities which ye shall give six cities shall ye have for refuge (Num. 35:9–13).

This law rested on the theocentric principle of God as the provider of sanctuaries in history for innocent people who are suspected of wrongdoing. The parallel principle is that the accused person who chooses to dwell outside of these safe havens is totally at risk in a world of imperfect knowledge and imperfect justice.

God gave Levi an inheritance: 48 cities (Num. 35:7). Of these 48 cities, six were designated as cities of refuge (v. 6). God told Israel that three of these cities were to be located inside the boundaries of Canaan; the other three were to be across the Jordan in the lands allocated to Reuben, Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh (v. 14). After the conquest, “they appointed Kedesh in Galilee in mount Naphtali, and Shechem in mount Ephraim, and Kirjath-arba, which is Hebron, in the mountain of Judah. And on the other side Jordan by Jericho eastward, they assigned Bezer in the wilderness upon the plain out of the tribe of Reuben, and Ramoth in Gilead out of the tribe of Gad, and Golan in Bashan out of the tribe of Manasseh” (Josh. 20:7-8).

A. Murder or Accidental Death

These cities of refuge were unique. They offered protection to anyone who innocently caused the death of another.

Thou shalt prepare thee a way, and divide the coasts of thy land, which the LORD thy God giveth thee to inherit, into three parts, that every slayer may flee thither. And this is the case of the slayer, which shall flee thither, that he may live: Whoso killeth his neighbour ignorantly, whom he hated not in time past; As when a man goeth into the wood with his neighbour to hew wood, and his hand fetcheth a stroke with the axe to cut down the tree, and the head slippeth from the helve, and lighteth upon his neighbour, that he die; he shall flee unto one of those cities, and live: Lest the avenger of the blood pursue the slayer, while his heart is hot, and overtake him, because the way is long, and slay him; whereas he was not worthy of death, inasmuch as he hated him not in time past (Deut. 19:3–6).

This grant of protection to the suspect did not relieve judges from the responsibility of trying him. Murder was a capital crime. The elders in the city of refuge did not subsidize murder. They offered a cooling-off period. The congregation in the suspect's community retained primary jurisdiction. "But if he thrust him suddenly without enmity, or have cast upon him any thing without laying of wait, Or with any stone, wherewith a man may die, seeing him not, and cast it upon him, that he die, and was not his enemy, neither sought his harm: Then the congregation shall judge between the slayer and the revenger of blood according to these judgments" (Num. 35:22–24). The question was: Where should the suspect remain in protective custody before the trial? Israel had no prison system. The city of refuge served as a kind of prison for the man: it kept him in, but it kept the blood avenger out. The city did not enforce his functional incarceration; the blood avenger did.

The civil court in the suspect's jurisdiction had primary authority after the suspect had fled to the city of refuge. It could seek his extradition into its protective custody. The elders of his home community would send someone to escort him home. These escorts would protect him from the blood avenger until after the trial. If the local court then declared him innocent, it would send him back to the city of refuge. "Then the congregation shall judge between the slayer and the revenger of blood according to these judgments: And the congregation shall deliver the slayer out of the hand of the revenger of blood, and the congregation shall restore him to the city of his refuge, whither he was fled: and he shall abide in it unto the death of the high priest, which was anointed with the holy oil" (Num. 35:24–25). This congregation must have been located in his home town, for the text required the congregation to restore him to his city of refuge. Obviously, he was not in his city of refuge during the trial. If declared innocent, he would not live among the relatives of the victim until after the death of the high priest. Again, this served as a cooling-off measure.

The local congregation might declare him guilty. It would then turn him over to the blood avenger. "But if any man hate his neighbour, and lie in wait for him, and rise up against him, and smite him mortally that he die, and fleeth into one of these cities: Then the elders of his city shall send and fetch him thence, and deliver him into the hand of the avenger of blood, that he may die. Thine eye shall not pity him, but thou shalt put away the guilt of innocent blood from Israel, that it may go well with thee" (Deut. 19:11–13). The blood avenger would execute the sentence.

B. Degrees of Protection

The city of refuge tried the person initially. The judges listened to his story. If they believed it, he could remain inside the city until his home court demanded his extradition and arranged protective custody for him. Until his community demanded his extradition, he was allowed to remain in the city of refuge, safe from the blood avenger.

That the slayer that killeth any person unawares and unwittingly may flee thither: and they shall be your refuge from the avenger of blood. And when he that doth flee unto one of those cities shall stand at the entering of the gate of the city, and shall declare his cause in the ears of the elders of that city, they shall take him into the city unto them, and give him a place, that he may dwell among them. And if the avenger of blood pursue after him, then they shall not deliver the slayer up into his hand; because he smote his neighbour unwittingly, and hated him not beforetime. And he shall dwell in that city, until he stand before the congregation for judgment, and until the death of the high priest that shall be in those days: then shall the slayer return, and come unto his own city, and unto his own house, unto the city from whence he fled (Josh. 20:3–6).

The civil court in a city of refuge had jurisdiction only within the boundaries of its city. The city was comparable to a modern embassy. Inside its four walls, no other nation exercises jurisdiction. Outside, the laws governing the foreign nation or city are sovereign. Inside the city of refuge, a man was legally immune from attack by the blood avenger. Outside, he was not immune.

It was a matter of jurisdiction. The civil court in a city of refuge possessed a geographically limited jurisdiction in the case of accidental manslaughter. The blood avenger had the primary jurisdiction outside of the city's walls prior to the suspect's trial back home. The suspect's local civil court had jurisdiction, but it had to demand extradition in order to enforce it. When it did so, jurisdiction shifted from both the city of refuge and the blood avenger.

Today, a civil court decides finally who is to blame. In Mosaic Israel, the local court assessed guilt or innocence. But to try the person, the local community had to wait until the city of refuge took him. The avenger of blood—the go'el or ga'al—had the authority to execute the suspect on sight prior to his arrival in a city of refuge.

C. Blood Avenger, Kinsman Redeemer

Mosaic law devotes considerable space to this family office. The kinsman-redeemer was the closest relative. Boaz was Naomi's kinsman-redeemer (Ruth 2:20). God is spoken of as Israel's kinsman-redeemer. "Thus saith the LORD, your redeemer, the Holy One of Israel; For your sake I have sent to Babylon, and have brought down all their nobles, and the Chaldeans, whose cry is in the ships" (Isa. 43:14). David spoke of God as his kinsman-redeemer: "Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be acceptable in thy sight, O LORD, my strength, and my redeemer" (Ps. 19:14). Job viewed God as the final judge: "For I know that my redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth" (Job 19:25).

Yet this redeemer, this deliverer, was also the judge who had the authority to execute a man who had killed the redeemer's nearest of kin. Until the man arrived in a city of refuge, the blood avenger served as jury, judge, and executioner. In Israel, where a death was involved, there was swift justice. This sanction was permanent.

1. Sanctions and Incentives

The death penalty is the limit of any civil sanction. The state is to be neither bloodthirsty, imposing torture or mass executions, nor soft-hearted, imposing a lesser sanction. The incentive either to exceed or avoid imposing God's law is always very great. The Mosaic law had two major methods of assigning the responsibility for executing the capital sanction: shared responsibility and unitary responsibility. Shared responsibility removed the full responsibility from the citizen. The method of execution, stoning, made it impossible for any participant to know if his blow had killed the criminal. Unitary responsibility fell to the blood avenger. The blood avenger knew that his act would kill the suspect. He was the nearest of kin, and he had the incentive to execute judgment. But there was only one blood avenger. Everyone else in the community had to restrain himself. There were to be neither mobs nor clan feuds in Israel. Both shared responsibility and unitary responsibility were under God's law and his restraints. The restraint in this case was geographical: a city of refuge.

The office of blood avenger was designed to reduce the threat of clan or family feuds. One person was designated as a lawful agent of the state. His lethal action kept the violence from spreading. When a family member was killed, the family as a unit did not seek vengeance. One member did. In fact, the other members of the family were not allowed to restrain the suspect from fleeing to a city of refuge. No family could assign the task of hunting down the suspect to the fastest runner in the family. The office was held strictly on a next-of-kin basis.

The tribes could more easily restrict bloodshed from spreading by keeping the roads open. To give the suspect a better opportunity to reach a court, the tribes made sure that easy access was possible. The Mosaic law also allowed travellers to eat a handful of food free of charge (Deut. 23:24–25; Matt. 12:1). The man who was killed by a blood avenger had been given an opportunity to escape. His family had less incentive to retaliate against a member of another family, since the same legal protection was available to all. To exact vengeance against the blood avenger in such a case, let alone against other family members of the deceased victim, was to remove the protection that the city of refuge offered to everyone.

Open roads were therefore a life-and-death issue. Everyone had an incentive to support the maintenance of open roads leading to one or more cities of refuge. The Bible does not establish who has jurisdiction over roads, but the system of refuge cities indicates that for roads connecting to, or feeding into, these cities of refuge, the state had an obligation to build and maintain them as part of the judicial system. There would have been no toll roads into these cities. To have established tolls would have been to sell access to justice. The Bible does not authorize such a system of justice.

D. The Presumption of Guilt and Innocence

The man who accidentally killed his neighbor was automatically presumed guilty by the blood avenger. This means that the slain victim, who could not speak on his own behalf, was automatically presumed innocent. The suspect was not allowed to defend himself physically against the blood avenger; to have done so would have been assault or murder. In the latter case, the state would have imposed the death penalty. The innocent man would have forfeited his innocence by killing his lawful pursuer. The courts recognized the right of the blood avenger to execute the suspect. Had they not done so, powerful suspects could have disposed of speedy but ineffective avengers.

With respect to everyone else in Israel, the suspect was not considered guilty. He had the right of protection if he reached a city of refuge. He could not be killed by the blood avenger within the walls of that city. At the death of the high priest, he returned home in safety: innocent for life.

This reduced the cost of murder trials in Israel. The suspect bore the cost of fleeing to a city of refuge. He would have started running as soon as he recognized that his victim was dead. This surely would have increased the likelihood that he would have done his best to save the victim's life if he appeared as though he could be saved. But once the victim was dead, there was no time to waste.

The blood avenger, who was probably biased in favor of the victim, would bear the cost of pursuing the suspect. No one else would. The judges in a city of refuge, presumably with no bias against the suspect, would conduct the preliminary hearing. If the suspect wanted to bring witnesses on his behalf, he or the witnesses would have borne the expense of travel. The city of refuge supplied only the judges. This would have taken place only when the suspect managed to make it to the city. This means that the bulk of the cost of prosecuting murder suspects would have been borne by the blood avenger. The defense cost would have been borne mostly by the suspect. This system allocated the costs of murder to those with the greatest incentive to gain a settlement.

The system also forced a suspect to identify himself publicly. Running away did not imply his guilt. He headed for a city of refuge where he could publicly protest his innocence. The blood avenger knew where to find him. The cost of tracing the suspect was low. If he was innocent, the refuge city's judges might protect him. If he was guilty, the blood avenger knew where to plead his case. There would be fewer unsolved murders in Israel because of this system. An unsolved murder was a major problem in Israel because of bloodguilt. This is why there was a formal system of public expiation for unsolved deaths (Deut. 21:1–9). “So shalt thou put away the guilt of innocent blood from among you, when thou shalt do that which is right in the sight of the LORD” (Deut. 21:9).

The dead man could not speak on his own behalf. This is why the suspect was presumed guilty by the victim’s family, but only one person could lawfully apply the appropriate sanction apart from a trial: the kinsman redeemer, who acted judicially on behalf of the victim. The refuge city system increased the incentive for a suspect to prove his case in a civil court. He had to identify himself as a suspect to the authorities.

E. Personal Boundaries and Defensive Jurisdiction

Not every death was under the jurisdiction of the blood avenger. The blood avenger gained jurisdiction over suspects who had been involved in what appeared to be an unrelated activity, such as work, where what could have been an accident caused a death. There were certain situations in which circumstances indicated that the victim had initiated the violence. In this case, a blood avenger had no jurisdiction.

A deceased intruder was retroactively presumed guilty. When a householder killed an unknown thief or intruder inside the boundaries of his house when it was obvious that the intruder had no legitimate reason to be inside, there was no question of the householder’s liability (Ex. 22:2–4). He was innocent. An intruder who came into the house at night had no legal rights. The blood avenger had no jurisdiction. The house’s boundaries testified against the intruder.

If a man attacked another man in front of witnesses, and the defender killed him, the blood avenger had no jurisdiction. The slayer’s boundaries had been violated. He was presumed innocent; only a local court could declare him guilty.

The case laws indicate that the victim had not initiated violence against the slayer. The slayer’s rock or axe head had caused the fatal injury. The victim had done nothing to bring on the response of the slayer. He had violated no boundaries. The witnesses, if any, could not speak definitively on behalf of the slayer or the slain. In such a case, the victim was presumed innocent. The blood avenger then had lawful jurisdiction until the suspect could place himself inside the walls of a city of refuge.

The refuge city system was designed to overcome two crucial features of Israelite society: the limits of knowledge and the tendency of clan societies to develop blood feuds. The limits of knowledge are universal; clan societies are not. Israel was a tribal society. A tribal society is a usually clan-based society, for families, including extended families, possess their civil jurisdiction through a tribal council or court. The legal hierarchy is tribal. The civil sanctions are imposed tribally: in Israel's case, corporate stoning. Thus, families within a tribal society are tempted to seek analogous authority to impose final sanctions, since the judicial system appears to be based on bloodlines. This is the sociological basis of clan feuds.

Israel established limits on such a development. The Levites were one limit: counsel from outside the tribe's regional authority. The cities of refuge, which were all Levitical cities, were another limitation. The blood avenger seems to be a clannish office, but it operated to limit the spread of clan feuds. In fact, the blood avenger was an agent of the state who received his office through the family. His authority to impose lawful sanctions was limited by the civil congregation of his own city and by the mortality of the high priest.

F. The Death of the High Priest

We are not told why the high priest had to die in order for the innocent man to be released. The high priest's death had preeminence over the civil government of the innocent man's local community as well as over the blood avenger. The "blood feud," i.e., the family or clan feud, had to be eliminated. There had to be a healing judicial act which would overcome the blood lust of the avenger. It was not enough for a local court to declare the suspect innocent. There had to be a death. The death of the high priest was a substitutionary atonement. The dead man had been presumed the victim of foul play by his family. The local court had overturned this judgment on the basis of incomplete evidence, but the case was not settled permanently until the high priest died. The suspect then had his name cleared in history. No further act of violence against him was legal. The blood avenger had no further jurisdiction.

There has to be a way to bring disputes to a peaceful end. The costs of perpetual warfare are too high. Such conflicts undermine peace. Too many resources must otherwise be expended to reduce violence. The death of the high priest ended all defense costs for the suspect. The high priest's death called into session the court of highest earthly appeal, which automatically handed down a verdict of "innocent.” The authority of the court of the city of refuge was thereby extended beyond the jurisdiction of the city.

This law is no longer in force. It cannot be; there is no earthly high priest. Without a mortal high priest, there would be no way for an innocent man ever to return to his home. There would be no prospect of full liberty for the innocent man. This law was operationally annulled with the exile, when Israel lost jurisdiction over civil justice inside its boundaries. It was definitively annulled with the death of the true high priest, Jesus Christ.

Conclusion

The cities of refuge were designed to reduce conflict, especially family feuds. The initial burden of proof was on the suspect. If he was fleet of foot, he might escape judgment by the blood avenger. If he could plead his case to the judges of the city of refuge, he could live. If he subsequently persuaded his local court, he would have been returned to the city of refuge that had sheltered him. If he outlived the high priest, he could lawfully return to his community.

Blood had been shed, and it had to be atoned for. The judicial issue here was expiation: cleansing bloodguilt for the land and for the victim’s family. The refuge city system reduced the number of unsolved cases of murder. This protected the land. The death of the high priest provided the final expiation for the original bloody act. This protected the local community from the heavy costs of family feuds.

To protect themselves, communities had to keep the roads open. Roads in Israel were both judicial and sacramental: judicial with respect to the cities of refuge; sacramental with respect to the festivals and required sacrifices at the central city. There is no biblical evidence that state highway construction was justified on the basis of its positive economic effects, although the roads surely had positive economic effects. What the roads were intended to provide was access to justice and access to expiation. Both justice and expiation were geographically based. “Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her, that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned: for she hath received of the LORD’s hand double for all her sins. The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the LORD, make straight in the desert a highway for our God. Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low: and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain: And the glory of the LORD shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together: for the mouth of the LORD hath spoken it" (Isa. 40:2–5).

Having to dwell inside the boundaries of a city of refuge until the high priest died was a negative sanction. The person so condemned probably would have had to change occupations. He would have had to learn to compete in a completely different environment. This no doubt was an incentive for those working in jobs that involved imposing risk on others to take care of their equipment.

The odd thing is that the Mosaic law was silent about what family sanctions there were against accidental manslaughter inside a city of refuge. Presumably, the kinsman-redeemer did not possess the power of enforcement against anyone who lived inside a city of refuge. If so, then the city of refuge would have been a more risky place to work: less care regarding the repair of the tools of one's trade. The threat of living inside the confines of a city of refuge would have weighed less heavily on someone who already lived in one.

The fact that the victim's family received nothing from the person who had caused the death but escaped to a city of refuge indicates that Mosaic civil law did not rest on the doctrine of strict liability. Strict liability requires the person who inflicts an injury to compensate the victim, no matter what the circumstances. Mosaic law rested on a much less rigorous concept of liability. If a damage-producer could not reasonably have foreseen it, the state allowed him a way to avoid making full compensation on an eye-for-eye basis. Men are not omniscient; biblical law acknowledges this fact in its concept of liability.

22

TRIBAL INHERITANCE

This is the thing which the LORD doth command concerning the daughters of Zelophehad, saying, Let them marry to whom they think best; only to the family of the tribe of their father shall they marry. So shall not the inheritance of the children of Israel remove from tribe to tribe: for every one of the children of Israel shall keep himself to the inheritance of the tribe of his fathers. And every daughter, that possesseth an inheritance in any tribe of the children of Israel, shall be wife unto one of the family of the tribe of her father, that the children of Israel may enjoy every man the inheritance of his fathers. Neither shall the inheritance remove from one tribe to another tribe; but every one of the tribes of the children of Israel shall keep himself to his own inheritance (Num. 36:6–9).

The theocentric issue here is inheritance, which was a matter of upholding the family's name, just as God upholds His (Ex. 20:7).¹ The tribe of Manasseh was divided. Half of the tribe lived in Gilead, that section of Israel which lay beyond the Jordan. The chief rulers of this part of the tribe approached Moses with a question: What about the jubilee year?

And they said, The LORD commanded my lord to give the land for an inheritance by lot to the children of Israel: and my lord was commanded by the LORD to give the inheritance of Zelophehad our brother unto his daughters. And if they be married to any of the sons of the other tribes of the children of Israel, then shall their inheritance be taken from the inheritance of our fathers, and shall be put to the inheritance of the tribe whereunto they are received: so shall it be taken from the lot of our inheritance. And when the jubilee of the children of Israel shall be, then shall their inheritance be put unto the inheritance of the tribe whereunto they are received: so shall their inheritance be taken away from the inheritance of the tribe of our fathers (vv. 2–4).

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Pt. 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 23.

The five daughters of Zelophehad had previously come to Moses with a question: What about their inheritance? More to the point, what about the survival of their father's name in Israel? "Our father died in the wilderness, and he was not in the company of them that gathered themselves together against the LORD in the company of Korah; but died in his own sin, and had no sons. Why should the name of our father be done away from among his family, because he hath no son? Give unto us therefore a possession among the brethren of our father" (Num 27:3–4). The law was silent on this matter. The daughters did not want to lose their land, but the Mosaic law weighed heavily on the side of masculine authority. They sought a clear-cut ruling from God: Did God place the preservation of masculine authority above feminine authority to the extent of removing a man's inheritance from his exclusively female progeny? "And Moses brought their cause before the LORD. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, The daughters of Zelophehad speak right: thou shalt surely give them a possession of an inheritance among their father's brethren; and thou shalt cause the inheritance of their father to pass unto them. And thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel, saying, If a man die, and have no son, then ye shall cause his inheritance to pass unto his daughter" (Num. 27:5–8).

Household authority rather than gender was primary in Israel. Like the widow who became the head of her household, and who thereby gained the right to declare a vow independently of a man (Num. 30:9), so were the daughters of a man who died without sons. His name was to be preserved in Israel through his offspring. Daughters rather than brothers were the means of preserving his name.

A. Adoption Through Marriage

A problem still remained: What about marriage? When a man married, his wife brought a dowry into the marriage. The dowry was what distinguished a wife from a concubine. The dowry was generally provided by the bridegroom: a bride price. This is why Saul established the terms of his daughter's dowry for David: the foreskins of a hundred Philistines (I Sam. 18:25). Because the bridegroom provided the bride price, a daughter was not an economic burden on her brothers. Her dowry did not cost them part of their inheritance. A sister was not a source of negative economic sanctions in the family.² In contrast, a son inherited a portion of his father's land. This capitalized his branch of the family. This is how a man's name was normally preserved in Israel.

Then what about marriage? If the daughter inherited a portion of her father's land, and her husband was outside the tribe, would the tribe's inheritance be reduced? The jubilee law as written indicated that this was the case. The issue was judicial: adoption. The bride was adopted into her husband's family. We know this because of the response of the tribal leaders. If the wife had not become a member of her husband's family, which could take place only through adoption, then the problem the leaders brought before Moses would never have arisen. But the husband was under the authority of another tribe. Through his authority over his wife, based on her adoption into his household, his tribe would gain authority over the legacy of the man who died without sons.

The judicial solution was tribal. If a daughter married a man who was a member of her tribe, she inherited her father's land. If he was outside her tribe, she forfeited her inheritance. This inheritance was part of her tribe's inheritance. It was located within the legal boundaries established by lot (Num. 36:2). The tribe's judicial authority extended to its borders. The enforcement of God's civil law was tribal. Each tribe would apply God's law locally as it saw fit. This judicial decentralization was a major source of liberty in pre-exilic Israel. The central civil government could not impose its will over the tribes apart from an appeals system (Ex. 18).

The creation of geographical zones exempt from local tribal law would have undermined this decentralized system of rule. If one tribe could extend its authority by means of marriage, this would have subsidized a form of inter-tribal imperialism. The power of one tribe could have been extended through a program of seeking out brotherless virgins in another tribe. These women, already vulnerable, would have become pawns in a game of inter-tribal politics. To protect them, and to protect the regional authority of each tribe, God revealed a solution: the forfeiture of landed inheritance by a woman adopted into the family of a rival tribe. Landed inheritance was not strictly individualistic. "If a man have two wives, one beloved, and another hated, and they have born him children, both the beloved and the hated; and if the firstborn son be hers that was hated: Then it shall be, when he maketh his sons to inherit that which he hath, that he may not make the son of the beloved firstborn before the son of the hated, which is indeed the firstborn: But he shall acknowledge the son of the hated for the firstborn, by giving him a double portion of all that he hath: for he is the beginning of his strength; the right of the firstborn is his" (Deut. 21:15–17).³ It was also not strictly familistic, as the case law of Zelophehad's daughters indicates. It was partially tribal. "Neither shall the inheritance remove from one tribe to another tribe; but everyone of the tribes of the children of Israel shall keep himself to his own inheritance" (Num. 36:9). The preservation of a man's name mandated the preservation of his tribe's name. The preservation of a man's inheritance mandated the preservation of his tribe's authority over his land. Only with the defeat of Israel by Assyria and the defeat of Judah by Babylon did this system of tribal authority end. It ended because the hierarchy of civil authority was transferred by God from Israel to a series of pagan empires.

2. Ibid., Pt. 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 47.

B. Progressive Revelation and Eschatology

Perhaps more than any other incident in Scripture, the story of Zelophehad's daughters reveals the progressive nature of God's revelation in biblical history. The jubilee land law was incomplete. It did not answer the question: What if an Israelite dies without sons? This question was raised by the five daughters in Numbers 27. Moses asked God; God replied: daughters should inherit, not the man's brothers or his uncles. But this answer raised another question: What if a daughter marries a man from outside her tribe? This was a problem because of a judicial issue that is never directly raised in the Mosaic law but which is the most fundamental of all judicial issues: adoption. Ultimately, this is the issue of redemption: the transition from wrath to grace. While the Mosaic law does not discuss it, this issue underlies the entire system: adoption into a tribe through a family or a city (citizenship); adoption into a family through marriage (inheritance); adoption of one family's inter-generational slave into another Israelite family (liberation).

God did not reveal the details of all this at one point in time. He revealed it over time. The jubilee law did not answer all of the problems of inheritance. Neither did God's initial revelation to Moses regarding the daughters of Zelophehad. He waited for the appearance of the moral discipline that used to be called casuistry—the systematic application of God’s law to specific cases—to reveal new problems. Then He revealed the answers through Moses.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 50.

With the closing of the canon of Scripture, progressive revelation ceased. No new revelation comes to man that has authority equal to that of the Bible. A claim of judicial equality is in fact a claim of judicial superiority, for that which lawfully interprets past judgments is judicially superior to the past. God’s revelation in Numbers 36 was superior to what He revealed in Numbers 27. That which He revealed in Numbers 27 was superior to what He had revealed in Leviticus 25.

Casuistry did not cease with the closing of the canon of Scripture. Casuistry is basic to every legal system. In the West, casuistry ceased to be practiced by Protestants around the year 1700.⁴ The demise of Protestant casuistry was part of a larger social transformation: the replacement of Puritanism’s theocratic ideal by Newtonian rationalism, Enlightenment speculation, and political secularism. The kingdom of God was progressively restricted to heart, hearth, and church. This was a denial of the comprehensive claims of God on man and his institutions.⁵ The revelation of the Bible was assumed to be irrelevant to civil affairs. The revealed law of God was assumed to be subordinate to both natural law and common law because natural law is supposedly more universal than biblical law, and common law is second in authority after natural law. The categories of space and time were invoked against biblical law. They still are, although the category of time is generally given precedence: the doctrine of evolution. Cultural relativism has generally replaced natural law theory in academic circles.

This raises the issue of eschatology. If God’s law can never extend to the four corners of the earth through mass evangelism and conversion, then the common-ground categories of space and time will continue to supersede the category of biblical law in the thinking of the vast majority of Christians. That is, if progressive sanctification is eschatologically impossible outside the boundaries of heart, hearth, and church, the kingdom of God must remain confined in history to cultural ghettos. The revealed law of God loses its operational authority because it supposedly was circumscribed spatially and temporally. This ignores the existence of God's specially revealed cross-boundary laws.⁶ Their existence was manifested in the ministry of Jonah, who prophesied God's corporate negative sanctions against Nineveh. Cross-boundary laws are geographically universal. They are also temporally binding.

4. Kenneth E. Kirk, Conscience and Its Problems: An Introduction to Casuistry, new ed. (London: Longmans, Green, 1948), pp. 206–207.

5. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

Only with a restoration of biblical casuistry can the kingdom of God be consummated in history.⁷ But until there is widespread belief in the triumph of the gospel in history, casuistry will remain, at best, the hobby of a handful of Christian academics with a lot of time on their hands.

Conclusion

The case law application of the jubilee law which we find in Numbers 36 ends the Book of Numbers. There is no question what the issue was: inheritance. This is the issue of continuity in history. In the context of Mosaic Israel, this issue was the preservation of a man's name. But it also involved his tribe's name. It had to do with the messianic prophecy of Jacob regarding the coming of Shiloh. "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be" (Gen. 49:10). This was a seed law. It was also a land law: the preservation of the judicial authority of the tribes in a decentralized holy commonwealth. This judicial commonwealth ceased in the realm of civil government with the exile. So did the land laws in their original form.

6. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed, (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), Conclusion, C:4.

7. North, Authority and Dominion, Appendix Q.

CONCLUSION

Harden not your heart, as in the provocation, and as in the day of temptation in the wilderness: When your fathers tempted me, proved me, and saw my work. Forty years long was I grieved with this generation, and said, It is a people that do err in their heart, and they have not known my ways: Unto whom I sware in my wrath that they should not enter into my rest (Ps. 95:8–11).

The Book of Numbers is the Pentateuch's book of sanctions: the fourth book in the Pentateuch. Oath/sanctions is point four of the five-point biblical covenant model.¹ The Book of Numbers is an integral part of the five books of Moses. Its theme—sanctions—is integral to the five-point biblical covenant model.

The book begins with the mustering of the holy army of God. This was the second mustering. The first had taken place about seven months earlier (Ex. 38:26). The third and final mustering took place just before the conquest of Canaan (Num. 26). A numbering required the payment of atonement money for the blood to be shed in the subsequent battles of the army (Ex. 30:12, 15).²

A. The Slave's Mentality

The Israelites had spent their lives as slaves. Through their leaders, they had resisted Moses and Aaron after the two had confronted Pharaoh (Ex. 5:20–21). In refusing to heed this request by Israel's elders, Moses and Aaron replaced them as national leaders by the time of the exodus. Each of God's ten negative sanctions against the Egyptians followed a confrontation between Moses and Pharaoh. These sanctions publicly ratified God's sovereignty over Pharaoh.³ They also ratified the transfer of civil and ecclesiastical authority from the existing

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Pt. 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 50.

3. Ibid., Pt. 1, Representation and Dominion (1985).

rulers of Israel to Moses and Aaron. The exodus, which culminated in Israel's crossing of the Red Sea (positive sanction) and the drowning of Pharaoh and his charioteers (negative sanction), was the final ratification of this transfer of authority. But as the Book of Numbers reveals, these foundational sanctions in the history of Israel did not completely persuade the ex-slaves. They repeatedly lost faith in Moses' leadership, which meant that they repeatedly lost faith in the God whom Moses represented, and who consistently brought visible sanctions in response to Moses' words. Moses' ability to forecast God's immediate sanctions identified him as a prophet, yet the people resisted Moses' words and God's ratification of them. In this sense, they were like their former master, Pharaoh. They would promise to obey, but then they refused.

Slaves depend on masters. The master first makes plans; he then works to carry them out. He gathers resources, which includes slaves. He owns both the raw materials and the slaves. The model for the office of master is God the Creator, who created raw materials and then created Adam. God owned all of these resources because He created them. He delegated responsibility to Adam to administer His resources in terms of a goal: Adam's judicially representative dominion over the earth (Gen. 1:26).⁴ To one degree or other, the master delegates responsibility to his slaves; if he did not, he would have to do the work himself. Of what economic use would such unemployed slaves be? They would be little more than adornments for the master: consumer goods.

1. Representation

A good slave must learn to think his master's thoughts representatively. He should think to himself, "How would my master want me to do this?" This is why Christ warned: "No servant can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon" (Luke 16:13).⁵ A good slave will not do things the way his evil master would. He therefore becomes unfaithful to his master, even if his acts increase his master's wealth. He becomes a representative of another, higher master, the heavenly master who lays down the law in history and enforces it in history. This is why bad masters lose control over good slaves in history. The good master eventually delivers good slaves from their intermediary bad masters. He does this in history. The nineteenth century is proof.

4. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 3.

5. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 39.

The Israelites had lived in Egypt under two masters: God and the supposedly divine Pharaoh. As time went on, and as deliverance seemed to be delayed, they took on the moral characteristics of their earthly master, Pharaoh. We see this in the first confrontation between Moses and Pharaoh: Moses' slaying of the cruel taskmaster. The Israelites were envious of him. They preferred to see him torn down from his position of authority rather than have him rule over them. "And when he went out the second day, behold, two men of the Hebrews strove together: and he said to him that did the wrong, Wherefore smitest thou thy fellow? And he said, Who made thee a prince and a judge over us? intendest thou to kill me, as thou killedst the Egyptian? And Moses feared, and said, Surely this thing is known" (Ex. 2:13–14). That phrase, "Who made thee a prince and a judge over us?" was to become the constant refrain of the Israelites in the wilderness. The answer was obvious: God had. In rejecting the leadership of Moses, they were rejecting the authority of God. This was God's testimony to Samuel half a millennium later: "And the LORD said unto Samuel, Hearken unto the voice of the people in all that they say unto thee: for they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them. According to all the works which they have done since the day that I brought them up out of Egypt even unto this day, wherewith they have forsaken me, and served other gods, so do they also unto thee" (I Sam. 8:7–8). They wanted a leader like the other nations had, which meant that they wanted gods like the other nations had. They preferred Pharaoh to Moses. They preferred the golden calf to God.

2. Time Preference

The Israelites were marked by impatience. In their years in Egypt, they had grown impatient with God. They looked to Pharaoh as the ultimate sanctions-bringer in history. Yet God operated on a very strict timetable. "And it came to pass at the end of the four hundred and thirty years, even the selfsame day it came to pass, that all the hosts of the LORD went out from the land of Egypt" (Ex. 12:41).⁶ This impa-

6. The actual time they spent inside Egypt's national borders was 215 years; the tience is a familiar theme in the Book of Numbers. The golden calf incident was typical of Israel's entire wilderness experience: with Moses absent, the people played with idols.

This short time frame is common to lower-class people, who are present-oriented.⁷ They are slaves to the present. The Bible says that we must be slaves to the future.⁸ God rules the future as absolutely as He rules the present and the past. An important mark of His people's faithfulness is their confidence in the future, for it is governed by God's eternal decree. This is seen through faith, since we cannot see the future. But God's reliability has been revealed in the Bible through the prophets' accurate predictions of future events.⁹ The mark of the true prophet was two-fold: accurate predictions regarding the future (Deut. 18:22) and faithful theological testimony regarding the one true God (Deut. 13:1–5).

A person who is future-oriented is upper class, no matter what his present income is. His thinking is characterized by long-range planning, thrift, and a willingness to defer gratification. Mises calls this phenomenon low time-preference. The future-oriented person is willing to lend at comparatively low rates of interest. He is unwilling to borrow at high rates of interest in order to fund present consumption.¹⁰

The generation of the exodus could not plan for the future successfully. They were trapped by their own present-orientation. They could not see beyond the present. They were therefore blind to the reality of the past. They kept crying out to Moses to take them back to Egypt. They remembered the past in terms of the low-risk immobility of slavery. The past deliverances of God did not persuade them to accept His promise of future protection because they had no confidence time they spent under Egypt's kingdom authority, which extended to Canaan, was 430 years. See North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 1:A.

7. Edward C. Banfield, The Unheavenly City: The Nature and Future of Our Urban Crisis (Boston: Little, Brown, 1970), pp. 47–48, 53–54.

8. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 16:B.

9. This is why higher critics of the Old Testament invariably conclude that prophetic passages that demonstrably came true, most notably those in Daniel forecasting three future empires, were written after the fact. The suggestion that some men can know the future in detail is an implicit affirmation of teleology: a future that is fixed, i.e., not open-ended in terms of the present. It affirms predestination. Only man is allowed by humanists to seek to predestine the future, and even he is not acknowledged as being capable of achieving this goal.

10. On time-preference and the rate of interest, see Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. 19. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>) in history. They did not believe that the events of the exodus testified to the reliability of God's covenant with them. They did not believe Moses when he prophesied the positive sanction of future victory. They demanded constant reassurance. "What have you done for us lately?" was their constant rhetorical question to Moses, and therefore to God.

In this sense, they were radical empiricists: spiritual forefathers of David Hume and modern existentialists. For the radical empiricist, there is no continuity of law in history. Patterns of cause and effect that individuals believe they have observed in the past do not prove the continuing existence of the same fixed patterns in their observations, let alone in the world beyond their observations, whether in the present or the future. The fact that a radical empiricist remembers that when he stuck his finger into boiling water, it hurt, does not prove to him that it will hurt the next time he does this. The mother's warning to her small child who is about to touch a hot stove—"Hot! Hot!"—may persuade the small child not to touch it after a few painful experiences, or even after one, but this does not persuade the radical empiricist to change his theory of causation and perception.¹¹ The small child possesses greater epistemological clarity and more common sense than the radical empiricist. Similarly, the children of the exodus generation had more sense than their parents. They, unlike their parents, learned from experience.

B. Sanctions and Inheritance

The Israelites departed from Egypt bearing spoils. The sons of Israel survived the corporate negative sanction of the death of the firstborn. All of Egypt's firstborn sons perished on the night of the Passover. Their inheritance went to the departing Israelites. The positive sanction of inheritance was based on the negative sanction of disinheritance. There was a biblical principle at work here: "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov. 13:22). The Book of Proverbs extends this principle: "The curse of the LORD is in the house of the wicked: but he blesseth the habitation of the just" (3:33). "The memory of the just is blessed: but the name of the wicked shall rot" (10:7).

11. I think this has something to do with Jesus' warning about hell: "Hot! Hot!" Rebellious children do not listen. They prefer to remain radical empiricists rather than become Christians. "Show me!" they cry. Jesus rose from the dead to ratify the reliability of His warning. The radical empiricist then cries: "Show me again!" He refuses to accept God's testimony (Luke 16:30–31).

The status of the Levites as the tribe in charge of the sacrifices also reveals this relationship between sanctions and inheritance. The sacrificial system was a system of negative sanctions applied to judicial representatives (animals) by judicial representatives (priests). The priesthood represented the firstborn sons of Israel. They had achieved this lofty status because they had shed the blood of 3,000 Israelites after the golden calf incident.¹² But the status of the firstborn was ultimately not lofty, for the firstborn son was under a curse: a representative of Adam, God's firstborn. Only because God accepted an animal substitute did the firstborn sons of Israel survive Passover night. Had there not been a sacrifice, the firstborn sons of Israel would have perished as surely as the firstborn sons of Egypt did. Because the Passover lambs were disinherited, the firstborn sons of Israel inherited. Because the 3,000 sons of Israel were disinherited by the Levites, the Levites inherited the unique judicial status of the nation's priestly tribe. But this judicial status involved great risk: life lived within the sacred boundaries of the tabernacle-temple. Violations of sacred space and sacred ritual could bring death (Lev. 10:1–2). The inheritance of Eleazar and Ithamar was based on the disinheritance of Nadab and Abihu (v. 6).

Canaan was supposed to be disinherited by Israel. This disinheritance would be the basis of Israel's inheritance. This transfer of wealth was based on ethics, not power. God had told Abraham: "But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full" (Gen. 15:16). Corporate, national iniquity was the covenantal basis of the disinheritance of the Amorites. The progressive rebellion of the Amorites was cumulative. It moved toward eschatological fulfillment.

C. Sanctions and Eschatology

Israel had been given an eschatology: guaranteed inheritance through military conquest. The exodus generation had not believed this eschatology. Or, more to the point, that generation refused to believe that the eschatological fulfillment of the promise of a land flowing with milk and honey was in any way associated with Israel's prophetic role as a sanctions-bringer in Canaan. Israel rejected the specified terms of the inheritance: military conquest. So, the next generation would inherit. This meant that each of Israel's holy warriors would have to accept both the obligation and threat of personal military sanctions in battle. Israel's national inheritance was tied to the presence of these sanctions.

12. Chapter 4.

This leads us to a theological conclusion. Point four of the biblical covenant model is sanctions. It is as tied judicially to point five, inheritance, as it is to point three: law. God imposes historical sanctions, positive and negative, in terms of His covenant law. These sanctions result in inheritance by His covenant people and the disinheritance of covenant-breakers. This is why theonomy is inescapably and indissolubly tied to eschatology. Theonomy is inherently postmillennial because theonomy is biblical law, and biblical law is indissolubly linked to God's covenant sanctions in history. Law without sanctions is mere opinion. Theonomy without predictable historical sanctions is mere opinion—one not widely shared. Theonomy without postmillennialism is God's law without predictable sanctions—sanctions that lead to the victory of God's kingdom, in time and on earth.

The New Covenant has not annulled the covenantal structure of inheritance. On the contrary, the New Covenant reaffirms it. "Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth" (Matt. 5:5). The New Covenant was marked by a transfer of inheritance from Israel to the church. "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43). This transfer was visibly imposed by God through Rome's destruction of the temple in A.D. 70.¹³

Like the generation of the exodus, the vast majority of today's Christians steadfastly maintain that the covenantal structure of inheritance no longer applies in history. Amillennialism and premillennialism march arm in arm on this point. Amillennialists insist that God will progressively impose corporate negative sanctions against the church. Christendom as a civilization will be suppressed, if it has not already been consigned by God to the ash can of history. Not only that, antinomian amillennialists insist, the very idea of Christendom is a perverse legacy of Old Covenant Israel. They dismiss the ideal of Christendom as "Constantinian."

Meanwhile, premillennialists are divided. Historic premillennialists, whose ranks are thin, agree with the amillennialists: until Christ returns to set up His earthly kingdom, things will get worse for God's people. The dispensationalists insist that things would get worse were it not for the rapture. The church will be delivered out of history. Both of these eschatologies agree: the covenantal structure of history has been reversed by God. Covenant-keepers will be progressively disinherited, which covenant-breakers will inherit the earth. Only the cessation of history—by either the final judgment or the rapture—can bring back the covenantal structure of history as it existed under the Old Covenant. The New Covenant is, to this extent, a burden of cosmic proportions for God's people compared to the Old Covenant. The death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ in history brought a harsh legacy into history, we are assured by pessimillennialists: the reversal of the covenant's basis of inheritance. Their eschatologies are consistent with their view of sanctions, i.e., that covenant-breakers will progressively impose historical sanctions on covenant-keepers. Pessimillennialists have a consistent theology of historical sanctions and inheritance: covenant-breakers will inevitably inherit in history because God has predestinated them to impose historical sanctions on the church. This was the operational eschatology of all those who sought to stone Caleb and Joshua.

13. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

The suggestion that all three eschatological views can coexist indefinitely inside the same ecclesiastical organization is necessarily a suggestion that neither covenant theology nor eschatology matters decisively in the life of the church. Both doctrines are to this extent adiaphora: things indifferent to the Christian faith. Ultimately, this suggestion of eschatological pluralism is highly partisan. It favors the worldview and anti-Christendom agendas of both amillennialism and premillennialism, for these outlooks are united in their opposition to the covenantal structure of inheritance and disinheritance in the New Testament era. In the name of eschatological neutrality, amillennialists and premillennialists come to postmillennialists and ask them to agree that covenantal postmillennialism's view of the past and the future is, historically speaking, a moot point. Moot points are mute points. This is an ancient lure: the myth of neutrality. It is offered in the name of peace and growth. It is the myth that undergirds all forms of confessional pluralism.

This is why a consistent theonomist must reject eschatological pluralism as an ideal for the creeds and confessions of the churches. There is no eschatological neutrality in the Bible. Premillennialism, amillennialism, and postmillennialism cannot all be true. If they are said to be judicially equal, then eschatology is necessarily reduced to the status of adiaphora. A church that is not postmillennial is like the generation of the exodus: fearful of judicial and cultural victory, committed to wilderness wandering as a way of cultural life, and hostile to those who, like Caleb and Joshua, predict inevitable victory in history.

To discuss eschatology apart from a consideration of God's law and historical sanctions is to ignore the covenant's structure. The covenant is a unified system. It cannot be broken analytically and still retain its authority. Any consideration of inheritance, either in eternity or in history, has to include the doctrines of sanctions, law, authority, and the sovereignty of God. A discussion of eschatology apart from historical sanctions is as misleading as a discussion of prophecy apart from the sovereignty of God. To say that something must happen in the future while asserting that man is totally free to choose a different future is covenantally absurd. It is equally absurd covenantally to discuss eschatology without discussing sanctions: covenantal cause and effect. It is also covenantally absurd to discuss God's historical sanctions without discussing God's law. The covenant is a unit. It cannot be broken.

Postmillennialists can afford to be patient. They understand that the future will bring victory for Christ's church in history. Christendom will be established in history. So, they can afford to do the work of dominion inside the boundaries of eschatologically pluralist churches. They know that, when victory becomes visible over time, the defenders of pessimillennialism will face a much smaller audience. Most people prefer success to failure, dominion to martyrdom. They understand and believe the economist's dictum: "It is better to be rich and healthy than it is to be poor and sick (other things being equal)." Pessimillennialism is popular when things are going badly for the church and kingdom. It offers deliverance out of history: rapture or second coming. But when things start going better, and keep going better, Christians will at long last understand that the establishment of the kingdom of God on earth and in history is what is mandated by the Great Commission.¹⁴ Then will be the time to revise the eschatological portions of various ecclesiastical confessions of faith.

Conclusion

The Book of Numbers is the Pentateuch's book of sanctions. It ends with the story of Zelophehad's daughters. The leaders of the tribe of Manasseh wanted to know about a specific application of the jubilee's laws of inheritance. Would a tribe's land pass to another tribe if an inheriting daughter married a man from the other tribe? The answer was no. This is a fitting conclusion to the book of sanctions. It leads to the fifth book of the Pentateuch, Deuteronomy: the book of inheritance.

14. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

APPENDIX

HOW LARGE WAS ISRAEL'S POPULATION?

So were all those that were numbered of the children of Israel, by the house of their fathers, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war in Israel; Even all they that were numbered were six hundred thousand and three thousand and five hundred and fifty (Num. 1:45–46).

And all the firstborn males by the number of names, from a month old and upward, of those that were numbered of them, were twenty and two thousand two hundred and threescore and thirteen (Num. 3:43).

Commentators have argued for over a century about the size of Israel's population. Liberals and those influenced by them want to downsize it. Conservatives are at a loss explaining how it got as large as the biblical texts say that it did. There are a whole series of problems in assessing the demographics of Mosaic Israel.

Conservative Bible commentator Gordon Wenham provided several arguments as to why the texts' population figures are wrong—perhaps by as much as a factor of 100 to one. His arguments reveal the extent to which modern evangelical Bible commentators have mimicked higher critics in their ready acceptance of the hypothesis of extensive textual corruption. Jacob Milgrom's solution is even worse. He suggested that the original author of Numbers lied: “. . . the tendency of ancient epics to inflate numbers is well attested.”¹ Despite the fact that multiple texts assert the same demographic picture, thereby reinforcing each other, commentators are ready to substitute their own speculations when these texts do not describe events that conform to present-day scientific or historical theories. This raises the issue of biblical interpretation.

1. Jacob Milgrom, The JPS Torah Commentary: Numbers (New York: Jewish Publication Society, 1990), p. 339.

A. Liberals and the Bible

There are many examples of this methodology in the literature of academic biblical studies. A common example is this one: higher critics of the Bible have sought to re-define the Red Sea. It has become in retrospect the Sea of Reeds, through which the Israelites safely walked across dry land (Ex. 14:21).² Just imagine: people actually walked across relatively dried-up marshes! The very thought of this stupendous event paralyzed the Canaanites with fear: "For we have heard how the LORD dried up the water of the Red [Reed] sea for you" (Josh. 2:10a). This escape across the marshes was followed by an unprecedented miracle: Pharaoh's army, hot in pursuit, drowned in this sea of reeds. (The word for "reed" can also be translated "papyrus." Perhaps the Israelites used the reeds to create papyrus to create environmental impact statement forms, and drowned the Egyptians in them. Just a suggestion.) All that is missing from this Red Sea revision is a comparable creek to substitute for the Jordan River: "For the LORD your God dried up the waters of Jordan from before you, until ye were passed over, as the LORD your God did to the Red sea, which he dried up from before us, until we were gone over" (Josh. 4:23). Perhaps the Jordan was running seasonally low at the time of Israel's crossing.

Another miracle was the manna, which has retroactively become insect dung. And what a miracle it was! Two different species of insects provided it: same color, same texture, same naturally sweet, honey-like flavor—"No preservatives added!" (Ex. 16:31). One insect species was located in the mountains, the other in the lowlands.³ But the miracle had only just begun: both varieties of insects excreted double loads on the day before the sabbath but nothing on the sabbath (Ex. 16:22, 26–27)—truly strict sabbatarian insects! So, the Israelites feasted on insect dung daily for 39 years. Yet they were also required by God to break a jar if a dead insect was found inside it (Lev. 11:32–33). We might ask rhetorically: Who are we, or who was Moses, or who was God, to blame the murmurers for having preferred eating quail to insect dung (Num. 11:6)?

2. James King West, Introduction to the Old Testament: "Hear, O Israel" (New York: Macmillan, 1971), p. 133. The word "red" (supf) can be translated reed or weed, as in: "The waters compassed me about, even to the soul: the depth closed me round about, the weeds were wrapped about my head" (Jonah 2:5). The presence of weeds did not mandate the presence of marshes.

3. F. S. Bodenheimer, "The Manna of Sinai," The Biblical Archeologist Reader, X (Feb. 1947); reprinted in G. Ernest Wright and David Noel Freedman, eds., The Biblical Archeologist Reader (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, 1961), p. 79.

My conclusion: theological liberalism does a strange thing to people. It turns their brains into manna (lowland variety).

B. "The Numbers in Numbers Don't Add Up!"

Wenham argued that the wilderness could not have supported such a large population, even with manna, i.e., the heavenly kind. After all, "The bedouin population of modern Sinai amounts to only a few thousand; . . ."⁴ Noordtzi agreed: Sinai could not have fed all those people; it was a wilderness. But the whole point of the manna was to sustain the Israelites miraculously in the wilderness. The manna was a miracle, as was their clothing that did not wear out. Moses described both of these as related miracles (Deut. 8:3–4).

Furthermore, Wenham says, archeological evidence points to much smaller population centers: a few thousand people per Canaanite city.⁵ God said that it would take years for the invading Israelites to overcome the existing population in Canaan (Ex. 23:29). If the Israelite population was large, there could have been only brief resistance by tiny Canaanite villages.⁶ This indicates that the number of Israelites was small. Wenham does not mention another possibility, namely, that today's archeological evidence is incomplete and has been misinterpreted by extrapolating from a handful of discoveries. The same criticism can be leveled at modern chronologies of the ancient Near East prior to the eighth century B.C. Archaeologists therefore date the strata incorrectly. Wenham's failure to mention the possibility that modern archeological scholarship has made crucial errors is also representative of the higher critic's mind-set. When the latest scientific evidence, which he can be confident will eventually be superseded and made obsolete, tells him that the Bible's account is false, he accepts the new evidence and rejects the Bible's account.

Wenham cited a 1906 book by Flinders Petrie,⁷ an archeologist, who argued that the word translated thousand ('eleph) could mean either "thousand" or "family." Recording the population of Reuben, the

4. Gordon J. Wenham, Number: An Introduction and Commentary (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1981), p. 61.

5. Wenham, Numbers, p. 62.

6. Ibid., p. 61.

7. Petrie, Researches in Sinai (London: Murray, 1906).

text says 46,500 men (Num. 1:21). Not so, said Petrie: the tribe of Reuben really consisted of 46 families ('eleph') plus 500 men. Wenham cites his own father's study, which allowed 45 Reubenite leaders and 1,500 men.⁸ Noordtzij insisted that 'eleph' means "clan."⁹ Other estimates of Israel's total population range from 140,000 to as few as 20,000. Petrie allowed no more than 5,600.¹⁰ He was being generous; G. Ernest Wright allowed no more than 5,000; the Israelites may have been as few as 3,000.¹¹ This is a reduction from about 2.4 million (men, women, and children). The Bible's account, we are informed, may be off by 800 to one. Not too reliable! But this isn't the half of it. Harrison said that one estimate places the number as low as 100 people.¹²

Ashley simply capitulates: "In short, we lack the materials in the text to solve this problem," i.e., the problem of large numbers.¹³ He was exaggerating. We have enough materials in the text to begin to solve the problem. We must use these materials to guide us in our search for the answer.

C. Whose Numbers Should We Accept?

That the number of Israelites was huge can be seen from the despair of Balak the Moabite in seeking an alliance with the Midianites. "And Moab said unto the elders of Midian, Now shall this company¹⁴ lick up all that are round about us, as the ox licketh up the grass of the field. And Balak the son of Zippor was king of the Moabites at that time. He sent messengers therefore unto Balaam the son of Beor to Pethor, which is by the river of the land of the children of his people, to call him, saying, Behold, there is a people come out from Egypt: behold, they cover the face of the earth, and they abide over against me: Come now therefore, I pray thee, curse me this people; for they are too mighty for me: peradventure I shall prevail, that we may smite them, and that I may drive them out of the land: for I wot that he whom thou

8. Wenham, Numbers, p. 63.

9. Noordtzij, Numbers, pp. 24–25.

10. Wenham, Numbers, p. 64.

11. G. Ernest Wright, Biblical Archaeology, rev. ed. (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1962), p. 66.

12. R. K. Harrison, Numbers: An Exegetical Commentary (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker, 1992), p. 436.

13. Timothy R. Ashley, The Book of Numbers (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1993), p. 66.

14. "And God Almighty bless thee, and make thee fruitful, and multiply thee, that thou mayest be a multitude of people" (Gen. 28:3).

blessest is blessed, and he whom thou cursest is cursed" (Num. 22:4–6). I find it difficult to believe that fewer than 5,000 people covered the face of the earth. That about 1,000 warriors terrified Balak seems even less probable. Balaam's prayer is even more revealing: "Who can count the dust of Jacob, and the number of the fourth part of Israel? Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his!" (Num. 23:10). But the scholars think Balak and Balaam were grossly exaggerating, that they were terrified of a handful of ex-slaves who somehow had recently conquered King Sihon, the city of Jaazer, and King Og (Num. 21:24–35).

We have a tally of the booty taken from Midian by 12,000 Israelite warriors in the period immediately prior to the invasion of Canaan:

And the booty, being the rest of the prey which the men of war had caught, was six hundred thousand and seventy thousand and five thousand sheep, And threescore and twelve thousand beeves, And threescore and one thousand asses, And thirty and two thousand persons in all, of women that had not known man by lying with him. And the half, which was the portion of them that went out to war, was in number three hundred thousand and seven and. thirty thousand and five hundred sheep: And the LORD's tribute of the sheep was six hundred and threescore and fifteen. And the beeves were thirty and six thousand; of which the LORD's tribute was threescore and twelve. And the asses were thirty thousand and five hundred; of which the LORD's tribute was threescore and one. And the persons were sixteen thousand; of which the LORD's tribute was thirty and two persons (Num. 31:32–40).

The Bible testifies clearly to the size of at least one city-state in the wilderness. Thirty-two thousand young women and girls were taken captive. This was no village. This was a separate culture that possessed a great deal of wealth.

The degree of honesty of Petrie's argument is more readily assessed when we read the account in Numbers of the size of the families of Levi: Gershon, seven 'eleph, five hundred (Num. 3:22); Kohath, eight 'eleph, six hundred (v. 28); Merari, six 'eleph, two hundred (v. 34). Total number of Levites if 'eleph means thousand: 22,300. This corresponds closely with the summary total of 22,000: "All that were numbered of the Levites, which Moses and Aaron numbered at the commandment of the LORD, throughout their families, all the males from a month old and upward, were twenty and two thousand ['eleph']"

(Num. 3:39).¹⁵

Petrie knew he had a problem.¹⁶ In Numbers 3, there can be no confusion over the meaning of 'eleph. Levi had three family groups; each family had a specific number of males above one month old. This number corresponded closely to the number of Israel's firstborn: "And all the firstborn males by the number of names, from a month old and upward, of those that were numbered of them, were twenty and two thousand ['eleph] two hundred and threescore and thirteen" (Num. 3:43). So, the number of Levite males in Numbers 3—judicial surrogates for Israel's firstborn (Num. 3:12–13)—matched almost perfectly the number of Israel's firstborn males, counted in thousands. We cannot escape the grammar of the numerical account in Numbers 3.

But Petrie sought to evade the plain language of the texts. He argued that the Levites' numbers in Numbers 3 were inserted into the text in a later period. What later period in Israel's history would have imagined that there were 22,000 Levites? Only a period in which there were a lot of Levites. Where did all these Levites come from? If there were only 5,600 adult male Israelites at the time of the numbering, how many adult male Levites were there? Four hundred, perhaps? How, and how fast, did this Levite population grow from 400 to so many that 22,000 seemed reasonable to the forger (sorry: "redactor")? Was the redactor so confused that he inserted numbers for the tribe of Levi that totaled four times larger than the number of all the other 12 tribes combined (using Petrie's estimate of 5,600)? Translating 'eleph in Numbers 1 as "family" rather than "thousand" leads to a dead end. It was an obvious dead end on the day it was proposed in 1906.

Counting the firstborn was required because there had to be a substitute for them: the Levites. The Levites as a tribe would substitute for the firstborn on a one-to-one basis. If there were more firstborn sons than Levite males, someone would have to pay the Levites five shekels per extra firstborn. The Bible does not say who would have to pay. The allocational question was this: Which families had born the "excess" 273 children? If all of the families were counted, and the comparison was made, on what basis would a particular tribe or family be assessed the five shekels? Would it be those families whose firstborn were born later than the others, i.e., families of those firstborn who constituted 15. Here there could have been an error in copying: the Hebrew word for 6—the Kohathites' 8,600—is similar to the word for 3. If the figure was 8,300, the total was 22,000. Wenham, Numbers, p. 71.

16. Ibid., p. 63.

the excess? This would seem to be fair, but we are not told.

The ratio of firstborn sons to adult males constitutes a long-recognized problem. There were 603,550 adult males (Num. 1:46). There were 22,273 firstborn (Num. 3:43). Wenham wrote: "This means that out of 27 men in Israel only 1 was the first-born son in his family. In other words, an average family consisted of 27 sons, and presumably an equal number of daughters."¹⁷ Milgrom also cited this ratio.¹⁸ The firstborn were not adults—age one month and older. The ratio is clearly impossible demographically. Because this dilemma is based on biblical texts, it requires a solution consistent with the texts. Wenham saw none. I see three possible explanations. But before considering them, we must understand the demographics of Israel in Egypt.

D. Population Growth: Jacob to Moses

There were only four generations from the generation born after the descent into Egypt until the conquest (Gen. 15:16). The time Israel spent in Egypt was 215 years. I discussed in Authority and Dominion why the 215-year figure is correct, and why the 430 years included the time that Abraham and Isaac spent in Canaan, which was formally under Egyptian sovereignty.¹⁹ Paul was clear on this point: it was 430 years from the promise given to Abraham until the giving of the law to Moses at Mt. Sinai. "And this I say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect" (Gal. 3:17). We also know that this stay in Egypt took four generations: the text regarding Jochebed (Num.26:59).

If a woman bore a child every two years, and if she lived to 120 years old, and if her menopause came at, say, age 80 (Sarah was beyond menopause at age 90), then theoretically she could have borne 30 children in a 60-year reproductive period: age 20 to 80. (A figure of 54 children per family is impossible. This would have required almost one child per year from every woman for her six decades of fertility.)

Let us assume that each of the 70 wives produced 30 children, and all of her children survived, married, and repeated the process. Half of these children would have been sons. The average number of children in Jochebed's generation would have been $30 \times 70 = 2,100$. Of these, 1,050 were sons. Repeating this performance, Moses' generation would have totaled 15,750 men ($15 \times 1,050$). Assuming no retarding effects demographically from the persecution of the Pharaoh, Moses' generation would have produced 236,250 sons ($15 \times 15,750$). If all of Moses' generation had been alive at the time of the first numbering, and all of Joshua's generation, the total would have been 252,000 men. But there were over 600,000 men. Even with the preposterous assumption of 30 children per family, the numbers do not add up.

17. Wenham, Numbers, p. 61.

18. Milgram, Numbers, p. 339.

19. On 215 years rather than 430, see North, Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Pt. 1, Representation and Dominion (1986), ch. 1:A:1–2. Cf. Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews, Book II, Chapter XV; Section 2, in Josephus: Complete Works, William Whiston, trans. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Kregel, 1960), p. 62.

Relating to the second mustering in the Book of Numbers, we read: "And the name of Amram's wife was Jochebed, the daughter of Levi, whom her mother bare to Levi in Egypt: and she bare unto Amram Aaron and Moses, and Miriam their sister" (Num. 26:59). It appears that Israelite mothers had far fewer than 30 children unless Jochebed missed the mark by a factor of ten to one. Israel's descent into Egypt took place when Jacob was an old man: age 130 (Gen. 47:9). Jochebed's birth occurred after Levi had come down with his father into Egypt. There were no other intervening generations. Moses' generation was the second after the descent. This left only two until the conquest of Canaan (Gen. 15:16).²⁰

1. Adopted Household Servants

Seventy male family members arrived in Egypt: "All the souls that came with Jacob into Egypt, which came out of his loins, besides Jacob's sons' wives, all the souls were threescore and six; And the sons of Joseph, which were born him in Egypt, were two souls: all the souls of the house of Jacob, which came into Egypt, were threescore and ten" (Gen. 46:26–27). Jacob plus the 66 sons and grandsons plus Joseph plus his two sons equalled 70. They could have brought several thousand servants into Egypt with them: servants adopted into their families. Recall that Abraham had 318 household servants (Gen. 14:14).

Only by adopting their servants or other residents of Egypt could the Israelites have reached large numbers by the time of the exodus. If there were 1,500 men who came down with Levi's generation, and each had seven sons, in Jochebed's generation there were 10,500; Moses' generation had 73,500; Joshua's had 514,500. Together, this totalled 588,000 men, which was close to 600,000. So, this would have been biologically possible, but highly unlikely: 14 children per family, all of whom survived and repeated the process.

20. The children of Joshua's generation did have children, and presumably some of them were over age 20 at the second Numbers mustering. But the leaders were the sons of Joshua's generation, and so are regarded as heirs of God's promise to Abram.

Then there is the problem of the effect of high birth rates. If Joshua's generation continued to reproduce at these rates, the 600,000 men would have had something like six million children at the exodus, at least 90% of whom died in the wilderness. An even higher percentage of them died if any of them had children, since the nation was in zero growth mode in the wilderness. Covenantally, this is an unacceptable scenario: God's judgment against the fourth generation rather than the third. To avoid it, we must conclude that the overwhelming majority of Joshua's generation had two children: replacement rate. From 14 children per family to two children in a single generation: this is simply unheard of in history. Living in slavery did not stop Aaron from having four sons. So, this 14-children-per-family scenario is totally implausible.

It takes such a series of demographic assumptions that are not directly revealed in the texts to solve the problem of the 600,000 adult males, beginning with the assumption of 1,500 (or more) men who were counted as Israelites. We can play with the numbers by assuming that even more servants came down, or that they had lower reproduction rates, or that more residents of Egypt were adopted in Joseph's era, but this does not avoid the adoption issue. There had to be adoptions at some point: either early in the process or at the very end, and possibly all along the way. The larger the number of adoptees early in the process, the smaller the families could be in order to reach 600,000, assuming that most of these 600,000 were not themselves very late adoptees (post-exodus).

The nation experienced zero population growth in the wilderness. The number of adult males at the beginning was the same as the number of adult males at the end. The nation supposedly grew to a huge size during the years of servitude; then, in freedom, its population growth ended. This is not easy to explain. A fast-growing population is characterized by large numbers of children, not the small families that appeared in the wilderness. A fast-growing population rarely reaches zero growth in one generation unless there is a catastrophe, either biological or political, that produces less-than-replacement-rate births or else wipes out children before they reach maturity. Normally, there is a population “echo” of the children who have already been born, even if these children reproduce only at the replacement rate. So many of them are marrying and having children that the population keeps growing even though this generation is only producing two children (replacement rate) per family. The smaller the families were before the exodus, the less of an echo effect in the wilderness. There was no echo in Israel’s wilderness experience. The nation reached population stagnation in one generation. There has to be a reason. The death of the bulk of the fourth generation in the wilderness is not a covenantally likely solution: they were the heirs of God’s promise to Abraham. Also unlikely is the possibility that they failed to reproduce at all during the wilderness era. Then what happened? This lengthy chapter is my attempt to suggest a plausible explanation. As far as I am aware, no previous commentator has even raised the question.

I see no exegetical escape from the presupposition of adoption: adoption into the original 70 families of Jacob’s era and/or after they settled in Egypt, and (as I shall suggest) again before the numbering mentioned in Exodus 38.²¹ Adoption came early because the 70 males who came down to Egypt, including sons and grandsons (Kohath’s generation),²² would not have multiplied fast enough to have constituted a numerical challenge to Pharaoh: “And the children of Israel were fruitful, and increased abundantly, and multiplied, and waxed exceeding mighty; and the land was filled with them. . . . And he said unto his people, Behold, the people of the children of Israel are more and mightier than we” (Ex. 1:7, 9). There had to be adoptions by Jacob and his sons in order for the population to have multiplied this much by the time of Moses’ infancy. The base of 70 families was not large enough to have provided such a threat in a single generation.

2. What Seems Reasonable?

Moses had a brother and a sister (Num. 26:59). Was his family abnormally small? Small, but not abnormally small. Aaron had four sons (Num. 26:60). He may have had daughters, but the text does not say so.

21. If someone were to ask me if I think I have ever made an exegetical breakthrough of real significance, one never before suggested by any commentator, this would be my choice. See Moses and Pharaoh, ch. 1.

22. Kohath and Jochebed were brother and sister (Num. 26:59). She married her nephew Arnam (Ex. 6:20). Presumably, she was born much later than Kohath: the Numbers text says she was born in Egypt. Her birth in Egypt established her as part of the first of the four generations prophesied in Genesis 15:16.

There were few families with 16 children. This means that there must have been many families for the population to have reached 600,000 men, unless there was a last-minute mass adoption of gentiles just prior to the Exodus mustering. These families must have been the families of the adoptees in Egypt.

The case for adoption is exegetically inescapable. The texts demand it. The only question is: When did the bulk of these adoptions take place? We know that Israel's population was large and growing in the days of Moses' infancy. This indicates that a significant number of adoptions had already taken place, either before they came down into Egypt or shortly thereafter in the days of Joseph's rulership. There was insufficient time for biological reproduction to have produced such a military threat from the loins of 69 men (Jacob was beyond fatherhood).

The problem is this: Did the adoptees of the early years reach 600,000 adult men at the time of the exodus? We can only speculate; the texts do not tell us authoritatively.

E. The Meaning of Firstborn at Passover

Because of the problem of the 27-to-one ratio, Bible-believing commentators who understand the nature of the demographic problem have frequently dealt with it by altering the definition of firstborn in Numbers 3. They employ a different definition for the Passover. We shall see why this is the case in the sections on the proposed solutions.

Numbers 3:40 reads: "And the LORD said unto Moses, Number all the firstborn of the males of the children of Israel from a month old and upward, and take the number of their names." This is the same language that is used in the previous verse: "All that were numbered of the Levites, which Moses and Aaron numbered at the commandment of the LORD, throughout their families, all the males from a month old and upward, were twenty and two thousand." All of the male Levites were numbered. The parallel language for the firstborn seems to exclude the possibility that firstborn was limited to those sons under age 20.²³ But is this conclusion correct?

On the other hand, is it possible that firstborn only referred to males under age 20? Consider the survival of the Egyptian army. The death of the firstborn in Egypt did not seem to afflict adults. "And it came to pass, that, at midnight the LORD smote all the firstborn in the land of Egypt, from the firstborn of Pharaoh that sat on his throne unto the firstborn of the captive that was in the dungeon; and all the firstborn of cattle. And Pharaoh rose up in the night, he, and all his servants, and all the Egyptians; and there was a great cry in Egypt; for there was not a house where there was not one dead" (Ex. 12:29–30).

23. Or under age five, if James Jordan is correct. See below, Section F.

Pharaoh survived; so did the captive in prison. The phrase, "the captive," is a representative term: a head of household. So, the adult head of household survived if he had a firstborn son living at home. Egypt's firstborn male offspring, at least minors living at home, did not survive. All of Pharaoh's servants arose. All of the Egyptians arose. What can this mean? It means that the adults under Pharaoh's command survived, but their firstborn sons did not. One male was dead in a family, but not two, i.e., both father (if he was a firstborn son) and son.

Pharaoh still commanded an army. Were the survivors all younger sons? This seems unreasonable. The whole command structure would have been destroyed if firstborn officers all died. Furthermore, unless Pharaoh was a second-born son whose older brother had died, he would have perished if death had taken every firstborn son irrespective of his age or his status as household head. If this was true in Egypt, then it may have been true—probably was true—of Israel. After all, the threat of death had been given to both the Egyptians and Israelites. Only the Passover lambs saved Israel from the same negative sanction that afflicted Egypt.

If the sanction of death struck every firstborn son in Egypt, fathers and sons, which I think is unlikely, then the Pharaoh of the Passover was either a second-born son (his older brother had previously died without leaving a son to inherit the throne) or else he was replaced by his younger brother after the Passover, who then pursued Israel. Moses must have been dealing with a Pharaoh who was a surviving brother if firstborn for Egyptians meant all firstborn adult males. On the other hand, if firstborn meant the firstborn dwelling in a household, then Pharaoh could have been biologically a firstborn. His resident son died in his place.

Some Egyptian households would have seen their firstborn sons depart years before. Yet every household had a death. If my view is correct, then those firstborn fathers whose firstborn sons had left home came under the sanction of death. I conclude this because: (1) every household had a death; (2) there were still many adult males left alive in Egypt. This indicates that not every firstborn son died. Those who still lived in their fathers' households did die. For a firstborn son who had left home, and who had a son of his own who died, there also was a death back home: the firstborn head the household, i.e., his firstborn father. There was a death in every household.²⁴ Only two things could save a firstborn father: the death of his resident firstborn son or the death of a lamb.

Was the threat against Israel the same? Was every male at risk, or were only their sons at risk? The text seems to indicate that the same threat applied to the Israelites that applied to the Egyptians. I conclude that the definition of the term firstborn applied equally to both nations: the firstborn son in a household.

We now return to the problem of the 27-to-one ratio between adult males and firstborn sons.

F. First Proposed Solution: Firstborn as Young Minors

James Jordan asks us to assume that firstborn sons were young minors in a household, i.e., that only minors under the age of five were counted as firstborn sons.²⁵ Why should we assume this? Why should we assume that they could have had older brothers? Textually, the one reason is the size of money payment required by God. The payment to the Levites was five sanctuary shekels per firstborn (Num. 3:47). This was also the size of the payment to the Levites which was required for buying entry through adoption into the family of Levi of a male child, age one month to five years (Lev. 27:6).²⁶ The second reason is practical: to reduce the number of firstborn in Numbers 3 compared to the number at the Passover. If judicially we can reduce this number, then the biological anomaly disappears.

This approach requires a redefinition of firstborn. Jordan at first did not think it does. He wrote that "the original Passover was designed to save, directly, the firstborn sons between the ages of one month and five years; indirectly, everyone else." But in speaking to him about this problem, I learned that he now says that the Numbers 3

24. No younger brothers headed households in which their firstborn sons had departed. If every household was headed by a firstborn son, then Egypt was in replacement-rate mode: zero population growth.

25. James Jordan: "Who Were the Firstborn Sons?" Biblical Horizons, No. 73 (May 1995), p. 4.

26. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 36.

definition serves to reduce the number of biological firstborn.

There is a problem with this solution: the echo effect. If firstborn means any son under age five, irrespective of older brothers, then his older brothers become a covenantal sanctions problem. If he has, say, three older brothers—one in each five-year age bracket—then Joshua's generation had very large families: at least eight children per family. To avoid the conclusion that large numbers of the fourth generation died in the wilderness, we must assume that the 400,000 fathers produced only one son. This means that the typical firstborn son was also the last-born son. If the 22,273 firstborn sons had older brothers who had been counted at the Passover by means of an earlier definition, then the echo problem appears: 400,000 fathers times eight children, or 3.2 million children. Some 2.8 million died in the wilderness, hopefully before they had their own children, most of whom would also have died.

Joshua's generation was at the end of its peak childbearing years: on average, probably about age 35 or 40. All but two of them were dead 39 years later. If the 22,273 sons had been born over the preceding four years, then the average number of male births was about 5,600 a year. But the replacement rate for 400,000 men was closer to 20,000 a year for two decades. This raises the obvious question: Where did the 600,000 men in Numbers 26 come from? Were most of the other 380,000 sons bunched together demographically from age five up? Were they born over a 16-year period at a rate of 23,000 a year, followed by a sharp drop in the birth rate? (If we were to adopt the definition for firstborn as "under age five," applying both to Passover and Numbers 3, then not many firstborn sons were actually at risk at Passover: maybe 25,000 out of 375,000. This may be why Jordan adopts his definition only for Numbers 3.) The demographics of this scenario are uncomfortable to a Bible-believing expositor. It may be possible to put all of the seemingly conflicting pieces together, but it is not an easy task.

Jordan's definition of firstborn reduces the number of sons in Numbers 3 compared with the Passover. A century ago, C. F. Keil adopted a similar strategy, but with a different way of shrinking the number of numbered firstborn. His solution has the benefit of minimizing the echo problem.

G. Second Proposed Solution: Births Since Passover

According to this scenario, firstborn sons who were alive at the first Passover had already been atoned for by the blood on the doorposts. Thus, no further payment was necessary. The law governing the money payment to the priests for the firstborn was given in the wilderness, after the first Numbers mustering. It did not apply retroactively to those children whose lives had been spared during the Passover, who were not in need of further substitutes; the Passover lambs had served that function. The money payments were due only for those sons who had been born in the wilderness during the 12 months from the Passover in Egypt to a month before the first Numbers mustering.²⁷ This amounted to 22,273 sons. So, the 27-to-one ratio cannot be taken as applying to all the firstborn in Israel. It applied only to those born in the 12-month interim period.²⁸

The demographic question is this: Could 600,000 families have produced 22,273 firstborn sons and approximately the same number of firstborn daughters in 12 months? Conception took place beginning nine months prior to Passover and continuing for another three months. Moses' generation was beyond the normal childbearing years; certainly firstborn children for any of them would have been abnormal. We know that Israel was about to experience a drastic reduction of lifespans, from around age 120 for Moses and Aaron to about 70 to 80 for Joshua's generation (Ps. 90:10). Joshua's generation died of old age in the wilderness; therefore, very few of them were above age 40 at the early musterings.

Let us assume for the sake of argument that there were 400,000 mustered men in Joshua's generation, ages 20 to about 70. Ages 20 to 40 are the prime reproduction years. Could, say, 175,000 families have produced 22,273 firstborn sons? Theoretically, yes, especially if the parents were recently married as a result of the exodus liberation, which perhaps a third of them were. But did this really happen? How many of these 175,000 families had never produced a son? Most of them had, which is why Keil adopted his narrowly circumscribed definition of firstborn as a solution to the 27-to-one problem. There is no solid reason to say that his scenario was biologically impossible. To reproduce themselves, Joshua's generation required 400,000 sons. (Their grandsons could supply the 200,000 replacements for Moses' generation.) The 400,000 sons meant replacement-rate mode: one son per household. So, about 22,000 sons born in one year seems reasonable. If this birth rate had continued for two decades (ages 20 to 40), this would have produced a little over 400,000 sons.

27. This eliminated all but the prematurely born sons who were born as a result of the debauchery of the golden calf incident, which took place as Moses was returning from Mt. Sinai. Israel arrived at Sinai in the third month, probably toward the end of the month (if the Jews are correct about dating the arrival at firstfruits/Pentecost). Moses was with God for 40 days. This placed the rebellion at less than nine months prior to the Numbers numbering.

28. C. F. Keil and F. Delitzsch, Biblical Commentary on the Old Testament (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, [English translation, 1872–84], n.d.), III, pp. 11–13.

Yet even if all this did happen, it does not solve the more fundamental problem: Where did the 400,000 men of Joshua's generation come from?

In every plausible scenario, the expositor has to rely on the adoption argument to make sense of the numbers. Bible-believing expositors have generally avoided dealing with this demographic problem. Jordan accepts this with respect to the original families, but Keil did not mention it. Biological reproduction rates do not allow the kind of population growth required to get from the 70 males who came down to Egypt in the famine to the 600,000 who were numbered. The texts indicate that Joshua's was the third generation: Kohath, Moses, Joshua. Conclusion: servants must have been adopted into the original families. Israel then spread out through the land of Goshen.

Could Keil's thesis be modified to include prior adoptions? Yes. This would not change his basic point regarding the meaning of firstborn in Numbers 3. But to adopt this solution, we must assume a drastic reduction of births, i.e., a drastic reversal of the previous experience of growing families. There was no population echo in the wilderness. This means that Joshua's generation either suffered drastically lower birth rates than their parents or else more of their children died before reaching maturity. A decreased birth rate could have been the effect of the persecution.

The main problem with Keil's thesis is the language that God used to explain His substitution of the Levites for the firstborn: "And I, behold, I have taken the Levites from among the children of Israel instead of all the firstborn that openeth the matrix among the children of Israel: therefore the Levites shall be mine; Because all the firstborn are mine; for on the day that I smote all the firstborn in the land of Egypt I hallowed unto me all the firstborn in Israel, both man and beast: mine shall they be: I am the LORD" (Num. 3:12–13). It sounds as though

God was setting apart (hallowing) the Levites because of the previous hallowing of the firstborn. He placed His claim on them. All of this is in the context of the payment of five shekels per firstborn.

The problem with the solutions offered by Jordan and Keil is that they both define firstborn in a way that the plain reading of the text seems to deny: firstborn as under age five or as a son who was born after Passover. Is there any solution that preserves the normal meaning of the word: a firstborn son of Israel? Yes, but it invokes a scenario that is surely not intuitive, just as the early adoption scenario is not intuitive, though mandatory.

While I devote considerable space to a third scenario, my instincts tell me that Keil's approach creates the fewest problems. But for those who are suspicious about tampering with the plain meaning of words, I offer a thesis that adheres to the definition of firstborn as the firstborn son of a household. It also solves the 27-to-one problem and the zero growth problem. It may do this, however, at too high a speculative price. What the reader must understand is that the texts do not offer solutions to these problems in a straightforward manner. You must decide how much "creative explaining" you can tolerate.

H. Third Proposed Solution: Mass Adoption

If adoption early in Israel's stay in Egypt is the only way to solve the problem of the source of the 600,000, why not follow through on this approach? What about the possibility of later adoptions? What about a mass adoption after the exodus?

I present the following scenario in order to consider the possibility that there is a legitimate alternative to Keil's definition of firstborn, which is the heart of his solution to the 27-to-one problem.

Before we study the problem in greater detail, I must present a new definition for Numbers 3: a firstborn son who was not old enough to be mustered. He was under age 20. At the Passover, the deciding factor had been the presence of the firstborn son in the household. This changed in Numbers 3. Jordan has one explanation; Keil had another. I tentatively suggest a third: mustering removed him judicially from his father's household. With the addition of a new institution, God's holy army, which was assembled through mustering and which required an atonement payment, the definition of a firstborn son changed. Judicially, a soldier in God's holy army was no longer under the same degree of family jurisdiction as he had been prior to his military eligibility. Judicially speaking, he had moved out of his father's household. So, at the time of the Exodus mustering, the criterion of firstborn shifted: from a household resident in Egypt to a man under 20 years old.

Recall that I am dealing with three problems: (1) how the 27-to-one ratio could have existed; (2) how a relatively small population of sons became the 600,000 fighting males that invaded Canaan; (3) how Israel grew to 600,000 adult males in three generations: Kohath's, Amram's, and Moses'. If firstborn means something significantly different in Numbers 3 from what it means in Exodus 12, there ought to be a reason for the change. I think the reason may have been judicial: the presence of the army of the Lord. The following presentation is structured by this definition of firstborn. If neither Jordan's nor Keil's definition seems legitimate, then consider the implications of a third.

At the exodus, the Israelites were joined by others who were fleeing the tyranny of Egypt. What if most of them subsequently covenanted with the Israelites? When word spread that the Israelites were about to depart, not to mention the spoils they were carrying with them, others in Egypt saw their opportunity and took it. They had two options: they could go out of Egypt into the wilderness or into Philistia on their own, or they could link up to the nation whose God had just smashed the Egyptian social order. Add to this the miracle of the manna: nearly free food²⁹ until the conquest (Ex. 16).

A lot of them could have chosen the latter option: to stay with the Israelites. This explains the presence of the mixed multitude with the Israelites (Ex. 12:38). It is possible that some of these people were adopted into the families of Israel as full members. For the sake of argument, let us consider the possibility that the bulk of the mustered Israelites were recent adoptees, and the firstborn sons were biological sons, not adoptees. If true, this would solve the 27-to-one demographic problem.

1. Biological Sons vs. Adopted Sons

The firstborn sons were biological sons of Israel (Num. 3:12). They were the minor sons of Joshua's generation. Let us assume that this strictly biological definition of firstborn governed the mustering process. Those who were subsequently ingrafted into the nation through adoption were not counted as firstborn sons retroactively back to Passover, nor were their children, who had not been born under the covenant. These pre-mustering adoptees added to the number of fighting-age males, but they and their children were not counted as firstborn. Firstborn was biological, not judicial: “opens the matrix” (Ex. 13:15).

29. There had to be grinding and cooking.

After the completion of the tabernacle, the Levites were set apart by God as a separate tribal offering in place of biological firstborn sons, as we have seen (Num. 3:12–13). This revelation came after the other tribes were mustered and just before Levi was numbered. This judicial substitution of Levites for firstborn minor sons was a one-time event that took place four months after the mustering in Exodus.

We might assume that the foreign adoptees were grafted into Israel covenantally through circumcision, but this may not have been the case. Those who came out of Egypt were circumcised (Josh. 5:5), but this presumably refers only to Israelites at the time of the crossing of the Red Sea. This great miracle allowed everyone accompanying them to escape, including the mixed multitude. There is no reason to believe that the passage in Joshua refers to the mixed multitude, who would not have been circumcised. This miracle of dry passage must have persuaded the mixed multitude, just as it persuaded the Canaanites, that God was with Israel. At this point—after the Red Sea exodus—some would have asked to be adopted into Israel. Perhaps Israel circumcised these newcomers, but perhaps not. Israel did not circumcise those sons who were born in the wilderness. If adoption did take place without circumcision, a lot more of the mixed multitude males would have consented to be adopted.

Why would Israel have agreed to this mass adoption? Because of their graciousness? Perhaps, but the thought of adding a huge number of potential fighting men to the army would surely have been a major motivation. This decision would soon cost the Israelites a lot of money: the payment of silver at the first mustering and presumably also at the second and third. The adopters had to fund the adoptees' payments. The mixed multitudes had not received the inheritance of the Egyptians.³⁰ Perhaps they had some silver, but if they were escaping slaves, this is doubtful. The immense number of adoptees in comparison with the number of biological Israelites meant that this adoption into the army of the Lord must have been extremely expensive for each Israelite family. Each family would have had to fund the atonement payment of its adoptees. Expanding the army of the Lord was a costly venture for each original Israelite family. It made economic sense only if they actually planned to invade Canaan. The only way for the economics of adoption to have paid off for the exodus generation was for the nation to have invaded Canaan immediately, thereby receiving its inheritance. The cost of two atonement payments could have been recovered only through military conquest. But after two numberings, the nation suffered a failure of nerve. The inheritance was delayed for another generation.

30. Chapter 4:B.

What if the mixed multitude had been adopted on the day after the death of Egypt's firstborn? They were not part of the original Passover, but perhaps they participated in the spoiling of the Egyptians.³¹ This is difficult to imagine: a mass adoption of foreigners followed that very day by a shared inheritance.

This would have meant that the adoptees paid their own atonement money, and also that the per capita wealth extracted by the spoiling was vastly smaller. But this does not change the economics of the mustering process. The adoptees were supplied with the atonement money they needed to pay the Levites. Either the Egyptians gave it to them directly or the Israelites did. In either case, the original Israelite families, other than the Levites, wound up with far less wealth than if there had been no adoption.

The mandated payment enforced a huge transfer of wealth from the 12 tribes to the priests and the tabernacle. This also indicates that the Israelites had stripped Egypt of an immense treasure: large enough to fund the payment of three wilderness numberings of mostly adopted foreigners, plus the voluntary offering prior to the building of the tabernacle.

Because of the number of Israelites slain by the Levites after the golden calf incident, I believe that the mass adoption may have come after this event. The 3,000 slain men were a significant percentage of the original Israelite population of about 35,000 men.³² The magnitude of the loss of population was consistent with the magnitude of the crime against God. The loss of one-half of one percent of 600,000 adult males does not seem sufficiently burdensome. But to take this position, I must assume that the mixed multitude had no part in the rebellion,

31. We say "the Egyptians," but we mean something more circumscribed: those Egyptians living close to the Pharaoh's court. These were the leaders of the nation. It was they who supplied the enormous quantity of gold and silver used later by Israel to build a golden calf, build the tabernacle, and pay for three musterings. To say that these Egyptians had been rich is not putting it strongly enough.

32. See below, Section H:2.

nor would they have participated in the covenant oath at Sinai. This may be too much to assume. If they were adopted earlier, then God was being very lenient with the nation.

In the third numbering (Num. 26), the text is silent with respect to firstborn sons. This is because there was no longer any need to number them as a group. The ratio of biological firstborn sons to the total number of Levite males was established after the initial numbering of the tribes; so, this ratio was no longer judicially relevant except for individual families. From the day of the one-time numbering of the Levites (Num. 3), each non-Levitical family had to pay money to the Aaronic priesthood for each firstborn male under its authority, whether of man or beast (Num. 18:15–16). Numbering the firstborn corporately was no longer necessary.

2. The Number of Levites

The number of Levites almost perfectly matched the number of biological firstborn minor sons of the other 12 tribes. This was God's doing, not man's. The adoptions took place before Exodus 38:25. Moses did not yet know about the substitution of Levites for firstborn sons. It does not appear that Moses deliberately assigned to Levi a number of adoptees that closely matched the number of firstborn. Presumably, each tribe was assigned a proportional share of new members. As the other tribes' total number of adopted members grew, though not the total number of biologically firstborn sons, the Levites' number of adopted sons also grew. Moses numbered all of the males of Levi above one month old, not just firstborn sons (Num. 3:39).

Given the mass adoption theory, a relatively small Israelite population existed on Passover night. We know that there were about 22,000 biologically firstborn males one year after the exodus. This was every firstborn male above one month old (Num. 3:40). If the definition of firstborn was common to both Israel and Egypt on Passover night, which I think was the case, and only household-resident firstborn Egyptian sons died, which I also think was the case, then the firstborn Israelites were unmarried sons living in their fathers' households. For reasons already offered, I argue that firstborn in Numbers meant firstborn males under age 20. I use the 22,000 figure as a marker. There would also have been somewhere in the range of 22,000 firstborn females. But bear in mind that what constituted a firstborn son in Numbers was not exactly the same as at Passover. The definition had changed: males under age 20.

If Israel's population prior to the exodus had been at the replacement rate level, there would have been a one-to-one ratio between firstborn and the total population of each gender: every person a first-born. This would mean that the number of children of Joshua's generation was about 45,000. There were 45,000 parents and possibly even 45,000 grandparents. Israel's population would have been somewhere in the range of 135,000 people. Again, this assumes zero population growth. But if Aaron's family size was typical—four sons—then there was actually considerable population growth. This means that there were fewer grandparents (Moses' generation) than parents (Joshua's generation).

If Aaron's family and Zelophehad's wilderness family of five daughters (Num. 26:33) were typical, then the Israelites were multiplying above the replacement rate by a factor of two.³³ We know that the nation had been growing rapidly prior to the Pharaoh of the persecution (Ex. 1:7). Because of the relatively small size of the families in Aaron's day, I believe that the bulk of the adoptions took place prior to the persecution, probably under Jacob. We do not know what happened to the birth rate in Moses' generation, although the examples we have indicate that there may have been growth. If the persecution and slavery that were specifically designed by the Pharaoh to slow the Israelites' rate of growth actually worked, then Moses' generation suffered a reduced rate of increase compared to the previous one. We do not know that this was the case. Aaron had a brother and a sister (Num. 26:59), but he had four sons. There is no way that 70 biological Israelites could have multiplied to 22,000 firstborn sons in three generations without adoptions.

Let us assume that population was doubling every generation. Something in the range of 22,000 firstborn sons were residing in their fathers' households. Let us assume that each of them had a brother, although this is probably too high an estimate for the Passover. Eventually there would have been two brothers per household: doubling. So, there were about 22,000 fathers in Joshua's generation, and 11,000 grandfathers, if all were still alive. So, the adult males of Israel probably totalled fewer than 40,000, perhaps as low as 33,000.

33. Zelophehad's family was not typical in the wilderness. It was abnormally large. Replacement-rate demographics were dominant. Perhaps he kept trying for a son. Perhaps he was an Israelite rather than an adoptee. He may have been operating in terms of an earlier dominion outlook. Or maybe God just blessed him with a lot of children.

How did this small group reach 600,000 adult males one year after the Passover? The solution has to be mass adoption, sometime after the Passover, or after the exodus, or after the golden calf incident. This influx also provided the males that brought Levi's numbers up to 22,000 males—not firstborn³⁴—at the time of the Numbers 3 numbering.

The other tribes were mustered first (Num. 1). The Levites were not numbered at this point, by God's command (Num. 1:49). God then announced that the Levites would serve as judicial substitutes for the total number of firstborn males in the other tribes (Num. 3:12-13). As it turned out, the number of biologically firstborn Israelite males was close to the number of Levite males as augmented by the recently adopted recruits. This does not seem to have been the result of planning by the Israelites. This information regarding the substitution had not been known prior to Numbers 3.

Leviticus 27:2-8 referred to an entry price for entering the tribe of Levi. This was a very large amount of money per family, which is why the system served as a barrier to entry³⁵. This law was given in Leviticus, which was revealed to Moses after the completion of the tabernacle (Lev. 1:1). But the mass adoption took place prior to the Exodus numbering, i.e., prior to the construction of the tabernacle. The law requiring an entry payment to the Levites had not yet been revealed to Moses. Thus, the other tribes did not have to fund the adoption of thousands of gentiles by the tribe of Levi. The barrier to entry came only after Book of Leviticus was revealed.

If I am incorrect about the Leviticus prices being entry prices into the tribe of Levi, then some other explanation of what those prices were is necessary. I do not see a reasonable alternative. So, I conclude: 1) the bulk of those Israelites who were counted in the Exodus numbering were Israelites by post-Passover adoption; 2) the prices in Leviticus 27:2-8 were priestly adoption prices paid by those who wanted to be adopted into the tribe; 3) the entry fee was not imposed on future adoptees until after the mass adoption had taken place.

After the numbering of the 12 tribes was finished, God told Moses to number the Levites (Num. 3:15). After this counting was completed (v. 34), God ordered a precise counting of the firstborn of the other tribes (vv. 44–45). There were an additional 273 biologically firstborn sons in the overall population, for whom ransom money was paid to Aaron (Num. 3:46–51).

34. Because the number of Levite firstborn sons was judicially irrelevant in the substitution process, they were not numbered separately.

35. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 36.

3. Adoption into a Tribe

I am assuming here that adoption was by family or tribe, not by the nation as a whole. Israelites had membership in the congregation through their families, clans and tribes. Thus, when the mass adoption took place, each family, clan, and tribe received its share of the newcomers. In any case, each tribe did. The newcomers were not citizens in general; they were citizens of tribes. Levi would not have been left out of this initial distribution of new members.

Amram's small family, like Aaron's, indicates that at the time of the exodus, Israel's nuclear families were not large. The question is: How many families were there in each clan? If families were small, there would have had to be many families for Israel's adult male population to have been 600,000 by the Exodus numbering. That is, prior adoptions would have had to multiply the number of nuclear families.

Is the mass adoption of the mixed multitude the likely scenario, with stable population in the wilderness based on a less-than-replacement-rate stagnation, but without a population catastrophe? If so, then the firstborn sons had been born of Israelite mothers; the adoptees were the mixed multitude.

If Israelite fathers adopted gentile sons, then the bulk of these adoptees were probably younger men who were of fighting age. They would have been adopted by Moses' generation. Thus, the bulk of the population was in Joshua's generation. These adults were replaced by the conquest generation. The sons of Joshua came from the loins of Joshua's brothers by adoption. Replacing Moses' generation was statistically incidental; it had not been large compared to the 600,000. Thus, the population moved into replacement-rate mode during the wilderness. Joshua's generation was much larger than Moses' through adoption. Their sons and grandsons did not quite replace the adult males of Moses' generation and Joshua's combined.

So, most of the 600,000 males were probably members of Joshua's generation. If so, then each family bore fewer than two children who reached maturity, for the 600,000 men a generation later included grandsons of Joshua's generation. My conclusion is that their birth rates were low or else the mortality rate for children was high. The first possibility seems more likely. God brought them under a curse in the wilderness: very low birth rates. But He did not kill off large numbers of the fourth generation.

The 22,273 non-Levite, biological (matrix-issued), firstborn sons of Israel, from one month old to age 19, constituted four percent of the fighting-age male population of 603,550. To be in replacement-rate mode, there had to be approximately 22,000 fathers. Some fathers might have been childless; others might have two sons; but nationally, the 22,273 firstborn testified to an upper limit on the number of men in Joshua's generation. Again, to maintain the replacement rate, there could have been no more than about the same number of men in Moses' generation. If there was growth, however, then the number of Moses' generation was less: fathers producing more than one son. If the growth rate was doubling, as Aaron's four children testified to, there were 22,000 fathers and 11,000 grandfathers. This indicates how thoroughly gentile, genetically speaking, Israel's army was at the time of the first mustering, and how important covenantal adoption was in Israel's founding as a nation. Most of the 603,550 were ex-gentiles. This is why they were numbered separately from the biological first-born. This was serious covenantal evangelism.

There is a weak link in this scenario. I regard it as the major weak link. If the maximum number of men in the third generation was in the range of 22,000—no higher than 30,000—then there probably were not this many men at the beginning of the oppression, two generations earlier. For growth to have taken place, there would have been fewer than 22,000 men when the oppression began. The faster the growth, the fewer the men. I believe there was growth: the blessing of God. This was the testimony of the Israelite midwives. What threat would fewer than 22,000 men have posed to the Pharaoh of the oppression? Perhaps he was looking ahead at what might be if he refused to restrict their growth, but in a society that had enough slaves to construct the pyramids, there would not have been a great threat from 10,000 men, let alone 5,000.

My theory of mass adoption and a subsequent tribal membership re-distribution to the Levites is textually speculative. The texts say nothing about either event. But something like this is consistent with the tribal population numbers recorded so exactly and repeatedly in the texts. The adoption scenario may seem far-fetched. But adoption into Israel had been going on from the time of the descent into Egypt, and maybe earlier.

I. The Mixed Multitude at Passover

There is another important question: Did the firstborn sons of the mixed multitude die on Passover night? Not necessarily. The confrontation was between the God of Israel and the gods of Egypt, who were represented judicially by Pharaoh. Gentile slaves and other residents of Egypt are not mentioned prior to the exodus itself (Ex. 12:38). God had not brought a covenant lawsuit against them.

Let us consider three possible scenarios. First, it may be that God spared their sons without blood on their doorposts. The Bible does not say that the homes of the mixed multitude were visited with death; only the homes of the Egyptians: “. . . It is ‘the sacrifice of the LORD’s passover, who passed over the houses of the children of Israel in Egypt, when he smote the Egyptians, and delivered our houses. . . .’” (Ex. 12:27). The comprehensive language of Exodus 12:29–30 may indicate otherwise, but Exodus 12:27 may be the dominant theme: Israel vs. Egypt. Second, it is possible that they believed the Israelites and put blood on their doorposts. To this extent, they covenanted with God: a common-grace, non-adoptive covenanting. Problem: Where did this many of them get the lambs? Or did they use some other form of blood, e.g., the blood of human fathers? Did God accept a substitute form of blood in an emergency? He might have. He wants obedience, not the blood of animals. “The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit: a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise” (Ps. 51:17). Third, it is possible that their firstborn died. This possibility seems unlikely, for the adoption scenario rests on the assumption of the presence of a large population of non-Israelite males. If their firstborn sons did die, who subsequently married all of their firstborn daughters? How did demographic stability occur in the wilderness era, i.e., one wife, one husband, one son, and one daughter?

I think the second possibility is most likely. I reject the first scenario—grace without bloodshed—because of the comprehensive nature of the death of the firstborn in Numbers 8:17: “For all the firstborn of the children of Israel are mine, both man and beast: on the day that I smote every firstborn in the land of Egypt I sanctified them for myself.” The firstborn sons and animals of the mixed multitude survived because the parents smeared blood on their doorposts. They believed the God of Israel with respect to the coming sanction. They had seen the other nine plagues. In smearing their doorposts with blood, they did not covenant with God in a special grace sense but in a common grace³⁶ sense: a visible acknowledgment that He is sovereign and the source of visible covenantal sanctions in history. They broke covenant with the gods of Egypt, but they did not formally covenant with the God of Israel. They only acknowledged that in order to avoid the negative sanction of death, they had to obey God and place blood on their doorposts. If they could not locate a lamb, they substituted some other form of blood. They were not held to so strict an honoring of the Passover rites as the Israelites were because they were breaking covenant with Egypt, not establishing a covenant with God. They did not eat a Passover meal, but they did avoid the death of their firstborn. When it came time to leave, they left alongside of Israel because they had broken covenant with Egypt. This did not make them part of Israel; it did separate them from Egypt. Only adoption could make them part of Israel. But their firstborn sons did survive Passover night. These sons provided the next generation of God's holy army.

1. Not All Were Adopted

Later in Numbers, we read about the mixed multitude. "And the mixt multitude that was among them fell a lusting; and the children of Israel also wept again, and said, Who shall give us flesh to eat?" (Num. 11:4). Where did these people come from? There are two possible answers. First, not all the mixed multitude had covenanted with Israel. Second, these new converts were still regarded as a separate group culturally. They were not yet assimilated into Israel's covenantal life. I think the first answer is the correct one. There were many among the escaping masses who did not want to suffer circumcision (assuming they were to be circumcised) and subordination to the God of the Bible, but they saw the advantages of remaining with the Israelites. For a time, manna had seemed to them to be one of these blessings. They had not been asked to depart from the camp of the faithful.

The mixed multitude served as contrasts to covenant-keepers, and they also served as sources of temptation, as was the case in Numbers 11. They still had an independent voice. The Israelites listened to their complaints against God and then voiced these complaints themselves. Judgment came swiftly: the positive sanction of quail and the negative sanction of plague (Num. 11:31–33).

36. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gngrace>)

2. Objections

There are several plausible objections to my scenario. The main one is that no revelation of such a mass adoption appears in the Bible. But neither does the suggestion of prior adoptions, yet these are necessary to make sense of Israel's demographics.

Second, why would a small nation adopt a lot of questionable pagans? Wouldn't the newcomers swamp the adopters? One reason is that the pagans asked to be adopted, even as the Gibeonites later were willing to become servants (Josh. 9). How could Israel reject such a request and still adhere to God's covenant? If a small local church is approached by 500 local college students who ask to join, what is the church to do? Tell them to go elsewhere? But there was no "elsewhere" in the Old Covenant. Another reason is military. Cowards like large numbers, hoping to reinforce their weak position. Here was a nation that feared marching into Canaan with an army of 600,000 men (even though not all of them could serve). How brave would they have been if there were, say, only 35,000 of them, with a third of these being old men?

Third, what language would have been used to communicate? Probably whatever language the Egyptians used to command these people. Then how was Hebrew ever to become the nation's common language? Perhaps through the same means that Hebrew has become the common language of the modern state of Israel: by conducting worship, civil law, education, and business in Hebrew.

Fourth, one which I have already mentioned: the small size of the population in Kohath's day. In my opinion, this is the strongest objection. It calls into question the reason for the oppression, which ultimately decided Israel's fate in Egypt.

Conclusion

Here are the three problems that are raised by this passage: 1) how the 27-to-one ratio between adult males and firstborn sons could have existed biologically; 2) how a relatively small population of sons became the 600,000 fighting males that invaded Canaan; 3) how Israel grew to 600,000 adult males in three generations.

The third problem can be answered in only one way: through adoption into the nation of Israel. Because the theme of adoption is so central to the issue of God's kingdom in history, I used this theological model to approach the other two problems. I asked: Could the 27-to-one ratio have had something to do with the relationship between biologically firstborn sons and newly adopted adults? Second, could the disparity between the birth rates of the Passover's Israelites and the newly adopted gentiles explain the seemingly overnight appearance of zero population growth during the wilderness era?

Something took place in Israel's wilderness experience which reversed the high population growth rates that had prevailed since their descent into Egypt. I suggest the following: God's imposition of low birth rates on rebels. My solution to the echo problem does not require the death of fourth generation members who were born prior to the exodus. It also allows high birth rates for Joshua's generation: more than firstborn sons.

Jordan's solution, that the firstborn sons were under age five, suffers from the problem of redefining the meaning of firstborn. The evidence for five years or younger comes from the adoption price of Leviticus 27:6. It is indirect, at best. This solution creates problems regarding the birth rates of Joshua's generation in Egypt: either below the replacement rate or skewed very strangely during the last four years in Egypt.

Keil's thesis of the numbered firstborn as only those born after the exodus, if coupled with some variant of the early adoption scenario, is plausible, but only at the expense of radically redefining firstborn so as to eliminate the Passover's sons from the numbering.

For the person who resists a major redefinition, mine is technically possible though speculative: mass adoption. The enormous number of adult male Israelites at the time of the first numbering, if compared to the small number of firstborn sons, indicates that the Israelites had adopted huge numbers of fleeing gentiles into the nation sometime during the year following the exodus.

This places adoption at the very center of Israel's history as a nation. There must have been prior adoptions: surely of the household servants who came into Israel; probably of residents of Egypt in the years prior to the oppression. But the ratio of adult males to firstborn sons—27 to one—can be explained in terms of a mass adoption out of the mixed multitude, either at the time of the exodus or in the months that followed, but before the Exodus numbering.

One thing is certain: Israel was a nation of recruits. From God's recruiting of Noah, then Abram, then Jacob's servants, and perhaps at the exodus, Israel had been a nation of adopted recruits. This was Ezekiel's clear testimony to the nation: "And saith the Lord GOD unto Jerusalem; Thy birth and thy nativity is of the land of Canaan; thy father was an Amorite, and thy mother an Hittite. And as for thy nativity, in the day thou wast born thy navel was not cut, neither wast thou washed in water to supple thee; thou wast not salted at all, nor swaddled at all. None eye pitied thee, to do any of these unto thee, to have compassion upon thee; but thou wast cast out in the open field, to the lothing of thy person, in the day that thou wast born. And when I passed by thee, and saw thee polluted in thine own blood, I said unto thee when thou wast in thy blood, Live; yea, I said unto thee when thou wast in thy blood, Live. I have caused thee to multiply as the bud of the field, and thou hast increased and waxen great" (Ezek. 16:3–7a).

What I have deduced from the texts is based on the data in the texts. This means that the Jews of Jesus' day should have known about the many adoptions of gentiles in Egypt. But the teachers of Israel did not teach this. Even the Jews who believed Jesus (John 8:31) were unaware of it. "They answered him, We be Abraham's seed, and were never in bondage to any man: how sayest thou, Ye shall be made free?" (John 8:33). They were incorrect on both counts. First, they were obviously in civil bondage to Rome, and had been in bondage to pagan empires ever since the exile. Second, they were heirs of the adopted sons of Abraham's heirs.

Any hope in a blood covenant through Abraham was a false hope. The Abrahamic covenant had itself been adoptive. Jesus on another occasion warned the Pharisees and Sadducees: "And think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham" (Matt. 3:9). The context of that challenge was John's baptism. Jesus employed rhetorical language—stones into sons—to proclaim the message of adoption. The vast majority of those who called themselves Abraham's sons were heirs of adoptees. If they believed otherwise, they had not paid close attention to Moses' accounts of the population explosion in his youth and the post-exodus adult to firstborn ratio.

If Jordan's thesis is correct, namely, that the firstborn sons in Numbers 3 were under age five, then my suggestion regarding Israel's having adopted large segments of the mixed multitude is incorrect, or at least not necessary to make sense of the texts. We could legitimately conclude that adoptions of gentiles into Israel took place earlier in Israel's history, but not necessarily after the exodus Passover.

My objection to his interpretation is based on my view of what a firstborn son was judicially in Egypt: any firstborn son, no matter how old, who had no firstborn son in his own household who would bear the sanction of death. There was no age limit on this judicial status. The deciding covenantal issue was household residence. This was why blood had to be smeared on the doorposts, and everyone had to remain inside his house.

This definition changed in the musterings. The firstborn son in Numbers 3 was any firstborn son who was not eligible for mustering because he was under age 20. judicially speaking, a mustered son had left his father's household. The deciding covenantal issue of household status moved from physical residence to military status: a new hierarchy. But if my thesis concerning late adoptions is wrong, then so is my definition of firstborn.

Like Jordan, Keil wants the number of firstborn sons in Numbers 3 to be smaller than the number at Passover, so as to reduce the 27-to-one ratio. He accomplishes this by limiting the time horizon of what constituted a firstborn son in Numbers 3. There were far more firstborn sons, biologically speaking, than those recorded in Numbers 3. How many, we cannot know, but as many as we need to make the ratio believable! This is one way to handle the problem. It does require the addition of the assumption of prior adoptions. By extending the number of births that persisted from the exodus to the Numbers numbering, we discover that Joshua's generation was close to replacement-rate mode. This implies extensive adoptions very early in Israel's sojourn in Egypt: slower growth late in the process; therefore, a minimal echo effect.

In contrast, my thesis of late adoptions allows approximately the same number of firstborn in Numbers 3 as at the Passover. It solves the 27-to-one problem by dramatically increasing the number of biologically unrelated adults numbered. This makes the ratio acceptable by removing it from the realm of biology.

I prefer Keil's thesis to Jordan's. It gives a theological reason for the shift in definition: the atonement of the Passover's firstborn by the lambs. But is Keil's solution superior to my thesis of a post-exodus mass adoption? His explanation is surely less complicated. It raises fewer questions about the problems of assimilating a huge number of foreigners. But to make it plausible, we must make the assumption of extensive early adoptions, probably in Joseph's era, in order to avoid the implications of a monumental demographic echo effect: either a dramatic reduction in the birth rate of Joshua's generation or the deaths of most of the fourth generation in the wilderness.

I have suggested a third possibility: the mass adoption of the mixed multitude. It is the only way I can imagine that the 27-to-one problem can be solved without radically redefining firstborn in Numbers 3. Yet I have redefined it slightly: defining the son's departure from his father's household as judicial rather than strictly physical. To answer the 27-to-one problem, there must be two different definitions.

Having made the strongest case I can for the mass adoption thesis, I think it is weaker than Keil's. Yet it is the only substitute for Keil's that I think comes close to solving the three problems. It raises so many questions, however, that it is safer to go with Keil's definition of the firstborn: a firstborn son who was born after the Passover but no less than one month before the second numbering. But in either scenario, there is no escape from the conclusion that Israel was a nation of adoptees.

End of Book

INHERITANCE AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON DEUTERONOMY

VOLUME 1

Other Books by Gary North

An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)

Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)

An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)

Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)

Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)

Government by Emergency (1983)

Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)

75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)

Coined Freedom (1984)

Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)

Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)

Honest Money (1986)

Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)

Dominion and Common Grace (1987)

Inherit the Earth (1987)

Liberating Planet Earth (1987)

Healer of the Nations (1987)

The Pirate Economy (1987)

Is the World Running Down? (1988)

When Justice Is Aborted (1989)

Political Polytheism (1989)

The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)

Victim's Rights (1990)

Westminster's Confession (1991)

Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar

The Coase Theorem (1992)

Salvation Through Inflation (1993)

Rapture Fever (1993)

Tithing and the Church (1994)

Crossed Fingers (1996)

The Covenantal Tithe (2010)

INHERITANCE AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON DEUTERONOMY

VOLUME 1

GARY NORTH

Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy
Volume 1

Copyright © Gary North, 2012
Second Edition

Published by:

Point Five Press
P.O. Box 2778
Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

This book is dedicated to my wife

Sharon North

who gave me the original idea for this commentary in 1973

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Volume 1

| | |
|--|------|
| Foreword | xi |
| Preface | xxxi |
| Introduction | 1 |
| Part I: Transcendence/Presence (1:1–5) | |
| 1. The God Who Brings Judgment in History (Deut. 1:1–5) . | 17 |
| Part II: Hierarchy/Representation (1:6–4:49) | |
| 2. A Delayed Inheritance (Deut 1:6–8) | 23 |
| 3. Delegated Authority and Social Order (Deut. 1:9–13) | 36 |
| 4. The Face of Man (Deut. 1:17) | 44 |
| 5. Bureaucratic Counsel (Deut. 1:21–23) | 52 |
| 6. The Skills of Foreign Trade (Deut. 2:4–6) | 63 |
| 7. Transferring the Inheritance (Deut. 3:27–28) | 71 |
| 8. Evangelism Through Law (Deut. 4:5–8) | 78 |
| 9. Hear, Fear, and Testify (Deut. 4:9–10) | 84 |
| 10. Removing the Inheritance (Deut. 4:25–28) | 96 |
| Part III: Ethics/Law/Boundaries (5–26) | |
| 11. Judicial Continuity (Deut. 5:1–5) | 108 |
| 12. Sabbath and Liberation (Deut. 5:14–15) | 116 |
| 13. Law and Sanctions (Deut. 5:32–33) | 125 |
| 14. The Wealth of Nations (Deut. 6:1–3) | 133 |
| 15. Law and Inheritance (Deut. 6:4–9) | 145 |
| 16. Genocide and Inheritance (Deut. 7:1–5) | 161 |
| 17. By Law or By Promise? (Deut. 8:1) | 182 |
| 18. Miracles, Entropy, and Social Theory (Deut. 8:2–4) | 191 |
| 19. Chastening and Inheritance (Deut. 8:5–7) | 209 |
| 20. Overcoming Poverty (Deut. 8:9) | 215 |
| 21. The Assertion of Autonomy (Deut. 8:10–17) | 223 |
| 22. Economic Growth (Deut. 8:18) | 228 |
| 23. Disinheriting the Heirs (Deut. 8:19–20) | 251 |

| | |
|--|-----|
| 24. Overcoming the Visible Odds (Deut. 9:1–6) | 263 |
| 25. Sonship, Servitude, and Inheritance (Deut. 9:26–29) | 283 |
| 26. Sonship, Obedience, and Immigration (Deut. 10:12–16) | 291 |
| 27. Oath, Sanctions, and Inheritance (Deut. 10:20–22) | 306 |
| 28. Rain and Inheritance (Deut. 11:10–14) | 313 |
| 29. Law, Sanctions, and Inheritance (Deut. 11:18–21) | 323 |

Volume 2

| | |
|---|-----|
| 30. Common Grace (Deut. 12:1–3) | 339 |
| 31. Communal Meals (Deut. 12:5–10) | 358 |
| 32. The Murderous Gods of Canaan (Deut. 12:28–31) | 369 |
| 33. The Lure of Magic (Deut. 13:1–5) | 376 |
| 34. Commerce and Covenant (Deut. 14:21) | 395 |
| 35. Tithes of Celebration (Deut. 14:22–29) | 407 |
| 36. The Charitable Loan (Deut. 15:1–5) | 429 |
| 37. Lending and Dominion (Deut. 15:6) | 445 |
| 38. Consuming Capital in Good Faith (Deut. 15:19–22) | 453 |
| 39. Individual Blessing (Deut. 16:14–17) | 461 |
| 40. Casuistry and Inheritance (Deut. 16:18–20) | 468 |
| 41. Israel's Supreme Court (Deut. 17:8–13) | 483 |
| 42. Boundaries on Kingship (Deut. 17:14) | 500 |
| 43. Levitical Inheritance Through Separation (Deut. 18:1–2) | 517 |
| 44. Landmarks and Social Cooperation (Deut. 19:14) | 526 |
| 45. The Penalty for Perjury (Deut. 19:15–19) | 536 |
| 46. A Hierarchy of Commitments (Deut. 20:5–7) | 551 |
| 47. A Few Good Men (Deut. 20:8) | 559 |
| 48. Limits against Empire (Deut. 20:10–18) | 567 |
| 49. Fruit Trees as Covenantal Testimonies (Deut. 20:19–20) | 584 |
| 50. Double Portion, Double Burden (Deut. 21:15–17) | 594 |
| 51. Executing a Rebellious Adult Son (Deut. 21:18–21) | 608 |
| 52. Lost and Found (Deut. 22:1–4) | 629 |
| 53. Nature's Roots and Fruits (Deut. 22:6–7) | 643 |
| 54. The Rooftop Railing Law (Deut. 22:8) | 649 |
| 55. Laws Prohibiting Mixtures (Deut. 22:9–11) | 659 |
| 56. The Fugitive Slave Law (Deut. 23:15–16) | 670 |
| 57. Usury: Yes and No (Deut. 23:19–20) | 679 |
| 58. Vows, Contracts, and Productivity (Deut. 23:21–23) | 692 |
| 59. Free for the Picking (Deut. 23:24–25) | 704 |

Volume 3

| | |
|---|-----|
| 60. Collateral, Servitude, and Dignity (Deut. 24:6) | 727 |
| 61. Wages and Oppression (Deut. 24:14–15) | 744 |
| 62. Gleaning: Charitable Efficiency (Deut. 24:19–22) | 766 |
| 63. Unmuzzling the Working Ox (Deut. 25:4) | 782 |
| 64. Levirate Marriage and Family Name (Deut. 25:5–6) | 796 |
| 65. Just Weights and Justice (Deut. 25:13–16) | 812 |
| 66. The Firstfruits Offering (Deut. 26:1–3) | 844 |
| 67. Positive Confession (Deut. 26:12–15) | 850 |
| Part IV: Oath/Sanctions (27–30) | |
| 68. Landmark and Curse (Deut. 27:17) | 857 |
| 69. Objective Wealth and historical Progress (Deut. 28:4–5) . . | 865 |
| 70. Credit as a Tool of Dominion (Deut. 28:12–13, 43–44) . . | 884 |
| 71. The Covenant of Prosperity (Deut. 29:9–15) | 896 |
| 72. Captivity and Restoration (Deut. 30:1–5) | 901 |
| 73. Life and Dominion (Deut. 30:19–20) | 908 |
| Part V: Succession/Inheritance (31–33) | |
| 74. Courage and Dominion (Deut. 31:4–8) | 914 |
| 75. Law and Liberty (Deut. 31:9–13) | 921 |
| 76. A Covenantal Song (Deut. 31:16–18) | 930 |
| Conclusion | 933 |

Volume 4

| | |
|---|------|
| APPENDIX A—Modern Economics as a Form of Magic | 983 |
| APPENDIX B—Individualism, Holism, and Covenantalism | 971 |
| APPENDIX C—Syncretism, Pluralism, and Empire | 984 |
| APPENDIX D—The Demographics of American Judaism | 998 |
| APPENDIX E—Free Market Capitalism | 1017 |
| APPENDIX F—The Economic Re-education of Ronald J. Sider . . | 1052 |
| APPENDIX G—Strong Drink | 1068 |
| APPENDIX H—Weak Reed: The Politics of Compromise | 1075 |
| APPENDIX I—Eschatology, Law, and Pietism | 1084 |
| APPENDIX J—Categories of the Mosaic Law | 1111 |

FOREWORD

And further, by these, my son, be admonished: of making many books there is no end; and much study is a weariness of the flesh. Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil (Eccl. 12:12–14).

This book is a narrowly focused Bible commentary: the laws of Deuteronomy that relate to economic life. You have somehow discovered this book. Why should you read it? One reason is to get Christian guilt-manipulators off your back.¹ There are a lot of them out there. If you are tired of being harassed to give more money to God, even though you already tithe, this book will help. On the other hand, if you do not tithe, then this book can also help you: to get God off your back.²

Another reason: to learn more about the biblical basis of riches. This will help you understand why the West got rich before the rest of the world copied the West. The West obeyed God's Deuteronomic laws governing ownership. It also adopted the biblical concept of linear time. The West has reaped an unprecedented reward: compound economic growth that has lasted for over two centuries.

A third reason: this book constitutes a challenge to Christian anti-nomians and legalists (often the same people), who are committed to the ideal of the cultural defeat for Christianity in history. If you are tired of sitting in the back of humanism's bus, or if you think that you may wind up sitting on the back hump of Islam's camel, this book offers hope.

1. David Chilton, Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators: A Biblical Response to Ronald J Sider, 3rd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1981] 1985). (<http://bit.ly/dcsider>); Joel McDurmon, God Versus Socialism: A Biblical Critique of the New Social Gospel (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2009).

2. Gary North, The Covenantal Tithe (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision 2011).

Why is this book so long: a foreword, a preface, an introduction, 76 chapters, a conclusion, plus 10 appendixes? Two reasons. First, because there is a great deal of material on economics in Deuteronomy. Second, because I am going to die before this commentary has much effect on anyone except me.

When an author of innovative or controversial educational books concludes that his influence will not come in his lifetime, he should write in great detail. He should seek to make his work stand the test of time, capable of answering a myriad of questions after he is dead and buried. The author covers more material in greater detail because he will not be around to answer questions. He is appalled by the thought of what happened to Karl Marx: generations of books on what Marx really meant. (Note to future commentators on my commentaries: you are certainly entitled to write a book on what North should have meant, but clearly did not.)

Christian philosopher Greg Bahnsen said that doing philosophy is like swimming underwater. So is reading this commentary. It should be read a chapter or two at a time. Then put it aside and think about what you have just read. This book will be read in its entirety by very few people. It is far too long. But it can be read chapter by chapter by people who want insight on a particular passage. Each chapter was written to stand alone. I wrote this book with the assumption that many readers will read only one chapter. Search engines on the World Wide Web will bring people to individual chapters. Perhaps a few people will then read the entire book. I salute you!

A. A Neglected Book

The Book of Deuteronomy is obscure for most Christians. It is an unknown book among Christians in the pews. In the late stages of the first draft of the first edition (1999) of this book, I heard a sermon on the ninth commandment. The pastor cited Deuteronomy 19, the section dealing with the penalty against bearing false witness. The woman next to me whispered to me, "Where is Deuteronomy?" She was a dedicated Christian lady and a teacher in an adult Sunday School. She had just completed a summer school course at a well-known fundamentalist seminary in Texas. For her, Deuteronomy was a closed book, a lost book. She is not alone.

Deuteronomy is not read today. Why not? Because Deuteronomy lays down the law. So does the Book of Exodus, but Exodus contains a lot of historical information in it. Pastors can preach from it without touching on biblical law. Leviticus has a lot of law in it, but there is so much material on the sacrifices and the ceremonies that pastors can preach on Leviticus' many "types" of this or that New Testament theme. They can avoid the law. Like Exodus, Numbers has historical information in it.

Not so with Deuteronomy. From its opening section to the end, Deuteronomy lays down the law. This is why pastors avoid this book like the plague of biblical leprosy. On every page, it proclaims, "trust and obey, for there's no other way." Protestants sing these words, but they do not believe them. They proclaim: "We're under grace, not law!" They are wrong. They are under humanist civil courts and humanist lawyers. They will remain in this condition of bondage until they discover an explicitly biblical answer to this question: "If not biblical law, then what?"

B. A Resented Book When Understood

Resented? Is this too strong a word? No. This deep-seated resentment is deliberately concealed for reasons of public positioning, but it is there. There is a sense of foreboding about this book, which is followed by resentment. Men resent being called by God to greater service, greater sacrifice, and greater responsibility. This is what Deuteronomy does, for it offers covenant-keepers the possibility of long-term cultural success, including economic success. Christians know the truth: with greater blessings come greater responsibility. "And that servant, which knew his lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more" (Luke 12:47–48).³ They resent Deuteronomy because it offers a pathway to personal success and therefore greater personal responsibility, and even worse, from their point of view, a pathway to corporate success and therefore greater corporate responsibility.

I have encountered two rival approaches to the economics of Deuteronomy. The first is resentment by those Christians who believe that the civil government should exercise a significant welfare function in society, meaning the coercive redistribution of wealth through regulation and taxation. This position is well represented by Ronald J. Sider's best-selling first edition of Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger: A Biblical Study (1977).⁴ Deuteronomy teaches nothing like this. It teaches that private charity should prevail. The second position is resentment regarding the level of economic success that is promised to covenant-keeping societies, for economic success raises inescapable accompanying issues of wealth-creation by covenant-keepers and the degree of leadership in society that their wealth offers them. This position is well represented by Gene A. Getz's book, A Biblical Theology of Material Possessions (1990).

3. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

1. Diehl vs. Deuteronomy

A classic statement of resentment against Deuteronomy is found in William Diehl's response to my position paper in Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views (1984), edited by Robert Clouse, published (and almost immediately suppressed)⁵ by InterVarsity Press.⁶ Diehl is Keynesian, i.e., a disciple of the homosexual British economist, John Maynard Keynes, who in 1936 attacked the free market as an inefficient institution that is in need of a large centralized civil government in order to provide a system of coercive wealth redistribution to maintain full employment. There is no such scheme of civil government found anywhere in the Bible, and Deuteronomy is expressly hostile to such a concept of civil government. Diehl responded as follows to my brief theonomic defense of the free market:

That the author is strong on "biblical law" is apparent. The essay provides us with thirty-nine Old Testament citations, of which twenty-three are from the book of Deuteronomy. Alongside these imposing Old Testament references the reader is given only nine New Testament citations, of which only four come from the mouth of Jesus. Notwithstanding one of North's concluding statements that

4. See Appendix F.

5. Within a year of publication, with the book selling well enough to provide the four authors and the editor with several hundred dollars each in the first round of royalties, the publisher pulled the book off its list and offered to sell all copies in bulk for 25 cents each. I bought all of them: several thousand copies. I like to think that it was my spirited and heavily exegetical defense of the free market, and my equally spirited critique of the other three authors' less exegetical presentations, that forced the publisher to gag.

6. My paper is reprinted as Appendix E.

we need “faith in Jesus Christ,” this essay might more properly be entitled “Poverty and Wealth according to Deuteronomy.” The teachings and parables of Jesus are rich with references to wealth, poverty and justice. Why has the author chosen to ignore these? Can it be that the words of the Master are an embarrassment to the advocates of a free-market system?⁷

The teachings and parables of Jesus are indeed rich with references to wealth, poverty, and justice, but they are not rich with suggestions that the civil government can legitimately tax people at a rate four to nine times greater than the tithe, which is what all modern Western governments have done, beginning with the outbreak of World War I in 1914. (It should also be pointed out that I Samuel 8:10, 14 identify such levels of taxation as tyranny.)

Diehl and men like him have a problem with biblical interpretation. The words of Jesus are also the words of Moses. To imply otherwise is to imply that Marcion’s second-century defense of a two-gods authorship of the Bible is somehow orthodox. Marcion’s position was unorthodox then, and it still is. Was Deuteronomy revealed by some other god than the God of the Bible? No. Is Jesus divine? Yes. So, Mr. Diehl was indulging in a form of rhetoric that was devoid of any clarifying hermeneutic: a reconciliation of Moses and Jesus based on the words of Jesus. When rhetoric undermines orthodoxy, it should be sacrificed for the sake of orthodoxy. This is especially true in the case of Mr. Diehl, who, in his attempt to escape the clear teaching of Scripture in favor of private ownership and the free market economy, was reduced to arguing that the Bible really says nothing authoritative regarding economics. “The fact that our Scriptures can be used to support or condemn any economic philosophy suggests that the Bible is not intended to lay out an economic plan which will apply for all times and places. If we are to examine economic structures in the light of Christian teachings, we will have to do it in another way.”⁸ What way? As he insisted, a way without judicially binding biblical law. In this, he is joined by about a billion other Christians, who are equally hostile to the suggestion that the Bible provides authoritative judicial limits to their dreams and schemes for building the kingdom of man in the name of the kingdom of God.

7. William E. Diehl, “A Guided-Market Response,” in Robert Clouse (ed.), Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views of Economics (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1984), p. 66. (<http://bit.ly/ClouseWAP>)

8. Diehl, “The Guided-Market System,” ibid., p. 87.

I ask: What is wrong with Deuteronomy's discussion of the causes of wealth and poverty? There is no other book in the Bible that discusses these related issues in greater detail. God should not be placed in the dock just because Deuteronomy does not conform to the incoherent speculations in Mr. Keynes' General Theory.⁹

Sider in 1977 through 1990 was even more committed than Diehl to the ideal of the coercive state as the proper biblical agency of wealth-redistribution. But, in his 1997 edition, he retracted much of his early work and became openly hesitant regarding what, exactly, the Bible has to say about economics.¹⁰

2. Getz on Material Possessions

Gene Getz is a dispensationalist. He therefore believes in a radical separation of the Old Testament from the New Testament. His theology distinguishes sharply between the church in the Old Testament and the church in the New Testament. He taught at Dallas Theological Seminary in the late 1960s and early 1970s, when that school was still defending the founder's version of dispensationalism. This was a decade and a half before "progressive dispensationalism" replaced the older version at Dallas. (In 1988, Dallas stopped publishing the founder's 8-volume Systematic Theology.) He had previously taught for two decades at Moody Bible Institute, the premier undergraduate dispensational academic institution of higher learning. In 1972, Rev. Getz founded the Fellowship Bible Church. It was there that he wrote his book, A Biblical Theology of Material Possessions.¹¹ This book was the culmination of a career of teaching.

He confined his study mainly to the New Testament. He therefore quietly assumed away most of the Bible. I would not call his book "Hamlet without the Prince of Denmark," as the traditional barb puts it. I would rather call it "Julius Caesar without the Roman Empire." Specifically, it is Jesus without Moses.

His is a common error. Indeed, it is the most common error in Christendom. It is, in fact, an important aspect of Protestantism's denial of Christendom. This began with Martin Luther in 1517. Luther was not content to deny Roman Catholicism's claim to represent Christendom. He went much further: to deny Christendom as a concept. He was an ethical dualist.¹² He promoted the idea of Bible-free natural law for non-Christian political systems and an inner spiritual release from the law for the redeemed.¹³ As for Christendom, it was for Luther a myth, for the only way to build a Bible-based society by rejecting natural law theory and using only the Bible would be to invoke Old Testament law. He denied that this methodology is valid. He therefore denied the legitimacy of the ideal of Christendom. Most Protestants have followed his lead.

9. For a coherent critique of one of Mr. Keynes' disciples, a Calvinist, see Ian Hodge, Baptized Inflation: A Critique of "Christian" Keynesianism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1986). (<http://bit.ly/HodgeBI>). This is a critique of Douglas Vickers, Economics and Man (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1976).

10. See Appendix F.

11. Chicago, Illinois: Moody Press.

Rev. Getz is in this tradition. But there is a difference: he is not explicitly an ethical dualist. He is an ethical dualist by default when it comes to civil government, for he never discussed its God-imposed limits. This dualism is implicit and not readily observable to readers who share it, which is most of them.

He spent over 400 pages in discussing New Testament passages that deal with wealth and poverty, or as he called them, material possessions. His Scripture index reveals his hermeneutic: two pages from the Old Testament and 11 pages from the New Testament. Yet he called his book A Biblical Theology of Material Possessions. This is false advertising. It should have been called A New Testament Biblical Theology of Material Possessions. Seminaries that teach biblical theology offer an OTBT course and an NTBT course. Instructors and students understand the difference in scope. Rev. Getz's readers do not. He wrote his book knowing full well that he nowhere solved the hermeneutical problem of reconciling and integrating the two fields of academic biblical theology. But, in this deliberate, self-conscious neglect, he is not unique. Entire seminary and Christian college faculties suffer from the same refusal to deal with this crucial hermeneutical issue: the reconciliation of the testaments.

Getz's book is over 400 pages long. It presents 126 "supracultural principles" of stewardship or ownership.¹⁴ All of them are taken from the New Testament. As a group, they deal with these themes: the spiritual danger of wealth, the necessity of Christians' giving charity, and the insecurity of wealth. Not one of these principles affirms the mor-

12. Charles Trinkaus, "The Religious Foundations of Luther's Social Views," in John H. Mundy, et al., Essays in Medieval Life (Cheshire, Connecticut: Biblo & Tannen, 1955), pp. 71–87.

13. Chapters 8 and 17.

14. Gene A. Getz, Biblical Theology of Material Possessions (Chicago: Moody Press, 1990), ch. 39.

ally binding law of tithing, which he specifically said is no longer binding in the New Covenant era.¹⁵ He left everything to the individual conscience. “Every Christian is ultimately responsible to give to God on the basis of his own heart decision.”¹⁶ If this is true, then pastors are reduced, as Getz was reduced, to arguing that God wants individuals to give more than they are presently giving. These pastors must spend their entire careers begging for money, as I have argued elsewhere.¹⁷ The become beggars for Jesus.

The New Testament does not identify widespread blessings, including wealth, as the products of national obedience to God’s law: the teaching of Deuteronomy 28:1–14. This explicitly covenantal view of economic prosperity and poverty is found in the Old Testament, but not in the New Testament. This means one of three things: (1) the New Covenant authors assumed the continuation of the Old Covenant’s judicial foundation of wealth and poverty (the theonomists’ view); (2) the New Covenant has no official explanation for wealth and poverty, and is generally hostile to personal riches (pietism’s view); or (3) the New Covenant has broken with the Old Covenant, and is unquestionably hostile to wealth (Sider’s published view before 1997).

Getz is a pietist. He pressed Christians to make personal economic decisions, not on the basis of biblical law, but rather on the basis of their feelings. He had nothing to say about the state’s role in establishing justice as one foundation of economic growth. All he said about the state was this: (1) Christians have an obligation to pay their taxes;¹⁸ (2) it is a fortunate thing that the state’s welfare programs have reduced the burden on churches for supporting the poor.¹⁹

Getz said explicitly that Deuteronomy 28’s view of wealth and poverty is the Old Testament’s teaching.²⁰ Then he did his best to distance himself from the Old Testament’s specifics. He threw out Deuteronomy 28, justifying this jettisoning of biblical revelation on the basis of cultural differences. He cited someone named Willingale in

15. Ibid., p. 210.

16. Ibid., p. 233.

17. Gary North, Tithing and the Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/gntithing>)

18. Getz, Material Possessions, pp. 255–56.

19. “First, the church should make sure there are no other sources of support—including assistance from various governmental agencies. If people in need have access to welfare systems, they should use those resources to the full. This was not possible for widows in the first-century world, but fortunately, it is possible in many countries today.” Ibid., p. 317.

20. Ibid., p. 265.

the New Bible Dictionary (Eerdmans, 1962).

Willingale reminds us that this unique economic setting in Israel “changes in the New Testament.” Israel now existed in a totally different situation culturally and economically. The Jews had to adapt their laws to a commercial economy.²¹

Why I am supposed to take seriously Willingale’s observation is beyond me. Willingale’s view rests on preposterous assumption: that the Jews in the era of the Mosaic law did not participate in a commercial economy until after the Monarchy. Speaking of the conquest generation, Getz wrote: “Because of God’s material provisions for the children of Israel, there was no need to establish businesses based upon a free enterprise system. Rather, they were able to make a living from the land they had received free from indebtedness.”²² This statement boggles the imagination. First, he implicitly defined business as exclusively urban. He had no conception of agriculture as a business, or other rural occupations as businesses. Second, he conveniently ignored the 48 Levitical cities (Num. 35:7). Third, Israel was located on one of the most important trade routes of the ancient world: the road between Egypt and Babylon, with ports on the Mediterranean. The Old Testament is filled with laws governing commerce. But, having created a true straw man—Old Covenant business as urban—Getz made his break with Deuteronomic law.

Interpretation and Application Today. The challenge twentieth-century Christians face is to interpret these Old Testament teachings without transplanting Old Testament law into another cultural setting in a legalistic, literal fashion.²³

This is the standard pietistic line: the Mosaic law as legalistic when applied literally to the New Covenant era. Somehow, it must be applied spiritually, meaning non-literally. But on what basis can anyone draw such a conclusion regarding a specific Mosaic law? Using what hermeneutic (principle of interpretation)? The pietists never say. However, in order to evade the accusation of being what they obviously are—antinomians—they hasten to add statements such as these: “At the same time, we must not bypass the spirit of these laws. Though designed for Israel, they yield timeless principles that are supracultural, for, as we will see, they are affirmed by New Testament teaching.”²⁴ This is pietistic gush unless it is accompanied by a principle of interpretation that enables us to discover the timeless principle in a now-annulled Mosaic law. Getz offered no such principle.

21. Idem.

22. Idem.

23. Ibid., pp. 265–66.

Getz did not again refer to Deuteronomy’s covenantal laws governing economic growth, nor did he show that any principle in the New Testament relates covenant-keeping to wealth. This law of wealth does not appear in his list of 126 supracultural principles. He never offered one word of encouragement regarding the covenantal legitimacy of great wealth as a blessing of God. His entire book is one long call for people to give more money to the local church, although he refused to specify what percentage. Having abandoned the tithe as a judicial principle, he substituted guilt-manipulation.

Getz is to Christian financial guilt-manipulation on behalf of the local church what Sider was for Christian financial guilt-manipulation on behalf of the state and the United Nations. I define Christian guilt-manipulation as preaching that makes Christians feel guilty for not having given enough to the poor, despite the fact that the preacher chooses not to point to any biblical law that the victims have broken, such as the law of the tithe. Getz denied the law of the tithe. Sider called for something called a “graduated tithe” extracted by compulsion by the state.²⁵ This is open-ended guilt that no specific act of sacrifice can overcome. The guilt is open-ended because its institutional context is antinomianism.²⁶

Getz, like Sider, did not accept the explicitly biblical basis of legitimate riches: covenant-keeping. He discussed the reduction of poverty only in terms of charitable giving by Christians and hard work by recipients, never in terms of job-creating investments by Christians and other profit-seeking capitalists. His footnotes and his bibliography reveal no awareness of David Chilton’s Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators (1981) or E. Calvin Beisner’s Prosperity and Poverty: The Compassionate Use of Resources in a World of Scarcity (1988).²⁷ But, far more important than this, he ignored the Old Testament’s revelation that undergirds these two books. For him, the Mosaic law is irrelevant except as some sort of handy-dandy, non-binding

24. Ibid., p. 266.

25. Ronald J. Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger: A Biblical Study (Downer’s Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity, 1977), pp. 175ff.

26. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 56.

27. Both published by Crossway Books.

grab-bag of examples for some vague process called “the spirit of these laws.”

Of what practical, institutional use is a concept of “the spirit of these laws” without either the laws or their mandated sanctions? For example, what would Rev. Getz say if he caught one of his parishioners having sex with a pig? Maybe this: “Joe, you really aren’t entering into the true spirit of God’s law.” What could he say to this response? “If there is no New Testament law against it, then I’ll pick my partners as I choose. It’s just a matter of taste, after all. This is how my spirit leads me. The New Testament era is different from the culture of Mosaic Israel. After all, Reverend, you wrote it yourself: ‘This Old Testament law and others like it must be interpreted in its cultural setting.’²⁸ Well, the law against bestiality I interpret as ‘others like it.’ Who is to say I’m wrong? Put up or shut up, Reverend.”

In defending a hermeneutic of the Mosaic law’s authority as culture-based and therefore mutable, Getz is not alone. This is why I have used the same case-law example of deviant animal husbandry in response to a faculty member of Westminster Seminary.²⁹ Getz’s antinomian hermeneutic is not unique to dispensationalism, which at least has an explanation, however weak exegetically, for the total judicial discontinuity between the Testaments: the absolute separation of Mosaic law from the so-called Church Age or “Great Parenthesis.” All schools of theology except theonomy presume the general principle of judicial discontinuity. This is why theologians, one and all, resent Deuteronomy. This is why they also resent theonomy and its implication, Christian reconstruction. In this hostility, they are joined by theological liberals and humanists.

3. Pietism vs. Responsibility

There are pietistic Bible commentators who argue that the dominion covenant made with Adam was pre-Fall and therefore does not apply to history. An example is the then-tiny and now even tinier premillennial fundamentalist denomination, the Bible Presbyterian Church, which declared in 1970 that the cultural mandate (the Dutch Reformed version of the dominion covenant) has no authority in history, 28. Getz, Material Possessions, p. 266.

29. Gary North, Westminster’s Confession: The Abandonment of Van Til’s Legacy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991), pp. 211–14. (<http://bit.ly/gnwc>)

but is exclusively pre-Fall and post-final judgment. Genesis 1: 26–28³⁰ and Genesis 9 have nothing to do with culture, they insisted. The passages apply only to biological reproduction. Genesis 9 does not use the words “and subdue it,” and therefore the passage has nothing to do with culture in history. The idea of the cultural mandate “cuts the nerve of true missionary work and of evangelism.”³¹

For pietists, true missionary work and evangelism apply only to individual souls, denominational reform (i.e., separatism’s endless church splits), and the establishment of Christian families. Culture in general is in principle handed over to the devil and his earthly agents. The dominion covenant is said to remain right where it was immediately after Adam’s Fall: under Satan’s authority. This means that the incarnation, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ in history have had no effect on Adam’s rebellious transfer of allegiance to Satan in history. Culture is seen as outside of Christ’s redemption. So, the Great Commission has to do with souls, not culture. The Great Commission is really not so great. It is highly limited.³²

Why do Christians defend such a truncated view of the gospel? Because they want to restrict their personal responsibility for engaging in comprehensive social reform. The idea of the dominion covenant appalls them, for it makes them responsible for politics, culture, and everything else. They want to go through life as minor figures without responsibility in a world legitimately dominated by covenant-breakers. They prefer not to think about the possibility that God has called His people to subdue the earth for His glory, and has provided biblical laws to enable His people to obey Him. They prefer to adopt natural law theory on the assumption that covenant-breakers and covenant-keepers can agree on fundamental cultural and civil law and, once agreed, that covenant-breakers can run things. All the pietist wants is immunity from covenant-breakers. But covenant-breakers do not offer them immunity. They want control. They take seriously the dominion covenant. They just don’t take God’s law seriously. They share the same hostility to God’s law with the pietists.

Pietists pray “thy kingdom come, thy will be done, in earth as it is

30. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

31. For the complete document and its refutation, see R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 723–30.

32. For a refutation, see Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>) in heaven,” with one of two mental escape clauses: (1) to be fulfilled after the second coming, during the millennial reign of Christ, bodily, over a top-down international bureaucracy (premillennialism); (2) to be fulfilled after the final judgment, when sinners are permanently separated from saints (amillennialism). In both cases, the implication is the same: “not my responsibility.”

C. Higher Critics and Their Baptized Agents

Higher critics of the Bible argue that Moses did not write the Pentateuch. These five books were supposedly written centuries later by ecclesiastical officials inside the land. That is to say, higher critics implicitly argue that the Book of Deuteronomy is a pack of lies that was written and rewritten over the centuries by a series of highly dedicated and highly skilled forgers. But, being mild-mannered academics as well as wolves in sheep’s clothing, the critics do not use such words as “lies,” “forgers,” and “deception.” They prefer such sophisticated terms as “myths,” “redactors,” and “weltanschauung.”³³

One argument against the higher critics is the integration of the five books of Moses. The Pentateuch is a remarkable structure. How did hordes of redactors re-write the Pentateuch, line by line, without undermining the integration of the five books? How was it that this structure, which generations of higher critics failed to perceive, was understood by each of the redactors? How was it that generations of tiny revisions maintained this covenant structure, which was invisible to academic specialists—even Germans!—until the work of George Mendenhall in the mid-1950s?³⁴

The Pentateuch is structured in terms of a covenant. The five books of Moses parallel the five-point biblical covenant model.³⁵ This model defines covenant theology.³⁶ The five-point structure is clearest within the Book of Deuteronomy: transcendence (1:1–5); hierarchy (1:6–4:49); ethics (5–26); sanctions (27–30); and continuity (31–34).³⁷

33. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), Appendix H: “Conspiracy, Forgery, and Higher Criticism.”

34. George Mendenhall, Law and Covenant in Israel and the Ancient Near East (Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania: Biblical Colloquium, 1955).

35. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, General Introduction.

36. Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010).

37. This is Sutton’s version of Meredith Kline’s proposed structure. Meredith G. Kline, Treaty of the Great King: The Covenant Structure of Deuteronomy: Studies and

The book's five-point structure is widely acknowledged by scholars specializing in the Old Testament. James Jordan divides the book into five parts: (1) steward as vice-gerent, (2) new cosmos,³⁸ (3) Moses' sermon on the Ten Commandments, (4) implementation, and (5) succession.³⁹ This five-point model also governs the structure of Exodus⁴⁰ and Leviticus,⁴¹ as well as the Ten Commandments⁴² and the five sacrifices of Leviticus.⁴³

This covenantal structure was common to Hittite treaties in the second millennium, B.C. This was Mendenhall's point and Kline's. If the Book of Deuteronomy was put into its final form in, say, the seventh century B.C., how was it that it was structured in terms of a treaty structure in wide use almost a thousand years earlier?

Despite this obvious problem, professedly conservative Bible commentaries still promote some version of higher criticism. The New Bible Dictionary, co-published by InterVarsity Press in England and Tyndale House in the United States, asserts: "But none of these statements permits the conclusion that Deuteronomy as we have it today came completely, or even in large measure, from Moses himself. One has to allow for editorial activity and adaptations of original Mosaic material to a later age."⁴⁴ Let me translate this into non-Ph.D. English: "One has to allow for post-Mosaic forgeries by non-inspired charlatans who adapted the original Mosaic material according to the interests, information, and perspectives of their age, fooling the likes of you, my academically uncertified Christian reader, generation after generation." The author says as much: "However, it became necessary in new situations to represent the words of Moses and to show their relevance for a new day."⁴⁵ Then he escalated his rhetoric: "While there seems little reason to deny that a substantial part [which part?] of Deutero-

Commentary (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1963), pp. 48–49; Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), pp. 21, 41, 59, 77, 96. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

38. Two sets of five points each (1:6–46; 2:1–4:40).

39. James B. Jordan, Covenant Sequence in Leviticus and Deuteronomy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/jjcovseq>)

40. Sovereign God (1–17), judicial appeals courts (18), laws (21–23:13), oath (23–24), and inheritance (25–40). North, Authority and Dominion, Appendix S:C:1.

41. Sacrifices (1–7), priestly cleansing (8–16), laws of separation (17–22), covenant-renewal festivals and covenant-breaking acts (23–24), and inheritance (25–27). North, Boundaries and Dominion, Introduction to Part I, Section B:1.

42. North, Authority and Dominion, Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion.

43. North, Boundaries and Dominion, Preface, Section B.

44. "Deuteronomy, Book of," New Bible Commentary, p. 283.

45. Idem.

nomy was in existence some centuries [how many?] before the seventh century BC, it is not possible [for humanist-certified Christian scholars] to say how much of it comprises the ipsissima verba of Moses himself.”⁴⁶ How impressive: ipsissima verba. I would call his language struttissima verba. “Hey, all you untrained bumpkins out there who still believe in the inspired word of God, who still believe in the words of Jesus, which identified the author of the law as Moses. You don’t have a Ph.D. issued by some secular university. You poor, pathetic people are struggling to earn a living, while we Christian academics live off of your tithes, your offerings, or maybe even your taxes through a tax-funded university faculty. Personally, I live off of public tax money. See what we can do! We can undermine your faith at your expense. We can toss around Latin phrases. I guess that shows you what we are.” Yes, it does. And also what they believe: “Hath God said?”

