Those thoughtful people who, in a century or a millennium from now, may reflect on why the twentieth century was almost devoid of Bible commentaries that were confident in the cultural relevance of the Bible, or in principles drawn from the Bible, or in the probable success of the gospel in transforming culture, need only consider the emasculating effects of such prevarications as we find in The New Bible Commentary, written for educated laymen by humanist-trained and humanist-certified academic evangelicals. Cautious Christian authors refused to use words that reflect what they were really saying. Forgers in retrospect become “editors.” Revisions made centuries later by these clever and unscrupulous forgers become “relevance for a new day.” The verbal, plenary inspiration of the Bible becomes a mish-mash of “fragments.” The Bible as delivered to the saints becomes a grab-bag of updates, revisions, and improvements on the revealed word of God. The timeless authority of the Bible is jettisoned for the timely authority of academic relevance. The word of man triumphs in history, revision by revision, leaving saints in every age without an inspired anchor linking heaven and earth, eternity and time. Man is thereby unchained covenantally, which is what covenant-breaking man since Adam has wanted to be. Twentieth-century evangelical churches were deeply compromised with modernism’s pagan culture, rarely more visibly or more dangerously than in the Christian college and seminary classroom. So far, the twenty-first century has not changed this situation. But it is just beginning.

46. Ibid., p. 284.

D. The Economics of the Pentateuch

I began writing my economic commentary on the Bible in the spring of 1973. In August of 1977, I went into high gear: 10 hours a week, 50 weeks a year. I have invested over 16,000 hours in this writing project since 1977. With the completion of the Pentateuch, I reached the end of phase one of this project in 1999.

No one before me had bothered to write an economic commentary of the Pentateuch. A major reason for this neglect was that there has never been any demand for such a Bible-based study. Academic economists are methodological atheists, which includes Christian economists. Both groups search for social truths through supposedly value-neutral reason. Economists are not willing to re-think their academic specialties in terms of the assumption of the final authority of the Bible. They do not re-structure the received wisdom of their academic disciplines in terms of biblical revelation.

I wrote this commentary, above all, because I was curious about what God's law says about economics. I had to do the exegetical work to find out, since no one else ever had. I learn best by research and writing. It has taken a large investment of time for me to find out.

Why do I think an economic commentary on the Bible is important? Six reasons. First, it is important for God's people to understand what the Bible has to say in every area of life. The church cannot bring an effective covenant lawsuit against society if its members do not know what the Bible says is wrong, legally and morally, with every area of society. Sin reigns wherever God's law doesn't. To reduce sin, we must extend the rule of God's law by means of God's grace. God's law is as comprehensive as sin. So is God's redemption.⁴⁷ When empowered by the Holy Spirit, Christians can use the law to overcome progressively the rule of sin in every nook and cranny in which it reigns. God's Bible-revealed law is Christendom's unique tool of dominion.

There I go again, using a naughty word: Christendom. Most Protestants for over a century have not used it in public except as a pejorative. Christendom implies that the city of God can have visible manifestations in history—in the church (“well, of course”), the family (“OK, we can accept that”), and the state (“Wait a minute—that sounds like theocracy to us!”).

47. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C: “Comprehensive Redemption: A Theology for Social Action.” (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

I could ask the typical Bible-affirming Christian: Is there sin in personal life, the area of self-government? His answer: “Yes.” Then what is the solution? Answer: “God’s grace and God’s . . . uh, hmmm; oh, yes, God’s principles!” (This sounds a lot safer theologically than God’s law.) I am not exaggerating. Rev. Getz refused to use the phrase “biblical law.” He substituted the academic mouthful, “supracultural principle.” I suggest that nobody uses a word like “supracultural” who does not have a hidden agenda. Rev. Getz’s hidden agenda was to keep his readers from accepting the concept of an authoritative biblical law-order that is set forth in both the Old Testament and the New Testament and is therefore still binding in the New Testament era, including the “Church Age” or “Great Parenthesis,” as dispensationalists call it.

What about sin in the church, the area of church government? What is the solution? “God’s grace and God’s principles!” What about sin in the family, the area of family government? Solution? “God’s grace and God’s principles!” What about the state, the area of civil government? “Democracy and natural law!” This is pietism’s confession: fundamentalist, Lutheran, and Presbyterian.

A second reason why this commentary is important is that there is a positive relationship between corporate obedience to God’s law and corporate success in history (Deut. 28:1–14). This positive relationship is denied by anti-theonomists, most notably Meredith G. Kline. My goal is to persuade Christians to begin obeying God’s Bible-revealed law in preparation for preaching it, enforcing it, and benefiting from it.

Third, I want this economic commentary to serve as a model for other practical and theoretical Bible commentaries in the various social sciences.

Fourth, I am tired of hearing the Christian scholar’s familiar slogan, “The Bible isn’t a textbook in [my academic discipline],” the discipline in which he was formally certified by humanists in some institution of higher learning, and for which he is a mouthpiece for a baptized version of humanism’s conclusions. The Bible is indeed not a textbook. But it does provide the governing interpretation and many facts necessary for writing accurate textbooks.

Fifth, I want to write a textbook someday on Christian economics as a first step in restructuring the Christian curriculum. To do thus, I first must know what the Bible says about economics. The Pentateuch was the place to start: the law.

E. Time for a Change

There is a sixth reason. I am convinced that P. A. Sorokin was correct two generations ago: the West is facing a monumental breakdown.⁴⁸ We live in a culture which rests on the humanistic presupposition that anything that cannot be touched, measured, or manipulated by scientific techniques is not socially relevant. Sorokin called the product of this outlook “sensate culture.” No society can survive indefinitely that holds such a view of cause and effect, he said.

The world’s division of labor will collapse if there is a breakdown in the means of payment: bank credit money. If this happens, there will be a worldwide economic disaster. In the aftermath of such a disaster, not to mention during it, Christians will be among the local competitors for social and political influence.

There are others threats: a plague that cannot be suppressed by antibiotics, biological warfare, nuclear war, and warfare against the electronic infrastructure, such as EMP (electromagnetic pulsation). All of these threaten the international division of labor. All of them threaten the debt system. This means that the banks are threatened from outside the financial system as well as from inside.

If we avoid all this, we will still face the bankruptcy of tax-funded social welfare programs for the aged. Charities will have to pick up the slack Christians are not ready for this huge increase of responsibility, but it is coming anyway.

During the crisis period, I expect theonomy to receive a wider hearing among Christians, who will be facing that ancient political problem: “You can’t beat something with nothing.”

I now possess a monopoly: an economic commentary on the Bible. Maybe I can at long last generate some demand at something above zero price.

Here is the looming social problem, in the words of real estate master investor Jack Miller: “Voters will call for a man on a white horse, and there are a lot of guys out there with brown horses and whitewash.” To distinguish accurately between white horses and whitewashed horses, we need to have a model for white horses (Rev. 19:14). The Bible provides this model: biblical law. The problem is, this model is found mainly in the Old Testament. Christians today prefer leaders on whitewashed brown horses to the Old Testament.

48. Pitirim A. Sorokin, The Crisis of Our Age (Oxford, England: Oneworld, [1941] 1992).

Conclusion

I think sections of my multi-volume commentary will still be read in a hundred years, though not read by many. Its temporal longevity is easy to secure, because there is one advantage that commentaries possess over other books: they help pastors interpret difficult Bible passages. The Pentateuch has many difficult passages. This, plus the World Wide Web, will keep this commentary “in print.”

This book is long because it is a Bible commentary relating to a specialized area. A standard Bible commentary comments—or should—on every passage. It cannot include much information about any one passage. This commentary is different. It is designed to convey extensive knowledge about a few verses that relate to the topic at hand: economics. The reader is seeking more information per passage than a standard commentary can provide. This book can be read cover to cover, even if it has no covers, but it is designed to be read one chapter at a time. I assume that a pastor who is preaching on one passage wants information on this passage and no other, for today. The same is true of a reader who reads a passage and wants to see if it has any economic implications. This is the reason why the book is repetitive. I assume that most people will not read it straight through, and even if they do, they will forget what I say about a specific passage. They will come back to this book, if at all, for clarification regarding one passage. A Bible commentary should meet the needs of readers who are seeking clarification, one passage at a time.

I also offer a warning: those Christians who continue to chant the academic mantra, “There’s no such thing as Christian economics,” have their work cut out for them. They have a lot of reading to do. So far, they have done very little reading. To all of them, I say, using an analogy from basketball, “The ball is in your end of the court.” The fact is, it has been for a couple of decades.

Until you see evidence that at least one of my critics has done his homework in the exposition of biblical texts and economic theory, whose Bible citations and footnotes reflect this, and who has offered a coherent refutation of what I have written, with footnotes to my economic commentary on the Bible, you would be wise not to take their mantra seriously. There really is such a thing as Christian economics. It is part of the church’s inheritance.

With every inheritance comes responsibility. The church today prefers to forfeit its lawful inheritance for the sake of avoiding any additional responsibility. This is true in almost every area of life and especially every area of academic specialization. Result: the church is a convenient public doormat for humanists, who laugh at it in derision yet also fear it. The church is growing worldwide. Humanism is in retreat everywhere, especially the nation-state. If the church ever claims its full inheritance and begins to apply it, the cultural tide will shift: in science, politics, economics, and education. This, the humanists fear. Sadly, so do most Christians.

PREFACE

And the LORD heard the voice of your words, and was wroth, and sware, saying, Surely there shall not one of these men of this evil generation see that good land, which I sware to give unto your fathers, Save Caleb the son of Jephunneh; he shall see it, and to him will I give the land that he hath trodden upon, and to his children, because he hath wholly followed the LORD. Also the LORD was angry with me for your sakes, saying, Thou also shalt not go in thither. But Joshua the son of Nun, which standeth before thee, he shall go in thither: encourage him: for he shall cause Israel to inherit it. Moreover your little ones, which ye said should be a prey, and your children, which in that day had no knowledge between good and evil, they shall go in thither, and unto them will I give it, and they shall possess it (Deut. 1:34–39).

The language of inheritance appears early in the Book of Deuteronomy. Inheritance is the integrating theme of the entire book, as I shall argue in this commentary. Inheritance is the transfer of lawful ownership at the death or departure¹ of the testator. I contend that economic theory is primarily the social science of ownership. I define economics as follows:

Economics is the science of covenantal stewardship: the administration of resources that have been assigned by God, the cosmic Owner, to a person or group, which then leads to an increase, a decrease, or no change in the resources' value in God's estimation and also in the estimation of other stewards.

I begin with God. Christian economics is theocentric. The archetypical passage on economics in the Bible is Jesus' parable of the talents (Matt. 25:14–30;² Luke 19:12–15³).

1. "And Abraham gave all that he had unto Isaac. But unto the sons of the concubines, which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and sent them away from Isaac his son, while he yet lived, eastward, unto the east country" (Gen. 25:5–6).

A. The Covenantal Structure of the Pentateuch

Inheritance and Dominion is the culmination of my two-fold, multi-volume assertion that (1) the biblical covenant model has five points, and (2) the Pentateuch is structured in terms of the biblical covenant model. I did not recognize this when I began writing this series of economic commentaries in 1973. I recognized it only in late 1985, when Ray Sutton first presented his study of the covenant model in a series of Wednesday evening Bible studies. I argued for this five-point structure of the Pentateuch in my “General Introduction to The Dominion Covenant (1987),” published in the second edition of The Dominion Covenant: Genesis.⁴ The biblical covenant model has five parts: the transcendence/presence of God; man’s hierarchy/authority under God; ethics/law as the basis of covenant-keeping man’s dominion in history, i.e., the visible extension of the boundaries of God’s kingdom; oath/sanctions as the basis of cause and effect in history; and succession in history through corporate covenant renewal.⁵ The acronym for this structure is THEOS. If this argument is correct, then the fifth book of the Pentateuch should match the fifth point of the covenant: inheritance/disinheritance, a two-fold process in history which mirrors the dual covenantal sanctions of blessing and cursing.

Let us survey briefly the primary integrating theme of each of the Pentateuch’s five books. Genesis reveals the absolute sovereignty of God in creating the world out of nothing and sustaining it in history. Exodus reveals the deliverance of national Israel in history by this sovereign God, who requires His people to covenant with Him as His lawful subjects (Ex. 19). Leviticus reveals the laws of God for Mosaic Israel: the stipulations of Israel’s national existence as a covenantal unit. Numbers reveals God’s corporate sanctions in history: against Israel in the wilderness because of unbelief, and against the Amorites a generation later, outside the borders of Canaan, in the months preceding the

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 47.

3. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 46.

4. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1987] 2012), General; Introduction, Section F.

5. On the five points, see Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992). (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) invasion of Canaan. Deuteronomy is the book of inheritance through covenant renewal, revealing the imminent fulfillment of the promised Abrahamic inheritance, which involved the disinheritance of the Canaanites.

The reader is hereby warned: if, after reading this commentary, you find that you agree with my thesis that the primary theme of Deuteronomy is inheritance, then you should be more willing to accept my thesis that the Pentateuch is structured in terms of the five-point biblical covenant model.

This commentary series is called An Economic Commentary on the Bible. My general thesis for all of these volumes is that both economic theory and practice are inherently covenantal. I titled the first volume, The Dominion Covenant: Genesis. I argued there that God's covenant with Adam (Gen. 1:26–28) defines mankind. This thesis has led me to argue that the fundamental economic issue is not scarcity, contrary to virtually all economics textbooks. The fundamental economic issue is ownership. The issue of ownership is always covenantal. The legal question, "Who owns this?" is more fundamental than the economists' initial question: "Why do I have to pay something to obtain this?"

To answer the question, "Who owns this?" we must first answer the question: "Who possesses original sovereignty?"

B. Original Sovereignty

Economists should begin the study of economics with a question: Who is originally sovereign? The Bible's answer is clear: God. He created the world. He therefore possesses original jurisdiction. Through the rebellious actions of the serpent, Eve, and Adam, Satan gained subordinate control over the earth. Adam, as God's supreme covenantal agent, had the authority to decide which sovereign he would serve. By disobeying God, he transferred allegiance to Satan. This was an act of covenant-breaking. It was also a judicially representative act: he did this in the name of his heirs. Those heirs of Adam who remain outside of God's covenant of redemption necessarily deny the ownership claims of God.

It is covenant-keeping man's God-given assignment to extend the kingdom of God in history, reclaiming territory that was lost by Adam's transfer of covenantal allegiance. This reclaiming of the earth is a two-fold activity: fulfilling the original dominion covenant (Gen. 1:26–28) and reclaiming the lost inheritance from covenant-breakers.

We redeem this property—buy it back—just as Christ redeemed us from the wrath of God. We redeem this world as delegated stewards under Christ’s general ownership, as both the Creator of the world (Col. 1:16) and as its Redeemer. But, because of His comprehensive redemption, we now operate not merely as stewards, but as adopted sons (Gal. 4:5–8). Our stewardship is our means of establishing our post-final-judgment inheritance, as the parable of the talents says. There is continuity between history and eternity.

For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ. Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; Every man’s work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man’s work of what sort it is. If any man’s work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man’s work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire (I Cor. 3:11–15).⁶

Ultimately, Satan will be disinherited in history. To argue otherwise is to argue that Adam’s transfer to Satan of Adam’s God-given stewardship over the kingdom of God is a permanent condition in history. The eschatological assumption of Satan’s triumphant reign in history also necessarily assumes that Jesus Christ’s Great Commission (Matt. 28:18–20)⁷—reclaiming the world by means of the Holy Spirit-empowered gospel of redemption (buying-back)—will produce only a series of sporadic Christian oases in the historically permanent desert of Satanism. It is to argue that biblical eschatology teaches that Adam’s inheritance in history was permanently transferred to Satan, irrespective of the redemptive work of Jesus Christ in history and for history. This outlook transfers almost all of the covenant-keepers’ lawful inheritance to the world beyond the grave. It makes men’s cultural inheritance an either/or proposition: either history or eternity. It denies what the Bible teaches: inheritance is a both/and proposition. It is inheritance in both history and eternity for covenant-keepers, and disinheritance in both history and eternity for covenant-breakers.⁸

6. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 3.

7. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>) North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 48.

8. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1997). (<http://bit.ly/klghshd>)

C. Eschatology and Inheritance

This theme of inheritance/disinheritance is basic to covenantal progression in history: the growth of the kingdom of God at the expense of the kingdom of Satan. In this sense, covenantal conflict is what economists call a zero-sum game: the winner's gains come at the expense of the loser. Because of God's common grace,⁹ this is not always true in cultural matters. Through the division of labor, covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers can simultaneously expand their respective spheres of influence. There can be win-win arrangements in history between both camps. The obvious example is population growth. But in the supernatural battle for an individual soul, covenantal conflict is a pure zero-sum conflict. One kingdom expands at the expense of the other.

This covenantal fact of life and death raises the issue of eschatology. The theological doctrine known as eschatology—the doctrine of the last things—is point five of the biblical covenant model. It cannot be separated from a theory of history, because eschatology is also the doctrine of whatever precedes the last things. It is, in this sense, the doctrine of the next-to-last things. Because there are three rival theories of biblical eschatology—amillennialism, premillennialism, and postmillennialism—each has a different conception of the next-to-last things. Each theory has its own conception of social theory, i.e., social cause and effect.¹⁰

Biblical eschatology is the story of the replacement of Satan's stolen kingdom by God's kingdom. The eschatological question that divides theologians is this: To what extent is this process of kingdom replacement revealed in history? Is history an earnest—a down payment—on the eternity to come? Is there considerable or minimal continuity between history and eternity? Does the wheat or do the tares progressively dominate as history unfolds? Amillennialism insists that history is a reverse foretaste of eternity: the righteous get weaker, and the unrighteous get stronger. Premillennialism teaches the same with regard to the era prior to Christ's bodily return and His imposition of a comprehensive international bureaucracy, staffed by Christians, for a thousand years. Postmillennialism insists that covenantal history is the story of the lawful transfer of inheritance, secured by the death of the lawful Heir, who thereby has become the Testator (Heb. 9:16–17). For postmillennialism, history is also the story of disinheritance in history: covenant-keepers' reclaiming of the stolen legacy from covenant-breakers. Righteousness will replace unrighteousness as the next-to-the-last things unfold.

9. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcrg>)

10. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

D. Social Theory and Eschatology

The fifth point of the biblical covenant model is succession.¹¹ The fifth point is judicially connected to the fourth: sanctions.¹² Corporate sanctions are applied by God in history in terms of point three: law.¹³ Any discussion of biblical law that ignores corporate sanctions and succession is incomplete. Any discussion that self-consciously separates sanctions and succession is incorrect.

Succession is an aspect of eschatology. The eschatological question regarding history is this: Who shall inherit the earth? The Bible is clear: covenant-keepers.

His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth (Ps. 25:13).

For evildoers shall be cut off; but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth (Ps. 37:9).

But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace (Ps. 37:11).

For such as be blessed of him shall inherit the earth; and they that be cursed of him shall be cut off (Ps. 37:22).

Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth (Matt. 5:5).¹⁴

This eschatological outlook is denied by premillennialists and amillennialists. This is why they have a major problem with the Book of Deuteronomy, the premier book of inheritance in the Old Testament. To deal with this book, they have to argue that the corrosive effects of sin always lead men to break the covenant and lose the inheritance. This is why covenant-keepers supposedly will not inherit the earth. The problem with this argument is two-fold: (1) it necessarily makes covenant-breakers the inheritors, thereby denying the plain

11. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 5.

12. Ibid., ch. 4.

13. Ibid., ch. 3.

14. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 4.

teaching of Scripture; (2) it relegates the New Testament doctrines of the bodily resurrection and ascension of Christ to the realm of eschatological adiaphora—things indifferent to the faith.

E. Methodological Starting Point: Scarcity or Ownership?

In my 1987 book, Inherit the Earth: Biblical Blueprints for Economics, I began with the first point of the covenant: God's transcendence, yet also His presence. In economic theory, this principle is manifested in the concept of God's original ownership. Point two, hierarchy-representation, is applied in economics by the concept of God's delegated but restricted ownership of property to individuals and organizations: stewardship. Point three, boundaries, is applied in economics by the concept of landmarks or fences. Point four, profit or loss, is the basis for evaluating success or failure. Finally, point five, inheritance, is the economic issue of economic growth.

1. Adam Smith on Private Property

Humanistic free market economists traditionally begin their analyses with the issue of scarcity. This has been true ever since Adam Smith wrote Wealth of Nations (1776). They begin here for an unstated but powerful reason: their quest for epistemological neutrality. They begin with what appears to be a common-ground observation about the external world, an observation that is universally acknowledged and therefore presumably neutral epistemologically. They seek to avoid any appeal to theology or other obviously value-laden presuppositions. The issue of scarcity is not epistemologically neutral. It is heavily value-laden, but it is far easier to conceal this fact than to conceal the more obviously value-laden doctrine of original ownership.

After I read Tom Bethell's 1998 book, The Noblest Triumph, I recognized how inappropriate Smith's starting point was. Bethell made the neglected point that Smith generally ignored the concept of private property in Wealth of Nations. Bethell wrote, "there is very little that is directly about property in The Wealth of Nations. The few paragraphs on the subject are extraneous to Smith's argument."¹⁵ Smith's oversight enabled socialists, beginning with William Godwin in his book, Enquiry Concerning Political Justice (1793), to focus on ownership as the central issue: the failure of private ownership and the goal of state ownership. There was no full-scale intellectual defense of private property as the linchpin of rational economic analysis until Ludwig von Mises wrote his path-breaking essay, "Economic Calculation in the Socialist Commonwealth" (1920). Mises extended his analysis in his 1922 book, Socialism, presenting it in final form in Human Action (1949). Thus, almost two centuries passed between Smith's neglect of private property until Mises' comprehensive theoretical defense of economic theory as grounded in private ownership. It was not until the political and economic collapse of the bankrupt Soviet Union in 1991 that socialist economists quietly retired from the field of intellectual battle.

15. Tom Bethell, The Noblest Triumph: Property and Prosperity through the Ages (New York: St. Martin's, 1998), p. 97.

When would-be autonomous man begins his discussion of economics apart from any consideration of the twin doctrines of creation and providence, he has assumed as incontrovertible what he needs first to prove, namely, that the creation is an autonomous "given," and that man is also an autonomous "given." Far from being neutral, this presupposition of the creation's autonomy is an intellectual act of theft. It is an application of the serpent's rhetorical question: "Hath God said?" (Gen. 3:1). That question led immediately to the transgression of a boundary: theft. So does the assumption of scarcity as the methodological starting point of economics.

2. Locke's Theory of God's Original Ownership

When a methodological individualist eventually gets around to considering the question of personal sovereignty, he begins with the presupposition of each man's ownership of his own person. This was John Locke's argument in 1690, but only after he had invoked God's sovereign ownership of creation. He wrote: "Though the earth and all inferior creatures be common to all men, yet every man has a 'property' in his own 'person.' This nobody has any right to but himself."¹⁶ Libertarian economist and ethicist Murray Rothbard began with self-ownership apart from any consideration of God.¹⁷ If followed to its logical conclusion, Rothbard's presupposition legalizes suicide. Christians should therefore sense the presence of a fundamental ethical problem associated with methodological individualism.

16. John Locke, Second Treatise on Government (1690), V:26.

17. Murray N. Rothbard, The Ethics of Liberty (New York: New York University Press, [1982] 1998), pp. 45–46, 59. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardEOL>); Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State: A Treatise on Economic Principles, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), p. 92. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardMES>)

The right-wing Enlightenment's presupposition of each person's self-ownership does not solve the moral and judicial problems regarding the limits (boundaries) of that which adult children owe to their parents, whose time and effort allowed their children to survive. Methodological individualism begins with the individual as if there were no legal bonds of the family, which is a corporate institution sanctioned by God and possessing legal claims on the individual. Are these family claims morally and legally valid? Methodological individualism begins with assumption that these claims are not valid. Methodological individualists assume this; they do not prove it by an appeal to economics, which is not autonomous. Economic analysis assumes, but does not prove, certain doctrines of property.

At best, the presupposition of self-ownership does not solve the problem of ownership of anything other than one's own person. But men are dependent on external nature for their survival. How is ownership lawfully established over anything in nature? The libertarians, who are methodological individualists, offer two answers. First, ownership is established by a person's verbal declaration.¹⁸ If true, then we must ask: What happens when one person's declaration extends across a boundary that some other person lays claim to? This is the issue of lawful boundaries, which is point three of the biblical covenant.¹⁹ Who possesses lawful authority to decide which declaration is superior? (Point two.) By what standard? (Point three.) By which sanctions? (Point four.)

The second answer insists that ownership is established, as John Locke argued in 1690, by mixing one's labor with the soil. Locke wrote:

Though the earth and all inferior creatures be common to all men, yet every man has a "property" in his own "person." This nobody has any right to but himself. The "labour" of his body and the "work" of his hands, we may say, are properly his. Whatsoever, then, he removes out of the state that Nature hath provided and left it in, he hath mixed his labour with it, and joined to it something that is his own, and thereby makes it his property. It being by him removed from the common state Nature placed it in, it hath by this labour something annexed to it that excludes the common right of other men. For this "labour" being the unquestionable property of the labourer, no man but he can have a right to what that is once joined to, at least where there is enough, and as good left in common for oth-

18. This was the position of libertarian anarchist Robert LeFevre.

19. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 3.

ers.²⁰

This also does not answer the question of boundaries. How wide a range does the original owner lawfully roam as he picks the fruits of nature, removing them from the unclaimed state of nature? Locke said that a man in a state of nature has a legal claim only to that which he removes from the environment for his consumption. But then a man walks away in search of other fruits of nature. On what legal basis can he establish lawful permanent ownership of the land that he leaves behind? That which he is unwilling to defend by his continuing presence cannot be said to belong to him—not on the basis of anything in Locke’s theory, anyway. Covenantally speaking, God retains and defends His primary ownership by His omnipresence. Man does not possess this attribute. When he leaves the scene, his claim of ownership departs with him, or so Locke’s analysis implies.

Locke’s theory is mostly hyperbole. We must ask: What kind of labor is mixed with the soil? Extractive labor only? This is what Locke said.²¹ Then what of planting and guarding, as in the garden of Eden? In short, what about fences? What are the lawful limits of man’s original fences? Locke’s answer: “As much as any one can make use of to any advantage of life before it spoils, so much he may by his labour fix a property in. Whatever is beyond this is more than his share, and belongs to others. Nothing was made by God for man to spoil or destroy.”²² The moment the economic theorist raises the divisive judicial issue, “more than his share,” he has raised the issue of boundaries. How can today’s land user know how much land he will use tomorrow or next week? What new information will he discover? Can he pick one berry in the far country, and by this act of extraction, lawfully establish title to everything in between? Can he plant one acorn in a far country and thereby lay claim to everything in between? The soil in Locke’s theory is symbolic soil, not literal soil. There are no identifiable boundaries in Locke’s theory, yet the establishment of boundaries is the central issue of the definition of lawful title to property, from the garden of Eden until final judgment.

Locke’s theory of individual ownership assumes the prior existence of some sort of overarching moral and legal order. Locke admitted this in the opening words of his chapter on property.

20. Locke, Second Treatise, V:26. Rothbard took this position. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State, p. 92.

21. Locke, Second Treatise, V:27.

22. Ibid., V:30.

Whether we consider natural reason, which tells us that men, being once born, have a right to their preservation, and consequently to meat and drink and such other things as Nature affords for their subsistence, or “revelation,” which gives us an account of those grants God made of the world to Adam, and to Noah and his sons, it is very clear that God, as King David says (Psalm 115. 16), “has given the earth to the children of men,” given it to mankind in common.²³

Immediately, he hit a conceptual brick wall. How can we logically get from God’s delegation of ownership to one man, Adam or Noah, to the concept of individual ownership by many men? Locke had no answer, as he admitted, so he offered speculation regarding “how men might come to have a property in several parts of that which God gave to mankind in common.” “Might” is surely a highly speculative word, and a weak foundation on which to build an entire social, political, and economic worldview. Locke wrote a long, convoluted sentence.

But, this being supposed, it seems to some a very great difficulty how any one should ever come to have a property in anything, I will not content myself to answer, that, if it be difficult to make out “property” upon a supposition that God gave the world to Adam and his posterity in common, it is impossible that any man but one universal monarch should have any “property” upon a supposition that God gave the world to Adam and his heirs in succession, exclusive of all the rest of his posterity; but I shall endeavour to show how men might come to have a property in several parts of that which God gave to mankind in common, and that without any express compact of all the commoners.

Locke began with God as the sovereign original owner, who then delegated ownership to the sole representative agent of mankind, Adam. This expressly biblical starting point was the context of Locke’s theory of self-ownership and his theory of ownership through a man’s labor mixed with soil. None of this provides epistemological support for a libertarian theorist. The methodological individualist begins with the autonomous individual. He cannot legitimately invoke God, Adam, or covenant theology, nor would he want to. Yet Rothbard invoked Locke when he theorized regarding the ethical starting point for private property. He presented Locke’s soil and labor argument as if it in some way solved the issue of boundaries. He devoted only a few paragraphs to this most crucial of all economic questions: original ownership.

23. Ibid., V:24.

3. Collective Sanctions and Society

In contrast to Locke's methodological individualism, the methodological collectivist assumes that society's claims of ownership are prior to and superior to the individual's claims. But this raises a series of questions that humanists have been unable to answer to each other's satisfaction. What is society? What are its boundaries (point three)? The local community? The nation-state? The whole world—the so-called family of man? Who represents this society (point two)? Are we speaking of the state, i.e., civil government, when we say the word “society”? Which state? Exactly what is it that establishes the prior or superior jurisdiction of this or that agency called the state? What if there are competing jurisdictions of various states? Whose jurisdiction is superior? By what standard? Who lawfully imposes the sanctions? From what or from whom are sanctions lawfully derived by those who claim to represent society? Wars are fought between nations and within nations regarding the issue of the authority to establish boundaries and then impose sanctions against boundary violators in the name of society.

The methodological collectivist asserts a prior sovereignty or a superior sovereignty over the individual. But this also does not answer the question of the delegated authority to guard the garden. A representative guardian is required, but in whose name? By whose standard? Hitler wanted national socialism, but he kept expanding the Reich's boundaries. Stalin wanted international socialism, but productivity inside the national boundaries of the Soviet Union's satellite nations always seemed to benefit the Soviet Union's hierarchy. It took the Second World War (1939–45) to establish new national boundaries in Europe, and then the Cold War (1946–91) began: a dispute over boundaries. To say that society is sovereign raises the question: Which society? Represented by whom? By what standard? By which sanctions? With what goals? These are crucial questions, yet there has been no agreement on them or their answers throughout the history of social theory.

These methodological issues extend into the field of economic theory. There is a long tradition of methodological collectivism in economics: from Greek speculation to medieval guild socialism to modern socialism, Marxism, and modern ecology-based economics.

There are very few examples of exclusively individualistic or exclusively collectivist theoretical economic systems. There have been none in practice. Men cling intellectually to one or another version of the mixed economy. Keynesianism has been the dominant version of a theory of the mixed economy since the late 1930s.

In opposition to both methodological individualism and methodological collectivism, I offer methodological covenantalism.²⁴

Conclusion

Deuteronomy is the Pentateuch's book of inheritance and disinheritance. Its theme is three-fold: predestination, adopted sonship, and inheritance. The fourth generation after the descent into Egypt would surely inherit Canaan (Gen. 15:16).²⁵ This had been predestined by God. This inheritance was nonetheless ethically conditional: primarily dependent on Jesus Christ's representative perfect work and secondarily dependent on Joshua's decision to circumcise the nation at Gilgal (Josh. 5:3). To maintain this inheritance—the kingdom grant—Israel would have to obey God's law. Disobedience would produce disinheritance, which Jesus announced to the religious leaders of Israel: "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43). The adopted Israelite heirs were finally replaced in A.D. 70 by gentile adopted heirs. "But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name" (John 1:12).

Deuteronomy offers the basics of biblical economics. The economics that Deuteronomy teaches is free market economics. This is why Christian economists of the socialist or Keynesian persuasion do not spend a lot of time commenting on the specific details of Deuteronomy. Deuteronomy is an affront to their economics. They therefore reject Deuteronomy, a priori. The problem is, they refuse to offer an exegetical basis for their rejection. They assume what they need to prove. They regard the Old Testament as "God's word, emeritus." They offer no hermeneutical defense of this position. They merely assume it. Then they wander off into the epistemological wilderness of academic humanism in search of formulas by which the state, through compulsion, deficits, and fiat money, can turn stones into bread.²⁶

24. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 5.

25. Kohath, Amram, Moses, Gershom.

26. Appendix A.

INTRODUCTION

These be the words which Moses spake unto all Israel on this side Jordan in the wilderness, in the plain over against the Red sea, between Paran, and Tophel, and Laban, and Hazeroth, and Dizahab (Deut. 1:1).

The Hebrew words that begin this book of the Bible, ‘eleh dabarim or devarim, mean simply “these words.” But this phrase is not the familiar name of the book that has come down through time to Jews and gentiles. Deuteronomy is the book’s commonly accepted title. The word “deuteronomy” is an Anglicized derivative from the Greek: second (deutero) law (nomos). It comes from the Septuagint’s¹ rendering into Greek of the words mishneh torah,² or copy of the law. “And it shall be, when he sitteth upon the throne of his kingdom, that he shall write him a copy of this law in a book out of that which is before the priests the Levites” (Deut. 17:18).³ It is worth noting that this verse occurs in a passage in which any future king in Israel is told to read the Mosaic law and obey it.

What were the words of Moses? They were a recapitulation of God’s law. This is why the laws of Deuteronomy repeat so many of the laws of Leviticus, e.g., Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. This recapitulation of the law was preparatory to the national covenant renewal at Gilgal (Josh. 5). The generation that had been born in the wilderness had not visibly covenanted with God: no circumcision. Most—probably all—of the members of the exodus generation except Moses were dead by now.⁴ Aaron died (Num. 20:28) just prior to the wars against

1. The Septuagint translation of the Old Testament into Greek: second century B.C.

2. The title of Maimonides’ twelfth-century commentary on the Mosaic law, written from 1177 to 1187. It fills 14 volumes in the Yale University Press edition, The Code of Maimonides. The 14 volumes, I am informed by Rabbi Daniel Lapin, represent the 14 bones of the human hand.

3. New Bible Dictionary, 2nd ed. (Wheaton, Illinois: Tyndale House, 1982), p. 280.

4. Exceptions: Joshua and Caleb.

King Arad, King Og, and King Sihon (Num. 21). It was now time for national covenant renewal (point four of the biblical covenant model), which had to precede national covenantal inheritance (point five). Deuteronomy presents both the judicial basis and the promise of this inheritance.

According to the King James Version, this presentation of the law was made “on this side of Jordan in the wilderness.” This is an inaccurate translation. The Hebrew word translated as “this side” should be translated “opposite side,” i.e., east of the Jordan, meaning across the Jordan. The King James translators sometimes translated ayber as “other side.”⁵

Moses died on the wilderness side of the Jordan. Yet the context of this passage indicates that the word should be translated “other side.” Because Moses wrote these words, he must have been writing from the perspective of the nation after it had crossed the Jordan. He was on the other side of Jordan when he wrote of the other side as the other side. That is, he wrote Deuteronomy as if he were writing to people settled in Canaan. He was writing in the prophetic confidence that Israel would be successful in the conquest of the land. He was writing to those who had already inherited. The future-orientation of the Book of Deuteronomy begins in its first sentence.

A. Sanctions and Inheritance/Disinheritance

Deuteronomy begins after the promised negative sanction against the generation of the exodus had been imposed by God: they would not enter the Promised Land (Num. 14:23). This exclusion was a secondary form of disinheritance. The primary form was genocide. This is what God had initially threatened. “I will smite them with the pestilence, and disinherit them, and will make of thee a greater nation and mightier than they” (Num. 14:12). Moses had countered this threat by means of the ultimate prayer: an appeal to God’s reputation.

And Moses said unto the LORD, Then the Egyptians shall hear it,

5. “And they came to the threshingfloor of Atad, which is beyond Jordan, and there they mourned with a great and very sore lamentation: and he made a mourning for his father seven days” (Gen. 50:10). “From thence they removed, and pitched on the other side of Arnon, which is in the wilderness that cometh out of the coasts of the Amorites: for Arnon is the border of Moab, between Moab and the Amorites” (Num. 21:13). Yet in one case the word is translated both ways in one verse: “For we will not inherit with them on yonder side Jordan, or forward; because our inheritance is fallen to us on this side Jordan eastward” (Num. 32:19).

(for thou broughtest up this people in thy might from among them;) And they will tell it to the inhabitants of this land: for they have heard that thou LORD art among this people, that thou LORD art seen face to face, and that thy cloud standeth over them, and that thou goest before them, by daytime in a pillar of a cloud, and in a pillar of fire by night. Now if thou shalt kill all this people as one man, then the nations which have heard the fame of thee will speak, saying, Because the LORD was not able to bring this people into the land which he swore unto them, therefore he hath slain them in the wilderness (Num. 14:13–16).

Inheritance can be secured in one of two ways: disinheritance or adoption. Either God displaces the present owners and transfers ownership to His people, or else He incorporates the present owners into His people through adoption, which then secures the inheritance. There is no third way. Inheritance and disinheritance are two sides of the same coin, or the two sides of the same covenant. They are an aspect of God's sanctions, positive and negative, in eternity but also in history. This means that inheritance and disinheritance are both ultimately eschatological. The historical conflict of kingdom's, God's vs. Satan's, is ultimately a battle over inheritance and disinheritance.

Sihon's resistance to Israel was part of this preliminary process of inheritance/disinheritance.

But Sihon king of Heshbon would not let us pass by him: for the LORD thy God hardened his spirit, and made his heart obstinate, that he might deliver him into thy hand, as appeareth this day. And the LORD said unto me, Behold, I have begun to give Sihon and his land before thee: begin to possess, that thou mayest inherit his land. Then Sihon came out against us, he and all his people, to fight at Jahaz. And the LORD our God delivered him before us; and we smote him, and his sons, and all his people. And we took all his cities at that time, and utterly destroyed the men, and the women, and the little ones, of every city, we left none to remain: Only the cattle we took for a prey unto ourselves, and the spoil of the cities which we took (Deut. 2:30–35).

This had been a manifestation of a system of national dispossession. The gods and the laws of Canaan were to be dispossessed by force.

And because he loved thy fathers, therefore he chose their seed after them, and brought thee out in his sight with his mighty power out of Egypt; To drive out nations from before thee greater and mightier than thou art, to bring thee in, to give thee their land for an inheritance, as it is this day. Know therefore this day, and consider it in thine heart, that the LORD he is God in heaven above, and upon the earth beneath: there is none else. Thou shalt keep therefore his statutes, and his commandments, which I command thee this day, that it may go well with thee, and with thy children after thee, and that thou mayest prolong thy days upon the earth, which the LORD thy God giveth thee, for ever (Deut. 4:37–40).

This dispossession was supposed to be comprehensive: “But of the cities of these people, which the LORD thy God doth give thee for an inheritance, thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth: But thou shalt utterly destroy them; namely, the Hittites, and the Amorites, the Canaanites, and the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites; as the LORD thy God hath commanded thee” (Deut. 20:16–17).

The Book of Deuteronomy is the Pentateuch’s book of inheritance. It follows the Pentateuch’s book of sanctions, Numbers.⁶ The account of the preliminary dispossession on the wilderness side of the Jordan is found in Numbers 21. The significance of this initial warfare was announced by Moses to the generation of the conquest. Moses framed his discussion of the events of Numbers 21 in terms of God’s program of inheritance/disinheritance.

B. The Fourth Generation

The key verse governing the inheritance of the land of Canaan by Israel is Genesis 15:16: “But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full.” The four generations that dwelt in Egypt were the heirs of Levi: Kohath, Amram, Moses, Gershom.⁷ It was under Joshua’s leadership that his generation and their children invaded Canaan. Joshua was the representative leader.

A theological question arises: Was God’s promise to Abraham conditional or unconditional? Was it dependent on what Abraham and his heirs would do (conditional), or was it a prophecy that could not be thwarted by anything that man would do (unconditional)? For that matter, is it legitimate even to distinguish between the two?

The traditional theological answer to this question is that the Abrahamic promise was unconditional. This answer invokes Paul’s arguments in Galatians 3. “And this I say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect. For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise. Wherefore then serveth the law? It was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made; and it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator” (Gal. 3:17–19). Paul here was speaking of the Mosaic law, but theologians have extended his line of argumentation to the context of the Abrahamic promise regarding Canaan.

6. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1987] 2012).

7. Gershom was born outside of Egypt, but he was part of the fourth generation.

To argue that a promise is unconditional is to argue for God’s predestination. The theologian announces: “God’s promise to Abraham was a prophecy.” Yet this statement begs the question. Is biblical prophecy at least sometimes conditional? For example, Jonah prophesied that Nineveh would be destroyed in 40 days, yet Nineveh escaped this curse through repentance. Was God’s promise to Abraham that sort of prophecy, i.e., conditional on the ethical response of those who heard it? Specifically, could the third generation have inherited Canaan, had the word of God been mixed with faith? “For unto us was the gospel preached, as well as unto them: but the word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it” (Heb. 4:2).

C. The Doctrine of Predestination

God’s absolute predestination is central to the doctrine of the unconditional promise. God promised Abraham that the fourth generation would inherit. This can mean only one thing: they were predestined to inherit. It was not merely statistically likely that they would inherit; they would surely inherit. Yet the males born in the wilderness were not circumcised. They were circumcised in a mass ritual procedure at Gilgal after they had crossed the Jordan and were inside Canaan’s boundaries (Josh. 5:4). To inherit, they had to be lawful heirs. The mark of Abrahamic heirship was circumcision. “And ye shall circumcise the flesh of your foreskin; and it shall be a token of the covenant betwixt me and you” (Gen. 17:11). Circumcision was the covenant sign. So, in order to fulfill the Abrahamic promise, the Israelites had to perform a mandatory work. This means that the Abrahamic promise was conditional on works, yet at the same time, it could not be thwarted, for the inheritance by the fourth generation was predestined.

tined. This is the age-old issue of promise vs. works, unconditional promise vs. conditional promise.

1. Conditional or Unconditional

Ephesians 2:8–10 solves this theological dilemma: not only are covenant-keepers predestined to eternal life, they are predestined to temporal good works. “For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: Not of works, lest any man should boast. For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them.” A covenantal promise is therefore ethically conditional—the mandatory performance of good works—yet it is also operationally unconditional, for these good works are part of the predestined inheritance itself. Protestant fundamentalists quote Ephesians 2:8–9: grace. Roman Catholics are more likely to quote Ephesians 2:10: works. Theonomists quote the entire passage, which includes the phrase, “which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them,” i.e., predestination.

The Epistle to the Hebrews ties the doctrine of predestined good works to the ethically conditional nature of the Abrahamic promise. Hebrews 3 and 4 discuss the sabbatical rest which God gives to His people. The Israelites of Moses’ generation did not enter into the rest—Canaan—which God had offered to them. The author cited Psalm 95: “Harden not your heart, as in the provocation, and as in the day of temptation in the wilderness: When your fathers tempted me, proved me, and saw my work. Forty years long was I grieved with this generation, and said, It is a people that do err in their heart, and they have not known my ways: Unto whom I sware in my wrath that they should not enter into my rest” (Ps. 95:8–11; cf. Heb. 3:8–11). This means that God made a legitimate offer to the third generation: immediate inheritance. Moses made this plain in his recapitulation of the events immediately following the exodus.

And I commanded you at that time all the things which ye should do. And when we departed from Horeb, we went through all that great and terrible wilderness, which ye saw by the way of the mountain of the Amorites, as the LORD our God commanded us; and we came to Kadesh-barnea. And I said unto you, Ye are come unto the mountain of the Amorites, which the LORD our God doth give unto us. Behold, the LORD thy God hath set the land before thee: go up and possess it, as the LORD God of thy fathers hath said unto thee; fear not, neither be discouraged. . . . Notwithstanding ye would not go up, but rebelled against the commandment of the LORD your God: And ye murmured in your tents, and said, Because the LORD hated us, he hath brought us forth out of the land of Egypt, to deliver us into the hand of the Amorites, to destroy us. Whither shall we go up? our brethren have discouraged our heart, saying, The people is greater and taller than we; the cities are great and walled up to heaven; and moreover we have seen the sons of the Anakims there. Then I said unto you, Dread not, neither be afraid of them. The LORD your God which goeth before you, he shall fight for you, according to all that he did for you in Egypt before your eyes; And in the wilderness, where thou hast seen how that the LORD thy God bare thee, as a man doth bear his son, in all the way that ye went, until ye came into this place. Yet in this thing ye did not believe the LORD your God, Who went in the way before you, to search you out a place to pitch your tents in, in fire by night, to shew you by what way ye should go, and in a cloud by day. And the LORD heard the voice of your words, and was wroth, and sware, saying, Surely there shall not one of these men of this evil generation see that good land, which I sware to give unto your fathers, Save Caleb the son of Jephunneh; he shall see it, and to him will I give the land that he hath trodden upon, and to his children, because he hath wholly followed the LORD (Deut. 1:18–21; 26–36).

How can we solve this seeming theological anomaly? God's promise was given to the fourth generation, yet He commanded the third generation to begin the invasion of Canaan, promising to go before them, leading them to victory, just as He had done in Egypt and the Red Sea. This indicates that the fulfillment of the Abrahamic promise by the fourth generation was historically conditional, i.e., dependent on the faithlessness of the third generation, which would refuse to conquer.

The beginning of the solution to this theological dilemma is found in the Epistle to the Hebrews: "For we which have believed do enter into rest, as he said, As I have sworn in my wrath, if they shall enter into my rest: although the works were finished from the foundation of the world" (Heb. 4:3). These words are quite clear: "although the works were finished from the foundation of the world." This language—"before the foundation of the world"—is also found in the biblical passage which, more than any other, teaches the doctrine of predestination, the first chapter of Paul's epistle to the church at Ephesus. Paul wrote:

Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ: According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love: Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will, To the praise of the glory of his grace, wherein he hath made us accepted in the beloved. . . . In whom also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will: That we should be to the praise of his glory, who first trusted in Christ. In whom ye also trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation: in whom also after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of promise, Which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of his glory (Eph. 1:3–6, 11–14).

2. The Three-Fold Theme of Grace

Predestination, adoption, and inheritance: here is the three-fold theme of God's special grace to His people in history. This is not a two-fold theme—adoption and inheritance—contrary to Arminians and other defenders of the doctrine of man's free will. Adoption in Christ is the only judicially valid basis of any man's claim to his share of the inheritance of God's kingdom, both in history and eternity. Paul teaches that every redeemed person's adoption by God in history has been predestined before the foundation of the world.

The three-fold theme of predestination, adoption (judicial sonship), and inheritance is the theme of the Book of Deuteronomy. God, in His absolute sovereignty, predestined the fourth generation after Abraham to inherit the Promised Land. Moses spoke the words recorded in Deuteronomy to the representatives of the fourth generation, just prior to Israel's inheritance of the land under Joshua. Similarly, God has predestined individual Christians to eternal salvation, which is their lawful inheritance through judicial adoption into God's redeemed family. Paul's words are clear: we have obtained in history a down payment or "earnest" of this eternal inheritance. "Ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of promise, Which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of his glory" (v. 13b). The Greek word translated here as "purchased possession" is elsewhere translated as "saving," as in "the saving of the soul" (Heb. 10:39).

The Greek word that Paul used for "inheritance" (Gal. 3:18) is the same one that Stephen used to identify God's promise of Canaan to Abraham: "And he gave him none inheritance in it, no, not so much as to set his foot on: yet he promised that he would give it to him for a possession, and to his seed after him, when as yet he had no child" (Acts 7:5). Paul used this language of the seed, which alone lawfully inherits, in order to identify those who are adopted by God the Father through Christ's sacrificial work of redemption: "And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. 3:29).

Paul insisted in his letter to the Ephesians that this eternal and historical inheritance of the kingdom of God is an inheritance of righteousness only for those who are themselves righteous. "For this ye know, that no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God" (Eph. 5:5). This kingdom inheritance comes exclusively through God's grace. Nevertheless, Paul insisted on another equally important doctrine: the earthly good works that are mandatory in the life of the true heir are as predestined as the adoption itself.

D. Imputation

Imputation is associated with point four of the biblical covenant model: sanctions. He who imposes sanctions necessarily extends judgment. He evaluates. God is the sovereign imputer of judgment. He is the sanctions-bringer.

The basis of the theological reconciliation of grace vs. good works, or unconditional election vs. conditional inheritance, is the doctrine of imputation. Participation in both of the two kingdoms in history, Satan's and Christ's, is representational as well as individual. The sin of Adam is imputed to covenant-breaking man. "Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned: For until the law sin was in the world: but sin is not imputed when there is no law. Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, who is the figure of him that was to come" (Rom. 5:12–14). There was a law that condemned all men to death: God's command to Adam not to eat of the forbidden tree. Adam's heirs did not commit this sin individually, but they all committed it representatively through their father, Adam. So, death reigned from Adam to Moses. The fact that Adam's heirs did not (and could not—no tree) commit Adam's specific sin made no difference in the question of life and death. They all committed it. Adam's representative act condemned all of his heirs. The proof of this, Paul argued, is that they all died. The law was still in force—not the Mosaic law, but the Edenic law. The sanction of death still ruled.

This judicial imputation of Adam's sin is the historical starting point of biblical covenant theology. To escape God's declaration of "Guilty!" to Adam, and thereby to Adam's heirs, a person must come under God's declaration of "Not guilty!" to Jesus Christ and His heirs. Adam's sin is the judicial basis of the imputation of disinherited sonship to Adam's heirs. Jesus Christ's perfect humanity (though not His divinity) is the judicial basis of the imputation of adopted sonship to Christ's heirs. "And not as it was by one that sinned, so is the gift: for the judgment was by one to condemnation, but the free gift is of many offences unto justification. For if by one man's offence death reigned by one; much more they which receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ" (Rom. 5:16–17).

Let us consider this theological doctrine from another angle: the imputation of Christ's good works. As surely as Christ met the comprehensive demands of God's law, so also do all those people to whom His perfection is imputed by God. Christ's imputed perfection is definitive. At the moment of their regeneration, people receive Christ's perfection judicially through grace. Then they are required to strive in this life to meet Jesus' standard of moral perfection. "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect" (Matt. 5:48). This condition of perfection is achieved by covenant-keepers only in the world beyond history. But the goal of perfection is still our mandatory standard, "Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ" (Eph. 4:13).

Both conditions are true of covenant-keeping men in history: perfection and imperfection. First, imperfection: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us" (I John 1:8–10). This condition relates to progressive sanctification in history. Second, perfection: "Little children, let no man deceive you: he that doeth righteousness is righteous, even as he is righteous. He that committeth sin is of the devil; for the devil sinneth from the beginning. For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil. Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him: and he cannot sin, because he is born of God" (I John 3:7–9). In the day of final judgment, God looks at Christ's perfection in history, not Christians' sins in history. The redeemed person's moral condition, definitively and finally, is representatively perfect: sin-free. This is because of the representative imputation of Christ's perfection. But the redeemed person's life in history is a progressive overcoming of sin, which is always present.

The doctrine of imputation is the theological basis of reconciling God's conditional and unconditional promises. An unconditional promise rests on the predestinating work of God in history to bring the recipients of the promise to that degree of moral perfection and judicial righteousness required to obtain the promise. No promise by God is devoid of stipulations. The covenantal question is this: Who lawfully performs these stipulations on behalf of the heirs? Paul provided the answer in Galatians 3. His message in Galatians 3 is that the promise is more fundamental than the law. Yet the promise was not in opposition to the law, nor was the law absent from the conditional terms of the promise.

And this I say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect. For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise. Wherefore then serveth the law? It was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made; and it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator. Now a mediator is not a mediator of one, but God is one. Is the law then against the promises of God? God forbid: for if there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law (Gal. 3:17–21).

Did the Israelites have to be circumcised in order to inherit the land? Yes. To become an heir of God's promise to Abraham's seed, you had to be circumcised. Yet the promise to Abraham was nonetheless unconditional. How could it be both? Because of Christ's work as the judicial representative of all redeemed men. God's promise to Abraham—and through him, to his heirs—was always conditional on Jesus Christ's fulfilling of God's law in history. This is why Paul invoked an otherwise peculiar grammatical argument: "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ" (Gal. 3:16). God's promise to Abraham was unconditional for the fourth generation only because this promise was conditional on the historical work of Jesus Christ as redeemed mankind's judicial representative. Had Jesus' perfectly obedient life not been predestined by God before the foundation of the world, there would have been no judicial basis of redemption, and therefore no unconditional promises in history. The only promise that would have been fulfilled in history would have been God's promise to Adam: "But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die" (Gen. 2:17).

Death was a major sanction. So was the curse of the ground. Sanctions are fourth on the list of the Bible's five-point covenant model. These are: transcendence/presence, hierarchy/representation, ethics/boundaries, oath/sanctions, and succession/inheritance. As applied to economic theory, these five points are: primary ownership, delegated ownership, property rights, scarcity, and inheritance. Scarcity in the modern economic definition—"at zero price, there is greater demand than supply"—is the result of God's curse of the earth in response to Adam's rebellion (Gen. 3:17–19).⁸

If this is the case, then Christians should conclude that a reduction of scarcity, i.e., economic growth, is the result of God's positive sanctions in history. On what legal basis does man receive these positive sanctions? For the answer, the Christian must look to the work of Christ: His legal status as God's covenantally representative agent and also His work of redemption through God's imposition of negative sanctions at Calvary. The negative sanctions of Calvary were soon overcome in history by Christ's bodily resurrection and His bodily ascension. These two divine positive sanctions in history have enabled man's overcoming of the curse of the earth through economic growth. The negative sanctions that were imposed by God on Adam have been definitively overcome through the death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ. These Adamic sanctions must now be progressively overcome in history through dominion by Christ's covenantal agents. The dominion covenant is still binding on mankind. We are to obey God's law. God will bless the society that does this. This is the message of Deuteronomy 28:1–14. The society that disobeys will suffer losses. This is the message of Deuteronomy 28:15–68. The question of economic growth raises the issue of law.

8. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 11.

E. The Hatred of God's Law

By linking covenant-keeping with God's blessings in history, and covenant-breaking with God's curses in history, the theonomist challenges just about everybody. Not only does he challenge all other religions, including humanism, he also challenges premillennialists and amillennialists. There can be no escape from this confrontation. The doctrine of eschatology (point five) raises the issue of historical sanctions (point four). These, in turn, raise the issue of biblical law (point three). The consistent theonomist insists that biblical law, God's predictable historical sanctions, and eschatology are "a package deal," to use modern American slang. They are unbreakably interlocked. Defenders of non-theonomic views of eschatology are not always consistent in their rejection of this package. A few of them may not openly reject theonomy's insistence on the covenantal continuity of biblical law and God's visible, predictable, corporate historical sanctions, although most of them do. Their rejection of postmillennialism eventually leads most of them to reject theonomy's view of law and sanctions.

Modern Christians are generally opposed to biblical law. This is one reason why they are opposed to postmillennialism. Instead of rejecting biblical law on the basis of their anti-postmillennialism, many of them are anti-postmillennial because of their rejection of the continuing authority of biblical law and its mandated civil sanctions. For these critics, the Book of Deuteronomy is an offense. When pushed to state their views, they come out against Deuteronomy. The size of this commentary indicates why they are so hostile to Deuteronomy: Deuteronomy contains the most comprehensive presentation of God's law.

Is there evidence that God's commandments in Deuteronomy were annulled by the New Covenant? Some commandments have been annulled, such as the law of genocidal annihilation. That was a one-time event. It is the job of the expositor to examine which Mosaic laws have carried over into the New Covenant and which have not. But for a critic of the free market order, or any other aspect or social product of Deuteronomy, blithely to dismiss Deuteronomy's authority over him and his academic speculations without showing what has been annulled and why, is to play with fire.

Modern man arrogates to himself the right to pick and choose from God's revelation, a practice which Rushdoony called the smorgasbord approach to the Bible. Modern academic evangelicals come in the name of the latest humanist fad, indulging in the rhetoric of contempt for God's law. Joseph Sobran, a Roman Catholic columnist with a gift for the English language, once wrote that he would rather belong to a church that is 5,000 years behind the times than one that is huffing and puffing to keep with the spirit of the age. Put another way, better Eastern Orthodoxy than the World Council of Churches. Better the Athanasian Creed than the Social Gospel.

God's law provides the legal framework for a free market social order; it undermines the theory of socialism. Until at least one critic of the free market produces a comparably detailed commentary on the economics of the Pentateuch, readers of my multi-volume series should withhold judgment regarding the standard replies by Christian defenders of socialism and the mixed economy: (1) the Bible does not offer a blueprint for economics; and/or (2) the Bible is opposed to the free market. Assertions without proof are merely rhetoric. To my critics, I will say it one more time: You can't beat something with nothing.

Conclusion

Deuteronomy recapitulated God's law in preparation for Israel's national covenant renewal through circumcision (Josh. 5). Moses looked forward to Israel's conquest of Canaan. The law would provide the judicial basis for Israel's maintaining the kingdom grant.

The Pentateuch is structured in terms of the five points of the covenant. This fact testifies against higher critics who would deny the Mosaic authorship. The Pentateuch's structure compares with the treaties of kings of the second millennium B.C. It was written in that era.

The fifth point of the covenant is inheritance/disinheritance. This is the primary theme of Deuteronomy. The book is inherently postmillennial. Dispensationalism denies this, of course. But, by acknowledging that Jews after A.D. 70 have been under the covenant's negative sanctions,⁹ the editors of the New Scofield Reference Bible (1967) thereby acknowledged covenantal continuity, Old Testament to New Testament. Nevertheless, by ignoring the continuity of the covenant with respect to the church as the lawful heir of the Old Covenant's promises, they placed Christians under the rule of covenant-breakers.

9. New Scofield Reference Bible (New York: Oxford University Press, 1967), p. 251, note 2, Deut. 30:5.

If both positions are true—continuity (negative) for Jews and discontinuity for the church—then neither the Jews nor the Christians are the recipients of corporate covenant blessings this side of the millennium. The cultural pessimism of dispensationalism is inescapable. It offers no cultural hope for the Church Age; so, it places no value on the development of biblical social theory.

In contrast, theonomic postmillennialism offers both hope for the church and incentives for those Christians who would develop an explicitly biblical social theory. Deuteronomy, more than any other book in the Bible, offers the judicial content of such a reconstruction.

The two most common Christian eschatologies, premillennialism (fundamentalist churches) and amillennialism (European liturgical churches), have correctly relegated the conquest of Canaan to the Old Covenant. They have also relegated inheritance in history to the Old Covenant. But these are separate issues. After the exile, the laws of landed inheritance changed. The gentiles occupying the land were to be incorporated into the jubilee's inheritance system (Ezek. 47:21–23).¹⁰ This pointed to the New Covenant's incorporation of the gentiles into the covenant. It was not the conquest of Canaan that was fundamental to Israel; it was the preservation of the messianic seed line that was fundamental. The crucial eschatological issue was the Promised Seed, not the Promised Land.

This does not mean that the issue of inheritance in history was an exclusively Old Covenant issue. On the contrary, the issue of inheritance is far more a New Covenant issue. The Old Covenant inheritance centered around the Promised Seed (Gen. 3:15). Only much later did the issue of the Promised Land become intermixed with the Promised Seed (Abraham's covenant). This was a temporary mixing of categories of inheritance that ended with the coming of the Messiah, i.e., Shiloh (Gen. 49:10), and His rejection by Israel.

The universalism of the Genesis inheritance (Gen. 3:15) has now been mixed with the universalism of the kingdom of God in history (Matt. 21:43). This is the meaning of the Great Commission: "And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world.

10. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 22.

Amen” (Matt. 28:18–20).¹¹ So, far from being relegated to the Old Covenant, inheritance has become the fundamental eschatological issue of the New Covenant.

11. See Appendix I.

Part I: Transcendence/Presence (1:1–5)

1

THE GOD WHO BRINGS JUDGMENT IN HISTORY

These be the words which Moses spake unto all Israel on this side Jordan in the wilderness, in the plain over against the Red sea, between Paran, and Tophel, and Laban, and Hazeroth, and Dizahab. (There are eleven days' journey from Horeb by the way of mount Seir unto Kadesh-barnea.) And it came to pass in the fortieth year, in the eleventh month, on the first day of the month, that Moses spake unto the children of Israel, according unto all that the LORD had given him in commandment unto them; After he had slain Sihon the king of the Amorites, which dwelt in Heshbon, and Og the king of Bashan, which dwelt at Astaroth in Edrei: On this side Jordan, in the land of Moab, began Moses to declare this law. . . (Deut. 1:1–5).

The theocentric focus of this passage is the sovereignty of God. He is present with His people. He brought judgment against the Amorites. He would now declare His law once again, as He had four decades earlier. He would declare Himself through Moses, just as He had four decades earlier.

By the time of the opening words of the Book of Deuteronomy, all of the fighting men of the generation of the exodus were dead, except for Joshua and Caleb. In his recapitulation of the story of the wilderness, Moses said: "So it came to pass, when all the men of war were consumed and dead from among the people. . ." (Deut. 2:16). Then Moses re-told the story of the defeat of Sihon (Deut. 2:26–35). This event had taken place before Deuteronomy's narrative began (Num. 21:21–26).

The exodus generation was the third after Israel's descent into Egypt: Kohath, Amram, Moses. The conquest of Canaan was therefore imminent, according to God's prophecy to Abraham. "But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full" (Gen. 15:16). The death of the exodus generation had prepared the nation of Israel for the long-promised inheritance. Deuteronomy is the Pentateuch's book of inheritance. Inheritance is associated with succession, which is point five of the biblical covenant model.¹

Meredith Kline identified this introductory passage in Deuteronomy as the preamble of the covenant or treaty between God and Israel. "Ancient suzerainty treaties began with a preamble in which the speaker, the one who was declaring his lordship and demanding the vassal's allegiance, identified himself." Deuteronomy's opening words, "these are the words," were common in extra-biblical treaties.² Who, then, was the sovereign? Was it Moses himself, as James Jordan argued?³ Or was it God?

It was God. Moses was the mediator.

A. Moses the Mediator

The opening words reveal that Moses spoke them. The question is this: In what capacity? It had to be as a delegated agent. "Moses spake unto the children of Israel, according unto all that the LORD had given him in commandment unto them; After he had slain Sihon the king of the Amorites. . ." (vv. 3b–4a).

Who had achieved the victory over Sihon? Not Moses. God had given them victory—the same God who had sustained them in the wilderness for four decades. The implication was that God is sovereign over all earthly kings, even as Moses was sovereign over Israel's civil rulers (Deut. 1:13–18). God was also present with the Israelites, delivering their enemies into their hands—as present as Moses had been in rendering civil judgment (Ex. 18). That is, God is above mankind, yet He is especially present with His chosen people.

This makes God different from both the god of deism and the god of pantheism. The god of deism is too distant from his creation to influence it. His lack of immanence destroys his sovereignty. His personalism is limited; it applies only to his own being. The world is impersonal. English Deists may never have argued this way, since they were heavily influenced by Christianity, but this is the theoretical meaning of deism. The god that made the cosmic clock no longer interferes with it. At most, he tinkers at the edges of creation. In contrast, the god of pantheism is a part of the creation and is therefore unable to influence it as a sovereign master. He is immersed in it. He cannot remove himself from it in order to command it. His lack of transcendence destroys his sovereignty. His personalism is limited; he shares it with the world he did not make.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

2. Meredith G. Kline, Treaty of the Great King: The Covenant Structure of Deuteronomy: Studies and Commentary (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1963), p. 50.

3. James B. Jordan, Covenant Sequence in Leviticus and Deuteronomy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), p. 58. (<http://bit.ly/jjcovseq>)

The God of the Bible is sovereign over the world because He made it out of nothing. He is present with the world because He providentially sustains it. The God of origins is the God of history. The Bible teaches cosmic personalism.⁴ The world is personal because God is personal. It does not share in God's being, but it reflects His being. "For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse" (Rom. 1:20). In contrast to the Bible's concept of cosmic personalism, most modern philosophies teach cosmic impersonalism. God has been shaved out of the cosmos by Occam's razor.

This passage resembles part two of the biblical covenant model, which Kline called historical prologue.⁵ Yet Kline listed it as part one: "Preamble: Covenant Mediator."⁶ A mediator implies a hierarchy; hierarchy is also point two of the biblical covenant model.⁷ Why, then, did both Kline and Sutton designate this brief section as part one? Why do I? If this designation is merely for the sake of argument, to make the Book of Deuteronomy fit the five-point covenant model, then the power of their argument is weakened.

This is ultimately a question regarding the Person who is represented by the mediator. God revealed Himself to Old Covenant people through prophets. Moses was the greatest of these prophets (Deut. 34:10).⁸ The words of Moses His servant could be trusted. These words had to be obeyed because God is above men, and He brings judgments

4. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 1.

5. Kline, Treaty of the Great King, p. 52.

6. Ibid., p. 50.

7. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 2.

8. John the Baptist was his equal (Matt. 11:11).

in history in terms of His Bible-revealed law. The law-giver is God, who is also the sanctions-bringer. He is transcendent over the world as the law-giver, yet He is present with the world as the sanctions-bringer. Sihon and Og learned the hard way that God is totally sovereign. To present Himself to the generation of the conquest, God announced through Moses His law and sanctions.

The announcement of God's law and God's historical sanctions points back to the giving of the law after the exodus. The Book of Exodus is the second book of the Pentateuch. It corresponds to the second point of the covenant, as Kline and Sutton argue. Moses reviews in Deuteronomy the story of God's dealings with Israel for 40 years in the wilderness (1:6–4:49). God is the God of history because He is ruler over history: hierarchy. He brings His word to pass.

In the Book of Genesis, God revealed Himself as the Creator. In Genesis, Moses presented an account in the first chapter in terms of what God repeatedly said: "Let there be," and the immediate results of His words in history. When God presented Himself in the Old Covenant, He did so, not by announcing a theological proposition, but by declaring what He has done in history. He identified Himself through written words: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth" (Gen. 1:1). Then He gave a detailed account of His acts. Similarly, we read in the opening passage in Deuteronomy, "Moses spake unto the children of Israel, according unto all that the LORD had given him in commandment unto them" (v. 3b). Who is the Lord? He is the Person who only recently had destroyed Sihon and Og (v. 4), the Person whose law Moses was about to review.

B. Four Decades

The Book of Deuteronomy begins six months after Aaron died (Deut. 1:3). Aaron died at age 123 (Num. 33:39) in the fortieth year after the exodus: "And Aaron the priest went up into mount Hor at the commandment of the LORD, and died there, in the fortieth year after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt, in the first day of the fifth month" (Num. 33:38). Deuteronomy's phrase, "the first day of the fifth month," also refers to Aaron's death. Miriam had died before Aaron, in the first month (Num. 20:1). Aaron's death marked the end of the wilderness period.

Deuteronomy ("second law") announces the terms of the covenant. It is the second reading of the law. Why a second reading? Because this was preparatory to an act of national covenant renewal. The fourth generation after the nation's initial subordination to Egypt (Gen. 15:16) was about to experience corporate covenant renewal. This took place inside the Promised Land at Gilgal: mass circumcision (Josh. 5:5). Before they were told by Joshua to participate in this act of covenant renewal, the generation of the conquest was required to hear the law read in public.

It was not just that they had to hear the law. They also had to be reminded of the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt (Deut. 4:20, 34, 37), as well as God's miraculous preservation of Israel in the wilderness (Deut. 8:3–4). The law of God and the nation's deliverance by God were linked: "These are the testimonies, and the statutes, and the judgments, which Moses spake unto the children of Israel, after they came forth out of Egypt" (Deut. 4:45). Because the deliverance and preservation of Israel in the wilderness were clearly miraculous events, the God who performed these miracles is above history: transcendent. But because He spoke through Moses, God was also present with His people. His transcendence in no way undermines His immanence—immanence in the sense of presence. He is not part of the creation, but He is present with His people.⁹

Conclusion

The opening passage in Deuteronomy identifies Moses as the spokesman for the God who had delivered Israel out of Egypt and had also defeated two great Canaanite kings, Sihon and Og. Then begins a presentation of this sovereign King's law. But before this law was announced by God's prophet, the Israelites had to be reminded of the power of God in history. God's law is not some sort of natural law order that is part of the cosmos and therefore indistinguishable from the cosmos. God's law is not a system of impersonal law. It is the law of the God who is sovereign over history. The evidence of His sovereignty was His deliverance of Israel.

To persuade the Israelites that He could deliver the long-expected inheritance into their hands, God spoke through Moses. Moses spoke of God's demonstrated power over two Canaanitic kings. Moses spoke also of God's law. As sovereign over history, God is the sanctions-

9. Jesus Christ was God incarnate in history. This is the ultimate manifestation of both presence and immanence. God was in the world but not of it. In His capacity as perfect man, He was of the world. In His capacity as God, He was not.

bringer in history. He delivers His promised inheritance in history. He announced His law through Moses after He had slain Sihon and Og. First had come the display of His power; then came the revelation of His law. He possesses the authority to impose His law because He is sovereign over history.

Part II: Hierarchy/Representation (1:6–4:49)

2

A DELAYED INHERITANCE

The LORD our God spake unto us in Horeb, saying, Ye have dwelt long enough in this mount: Turn you, and take your journey, and go to the mount of the Amorites, and unto all the places nigh thereunto, in the plain, in the hills, and in the vale, and in the south, and by the sea side, to the land of the Canaanites, and unto Lebanon, unto the great river, the river Euphrates. Behold, I have set the land before you: go in and possess the land which the LORD sware unto your fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to give unto them and to their seed after them (Deut. 1:6–8).

The theocentric focus of this command is stewardship-ownership. Stewardship is the representative control over an asset on someone else's behalf. It implies hierarchical authority: owner > steward > asset.

A. Israel's Refusal to Fight

This transfer of ownership of the Promised Land was legally grounded in God's oath to Abraham, which He had renewed with Isaac and Jacob. "But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full" (Gen. 15:16). The exodus generation was the third generation. Its members had feared a confrontation with the Canaanites (Num. 14). This led to their wilderness wanderings.

Moses begins Deuteronomy with a summary of the rebellion of the exodus generation in refusing to listen to Joshua and Caleb (1:22–38). It was at that time that God had reaffirmed the promise that the fourth generation would inherit. "Moreover your little ones, which ye said should be a prey, and your children, which in that day had no knowledge between good and evil, they shall go in thither, and unto them will I give it, and they shall possess it" (v. 39). With this as the historical background, Moses begins the second reading of God's law (v. 5). This reading of the law was a covenantal act (point three) preparatory to the covenant renewal ritual of national circumcision (Josh. 5:5) (point four). Circumcision was the mandatory rite preparatory to the conquest: inheritance (point five).

For a younger generation that knew these stories, Moses' words suggested what lay ahead: warfare. Joshua would be leading the nation into battle, his reward from God because of his courageous recommendation to invade Canaan a generation earlier. Their parents had been told by God at the time of that earlier battle with Amalek that it was time to conquer Canaan. Their parents had not accepted this assignment. Three miracles—the manna (Ex. 16), water out of a rock (Ex. 17:1–7), and military victory through Moses' raised hands (Ex. 17:8–13)—had not persuaded them that Moses' leadership could be relied on, that he had a unique position as God's spokesman. They did not believe Moses because they did not believe God.

Moses then reminded the conquest generation of God's repetition of the command to conquer the land. This had taken place at another mountain, the mountain of the Amorites (Deut. 1:19). "And I said unto you, Ye are come unto the mountain of the Amorites, which the LORD our God doth give unto us. Behold, the LORD thy God hath set the land before thee: go up and possess it, as the LORD God of thy fathers hath said unto thee; fear not, neither be discouraged" (vv. 20–21). Moses was speaking to the generation of the conquest; the fighting men of the exodus era, were all dead (v. 16). Nevertheless, he spoke of his having spoken to "you." He reminded them of their parents' decision not to accept the words of Joshua and Caleb (vv. 22–25). He applied the parents' rebellion to their children because it had been a covenantally representative act. "Notwithstanding ye would not go up, but rebelled against the commandment of the LORD your God: And ye murmured in your tents, and said, Because the LORD hated us, he hath brought us forth out of the land of Egypt, to deliver us into the hand of the Amorites, to destroy us" (vv. 26–27). Their parents had refused to listen to Moses. "Then I said unto you, Dread not, neither be afraid of them. The LORD your God which goeth before you, he shall fight for you, according to all that he did for you in Egypt before your eyes; And in the wilderness, where thou hast seen how that the LORD thy God bare thee, as a man doth bear his son, in all the way that ye went, until ye came into this place. Yet in this thing ye did not believe the LORD your God, Who went in the way before you, to search you out a place to pitch your tents in, in fire by night, to shew you by what way ye should go, and in a cloud by day” (vv. 29–33).

It was at that point that God had disinherited the exodus generation: “And the LORD heard the voice of your words, and was wroth, and sware, saying, Surely there shall not one of these men of this evil generation see that good land, which I sware to give unto your fathers” (vv. 34–35). Had the sins of the fathers condemned the sons? Moses would later reveal this law: “The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers: every man shall be put to death for his own sin” (Deut. 24:16). Yet the sons had wandered with their fathers for 40 years. Their inheritance had been delayed. The effects of their fathers’ sin had been borne in part by the sons. There is covenantal representation in history. There is hierarchy. Their parents had lawfully been in authority over them. They had made a bad decision that affected their children. The children had participated in the sins of their fathers in the same way that they had participated in the sin of Adam. Covenantal continuity in history is based on covenantal representation. Sons inherit from fathers; they also participate in the sins of their fathers, which can be seen in the size and timing of the inheritance.

Moses reminded them of the two exceptions to the curse: Caleb (v. 36) and Joshua. “But Joshua the son of Nun, which standeth before thee, he shall go in thither: encourage him: for he shall cause Israel to inherit it” (v. 38). For four decades, Moses had encouraged Joshua. Now the time had arrived; Joshua’s time had come. It would soon be his assignment to lead Israel in the conquest of the Promised Land. The children of the exodus generation would gain what their parents had forfeited. The day of inheritance was imminent.

Their parents had rebelled against God’s announcement of the 40-year delay. They had immediately attacked the Amorites. As Moses had predicted (Num. 14:41–42), Israel lost that battle (vv. 41–44). From that point until the recent victories over Arad, Sihon, Og, and Moab-Midian, Israel was not allowed by God to fight. Israel was not entitled to the lands of Edom and Moab (Deut. 2:5, 9). Israelites had to buy whatever they wanted: “Ye shall buy meat of them for money, that ye may eat; and ye shall also buy water of them for money, that ye may drink” (v. 6). They had forfeited their inheritance; so, God refused to allow them to engage in military conquest. Israel was not entitled to any nation's land, other than that owned by the Canaanites.

B. The Conquest of Canaan

The conquest of Canaan was a unique event. The land had been assigned to Israel in Abraham's day. But there was a time limit on the fulfillment of this promise: four generations (Gen. 15:16).

This raises a theological problem. God punished the exodus generation for their refusal to follow the advice given by Joshua and Caleb: begin the conquest. Yet He had prophesied to Abraham that the fourth generation would conquer. Why did God punish the exodus generation for not doing what He had told Abraham would not be done?

The third generation was called upon by God to conquer the Canaanites immediately after the exodus. "And I said unto you, Ye are come unto the mountain of the Amorites, which the LORD our God doth give unto us. Behold, the LORD thy God hath set the land before thee: go up and possess it, as the LORD God of thy fathers hath said unto thee; fear not, neither be discouraged" (Deut. 1:20–21). Yet the fourth generation was the promised heir (Gen. 15:16). How could God require the third generation to conquer Canaan?

This military conquest could have been achieved by the third generation's transfer of title to the inheritance to the fourth generation immediately following the exodus. This could have been achieved judicially by a transfer of military authority to the fourth generation, which was represented by Joshua and Caleb. These two men spoke for the fourth generation and its interests: immediate invasion. The other 10 spies spoke for the third generation. Had the third generation's representatives accepted the testimony of Joshua and Caleb, and had they been willing to transfer military leadership to Joshua and Caleb, Israel would have entered Canaan as the conqueror a generation early.

The judicial issue, and therefore the prophetic issue, was representation. Which generation's representatives would represent all of Israel in the imposition of corporate sanctions? The answer of the third generation: "Ours." This decision, publicly manifested by the congregation's attempt to stone Joshua and Caleb (Num. 14:10), sealed their doom. They would all die in the wilderness (Num. 14:33).

The exodus generation's sin in rejecting God's command had condemned them to a life of wandering. The Amorites, i.e., the residents of Canaan and the immediate surrounding areas—Arad, Sihon, and Og—were given extra time by God to work out the implications of their respective faiths. They were allowed to develop their rule. They had an important purpose in covenant history. They became negative examples for Israel: how not to worship and live. This leads me to a conclusion: sin compounds over time. It gets worse. It feeds on itself, building to a crescendo. The Amorites were filling up their cup of iniquity. In this sense, there is a kind of progressive de-sanctification that parallels progressive sanctification. Evil grows to the point where God will tolerate it no longer. Then He cuts it short.

The Amorites were building up an economic inheritance for the fourth generation of Israelites. “And it shall be, when the LORD thy God shall have brought thee into the land which he swore unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give thee great and goodly cities, which thou buildedst not, And houses full of all good things, which thou filledst not, and wells digged, which thou diggedst not, vineyards and olive trees, which thou plantedst not; when thou shalt have eaten and be full. . .” (Deut. 6:10–11). Nevertheless, Canaan’s spiritual inheritance was an abomination. Israel would inherit the former but was forbidden to claim the latter. But how could this be? If Canaan’s spiritual inheritance was abominable, why not also the economic results of that inheritance? If the spiritual roots were perverse, why not also the fruits? How could an evil tree produce good fruit? “For a good tree bringeth not forth corrupt fruit; neither doth a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit” (Luke 6:43).¹ This is the question of common grace.

C. Common Grace and Inheritance

Because man is made in the image of God, he cannot avoid certain common beliefs and evaluations. “Drop dead!” is a universally recognized negative phrase, just as “O, king, live forever” was a common term of respect in many ancient kingdoms, even though obviously impossible to fulfill in history.² Certain features of life are almost universally accepted as being desirable. Wealth is one of them, though not necessarily great wealth, which most men and societies acknowledge brings with it unpleasant consequences. Good health is another.

1. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 12.

2. I Kings 1:31; Nehemiah 2:3; Daniel 2:4; 3:9; 5:10; 6:6, 21.

Nowhere is there anyone who would deny the truth of North's universally preferable trade-off: "It is better to be rich and healthy than it is to be poor and sick." (Of course, this must be qualified by the economist's ceteris paribus: other things remaining equal.)

There are common features of life that everyone acknowledges as preferable. Men share commonly agreed-upon goals: wealth in general, health in general. People seek to attain these preferred conditions of life. This shared outlook is an aspect of common grace. It makes economic cooperation possible among men of all religious and philosophical views.³ This is why the efforts of Canaanites in building up their farms and vineyards produced an inheritance for Israel. Men agree on the desirability of certain results. This does not validate their logic or other culturally derived methods of coming to conclusions. It does not validate their worship of idols in seeking God's favor. But it does mean that there must be a common acceptance of certain principles of action in order for individuals to prosper.

One of these principles is thrift. Men through hard experience are taught to "save something for a rainy day." They are told: "waste not, want not." They learn that "a penny saved is a penny earned."⁴ They learn not to eat their seed corn. Another principle is hard work. Men labor to subdue the earth in order that the earth might bring forth its fruits. The earth blooms because men work hard over long periods of time to convert the ground into something desirable.

D. Covenantal Limits to Growth

The life spans of men are shorter in the post-Flood world than they were before. Moses wrote: "The days of our years are threescore years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labour and sorrow; for it is soon cut off, and we fly away" (Ps. 90:10). There are limits to the growth of capital under the authority of any individual. For the compounding process in the broadest sense to continue, he must find associates who share his vision and skills, so that he may make them heirs by leaving his capital to them.

By shortening men's life spans, God made the inheritance/disinheritance factor predominant in the building of His kingdom. If men

3. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 7. (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

4. Assuming a rate of zero income taxation. In high income tax brackets, a penny saved is 1.4 pennies earned.

lived as long as Methuselah (Gen. 5:27), the compounding process of evil would not have been undermined nearly so effectively as it has been through the multiplication of inter-generational transfers of wealth. There has been a much greater dispersion of the wealth of covenant-breakers because of shorter lifespans. The godly corporate inheritance compounds through the generations through the dominion work of the church. It cannot compound long term through either the family or the state. The family inheritance is too easily dissipated through bad marriages, broken covenants, or unmotivated heirs, while the state is not creative. No institution matches the church for long-term compounding: succession. By shortening all men's lives, God has subsidized covenant-keepers' corporate advantage in society until such time as Christians are in a majority.

1. Progressive Inheritance Through Disinheritance

The Bible's system of covenant sanctions is clear: covenant-keepers inherit; covenant-breakers do not. Covenant-breakers are eventually disinherited by covenant-keepers. "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov. 13:22).⁵ This transfer of inheritance was by war in the case of the Canaanites. But after this, Israel was to extend its process of progressive inheritance through disinheritance by economic means. One of the means of extending their dominion was extending credit. "For the LORD thy God blesseth thee, as he promised thee: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow; and thou shalt reign over many nations, but they shall not reign over thee" (Deut. 15:6).⁶ Their possession of wealth would multiply at the expense of covenant-breakers.

And the LORD shall make thee plenteous in goods, in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy ground, in the land which the LORD sware unto thy fathers to give thee. The LORD shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his season, and to bless all the work of thine hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow. And the LORD shall make thee the head, and not the tail; and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath; if that thou hearken unto the commandments of the LORD thy God, which I command thee this day, to observe and to do them: And thou shalt not go aside from any of the words which I command thee this day, to the right hand, or to the left, to go after other gods to serve them (Deut. 28:11–14).⁷

5. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 41.

6. Chapter 37.

Nevertheless, covenant-breakers were not to be pressured by covenant-keepers to borrow. Then how was it that their progressive disinheritance by Israel would be accomplished voluntarily? Why would they go into debt to Israel? For the same reason and in the same way that Esau was willing to sell his inheritance to Jacob (Gen. 25:30–33). Esau was more present-oriented than Jacob was. He valued present gratification more highly than Jacob did. Jacob was willing to give red pottage to Esau in exchange for Esau's present legal title to his future inheritance. A voluntary exchange became possible because the two men had different time perspectives. Jacob was upper class; Esau was lower class.⁸

So, there are limits to growth for the covenant-breaker. The ultimate limit is eschatological: the final judgment. God will bring to a close the conflict between covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers. But, prior to this eschatologically representative event, God disinherits those who hate Him. He allows covenant-breaking societies to compound their sin and their wealth for a few generations, but He allows covenant-keepers to multiply their righteousness and wealth for many generations. "Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them: for I the LORD thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me; And shewing mercy unto thousands of them that love me, and keep my commandments" (Ex. 20:5–6). This does not mean thousands of people; it means thousands of generations. The literalism of "thousands of generations" would mean at least 80,000 years (40 x 2 x 1000). I believe this language is symbolic; it means until the end of time.⁹

7. Chapter 69.

8. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 26:D.

9. Here is one reason why I believe this. Our memories are limited. We cannot recall more than a tiny fraction of our own lives. In studying the records of history, we can discover and then summarize only a few representative fragments. We remember far less than we read. So, if mankind survives for tens of millennia, men in the future will find it impossible to master the covenantal past, even when they live long lives (Isa. 65:17–20). The longer the race survives, the less we can understand of man's history. We become overwhelmed by its complexity and diversity.

A lengthy passage later in Moses' monologue makes this time perspective clearer. First comes God's covenant promise. Next comes God's fulfillment of the promise by giving victory to His people. This should produce in them ever-greater covenantal obedience, which in turn will produce ever-greater blessings. This is the compounding process, and it is tied to corporate obedience. The compounding process is covenantal.

But because the LORD loved you, and because he would keep the oath which he had sworn unto your fathers, hath the LORD brought you out with a mighty hand, and redeemed you out of the house of bondmen, from the hand of Pharaoh king of Egypt. Know therefore that the LORD thy God, he is God, the faithful God, which keepeth covenant and mercy with them that love him and keep his commandments to a thousand generations;¹⁰ And repayeth them that hate him to their face, to destroy them: he will not be slack to him that hateth him, he will repay him to his face. Thou shalt therefore keep the commandments, and the statutes, and the judgments, which I command thee this day, to do them. Wherefore it shall come to pass, if ye hearken to these judgments, and keep, and do them, that the LORD thy God shall keep unto thee the covenant and the mercy which he swore unto thy fathers: And he will love thee, and bless thee, and multiply thee: he will also bless the fruit of thy womb, and the fruit of thy land, thy corn, and thy wine, and thine oil, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks of thy sheep, in the land which he swore unto thy fathers to give thee. Thou shalt be blessed above all people: there shall not be male or female barren among you, or among your cattle. And the LORD will take away from thee all sickness, and will put none of the evil diseases of Egypt, which thou knowest, upon thee; but will lay them upon all them that hate thee. And thou shalt consume all the people which the LORD thy God shall deliver thee; thine eye shall have no pity upon them: neither shalt thou serve their gods; for that will be a snare unto thee. If thou shalt say in thine heart, These nations are more than I; how can I dispossess them? Thou shalt not be afraid of them: but shalt well remember what the LORD thy God did unto Pharaoh, and unto all Egypt (Deut. 7:8–18).

A covenant-breaking society can experience long-term growth. But the period of economic growth for a covenant-breaking society is vastly shorter than the long-term growth open to a covenant-keeping society. The compounding process in any area of life produces accel-ating growth. When you re-invest the earnings, and these investments also participate in the compounding process, the numbers get astronomically large very fast. The higher the rate of growth, the faster the things being compounded reach high numbers.

10. Here, only a thousand generations are mentioned, not thousands. The language of thousands of generations is symbolic.

God was telling Israel that covenantal obedience produces growth. Growth produces victory. No matter how low the rate of growth, if the compounding process goes on long enough, it will engulf the world. It will reach environmental limits of growth. The world is not infinite.¹¹ This is God's way of pointing to the end of time. There are environmental limits to growth. There is just so much "stuff" to inherit. There is also a temporal limit to growth: the final judgment. The existence of compound growth for covenant-keepers points to the final victory in time of God's kingdom. It also points to the disinheritance of Satan's kingdom in history.

2. Cutting Off Growth

The key to compounding is continual reinvestment. It does not matter how low the rate of growth is; if this growth continues through time long enough, it will eventually swallow up everything in the environment that feeds it. This is the message of Aesop's fable of the tortoise and the hare. The hare achieves a rapid conquest over space, but he does not sustain it. The tortoise can achieve only a slow conquest of space, but he never quits moving forward. The tortoise eventually overtakes the sleeping hare. "Slowly but surely" is a familiar folk phrase that illustrates this principle of comparative growth. So is "little by little." Isaiah wrote: "But the word of the LORD was unto them precept upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little, and there a little; that they might go, and fall backward, and be broken, and snared, and taken" (Isa. 28:13).

God cuts off the growth of covenant-breaking societies. They grow only until their iniquity becomes full. Then they either fall or are converted to faith in God. Their growth ceases if they continue to reject God. They experience setbacks. Meanwhile, the compounding process goes on for covenant-keeping societies. Even if it is reversed temporarily, it returns.

The church is the heir of God's covenantal promise of growth. It survives all setbacks. Its growth may slow down for a time. Covenant-breaking organizations and even whole societies may outrun the church for a time. But the church is never stopped. It is like the tortoise in the fable.

11. Gary North, "The Theology of the Exponential Curve," The Freeman (May 1970) (<http://bit.ly/TheologyCurve>); reprinted in Gary North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 8. (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>)

Biblical principles of limited civil government, free trade, thrift, and freedom of contract produce compound economic growth. As the West has applied these principles, it has grown rich.¹² Another major factor was confidence in the possibility of long-term economic growth. This was an implication of postmillennialism, which was rediscovered in Holland and Scotland in the seventeenth century. Then there was the issue of the legitimacy of profit-seeking. That, too, was acknowledged by the Dutch in the seventeenth century. The idea spread to the British Isles in the eighteenth century.¹³

All other social orders fell behind the West in this regard. The lure of wealth is universal. The West's principles of economics are now being adopted by societies in Asia. The economic results of this adoption have been spectacular since the end of World War II in 1945. But these principles of economic development have been secularized by their expositors. These principles have been explained as contract-based, not covenant-based. No sovereign, personal God is said to sustain the growth process. In fact, economists have been more ready than any other academic group to dismiss God as irrelevant to theory. They were the first academic profession to secularize their discussions: in the late seventeenth century.¹⁴

The growth of economic output has led to the growth of population. All over the non-industrial world, populations are growing as never before in man's history. In the wealthy West, however, reproduction rates are falling. Were it not for immigration, these rates would be much lower. After two centuries of compound economic growth, Europe has lost its faith in the God of the Bible and its faith in the future. No European nation is reproducing itself biologically; all are below the replacement rate of 2.1 children per woman.¹⁵ Most of these nations are inviting Muslims to come and live, to do the low-paying jobs that the domestic populations refuse to do at the wages

12. Nathan Rosenberg and L. E. Birdzell, Jr., How the West Grew Rich: The Economic Transformation of the Industrial World (New York: Basic Books, 1986).

13. This is the thesis of Deirdre McCloskey in a proposed six-volume set titled The Bourgeois Era. Two volumes have been published as of 2011.

14. William Letwin, The Origins of Scientific Economics (Cambridge, Massachusetts: M.I.T. Press, 1963), ch. 6.

15. Pat Buchanan, The Death of the West (New York: Simon & Schuster, 2001).

offered. Muslims have large families, although this is beginning to change in Western Europe, and has dramatically changed in Iran. They are steadily replacing the indigenous populations. The same attitude regarding family size has appeared in the United States. In 1957, the average American family produced almost four children. By 1971, this had fallen to two children, where it remains. Immigrant families, especially from Latin America, were the main exceptions. The West's inheritance is steadily being transferred to residents and citizens whose cultural roots are in the southern latitudes.

Today, we see the covenantal realm of Satan expanding. The West has generally abandoned Christianity, and the Third World has yet to adopt it, although there are revivals going on in sub-Sahara Africa, Latin America, and China.¹⁶ But the growth in the number of covenant-breakers is dwarfing the growth of covenant-keepers. This has put the church on the defensive.

If widespread revival does not come before the end of time, and if compound economic growth nevertheless continues, then the covenantal social theory implied by the Book of Deuteronomy can be said to have been annulled at some time prior to the twentieth century, presumably by the New Covenant. If Mosaic social theory is no longer in effect, then there can be no social theory that is explicitly based on the Bible. If there is no predictability between corporate covenant-breaking and God's corporate negative sanctions, then biblical social theory is not possible. This would place Christians permanently at the mercy of covenant-breaking social philosophers. The wisdom of covenant-breaking man would triumph: one or another of the competing, irreconcilable systems of social cause and effect would triumph. Christians would be asked to baptize the reigning social theories of their nation. No doubt they would do so. They have done so ever since the days of the early church, when Christian apologists adopted Greek categories of philosophy in the name of Christ.¹⁷ They have done so in the name of epistemological neutrality and, in modern times, political pluralism.¹⁸ But this would not solve the problem of discovering what God has spoken authoritatively in New Covenant history.

16. Philip Jenkins, The Next Christendom: The Coming Global Christianity (New York: Oxford University Press, 2002).

17. Cornelius Van Til, A Christian Theory of Knowledge (Nutley, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1969), Part IV: "The Church Fathers."

18. See Appendix H: "Week Reed: The Politics of Compromise." See also Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

Conclusion

When God's people refuse to seek His wisdom and obey His word, they forfeit many opportunities. This was true in the wilderness era. It is equally true in the modern world. When God's law is not honored by God's people, they always find themselves progressively enslaved by covenant-keepers: psychologically, philosophically, culturally, economically, and politically. God prophesied this, too (Deut. 28:15–20). This corporate cursing cuts off the growth process. If corporate blessing were never restored, covenant-breakers would be given equal footing with God's people. But this cutting off of God's people is always temporary (Deut. 4:25–31).¹⁹

Even though one generation may forfeit great opportunities, a subsequent generation can make up for lost time. Succession covers a multitude of losses. The goal, then, is to train up the next generation, provide it with capital, and keep the compounding process alive. As the capital base of money, talent, wisdom, and experience continues to grow, society can live off the “interest.” That is, subsequent generations are not required to save as religiously. As time goes on, the investment begins to sustain more and more projects. Dominion is extended because of the covenant community's access to a huge capital base. It can afford to make some mistakes. It need not guard its wealth so closely. But it must not live exclusively on accumulated capital. Each generation must leave its legacy to the next. Each generation should leave God's covenant society a little richer. Biblical society is value-added society. This is the primary theme of Deuteronomy: adding value through inheritance.

The exodus generation had refused to honor the compounding process. They had forfeited its opportunity to inherit through Joshua's leadership. They had held on tightly to power and authority by refusing to surrender the inheritance to the fourth generation after the spies' return from the Promised Land. The third generation could have inherited through the military leadership of Joshua, but they refused. Thus, they broke the compounding process. They wandered in the wilderness until all of them died except Joshua and Caleb. Then the compounding process could begin again with an enlarged capital base: the wealth of Canaan.

19. Chapter 10.

3

DELEGATED AUTHORITY AND SOCIAL ORDER

And I spake unto you at that time, saying, I am not able to bear you myself alone: The LORD your God hath multiplied you, and, behold, ye are this day as the stars of heaven for multitude. (The LORD God of your fathers make you a thousand times so many more as ye are, and bless you, as he hath promised you!) How can I myself alone bear your cumbrance, and your burden, and your strife? Take you wise men, and understanding, and known among your tribes, and I will make them rulers over you (Deut. 1:9–13).

The theocentric focus of this law is God’s delegation of judicial authority to men. Authority is an aspect of point two of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. The Division of Labor

Unlike God, no man is omniscient. Men must create alternatives to omniscient judgment. Moses had been burdened with the task of rendering judgment to all the people prior to Exodus 18. But he could not govern as the patriarchs had governed. There were too many Israelites. Israel needed a judicial hierarchy.²

While this law resembled a seed law in the sense that it derived from the fulfilled promise of seed to Abraham, it in fact was a cross-boundary law that applies to every commonwealth larger than an extended family. The problem of the division of judicial labor is to be solved by the creation of a hierarchical appeals court.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion by Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1992), ch. 2 (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 19.

Here Moses reminded the conquest generation of the nation's first major crisis of authority. Exodus 18 records the event in detail. A long line of disputants formed outside Moses' tent every day. "And it came to pass on the morrow, that Moses sat to judge the people: and the people stood by Moses from the morning unto the evening" (Ex. 18:13). His father-in-law warned him that the magnitude of this burden as a judge would overwhelm Moses as well as the people. "Thou wilt surely wear away, both thou, and this people that is with thee: for this thing is too heavy for thee; thou art not able to perform it thyself alone" (v. 18). He counselled Moses to establish a hierarchical chain of command. There would be judges of tens, fifties, hundreds, and thousands (v. 21): 60,000, 12,000, 6,000, and 600, or 78,600 judges.³

These judges were untrained and untried. They could provide only imperfect justice, but they could do this on a systematic basis, day in and day out. This was better for Israel than the perfect justice provided by Moses, because in order to gain access to this justice, men would spend their days waiting in line. The value of their time was greater than the cost of imperfect justice.⁴

Moses agreed to accept Jethro's suggestion. He must have recognized the truth of Jethro's warning. There was not enough time and not enough Moses to provide justice to the entire nation. The burden of delayed justice would oppress the people. Meanwhile, Moses would waste away. And after he was dead, where would the people receive justice? Who would then render perfect justice? Better to train up a generation of judges in preparation for the transition. Better to establish a tradition of imperfect judges rendering imperfect justice on a widespread basis. Swift imperfect justice is preferable to delayed perfect justice.

B. The Decision to Delegate

One of the most precious of scarce economic resources is managerial talent. It commands a high price in a competitive, growing economy. No one knows how to mass produce it. There are so many competing management training systems available that no one knows which one is most effective. In different kinds of businesses, different

3. This was Rashi's eleventh-century estimate: Rabbi Solomon (Shlomo) Yitzhaki, known as Rashi, Chumash with Targum Onkelos, Haphtaroth and Rashi's Commentary, A. M. Silbermann and M. Rosenbaum, translators, 5 vols. (Jerusalem: Silbermann Family, [1934] 1985 [Jewish year: 5745]), II, p. 95.

4. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 19.

management skills are required. Because the supply of effective managers is limited, they command a high price. Societies seek substitutes for managerial talent, such as compensation by commission (self-motivation) and computerized information.

The creative person usually finds it difficult to delegate all but the simplest tasks. He does not trust his subordinates' efforts. He may be willing to delegate to those who have special information in areas he is unfamiliar with, but the more talented he is in several areas, the less willing he is to delegate.

The division of labor is hampered by those who refuse to delegate. The English economist David Ricardo offered an example of two producers, one of whom is more productive than his trading partner in producing a particular product. Because his skill is even greater in producing some other product, which commands a higher price, which his trading partner wants to buy, he should allow the trading partner to produce the first product and then trade for it. Similarly, a soldier who can shoot straight when under fire, but who also types fast, should concentrate on his unique advantage: shooting. There are more skilled typists than skilled shooters. Their value to an army is less than the value of straight-shooting, front-line soldiers. Even if the typist is a less-skilled typist than the straight-shooter is, the army could be overrun if the men on the front lines cannot shoot straight. That semi-skilled typist should be recruited from a pool of men who cannot shoot straight under fire.

The general who staffs his headquarters with near-sighted men who are skilled managers would be wise to delegate management to them. His job is to design better battle plans than the enemy general does. Only if the task of the senior commander is to hold together skilled generals who are in competition with each other should he be known for his management skills.⁵

In effect, the delegator is asking his subordinates to trade with him. They will provide certain forms of output within the company; he will provide other forms. His job is to put together a team whose combined output is greater than the sum of the individual parts of that team would have been, had he not organized it. If he is successful, he multiplies his efforts. He gains the output of others in a combined effort.

5. Dwight D. Eisenhower is a classic example of a manager-general. His job, 1942 to 1945, was to keep British, American, and Commonwealth commanding generals from undermining each other.

C. Multiplication and Authority

Moses offered a prayer of blessing in the middle of his exposition on the hierarchy of civil authority. The King James translators placed this prayer in parentheses. “(The LORD God of your fathers make you a thousand times so many more as ye are, and bless you, as he hath promised you!)” (v. 11). He had just told them that God had already multiplied their numbers. They had witnessed this growth. Now, he prayed for more.

This is the dominion impulse. It involves the multiplication of all assets, including population.⁶ He immediately asked the proper question: How could he bear the burden placed on him as the supreme civil judge? He saw clearly that as the number of people multiplied, the number of disputes would multiply. It is likely that the number of disputes would rise even faster than the number of people. Without imposing new rules of behavior, doubling the number of people in a room will more than double the noise, as people talk louder to overcome the noise of additional people talking. The same is true of lawsuits in a litigious society.

Moses had understood that the blessing of additional people would soon become a curse if the judicial order were not restructured. Jethro offered the solution: a series of appeals courts. Any growing organization faces a similar problem. As the number of details increases, there must be institutional alterations to keep the details from overwhelming the system. A well-designed system must either find ways of standardizing ways of dealing with these details or else find ways of resisting growth. For example, a company that pursues growth must avoid the temptation to tinker with the structure of the firm in order to deal with lots of unique problems in unique ways. It must devise standard ways to deal with unique problems. If it tries to deal with too many unique problems, its ability to grow will be thwarted. It will become bogged down in details. It must treat unique problems as parts of larger aggregates to which familiar rules apply. It must smooth over the small distinctions. This is especially true of a price-competitive firm that seeks growth through cost-cutting and mass production.

Similarly, a civil government must resist the temptation to solve every social problem, review every case, and establish case law precedents by creating solutions to difficult and non-standard disputes. “Hard cases make bad law” is an ancient saying in the common law tradition.

6. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 1.

There must be an increase in authority as complexity increases. The question is this: Where should this increase take place? At the top of the social system or the bottom? The traditional socialist argument is that increasing social complexity requires more centralization and more planning at the top.⁷ Government must assert its authority, central government especially. This argument was challenged by F. A. Hayek in the late 1930s and 1940s. As societies grow more complex, he argued, they should decentralize. Central planners do not possess sufficient knowledge to micro-manage an advanced and growing economy. Social complexity is too great. The only source of knowledge that is sufficient to manage this growing complexity is the free market, with its price system, its sanctions (profit and loss), its specialization of knowledge, and its decentralized power structure.⁸

Because God is omniscient, omnipresent, and omnipotent, complexity is not a threat to Him. He can decentralize authority to man without any fear of losing His sovereignty. The same pattern is mandated for man: the willingness to decentralize, to delegate authority. By delegating authority, men reap the benefits of the division of labor. Others are given opportunities to serve in a leadership capacity. The talents of more men are called forth by a system of rules that allows those with skills to rise in the hierarchy.

Second, there are multiple hierarchies in a biblical society. There is no unitary system of authority which grants all the favors and receives all the acclaim. There are many areas of service and many chains of command. The civil hierarchy is severely limited by biblical law in what it can lawfully do. It can suppress public evil through the imposition of negative sanctions. But this leaves open many other areas of productivity, power, and honor within a biblical society.

Thus, by limiting the power of civil government as well as its jurisdiction, biblical law creates the judicial basis of a society that can grow in complexity without mandating the concentration of power to preserve social order. In fact, an increase in social order should accom-

7. The classic statement of this position is Chapter 3 of Frederick Engels' Socialism: Utopian and Scientific (1882). This chapter first appeared in Engels' Herr Eugen Dühring's Revolution in Science (1878), Part III, Chapter II. See Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Collected Works (New York: International Publishers, 1987), vol. 25, pp. 254–71.

8. F. A. Hayek, "The Use of Knowledge in Society" (1945); reprinted in Hayek, Individualism and Economic Order (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/HayekIAEO>) pany the multiplication of wealth, numbers, and knowledge. What creates social disorder is sin and its outward manifestations, not complexity as such. If the increasing complexity of society is the result of voluntary human action under God's law—self-government under God—then it is not a threat to the social order. On the contrary, this complexity is a blessing for the social order. When each man can find his unique area of maximum service—to God and man—a social order flourishes. The extension of the division of labor allows men to match their highly specialized productive talents with customer demand. The multiplication of producers extends each man's authority by narrowing his area of service. This increase in an individual's authority is the outcome of his increased productivity. He has access to additional capital because investors shift their investments from less productive employers of workers to more productive workers. It is not necessary for the state to centralize its authority in a doomed quest for greater social order. If it does, there will be a decrease in social order.

When men complain that “things are getting too complicated these days,” they mean that they are having trouble keeping up with social change. Their surroundings are changing fast. Yet every man loves to discover an opportunity to better himself that had not existed before. But every new opportunity adds to the complexity of society. With every new opportunity comes the potential for a better world. The fact is, a member of some primitive tribe can learn to operate an electric light switch as effortlessly and as absent-mindedly as any modern man does. Within a few months, he will want his own motorbike. Social complexity comes in enticingly simple steps.

If some people want simplicity, they can buy it. The Amish live simple lives, but most people think the price is too high: eighth-grade educations, no automobiles, no computers, no electricity (except in the barn), and no buttons or zippers. The visible mark of the true “plain person” is hook and loop clothing. The visible mark of heresy is the button and eye. A zipper indicates full-scale apostasy. And so it should, for the zipper is one of modern man's most amazing little technologies, so simple by most men's standards that they pay no attention to it. Yet who can explain it? Like a sewing machine's stitch, the zipper is incomprehensible to most people. Dedicated resistance to zippers necessarily marks the anti-complexity worldview of the Amish: the temptation of the seemingly simple and cheap device that opens the door to complexity on a scale that no previous civilization could have imagined. To the Amish, a zipper is as welcome as it would have been to the high priest of Israel, had one been installed on the veil of the temple.

When sin multiplies, however, an increase in state authority may be called for. This extension of authority should not be centralized. The threat to liberty of central authority is too great. Even with God's agent Moses as the supreme civil judge, Jethro warned that Israel would suffer. Moses possessed too much authority. Better to decentralize state authority to untrained judges than to concentrate authority in one man. Such centralized authority will undermine freedom, reduce complexity, reduce the division of labor, and cut short the multiplication of wealth. Men will stand in long lines seeking justice rather than getting on with living.

Conclusion

Moses had to delegate authority in order to save himself and the nation from exhaustion. The complexity of a large society overwhelms the best efforts of the best men at the top to deal with the inevitable disputes that arise among men. The solution is judicial decentralization and the delegation of judicial authority. This brings forth new knowledge that would not have manifested itself in a system of concentrated political power.

But how are disputes to be handled? By a fixed law, a predictable legal order, and self-government. Biblical social order begins with grace. The civil manifestation of this grace is God's revealed law. "Wherefore the law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good" (Rom. 7:12). "For we know that the law is spiritual: but I am carnal, sold under sin" (Rom. 7:14). To deal with the multiplication of disputes, society requires the multiplication of judges, not all of whom are civil magistrates. A society that seeks multiplication as well as the concentration of political power will find that these goals are unattainable, long term. The fall of the Soviet Union in 1991 provided the most graphic proof of this principle in modern times, and perhaps in all history: an enormous empire, based on the concentration of power, simply collapsed in a period of a few weeks, at the cost of only three lives. The Soviet Union had strangled itself in bureaucracy and misinformation, and had lost the will to resist, let alone expand. The top-down hierarchy of the centrally planned economy becomes unproductive and socially brittle.

A biblically structured social order reveals a multiplicity of hierarchies, each with its own jurisdiction, none with final earthly jurisdiction, all governed by God's Bible-revealed law. There must be ordained judges in a series of appeals courts, both civil and ecclesiastical. Voters in both church and state must retain the authority to revoke the ordination of these judges. Where the voters' authority is absent, in either church or state, the institutional supreme court inevitably becomes a legislative body. It asserts some form of divine right theory: the denial of any earthly appeal beyond the court's authority.⁹

9. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), ch. 10. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

4

THE FACE OF MAN

Ye shall not respect persons in judgment; but ye shall hear the small as well as the great; ye shall not be afraid of the face of man; for the judgment is God's: and the cause that is too hard for you, bring it unto me, and I will hear it (Deut. 1:17).

The theocentric focus of this passage is God as judge. Sanctions are associated with point four of the biblical covenant model, yet chapters 1:6–4:49 are categorized as belonging to point two: hierarchy. Two observations are relevant here: (1) sanctions are always associated with authority, i.e., the legal right to impose sanctions; (2) sanctions—positive and negative—are the means of inheritance/disinheritance. The God of the Bible was calling the fourth generation (Gen. 15:16) to impose negative sanctions on Canaan on His behalf. Warfare was to be the means of their inheritance. They should not be afraid of the Canaanites. Once in control of the Promised Land, they should also not be afraid of evil-doers. A hierarchical appeals court must settle these judicial issues.

A. Judicial Fear: An Inescapable Concept

Men are to fear God more than they fear men. Moses warned judges not to fear any man to the point of rendering false judgment in God's name. He who is ordained by law to speak as God's judicial representative must speak an honest word. This is the basis of the overriding principle of biblical law: the rule of law. "One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you" (Ex. 12:49).¹ The corollary to the rule of law is the principle found in this verse: there must be no respect of persons. This law is repeated

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 14.

throughout Scripture.²

There is a theocentric framework for this law: God as supreme judge. “For there is no respect of persons with God” (Rom. 2:11). “And, ye masters, do the same things unto them, forbearing threatening: knowing that your Master also is in heaven; neither is there respect of persons with him” (Eph. 6:9). “And if ye call on the Father, who without respect of persons judgeth according to every man’s work, pass the time of your sojourning here in fear” (I Peter 1:17). The warning is clear: “But if ye have respect to persons, ye commit sin, and are convinced of the law as transgressors” (James 2:9). Judges must render impartial judgment in God’s name, on His authority. This was not a seed law or a land law. It was a cross-boundary law—perhaps the cross-boundary law: the rule of God’s law.³

The governing principle of biblical civil justice is victim’s rights.⁴ To achieve the rule of law in specific case law applications, the judge must protect the victim. The judge must declare his judgment in terms of God’s law and the evidence in front of the court. Nothing must interfere with his declaration: not bribes, not favoritism, and not fear of repercussions. “Ye shall not be afraid of the face of man; for the judgment is God’s.”

The civil judge hands down judgment in God’s name. He acts as a representative of God, declaring God’s judgment in history. This is what makes a civil judge a minister of God. Men are to fear him because of his office as God’s judicial representative. “For he is the minister of God to thee for good. But if thou do that which is evil, be afraid; for he beareth not the sword in vain: for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil” (Rom. 13: 4).⁵

Men must fear God. The fear of God is the beginning of wisdom. The Old Testament declares this repeatedly. “And the spirit of the LORD shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the LORD” (Isa. 11:2).⁶ Men will either fear God or fear some aspect of the creation. They will either begin with God’s wisdom or man’s wisdom, but the beginning of wisdom is fear. The man who fears noth-

2. Deuteronomy 16:19; II Chronicles 19:7; Proverbs 24:23; 28:21.

3. On these categories of the Mosaic law, see Appendix J.

4. Gary North, Victim’s Rights: The Biblical View of Civil Justice (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnvictim>)

5. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 11.

6. Job 28:28, Psalms 111:10, Proverbs 1:7; 9:10; 15:33.

ing is a fool. He has not understood the threat of God's eternal negative sanctions. "And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell" (Matt. 10:28).

The judge is cautioned not to fear the face of man. This language is obviously symbolic. No one fears another person's face. Men fear the vengeful impulses which lie behind grim faces. "But unto Cain and to his offering he had not respect. And Cain was very wroth, and his countenance fell" (Gen. 4:5). Cain's face foretold trouble to come for Abel. No judge is to fear such a face. He is to fear God and hell, not those standing before the bar of justice.

Unrighteous men are to fear a righteous judge. In a perverse society under the rule of evil men, a righteous judge must live under the threat of negative sanctions. Thus, judicial fear is an inescapable concept. Either covenant-breakers fear judges who uphold God's law, or else covenant-keepers fear judges who uphold a rival legal order—or should fear them. But political pluralists prefer it this way.

B. Time Perspective and Sanctions

Basic to all human action is the concept of time preference. We act in the present. We are responsible in the present. We consider the future when we are making our decisions in the present, but we value the present more than we do the future. We apply a discount to the future. Economists call this discount the rate of interest.⁷

People vary with respect to their assessment of the importance of the future. Some people are more future-oriented than others. They understand that success in the future is heavily dependent on actions taken in the present. They are willing to sacrifice present enjoyment for the sake of future enjoyment. They save money at a much lower rate of interest compared to the rate which must be offered to a present-oriented person in order to persuade him to save.

Edward Banfield has defined class position in terms of time perspective. An upper-class person is more future-oriented than a middle-class person, who is in turn more future-oriented than a lower-class person.⁸ An upper-class person may not have more money early in life than a middle-class person—a medical student, for example—

7. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. 19. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

8. Edward Banfield, The Unheavenly City: The Nature and Future of Our Urban Crisis (Boston: Little, Brown, 1970), ch. 3.

but over time his devotion to thrift and hard work will normally produce personal wealth.

This insight regarding time perspective has implications for law enforcement, especially sanctions. If a person is extremely present-oriented, he cares little about the distant consequences of his actions. He discounts future pain so heavily that present enjoyment looms far larger in his decision-making. Even if he thinks he may be caught, tried, convicted, and sentenced, he dismisses the end result as relatively meaningless. He dramatically subordinates then to now.

Because God's law is supposed to be implemented without respect to persons, both the present-oriented person and the future-oriented person face the same civil sanctions. The existence of time preference tells us that a greater number of present-oriented people will commit crimes than future-oriented people. They fear the future less. The threatened civil sanctions do not appear equally threatening. Economic theory tells us that when the price of anything is lowered, more of it will be demanded. The price of criminal behavior is perceived to be lower by a present-oriented person than by a future-oriented person.

C. Capital Punishment

To deal with extreme present-orientation, God's law establishes the sanction of execution. The magnitude and permanence of this negative sanction impresses even the present-oriented criminal. Discounting death to zero price takes a unique degree of commitment to the present. A hero may do this for the sake of a greater cause. Most criminals are not this present-oriented.

The biblical case for capital punishment rests on the principle that some crimes are an especial affront to God. He demands that the convicted criminal be delivered immediately into His court. In the case of murder, the victim cannot announce a lesser penalty. Unlike Jesus on the cross, who asked God to forgive those who persecuted Him, the murder victim is silent. So, God requires the criminal's execution.

A positive side effect of capital punishment is the inability of the criminal to gain revenge against those who condemned him. Those who commit crimes so heinous that the state may not legally punish them with anything less than execution are unable to threaten judges and jurors. When the state substitutes other penalties, the criminal can later seek revenge.⁹ In the name of leniency to criminals, the state places at risk those law-abiding citizens who announced judgment in God's name.

9. The classic American western High Noon (1952) is built on this theme.

In the United States, the abandonment of capital punishment was accompanied by an unprecedented increase in crime, 1960 to 1975.¹⁰ It was an era in which traditional conservative humanism was visibly replaced by various forms of liberal humanism. The state substituted new sanctions for old. It sought to heal evil men rather than condemn them. It sought to rehabilitate criminals rather than punish them. The healing state became the lenient state—lenient on criminals, but harsh on their victims and those who lived in fear of criminals. This was consistent with left-wing humanism's concept of the state as an agency of healing, of positive sanctions.

The previous decade had launched an era of judicial activism,¹¹ but in 1960 there were still signs culturally that an older conservative humanism prevailed in the thinking of the general public. Yet within one decade, 1960 to 1970, this older attitude was abandoned by policymakers and judicial theorists. For decades, liberal elitists and academics had called into question the legitimacy of traditional negative sanctions against crime. The 1950s marked the last decade of the common man's dam of resolve. As Irving Kristol wrote, "Prior to the victory of modern liberal dogmas in the early 1950s, the police and the courts could cope with common street crime, as well as burglaries or robberies, without having to defer to a catalog of criminals' constitutional rights, most of which, at the time, were still undiscovered. It may have made for less perfect justice, but it did deter wanton criminality among the young and ensured a more trusting, less fearful society."¹² A new judicial activism silenced conservative critics. The book title chosen by Karl Menninger, one of the reformers, said it all: The Crime of Punishment.¹³ The liberal elite succeeded in persuading voters to abandon "wild west" justice: the justice of predictable negative sanctions. The result was an unprecedented increase in crime.

10. James Q. Wilson, Thinking About Crime (New York: Basic Books, 1975), ch. 1; U.S. Senator James L. Buckley, "Foreword," Frank Carrington, The Victims (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1975).

11. The symbolic figure here was U.S. Supreme Court Chief Justice Earl Warren, beginning with his appointment to the Court in 1953. The "Warren Court" was decidedly liberal.

12. Irving Kristol, "The Way We Were," Wall Street Journal (July 14, 1995).

13. Karl Menninger, M.D., The Crime of Punishment (New York: Viking, 1968).

D. Liberty and Justice

Liberty requires the rule of law. The rule of law means predictable law. Men must believe that evil-doers will be punished if the evidence testifies against them. Their victims will be economically rewarded by criminals, even if this means selling the criminals into slavery until their victims are repaid.

The predictability of the law increases the likelihood that negative civil sanctions will be imposed. The criminal already discounts the personal cost of negative future sanctions. High time preference—a steep discounting of the future—is one aspect of criminal behavior generally.¹⁴ If the criminal understands that most crimes go unsolved and that most solved crimes go unpunished, his heavy discounting of the future drives his present costs of crime almost to zero. This increases the amount of crime in society: as the cost of something falls, more of it is demanded. By increasing the predictability of negative sanctions, the legal system decreases the amount of crime by raising its cost to criminals.

There is another aspect of discounting: the victim's. The victim estimates the likelihood of negative sanctions' being imposed on the criminal. If the likelihood is low, why go to the trouble of seeking justice? Why take the risk? Also, will the victim be rewarded if the criminal is convicted? Is there the possibility of positive sanctions? The more likely the positive sanctions, the more likely the victim will co-operate with law-enforcement officials in solving the crime.

The first stage in the retreat of a society from the rule of biblical law is the substitution of an ideal of social revenge for the biblical ideal of victim's rights. The ideal of victim's rights is always abandoned by the humanist state, which regards all crime as crime against the state. The humanist state imposes negative sanctions, but always at taxpayers' expense. The symbol of this legal order is the prison. The negative sanction of prison brings no positive sanctions to victims except in the sense of revenge. The biblical judicial ideal of victim's rights fades; it is replaced either by a theory of social revenge or by a theory of criminal rehabilitation. These rival theories can trade places back and forth in the public's estimation, as each is tried and found wanting.

In both cases, the citizenry fears the criminal. In the first case, the criminal is locked up for years. He is removed from the presence of law-abiding people. He associates with a caste of professional criminals in prison. He is prohibited from making economic restitution to his victims. Citizens deny the criminal's social redemption through personal restitution. They have no trust in biblical law as a means of restoration. They trust only in the state's vengeance. "Lock him up and throw away the key!" In the second case, he is paroled early and released back into society before he makes restitution to his victims. Citizens receive into their midst hardened criminals. They learn to fear these men, who in turn fear neither God nor law-abiding men.

14. Edward Banfield, "Present-Orientedness and Crime," in Randy E. Barnett and John Hegel III (eds.), Assessing the Criminal: Restitution, Retribution, and the Legal Process (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Ballinger, 1977), pp. 140–41.

When the fear of evil men undermines a community's fear of God, that community is eventually going to experience tyranny. The worst men will claw their way to the top through the imposition of fear. A subculture based on rule by fear has an enormous competitive advantage in a society that fears men more than it fears God. When this subculture becomes dominant, the rule of law becomes rule by criminals.

The mark of a community's commitment to liberty is its commitment to biblical law. God's law must be enforced. The countenances of the citizenry must be set against the countenances of criminals. The citizenry represents God. Their ordained civil agents represent them before the face of God and represent God before the faces of criminals. Civil authority flows from God to citizens to the civil magistrate.¹⁵ They are judges insofar as they bring sanctions, positive or negative, against their ordained representatives. They are told not to fear the face of man.

Conclusion

The rule of law requires the honoring of the principle of no respect for persons. God's law is unified, for it reflects His moral unity. It is universally binding, for He is universally sovereign. Judgment should not be made unpredictable through the imposition of unpredictable sanctions. "Different strokes for different folks" is not a biblical principle of justice.

When the sense of justice departs from a society, that society becomes vulnerable to appeals by criminals, guilt-manipulating politicians, revolutionaries, tyrants, and others who offer to get even with the present order: the politics of revenge. When statist revenge is substituted for personal restitution, a society searches in vain for a judge who will bring stability, peace, and justice. When statist rehabilitation is substituted for personal restitution, a society also searches in vain for stability, peace, and justice. In both cases, liberty is at risk. The predictability of just laws becomes either the predictability of unjust laws or the unpredictability of any law.

15. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 4.

The issue here is hierarchy. Civil law is enforced by legal representatives who serve as God's agents and also as the community's delegated agents. The judge must not fear law-breakers, for he declares God's law. He must fear God, not men. Criminals must fear civil judges, who speak in the name of God, and who mandate God's civil sanctions. One mark of a disintegrating social order is the criminals' loss of fear of the civil law. When judges in turn fear law-breakers, this fear spreads to the entire society.

Courage is as basic to law-enforcement as it is to military service. There is supposed to be a covenantal hierarchy of fear: judges must fear both God and the voters; criminals must fear God and the judges. The society of Satan is based on a perverse hierarchy: criminals fear other criminals; judges and citizens fear criminals. They fear the faces of evil men.

5

BUREAUCRATIC COUNSEL

Behold, the LORD thy God hath set the land before thee: go up and possess it, as the LORD God of thy fathers hath said unto thee; fear not, neither be discouraged. And ye came near unto me every one of you, and said, We will send men before us, and they shall search us out the land, and bring us word again by what way we must go up, and into what cities we shall come. And the saying pleased me well: and I took twelve men of you, one of a tribe (Deut. 1:21–23).

The theocentric principle of this law is God in His office as supreme military commander. He gives orders. These orders are to be obeyed. In His capacity as supreme commander, He possesses omniscience, an incommunicable attribute. Men are not omniscient. They require means of increasing the supply of accurate information.

A. God's Spies

In this case, Israel needed spies. The spies would enter the land of Canaan, evaluate its vulnerability to invasion, and return to speak accurately on God's behalf. They were to think God's thoughts after Him, as faithful representatives. Thinking God's thoughts after Him is part of the hierarchy of covenantal dominion.

Moses here recounts the story of the exodus generation's rebellion against God's command that they immediately conquer Canaan. God gave the command, and the people did not initially reject it. Instead, they added a suggestion, namely, that they be allowed to gather information regarding the best route into Canaan for military purposes. Moses approved of this request. He selected a representative from each of the tribes to conduct the reconnaissance operation.

What appeared to be a sensible pre-war tactic turned out to be the first in a series of retreats. The nation did not want to challenge the residents of Canaan, but their leaders did not admit this in the early stages of the operation. Moses went on to recount the story of their rebellion, how the exodus generation and those men old enough in the next generation to have participated in the conquest had been prohibited from entering the land. Only Caleb and Joshua were excepted (Deut. 1:36, 38). They had shown resolve regarding the conquest; for this, they were spared the ignominy of having their personal inheritance in the land revoked by God. The next generation would inherit: “Moreover your little ones, which ye said should be a prey, and your children, which in that day had no knowledge between good and evil, they shall go in thither, and unto them will I give it, and they shall possess it” (v. 39).

God’s negative sanction of disinheritance matched the nation’s negative strategy of non-confrontation. He wanted Israel to disinherit the Canaanites; this negative sanction would have been a positive sanction for Israel. This was what economists call a zero-sum game: the gains of the winners are offset by the losses of the losers. Warfare has this characteristic. Israel wanted to avoid war; so, the spies recommended non-confrontation. This would have permanently disinherited Israel and permanently confirmed the continuity of inheritance in Canaan. Disinheritance is an inescapable concept. Either Israel would be disinherited or the Canaanites would be. By escaping the sanction of war, Israel wanted to escape war’s negative sanctions. But this granted immunity to Canaanites. It also constituted a negative sanction against Israel’s heirs. Ultimately, it constituted a negative sanction against God, who had promised Abraham that the fourth generation would inherit (Gen. 15:16). Had Israel’s strategy of non-confrontation been allowed to stand, God would have been exposed before His enemies as one who did not fulfill His promises.

B. A Matter of Strategy

God had a strategy: the conquest of Canaan. This strategy was announced three times: to Abraham once and to Moses twice, at the beginning and end of the wilderness period. first, He had told Abraham that his heirs would conquer Canaan in the fourth generation after their descent into Egypt. This was Joshua’s generation. Second, He had told the exodus generation to begin the offensive campaign (Deut. 1:21). This was their responsibility, God said, yet anyone who knew of the promise to Abraham would have known that this generation would not conquer. The only way for the third generation to particiate in the conquest of Canaan was to surrender leadership to the fourth generation. Third, at the end of the wilderness period, God told Moses and Joshua that the conquest must begin soon. This was carried out under Joshua.

The conquest of Canaan was ethically and prophetically mandatory. The question was: Which generation would carry it out? Those to whom the command to march into Canaan was first given soon rebelled against this strategy. They rebelled, not by citing the specific details of the Abrahamic promise—fourth generation, not third—but by announcing that the Promised Land was not worth the military effort to inherit. “And they brought up an evil report of the land which they had searched unto the children of Israel, saying, The land, through which we have gone to search it, is a land that eateth up the inhabitants thereof; and all the people that we saw in it are men of a great stature” (Num. 13:32). In short, they tampered with the visible evidence. They said that this place could not possibly be the Promised Land of milk and honey. The land ate up its normal inhabitants; you had to be a giant to prosper.

The recalcitrant captains should have gone to Moses with this request. “Tell God that we are not ready to lead this campaign. He told our father Abraham that the fourth generation would conquer Canaan. We are not that appointed generation. We respect the details of His prophecy. We do not want to get ahead of God’s prophetic timetable. We also do not want to fall behind. We are ready to transfer leadership of the army of the Lord to our older sons, under Joshua’s command.” Had they put their request in terms of God’s promise to Abraham, they would have demonstrated their commitment to His word. Instead, they tried to thwart His word by declaring the land unfit to conquer.

God’s strategy for Canaan was military conquest: the imposition of final negative historical sanctions. The details of this operation were left to Moses and the captains of God’s holy army. God did not tell them the best route into Canaan. He did not do their tactical work for them. He announced to Moses the timing of the conquest, but He left to Moses and his advisors the responsibility for implementing the general strategy. That is, God delegated responsibility to His designated representatives.

Moses accepted the offer of the captains to allow spies to go into the land for reconnaissance purposes. This seemed to be a tactical matter. What he did not understand until after their return was that this request was not tactical; it was strategic. The generation of the exodus had no intention of risking their lives to conquer Canaan. God had spoken, but perhaps they could buy more time. The request regarding the tactical reconnaissance operation was their means of delaying the implementation of the mandated strategy.

C. Rule by Committee

God announced the strategy. The task of the supreme commander is to design a military strategy. Military strategy is focused on a narrow goal: victory or stalemate, never defeat. This is why warfare lends itself to the establishment of a supreme commander. A society agrees on the fundamental goal: the avoidance of defeat. Because there is this unanimity of opinion and a narrowly defined performance standard, it is possible for a central planner to design a strategy. A military strategy lends itself to unitary decision-making. A senior representative of the nation must implement a wartime military strategy. The nation's other representatives may approve or disapprove of the strategy; they may or may not be able to veto it if they do not approve. Lower-level representatives also affect strategy through approving or disapproving something that the senior representative has submitted for consideration. A committee cannot effectively design a strategy. The committee's division of labor is valid for counsel, but not for innovation.

1. A Multitude of Counsellors

The Bible recommends a multitude of counsellors:

Where no counsel is, the people fall: but in the multitude of counsellors there is safety (Prov. 11:14).

Without counsel purposes are disappointed: but in the multitude of counsellors they are established (Prov. 15:22).

For by wise counsel thou shalt make thy war: and in multitude of counsellors there is safety (Prov. 24:6).

The larger the multitude of counsellors, the less likely that they will be able to devise an alternate strategy. The larger the group is, the less likely the agreement. A strong ruler knows that he is far less threatened by a large group of advisors than a small group. It costs too much for the members of a large group to combine against him. There are many competing strategic details to resolve, many competing egos to assuage. The Bible recommends a multitude of counsellors; it does not recommend a multitude of strategists. This system of multiple counsellors is designed to increase the wisdom of the decision-maker and at the same time strengthen his authority.

This process of centralized strategic planning through diversified counsel is mandatory in military matters, and this is also true of economic organizations. But counsel is not the same as strategic decision-making. Devising a corporate strategy is the responsibility of one person who has been delegated the authority by the owners to represent the corporation. He is held responsible by owners or whoever is legally represented by this supreme commander. This is not true of counsellors. When asked, counselors raise objections, comment on risks, suggest alternatives, and generally enable the commander to count the costs of his strategy. They do not design a strategy.

Jesus used the analogy of military strategy to describe personal decision-making. "For which of you, intending to build a tower, sitteth not down first, and counteth the cost, whether he have sufficient to finish it? Lest haply [it happen], after he hath laid the foundation, and is not able to finish it, all that behold it begin to mock him, Saying, This man began to build, and was not able to finish. Or what king, going to make war against another king, sitteth not down first, and consulteth whether he be able with ten thousand to meet him that cometh against him with twenty thousand? Or else, while the other is yet a great way off, he sendeth an ambassage [ambassador], and desireth conditions of peace" (Luke 14:28–32).¹ We are supposed to count the costs before we begin the action. Counsellors help us to estimate costs more accurately.

Committees can veto plans; they are rarely able to establish plans. The voices of the members are not unified. The division of intellectual labor produces cacophony in a committee. The unitary design needed for a successful strategy does not come from a committee. Folk wisdom understands this: "A camel is a horse designed by a committee." The division of intellectual labor does not produce a unified design, because none of the committee's members is willing to take final responsibility for a strategy created by all the other members.

The supreme commander trusts his own judgment more than he trusts the judgment of a committee. He relies on a committee to suggest several alternatives; he does not rely on it to produce a strategy.

1. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 35.

He refuses to be held responsible for a strategy designed by competing men who will not take personal responsibility for the committee's collective decision, if any. He understands that committees can sometimes veto a strategy. Committees can select someone to design a new strategy, but they cannot devise an effective strategy.

2. To Veto God

Israel's spies attempted to veto God's announced strategy, but they proposed no agreed-upon alternative. God had announced the overall strategy and the timing. Any attempt on the part of the captains or the spies to thwart that strategic plan was a form of rebellion. God did not ask the Israelites to accept or reject His strategy. He allowed them only to seek out information which would have enabled Moses to design tactics to implement God's overall strategy.

The committee of spies returned to give an account of Canaan that was at odds with everything God had told them. Only Caleb and Joshua publicly defended the basis of God's strategy, namely, the vulnerability of the Canaanites to immediate invasion. "If the LORD delight in us, then he will bring us into this land, and give it us; a land which floweth with milk and honey" (Num. 14:8). For his public defense of God's strategy, Joshua was appointed by God to succeed Moses and to direct Israel's inheritance: "But Joshua the son of Nun, which standeth before thee, he shall go in thither: encourage him: for he shall cause Israel to inherit it" (Deut. 1:38). He and Caleb could have led the army to victory four decades earlier than they eventually did.

Had the spies been allowed to speak authoritatively for Israel, God would have executed the entire nation (Num. 14:11–12). Canaan would have remained occupied by the Amorites indefinitely. That is, the Amorites would have inherited the inheritance which God had promised to Abraham's seed. It was this possibility that Moses raised in his debate with God: God's vow to destroy the Amorites would not be fulfilled; so, His enemies would mock Him (vv. 13–16). God heeded this warning (v. 20). God then applied negative sanctions. The spies had sought to veto God's strategy, but God vetoed them. He executed them on the spot with a plague (v. 37).

As is so often the case, 10 of the spies had a hidden agenda. It reflected the nation's hidden agenda, which became clear only in retrospect: to avoid military conflict with Canaan. To conceal this agenda, they recommended the reconnaissance. God knew their agenda, yet He did not tell Moses to call a halt to the reconnaissance. He allowed Moses to approve the spies' tactic. Moses would learn soon enough what the spies' hidden agenda was. The spies' report discouraged the nation. "And ye murmured in your tents, and said, Because the LORD hated us, he hath brought us forth out of the land of Egypt, to deliver us into the hand of the Amorites, to destroy us. Whither shall we go up? our brethren have discouraged our heart, saying, The people is greater and taller than we; the cities are great and walled up to heaven; and moreover we have seen the sons of the Anakims there" (Deut. 1:27–28).

The committee's report had undermined the Lord's recently announced strategy: to invade Canaan immediately (v. 21). Moses could not persuade them to believe God (v. 32). The authority of the committee's majority report was overpowering when combined with the fears of that generation, fears which the people had repeatedly expressed to Moses. The spies had corroborated what the nation had feared: the Promised Land was filled with giants. Despite the fact that God cut down all of the nay-sayers on the committee, the people did not change their minds regarding God's strategy. The majority report had truly spoken for them judicially. Only Moses' intercessory prayer had saved them from God's wrath.

D. Sovereign Counsellors

The people who are represented by a decision-maker are sovereign over him. They have the authority to thwart their economic and political representatives. God holds them responsible for what their leaders do.² This is why biblical law places centralized military decision-making authority into the hands of one man. The people can see who is responsible for making plans. This is much less true when committees make the plans. Members of committees seek to hide from the derivatively sovereign people. They seek to avoid the limelight. They seek to transfer personal responsibility by spreading it among many others. When things go wrong, a committee is like a circle of men, each pointing to the man next to him. "He did it. Blame him." The supreme example in the Bible is Adam blaming Eve, and by implication, God, who gave him Eve.

2. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 4.

1. Legal Sovereignty

Does this biblical structure of authority imply central planning? In military matters, yes. In military affairs, the decisions of the strategist have the characteristic of being all or nothing. A mistake can lead to national defeat. So, societies have adopted a single chain of military command.³ What about economic planning? Is it also to be centralized? Within one firm, yes. The owner or senior manager has to be held accountable. Accountable to whom? first to the lenders, then to the holders, but finally to the customers. The share owners are legally sovereign; the customers are economically authoritative.⁴ There has to be a central officer who announces the company's general strategy. In a profit-seeking enterprise, the primary strategy is to make a profit. The company's general rules and compensation schemes set the boundaries of profit-making efforts. These are announced and enforced by central management. Senior managers allow lower-echelon managers and salesmen to apply the general rules to specific cases, where central management does not have immediate access to local information.⁵

For the owners of a corporate enterprise to exercise legal sovereignty, managers must be under the control of the owners. Owners must be allowed to replace managers. In the case of public corporations, the owners are the shareholders. This is why it is important for business law to allow proxy fights and corporate take-overs. If the diversified owners of shares of the company are not allowed by existing management or the civil government to throw out the existing management, then their authority as owners is thwarted. Government regulations that prohibit "predatory corporate raiders" inevitably subsidize the existing managers, increasing their immunity from profit-seeking shareholders who would prefer to sell their shares at a profit to raiders, who in turn see ways of increasing the market value of the company's assets and shares.⁶

3. Even here, the Mosaic law divided national authority. Both a civil representative and then two priests had to blow the pair of trumpets: first the civil ruler, then the priests (Num. 10:2–9).

4. On the distinction between legal sovereignty and economic authority, see North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 25:B:1. Owners tell managers what to do; customers tell owners and managers if what was done was profitable.

5. Ludwig von Mises, Bureaucracy (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1944), pp. 31–36. (<http://bit.ly/MisesBUR>)

6. Henry G. Manne, Insider Trading and the Stock Market (New York: Free Press, 1966), ch. 11.

2. Customer Authority

In a free market economy, the ultimate institutional sovereign is collective: customers. Their individual decisions to buy or sell produce a collective result: an objective array of prices. Their decisions also produce profits or losses for specific sellers. So, final sovereignty in a free market is diffuse. The free market allows buyers and sellers to come together and make individual exchanges voluntarily. Because ownership is diffuse, sovereignty is diffuse. Because accurate knowledge is diffuse, ownership is diffuse, for people specialize in those productive services that they understand best and therefore possess a comparative advantage. The free market rewards the pooling of accurate knowledge through the price system. The competitive bidding of buyers against buyers and sellers against sellers produces an array of publicly available prices. These prices convey information to other buyers and sellers. They also convey motivation for sellers to meet the demands of customers on a cost-effective basis.

In a free market, the goals of asset owners are complex and shifting. The operations of a free market are not like a military campaign. In a military campaign, the goals of citizens are highly focused: the avoidance of defeat, preferably through victory. The narrow focus of this common goal mandates central planning by a supreme military commander. Military victory through the concentration of specific military forces is very different from economic victory, which comes mainly through the pooling of highly diffused knowledge—the most expensive economic resource—through a system of rewards and punishments, i.e., profit and loss.

In a free market, the customers are a multitude of counsellors. Sellers must meet customer demand profitably, or else they will go out of business. The counsellors possess legal authority: the legal right to buy or refrain from buying. They also possess economic authority: they own an asset (money) that they can use to buy other assets. The opinions of these counsellors can be ignored by sellers, but always at a price: reduced sales, reduced income. Thus, senior decision-makers in profit-seeking firms must take seriously the opinions of customers, whose counsel has money attached to it.

The Bible exhorts decision-makers to seek a multitude of counsellors. In economic affairs, this means that they must seek out representatives whose opinions reflect the opinions of the customers. This is why statistical sampling techniques are widely used by businesses. This is also why such techniques are used by politicians seeking election in a democracy.

In a free society, the counsellors are sovereign, either as customers or voters. They bring sanctions, both positive and negative, through money or votes. Decision-makers must pay attention to counsellors when the counsellors are armed with such sanctions. The counsellors possess lawful authority. In the free market, as in a representative democracy, the biblical principle of a multitude of counsellors is greatly honored through appropriate systems of sanctions.

In an unfree society, central planners strip customers and voters of any meaningful authority. The result is always the same: reduced wealth. This is why socialism always impoverishes all but the senior politicians and their favored counsellors. After the fall of Communism in the late 1980s in Eastern Europe and in the USSR in 1991, citizens of the formerly Marxist tyrannies learned just how far behind the capitalist West they had been. Their richest leaders were poor by comparison to the West's middle class, a fact that the leaders had learned at the 1980 Olympics, which were held in Moscow. Visitors from the West were visibly far richer than the Soviet tyrants. This huge disparity of wealth could no longer be easily ignored in the USSR. The Communist leaders' wealth was a joke; they were being laughed at by the West. The West's political conservatives could dismiss the USSR as nothing more than "Bangladesh with missiles."⁷ This condescension by the West broke the tyrants' confidence in the benefits the Communist system had produced for them. Within a decade, European Communism was abandoned in a series of bloodless coups. European Communist parties changed their names.

Western college professors were the last to learn. As late as 1989, the world's most popular college-level economics textbook still asserted: "The Soviet economy is proof that, contrary to what many skeptics had earlier believed, a socialist command economy can function and even thrive."⁸ Within two years, the Soviet Union no longer existed. It visibly collapsed economically in 1989 and politically in December of 1991.

7. Richard Grenier's phrase.

8. Paul A. Samuelson and William D. Nordhaus, Economics, 13th ed. (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1989), p. 837. Cited in Mark Skousen, Economics on Trial (Homewood, Illinois: Business One Irwin, 1991), p. 214.

Conclusion

God was Israel's strategist. Moses was His mouthpiece, His chief of staff. When the spies attempted to replace God's strategy with their own, they became rebellious. They attempted to usurp a degree of authority that did not belong to them. Rather than remaining content with gathering information useful in the implementation of God's strategy, they tried to replace that strategy. He brought judgment against them individually and against the nation that consented to their report. The 10 spies died immediately; the generation died off, one by one, over the next four decades.

Devising a strategy is not a project for a committee. A committee articulates long-term goals and rules. It then delegates authority to hired senior managers, the strategists. A strategist is wise to consult committees and people with expert knowledge, but the vision and integration required for a successful strategy are not provided by committees. Those who make up a committee are not individually responsible for the outcome of a strategy to the degree that a supreme commander is. To match personal responsibility with strategy, a society or an organization must place one person in charge. Two captains of equal rank cannot successfully command a military unit. Two admirals cannot direct a ship. The centralization of strategic authority is inevitable. Committees can veto strategies; they cannot design them. Hierarchy is visible and legal in a military chain of command.

In a free society, wise rulers seek out counsellors who reflect the opinions of citizens and customers, who exercise control through the authority to impose sanctions: votes or money. This is what public opinion polls and market research are all about: seeking out representative counsellors who can serve as surrogates for the society's final counsellors, the people. In an unfree society, rulers strip the people of the authority to impose meaningful sanctions. God brings such societies under judgment. He strips economic planners of the ability to gain accurate information.⁹ The citizens of such societies withhold accurate information and their productive efforts from the rulers. The familiar phrase of workers in Soviet Russia is representative: "The government pretends to pay us, and we pretend to work."

9. Ludwig von Mises, "Economic Calculation in the Socialist Commonwealth" (1920), in F. A. Hayek (ed.), Socialist Economic Planning (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, [1935] 1963), ch. 3. This is posted on-line: <http://www.mises.org/econcalc.asp>.

6

THE SKILLS OF FOREIGN TRADE

And command thou the people, saying, Ye are to pass through the coast of your brethren the children of Esau, which dwell in Seir; and they shall be afraid of you: take ye good heed unto yourselves therefore: Meddle not with them; for I will not give you of their land, no, not so much as a footbreadth; because I have given mount Seir unto Esau for a possession. Ye shall buy meat of them for money, that ye may eat; and ye shall also buy water of them for money, that ye may drink (Deut. 2:4–6).

The theocentric principle of this law is God as the sovereign Owner who allocates national lands as He sees fit.

A. Honoring Boundaries

Boundaries are associated with point three of the biblical covenant model.¹ The eighth commandment—third in the list of five kingly commandments (6–10)²—prohibits theft.³ Why is this law governing trade placed in the section of Deuteronomy associated with point two: hierarchy? The answer is the doctrine of representation. Covenantal boundaries are an aspect of delegated authority. The steward is under God's authority. Ownership is an aspect of stewardship. The prohibition against theft is an aspect of the hierarchical nature of ownership.

Stealing from man is representative of stealing from God. This law has to do with fear: the fear of brotherly nations. This fear could become the basis of tyranny: theft.

What God commands in this passage is not hierarchy but trade.

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012).

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), Preface.

3. Ibid., ch. 28.

Trade is a relationship between legal equals: each party possesses legal authority over his property. Trade is a relationship between economic equals: each participant possesses what the other desires.

This land law⁴ regarding Israel's wilderness wandering was based on a broader principle of justice: the prohibition against theft. Israel was told not to seek another inheritance besides the land of Canaan. Esau's land was listed as off-limits; so was Moab's (v. 9). Israel had no legal claim to any other nation's inheritance besides Canaan's. To have set their eyes on any land but Canaan would have been a violation of the tenth commandment, the command against covetousness.

God told them to buy meat and drink with money. They had been given money by the Egyptians. Israel had gained the inheritance of many of Egypt's firstborn sons, who had all perished on Passover night. Israel had been capitalized by the Egyptians, who had illegally held them in bondage. Even after the capital losses imposed by Moses after the golden calf incident (Ex. 32:20), Israelites still had money.

Money has been defined as the most marketable commodity.⁵ It has the widest market of all commodities. Wherever men go, there are other men who want to exchange more specialized goods and services for money, the least specialized good. Money is the most liquid asset. This means that it can be exchanged for other valuable assets rapidly without advertising costs and with no discount.

Money is an ideal form of wealth for men on the move. It is readily transportable, easily divisible, and has a high value in relation to its volume and weight. Money was what Israel needed for a 40-year march through the wilderness. Had there been no other nations to trade with, money would have done the Israelites far less good, since men cannot eat money. But men can surely eat the things that money can buy, and there were many cultures along Israel's journey with one thing in common: a desire for more money.

B. Voluntary Trade

Because the Israelites had money, they had the option of trading with those foreigners along the way who had meat and drink for sale. In the wilderness, meat and drink were in short supply. The Israelites possessed money, but they could not eat their money. On the other hand, the nations they passed by had meat and drink. Pre-exodus Egypt had been the richest kingdom in the region around Sinai. Now the Israelites possessed much of the transportable wealth of Egypt. A series of mutually profitable exchanges became possible. The nations had what Israelites wanted, and vice versa.

4. On land laws, see Appendix J.

5. Ludwig von Mises, The Theory of Money and Credit, 2nd ed. (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1953), p. 32. (<http://bit.ly/MisesTMC>) The first German edition was published in 1912.

The Israelites possessed an advantage: the nations were afraid of them (Deut. 2:4). Israel had just defeated Egypt. They had crossed the Red Sea miraculously. This was a demonstration of supernatural power that threw fear into the hearts of the Edomites. But God warned Israel not to use force to extract wealth from Edom. He told them to be peaceable people, for other nations lawfully possessed their own inheritances. There were legal boundaries around their possessions.

This made trade a major source of increased wealth for the Israelites. Israelites would give up money, which was of low value to them, in exchange for meat and drink, which were of high value to them. Giving up money for consumer goods meant the de-capitalization of Israel's distant future. But men live in the present; they must eat and drink in the present. God allowed them to make the decision: money as part of the inheritance for the next generation vs. meat and drink in the present.

Israelites were not to place their hope in money. They were also not to place their hope in military conquest, other than in or around the land of Canaan. So, with respect to portable wealth, those who gave up money for meat and drink were more present-oriented than those Israelites who refused to trade. They became spenders rather than savers. They valued the pleasures of meat and drink more than they valued their money. They knew that the next generation would conquer Canaan. At that future point, the spoils of Egypt would be rendered relatively less valuable. It was productive real estate that would then be valuable, for it would produce wealth for the whole nation.

The spoils of Egypt became the means of immediate gratification for some Israelites. The value to them of meat and drink in the present far outweighed the discounted future value of money. Money could not be invested at high rates of return by a nation wandering in the wilderness. It would not compound for entrepreneurs. The Israelites of the exodus generation knew they would not be allowed to conduct exchange with Canaanites inside the Promised Land. They were to replace the Canaanites, not enter into economic arrangements with them. What good was money to them in the wilderness? It was either a means of buying pleasure in the present or a means of transferring an inheritance to their children. But their children had been guaranteed an inheritance in Canaan. So, why not spend money?

This raises an important issue for economic theory. Is mankind consumption-driven or production-driven? Should consumption or production be the central issue of economic theory? Virtually all humanistic schools of economic opinion say that the goal of production is consumption, either immediate consumption or consumption in the distant future. This is the doctrine of customers' authority.

It is my contention that biblical economics places production, not consumption, at the center of covenant-keeping motivation. This is because biblical society is value-added society. To add economic value requires thrift, entrepreneurship, and improved technology. The biblical goal of production is mandatory for the extension of the kingdom of God in history. Consumption is legitimate. So is celebration. The tithe of celebration was required in Mosaic Israel (Deut. 14:22–29).⁶ Nevertheless, increased production is to be the primary motivation of the covenant-keeper. Biblical economics is supply-side economics in the broadest sense. Thrift is therefore a moral obligation.

The Israelites who understood this would have restricted their consumption for the sake of adding to their children's inheritance: gold and silver. Long-term conquest requires an intergenerational transfer of wealth. Compound interest makes itself felt as time goes on. The longer the period of growth, the less dependent on the rate of growth is the investor. The covenant-keeping investor is told to think generationally. He is to provide capital in the broadest sense for his children. This capital includes future-orientation, meaning low time preference. Low time preference means a low rate of discount applied to streams of expected future income. It means low interest rates.⁷

Money was less valuable than meat and water in the value scales of some members of the exodus generation. Meat and water were less valuable to some Edomites than money. Because each participant in an exchange values what the other has more than what he has, both of them can increase their satisfaction by a voluntary exchange. God told Moses to instruct the nation that from now on, and for the next four decades, voluntary exchange would be the only lawful avenue of their wealth-generating activities with other societies. They had to learn to prosper through peaceful exchange. Violence should not become a means of increasing the nation's wealth.

6. Chapter 34.

7. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. 19. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

This set a pattern for post-conquest relations with the nations around Israel. Israel restrained itself when it possessed what appeared to be a military advantage. Israel would not have retained an advantage, had they violated the boundaries that God had placed around the nations, but the nations did not know this. Israel had to rely on trade to get what people wanted. This must have made an impression on the nations in the region. If anyone wanted access to the wealth of Israel, he could gain it by offering an Israelite an advantage. The Israelites were ready to trade. They were not in the empire-building business. They were in the “let's make a deal” business.

This pressured all wealth-seeking Israelites to become skilled bargainers. They could not rely on military force to gain what they wanted. They had to learn self-restraint. Weak nations must do this of necessity. Strong nations are wise to do this. The example of Switzerland is over five centuries old. That nation displays a ferocious determination to defend its territory from military invasion, yet it displays complete neutrality outside its borders. It is an armed camp internally and a disarmed sales force externally. A banker defends his bank's vault. He also makes visitors welcome when they come to deposit money or borrow at rates profitable to the bank. Switzerland has become the banker for the world's central banks.⁸

C. A Matter of Positioning

Israel gained a reputation in the wilderness for trading rather than fighting. This was probably what lured Arad, Sihon, and Og into suicidal attacks on Israel just prior to the conquest of Canaan. Those powerful kings assumed that trade-seeking Israel could not defend herself. They were wrong. Israel was about to become the most battle-hardened military force in the region. But for almost four decades, Israel had positioned herself as a non-violent trading nation, a wandering people without a home base. Trading nations that gain the reputation of being unwilling to fight become vulnerable to aggressive nations that prefer conquest to trade.⁹ This was not Israel's condition, but it appeared to be Israel's condition immediately prior to the first

8. The Bank for International Settlements is headquartered in Basle, Switzerland. This is the central banks' clearing house.

9. This is why Switzerland has had to maintain itself as an armed camp to defend its autonomy and neutrality. The Swiss avoid a reputation for softness.

battles of the conquest.

After the conquest, Israel allowed foreigners to live inside her borders. The rule of law did not discriminate against foreigners who lived inside non-Levitical walled cities. They could buy and sell homes and leave an inheritance to their children (Lev. 25:29–30). Furthermore, one law governed all traders (Ex. 12:49).¹⁰ This was unheard of in the ancient Near East. In all other societies, the cities' gods were local. If you did not have legal access to the religious rites of these local gods, you had no legal standing. These rites excluded foreigners and women.¹¹ But Israel's God was a cosmic God. His transcendent authority was not dependent on geography. So, Israel became a place where all people could seek freedom from arbitrary civil government and legal protection for their property.

This positioned Israel as a trading nation. Israel welcomed traders as no other Near Eastern nation did. But this positioning had begun prior to the conquest. When Israel had no homeland, she sought no nation's wealth through conquest. Similarly, when Israel gained a homeland, she was commanded by God to seek no foreign national's wealth through oppression. In both instances, Israel gained wealth through trade. Israel extended the division of labor by abandoning force. She tempted the best and the brightest wealth-seekers from other societies to share their skills and information voluntarily through trade.

Israel for centuries was a nation located on important trade routes. With access to the Mediterranean, Israel was one of a handful of neutral trading nations that operated outside of the jurisdiction of the great land-based empires: Egyptian, Hittite, and Babylonian.¹² But a successful trade route is more than a matter of geography. It is also a matter of legal protection. From its days in the wilderness, Israel began building its reputation as a nation conducive to foreign trade. Revere writes of the coastal trade city:

Its main function was to guarantee neutrality. Continuity of the supply of goods was essential, since it could not be expected that traders

10. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 14.

11. Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955), Book II, Chapter VIII.

12. Robert B. Revere, "'No Man's Coast': Ports of Trade in the Eastern Mediterranean," in Trade and Market in the Early Empires: Economies in History and Theory, eds. Karl Polanyi, Conrad M. Arensberg, and Harry W. Peterson (Chicago: Regnery, [1957] 1971), ch. 4.

—under the difficult conditions of archaic long distance travel—would come to an outlying place unless they knew for certain that a safe exchange of goods was possible. The presence of a strong military power on the spot would unfailingly frighten them away. Political neutrality, guarantee of supplies, protection of the lives and property of strangers had to be assured before trade could start. A prior understanding between the corporate parties was therefore needed, usually based on regular treaties. Such an understanding, no doubt, would include facilities for disembarking, lading, portage, storage, grading of goods and the fixing of equivalencies backed by the coastal authority. Without this mechanism of the port of trade, there could be no regular trading.¹³

God's prohibition against the multiplication of horses by the king was unquestionably part of this arrangement (Deut. 17:16). The presence of a large offensive army—an army with chariots or cavalry—would send mixed signals to the land-based empires that used the coastal port cities as foreign trade centers. A safe, innocuous coastal nation was not bothered by the great empires until well into the eighth century B.C., when Assyria began its conquests.¹⁴ The empires avoided establishing cities in the coastal areas, possibly because trading cities might have opened these closed societies to new ideas and an uncontrolled wealth. Foreigners were kept at a distance through the use of neutral coastal ports and state-authorized caravans to and from those ports.

Positioning is important in establishing a market. When men think of a particular good or service, they think of the product, company, or nation that supplies the best known (best positioned) item. Israel's positioning under God's law was as a nation where trade brought wealth to all market participants, including foreigners. Wealth flows into those nations in which property is protected and contracts are enforced impartially. God established "no trespassing" boundaries around other nations' assets as well as neighbors' assets. When it came to protecting private property, with the exceptions of rural land and the homes of Levites in Levitical cities (Lev. 25:32–33), "otherhood" in Israel was not different judicially than "brotherhood." This judicial condition is the mark of a trading nation.

13. Ibid., p. 52. Mosaic law was adamant about the evil of false weights and measures (Lev. 19:35–36; Deut. 25:13; 25:15; Prov. 11:1; Prov. 20:23).

14. Ibid., p. 58.

Conclusion

From the beginning of their wandering in the wilderness, the Israelites knew that they were not allowed to take land from the non-Amorite cities in the region. Those cities were the lawful possession of others. God honored the property rights of other nations that worshipped false gods. Even though these nations were afraid of Israel, they were not to be exploited. Israel was not to take advantage of them. Instead, the Israelites were told to trade for whatever they wanted from those nations. Voluntarism rather than military strength was to be the basis of gaining ownership of other nations' goods.

This was supposed to set the pattern for Israel's future economic dealings with foreign nations. Without the threat of violence facing them, other nations would come to regard Israel as a place to do business. If they wanted to benefit from Israel's productivity, they could bargain with Israelites. Without fear of confiscation, they could bring something valuable into Israel in search of a trading partner. Their property would be protected by Israelite law and custom. This safe haven for private property irrespective of national origin would make Israel a cross-roads for profit-seeking foreign traders. Egyptians could seek out Israelites or Babylonians or Hittites to do business. Israel could become one of the neutral, independent, coastal nations that served the great empires as common centers of trade.

God would soon give Israel the geographical location that could make the nation a foreign trade center. But first, He imposed a law that favored foreign nations: the protection of their property. By honoring this law prior to the conquest of Canaan, Israel would mark itself as a nation where private property was safe. Israel would become known as a trading nation rather than an aggressor nation. This reputation would position Israel as a regional trade center, bringing income from foreign traders seeking opportunities. This was part of God's program of foreign missions through law: "Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day?" (Deut. 4:6–8).¹⁵

15. Chapter 8.

TRANSFERRING THE INHERITANCE

Get thee up into the top of Pisgah, and lift up thine eyes westward, and northward, and southward, and eastward, and behold it with thine eyes: for thou shalt not go over this Jordan. But charge Joshua, and encourage him, and strengthen him: for he shall go over before this people, and he shall cause them to inherit the land which thou shalt see (Deut. 3:27–28).

God was about to ordain a new leader over Israel. As Lord of the cosmos, God possesses the authority to select His representatives. Representation is point two of the biblical covenant model: hierarchy/authority/representation.¹

A. Sanctions and Inheritance

God told Moses to be a mentor to Joshua in these last days of wilderness wandering. The older man would prepare the younger to take authority over the nation. This transfer of personal authority represented the coming transfer of the inheritance to Israel. Joshua would command Israel after Moses died. Only then would the actual transfer of land take place. God was about to remove the authority of Canaan over the land. Israel's task was to enforce this transfer of ownership. This was clearly a land law. More than this: it was a one-time land law in Israel's history.²

Moses asked God if God would allow him to go into the Promised Land (v. 25). God told him not to ask for this again (v. 26). Moses had been forbidden to cross over because he had struck the rock twice with the rod in order to call forth water, after God had told him to speak to the rock but not strike it (Num. 20:8, 11–12).³ This negative sanction against Moses was a prohibition against his participation in the inheritance. Moses had identified himself as a spiritual member of the exodus generation, a man who trusted more in signs and wonders than in the promises of God.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. On land laws, see Appendix J.

God's sanctions are the means of inheritance. Positive sanctions are inheritance sanctions; negative sanctions are disinheritance sanctions. The focus of sanctions, point four of the biblical covenant model, is point five: inheritance and disinheritance. Positive sanctions are given to covenant-breakers ultimately to increase the inheritance of covenant keepers. “A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children’s children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just” (Prov. 13:22).⁴ The New Heaven and New Earth are the eternal inheritance of the righteous (Rev. 21:1). The historical model for this final transfer of inheritance is the conquest of Canaan. The wealth created by covenant-breakers became the inheritance of covenant-keepers. “And it shall be, when the LORD thy God shall have brought thee into the land which he sware unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give thee great and goodly cities, which thou buildedst not, And houses full of all good things, which thou filledst not, and wells digged, which thou diggedst not, vineyards and olive trees, which thou plantedst not; when thou shalt have eaten and be full; Then beware lest thou forget the LORD, which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage” (Deut. 6:10–12).

Joshua inherited Moses’ mantle of authority. He replaced Moses in the civil hierarchy. This transfer of authority was the judicial basis of the fourth generation’s inheritance of Canaan.

B. Heirs and Inheritance

Covenant-breaking man is short of time. He has to earn a very high rate of return in order to accumulate vast wealth in one lifetime. He has to compound this wealth at rates that are abnormally high. This means that he must bear greater risks. He may lose all of his capital in a bad transaction. The second commandment states specifically that covenant-breakers exercise only a few generations of rule, while covenant-keepers extend and compound their rule for thousands of generations, i.e., permanently. “Thou shalt not make thee any graven image, or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the waters beneath the earth: Thou shalt not bow down thyself unto them, nor serve them: for I the LORD thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me, And shewing mercy unto thousands of them that love me and keep my commandments” (Deut. 5:8–10).

3. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 11.

4. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 41.

The covenant-keeper can rest content with ordinary rates of growth, for he believes that his heirs will continue the process. The goal of the covenant-keeper is steady expansion, year by year, generation by generation. The continuity provided by the covenant releases covenant-keepers from a frantic search for abnormally high rates of return. If each generation is faithful in building up the inheritance, and if each generation trains up a faithful generation, the compounding process brings success. It is more important to raise up a faithful, competent, future-oriented generation than to make high rates of return for one generation, only to see the next generation renounce the faith, inherit, and squander the legacy. This breaks the covenant and dissipates the inheritance.

Compound growth becomes negative because of covenantal rebellion (Deut. 28:38–40). This thwarts the compounding process. It sets the next generation back one or more generations. The threat of covenantal forgetfulness is always before us: “But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:18).⁵ So is the threat of negative returns: “And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God” (Deut. 8:19–20).⁶

God told the exodus generation that they would not inherit. This prophecy pressured that faithless generation to consider the future of their children. Only through their children would they participate in the inheritance. They could have participated in the conquest by transferring military leadership to their sons at the time they sent in the spies.⁷ This was not what that generation wanted. Even Moses wanted to escape this negative sanction. He wanted to walk into the Promised Land as the national leader. God did not allow it. His word was unbreakable. No member of that generation would inherit personally. The inheritance of the nation of Israel would be attained through the disinheritance of the exodus generation. Because the exodus generation refused to disinherit the Canaanites, God disinherited the exodus generation. The Canaanites enjoyed an extra generation of dominion over the land.

5. Chapter 21.

6. Chapter 22.

God told Moses to encourage Joshua. Joshua would lead the nation into Canaan. He would therefore replace Moses as the nation's prophetic leader. He would command God's holy army. He needed training, even at this late date. He needed a word of blessing. Moses, as the supreme commander, was uniquely able to provide this blessing. It was like the blessing of a patriarch to his son. This time, however, the inheritance would not be a bloodline inheritance, as had been true of patriarchy. It was a judicial inheritance based on personal confession: Joshua's confession before the council of spies. Joshua, not Moses' son, was the heir of the office of national prophet.

As Moses' successor, Joshua would have to lead as Moses had. He would have to exercise courage. He was the representative agent in the conquest. He had been such a representative at the council; now he would be the senior officer. He had demonstrated courage then; he would have to demonstrate it again. Moses had recently testified to God's omnipotence, at the very end of his career. "O Lord GOD, thou hast begun to shew thy servant thy greatness, and thy mighty hand: for what God is there in heaven or in earth, that can do according to thy works, and according to thy might?" (v. 24). It was this confession that Joshua needed to accept intellectually and internalize emotionally in his role as national leader. Through Joshua, the entire nation was duty-bound to accept it and act in terms of it. This testimony, if acted upon, would be the basis of their inheritance.

C. Courage Through Obedience

Shortly prior to his death, Moses gave this advice to Joshua: "Be strong and of a good courage: for thou must go with this people unto the land which the LORD hath sworn unto their fathers to give them; and thou shalt cause them to inherit it" (Deut. 31:7b). God repeated this to Joshua immediately prior to the crossing of the Jordan River:

7. Chapter 1.

Now after the death of Moses the servant of the LORD it came to pass, that the LORD spake unto Joshua the son of Nun, Moses' minister, saying, Moses my servant is dead; now therefore arise, go over this Jordan, thou, and all this people, unto the land which I do give to them, even to the children of Israel. Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon, that have I given unto you, as I said unto Moses. From the wilderness and this Lebanon even unto the great river, the river Euphrates, all the land of the Hittites, and unto the great sea toward the going down of the sun, shall be your coast. There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life: as I was with Moses, so I will be with thee: I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee. Be strong and of a good courage: for unto this people shalt thou divide for an inheritance the land, which I swore unto their fathers to give them. Only be thou strong and very courageous, that thou mayest observe to do according to all the law, which Moses my servant commanded thee: turn not from it to the right hand or to the left, that thou mayest prosper whithersoever thou goest. This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein: for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success. Have not I commanded thee? Be strong and of a good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed: for the LORD thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest (Josh. 1:1–9).

This more detailed version of Moses' instructions made it clear that the basis of Joshua's courage would be his commitment to the law of God. As the national leader, it was his task to read the law daily and meditate on it. The law was not to depart out of his mouth; that is, his words of judgment (point four) were always to be grounded in the law (point three). The basis of the inheritance (point five) would be their adherence to the law. If they ever departed from the law, they would forfeit their inheritance.

Thou shalt betroth a wife, and another man shall lie with her: thou shalt build an house, and thou shalt not dwell therein: thou shalt plant a vineyard, and shalt not gather the grapes thereof. Thine ox shall be slain before thine eyes, and thou shalt not eat thereof: thine ass shall be violently taken away from before thy face, and shall not be restored to thee: thy sheep shall be given unto thine enemies, and thou shalt have none to rescue them. Thy sons and thy daughters shall be given unto another people, and thine eyes shall look, and fail with longing for them all the day long; and there shall be no might in thine hand. The fruit of thy land, and all thy labours, shall a nation which thou knowest not eat up; and thou shalt be only oppressed and crushed away (Deut. 28:30–33).

Courage is a product of covenantal faithfulness. Without covenantal faithfulness, courage will depart: “In the morning thou shalt say, Would God it were even! and at even thou shalt say, Would God it were morning! for the fear of thine heart wherewith thou shalt fear, and for the sight of thine eyes which thou shalt see” (Deut. 28:67). Courage increases, or should increase, when men experience victories. That is, when they gain positive sanctions or, in wartime, inflict negative sanctions, they grow more confident. But if they refuse to trust God as the source of their victories, two unpleasant things can result: (1) cowardice because they do not trust God to deliver their enemies into their hands as He has in the past, and (2) defeat through overconfidence in their own power. Israel in the wilderness suffered from both afflictions: cowardice after the spies’ report and overconfidence immediately thereafter, when they attacked Amalek against God’s express command (Num. 13).

When God instructed Moses to build up Joshua’s courage, He was telling Moses to relate the whole law to Joshua and the nation. The Book of Deuteronomy is Moses’ response to God’s command. The recapitulation of the law ends with Moses’ final words to Joshua (Deut. 31:23). The law would serve Israel as the basis of the inheritance. Through the Mosaic law, Israel would maintain the kingdom grant from God.⁸ Grace precedes the law. The promise to Abraham preceded the kingdom grant. “For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise” (Gal. 3:18). But Israel could not retain this grant if she violated God’s law. “Now therefore hearken, O Israel, unto the statutes and unto the judgments, which I teach you, for to do them, that ye may live, and go in and possess the land which the LORD God of your fathers giveth you. Ye shall not add unto the word which I command you, neither shall ye diminish ought from it, that ye may keep the commandments of the LORD your God which I command you” (Deut. 4:1–2).

8. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), Introduction, Section E.

Conclusion

The exodus generation had never been promised the inheritance. They were all disinherited at the time of the council of spies. This negative sanction transferred the inheritance to their children. The parents would not enjoy the fruits of military victory. They preferred fruits without risk. They lost their inheritance.

God required courage from the next generation. They could not be risk-avoiders and also heirs. Under Joshua, they were courageous, though not enough to drive all of the Canaanites out of the land. “As for the Jebusites the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the children of Judah could not drive them out: but the Jebusites dwell with the children of Judah at Jerusalem unto this day” (Josh. 15:63; cf. 17:12–13). As a result, God ceased to support them militarily. Just before his death, Joshua announced: “Know for a certainty that the LORD your God will no more drive out any of these nations from before you; but they shall be snares and traps unto you, and scourges in your sides, and thorns in your eyes, until ye perish from off this good land which the LORD your God hath given you” (Josh. 23:13). This was an announcement of disinheritance, in contrast to Moses’ prophecy of inheritance at the time of his death. Joshua’s prophecy was fulfilled partially at the time of the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities. It was fulfilled completely in A.D. 70.

What the nation learned at the captivity was that courage and obedience are linked. They could not maintain their courage apart from obedience. Without courage, they would eventually surrender the inheritance. Without obedience, they would lose their courage.

8

EVANGELISM THROUGH LAW

Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it. Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day? (Deut. 4:5–8).

The theocentric principle undergirding this law is God as the Law-giver. He declares His law through representatives: God > Moses > Israel > nations.

A. Unique Among the Nations

Why is this law in the section of Deuteronomy that is related to point two? What has hierarchy got to do with this? Answer: Israel was God's representative nation among all other nations. Israel was supposed to become the model nation.

Moses, as the representative of God before Israel and Israel's representation before God, here announced a principle of dominion: the power of biblical law in reducing foreigners' resistance to Israel. Israel's reputation would be elevated above that of other nations to the extent that other nations acknowledged the legitimacy of God's law, which they would do, Moses said. Israel, as the nation that was governed by biblical law, would become pre-eminent among the nations—not politically, but in terms of its moral influence. Israel's reputation would accompany individual Israelites. This reputation would confer an advantage on the nation's foreign representatives. They would be seen as agents of the most just God. In this sense, Israel's authority was moral. It was based on God's law. Israel's authority was to be based on a hierarchy of righteousness. Israel would represent God to the nations.

This was a land law insofar as Israel had to obey it. It was a cross-boundary law insofar as foreign nations were required by God to acknowledge the wisdom of biblical law. Clearly, it was primarily a cross-boundary law.¹ It had to do with the universal wisdom of biblical law.

God expected foreign nations to hear of His law. How could this take place? Why should foreigners care anything about the laws governing a small nation like Israel? Normally, foreigners had little incentive to learn about the laws of a foreign nation. But two groups would pay attention: foreign traders and political representatives of foreign nations. Traders especially would pay attention, since their capital was at risk while inside the boundaries of a foreign nation. Foreigners normally had no legal standing in any nation of the ancient world, for they could not participate in the rites of the city's local gods. But in Israel, a cosmic God had announced that every foreigner had legal standing in the search for justice: "One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you" (Ex. 12:49).² A foreigner who had been cheated by an Israelite could bring the cheater before a civil court.

Israel would become a center of trade to the extent that judges enforced God's law. This would bring foreigners into Israel, either as short-term opportunity-seekers [nokree] or as permanent residents [geyr]. The story would have spread rapidly: how property was safe in Israel, how courts treated all men the same, and how oppression of foreigners was a violation of the civil law. Such a legal order was unheard of in the ancient world.

B. Justice Is a Universal Goal

There are many definitions of justice, but rare is the nation that formally denies the legitimacy of justice. Men seek justice, often with greater fervor than they seek money. They regard justice as one of society's major goals. They want to live under a civil government that offers justice.

God revealed that the nations would respect His law. They would

1. On these Mosaic legal categories, see Appendix J.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012) Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 14.

recognize that the Mosaic law was a great legal order that reflected a great God. Israel, as God's unique national representative, would bask in the sunlight of God's justice. But how could this be if all men have fundamentally different concepts of justice? The very possibility of other nations' honoring God by acknowledging the justice of Israel's legal order points to the existence of common elements of justice that cross borders and eras. God places in the heart (conscience) of every man the work of the law—not the law itself (Heb. 8:10), but the work of the law (Rom. 2:14–15).³ This knowledge is suppressed by covenant-breaking men in the final stages of their rebellion (Rom. 1:18–22), but it is part of every person's legacy as a human.⁴ The work of the law is in every person's heart. But covenant-breakers' active suppression of this revelation is why every appeal to the authority of a universal logic or ethic is doomed. The work of the law is innate to man, but no logical system that presupposes the sovereignty of man's mind can logically come to a belief in the sovereignty of God. Thus, every attempt to invoke natural law theory as the basis of long-term social order is biblically spurious. A covenant-breaking man's knowledge of the work of the law is held innately, not logically. It is suppressed actively, not passively. His knowledge condemns him eternally, and at best allows him to prosper for a time prior to his rebellion against the truth. The positive sanctions covenantally connected to men's external conformity to the work of the law eventually undermine the ethical rebel's sense of autonomy, which in turn leads him into external rebellion, just as God's blessings on Sodom and Canaan did. Conformity to "natural law"—the work of the law in men's hearts—will bless covenant-breaking men temporarily, but in blessing them, it eventually condemns them or their heirs in history. It cannot bring them to a knowledge of the truth. We are not saved by law. Neither are societies.

Most Protestant theologians have insisted that this is the case with respect to individuals, but they have denied that this insight applies to society. Lutherans have been most forthright in this inconsistency. Luther's two-kingdoms theory rested on his theory of two radically distinct forms of law: spiritual law governing Christians and natural law governing societies.⁵ He had no theory of Christian law for Christian societies, for his amillennial eschatology denied the possibility of a Christian society in history.

3. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: [2000] 2012), ch. 4. Cf. John Murray, The Epistle to the Romans, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1965), I, pp. 74–76.

4. Ibid., ch. 3.

5. Charles Trinkaus, "The Religious Foundations of Luther's Social Views," in John H. Mundy, et al., Essays in Medieval Life (Cheshire, Connecticut: Biblo & Tannen,

To the extent that Christians have shared Luther's eschatology and his social theory, they have adopted his ethical dualism. Every Christian theologian or social theorist who invokes natural law theory is an ethical dualist. Some are quite forthright about this; others are not. But we should recognize the covenantal confession of the ethical dualist whenever we come across it: a denial that the law-order revealed in the Mosaic law is in any way binding on societies and civil governments today. The more adamant dualists argue that Christians can live under any legal order without compromising their faith, with only one exception: biblical civil law. Every legal order is permitted except the only one which God ever commanded: biblical civil law. In the social theory of the hard-core Christian ethical dualist, all civil legal orders are equal, but one is less equal than others: biblical civil law.

Covenant-keeping men can and do depart from the proclamation of, and adherence to, biblical law. This is why Israel was warned: "Only take heed to thyself, and keep thy soul diligently, lest thou forget the things which thine eyes have seen, and lest they depart from thy heart all the days of thy life: but teach them thy sons, and thy sons' sons" (Deut. 4:9). Covenant-breakers cannot completely suppress their knowledge of what God expects from them. It means that they refuse to obey the things that they know to be true. Their consciences become seared (I Tim. 4:2).

The power of Israel's testimony to the nations would be the fact that Israel's civil courts would not misuse their power to impose unjust decisions on foreigners. As in the case of Israel's time in the wilderness, when God restrained them from confiscating the inheritances of other nations (Deut. 2:4–6),⁶ so would God's restraint of unjust judges provide a unique testimony. Foreigners who lived in fear of injustice in other nations would be able to live in peace in Israel. The power of Israel's judicial testimony would be great because it was granted freely to the weak. In Israel, the three representative groups that were singled out as deserving of special judicial scrutiny, lest oppression raise its head, were widows, orphans, and strangers. "Cursed be he that perverteth the judgment of the stranger, fatherless, and widow. And all the people shall say, Amen" (Deut. 27:19; cf. Deut. 14:29; 24:17, 19–20).

1955), pp. 71–87.

6. Chapter 6.

C. Increased Trade, Increased Evangelism

When a minority group without power is protected by law, members of that group spread the word. Such were strangers in Israel. When Israelite traders came into a foreign nation whose agents traded regularly in Israel, they would probably have received special consideration from the local sellers, despite the fact that the local courts granted no special consideration to foreigners. There is a tendency for good deeds to be repaid by those who seek a continuing profitable relationship. In this sense, Israel was in a position to set the judicial agenda outside of its own borders. Its testimony to the otherwise oppressed would have strengthened God's hand, and the hand of God's agents, in nations whose representatives had been treated well in Israel.

The great empires of the first millennium B.C. did not establish jurisdiction over port cities on the coasts. They allowed these cities to operate under local jurisdictions.⁷ This indicates that the rulers understood the power of foreign ideas. The major clearing center for new ideas was a port city. Here men gathered from many nations, selling many wares, and telling stories of many gods. But one God, above all others, was a threat to the sovereignty of a host nation's gods: Israel's. This God claimed a universal reign irrespective of geography. To make this claim believable, Israel was required to enforce God's law fairly and without discrimination against foreigners. All men are the same under God. His rule extends to all men.

The question arises: How important was world trade in the ancient world? The modern historian assumes cultural evolution. He assumes that modern ships alone have made world trade possible. Prior to medieval times, he assumes, trade was limited to the Mediterranean Sea, expensive and infrequent land journeys, and coastal shipping. This assumption is incorrect. World trade has brought contacts between distant cultures for millennia. Only in the second half of the twentieth century has the extent of this trade become visible to a handful of specialists. The academic world dismisses the evidence because the evidence calls into question the long-held assumptions about the technological accomplishments of pre-modern societies.⁸

7. Robert B. Revere, "No Man's Coast': Ports of Trade in the Eastern Mediterranean," in Trade and Market in the Early Empires: Economies in History and Theory, eds. Karl Polanyi, Conrad M. Arensberg, and Harry W. Peterson (Chicago: Regnery, [1957] 1971), ch. 4.

8. I survey this generally suppressed historical evidence in Boundaries and Domin-

Conclusion

The Mosaic law was to serve Israel as a means of worldwide evangelism. Someone carved the Ten Commandments into a boulder in New Mexico in the days of Jesus or earlier. Some Israelite understood the truth of Deuteronomy's assertion that the law of God is a powerful tool of evangelism. Oppressed men respond well to civil justice.

The civil law of God was simple enough for traders and resident aliens to learn. They would know their rights before God. Their chief civil right in Israel was equality before the law. This was a unique right in the ancient world, where civil rights were tied to civil rites. Foreigners had no civil rites in the ancient city-states, so they had no civil rights. This was not so in Mosaic Israel.

One of the self-inflicted wounds of modern Christianity is Christians' denial of the continuing validity of biblical law in New Testament times. They have stripped the church of one of its premier tools of evangelism: the proclamation of universal justice. God has given them their request—a world not under God's Bible-revealed covenantal law—and has thereby brought them under the rule of covenant-breakers.

9

HEAR, FEAR, AND TESTIFY

Only take heed to thyself, and keep thy soul diligently, lest thou forget the things which thine eyes have seen, and lest they depart from thy heart all the days of thy life: but teach them thy sons, and thy sons' sons; Specially the day that thou stoodest before the LORD thy God in Horeb, when the LORD said unto me, Gather me the people together, and I will make them hear my words, that they may learn to fear me all the days that they shall live upon the earth, and that they may teach their children (Deut. 4:9–10).

The theocentric basis of this law is the fear of God, who brings sanctions. This is the beginning of wisdom (Ps. 111:10).

A. A Family Inheritance

As covenantal agents of God, fathers were required to teach their sons and grandsons the law of God. The family's hierarchy was to extend Israel's national covenant into the future. This was not a seed law in the sense of a tribal law.¹ It was an affirmation of the covenant in the life of Israel. It is a universal law that is to govern covenant-keeping fathers throughout history. Only when God is no longer to be feared does this law cease in history, "that they may learn to fear me all the days that they shall live upon the earth."

Moses spoke these words to people who could remember the giving of the law. Through their parents' oath of allegiance to God, they had participated in the sealing of the covenant at Sinai-Horeb (Ex. 19), immediately prior to God's giving of the Ten Commandments (Ex. 20). Moses warned them not to forget, and to tell what they had seen to their children and grandchildren.

The threat to Israel was a break in this verbal inheritance. There was a risk that their memories of this covenantal event might depart from Israel. But how? Through a failure to tell this story. The focus of this warning was not primarily individual; it was corporate. Old people remember the events of their youth even when they forget their own names. The memory spoken of here was corporate memory, i.e., the transmission of the story. If this story should ever depart out of the nation's corporate heart, it would no longer define Israel. It would no longer motivate them to fear God and obey Him.

1. On seed laws, see Appendix J.

The transmission of Israel's inheritance rested on the telling of this story. Here, Passover was not the focus; the giving of the law was. Passover was to remind them of the great deliverance from Egypt, which Moses called the iron furnace (Deut. 4:20). But the story of the giving of the law was equally important. It was not just that God had delivered them out of bondage; it was that He had also delivered to them His law. The events surrounding the covenantal meeting between God and Israel at Mt. Horeb had to be repeated to the next generation. They had heard God (v. 12). They were not eyewitnesses to God; they were earwitnesses to God. They were required to pass on this story just as they had received it: verbally.

B. Hearing Is Believing

Modern man has a phrase, "Seeing is believing." The technology of photography launched a new era. Men could at last record faithful images of what they had seen. This elevated the eye to a position of authority that it had enjoyed only in trials, where witnesses had to confirm the event. The photograph replaced one of the witnesses. But this legal authority as a witness is about to depart unless modern computer technology is reversed. The technology of digital imaging is going to make possible the altering of photographic images to such an extent that seeing will no longer be believing.²

The rise of modern science is generally explained in terms of the rise of experimentation. Only that which can be measured is said to be scientifically valid. The repeatability of an experiment is the source of its validity: other scientists can see the same results. But the description of these experiments is always conveyed verbally. Words must accompany the images and mathematical formulas in order for others to understand the procedures and repeat them. Never has seeing been believing except for the individual who saw. To transmit a description of what he saw to others requires more than images. It requires words. The images confirm the words. Images do not speak for themselves. Facts do not stand alone. Facts are never brute facts; they are always interpreted facts.³

2. The immensely popular 1994 movie, Forrest Gump, brought to the screen mixed images of old newsreels and a modern actor. Several of these mixed images looked real. Similar image mixing had already been used by television advertisers.

This does not mean that seeing is irrelevant. I think of the scene in a Marx brothers skit where Groucho is discovered in the arms of some young woman. "What are you going to believe," he asks the intruder, "me or your own eyes?" Eyes are a valid source of information, but there is always an interaction between sight and interpretation. The persuasive power of belief and habit is usually greater than the power of sight. The Israelites saw the Red Sea open before them; then they crossed over dry land; then they saw the water close over the Pharaoh's army. Still, they soon ceased to believe that this unified event was in any way relevant for their new trials. Seeing was believing, but what Israel believed was highly restricted through their lack of faith. Seeing lasts only for a moment; then memory takes over—memory filtered by faith.

Hearing is repetitive. For those who did not see, as well as for those who saw but never learned the lesson, hearing is the dominant mode of communication.⁴

There is a strong ethical element in the Hebrew verb "to hear." The word for "hear" in Hebrew is the same as the word for "obey": shawmah. "As soon as they hear of me, they shall obey me: the strangers shall submit themselves unto me" (Ps. 18:44). "Now therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people: for all the earth is mine" (Ex. 19:5). "And he took the book of the covenant, and read in the audience of the people: and they said, All that the LORD hath said will we do, and be obedient" (Ex. 24:7).⁵ When God speaks, men should obey. When those in authority speak for God, the listeners should obey. This is why telling the story of the giving of the law was mandatory in Israel. The story was intended to persuade men to fear God, hear God's law, and obey what they heard.

Stories possess great authority when told by those in authority and

3. This is a constant theme in Van Til's writings. See Cornelius Van Til, Christian-Theistic Evidences, vol. 6 of In Defense of the Faith (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1978), Introduction.

4. Reading involves sight, but prior to the advent of photography, reading was mainly hearing through the eyes.

5. See also Genesis 22:18; 26:5; 27:8, 13, 43; 28:7; Exodus 15:26; 18:24.

confirmed by others in authority. The command to tell the story of the giving of the law was directed to parents and grandparents: people in authority. Children look up to their elders—literally when children are young. The awe associated with tall parents is analogous to the awe associated with God. The Israelites repeatedly expressed fear of the giants in the land; it was this that kept the exodus generation from the inheritance. They feared the children of Anak: “And there we saw the giants, the sons of Anak, which come of the giants: and we were in our own sight as grasshoppers, and so we were in their sight” (Num. 13:33; cf. Num. 14:28). They saw other “men of great stature” (Num. 14:32).

Israel’s spies had seen giants. But seeing was not to be believing. Hearing was to be believing. Joshua said: “Hear, O Israel: Thou art to pass over Jordan this day, to go in to possess nations greater and mightier than thyself, cities great and fenced up to heaven, A people great and tall, the children of the Anakims, whom thou knowest, and of whom thou hast heard say, Who can stand before the children of Anak!” (Deut. 9:1–2). Not only were the Israelites to hear; they were to obey. It was time to claim the inheritance. But to do this, they had to trust what they heard, not what they saw.

C. Obedience and Inheritance

The basis of maintaining the covenant’s kingdom grant is obedience to the terms of the covenant. An inheritance can always be dissipated. It can shrink to a shadow of its former self when the faithful become a remnant. The captivity brought home this point. Israel forfeited the original inheritance during the exile. Most Israelites remained behind, content with life in Assyria-Babylon-Persia. Only a remnant returned to the land on a permanent basis. The others came only at Passover.

The problem with maintaining the compound growth of an original grant of capital is that growth can turn negative. This delays the conquest. The kingdom’s era of expansion is replaced by an era of contraction. The problem is, when you lose half of your capital, you must double it to get even. Large losses are difficult to overcome. Growth seems almost automatic during the high-growth phase of a stock market boom. It is taken for granted. Yet a 20% per annum increase becomes exponential in just a few years. Such rates of growth cannot be sustained. The expanding capital base runs up against the limits to growth. Those who pursue wealth-building as if such rates can be sustained for part of the economy without comparable rates of growth throughout the whole economy eventually reach environmental limits. The investor runs out of investments that enable him to reinvest his profits at 20%. The compounding process slows. To sustain such high rates of growth, men often adopt techniques of debt: leverage. The threat to debt is two-fold: (1) mass inflation, which destroys the currency unit; (2) economic contraction, which bankrupts the debtors.

Moses told them generation. They were also to teach their grandchildren. This would either constitute a double witness—parents and grandparents combined—or else it would overcome the defection of the children. The grandparent factor becomes a kind of covenantal insurance policy against a breakdown in the inheritance process.

This is why bastardy is such a threat to a society. When fathers are absent, mothers must sustain the legacy. They do not enjoy the benefits of the division of labor. This places heavy burdens on mothers and children. Mothers must earn money to support their children. They must also allocate time to teach them. The covenantal legacy is threatened by a break in continuity. Grandmothers may intervene at this point, caring for the children while mothers are at work. If the grandmothers fail in their task of transmitting the story of the covenant, the third generation is cut loose from the covenant. This is when the breakdown of inheritance begins. This also implies the breakdown of society. The inheritance is ethical and cultural. When it fades, so does social order.

This process of cultural and social disinheritance has taken place in the United States among the black population. In the early 1960s, the rate of black illegitimacy was about 25%: high. By the 1990s, it had reached the two-thirds level.⁶ In the inner cities, it was above 80%.⁷ The social breakdown in the black community that was predicted by Harvard professor Daniel Patrick Moynihan in 1965 has taken place. Crime has escalated; welfare dependency is becoming universal among unmarried mothers.

There has been a one-generation cultural echo: black to white. The rate of illegitimacy among whites was 22% in the early 1990s—only slightly under the rate of black illegitimacy in the early 1960s.⁸ By

6. Jason DeParle, "Census Reports a Sharp Increase Among Never-Married Mothers," New York Times (July 14, 1993).

7. Charles Murray, "The Coming White Underclass," Wall Street Journal (Oct. 29, 1993).

8. Ibid.

1990, one-quarter of children in the United States were growing up without fathers. Writes Nicholas Davidson: "This is the greatest social catastrophe facing our country. It is the root of the epidemics of crime and drugs, it is deeply implicated in the decline in educational attainment, and it is largely responsible for the persistence of widespread poverty despite generous government support for the needy."⁹ Some 70% of all the juveniles in United States correctional facilities grew up without fathers in the household.¹⁰ There is no indication that this demographic process is decelerating; on the contrary, it is accelerating. Between 1983 and 1993, the birthrate for unwed mothers in the United States rose by 70%.¹¹

When the covenantal legacy is lost by three successive generations, it takes a religious revival to restore it. In my day, this will have to come from outside the secular entertainment media—music, television, and movies—and the secular schools, which combined absorb almost all of the daylight hours of every child. The government-funded school systems that are universal in the West in the twentieth century divorced learning from the Bible. This replaced the Christian covenantal inheritance for the vast majority of residents in the West.

D. Restoring the Testimony

When Christian parents send their children to secular schools, they are inevitably telling their children that knowledge—useful knowledge—has nothing to do with the Bible. Yet the words of Moses convey the opposite viewpoint: the knowledge of God's revelation in the Bible is the foundation of all useful knowledge. The parents then have a major problem: to persuade their children regarding the moral consistency of the parents' outlook, which is pro-secular education and pro-Bible. They do this by appealing to the traditional argument of the two hermetically sealed compartments of revelation: biblical and natural. Somehow, the two are consistent, yet they are separate. But because of the hierarchical structure of all knowledge—from God to man—this argument cannot be sustained. Either secular presuppositions regarding cause and effect in history replace the Bible's providential view of cause and effect, or else the Bible's cosmic personalism is substituted for the cosmically impersonal universe of humanism. We cannot begin our reasoning process from the presupposition of the autonomy of nature and human thought and then logically reach the conclusion that God is totally sovereign in history. We cannot reason consistently from the god of humanism—evolving nature as interpreted by autonomous man—and end with the God of the Bible.

9. Nicholas Davidson, "Life Without Father," Policy Review (Winter 1990), p. 40.

10. Philip F. Lawler, "The New Counterculture," Wall Street Journal (Aug. 13, 1993).

11. Stephen A. Holmes, "Birthrate for Unwed Mothers Up 70% Since '83, Study Shows," New York Times (July 20, 1994).

1. Philosophical Dualism

Philosophical dualism asserts two forms of knowledge, each based on a separate foundation, with both leading to the same truth. This presupposition has led Christian philosophy into compromises with humanism from the days of the early defenders of the faith.¹² It has culminated with the widespread support by Christians of the compulsory, tax-supported school. Christians send young children into an educational hierarchy in which the God of the Bible is either ignored or ridiculed. This has broken the covenant of the modern evangelical church. This substitution of covenants begins in kindergarten. It accelerates through graduate school. The American graduate school has been secular from its beginnings in the late nineteenth century.¹³ The opinions of a majority of college-educated Protestant evangelicals are not significantly different from the opinions of college-educated non-Christians.¹⁴ This is not surprising, since the colleges require all of their faculty members to have earned graduate degrees from secular universities. The professorial drift on campus into liberal humanism is disguised by a cloak of verbiage about Christian relevance in a pluralistic world. Such relevance usually is said to be available by baptizing some discarded humanistic fad.

At the end of the twentieth century, wrote David Wells, "It is only where assumptions in culture directly and obviously contradict articles of faith that most evangelicals become aroused and rise up to battle 'secular humanism'; aside from these specific matters, they tend to view culture as neutral and harmless. More than that, they often view culture as a partner amenable to being coopted in the cause of celebrating Christian truth.”¹⁵ But it has not been secular humanism that has been co-opted; it has been modern evangelicalism. “Evangelicals now stand among those who are on easiest terms with the modern world, for they have lost their capacity for dissent. The recovery of dissent is what is most needed, and the path to its recovery is the reformation of the church.”¹⁶

12. Cornelius Van Til, A Christian Theory of Knowledge (Nutley, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1969), ch. 4.

13. George M. Marsden, The Soul of the American University: From Protestant Establishment to Established Nonbelief (New York: Oxford University Press, 1994), ch. 9.

14. James D. Hunter, Evangelicalism: The Coming Generation (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987), chaps. 3, 5.

Wells was speaking of upper-middle-class, well-educated men and women who are beneficiaries of humanist culture. He subsumed under his label all the pietist-fundamentalist-charismatic church growth proponents who dismiss theology as irrelevant.¹⁷ But this categorization is misleading without extensive qualifications. Pietistic fundamentalists have generally resisted the inroads of modernism, and the six-day creationists still do in academic areas related to origins. Fundamentalists have defended Scofield’s rejection of the Enlightenment ideal of inevitable progress, while rejecting both Darwinian liberalism and post-World War II evangelicalism. Bob Jones University surely has had no alliance with modernism. “We’re reactionaries and proud of it!” has been the cry of millions of fundamentalists, especially prior to 1976, when some of them began to take tentative steps back into American political life, from which they had been absent as an identifiable voting bloc since 1925, the year of the Scopes “monkey” trial. Wells was also not speaking of the Christian home school movement. These people are dissenters, which is why evangelicals do not find them respectable. When parents take their children out of the public schools, they join the ranks of the dissenters, for the public schools have long served as America’s only established church.¹⁸

There has been an implicit, unspoken alliance between Christians and right-wing Enlightenment culture since at least 1700. In the name of Sir Isaac Newton, right-wing humanists have presented their case for universal principles of knowledge, law, and culture. But this implicit alliance was not self-consciously adopted in the name of an alliance; it was believed by the Christians to be inherently Christian.¹⁹ The fact that Newton hid his Unitarianism from his superiors at Cambridge in 15. David F. Wells, No Place for Truth; or Whatever Happened to Evangelical Theology? (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1993), p. 11.

16. Ibid., p. 288.

17. Ibid., p. 289.

18. Sidney E. Mead, The Lively Experiment: The Shaping of Christianity in America (New York: Harper & Row, 1963), p. 68.

19. Cotton Mather, The Christian Philosopher (1721).

order to retain his teaching position only added to the confusion.²⁰ After Darwin's Origin of Species (1859) destroyed the foundations of this Newtonian-Christian synthesis, American fundamentalists began to distance themselves from modernism. This self-conscious distancing escalated rapidly after the Scopes anti-evolution trial in 1925,²¹ and escalated again after the publication of The Genesis Flood in 1961. Newtonian mechanism still has its adherents in Christian scientific circles, for it is regarded as the only alternative to both evolutionary Darwinian organicism and Heisenberg's principle of uncertainty. Nevertheless, there has been a major break with modernism in the realm of creationism. This break has dismayed the neo-evangelicals, who strive to make peace with modern science at the expense of the Bible. What Wells said about evangelicals applies to the American Scientific Affiliation, a group of Trinitarian scientists who reject the six-day creation.²² It does not apply well to the Creation Science movement.

2. State Accreditation

The restoration of Christian culture can come only from outside the existing educational system. The churches must abandon the lust for certification through secular college education, beginning with the removal of all requirements for candidates for the ministry to attend state-accredited colleges and humanist-accredited seminaries. Parent-funded Christian education, beginning at the lowest level, must steadily replace the tax-funded system of state-accredited secular education. The graduate schools will be the last to fall. This means that curriculum materials must be written which are systematically in opposition to the presuppositions of modern secularism. The Bible must be placed above conventional curriculum materials.

This keeps non-certified people from entering the professions. Academic accreditation has been the humanists' means of centralizing the curriculum of all schools, not just tax-funded schools. This system was designed by a liberal Baptist minister, Frederick Gates, and sold to his employer, oil tycoon and liberal Baptist John D. Rockefeller, Sr.,

20. Gale E. Christenson, In the Presence of the Creator: Isaac Newton and His Times (New York: Free Press, 1984), ch. 10: "Heretic: Sotto Voce."

21. George M. Marsden, Fundamentalism and American Culture: The Shaping of Twentieth Century Evangelicalism, 1870–1925 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1980), ch. 21.

22. Henry M. Morris, A History of Modern Creationism (San Diego, California: Master, 1984), pp. 130–44.

who in turn persuaded the United States Congress to authorize the incorporation of the General Education Board in 1903. "It would be difficult to overstate the value of the work the GEB did in the ensuing half century. Ironically, it seems largely forgotten today. . . . To understand the GEB, one must see it as an agency of change, one of such remarkable accomplishments that it is scarcely an exaggeration to refer to it as revolutionary."²³ One of its major accomplishments was "reforming college administration and developing professional standards for graduate education throughout the United States. . . ."²⁴ Furthermore, "the work was done very quietly, with great circumspection and skill, for the good reason that, like any agent of change, the GEB was up against some form of established opposition in each of its successive missions. . . ."²⁵ By the time it was voluntarily shut down in 1960, the year John D., Jr. died, it had expended $324 million on its many projects.²⁶ Some $208 million had gone into higher education.²⁷ (The purchasing power of the dollar in 1903 was at least 20 times greater than in 2010; it was six times greater in 1960.) But setting standards for lower-level schools was also part of the plan. The GEB was the main factor behind the creation of the public school system in the American South, through the funding of one professorship in education in every major state university in the South, and through lobbying in every state capital. From a few hundred schools in 1900, the South's public school system grew to thousands in the 1920s.²⁸

3. Christian Schools

For the non-parochial school, non-immigrant-group Protestants in the United States to break with this entrenched monopoly would have seemed impossible in 1960, but since that time, the Christian school movement has grown rapidly. The deterioration of the public schools has paralleled and accelerated the exodus of Christians. These are self-reinforcing phenomena. Christian-fundamentalist curriculum materials are still highly influenced by traditional secular outlines, and none

23. John Ensor Harr and Peter J. Johnson, The Rockefeller Century (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1988), p. 70.

24. Idem.

25. Ibid., p. 71.

26. Ibid., p. 75.

27. Ibid., p. 79. The two main figures in distributing the funds in the early years were Jerome Greene and Abraham Flexner. Idem.

28. Ibid., p. 76.

of them is at a truly high level academically, but independent Christian schools represent an advance over what existed a generation earlier. A minority of Christian parents has begun to take seriously Moses' words regarding the necessity of teaching their children the stories of the Bible. These stories, when coupled with the law of God, provide God's people with the means of conquest: the cultural compounding process. But so much covenantal capital was dissipated by Christians in the twentieth century that it will take centuries to reclaim lost ground unless a revival—very high compound growth—should begin and be sustained. In the past, revivals have not been sustained.²⁹

The church must tell the Bible's story and show people how to apply it in New Covenant times. Parents must tell the story to their children. But the presumed judicial discontinuity between the Old Covenant and the New Covenant has created a problem. Of what relevance to the kingdom inheritance is the giving of the law at Horeb, if there is no continuity between the Ten Commandments, the case laws of Exodus, and New Covenant historical sanctions? If there is no visible kingdom of God in history that is tied covenantally to biblical law,³⁰ and if there is no predictability between corporate faith and corporate sanctions,³¹ then the Bible's story becomes little more than a testimony to personal moralism, if that. It loses its character as inheritance-preserving. This is the situation in the post-Puritan West. The assumption of judicial discontinuity has undermined the relevance of what had been a mandatory story.

Conclusion

Moses warned his listeners not to skip a generation. Parents were told to tell their children about the meeting between God and Israel at Mt. Horeb. God delivered the law to them at that time. Respect for the law was given added support by the testimony of parents and grandparents who had heard God speak in history.

This covenantal legacy was to be handed down verbally, generation by generation. This legacy would in turn undergird the legacy of land, which followed the giving of the law and the wilderness experience. Moses understood the threat of a break in Israel's covenantal inheritance, which above all was an inheritance of law. The authority of God's law was to be attested to by the testimony of the parents, who could trace back their unbroken testimony to the revelation of God at Mt. Horeb. When the children heard about God from their household elders, they were to fear and obey God. Their obedience to God was to lead to the expansion of the inheritance.

29. See my site, www.SustainedRevival.com.

30. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

31. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), ch. 7. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

10

REMOVING THE INHERITANCE

When thou shalt beget children, and children's children, and ye shall have remained long in the land, and shall corrupt yourselves, and make a graven image, or the likeness of any thing, and shall do evil in the sight of the LORD thy God, to provoke him to anger: I call heaven and earth to witness against you this day, that ye shall soon utterly perish from off the land whereunto ye go over Jordan to possess it; ye shall not prolong your days upon it, but shall utterly be destroyed. And the LORD shall scatter you among the nations, and ye shall be left few in number among the heathen, whither the LORD shall lead you. And there ye shall serve gods, the work of men's hands, wood and stone, which neither see, nor hear, nor eat, nor smell (Deut. 4:25–28).

This was a warning. Its theocentric basis is the second commandment: God as a jealous God.¹ He alone is to be worshipped. Moses warned of corporate sanctions to come, sanctions based on the second commandment. Moses prophesied that the people would build another golden calf to serve as their god. A calf would again serve as the nation's representative to the world of spirits and power. There is no exclusively future tense in Hebrew, but it is clear from the structure of the passage that Moses' comments were directed at a distant generation. That generation would be carried into captivity, where they would be told by their captors to worship lifeless foreign gods. The nation's punishment would fit the crime.

A. The Prophet's Job

An Old Covenant prophet, as God's voice of authority (point two of the biblical covenant model), set forth the law of the covenant: point three (law). Then he warned what the penalties would be if the people broke the law: point four (sanctions). Biblical negative prophecy was always ethically conditional. Sometimes these conditions were explicit. If the listeners would turn away from their covenant-breaking ways, the prophesied sanctions would not arrive. We see this in Jeremiah's warning:

1. The second commandment was the second in the list of five priestly laws in the Decalogue. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), Preface.

The word which came to Jeremiah from the LORD, saying, Arise, and go down to the potter's house, and there I will cause thee to hear my words. Then I went down to the potter's house, and, behold, he wrought a work on the wheels. And the vessel that he made of clay was marred in the hand of the potter: so he made it again another vessel, as seemed good to the potter to make it. Then the word of the LORD came to me, saying, O house of Israel, cannot I do with you as this potter? saith the LORD. Behold, as the clay is in the potter's hand, so are ye in mine hand, O house of Israel. At what instant I shall speak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom, to pluck up, and to pull down, and to destroy it; If that nation, against whom I have pronounced, turn from their evil, I will repent of the evil that I thought to do unto them. And at what instant I shall speak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom, to build and to plant it; If it do evil in my sight, that it obey not my voice, then I will repent of the good, wherewith I said I would benefit them (Jer. 18:1–10).

Sometimes, the ethical conditions were implicit. For example, God told Abraham that his heirs would conquer Canaan in the fourth generation (Gen. 15:16). Yet God told the third generation to invade the land. He knew that they would disobey Him, which is why He could be specific with Abraham. The prophecy was ethically conditional; God knew that the prophecy's conditions would not be met by the third generation. God also knew that the Canaanites would not repent. Thus, the promise to Abraham was historically reliable. God had predestined the fourth-generation Israelites to covenantal victory and the Canaanites to covenantal defeat. God had ordained the Canaanites to condemnation.² The Canaanites deserved to be annihilated. This in no way denies the fact that the prophecy regarding their defeat was conditional.

Moses spoke here of successive generations. The King James translators properly inserted "ye," although the Hebrew text does not include the plural pronoun. His warning was directed at the conquest generation, but it is clear that God's sanctions would come much later, to future generations that would rebel: "ye shall have remained long in the land, and shall corrupt yourselves, and make a graven image, or the likeness of any thing, and shall do evil in the sight of the LORD thy God, to provoke him to anger" (v. 25). Moses spoke to those future generations through their covenantal representatives: the generation of the conquest. He could do this because he knew that his words would persevere. He had already warned this generation to tell their children and grandchildren the story of the giving of the law (vv. 9–10).³ In order to preserve the landed inheritance, he said here, all successive generations would have to obey the terms of the covenant. That is to say, the maintenance of the kingdom grant was conditional. It always is. This raises the enduring theological question of the relationship between prophecy, promise, and conditions.

2. "For there are certain men crept in unawares, who were before of old ordained to this condemnation, ungodly men, turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and denying the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ" (Jude 1:4).

B. Prophecy, Promise, and Conditions

This issue of covenantal conditionality has been a favorite debating topic for hundreds of years among technically precise Calvinists, who regard themselves as covenant theologians. This debate never gets settled. Paul's words are the point of contention: his contrast between law and promise. "For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise" (Gal. 3:18). Covenant theologians have argued that there are unconditional promises in the Bible; otherwise, there can be no true promises and therefore no true grace in history.

Paul's contrast between law and promise seems absolute, but it really isn't. There was an unstated condition in God's promise to Abraham that neither Paul nor the theologians mention: sexual union. Putting the matter in biological terms, Paul's allegorical contrast between Sarah and Hagar was not based on the differences between the normal conception method and the virgin birth. "For it is written, that Abraham had two sons, the one by a bondmaid, the other by a freewoman. But he who was of the bondwoman was born after the flesh; but he of the freewoman was by promise" (Gal. 4:22–23). The promise to Abraham regarding Isaac was conditional. It was biologically conditioned, and it was also ethically conditioned. He was not to imagine that Sarah would become the judicial equivalent of the mother of the Messiah.

3. Chapter 9.

God's promise to Abraham was not on a par covenantally with the messianic promise of the virgin birth (Isa. 7:14), although it was analogous to it. Isaac was not Jesus. Had Abraham misinterpreted God's promise in terms of the virgin birth, he would have been ethically out of line. He would not have gone into Sarah's tent. The prophecy would not have been fulfilled. The prophecy was fulfilled because Abraham took biologically effective action at age one hundred.

Conclusion: we must not attempt to separate historical conditions from the fulfillment of biblical prophecy. Historical conditions are an inescapable aspect of every human action. No Calvinist argues that God sovereignly predestinates occasional events in an otherwise chance-governed world. That argument is the Arminian's intellectual burden. The Calvinist argues that God predestinates everything. The Calvinist speaks of the decree of God as providentially undergirding all that comes to pass. In short, as I have said from time to time, God does not predestinate in a vacuum. The fulfillment of a specific prophecy is not some imposed event that God inserts into an otherwise autonomous flow of historical events. The Arminian thinks it is, but the Arminian is wrong.

Human action is therefore inescapable in the fulfillment of every covenantal promise. Human action is always ethically conditional, for everything that men say, think, or do is under the authority and jurisdiction God's comprehensive law (Matt. 15:10–20). To argue otherwise is to adopt antinomianism: a theology of neutral, impersonal gaps in the law of God.

The antinomian's view of prophecy parallels his view of ethics. He sees the fulfillment of biblical prophecy as a discontinuous intrusion by God into the autonomous processes of history,⁴ in much the same way that he sees the jurisdiction of God's law as sporadic and under tight boundaries. In his view, history is mostly autonomous and chance-conditioned. History is not predestined and decree-conditioned. History is not seen by the Arminian as covenantal in the sense of being the providential outcome of human action within the context of God's sovereignty, authority, law, sanctions, and inheritance. But for a covenant theologian to defend the total separation of promise from ethical conditionality is necessarily to adopt some form of Arminianism-antinomianism: the God of the Bible as the God of the intrusion, whether historical or judicial.

4. The term "intrusion" is Meredith G. Kline's, which he applies to the Mosaic Covenant. Kline, "Intrusion and Decalogue," Westminster Theological Journal, XVI (1953/54); Kline, The Structure of Biblical Authority, rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1972), pp. 154–71.

C. Invoking Covenantal Witnesses

Moses invoked heaven and earth to witness against the nation that day (Deut. 4:26). This is covenantal language. Moses was not invoking living organisms. He was not a believer in Gaia, the earth-goddess. He was invoking a double witness. He was putting the nation on alert: these two cosmic witnesses would stand guard, day and night, to testify against them. A double witness was required to convict someone of a capital crime. "At the mouth of two witnesses, or three witnesses, shall he that is worthy of death be put to death; but at the mouth of one witness he shall not be put to death" (Deut. 17:6). Heaven and earth are the limits of history; there is no place for men to commit sin that is outside of the boundaries of heaven and earth. David asked rhetorically: "Whither shall I go from thy spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there: if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there" (Ps. 139:7–8). There is no escape from God and His word. "Out of heaven he made thee to hear his voice, that he might instruct thee: and upon earth he shewed thee his great fire; and thou heardest his words out of the midst of the fire" (Deut. 4:36).

God had said to Cain, "What hast thou done? the voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground" (Gen. 4:10). Blood has no vocal chords. But Abel's blood was in the ground, and God saw this evidence of murder. The existence of historical evidence in the presence of an omniscient God constitutes a valid witness against lawless men. What Moses was saying was that God would see their acts of rebellion, their worship of rival gods. This evidence could not be covered up in God's cosmic court. The evidence would cry out against them. This would constitute a covenantal witness against them.

The proof of God's covenantal sovereignty is the inheritance. When Israel successfully claims this legacy on Canaan's battlefields, Moses announced, Israelites will know that God can and will enforce the terms of His covenant. The positive sanction of gaining the inheritance will testify to the reality of the negative sanction of its future revocation. The Lord giveth, and the Lord taketh away. First, He gives.

And because he loved thy fathers, therefore he chose their seed after them, and brought thee out in his sight with his mighty power out of Egypt; To drive out nations from before thee greater and mightier than thou art, to bring thee in, to give thee their land for an inheritance, as it is this day. Know therefore this day, and consider it in thine heart, that the LORD he is God in heaven above, and upon the earth beneath: there is none else. Thou shalt keep therefore his statutes, and his commandments, which I command thee this day, that it may go well with thee, and with thy children after thee, and that thou mayest prolong thy days upon the earth, which the LORD thy God giveth thee, for ever (Deut 4:37–40).

Then He takes away.

When thou shalt beget children, and children's children, and ye shall have remained long in the land, and shall corrupt yourselves, and make a graven image, or the likeness of any thing, and shall do evil in the sight of the LORD thy God, to provoke him to anger: I call heaven and earth to witness against you this day, that ye shall soon utterly perish from off the land whereunto ye go over Jordan to possess it; ye shall not prolong your days upon it, but shall utterly be destroyed. And the LORD shall scatter you among the nations, and ye shall be left few in number among the heathen, whither the LORD shall lead you. And there ye shall serve gods, the work of men's hands, wood and stone, which neither see, nor hear, nor eat, nor smell (Deut. 4:25–28).

Israel will break the covenant, Moses announced. This was a prophecy. He knew this was coming unless Israel avoided rebellion. Moses did not mention the possibility that Israel might not rebel, i.e., the conditional nature of the prophecy. The condition of covenantal faithfulness would not be met. Moses spoke generations in advance to those in the midst of rebellion. God in His mercy will not kill them all for their false worship. Instead, He will strip them of their inheritance, but only for a time. He will hear their cries for deliverance, even as He had heard their cries when they were in Egypt. He will remain faithful to His covenant with Abraham even though the nation will wander into prohibited worship. But there will be a price to pay. There will be corporate negative sanctions. The covenant would remain in force.

By invoking heaven and earth, Moses was making this issue a matter of covenantal sanctions. Covenant sanctions are predictable in the ethically conditional sense of “if . . . then.” A prophet's task was to persuade his listeners of the predictability of these sanctions. That which identified an Old Covenant prophet was the specific nature of the predicted sanctions. With the closing of the canon of Scripture, this office was annulled. No man's word today is lawfully elevated to the authority of the Bible. Moses, however, was the nation's premier prophet. His words became part of Scripture, which is why his warning had judicial authority down through history. In Jesus' parable of the rich man and the poor man, He has Abraham invoke Moses and the prophets. "Abraham saith unto him, They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them. And he said, Nay, father Abraham: but if one went unto them from the dead, they will repent. And he said unto him, If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead" (Luke 16:29–31).

It is clear that Moses did not believe that Israel would listen to his words. He knew they would eventually rebel. This passage was designed to comfort them in a time of captivity. God would deliver them out of captivity as surely as He had prophesied through Moses that He would deliver them into captivity. The promise of deliverance out of was as certain as the promise of deliverance into. Sin being what it is, bad situations are easier to get into than out of. But foretelling the future is a mark of supernatural authority, and God was telling them in advance what would take place. Israel could trust His word.

D. Removing the Inheritors

Land is not mobile; people are. The threat to Israel's landed inheritance was two-fold: (1) invasion by other nations; (2) Israel's removal from the land. Under the judges, invasion was the problem. Centuries later, removal was the threat. The greater of these threats was removal, which is the focus of this prophecy. God threatened to remove the inheritance from Israel by removing Israel from the inheritance.

Under the judges, Israel faced domination by nearby nations that forced Israel to pay tribute. These nations sought tribute, not permanent slaves. They did not seek to carry the people out of the land. Later, under Assyria and Babylon, which were building great empires, Israel was led into captivity. This was the focus of Moses' warning, almost a millennium before Babylon carried off Judah. The prophetic time perspective was long.

The greatest threat to their liberty would be their forced subordination to foreign gods. "And there ye shall serve gods, the work of men's hands, wood and stone, which neither see, nor hear, nor eat, nor smell" (v. 28). To be forced to serve dead idols was a terrible prospect. But Moses knew where rebellious men's hearts are: in their earthly possessions. So, he prefaced this ultimate curse with a this-worldly curse: captivity. They will lose their property. They will lose their military strength. This will culminate in their subordination to dead idols.

The basis of military success, David told Israel generations later, is not weaponry. “Some trust in chariots, and some in horses: but we will remember the name of the LORD our God” (Ps. 20:7). He was merely rephrasing Moses’ warning to Israel’s kings not to multiply horses (Deut. 17:16).⁵ Moses made it clear that their covenantal faithfulness alone would preserve their independence as a nation. This independence would someday be withdrawn.

Moses offered hope to the scattered captives. “But if from thence thou shalt seek the LORD thy God, thou shalt find him, if thou seek him with all thy heart and with all thy soul. When thou art in tribulation, and all these things are come upon thee, even in the latter days, if thou turn to the LORD thy God, and shalt be obedient unto his voice; (For the LORD thy God is a merciful God;) he will not forsake thee, neither destroy thee, nor forget the covenant of thy fathers which he swore unto them” (vv. 29–31). Nevertheless, the full Mosaic covenant would never be restored to Israel. The civil covenant would be broken forever. After the remnant of Israel returned from captivity, the nation did not enjoy sustained political independence. The age of the empires had arrived. Control over Israel’s politics passed from the Medo-Perians to Alexander the Great and his successors, and from them to Rome. This loss of civil authority protected the nation from idolatry. Israel never again worshipped the gods of Canaan. Those gods had been defeated twice: by Israel under Joshua (partial) and by Assyria and Babylon (total), who replaced the Israelites with imported foreigners who did not worship the local gods of Canaan. Power would no longer come from Canaan’s gods under the captivity. Without power, the gods of the ancient world had no claim on men’s allegiance. The gods of the ruling empire would dominate while Israel was absent from the land.

When the remnant of Israel returned, pagan gods were seen as enemies, the gods of their conquerors. Israel’s leaders could not worship these alien gods and still retain the allegiance of the nation. Israel did not again turn to idols. Israel’s post-exilic temptations were legalism, Greek philosophy, and Hellenic culture, not dead idols. The captivity cured them of their older bad habits.

5. Chapter 42.

It was one thing for foreigners to reside in Israel as conquerors before the exile. It was quite another for them to remove Israelites from the land. This was the conclusion of pre-exilic idolatrous religions. Idolatrous worship in the pre-empire phase was local worship. The sovereignty of a god was manifested in his ability to extend visible rule to his people. Ancient civil theology was power religion.⁶ The success of a god was tied to the success of his people militarily. This is why an invading army was less of a threat to Israel than captivity, and less of a covenantal sanction. Israel's continuing presence in the land seemingly testified to the nation's continuing covenant with God. Israel's defeat was not total. So, to break them of this idolatrous way of thinking, God told them that His covenant with them was valid irrespective of their geography. They would be carried off, yet this would not break God's authority over them or His ability to deliver them. On the contrary, their military defeat would confirm the terms of His covenant. Unlike all the other religions of their day, Moses announced, Israel's military defeat and geographical scattering would confirm them as God's people.

E. Counting the Cost of Rebellion

Moses presented a real-world problem before them. Like every prophet who invoked covenant sanctions, he challenged them with a cost-benefit analysis. What was the cost of rebellion? Captivity. What was the cost of captivity? Loss of land, loss of authority, and loss of the temple.

The prophet had a difficult task of persuasion. He came before people who were confident that the sanctions would not come, either because "we're really not all that bad," or because "God's sanctions are symbolic, not historic" or because "God will not see us," or because "God is merciful," or because "we have the temple." People want to commit sin with abandon. They want cost-free sinning. They refuse to acknowledge that sin has significant costs attached.

Then there is future-orientation. Present-oriented people steeply discount the future. They apply a high discount to future costs and future benefits. They are the grasshopper in Aesop's fable of the ant and the grasshopper, a story resembling a biblical injunction: "Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways, and be wise: Which having no guide, overseer, or ruler, Provideth her meat in the summer, and gathereth her food in the harvest” (Prov. 6:6–8). Present-oriented people regard the pleasures of sin as immediate, and therefore highly valuable, whereas future costs are distant, and therefore not a significant factor in decision-making today. Such an outlook is the antithesis of Moses’ time perspective, for Moses was highly future-oriented. “By faith Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh’s daughter; Choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; Esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt: for he had respect unto the recompence of the reward. By faith he forsook Egypt, not fearing the wrath of the king: for he endured, as seeing him who is invisible” (Heb. 11:24–27).

6. North, Authority and Dominion, Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985).

The Israelites prior to the exile returned to idolatry, generation after generation. No matter what negative corporate sanctions God imposed, Israel returned to idolatry. Moses had warned a future generation of the wrath to come, but no rebellious generation read his warning with this mental reservation: “This might mean us.” Like the men in Noah’s day, who married and gave in marriage, and were carried away in the Flood (Matt. 24:38–39), so is every generation entrapped by sin. “I’ll think about it tomorrow” is the appropriate tombstone inscription for generations of covenant-breakers.

In the Old Testament, there is only one example of national repentance prior to the imposition of negative covenant sanctions: Nineveh (Jonah 3). A king in Israel might occasionally repent representatively and thereby defer the corporate sanctions (e.g., Josiah and Hezekiah), but Jonah alone was able to see national repentance from the bottom up. The king of Nineveh repented last, not first (Jonah 3:6). It was this repentance which gained Assyria the positive corporate sanctions that transformed her into an empire, which then brought the long-prophesied negative sanction of captivity to Israel. Moses’ prophecy was fulfilled because Nineveh repented long enough to build up its strength as an empire.

Moses warned the generation of the conquest about the cost of idolatry. That generation was soon to compromise with idolatry by allowing idolatrous Canaanites to remain in the land (Josh. 15:63; 17:12–13). The Book of Judges shows how God delivered Israel into the hands of idolatrous foreign nations because of Israel’s idolatry. Moses’ warning was not taken seriously enough to change men’s behavior. Each generation imagined that the covenant’s negative sanctions would be delayed indefinitely. Each generation failed to count the cost.

The debt to God kept growing, compounding so as to become unpayable. The debt finally came due at the time of the exile:

And the LORD God of their fathers sent to them by his messengers, rising up betimes, and sending; because he had compassion on his people, and on his dwelling place: But they mocked the messengers of God, and despised his words, and misused his prophets, until the wrath of the LORD arose against his people, till there was no remedy. Therefore he brought upon them the king of the Chaldees, who slew their young men with the sword in the house of their sanctuary, and had no compassion upon young man or maiden, old man, or him that stooped for age: he gave them all into his hand. And all the vessels of the house of God, great and small, and the treasures of the house of the LORD, and the treasures of the king, and of his princes; all these he brought to Babylon. And they burnt the house of God, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem, and burnt all the palaces thereof with fire, and destroyed all the goodly vessels thereof. And them that had escaped from the sword carried he away to Babylon; where they were servants to him and his sons until the reign of the kingdom of Persia: To fulfil the word of the LORD by the mouth of Jeremiah, until the land had enjoyed her sabbaths: for as long as she lay desolate she kept sabbath, to fulfil threescore and ten years (II Chron. 36:15–21).

Present-oriented people count temporally distant costs differently than future-oriented people do. Future-oriented people discount those costs at a far lower rate than present-oriented people do. The burden of those future costs looms greater in the mind of a future-oriented person. He pays closer attention to them. This is equally true of future blessings. The future looms larger in the thinking of a future-oriented person than in the thinking of a present-oriented person.

Israel did not respond to the threat of negative sanctions in the distant future. But it is the mark of spiritual maturity that a nation does pay attention to the distant future in making its decisions. Nineveh responded, but Jonah had prophesied a relatively short time period: 40 days (Jonah 3:4). Total judgment in 40 days caught their attention. An unspecified time period did not motivate Israel.

Conclusion

Deuteronomy 1:6–4:49 made clear to the conquest generation that God is above all other gods and all other kings: hierarchy. He has the power to deliver His people both out of bondage and into bondage. No one can stay His hand. Moses presented a detailed account of how God had delivered their fathers out of Egypt and through the wilderness. In recent days, God had delivered Sihon and Og into their hands, destroying them completely. The preliminary phase of the conquest was now completed.

Moses concluded his historical account with a warning of covenantal judgment to come. This prophesied judgment was specific: their removal from the land to a foreign nation. The moral cause would be idolatry: worship of the gods of Canaan. The resulting sanction would be their cultural subordination to foreign idols. The penalty would fit the crime. But Moses did not put a time limit on the fulfillment of this prophecy. It was open-ended. This did not reduce its threat to Israel. There were no cases of open-ended covenant lawsuits against Israel in the Bible that were not eventually prosecuted by God. The final one came in A.D. 70.

The nation did not respond in a way which indicated that they took Moses' warning seriously. The Israelites became idolatrous again and again. They did not learn their lesson under the judges. But God gave them time to change their ways. He gave them so much time that they discounted the future costs of rebellion to something approaching zero. In the face of mercy, sinners continued to sin. But eventually the bills came due.

Part III: Ethics/Law/Boundaries (5–26)

11

JUDICIAL CONTINUITY

And Moses called all Israel, and said unto them, Hear, O Israel, the statutes and judgments which I speak in your ears this day, that ye may learn them, and keep, and do them. The LORD our God made a covenant with us in Horeb. The LORD made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us, even us, who are all of us here alive this day. The LORD talked with you face to face in the mount out of the midst of the fire (Deut. 5:1–5).

This passage begins the third and longest section of Deuteronomy: the law. The theocentric focus of this law is God as the Lawgiver in His capacity as the covenant-maker. The covenant's authority extends through time, generation after generation. "The LORD made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us, even us, who are all of us here alive this day." God had appeared to Israel at Horeb almost four decades earlier, where He appeared to the nation in fire and smoke (Ex. 19:18). Sinai and Horeb are interchangeable names in this case, since it was at Horeb that the Israelites worshipped the golden calf in Moses' absence (Ps. 106:19).

A. Face to Face

Moses spoke here of the covenant that God made with them. He said that this covenant was not the covenant that God made with their fathers. God made this covenant with those still alive: face to face. Some of the listeners had been young men or children at the time of that initial covenant act (Ex. 19). But what about those who were now under age 40? Those alive at the time of Moses' second presentation of the law had not all been alive at the first presentation of the law. What did Moses mean when he said, “The LORD made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us, even us, who are all of us here alive this day” (v. 3)? This sentence cannot be taken literally, nor was it so understood in Moses’ day. How should it be taken?

To make sense of the passage, we should consider in detail another literal phrase that cannot be taken literally: face to face. “The LORD talked with you face to face in the mount out of the midst of the fire” (v. 4). We know this cannot be taken literally because of what God revealed to Moses on Mt. Sinai:

And he [Moses] said, I beseech thee, shew me thy glory. And he said, I will make all my goodness pass before thee, and I will proclaim the name of the LORD before thee; and will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and will shew mercy on whom I will shew mercy. And he said, Thou canst not see my face: for there shall no man see me, and live. And the LORD said, Behold, there is a place by me, and thou shalt stand upon a rock: And it shall come to pass, while my glory passeth by, that I will put thee in a clift of the rock, and will cover thee with my hand while I pass by: And I will take away mine hand, and thou shalt see my back parts: but my face shall not be seen (Ex. 33:18–23).

So, we know that Moses did not speak to God face to face. Yet a few verses before this passage, we read: “And the LORD spake unto Moses face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend. And he turned again into the camp: but his servant Joshua, the son of Nun, a young man, departed not out of the tabernacle” (Ex. 33:11). The key phrase here is this: as a man speaks to his friend. God spoke to Moses as someone bonded to Him through shared experiences and shared goals.

Not only did the Israelites not speak to God literally face to face, they avoided speaking to Moses face to face after his return from the mountain. “And when Aaron and all the children of Israel saw Moses, behold, the skin of his face shone; and they were afraid to come nigh him. And Moses called unto them; and Aaron and all the rulers of the congregation returned unto him: and Moses talked with them. And afterward all the children of Israel came nigh: and he gave them in commandment all that the LORD had spoken with him in mount Sinai. And till Moses had done speaking with them, he put a vail on his face” (Ex. 34:30–33). The glory of Moses was more than they could stand, let alone the glory of God.

Yet in the confrontation between God and Moses regarding the 10

spies' false testimony regarding Canaan, and because of the people's willingness to stone Joshua and Caleb, Moses reminded God that He had called Israel out of bondage and had promised to deliver Canaan into their hands. Moses asked: What if God destroys the nation first? This will lead God's enemies to mock Him. "And they will tell it to the inhabitants of this land: for they have heard that thou LORD art among this people, that thou LORD art seen face to face, and that thy cloud standeth over them, and that thou goest before them, by day-time in a pillar of a cloud, and in a pillar of fire by night" (Num. 14:14). But God was not seen face to face. What the Israelites saw was the glory cloud by day and the pillar of fire by night. In this, God manifested Himself to them. This was the literal application of "face-to-face." Israel was in God's presence, as in the presence of a friend, when they were led by the glory cloud.

The reference is partially symbolic—the glory cloud—and partially ethical: the relationship between friends. Thus, whenever this ethical bond is broken by Israel through rebellion, Israel will no longer enjoy its face-to-face relationship with God. "Then my anger shall be kindled against them in that day, and I will forsake them, and I will hide my face from them, and they shall be devoured, and many evils and troubles shall befall them; so that they will say in that day. Are not these evils come upon us, because our God is not among us? And I will surely hide my face in that day for all the evils which they shall have wrought, in that they are turned unto other gods" (Deut. 31:17–18). "And he said, I will hide my face from them, I will see what their end shall be: for they are a very froward generation, children in whom is no faith" (Deut. 32:20).

B. "Not With Our Fathers"

This phrase seems to refer to the patriarchs. Moses spoke to the nation about God's new covenant, a covenant not made with their fathers. Moses was the father of the exodus. His generation had fled Egypt. Yet he spoke here of the fathers. Such a reference points back to the generations that preceded his.

What covenant was Moses speaking about? The covenant whose stipulations are the Ten Commandments. This had been a new covenant for Israel, one which provided the general principles of law by which the nation would judge and be judged. God had made this new covenant with those alive that very day. Moses was preparing his listeners for a second reading of the Decalogue (vv. 6–21).

But what of those who had not been alive at Sinai-Horeb? They were listening now. They would soon hear the law read to them again, though modified slightly: the justification for the sabbath, i.e., their deliverance out of Egypt (v. 15). The important factor here was the continuity provided by the Mosaic law. The covenant was the same because the law was the same. The covenant had been made with them at Horeb because the law had not changed. The constancy of the Mosaic law was the judicial foundation of the continuity of the Mosaic covenant. The act of covenant renewal which would transfer the inheritance to the next generation would be grounded in the same commandments that had grounded that original covenant at Sinai-Horeb.

The covenant had been made between God and all of the listeners because the covenant establishes continuity: God's sovereignty, His authority, His law, His oath-bound historical sanctions, and His system of inheritance. Point five—inheritance—is possible only because the covenant can be renewed through the generations. This covenant renewal system is what links the generations. The link is the covenant, not biology. The biblical covenant is not a racial covenant; it is a confessional covenant. It is established by oath and oath-sign, not genetics. By birth, men are automatically consigned to Adam's covenant of death. They enter God's redemptive covenant only by oath and oath-sign.

Were the patriarchs participants in God's redemptive covenant? Of course. Then why did Moses exclude them from this covenant? Because this covenant had been, and would continue to be, the historical manifestation of God's redemptive covenant for a new era. There was a new priesthood: Aaron's. There was therefore a new covenant with a new set of stipulations. "For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law" (Heb. 7:12). There was absolute continuity of redemption; there was only partial continuity of administration. Circumcision remained; Passover was new.

God had made this new covenant with Israel. This covenant, as with the redemptive covenant in every era, included an administrative means of succession. The covenantal mark was still circumcision, but this mark was not sufficient. There also had to be annual covenant renewal: Passover.

The question arises: Did they actually celebrate Passover in the wilderness? The biblical texts do not say. The Book of Numbers does not provide information of events beyond the first two years until two years before the conquest.¹ Passover is not mentioned in the interim period. They celebrated it in the first year (Num. 9:5), prior to their rebellion against Joshua and Caleb (Num. 14). The next reference to Passover is at the end of the wilderness era, when Moses told the conquest generation the proper date for celebrating it (Num. 28:16). It appears as though they had not celebrated it in the interim.

Here is the theological problem: grace and law. The Passover was a means of grace, but it was closed to those who were not circumcised (Ex. 12:48). The conquest generation was not circumcised in the wilderness. This took place only after they had crossed into Canaan (Josh. 5:5). They immediately celebrated Passover (Josh. 5:10–12). God timed their entrance into Canaan in terms of the Passover. If Passover had been celebrated in the wilderness, either these people had been excluded or else admitted apart from the mark of the covenant. Exclusion seems unlikely. What about participation? The Old Testament is silent.

Nevertheless, we must decide, despite the absence of evidence: either there was no formal covenant renewal in the wilderness (no Passover) or there was grace shown to the conquest generation, i.e., access to Passover apart from circumcision. What do we know for sure? The parents refused to circumcise their children; they were in rebellion. It would have been consistent with this rebellion to have refused to celebrate the feasts. They had cut themselves off from the future by refusing to: (1) conquer the land themselves or (2) turn power over to their adult sons to lead them into the Promised Land.² They had also been unwilling to participate representatively in the conquest through faith in their sons' future victory. The mark of this unwillingness was their refusal to circumcise their sons. My conclusion: they did not celebrate Passover.

C. To Maintain the Grant

Moses introduced this third section of the Book of Deuteronomy with a call to Israel to learn, keep (guard),³ and do the statutes. He re-

1. R. K. Harrison, Numbers: An Exegetical Commentary (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker, 1992), p. 431.

2. Chapter 1.

3. "So he drove out the man; and he placed at the east of the garden of Eden Cherubim, and a flaming sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life" (Gen. 3:24); "And the LORD said unto Cain, Where is Abel thy brother? And he said, I know not: Am I my brother's keeper?" (Gen. 4:9).

minded them that God had made His covenant with them. They participated in the original covenant just as if they had been there at Sinai when God appeared in the fiery cloud and gave them the commandments. Judicially, God had made the covenant with them through their legal representatives, their parents. The covenant at Sinai was their covenant, for God would deal with them as friends, face to face. He had broken off relations with their fathers after the rebellion of the spies. Only God's promise to Abraham to deliver Canaan into Israel's hands had preserved them. Moses had pleaded on this basis in order to save the entire nation (Num. 14:13–17). On the basis of that promise, to be fulfilled soon by the fourth generation (Gen. 15:16), the face-to-face relationship with Israel had been maintained. Thus, the covenant was far more their covenant than it had been for their fathers at Sinai, who had broken it repeatedly. The very uncircumcised condition of the fourth generation testified to the degree that their fathers had broken the covenant.

To maintain the covenant, Moses announced, they would have to obey God. The continuity of God's law had not been broken. This was what linked them to their fathers. It was also what would link their descendants to them. The inheritance was grounded in God's promise to Abraham; maintaining it would be grounded in their obedience to God.⁴

The focus of Moses' immediate concern was the conquest. He was about to recapitulate the law because a new generation had succeeded the old. To them the Abrahamic promise applied. The covenant was their covenant far more than it had been their fathers' covenant, for they were the heirs of the promise. They had to understand the judicial relationship between God, covenant, law, sanctions, and inheritance. To maintain the grant, they had to obey.

God granted them the inheritance, not on the basis of what they had done, but because of what He had promised. As heirs of the promise, they were heirs of grace. They had not earned the inheritance. It was theirs because God had promised Abraham that the fourth generation would inherit. They would have to fight to win it, but the promise was their motivation. As recipients of God's grant, they could fight in great confidence. They had already learned this in the war against Midian, in which not one Israelite warrior had died (Num. 31:49).

The land flowing with milk and honey would soon be theirs. This was grace. They would receive an infusion of capital to replace whatever they had spent of Egypt's spoils. This capital would not just be money; it would be land. To this grant of land they would add their creativity and labor. This would in turn produce great wealth, if they continued to obey.

4. James B. Jordan, Covenant Sequence in Leviticus and Deuteronomy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), p. 9. (<http://bit.ly/jjcovseq>)

This means that Israel's greatest visible capital asset was the law of God. The law would serve them as their tool of dominion.⁵ But without God's grace, God's law is incapable of delivering the goods long term. The law always condemns those who seek to use it for their own purposes. Adherence to the law produces wealth, but this wealth then becomes a snare for its owners (Deut. 8:17–18).⁶ Men sin. Without grace, men cannot fulfill the stipulations of the covenant. Habakkuk announced this principle clearly: "Behold, his soul which is lifted up is not upright in him: but the just shall live by his faith" (Hab. 2:4). Faith in God's redemptive grace, not faith in man's creative power, is the basis of covenant blessings. Through faith, men obey; through obedience, they maintain the covenant grant.

Conclusion

God spoke through Moses to the generation of the conquest. He told them that He had made a covenant with them. God was dealing with them just as if they had been the first to make this covenant with them. This was a new covenant which the patriarchs had not known. It was a fulfillment of the promise made to Abraham. Moses told them that God had spoken to them out of the fire at Mt. Sinai, even though many who were listening to Moses had not been born at that time. He told them that God had spoken face to face with them, even though no man had seen God's face. God had established a covenant at Sinai, and they were part of this covenant. They were about to inherit the land, fulfilling the Abrahamic promise. The continuity of both promise and law placed them inside the covenant.

To re-confirm this covenant, Moses would now read the Ten Commandments to them. First, he referred to the covenant-making event of Exodus 19: the face-to-face meeting between Israel and God at Mt. Sinai. This event was followed by Exodus 20: the giving of the Decalogue. Second, they were now going to hear the law again. This was evidence that God was still dealing with Israel on a face-to-face basis. God had not changed, and neither had the terms of His covenant, with one exception: the reason given for the sabbath. If Israel remained faithful to the terms of this covenant, the nation would maintain the kingdom grant that was embodied in the land.

5. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990).

6. Chapter 21.

12

SABBATH AND LIBERATION

But the seventh day is the sabbath of the LORD thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy manservant, nor thy maidservant, nor thine ox, nor thine ass, nor any of thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates; that thy manservant and thy maidservant may rest as well as thou. And remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the LORD thy God brought thee out thence through a mighty hand and by a stretched out arm: therefore the LORD thy God commanded thee to keep the sabbath day (Deut. 5:14–15).

In the Exodus version of the fourth commandment, the theocentric focus is clearer: God made the earth in six days and rested the seventh. God as the Creator is its primary message. This version is different. It has to do with justice: masters and servants. Egypt had been unjust; therefore, God had delivered His people out of Egyptian bondage. The Exodus version is clearly a cross-boundary law. This version, however, is clearly a land law.¹ It has to do with the history of Israel. Unlike the other nine commandments, this one creates problems of interpretation based on land law vs. cross-boundary law.

A. A Nation of Former Servants

The Ten Commandments listed in Deuteronomy 5 are ethically the same that appear in Exodus 20. There is only one major variation: the reason given for the sabbath. In Exodus 20, the reason given is creational: “For in six days the LORD made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the LORD blessed the sabbath day, and hallowed it” (v. 11). This reason rests on something that God did. The reason given in Deuteronomy 5 rests on something that the Israelites had been. The focus of Deuteronomy

1. On land laws and cross-boundary laws, see Appendix J.

5:15 is on the Israelites' experience in Egypt. What had been their condition? They had been servants. Egyptians had ruled over them. The implication is that the Egyptians had not allowed them to rest. Deuteronomy 5:15 contrasts with Exodus 20:11, but the contrast is implicit, not explicit. Exodus 20:11 tells us what God did. Deuteronomy 5:15 implies that the Egyptians did something else.

1. A Slave's Life

The exodus generation was a generation of slaves. They had grown up under bondage. Their thinking was shaped by their lifelong condition as subordinates. They had not been allowed to make important decisions for themselves. They had been told what to do under threat of physical sanctions. When Moses had challenged Pharaoh, Pharaoh's response was to add new work requirements: to find a substitute for straw in their brick-making. That is, their punishment was additional work. Moses had asked Pharaoh to allow the people time off for worship. Pharaoh's answer was to make them work even harder, despite the fact that their production would be less efficient, economically speaking. Work had been a negative sanction in Egypt's slave society.²

The first case law in Exodus 21 has to do with slave marriages (vv. 2–6).³ The second case law governs the sale of daughters as servants (vv. 8–11).⁴ God caught their attention by announcing laws that were intimately connected with what their previous condition had been. They had been slaves; here were rules that protected slaves.

2. Why the Change?

The question arises: Why did God not offer in Exodus 21:11 the justification for the sabbath given in Deuteronomy 5:15? Second, why didn't He give the creational justification for the sabbath to the conquest generation? Wasn't the conquest generation more like God in His capacity as builder? Weren't they about to build a new civilization? But this is not what we find.

Moses in the first section of Deuteronomy 5 made the connection between the establishment of the national covenant at Sinai-Horeb and this generation. He spoke of God as having made the covenant with them personally. Here, Moses repeated the connection. Who had been servants in Egypt? Those listening to him. Yet, chronologically speaking, this was incorrect. The generation of former slaves had died off. Their slave mentality had condemned them to wander in the wilderness for four decades. Their fear of confrontation had led them into sin (Num. 14). They had not been willing to accept God's assignment of military conquest. But Moses spoke as if all of his listeners had just come out of Egypt. "And remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the LORD thy God brought thee out thence through a mighty hand and by a stretched out arm."

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 7.

3. Ibid., ch. 31.

4. Ibid., ch. 32.

The continuity of the Mosaic covenant, as manifested above all in Passover, linked all successive generations of Israelites with the exodus generation. Passover was a rite of passage: passage out of bondage. Israel had no rite of passage from childhood to adulthood. Judaism's bar mitzvah is a modern rite. The Mosaic Covenant had only two rites of passage: from the family of Adam into the family of Abraham (circumcision)—clearly a matter of adoption—and from the slave's life to the liberated man's life (Passover). Both rites were manifestations of God's grace. The first rite was a one-time event; the second was an annual event. The first rite placed a man definitively under the terms of God's covenant; the second was an act of covenant renewal. The Passover celebrated what God did immediately after the first Passover meal was eaten. The meal reminded Israelites of their slave condition. This is why they were required to eat bitter herbs (Ex. 12:8).

3. The Conquest Generation

The conquest generation did not ritually enter the family of Abraham until Gilgal, on the far side of the Jordan (Josh. 5:5). Yet they had already begun to inherit in terms of God's promise to Abraham (Num. 21).⁵ Their willingness to fight was proof of their membership in Abraham's line of descent. Israel had been a family. Abraham's name had meant "father of multitudes." Israel had become a multitude in Egypt (Ex. 1:7).⁶ But Israel in Egypt was not yet a nation because she was a slave. Not until Israel swore covenantal allegiance to God at Sinai and received the law did Israel become a nation. Prior to this corporate covenantal event, Israel had been an extended family.

5. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 12.

6. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 1.

Now, for the second time, Israel received the Mosaic law. The people did not have to swear allegiance. This had been done representatively once and for all by their parents in Exodus 19. Moses had already pointed back to the events of Exodus 19, in preparation for the reading of the law. He would do so again upon the completion of his reading of the law (vv. 22–33). With the reading of the law, Moses renewed the national covenant. This public event was to be repeated every seventh year after they came into the land (Deut. 31:9–13).⁷

B. The Day of Liberation

Deuteronomy 5:14 speaks of strangers in the gates. The language refers to the existence of gates. Israel in the wilderness had no gates. The gate was a judicial boundary. As with any boundary, the gate separated insiders from outsiders. Those inside the boundary were under the rule of law that governed the jurisdiction. Inside this boundary, God said, all men must be treated the same. “One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you” (Ex. 12:49).⁸

The sabbath law governed everyone inside the national boundaries of Israel. This included strangers, manservants, and maidservants. It also included animals. One year in seven, it even included the land, which was to receive a year of rest (Lev. 25:4–5).⁹

By giving a new reason for the sabbath, Moses established a sympathetic link among the listeners, their deceased parents, and all the servants whom the listeners might employ in the future. The sabbath became a day of liberation for all Israel, but especially those in bondage. The sabbath pointed to a future day of liberation. God had worked six days and had rested on the seventh. This pointed to Israel’s day of liberation at the end of her week. The bondservant was not to be required to work on the sabbath (Deut. 5:14). The conclusion is incapable: a day of liberation would come for Israel’s bond servants.

Egypt had refused to honor the sabbath with respect to servants, which was the crucial test of sabbath-keeping. The Israelites had been forced to work without a day of rest. They had also not been allowed to worship God. Moses' challenge to Pharaoh was that the people be allowed to have time off from work in order to worship God. Pharaoh understood what this meant: a direct challenge to his status as a divinity in Egypt. If he granted this time of relief from work, he would have ritually acknowledged his subordination to the God of Israel. He refused to allow this. Israel did not get her rest period until the day after Passover. Israel's day of rest was her day of liberation.

7. Chapter 75.

8. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 14.

9. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 23.

Egypt was condemned in God's eyes by the fact that the Egyptians did not allow their servants a day of rest. What He allowed Himself at the end of the creation week, Egypt did not allow for the slaves: a day of rest. The Egyptians had assumed that they owned all of the output of their servants. They had assumed that God owned none of this output. In short, they had assumed their autonomy from the Creator God. They had placed themselves under the bureaucratic rule of a supposed divine monarch, the Pharaoh, while extending his rule over their slaves. The legal condition of the slaves reflected the Egyptians' own legal condition: servants of Pharaoh. Their servants were their judicial representatives. This is why the sabbath law singled out servants. How men treat their servants is how their super iors will treat them. Their servants become their representatives. This hierarchical principle of subord inate representation governs one's placement among the sheep or the goats at the final judg ment (Matt. 25:31–46).

The sabbath law in Deuteronomy 5 warned Israel: to ignore the sabbath law is to become like the Egyptians. The evidence of how well Israelites obeyed the sabbath law would be seen in how they treated their servants. So it had been for Egypt; so it would be for Israel. The sabbath was Israel's representative principle of liberation. If Israel refused to honor it, the nation would again come under the negative sanction of slavery. This was why Judah went into captivity to the Babylo nians. The nation had not allowed the land its sabbath rest periods (Jer. 50:34).

C. Literal Texts for Less Literal Purposes

There are discrepancies between the Exodus 20 account and the Deuteronomy 5 account. A minor one is the difference between the two versions of the law against covetousness. In the Exodus 20 account, the prohibition begins with the neighbor's property and moves to the neighbor's wife (v. 17). The reverse is the case in Deuteronomy 5:21. Similarly, the blessing attached to the fifth command ment in Exodus 20:12 was long life in the land. In Deuteronomy 5:16, the promise is more general: “that it may go well with thee, in the land. . . .” But the discrepancy between the two justifications for the sabbath is not minor. The two accounts are totally different.

How, then, are we to interpret Moses’ words? “These words the LORD spake unto all your assembly in the mount out of the midst of the fire, of the cloud, and of the thick darkness, with a great voice: and he added no more. And he wrote them in two tables of stone, and delivered them unto me” (Deut. 5:22). If God added no more words than the words which Moses had just repeated, then what of Exodus 20:11? These surely were words in addition to Deuteronomy 5:15. If some archaeologist in Israel should ever discover the fragment of the broken tablet on which the sabbath law appeared, what would it say? Would it repeat both justifications or just one? If only one should appear, then one of the written accounts of the giving of the Decalogue is incomplete. If one of the accounts is incomplete, then the words, “he added no more,” cannot be taken literally.

This discrepancy cannot be a function of Moses’ flagging memory. “And Moses was an hundred and twenty years old when he died: his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated” (Deut. 34:7). He was in the final stages of writing down the Pentateuch (Deut. 31:9). He would die within a few weeks, and possibly within a few days. The suggestion that he would not have remembered what God announced at the sealing of the national covenant, or what God wrote on the tables of the law for 40 days (Ex. 24:12, 18; Deut. 9:9), or what Moses subsequently wrote on the tables of the law for 40 days (Ex. 34:28), would be ludicrous.

Higher critics like to think that different editors revised the two passages. But what forger would have been sufficiently stupid to revise part of the Ten Commandments? The Decalogue was the heart of Israel’s religion. Of all the passages in the Pentateuch to tamper with, the Decalogue would have been the last choice of a clever forger. Every torah scroll in the nation would have been different from his revision. Only at the time of the rediscovery of the law under Josiah would such a forgery have been possible (II Kings 22). But what would have been the forger’s motivation? Why not just re-write the seemingly deviant passage in the rediscovered scroll to make it conform to your scribal agenda? Why change one without changing the other? Why create a visible discrepancy? The higher critic must attribute a degree of stupidity to the forger that calls into question the intelligence necessary to become a successful forger. A forger this stupid would not have possessed the intellectual skills necessary to become a “redactor,” according to the canons of higher criticism: a master of the existing biblical texts and a master of deceit.¹⁰

E. A Question of Covenantal Purpose

My assumption is that God did verbally announce both reasons for the sabbath at the original sealing of the national covenant, but the words on the tablets¹¹ included only the more general justification: the creation account. The number-one question in the Book of Exodus is this: Who is Moses’ God? Answer: the God of the patriarchs (Ex. 3:15). This was what God told Moses to tell the rulers of Israel (Ex. 3:16). This answer looked back to the stories found in the first book of the Pentateuch, the book of origins. This God was the God of creation, which Moses asserted in the opening words of Genesis.

At the time of the sealing of the national covenant, the Israelites had just passed through the Red Sea. This event would have been at the forefront of concern for any nearby pagan nation that might hear of this deliverance. Who are the Israelites? Who knows? Who cares? But a God who can part the waters of the Red Sea is a God to be reckoned with. What He did at the Red Sea pointed to His sovereignty as Creator. The God of creation rules over nature. A creation-based justification of the sabbath would have been understood by all nations. The Exodus justification of the sabbath is consistent with the purpose of the book: to announce the authority of God. This authority is absolute because He is the Creator.

The Deuteronomy version applies specifically to Israel’s history. Moses in Deuteronomy was announcing a link between the generation of the exodus and the generation of the conquest. This link was covenantal-judicial: the Decalogue. It was also historical. Moses in Deuteronomy was making it clear to that generation that they were the heirs of all that had taken place in Egypt, before most of them had been born. The justification for the sabbath in Deuteronomy is historical-participatory. This fits the covenantal goal of Deuteronomy better than Exodus’ creational justification does, namely, to affirm point five of the covenant: inheritance. This is the primary theme of Deuteronomy.

10. North, Authority and Dominion, Appendix P: “The Hoax of Higher Criticism.” See also North, Boundaries and Dominion, Appendix H: “Conspiracy, Forgery, and Higher Criticism.”

11. On two sets of identical tablets, see Meredith G. Kline, The Structure of Biblical Authority, rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1975), Part 2, ch. 1.

Deuteronomy 5:22 reads: “These words the LORD spake unto all your assembly in the mount out of the midst of the fire, of the cloud, and of the thick darkness, with a great voice: and he added no more. And he wrote them in two tables of stone, and delivered them unto me.” The degree of literalism in Moses’ words here must be judged by two things: the context of his monologue on the Decalogue and the written record in Exodus. The context here was national covenant renewal and inheritance. The written record in Exodus was more universal: the authority of God as Creator. Conclusion: God and Moses wrote on the tablets what we read in Exodus 20:11, not what we read in Deuteronomy 5:15.

Conclusion

The sabbath law explicitly governed the treatment of subordinates. The test of how a man honored the sabbath was how he treated his subordinates. This is true in both versions of the law.

The justification for the sabbath law in Deuteronomy 5 is different from the justification in Exodus 20. In the earlier version, God’s creation week is used to justify the sabbath: a cross-boundary law. In the second version, Israel’s time of bondage in Egypt is given as the reason. In the first version, God set the positive pattern for all superiors in history. In the second, Egyptians set the negative pattern. God gives men a weekly day of rest out of mercy. Israelites had to do the same for their subordinates. In both versions of the sabbath law, subordinates are the focus of concern. How men treat subordinates reflects their obedience to God. From God to the lowest subordinate, each ruler in the hierarchy must honor the sabbath principle of rest.

The day of rest is by implication the day of liberation. The day of rest is the model of the final liberation from bondage to sin. We labor today to enter into rest later, just as God did. “There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God. For he that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works, as God did from his. Let us labour therefore to enter into that rest, lest any man fall after the same example of unbelief” (Heb. 4:9–11). There have been periods of liberation throughout covenant history. Israel did not remain a slave to Egypt indefinitely. This implied that no nation or people will be in servitude to any other indefinitely. This also implied that servitude will eventually end. The definitive abolitionist act occurred in Christ’s ministry, when He fulfilled the jubilee laws (Luke 4:18–21).¹² With the abolition of the jubilee laws also went Israel's permanent slave laws (Lev. 25:44–46).¹³

The Hebrew sabbath was intended to relieve men from the bondage of labor once a week. By honoring the sabbath, they acknowledged publicly that they were not in bondage to the futile quest for more. The quest for more is a hard task-master. It knows no limits. The Hebrew sabbath announced: "Enough for now!" Until men are willing to believe this and act in terms of it, they remain slaves to one of two idols, either nature or history.¹⁴ Regarding a land ruled by either of these idols, it can accurately be said, as the fearful spies said of Canaan, "The land, through which we have gone to search it, is a land that eateth up the inhabitants thereof" (Num. 13:32b).

The New Testament's covenantal deliverance of God's people out of the Old Covenant was presented by the author of the Hebrews as an aspect of the sabbath (Heb. 4). This deliverance was achieved by Christ in His earthly work, whose efforts serve as a model for our earthly labors: "For he that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works, as God did from his" (v. 10). Covenant-keepers enter God's rest definitively through faith in Christ: "For we which have believed do enter into rest" (v. 3a). They must strive toward this rest historically: "Let us labour therefore to enter into that rest, lest any man fall after the same example of unbelief" (v. 11). They achieve rest at the final judgment. This is in the future: "There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God" (v. 9).

Christ's entrance into the heavenly places as the high priest took place in the past. Our rest has been attained definitively and representatively through Christ. We look back in faith to His attainment of definitive rest on our behalf, even though we also look to the end of time for its final consummation. The first day of the week—the eighth day¹⁵—is our day of rest because of our testimony that, judicially speaking, we have already entered into our promised rest through Christ's representation.

12. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

13. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 30.

14. Herbert Schlossberg, Idols for Destruction: Christian Faith and Its Confrontation with American Society (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, [1983] 1993), p. 11.

15. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press [1982] 2012), ch. 6:D.

13

LAW AND SANCTIONS

Ye shall observe to do therefore as the LORD your God hath commanded you: ye shall not turn aside to the right hand or to the left. Ye shall walk in all the ways which the LORD your God hath commanded you, that ye may live, and that it may be well with you, and that ye may prolong your days in the land which ye shall possess (Deut. 5:32–33).

God as the Lawgiver is the theocentric focus of this law.

A. A Cross-Boundary Law

This case law was a cross-boundary law.¹ It was not a tribal law. It was a law of national inheritance in Canaan, since it referred to the land. The question is: Was it exclusively a land law?² I argue that it extended beyond the boundaries of Israel, for the Mosaic law was inherently expansionist and evangelical.

Moses informed the conquest generation that God had spoken these words to him immediately after the giving of the law in Exodus 20. The phrase, “ye shall not turn aside to the right hand or to the left,” occurs repeatedly in the Pentateuch and in Joshua. The model was the march through the Red Sea: “But the children of Israel walked upon dry land in the midst of the sea; and the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand, and on their left” (Ex. 14:29). They were safe on dry land in between two mountains of water. This judicial principle also underlay the decisions of Israel’s civil judges (Deut. 17:8–11) and the king: “That his heart be not lifted up above his brethren, and that he turn not aside from the commandment, to the right hand, or to the left: to the end that he may prolong his days in his kingdom, he, and his children, in the midst of Israel” (Deut. 17:20). This principle was to become the basis of Israel's extension of dominion over other nations: "And the LORD shall make thee the head, and not the tail; and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath; if that thou hearken unto the commandments of the LORD thy God, which I command thee this day, to observe and to do them: And thou shalt not go aside from any of the words which I command thee this day, to the right hand, or to the left, to go after other gods to serve them" (Deut. 28:13–14).

1. On cross-boundary laws, see Appendix J.

2. On land laws, see Appendix J.

The phrase also appears in the Book of Joshua, at the beginning of the conquest and at the end of his rule, when he transferred authority to the judges. The people told him: "Only be thou strong and very courageous, that thou mayest observe to do according to all the law, which Moses my servant commanded thee: turn not from it to the right hand or to the left, that thou mayest prosper whithersoever thou goest" (Josh. 1:7). Decades later, he told the rulers: "Be ye therefore very courageous to keep and to do all that is written in the book of the law of Moses, that ye turn not aside therefrom to the right hand or to the left" (Josh. 23:6). Solomon echoed this: "Turn not to the right hand nor to the left: remove thy foot from evil" (Prov. 4:27).

B. Ethical Cause and Effect

The basis of long-term success in history is adherence to the laws of God. This is stated clearly in the text. Moses exhorted the nation to obey God in order to prolong their lives in the land. This was a national extension of the Decalogue's familial rule: "Honour thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee" (Ex. 20:12). Paul pointed out that this was the first commandment to which a promise was attached (Eph. 6:2). This is a very important observation.

A promise in the Bible is always conditional. This is because a promise is always covenantal, and covenants are always ethically conditional. Calvinists speak of unconditional election, but this phrase is technically incorrect. Election from the beginning was always conditional on the faithfulness of Jesus Christ in history. God imputes—unilaterally declares judicially—the perfect righteousness of Christ to individual sinners, but this perfect righteousness was not unconditional. It was conditional down to the last jot and tittle of the law. "For whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all" (James 2:10). All theological discussions of unconditional vs. conditional promises should begin with the life of Christ. Anyone who argues that election is unconditional should be specific: unconditional with respect to the recipient of God's special grace, but neither historically nor judicially unconditional with respect to the life of Christ. This qualification seems obvious, but it is rarely mentioned in such arguments.

God's promise to Abraham regarding the inheritance was not made in terms of the Mosaic law. Paul wrote: "And this I say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect. For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise" (Gal. 3:17–18). Yet there was a law implicitly attached to the Abrahamic covenant promise: the law of circumcision. The conquest generation had to be circumcised before the conquest could begin within the Jordan's boundaries (Josh. 5:5). There were conditions attached to the promise.

Paul said that the commandment's positive sanction of long life for those who honor parents was a promise. This was obviously a conditional promise. This conditional promise was explicitly part of the Mosaic law. God extended this same promise from the family to the nation when He broadened the stipulations of the covenant to the whole of the Mosaic law.

Covenant law has sanctions attached. These sanctions are positive and negative. These sanctions are the means of inheritance. The negative sanctions are the means of disinheritance, while the positive sanctions are the means of inheritance. Point three of the biblical covenant model—ethics³—is inextricably connected with point four: sanctions.⁴ Point five—inheritance⁵—is the result of point four. They are a consistent, judicially unbreakable unity. Thus, God's promise of inheritance to Abraham's heirs was inextricably bound to the stipulation of the Abrahamic covenant: circumcision. Similarly, God's promise to the Israelites regarding the maintenance of the kingdom grant was inextricably bound to the stipulations of the Mosaic covenant. The Mosaic covenant's stipulations were far more comprehensive than the

3. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

4. Ibid., ch. 4. North, ibid., ch. 4.

5. Ibid., ch. 5. North, ibid., ch. 5.

Abrahamic covenant's had been. "Ye shall walk in all the ways which the LORD your God hath commanded you, that ye may live, and that it may be well with you, and that ye may prolong your days in the land which ye shall possess" (Deut. 5:33).

The Israelites were told to obey God in order to receive specific benefits. The presentation of the law was in terms of results: benefits for obedience, set-backs for disobedience. God did not present the covenant as a system of rules that was in no way connected with outcomes. On the contrary, God presented His law in terms of the wisdom of pursuing righteousness because of the benefits. "Doing well by doing good" is the very essence of biblical ethics. More specifically, doing well in history by doing good is biblical. Anyone who suggests that God has created an ethical system that promises only "pie in the sky bye and bye" has either not understood the biblical covenant model or else he has denied that this Old Covenant ethical system extends into the New Covenant. In the second case, he needs proof based on the New Covenant. It is not sufficient to assert such a conclusion without exegetical proof.⁶ Solomon said: "Cast thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days" (Eccl. 11:1). Jesus said: "And every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my name's sake, shall receive an hundredfold, and shall inherit everlasting life" (Matt. 19:29).⁷

C. Straight and Narrow, Deep and Wide

The road to success for Adam prior to the Fall was broad. He could do anything he wanted to without fear of loss, with one exception. For Abraham, this road was narrower. He had to circumcise the males of his household. For Moses, the road was narrower still. More things were placed off-limits. In some areas, the New Covenant is even narrower. Consider adultery. Christ moved the law from deed to thought. "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not commit adultery: But I say unto you, That whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart" (Matt. 5:27–28). On the other hand, the minutia of the dietary laws have been annulled completely (Acts 10; I Cor. 8). So, certain ethical limits have been tightened; ritual limits have been

6. Ever since 1973, theologians have been waiting for this proof.

7. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 40.

loosened. Mosaic land laws, seed laws, and priestly laws have been annulled.⁸ But the requirements for extending the kingdom have been made far more rigorous, especially geographically.⁹

Predictable, historical, visible corporate sanctions are unbreakably attached to God's law. This is covenant theology's explanation of God's promise of the church's visible victory in history. This promise is what amillennialists and premillennialists deny; they preach the visible cultural defeat of the church in history. This is why premillennialists and amillennialists either deny covenant theology or else define it in such a way that the law's sanctions are removed. We are told that there is no possible widespread cultural victory for the church in history because of the following reasons: (1) the Mosaic law has been completely annulled; (2) the covenant's historical sanctions are no longer predictable; or (3) the promise of the church's defeat in history has replaced the promise of Israel's victory in history, at least in this dispensation. None of these theological arguments is correct.¹⁰

Because God's covenant is a unified system, God's law, His historical sanctions, and our inheritance are an unbreakable unity. The inescapable reality of God's predictable sanctions in history is why it is theologically mandatory to link theonomy with postmillennialism. Non-theonomic postmillennialism can exist without theonomy, but theonomy cannot exist without postmillennialism, assuming that we define theonomy in terms of the five points of the biblical covenant. Of course, it is quite possible to discuss all five points independently, and many Calvinists do: God's sovereignty without God's law, God's sanctions without church hierarchy, and so forth. This is the way that Reformed Baptists adhere to Calvinism: without the covenant. It is also the way that most Presbyterians adhere to Calvinism. Protestants have been doing this for centuries. But if we speak of biblical covenant theology, we must speak of an integrated system: all five points. Deuteronomy is clearly structured in terms of these five points. So is Levitic-

8. Appendix J.

9. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

10. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1992] 1997). (<http://bit.ly/klghshd>) us.¹¹ So is the Pentateuch.¹²

Covenant theology identifies the straight and narrow path. It argues that because God is absolutely sovereign, every fact of history operates under His authority. God has given to covenant-keepers the hierarchical authority to extend His kingdom in history. They are to do this in terms of His Bible-revealed law, the tool of dominion.¹³ Covenant-keepers who possess lawful, ordained authority are required to bring predictable individual sanctions in terms of God's law: specific cases. God also brings corporate sanctions in terms of His law. This is why covenant-keepers inherit progressively over time, while covenant-breakers are progressively disinherited. "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov. 13:22).¹⁴

The ethically straight and narrow path leads to widespread dominion in history. Those who remain on this path inherit the earth.

His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth (Ps. 25:13).

For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth (Ps. 37:9).

But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace (Ps. 37:11).

For such as be blessed of him shall inherit the earth; and they that be cursed of him shall be cut off (Ps. 37:22).¹⁵

D. Deuteronomy and Inheritance

The word "deuteronomy" is an English transliteration of the Greek words for second and law. Deuteronomy is the second presentation of the law. Moses read the Decalogue to the people in Deuteronomy a second time. Why? Because this was part of an act of national covenant renewal. The long-promised Abrahamic inheritance was about to be claimed by the fourth generation. Yet this generation had not been

11. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary and Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), Introduction, Section B.

12. Ibid., Preface, Section A.

13. North, Authority and Dominion, Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990).

14. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 41.

15. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 6.

circumcised. Legally, they were outside Abraham's family covenant.

Moses' second reading of the law was a recapitulation of the events of Exodus 19 and 20, which is why Moses told that story and read that law. Because the Aaronic priesthood remained the same, this was not a new covenant with a new law. It was covenant renewal. Only through national covenant renewal, which involved circumcision, could this generation inherit. They were still technically outside the full covenant, Abraham's covenant of the promised inheritance. They had to go through a separate act of covenant renewal because of the rebellion of their parents in not circumcising them. Their parents had clearly broken the Abrahamic covenant. They had, judicially speaking, placed their children outside the inheritance. It was as if they said to themselves, "Since we cannot inherit, our children must not inherit, either." These were present-oriented people without a sense of dominion, without a commitment to kingdom-building.

By reading the law to the uncircumcised generation, Moses turned their minds back to the first event in national covenant-making: the covenant established at Sinai-Horeb (Ex. 19, 20). This reading was an act of covenantal subordination (point two).¹⁶ This followed the first covenantal step in the conquest: the total destruction of Arad's kingdom (Num. 21:1–3), a whole burnt offering (point one).¹⁷ Moses was preparing them for the next covenantal step: crossing the Jordan, a boundary violation signifying the conquest of Canaan (point three). Then would come the next covenantal step: circumcision, an oath sign (point four). Then would come the next covenantal step: the total destruction of Jericho, another whole burnt offering on Canaan's side of the Jordan (point one). Only then would come the full conquest: inheritance (point five).

Conclusion

The law of the covenant was Israel's tool of dominion. Israel was about to inherit, according to God's promise to Abraham. But inheriting is not the same as maintaining. To maintain the kingdom grant, Israel would have to obey God.

This passage offers a conditional promise: long life in the land as a positive sanction for obedience. God's promises are reliable. This means that His corporate historical sanctions are predictable. Predictable in terms of what standard? His Bible-revealed law. Biblical law begins with the Ten Commandments, which Moses has just read to them. It also includes case laws or application laws, which he will read to them later. The important point is that the law of the covenant and the maintenance of the Israel's kingdom grant in history were linked by the presence of God's predictable corporate sanctions.

16. Exodus is the book of the covenant (Ex. 24:7).

17. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 1.

Paul's citation of the fifth commandment and its positive sanction of long life affirmed the continuing validity of a crucial aspect of the Mosaic covenant. He universalized this promise: from long life in the land of Canaan to long life on earth. This was not an act of covenantal annulment. It was the antithesis of covenantal annulment. This fact constitutes a major exegetical dilemma for those who oppose theology.

14

THE WEALTH OF NATIONS

Now these are the commandments, the statutes, and the judgments, which the LORD your God commanded to teach you, that ye might do them in the land whither ye go to possess it: That thou mightest fear the LORD thy God, to keep all his statutes and his commandments, which I command thee, thou, and thy son, and thy son's son, all the days of thy life; and that thy days may be prolonged. Hear therefore, O Israel, and observe to do it; that it may be well with thee, and that ye may increase mightily, as the LORD God of thy fathers hath promised thee, in the land that floweth with milk and honey (Deut. 6:1–3).

The theocentric issue here is the law of God: point three of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. Intergenerational Covenant-Keeping

Moses was repeating himself. The same principles of interpretation apply here as in Deuteronomy 5:32–33. Moses had just given a similar message: obey the law, enjoy long years, and have things go well for you: “Ye shall walk in all the ways which the LORD your God hath commanded you, that ye may live, and that it may be well with you, and that ye may prolong your days in the land which ye shall possess” (Deut. 5:33).² He added three extra themes here: intergenerational covenant-keeping, population growth, and inherited wealth.

“Thou, and thy son, and thy son’s son”: this phrase reminded Moses’ listeners that their ethical responsibilities did not end with themselves; they extended down to those who would eventually inherit. “Keep all his statutes and his commandments,” Moses told them. To preserve the inheritance intact through the generations, each generation would have to bear the responsibilities associated with training up the next two generations.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

2. Chapter 13.

This law places grandparents into the chain of family command. The grandparents have responsibilities to preserve whatever capital they have accumulated. But this capital base is more than marketable wealth. The crucial capital asset is ethics. Without this, marketable wealth will inevitably be dissipated. This is the message of Deuteronomy 28:15–68.

Obviously, parents have greater covenantal authority over children than grandparents do. Parents are God's mediators between God and their children. The question is: Will the grandchildren mimic their parents or their grandparents? Which representative model will be dominant? There is always the possibility that grandchildren will model themselves after their grandparents. Folk wisdom has a saying: "We make our grandparents' mistakes." Each generation sees more clearly the mistakes of the parents, and so seeks to avoid them. This leads to a kind of generation-skipping.

We see this in the twentieth-century United States. The 1920s were years of ethical rebellion: the "roaring twenties." This was a time of economic growth, sexual experimentation, artistic creativity and degeneracy, and present-orientation. In the United States, it was a time of illegal drugs: alcohol. The 1930s followed: the Great Depression. The children of the "flappers" of the 1920s grew up in the depression years and World War II. They grew up in hard times, marched off to war, saw death on a massive scale, came home, started families, worked hard, saved their money, and enjoyed a growing prosperity without social rebellion. These children of the Great Depression bore the "flower children" who came of age in the late 1960s, a time of economic growth, sexual experimentation, artistic creativity and degeneracy, and present-orientation. The marijuana-smoking flower children had far more in common with their hip-flask grandparents than with their parents. The 1970s brought a reaction somewhat like the 1930s: economic recessions, stagnation of per capita economic growth, a glum reaction against deviant behavior, and a growing conservatism. The children of the flower children became far more like their grandparents. The nostalgia among the young for the socially conservative 1950s began in the late 1970s and escalated in the 1980s.

The point is, there is no automatic straight-line social development. Societies are linear only in the broadest sense. They can experience culture-shattering crises that break the covenant. When this happens, people may react the way their grandparents did when facing similar crises. There is a kind of cultural echo effect: grandparents to grandchildren.

There is also an economic echo effect. De Tocqueville observed in the 1830s that there was a rags-to-riches-to-rags phenomenon in the United States: “. . . I do not know a country where the love of money holds a larger place in the heart of man and where they profess a more profound scorn for the theory of the permanent equality of goods. But fortune turns there with incredible rapidity and experience teaches that it is rare to see two generations collect its favors.”³

The responsibility of the grandparents is even greater if they live in the households of their children and have responsibilities of supervising their grandchildren. This is the case in many black⁴ households in the United States today, where grandmothers raise the grandchildren while their unmarried daughters earn salaries outside the home. The breakdown of the black family since the 1940s has led to a situation where two-thirds of the children today are born illegitimate—over 80% in inner-city areas.⁵ This has put enormous economic pressure on unmarried mothers and has added heavy social responsibilities on grandmothers, who are also frequently unmarried. Third-generation illegitimate children are becoming common. This has led to what appears to be irreversible poverty—irreversible without a moral transformation or an economic collapse. The liberalization and feminization of black churches and the rise of the welfare state have left black families with few moral resources, such as fathers. White illegitimacy is now in the 22% range. There appears to be a one-generation echo effect racially: from blacks to whites. In the early 1960s, black illegitim-

3. Alexis de Tocqueville, Democracy in America, trans., eds. Harvey Mansfield and Delba Winthrop (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1835] 2000), I:3, p. 50.

4. When Negroes were called Negroes by Negro leaders, it made things easier for whites. But the old word was abandoned when representatives of the American black power movement of the late 1960s learned how to manipulate the white media's representatives through calculated guilt manipulation and violent rhetoric, which was exactly what TV newscasters and journalists needed to get air time—the holy grail for TV newscasters and journalists. These Marxist and secular interlopers had to come up with a new word to describe their race as part of their systematic program to replace the older generation of Christian Negro leaders, who had preached—literally—nonviolence. The black power movement was a flash in the pan, but their re-naming of Negroes has stuck. I defer to convention here.

5. Charles Murray, “The Coming White Underclass,” Wall Street Journal (Oct. 29, 1993).

acy was about 25%, while white illegitimacy was about 5%.

Clearly, there has been a breakdown in social values. The retreat of Christian orthodoxy in the United States, especially in non-rural areas outside the South, which began around 1890, has broken the covenant. Within a century, there were signs of breakdown everywhere: legalized pornography (late 1950s), rising crime rates (1960–80), the drug culture (late 1960s), legalized abortion (1973), a rising divorce rate (at least half of all marriages fail), rising welfare dependency, and collapsing academic standards in the government schools—all compounded in the black inner cities. From the generation that grew up in the 1890s—the “gay nineties,” in which secularism made its first major cultural gains in the United States—to the children who came of age and voted in the 1990s, it took only four generations: from my grandparents to my children. It did not take long. The broken social covenant of the “gay nineties” has produced a culture in which almost nothing remains of the ideal of Christendom.

The covenantal question is this: How long can long-term economic growth be sustained by a society that is growing ethically perverse? Is economic growth self-sustaining irrespective of moral vision? Not if the American inner city is a valid example. Economic growth is the product of certain attitudes toward the future: future-orientation, peaceful exchange, honest dealing, legitimate private ownership, minimal civil government, predictable civil government, and so on. These attitudes are becoming less common in the inner-city ghetto. These are not the attitudes of men with no fathers, no wives, poor educations, and no jobs. They are surely not the attitudes of drug addicts.

B. Population Growth

The next covenantal promise containing a positive sanction is this one: “that ye may increase mightily.” This increase is numerical. Biological expansion is the product of two things: high birth rates and low death rates. A high birth rate is a covenantal promise: “There shall nothing cast their young, nor be barren, in thy land: the number of thy days I will fulfil” (Ex. 23:26). So is a low death rate: “Honour thy father and thy mother, as the LORD thy God hath commanded thee; that thy days may be prolonged, and that it may go well with thee, in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee” (Deut. 5:16).

The compound growth process is governed by what has become known as the law of 72. The annual rate of growth divided into the number 72 gives the period of time it takes for the population to double. A 7.2% per annum growth rate will produce a doubling in 10 years. A 10% growth rate will produce a doubling in 7.2 years. This means that a 3% per annum increase will produce a doubling in a little over 24 years. This will increase a population by a factor of 16 in a century. This is serious multiplication. Anything that multiplies by a factor of 16 in a century gets very, very large in a millennium.

Israel began with about 2.4 million people. In just two centuries, with a 3% growth rate, the population would have been 614 million people. Twenty-four years after that, it would have been over 1.2 billion—the estimated population of China today. This would have been two centuries before the Davidic kingdom. This obviously was not going to happen—not within the geographical confines of tiny Israel. But there is no doubt that once compound growth produces an upward-pointing curve, the population approaches its environmental limits very fast. With a low growth rate, it takes a long time to reach the point when the population curve turns upward, but once it does, it reaches its limit fast.

There are two limits to growth, each corresponding to one of man's two idols: physical environment and time. The corresponding idols are nature and history.⁶ If any population compounds, it will usually run out of space before it runs out of time. In a world in which time is considered functionally unlimited, growth's limits are said to be environmental. Why is time considered functionally unlimited? Because any rate of growth, no matter how low, reaches its environmental limits within the confines of historical time. Cosmic evolutionary time therefore is not an environmental limit in such a world. The only question is the rate of growth in comparison to the perceived environmental limits.

With the coming of quantum physics in the late 1920s—the physics of the subatomic world—and the invention of the silicon computer chip in the 1950s, a handful of creative writers have begun to speculate about a realm that has no physical limits, a realm in which there is no law of diminishing returns.⁷ Raymond Kurzweil actually preaches the law of accelerating returns.⁸ As proof, they point to the fact that the capacity of the computer chip has doubled every 18 to 24 months since the 1960s: “Moore’s Law.”⁹ The doubling period is now down to one year. This is the highest decades-long growth rate of anything known in man’s history.¹⁰ Chip capacity increases so rapidly that by the time a buyer receives delivery of the fastest microcomputer on the market—delivery generally takes up to three weeks—it is likely that an equally fast microcomputer will be advertised at a lower price. But while limits to growth may not actually exist in the subatomic world—which I doubt—they surely exist in the capital markets. It costs billions of dollars to construct a new computer chip factory.¹¹ Until these costs cease to rise, there will still be an economic limit to the rising speed of the chips, although what that limit is, no one on earth knows.

6. Herbert Schlossberg, Idols for Destruction: Christian Faith and Its Confrontation with American Society (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, [1983] 1993), p. 11.

7. Most notably George Gilder: Microcosm: The Quantum Revolution in Economics (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1989); Telecosm: How Infinite Bandwidth Will Revolutionize Our World (New York: Free Press, 2000). This book was published at the top of the tech stock bubble, which fell by 80% over the next year, taking Gilder's newsletter publishing empire with it.

What may apply to subatomic physics does not apply to reproduction rates. There are biological limits to growth. These limits are either environmental or chronological. Either the population runs out of space or the world runs out of time. When the population in question is man, analysts assume that mankind must run out of space or the things necessary for man’s survival that are produced in space. Put another way, modern man assumes that time is functionally limitless. There will be no final judgment in historical time. There will only be the slow erosion of the universe as it moves over billions of years toward its own heat death: the triumph of physical entropy over life.¹² The heat death of the universe is the only temporal limit acknowledged by modern man: time runs out because there is nothing left by which time can be measured. Time’s arrow freezes solid, ceasing to fly.

This leads modern man to a conclusion: mankind must reach environmental limits soon. Man’s population has already turned the corner; it is on the upward slope of the exponential curve. At present

8. Ray Kurzweil, “The Law of Accelerating Returns” (March 7, 2001). This is published on his website, www.kurzweilai.net.

9. First observed by Gordon Moore, co-inventor of the computer chip in the 1960s.

10. Kurzweil’s article points out that computation speed per dollar for information technology doubled every three years from 1910 to about 1950. Then the doubling rate went to every two years. The doubling period keeps getting shorter.

11. Interview with Gordon Moore: Peter Leyden, “Moore’s Law Repealed, Sort Of,” Wired (May 1997). I did not discover this article until 2001. Gary North, “Moore’s Law, Pareto’s Law, and Greenspan’s Dilemma,” Gary North’s Reality Check (Dec. 24, 2001). This is posted here: <http://bit.ly/MoorePareto>.

12. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>) population growth rates, men will approach infinity as a limit within a few centuries. So, demographers and social commentators assume that there must be a reversal of man's growth within half a century or so: war, plague, famine, or population control—either state-imposed or self-imposed.

The covenantal question is this: How long can any population grow in the face of widespread paganism and apostasy? (Atheism is a little-shared view.) Israel did not grow. After the exile, only a handful of Israelites returned to the land. Israel from that time on was under the domination of a series of empires until Rome expelled all of them from Palestine in A.D. 135, after Bar Kochba's rebellion. It was a small, isolated nation. Nothing like the promise of Deuteronomy 6:3 took place.

The promise was conditional. It rested on ethics. Israel rebelled continually. But inherent in that promise was a covenantal possibility: the filling of the earth. That had been true since the days of Adam and Noah, both of whom were told by God to multiply. It was a little over two centuries from Noah's Flood to the birth of Abraham's father (Gen. 11:10–27). It was 430 years from God's promise to Abraham to the exodus (Gal. 3:16–17). Yet in this brief time period, the Israelites and their adopted heirs in Egypt grew to 2.4 million. There were also the other nations of the earth. If we take Genesis 11 literally, there is no question that there was enormous population growth after the Flood.¹³ So, with respect to Israel in Canaan, covenant-keeping men would have run out of time before they ran out of space.

The command to multiply, coupled with the economic means of multiplication, points to the end of time. Modern man does not want to acknowledge the end of time. Thus, he is trapped in a dilemma: he must accept the limits to growth. He wants to affirm the compound growth of knowledge and wealth, yet this is impossible in a world of cosmic time. We run out of space, if nothing else. So, a few men are willing to listen to another scenario: war, plague, famine, and population control. Nature has always kept mankind in check, but ever since 1800, it hasn't. History is supposedly unbounded; so, it cannot replace nature as the imposer of limits: no final judgment. This leaves it to warring man or scientific man or sovereign nature, which will produce some man-killing bacterium or virus, to impose the inevitable negative corporate sanctions. A series of best-selling books in the mid-1990s on the potential for killer plagues testified to modern man's wondering about limits. He sees the effects of compound growth, and he knows this growth cannot go on for centuries. The question is: What will stop it?

13. Of course, there must have been many other children in each family besides those named. The text requires this because it is specific with respect to chronology.

C. Milk and Honey

Moses spoke of "the land that floweth with milk and honey."¹⁴ This language was covenantal. It was not to be taken literally. What this covenantal language meant was that the new land would be a good place to raise cattle and bees, as well as all the other good things of rural living. Reuben, Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh took this language so seriously that they gave up their claims on land across the Jordan because they found that land outside the boundaries of Israel was good for cattle. Moses granted them their request (Num. 32:33).

The language of flowing milk and honey testified to a land that would provide covenant-keeping people with the comforts of middle-class living, however defined. Solomon prayed: "Two things have I required of thee; deny me them not before I die: Remove far from me vanity and lies: give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me: Lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the LORD? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain" (Prov. 30:7–9).¹⁵

The covenantal imagery of milk and honey meant that no matter how fast Israel's population grew, there would be wealth for all. This meant that the economic limits to growth inside Israel would expand with the population. But this promise obviously had limits. Space is in fixed supply. There are always spatial limits to growth. We do not live in the quantum. What this promise clearly pointed to was emigration out of Israel: the extension of Israel's holy commonwealth ideal beyond the geographical confines of Palestine. This expansion would force major adjustments in such geography-based rituals as festivals held in a central city. The very promise of population growth pointed to a new covenant with new legal requirements.

This law promised covenant-keepers that their growth in numbers would never be threatened by the limits of their environment if they obeyed God's law. Their numbers and their wealth would grow together. There would be milk and honey for all. This promise is anti-Malthusian to the core. Malthus' suggestion in his then-anonymous Essay on Population (1798) that human numbers expand geometrically, while food expands only arithmetically, makes no sense biologically. Humans eat things that multiply. Why edible things cannot be cultivated to multiply faster than we do, he never said. One seed of corn produces an ear; one ear produces hundreds of seeds. Corn multiplies a lot faster than men do. Malthus dropped the phrase in later (acknowledged) editions. Nevertheless, it is that phrase from the first edition which is most closely associated with his name: the Malthusian thesis. It is far more powerful rhetorically than it ever was logically or has been empirically since then. It was the most significant erroneous forecast in the history of eighteenth-century social science. Only Marx's prediction of proletarian revolution rivaled it half a century later.

14. American parents used to sing to their children of the big rock candy mountain, where lemonade rivers flowed.

15. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 85.

Modern man, beginning in the eighteenth century, has found ways of multiplying food faster than men. The price of food as a percentage of family income has been dropping steadily for over two centuries. This development is what has fuelled the increase in man's population. Economic growth—milk and honey—has more than kept pace with man's population. The poor in any industrial nation, and in most non-industrial nations, eat better today than their ancestors did two centuries ago. Even the things that we should not eat in large quantities, and which our ancestors could not afford to eat in large quantities, such as sugar, we eat because we want to and can afford to. Our ancestors had to content themselves with honey. Americans consume over a hundred pounds of sugar a year. Sugar beets, not honey bees, have made it possible for dentists to make a good, upper middle-class living. (Speaking of dentistry, what advocate of "simpler living" and a "return to nature" is prepared to go back to the pre-anesthetic dentistry of 1840?)

England's adoption of the rhetoric and ethics of free market capitalism in the eighteenth century¹⁶ ratified the trustworthiness of Moses' covenantal promise. We live in a land flowing with milk and honey, but with very few urban flies and hardly any bee stings. Should we conclude that Israel could not have made a similar discovery? Israel failed to experience long-term per capita economic growth, not because Israel lived way back then, but because Israel was covenantally unfaithful.

16. Deirdre McCloskey, Bourgeois Dignity: Why Economics Can't Explain the Modern World (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2010). McCloskey's forthcoming third volume in this projected six-volume series will have to prove this point; it is merely asserted in the second volume.

D. The Wealth Formula

Moses set forth a conditional promise: population growth and per capita economic growth in exchange for corporate covenantal obedience. Had Israelites conformed to the terms of the covenant, Israel would have experienced the same kind of compound growth that the West has enjoyed since the mid-eighteenth century.

Wealth is so widespread today that we fail to recognize the magnitude of what the West has experienced over the last two centuries. The economic condition of the average Englishman in 1750 was far closer to the economic condition of the average Israelite in Joshua's day than it was to the average Westerner today. Travel was just about as slow. The cost of travel was just about as high. Metallurgy was superior, but medicine probably was not. The physical pain of life's disasters was no different. A fire could wipe out a family's wealth just as completely in 1750 A.D. as in 1400 B.C. Mortality rates for children were high in England. We do not know what they were in Israel. Communications were much better in England because of the printing press. For the wealthy and well educated, life was substantially advanced beyond Joshua's day—more sophisticated toys—but for the average farmer, it was not much different. For the average English coal miner, it was worse. On the whole, the typical Israelite would have recognized the life style of England in 1750 as being marginally more productive than Israel's, but probably not worth suffering the English climate (and surely not English cooking).

Had he visited any modern industrial nation, he would have recognized this world as beyond the dreams of kings. Ours is a radically different world economically from 1750. The difference is not in raw materials. Those have not changed. The "limits to growth" doom-sayers might even argue there are fewer resources today. The difference is in science, technology, and rates of capital formation. But how did these changes come about? Through changes in economic organization. The chief difference is in the power of the institutions of capitalism to draw forth productive ideas from millions of people and then supply entrepreneurs with the capital required to transform a small percentage of these ideas into customer-satisfying output.¹⁷ The difference, in short, is in the division of labor, just as Adam Smith wrote in 1776. The structure of production of the pin factory in chapter 1 of Wealth of Nations has been imitated around the world, and its output had multiplied 500-fold by the final decade of the twentieth century. But how could this have been accomplished? By improving industrial output on average by a little under three percent per annum since 1776.¹⁸ From about 1870 until the 1990s, the annual economic growth rate in the United States was 3.25%.¹⁹ What is a barely measurable improvement in one factory's production on an annual basis becomes a world-transforming miracle in a little over two centuries, i.e., the amount of time from the death of Moses to the beginning of Gideon's judgeship. Putting it differently, this would have been from Moses' death to the birth of David's grandfather's grandfather's father. The West, beginning with Great Britain, found a way to sustain compound economic growth of somewhat under three percent per annum despite wars and revolutions. This discovery has changed the world.

Who is to say that a society that honored the Mosaic law could not have done the same? Who is to say that compound economic growth could not have begun fourteen centuries before the death of Jesus Christ rather than seventeen centuries after? The Mosaic law makes it plain that such economic growth was not only possible, it was morally mandatory.

Conclusion

Moses delivered to Israel the judicial foundation of long-term economic growth. Through God's grace, the nation could adhere to the Mosaic law. This would have produced the growth in population and per capita wealth promised by Moses. But God, in His sovereignty, did not predestine Israel to obey. The growth opportunity was lost. But this does not mean that the potential for enormous long-term growth was not available to Israel.

17. John Jewkes, David Sawyers, and Richard Stillerman, The Sources of Invention, 2nd ed. (New York: Norton, 1969).

18. Walt W. Rostow estimated the average annual increase of world industrial production as 2.84% per year. Rostow, The World Economy: History & Prospect (Austin: University of Texas, 1978), p. 48. Such a precise figure is spurious. The incomplete documentary evidence and the difficulty of comparing rates of growth in different periods and nations make such statistics little more than informed guesses. But "less than three percent" seems like a reasonable guess until someone can prove that this guess is extremely high or extremely low.

19. Milton Friedman, "Getting Back to Real Growth," Wall Street Journal (Aug. 1, 1995).

Had Israel continued to grow as fast as the world's population has grown since 1776, the filling of the earth would have been completed millennia ago. But it was not God's time. The rate of population growth will vary until such time as God has determined that time must end. We will run out of time before we run out of raw materials, space, and productive new ideas. Time, not nature, is the crucial limit to growth.

Modern man in his heart fears the idol of history more than he fears the idol of nature, so he has invented a mythology—uniformitarianism—which comforts him by assuring him that mankind has all the time in the world. “There’s plenty more where that came from!” Billions of years have passed, we are assured, so billions must lie ahead. “No final judgment anytime soon!” Modern man then pretends to fear nature: the resource limits to growth. He invents whole philosophies to deal with nature and nature’s limits.²⁰ He whistles past the cosmic graveyard, telling himself that mankind will run out of resources before we run out of time. He forgets Moses’ words: fear God, not nature. It is the fixed supply of time, not the far less fixed supply of raw materials, which threatens every covenant-breaking man and covenant-breaking mankind as a whole. Time is the only irreplaceable resource, and it is in short supply. Nothing points this out to man more effectively than the multiplication of man. God’s dominion command (Gen. 1:28; 9:1), when obeyed, forces men to hear the ticking of the prophetic clock. Either we must lower the rate of population growth to zero or less,²¹ or face judgment: at the hand of God or the hand of the idol of nature. Covenant-breaking man prefers to deal with the idol of nature, with whom he believes he can work out a peace treaty on terms satisfying to man.

20. North, Is the World Running Down?

21. This will begin in the second half of the twenty-first century, if current demographic trends continue: Ben. J. Wattenberg, Fewer: How the New Demography of Depopulation Will Shape Our Future (Chicago: Dee, 2004); Philip Longman, The Empty Cradle (New York: Basic Books, 2004).

15

LAW AND INHERITANCE

Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God is one LORD: And thou shalt love the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might. And these words, which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart: And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes. And thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates (Deut. 6:4–9).

The theocentric principle here is God as the Lawgiver.

A. Obedience and Inheritance

This passage begins with what have become the most famous words of Judaism, “Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God is one LORD,” called the shawmah Israel, or “hear, Israel.” In Hebrew, the word for “hear” is the word for “obey”: shawmah. The passage then adds what became some of the most famous words of Jesus: “And thou shalt love the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might” (v. 5).¹ Moses then told the nation that these words must become central to the nation, with each father teaching them to his son from morning to night (v. 7). The theocentric focus of this law is obvious: God as the one and only God.

The phrase “morning to night” indicates the comprehensive authority of biblical law. All day long, the law of God applies to the affairs of men. Fathers were to spend time with their sons, either in the fields or in the family business. Sons were to receive knowledge of the law in the context of profitable labor. The familiar phrase, “learning by doing,” was applicable. It was a system of instruction we might call “learning while doing.” The law was not some abstract legal code. It was an integrated system of rules that was supposed to be taught in the context of daily living. God’s Bible-revealed law was not to become peripheral in the lives of God’s covenant people. It was to be central. It was to govern men’s activities throughout the day. It was to be memorized, discussed, and acted upon by young and old. Fathers were not to tell their sons, “Do as I say, not as I do.” Their lives were to become consistent with their words. The sons would hear God’s law and see their fathers carrying it out. This law mandated a mastery of the details of biblical law to all those who were covenanted to Him.

1. “And thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength: this is the first commandment” (Mark 12:30).

All of this has been lost to modern man. Today, formal education is not Bible-based, family-based, occupation-based, or personal. It is humanism-based, state-based, abstract, and bureaucratic. It is also intensely feminine in the early years.

B. The Biblical Covenant Model

The entire passage, Deuteronomy 6:4–15, constitutes a single covenantal command. The structure of this passage parallels the biblical covenant model: all five points.² Point one, transcendence/ presence, is summarized by the opening: “Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God is one LORD.” This God is the Creator God of the patriarchs. He is not some local deity. He speaks with a unified voice. He speaks to men clearly in the midst of history.

Point two, hierarchy/authority, is seen in the command to love Him, and not just love Him, but love Him with everything man has at his disposal: heart, soul, and strength. Men must place their lives at God’s disposal, doing in love whatever He commands.

Point three, ethics/boundaries, is found in the command to place God’s words or commandments at the center of our lives. Men must teach these laws to their children down through the generations. Biblical law is to become the framework of interpretation of every person’s life, governing what he does and says from morning to night. Even the boundaries of a man’s house were supposed to be marked by the presence of the written law.

2. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992). (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010).

Point four, oath/sanctions, appears in the next section of the passage. God promises to deliver the wealth of the Canaanites into the hands of the Israelites. For the Canaanites, this will constitute negative sanctions. For Israel, it will constitute positive sanctions.

And it shall be, when the LORD thy God shall have brought thee into the land which he swore unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give thee great and goodly cities, which thou buildedst not, And houses full of all good things, which thou filledst not, and wells digged, which thou diggedst not, vineyards and olive trees, which thou plantedst not; when thou shalt have eaten and be full; Then beware lest thou forget the LORD, which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage (vv. 10–12).

The Israelites were told to fear God because of this, and to swear their oaths by His name: “Thou shalt fear the LORD thy God, and serve him, and shalt swear by his name” (v. 13).

Point five, succession/inheritance, is found in the covenantal threat of disinheritance: “Ye shall not go after other gods, of the gods of the people which are round about you; (For the LORD thy God is a jealous God among you) lest the anger of the LORD thy God be kindled against thee, and destroy thee from off the face of the earth” (vv. 14–15).

This passage later became the legal basis for the covenant lawsuits brought by the prophets against Israel. Here, in one brief passage, we find the outline of God’s covenantal dealings with Israel until the temple was destroyed in A.D. 70. As a geographically based nation, Israel was removed twice from the land: at the captivity and at the diaspora under Rome. They were scattered across the face of the earth. But, as a people, they were not destroyed from the face of the earth. After their return from the exile, Jews did not again pursue the gods around them. After the diaspora under Rome, they remained an identifiable people.

A problem today is the growing sophistication of covenant-breakers. The gods of Canaan did not reappear in history. Other gods did. They have offered power and influence—positive sanctions—to those who are willing to worship them. Such worship has become progressively more intellectual and moral than liturgical, more a matter of replacing biblical laws with other laws. Rather than teaching sons the law of God, men have turned over their sons to be trained by certified educators who are more far familiar with rhetoric than law.

C. Teaching the Next Generation

The passage following this one instructs covenant-keepers to instruct their children in the law of God. Parents are warned that children will ask questions about the meaning of God's law. "And when thy son asketh thee in time to come, saying, What mean the testimonies, and the statutes, and the judgments, which the LORD our God hath commanded you?" (Deut. 6:20). We might expect the required answer to be related to the person of God, holiness of God, or some other lofty speculation. Not so. The answer is to be tied to the corporate blessings of God in history.

Then thou shalt say unto thy son, We were Pharaoh's bondmen in Egypt; and the LORD brought us out of Egypt with a mighty hand: And the LORD shewed signs and wonders, great and sore, upon Egypt, upon Pharaoh, and upon all his household, before our eyes: And he brought us out from thence, that he might bring us in, to give us the land which he swore unto our fathers. And the LORD commanded us to do all these statutes, to fear the LORD our God, for our good always, that he might preserve us alive, as it is at this day. And it shall be our righteousness, if we observe to do all these commandments before the LORD our God, as he hath commanded us (vv. 21–25).

God had delivered them from bondage. He had imposed negative sanctions on Pharaoh and his household. He had brought them into the Promised Land. This was the fulfillment of a promise to the patriarchs. God commanded Israel to obey Him, "for our good always, that he might preserve us alive, as it is at this day." That is, God has established a cause-and-effect relationship in history between covenant-keeping and corporate blessings. The basis of Israel's preservation of its inheritance in the land was covenantal obedience to the specific terms of God's revealed law. The children of Israelites were to be instructed in two things: the history of Israel and the law of God. They were to be told that these two courses of study are covenantally related. The basis of the relationship between history and law is point four of the biblical covenant model: sanctions.

A mark of rebellion against God's covenant is the denial of this fixed relationship. To study history apart from God's law is to lay the foundation for national disinheritance. If the events of history have nothing predictable to do with God's law, then history becomes the product of forces other than God and His covenant. God's law then becomes, at best, a guide for personal ethics, a guide that cannot definitively be shown to advance the careers of those who adhere to it.

It is basic to modern Christian theology to deny that such a corporate cause-and-effect relationship exists in New Testament times. If it did exist, then Christians would be compelled to preach, teach, and obey biblical law if they want to prosper. This thought is anathema to modern theologians, so they deny that success in history has anything to do with God's law as revealed in the Bible, especially the Old Testament. Calvinist Meredith G. Kline writes that ethical cause and effect in history are, humanly speaking, random. "And meanwhile it [the common grace order] must run its course within the uncertainties of the mutually conditioning principles of common grace and common curse, prosperity and adversity being experienced in a manner largely unpredictable because of the inscrutable sovereignty of the divine will that dispenses them in mysterious ways."³

If most Christians had ever heard about Kline's argument, which they haven't, they would regard it as too radical. You have to be trained for years in seminary in order to believe anything as ethically antinomian and as culturally futile as Kline's position. Christians find it difficult to teach their children that obedience to God produces random results in history, whether corporately or personally. So, they search for common-ground ethical principles of individual action, hopefully shared by all honest men, that will reintroduce ethics into the discussion of historical cause and effect, but without any invocation of the Bible and God's predictable sanctions, which would reintroduce the embarrassing issue of biblical law. They are apt to cite Benjamin Franklin's famous eighteenth-century motto in Poor Richard's Almanack, "Honesty is the best policy." This is a statement of personal faith rather than a developed social theory. This declaration is devoid of biblical covenantal content because: (1) the definition of honesty is not tied to the Bible; (2) the definition of "best" is not tied to the Bible. It was Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations that first introduced a comprehensive common-ground theory to justify the link that Franklin's aphorism set forth. Smith argued that honesty will generate income on a free market, which was what Franklin was arguing. Smith developed the idea in detail.

There is a practical problem with Franklin's motto. With no explicit biblical laws to adhere to, no God-invoked historical sanctions to undergird it, and no common definition of “best policy,” this common-ground humanist faith can lead to a morally questionable career, such as Franklin’s. He hired men to serve under him who he knew were British spies, most notably Edward Bancroft, during his term of service as an ambassador to France during the American Revolution. He refused to tighten security in the Paris office, despite continual warnings to do so. He met secretly with Paul Wentworth, the head of Britain’s agents in France. He was known to the British secret service as “72” and “our leading man.” Franklin’s biographer Cecil Currey concluded: “Benjamin Franklin wanted to win the American Revolution. No matter who lost—the United States, France, England—Benjamin Franklin wanted to win. In some ways he did. His honor remained intact. He gained new renown. He was rewarded by a grateful nation with additional positions of public responsibility. His secrets generally remained hidden.”⁴ In Franklin’s case, dishonesty was the best policy during his career in France. If America lost, he would survive as a covert friend of Britain; if America won, nobody would believe his duplicity other than his political enemy John Adams and his fellow ambassador in Paris, Arthur Lee, both of whom suspected him. He got away with it. (Two professional historians have written on Franklin’s status as a possible double agent and ally of British spies. One did so anonymously and did not go into teaching;⁵ the other saw his book consigned to what he later called “historical limbo.”⁶)

3. Meredith G. Kline, "Comments on an Old-New Error," Westminster Theological Journal, XLI (Fall 1978), p. 184.

The problem is, those who say they are God’s chosen people have been hesitant to teach their children that God commands obedience and imposes sanctions in history in terms of this obedience. They have tried to find alternatives to such a revelationally grounded concept of historical cause and effect. They have sought broader ethical principles that have been sanctioned by covenant-breakers. In short, they have substituted new laws for old and new sanctions for old, which ultimately implies new gods for old.

4. Cecil Currey, “The Franklin Legend,” Journal of Christian Reconstruction, III (Summer 1976), p. 143.

5. The anonymous author of 1789, distributed by the John Birch Society. He later worked on the staff of a famous conservative United States Senator.

6. Currey, “Franklin Legend,” p. 150. See also Currey, Code Number 72: Ben Franklin: Patriot or Spy? (Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1972). His previous book on Franklin was Road to Revolution: Benjamin Franklin in England, 1765–1775 (Garden City, New York: Anchor, 1968). The earlier book was favorably received by historians. It was not controversial. It was not memorable. It was safe.

D. New Gods for Old

Consider post-exilic Israel. The experience of the exile broke Israel's habit of worshipping the idols of the land of Canaan. But the people continued to substitute new gods for old. In the name of the God of the Bible, they worshipped more subtle gods than those represented by physical idols. Greek philosophy and literature became a snare for a minority of well-connected Jews during the three centuries before the birth of Jesus. This was Judaic Hellenism. But the Jews' commitment to cosmopolitan Hellenism did not overcome their commitment to a proto-Talmudic law.⁷

The idols of ancient paganism were deaf, dumb, and blind (II Kings 19:17–18; Dan. 5:23). They judicially represented demonic forces whose offer of power and wealth was limited to geographical regions. They were not universal gods. To sustain an empire, a ruler had to destroy the authority of local gods by destroying their temples and their cities' walls or by removing the people from their walled city-states. The smashing of a city's walls represented the destruction of its gods, as the fall of Jericho indicated. Jericho was Israel's model: total destruction. But this was a one-time event. For the inheritance to survive, Israel could not repeat this act of total devastation. Instead, Israel was commanded to commit genocide or remove from the nation all of the inhabitants of Canaan's cities. This was why God allowed Israel to leave the cities' walls intact: the removal of the former residents was sufficient. But this complete removal was also covenantally necessary: should any of them remain in the land, they would lead the Israelites into false worship (Deut. 7:1–5).

After the exile, the Jews faced a new problem: syncretism. The religion of the empires was a religion of cooperating gods. The heart of this religion was politics. The political order replaced the priestly order. The various priesthoods became functionaries of the state. Their task was to secure the favor of all of the gods of the conquered cities. Today, we call this religion pluralism.⁸ While the modern world's version of syncretism is not openly idolatrous, the result is the same: the substitution of political salvation in history for the rule of local gods.⁹

7. Martin Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism: Studies in their Encounter in Palestine during the Early Hellenistic Period, 2 vols. (Philadelphia: Fortress, [1974] 1981), I, p. 313.

8. See Appendix H: "Week Reed: The Politics of Compromise."

9. See Appendix C: "Syncretism, Pluralism, and Empire."

E. Covenant-Keeping and Worldly Success

Deuteronomy 4 identifies covenantal faithfulness as the basis of continued dominion in the Promised Land. The sanction of removal from the land is clearly a negative sanction, a divine punishment. The implication is that covenantal faithfulness brings positive sanctions: economic success. We read in Deuteronomy 8 that compound economic growth is a public testimony to the cause-and-effect relationship between man's covenantal faithfulness and God's positive sanctions in history. "But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day" (Deut. 8:18).¹⁰

The problem is that the positive sanctions can lead to covenantal rebellion: "And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth" (Deut. 8:17). The blessing of God can become the basis of covenant-breaking man's belief in the autonomy of man. The blessing becomes a snare.

The gods of modernism are the gods of man's pretended autonomy. They are the product of mankind's success. The gods of modernism are secularized versions of covenantal truths. Does number really rule the world? No, but God in His wisdom created a world in which some of the numerical inter-relationships discoverable through man's mind are found to govern some of the operations of nature, thereby making science possible. Is compound economic growth really possible? Yes, for a time, when men honor God's law, especially God's laws restricting the claims of the state on the wealth of men (I Sam. 8:15, 17).¹¹ But time will run out—something that compound growth in a finite world points to. Is science a tool of dominion? Yes, but not when scientists adopt theories of origin and providence that place impersonal randomness and unbreakable law on the dialectical throne of an autonomous universe.

The legitimate goal of success in history is to be attained by the means of grace. The covenantal faithfulness of God's people leads to success. Success can be sustained, however, only by continuing covenantal faithfulness. When men believe they have discovered the secret of compound growth apart from the law of God, they have said in their heart that the power of man's mind in guiding his hand is the source of

10. Chapter 22.

11. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 14.

our wealth. This confession of faith is the essence of modernism. It is the mark of apostasy. A world built in terms of such a confession cannot be sustained long term.

F. The Feminization of Young Child Education

One of the monumental and as yet unsolved problems of modern society is that women teach boys: either mothers or female school teachers. The context of teaching today is the classroom or home, not the work place. This means that education for males has moved away from the father-son apprenticeship model, which was clearly the Mosaic norm, to the classroom, where education is bureaucratic, impersonal, and abstract—separated from a father's discipline and his occupation. This is also generally true of home schooling. Education in the modern world is almost completely feminized until the high school level.

The feminization of modern culture begins in the grammar school classroom. Socially, it is regarded as “women's work” to teach young children. There is a social stigma attached to men who teach young children.¹² Thus, the success indicators of American education through age 11 or 12 are female standards: sitting quietly at a desk, good penmanship, neatness, and unquestioned subordination to authority. Boys who meet these criteria tend to be regarded by other boys as sissies, i.e., imitation girls: non-athletic, non-confrontational, and bookish. There is a stigma attached to “book learning” for little boys. Mark Twain's character Huckleberry Finn is representative. Huck is an outdoorsman, someone who cannot stand Aunt Polly's feminine world. His friend Tom Sawyer is somewhere in between, but it is Huck, not Tom, who incarnates the masculine image of mid-nineteenth-century American youth.

This process began with the industrial revolution of the late eighteenth century. In the 1700s, books on how to be a good parent were written for fathers. By the middle of the 1800s, they were written for mothers. In his excellent book, Fatherless America, David Blackenhorn made this observation: “Within the home, the father retained his formal status as chief executive, or head of the family, but had largely ceded to his wife the role of chief child raiser, manager, and decision maker. . . . Paternal authority declined as the fatherhood script came to be anchored in, and restricted to, two paternal tasks: head of the family and breadwinner."¹³ Fathers leave home in the morning and come home in the evening. They do not take their sons to work.

12. This is why a day care center can be such a profitable family-run business: most men refuse to do it. On the supply side, this reduces competition. Meanwhile, on the demand side, unmarried women seek out male role models for their young children.

1. The Division of Labor

There were economic factors for this social change. The main one was the division of labor. It is less expensive in cities than in rural areas to match the specialized production skills of individuals with the demands of employers. There are more workers available in an urban geographical area. Population density is higher. Transportation costs per distance covered are less. Also, as capital invested per worker increases, production becomes more specialized. Output per unit of resource input increases. Therefore, wages increase. All of this leads to increased pay for urban workers. This is offset mainly by rising real estate costs, as demand for urban space increases.

Specialization accompanies capitalization. Fathers today are employees, not owners. They are not given time by their employers to teach their sons on the job. The extreme division of labor made possible by modern capitalism makes it unlikely that a son will follow his father in a family business. There is no family business, and the son's skills are different from his father's. A father rarely teaches his sons their lifetime trade.

Men change occupations several times in a career. The restructuring of modern corporations due to international competition is now threatening the lifetime employment practices of earlier generations, even in patriarchal Japan. So, education has to be performed in a specialized classroom setting, as it has always been for the very rich and well-placed elite corps of students who have been trained to staff the bureaucracies in man's history. But what has worked well for an educated and privileged elite has not worked equally well for the mass of students. Beyond basic literacy, the training appropriate for an elite bureaucracy is different from the training appropriate for students who do not fit into a book-oriented bureaucratic setting. Meanwhile, the impersonalism of a classroom has replaced the personalism of apprenticeship all over the world.

Women can be employed less expensively than men. Their income is normally supplemental to their husbands' income, or else they are single and can share the expenses of an apartment with other women. They can afford to work for less than a man can, especially a married man. The “school marm” has been a fixture of American education since at least the mid-nineteenth century. When knowledge of Latin ceased to be the criterion for all teaching positions, women began to replace men as teachers below the college level. College education was closed to all but a tiny minority, mainly masculine, throughout the world until the late nineteenth century. In the United States, the creation of state-funded land-grant universities, beginning with Federal legislation that set aside Federal land for state-funded agricultural schools (1862), changed this by opening up college to both sexes. The elective system, which scrapped compulsory Latin and classical education, as well as compulsory chapel attendance, began at Harvard University in the 1880s and spread rapidly.¹⁴ This moved higher education from theology—Latin had for centuries been the international language of theologians¹⁵—to science and the liberal arts. This was a worldwide shift in higher education. It replaced knowledge of Latin with the college diploma as the basis of access to teaching and ministerial positions. But college attendance was still highly restricted until after World War I. The great expansion of state-funded college education came after World War II. Women gained equal access to higher education, both economically and legally. Nevertheless, more than any other college major except possibly home economics, elementary education has been the choice of women, which is why it has the lowest prestige of any field except home economics.

13. David Blackenhorn, Fatherless America (New York: Basic Books, 1995), p. 15.

For a century, the Boy Scouts offered an extra-curricular alternative to the feminized classroom, but scouting came midway in a boy's life. The Cub Scouts, a later development than the Boy Scouts, is run by mothers. Male scoutmasters run the Boy Scouts; boys are eligible when they turn age 10½. Scouting faded in popularity in the late twentieth century, reducing boys' personal contact with masculine authority except in the principal's office. Positive sanctions and most negative sanctions are imposed by women until children reach high school. In the final two years of high school, boys' academic achievement shoots ahead of girls' achievement in math and science, but this comes at age

14. George M. Marsden, The Soul of the American University: From Protestant Establishment to Established Nonbelief (New York: Oxford University Press, 1994), pp. 187–89.

15. Ibid., pp. 37–38.

15 or 16, late in the maturity process.¹⁶

In the final decades of twentieth-century, the gang replaced the family for hundreds of thousands of teenage ghetto youths, whose fathers were either absent or ineffectual. The gang is exclusively male, although there are female gangs that are extensions of male gangs. The gang is bound by a self-maledictory blood oath and some form of initiatory rite of passage. It becomes the educator for rebellious young men who have rejected the public school. It is far closer to the apprenticeship ideal. It offers an apprenticeship in crime.

2. The Decline of Apprenticeship

The move from the personalism of apprenticeship to the impersonalism of the classroom is economics-driven: a group of parents shares the cost of a tutor. There is a loss of personalism. There is a move from practical wisdom to instruction in abstract material and rote memorization. This is a continuing problem for modern education, as it has always been in bureaucratic or priestly education. The medical profession in the twentieth century adopted internship as a way to imitate apprenticeship: on-the-job training after graduation from medical school.¹⁷

The decline of apprenticeship has paralleled the rise of secular education: formal/bureaucratic rather than practical/profitable. The

16. Reasons offered for this change have been both social and genetic. Social arguments include these. First, there are more male teachers at the high school level, who regard spirited intellectual competition as manly. They reward boys' behavior: more aggressive, questioning. Second, girls who are equally competitive with boys tend to be regarded as masculine and perhaps a threat to male egos. Girls who want to be popular with boys tend to be quiet, refuse to ask questions, and play the feminine role: submissive. They fall behind academically, especially in math and science. Girls test at 50 points below boys on the Scholastic Achievement Test in math: 450 vs. 500 out of 800 maximum. Jane Gross, "To Help Girls Keep Up, Girls-Only Math Classes," New York Times (Nov. 20, 1993). Problem: the girls do not test lower than boys in the language arts. Are they more aggressive in language arts classes? This seems doubtful. Another explanation is genetic: girls think more abstractly than boys until puberty, when boys begin to catch up and then excel. There have been only two female grandmaster chess players: Jewish sisters. There are no females at the very top of the profession among physicists and mathematicians. There have been no major female composers of Western classical music, and few in popular music.

17. Internship is also a way to reward hospitals for cooperating in the restriction of the supply of physicians which state medical licensure necessarily entails. Hospitals receive the low-cost services of newly graduated physicians for several years. Reuben A. Kessel, "Price Discrimination in Medicine," Journal of Law and Economics, I (1958), pp. 29-32.

sellers of educational services have always sought access to a wider market of potential buyers by establishing common-ground, religiously neutral education. This has been going on since the earliest days of university education in the twelfth century: the rise of scholasticism and also the revival of Roman law at the University of Bologna.¹⁸ Specialized instruction in technological fields also lends itself to the myth of neutrality. Graduate school education in the United States, except for theological seminaries, has been secular from its origins in the final quarter of the nineteenth century.¹⁹

The advent of Unitarian, state-funded education in nineteenth-century America separated religious confession from education. Progressive education has always been messianic: the substitution of the government school for God as the agent of redemption.²⁰ It has been at war with the educational criteria of Deuteronomy 6.

Ironically, it was training for the gospel ministry that first adopted the bureaucratic education model, beginning with the creation of the university in Western Europe in the twelfth century. The theological seminary appeared in 1808: Andover Seminary in Massachusetts. It was invented by Rev. Jedediah Morse because of the appointment of a Unitarian in 1805 to the chair of moral philosophy at Harvard College.

3. Solutions

Parents have the legal option of delegating authority to other teachers. The classic biblical example of this is God's delegation of authority over His son to earthly parents: the incarnation. The Old Covenant example is Hannah's vow to delegate Samuel's upbringing to Eli the priest (I Sam. 1). The parent must be sure that the teacher will be equally faithful in teaching God's Bible-revealed law to the child. A parent can send his child to live with a man who will apprentice the child. Also, a parent can hire a tutor, which is a traditional exception to direct parent-child instruction. This is an expensive solution. Both approaches retain the personalism of parent-child instruction.

There are Christians today who reject the biblical right of parents to delegate the teaching function, but all such objections end about the time that the critic's child is eligible for college. When a child reaches

18. Harold J. Berman, Law and Revolution: The Formation of the Western Legal Tradition (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983), pp. 123–31.

19. Marsden, Soul of the American University, ch. 9.

20. R. J. Rushdoony, The Messianic Character of American Education: Studies in the History of the Philosophy of Education (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1963).

age 18, the critics of earlier delegated education insist that the parents now possess this right of delegation. Legally in the United States, this is true. The child legally becomes an adult, except for the right to buy alcohol. The child is said by the critics of Christian day schools to have become accountable, and the parents therefore become free from the teaching obligation when the child graduates from high school. Yet the parents still usually pay the child's education bills. In the Mosaic covenant, reaching age 20 authorized a man to join God's holy army (Ex. 30:14).

Parents are required by God's law to educate their children, morning to evening. But because of the division of labor, some parents are better teachers than others. As specialization increases, the teaching skills of some parents become more evident. Parents will trade off: one parent comes in and teaches a group of students mathematics and science; another teaches music; another teaches a foreign language. To deny the legitimacy of joint teaching is to assert the ridiculous: the equal ability of all people in every field.²¹ The assertion that a mother may not lawfully teach any children but her own is an assertion that: (1) all mothers are equally gifted teachers; or (2) any differences in teaching skills are irrelevant or insignificant in the outcome of education; or (3) children should be deprived of the specialized skills of several teachers until after high school. All three arguments are doomed. Parental concern for their children's education, as well as widespread parental exhaustion and defeat in the face of chemistry, physics, and calculus, will eventually overcome the arguments of the "parents-only" purists. Only if some impersonal high school curriculum appears in which the children teach themselves, either by computer or by private study, can the parents-only argument become remotely plausible. But even in such a case, the parent must delegate instructional responsibilities to the author of the software or the books. We are back to square one: parents are commanded to teach their children by means of biblical law. Either this responsibility may be delegated or else all programmed education from outside the family must cease.

21. "Now there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit. And there are differences of administrations, but the same Lord. And there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God which worketh all in all. But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal. For to one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit; To another faith by the same Spirit; to another the gifts of healing by the same Spirit; To another the working of miracles; to another prophecy; to another discerning of spirits; to another divers kinds of tongues; to another the interpretation of tongues: But all these worketh that one and the selfsame Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will" (I Cor. 12:4–11). Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 15.

Parental sovereignty over education must be restored. The fundamental starting point in the reconstruction of education is therefore the removal of all state funding and regulations. This includes tax-funded educational vouchers.²² Economic sovereignty must match legal sovereignty. He who pays the piper should call the tune.

Conclusion

The command to worship God by obeying His law was tied to sanctions: positive (inheritance) and negative (disinheritance). The ultimate threat to the Israelites was that God would remove them from the land if they worshipped the gods of Canaan. This was a land-based command. The gods of Canaan were land-based gods. If the Israelites did not have the moral strength to separate themselves spiritually and ritually from the gods of the land, God would separate them from both the land and its gods.

The sanctions related specifically to the inheritance and disinheritance of the land of promise. This threat was fulfilled twice: at the exile and after the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. The question arises: Were the sanctions more general than this? That is, was the command to worship God a cross-boundary law and therefore valid in the New Covenant? Yes, because the God of Old Covenant Israel is a universal God: the one and only true God. No other god may safely be worshipped.

When God ordered Israel to hear, He simultaneously ordered Israel to obey. The Christian community has ceased to hear or obey, except highly selectively. The churches' self-conscious rejection of God's Bible-revealed law, its mandated sanctions, and Christians' kingdom inheritance in history has undermined their assertion of God's absolute sovereignty (partial, says the Arminian) over history and the church's authority in history. A God who is not completely sovereign over history is not the Creator God of the Bible who providentially ordains everything that comes to pass. He does not issue announcements to pagan rulers as God did to King Cyrus:

22. Gary North, "Educational Vouchers: The Double Tax," The Freeman (May 1976). (<http://bit.ly/NorthVouchers1976>); North, "Vouchers: Politically Correct Money," ibid. (June 1995). (<http://bit.ly/NorthVouchers1995>); "Friedman and North on Vouchers," ibid. (July, 1993). (<http://bit.ly/NorthFriedmanVouchers>)

Thus saith the LORD to his anointed, to Cyrus, whose right hand I have holden, to subdue nations before him; and I will loose the loins of kings, to open before him the two leaved gates; and the gates shall not be shut; I will go before thee, and make the crooked places straight: I will break in pieces the gates of brass, and cut in sunder the bars of iron: And I will give thee the treasures of darkness, and hidden riches of secret places, that thou mayest know that I, the LORD, which call thee by thy name, am the God of Israel. For Jacob my servant's sake, and Israel mine elect, I have even called thee by thy name: I have surnamed thee, though thou hast not known me. I am the LORD, and there is none else, there is no God beside me: I girded thee, though thou hast not known me: That they may know from the rising of the sun, and from the west, that there is none beside me. I am the LORD, and there is none else. I form the light, and create darkness: I make peace, and create evil: I the LORD do all these things (Isa. 45:1–7).

A partially sovereign god cannot legitimately assert his authority in history. No wonder, then, that modern Christians are convinced that their partially sovereign God has not issued unique laws as tools of dominion, nor has He offered a world-conquering vision to His followers. A God who does not impose predictable corporate sanctions in history is in no position to guarantee his followers a visible kingdom in history as a reward for obeying His laws.

GENOCIDE AND INHERITANCE

When the LORD thy God shall bring thee into the land whither thou goest to possess it, and hath cast out many nations before thee, the Hittites, and the Girgashites, and the Amorites, and the Canaanites, and the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites, seven nations greater and mightier than thou; And when the LORD thy God shall deliver them before thee; thou shalt smite them, and utterly destroy them; thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor shew mercy unto them: Neither shalt thou make marriages with them; thy daughter thou shalt not give unto his son, nor his daughter shalt thou take unto thy son. For they will turn away thy son from following me, that they may serve other gods: so will the anger of the LORD be kindled against you, and destroy thee suddenly. But thus shall ye deal with them; ye shall destroy their altars, and break down their images, and cut down their groves, and burn their graven images with fire (Deut. 7:1–5).

The theocentric focus of this law is the final judgment, when God will cut off for all eternity all those who oppose Him. This eschatological focus was not clear to Israelites, for Israel had no concept of the final judgment, which is a New Testament doctrine. The final judgment is the ultimate example of inheritance and disinheritance. The bodily resurrection to eternal life and the bodily resurrection to eternal death (Rev. 20:14–15) are the models of earthly inheritance and disinheritance.

Chapters 6–26 are associated with point three of the biblical covenant model: ethics/law/dominion.¹ This passage deals with sanctions: Israel vs. the Canaanites. But these sanctions were part of a one-time program of national dominion. This passage is immediately preceded by a call to obey God's law. "And the LORD commanded us to do all these statutes, to fear the LORD our God, for our good always, that he might preserve us alive, as it is at this day. And it shall be our righteousness, if we observe to do all these commandments before the LORD our God, as he hath commanded us" (Deut. 6:24–25). The verse that immediately follows this passage invokes holiness, which is another aspect of point three: boundaries. The word "holiness" means "set aside." We read: "For thou art an holy people unto the LORD thy God: the LORD thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth (Deut. 7:6). We see that the context of this passage is point three of the covenant.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

A. Genocide

This law mandated genocide. Theologically, it reflected the final judgment: God's eternal disinheritance of covenant-breakers. What God told Israel to do to the Canaanites is representative of what He will do in eternity to those who refuse to covenant with Him in history. There will be no post-resurrection covenants. Destruction will be total: worse than annihilation—eternal damnation. Adam's broken covenant will remain broken for all eternity. This was the theological foundation of genocide under the Old Covenant.

Israel's inheritance of Canaan was to be complete. Therefore, so was the Canaanites' disinheritance. The existing inhabitants of the land were to be driven out of the land or annihilated, preferably the latter. The Israelites were warned by God not to make a covenant of any kind with them. This included the marriage covenant, but it also included ecclesiastical and civil covenants. The separation of God from the idols of Canaan was to be total. This separation was to be enforced by the sword.

God forbade them to show any mercy to the inhabitants. Genocide had to include infants and children. We know this because of God's requirements regarding Israel's subsequent dealings with the Amalekites. "Now go and smite Amalek, and utterly destroy all that they have, and spare them not; but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass" (I Sam. 15:3). This was repayment for an event that had taken place four and a half centuries earlier: the refusal of Amalek to allow Israel to pass through their land at the time of the exodus. This established a condition of permanent warfare between Israel and Amalek. "For he said, Because the LORD hath sworn that the LORD will have war with Amalek from generation to generation” (Ex. 17:16). This was reaffirmed just before the conquest: “Remember what Amalek did unto thee by the way, when ye were come forth out of Egypt; How he met thee by the way, and smote the hindmost of thee, even all that were feeble behind thee, when thou wast faint and weary; and he feared not God. Therefore it shall be, when the LORD thy God hath given thee rest from all thine enemies round about, in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance to possess it, that thou shalt blot out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven; thou shalt not forget it” (Deut. 25:17–19). Samuel reminded Saul just before the final battle, over four centuries later: “Thus saith the LORD of hosts, I remember that which Amalek did to Israel, how he laid wait for him in the way, when he came up from Egypt” (I Sam. 15:2). Saul lost his kingship for his refusal to destroy the animals and the king of the Amalekites (I Sam. 15:27–28). God has a long memory when it comes to imposing negative sanctions.

Total warfare against a city had already taken place outside of Canaan: at Hormah, where the Israelites destroyed Arad’s kingdom (Num. 21:3). It would happen one time inside the land: at Jericho. It was also to have taken place under Saul. In all three cases, there were to be no spoils of war; everything was to be destroyed. But with respect to capital rather than people, Canaan was not to be totally destroyed. Israel would lawfully claim the wealth of Canaan as an inheritance.

B. Cause and Effect in Ancient Cosmology

Modern scholarship assumes that men’s faith in God is based on deep-rooted psychological needs (which modern scholars have failed to overcome through the techniques of modern rationalism), tradition (which has been uprooted by modern society), and fear of the unknown (which has been superseded by fear of the known), rather than on the actual existence of a supernatural realm that affects cause and effect in history. The god of modern man is the noumenal god of Kant: dwelling impersonally beyond history in a realm of mystery that is related to history only through the autonomous ethical consciousness of individual men.² Scholars assume that primitive men, past and present, have been unable to recognize the random character of many seemingly coordinated yet improbable events in history. Primitives have attributed these improbable events to a supernatural being's active intervention in history.

2. Richard Kroner, Kant’s Weltanschauung (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1914] 1956).

The scholars have misunderstood both the events and the primitives. The ancients understood full well the distinction between a random, improbable series of events and supernatural intervention into nature. For example, after each of the cities of Philistia was struck by a plague whenever the Ark of the Covenant was brought inside its boundaries, the priests advised the rulers to perform an empirical test. "Now therefore make a new cart, and take two milch kine, on which there hath come no yoke, and tie the kine to the cart, and bring their calves home from them: And take the ark of the LORD, and lay it upon the cart; and put the jewels of gold, which ye return him for a trespass offering, in a coffer by the side thereof; and send it away, that it may go. And see, if it goeth up by the way of his own coast to Bethshemesh, then he hath done us this great evil: but if not, then we shall know that it is not his hand that smote us; it was a chance that happened to us" (I Sam. 6:7–9). It had not been chance, they soon learned: the oxen took the cart and the Ark back to Israel.³

So, too, did Solomon understand the difference between a world governed by a combination of impersonal chance and impersonal fate vs. a world governed by a sovereign God. Solomon in his pain of recognition admitted what modern man prefers to suppress: belief in a world governed entirely by impersonal chance or impersonal fate or an impersonal mixture of the two leads to the madness of meaninglessness.

The wise man's eyes are in his head; but the fool walketh in darkness: and I myself perceived also that one event happeneth to them all. Then said I in my heart, As it happeneth to the fool, so it happeneth even to me; and why was I then more wise? Then I said in my heart, that this also is vanity (Eccl. 2:14–15).

For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them: as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath; so that a man hath no preeminence above a beast: for all is vanity (Eccl. 3:19).

All things come alike to all: there is one event to the righteous, and to the wicked; to the good and to the clean, and to the unclean; to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not: as is the good, so is the sinner; and he that sweareth, as he that feareth an oath. This is an evil among all things that are done under the sun, that there is one event unto all: yea, also the heart of the sons of men is full of evil, and madness is in their heart while they live, and after that they go to the dead (Eccl. 9:2–3).

3. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 13.

Solomon, speculating as a philosopher, looked at death and saw it as the great leveling agent. He argued that if temporal life is all there is, then nothing has meaning, for one life cannot be distinguished from another, one species from another. To divinize the temporal by denying the supernatural is to surrender all meaning to death: the death of meaning.

C. Invoking Idols

The ancients were far wiser than modern man, for they tried to structure their lives in terms of a ritually responsive supernatural realm rather than an inherently incomprehensible impersonal realm.⁴ They believed that local gods governed their lives rather than distant butterflies.⁵ They did not deny what their eyes occasionally showed them, namely, that the supernatural can directly influence the course of history. They understood that priestly magic was not always trickery.

This understanding was the basis of their worship of local deities. Idols served as links in history between demons and men. The Bible speaks of idols as blind and deaf, but it does not speak this way of demons. It makes the point that an idol is not a god. The idol merely represents sources of supernatural power that men invoke by covenant oath and correct ritual procedure. Israel was warned not to establish

4. Kant's noumenal realm is incomprehensible to the mind of man, yet it is held in dialectical tension with the partially knowable phenomenal realm. Man's mind supposedly holds the two realms together.

5. The "butterfly effect" is modern science's latest phrase to describe the effects of unknown. A butterfly's fluttering wings can supposedly set up wind patterns that produce a hurricane a continent away. Men probably do not believe this about literal butterflies and literal hurricanes, but they do believe that unnoticed, seemingly random, and incalculably undetectable causes produce measurable results. The first kind of event is too obscure for man to control; the second may be much too large to control. Man is trapped in a cosmic maelstrom not of his own or anyone else's making. The phrase "butterfly effect" was popularized in James Gleik's best-selling book, Chaos: Making a New Science (New York: Viking, 1987). For a cogent rebuttal, see Stanley L. Jaki, The Only Chaos and Other Essays (Lanham, Maryland: University Press of America, 1990). Jaki was a Roman Catholic priest, physicist, and historian of science. Gleik was a New York Times reporter. Gleik was far better known than Jaki.

covenants with the Canaanites, for the Canaanites invoked demons through their idols. God told Israel to destroy the idols of Canaan, not because idols can see and hear, but because they represent covenantal links between men and the occult realm of the demonic.

Because there are demons who act in history, they persuade men to believe that by invoking this or that deity, men can manipulate the cosmos. "As above, so below" is magic's statement of faith. The faith of someone who believes in magic is this: procedurally precise rituals performed here below can invoke power from on high to affect things here below. This faith is correct only insofar as Satan is the prince of the power of the air (Eph. 2:2). In fact, magic invokes power from below.⁶ Men can manipulate local things, such as a voodoo doll, in order to produce specific effects at a distance. This is neither mind over matter ("telekenesis") nor words over matter. It is the invocation of demonic beings that have been given limited powers in history, such as the effects produced by Satan in his testing of Job.

The ancients knew that these powers can be invoked and manipulated by men for the ends of men. Idols of the ancient city represented demons who participated in the covenantal life of the family, clan, and city. This is why Paul warned that to participate in cultic feasts is to participate in devil worship: "What say I then? that the idol is any thing, or that which is offered in sacrifice to idols is any thing? But I say, that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils, and not to God: and I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils. Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of devils: ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and of the table of devils" (I Cor. 10:19–21). This clear warning regarding pagan covenantal meals is in the chapter preceding his description of the church's covenantal meal.

Modern rationalists interpret the Bible so as to remove all traces of supernaturalism. They view the realm of the demonic as nonexistent, as impotent in history as carved idols or as impotent as God. They view the demonic as a self-serving invention of priestly magicians. Even a few Christians assume this: specifically, certain sleight-of-hand artists known today as magicians. They are not magicians; they are illusionists. Magic uses ritual to link supernatural forces to history: "as above, so below." But modern magicians view the supernatural as an illusion and their illusions as real.⁷ I exchanged a long series of detailed letters with one such Christian illusionist, who insisted that Satan and his demons have never had any supernatural power in history. This man denied that the magicians of Egypt possessed supernatural powers, denied that the sticks they threw down actually turned into snakes, despite the clear statement of the text of the Bible that this took place (Ex. 7:12). No, he insisted, they merely used trickery to make it look as though they had conjured up snakes. On this point, he insisted, the Bible cannot possibly mean what it specifically says. I pointed out to him that this is the humanist's hermeneutics: interpreting the Bible in terms of modern man's anti-supernatural presuppositions, dismissing the God of the Bible along with the priests of Egypt. He did not change his mind. He viewed the priests of Egypt simply as skilled tricksters, as he is. That is, he chooses to believe that he and his humanist peers are every bit as clever as they were.

6. R. J. Rushdoony, "Power from Below," Journal of Christian Reconstruction, 1 (Winter 1974).

Modern man wants it both ways: to be as clever as the ancients, but far wiser. Modern man may be as clever; he is surely less wise. The priests of Egypt and Phoenicia could distinguish among chance, demons, and God. They could devise accurate tests to evaluate which was the dominant factor in particular situations: "Then the magicians said unto Pharaoh, This is the finger of God: and Pharaoh's heart was hardened, and he hearkened not unto them; as the LORD had said" (Ex. 8:19). Modern man is more like Pharaoh than his magicians. As Jaki said, that which parades as modern scientific cosmology does not include the fear of God, which is the beginning of all wisdom.⁸

D. Localism or Cosmos

What holds the world together? The New Testament makes it clear: He who was born of God and woman does, "In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins: Who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of every creature: For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him: And he is before all things, and by him all things consist" (Col. 1:14–17). The unity of the cosmos is secured by the sovereignty of God. Behind the seemingly

7. The most prominent illusionist denier of the supernatural is known professionally as the Amazing Randi.

8. Jaki, The Only Chaos, p. 7.

infinite and therefore humanly immeasurable particulars of history and nature is cosmic personalism: the Creator-Sustainer God who has counted the hairs of every head (Matt. 10:30), or as modern man would put it, the subatomic particles of every galaxy. Butterflies and hurricanes are all part of God's decree.

Ancient religion did not emphasize the coherence of the cosmos, for the primary categories of ancient religion were pantheistic and animistic. The gods of Canaan were regarded by the inhabitants as local gods. They were cultic gods in the sense of familistic, clan-based, and civic. This was the common theological outlook of the ancient world, including Greece and Rome.⁹ The boundaries of a city marked the limits of a local god's sovereignty. Beyond those boundaries, he could extend his reign only through military triumphs by members of his cult. When Ben-hadad's advisors explained the defeat of Syria by Israel, they invoked the localism of Israel's God (I Kings 20:28). This public theological assessment led to the destruction of Syria's army by Ahab's troops. Evil as Ahab was, God gave him the victory rather than to allow Ben-hadad imagine that the God of Israel was some local Near Eastern deity whose sovereignty was threatened by the military forces of Syria. God controlled events outside the geographical boundaries of Israel. The kings of the earth were required to acknowledge this. Adam had known and was required to acknowledge this verbally and ritually; so are the rest of us.

The idols of Canaan were representational. They mediated oath-bound covenants. This was why Israel was required to destroy the idols, groves, and other representations of demonic authority. The nations of Canaan were in covenantal subjection to covenant-breaking supernatural beings represented by idols. These beings promised power to men and delivered on the promise enough of the time to keep the power-seekers in covenantal bondage. God did not require the death of every man, woman, and child in Canaan merely because a handful of professional illusionists had used their skills to establish local priesthoods. Had the cults of Canaan been, cosmically speaking, nothing more than income-producing enterprises of prestidigitators who today would be entertaining crowds in Las Vegas gambling casinos, God would not have mandated genocide.

God promised to give Israel victory over the inhabitants of the land. This meant that every human covenantal agent of demonic forces had to die, so that there would be no further invocation of local demons. The demons of the ancient city operated inside geographical boundaries imposed by God. No demon could exercise its powers at will across the face of the earth. Thus, when a city fell to an invader, the participants on both sides recognized that the gods of the victorious city had participated in the defeat of the gods of the defeated city. Jesus made it clear that civil war is characteristic of Satan's kingdom.

9. Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955).

Then was brought unto him one possessed with a devil, blind, and dumb: and he healed him, insomuch that the blind and dumb both spake and saw. And all the people were amazed, and said, Is not this the son of David? But when the Pharisees heard it, they said, This fellow doth not cast out devils, but by Beelzebub the prince of the devils. And Jesus knew their thoughts, and said unto them, Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation; and every city or house divided against itself shall not stand: And if Satan cast out Satan, he is divided against himself; how shall then his kingdom stand? And if I by Beelzebub cast out devils, by whom do your children cast them out? therefore they shall be your judges. But if I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you (Matt. 12:22–28).

E. Annihilation: Sanctions Applied

Israel's defeat of the cities of Canaan was supposed to reflect God's defeat of the demons that were worshipped in those cities. To this extent, the magical formula, "as above, so below," was correct.¹⁰ What men would see on earth would reflect the warfare in heavenly places. This is why God required total annihilation. There would henceforth be no reasonable doubt: the God of Israel is sovereign. But Israel always doubted. This is why Israel failed to drive out or destroy all of the inhabitants. Israel's doubt regarding the trustworthiness of God's promise of total victory, which was to be manifested by Israel's comprehensive negative military sanctions in Canaan, laid the foundation of Israel's subsequent bouts with idolatry.

The military sanctions were comprehensive, but they were not total. The army of Israel drove out most of the land's inhabitants, but it did not drive out all of them (Josh. 15:63; cf. 17:12–13). This failure gave a foothold to the few remaining Canaanites to lure the Israelites into idol worship. The idols of Canaan represented demons whose power had not been totally extinguished by God because Israel had failed to destroy every trace of their places of covenant renewal and the people who were under these pre-invasion covenants. Just before his death, Joshua announced: "Know for a certainty that the LORD your God will no more drive out any of these nations from before you; but they shall be snares and traps unto you, and scourges in your sides, and thorns in your eyes, until ye perish from off this good land which the LORD your God hath given you" (Josh. 23:13). Thorns in your eyes: here was a powerful image to warn men of the effects of idolatry.

10. The request in the Lord's Prayer, "in earth, as it is in heaven," is a call for ethical correspondence, not metaphysical correspondence. It is preceded by "thy will be done" (Matt. 6:10).

The Israelites were required by God to move from word to deed. God's word specified total annihilation. This was the mandatory deed. By removing the idols and the inhabitants, Israel would inherit everything of Canaan's that was worth inheriting.

F. Human Capital and Technology

The division of labor is basic to wealth. To increase the division of labor, men save—restrict their present consumption—in order to produce capital goods that they expect to produce consumer goods and services in the future. Thrift finances the increase of goods and services.

In recent decades, it has become more clear to economists that human capital is a very valuable resource.¹¹ Genocide is the antithesis of the division of labor: the systematic destruction of highly developed human capital. While Israel was promised the vineyards and houses of their enemies, there was no doubt that the skills used to produce such wealth would perish with the destruction of the inhabitants. Nevertheless, God required annihilation. This would reduce the division of labor compared to what it could have been through local trade.

Why did God require this? What cost-benefit analysis informed God that it was better for Israel to reduce the division of labor by destroying the inhabitants of the land? We can only guess, but our guesses can be informed guesses.

The essence of magic is the principle of something for nothing, or at least something costly for something seemingly inexpensive. Light a few candles, recite some incantations, paint a design on some convenient surface, and presto: you get what you want. There is no requirement that the participants plan and save for the future, or select the proper mix of land, labor, and capital. There is no doubt that the Canaanites had understood conventional economic planning, which is why they left a legacy to Israel. But undergirding their concept of economic cause and effect was their reliance on supernatural forces that promised something for practically nothing. The demons required covenantal subordination. Their covenants elevated magical formulas and rituals above rational planning and prayer. The productivity of economic planning was assumed by Canaanites to require rituals such as human sacrifice and temple prostitution. Power from below was understood as necessary for power in history. It was this invocation of magical power through debauchery and murder that God would not tolerate.

11. Julian Simon, The Ultimate Resource (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1981).

There was rational planning in Canaan. The physical capital left behind by the former inhabitants proved this. But technology is not neutral. Technology is applied cosmology. It is governed by assumptions regarding cosmology: cause and effect. These assumptions govern the development and application of technology. The assumptions governing Canaanite technology were so demonic that God wanted Israel to destroy all traces of that cosmology by destroying all those who professed it. The ultimate resource is not the human mind, contrary to modern economists. The ultimate resource is a confession of faith which acknowledges the God of the Bible as the master of the universe and the source of man's abundance (Deut. 8:18).¹² The theological content of the Christian confession of faith and the scientific worldview that it produces are the source of long-term economic growth.

Modern technology is the outworking of what the world called technology before the seventeenth century: grammar.¹³ Modern technology rests on the grammar of science. So did late medieval technology, which was highly sophisticated both in theory and application.¹⁴ Modern man invokes the repeatable wonders of science through written formulas that are governed by a series of assumptions regarding cause and effect. The grammar of mathematics underlies modern technology, but this grammar is not autonomous; it rests in turn on a host of presuppositions regarding the coherence of man's reasoning processes and the relation of this coherence to the external world.¹⁵

12. Chapter 21.

13. Jaki, The Only Chaos, p. 124.

14. Ibid., ch. 3.

15. Vern S. Poythress, "A Biblical View of Mathematics," in Gary North (ed.),

To what extent is the grammar of science and number dependent on the grammar of faith? Canaan's buildings did not fall down. Canaanites planted fields continued to produce food, despite the Canaanites' denial of God's sovereignty. Their accumulated capital was transferrable. How was this possible? Because man is made in the image of God. This common humanity brings with it common knowledge by means of common grace.¹⁶ Such knowledge, like the knowledge of cooking, is affected by time and place; it produces recognizable variations, but like recipes, it is repeatable and therefore transferrable. Accurate scientific formulas are universally valid, according to the theory of modern science. Their accuracy is not dependent on a personal confession of correct theology. But scientific formulas are not invoked outside of the processes of history, which are always covenantal. Scientific formulas and their applications are influenced by covenantal cause and effect in history. Some societies inherit; others are disinherited. The point is, because scientific formulas and the knowledge that underlies them are transferrable—universal, in other words—they and their products can be inherited. This is why the wealth of the sinner can be laid up for the just (Prov. 13:22).¹⁷

G. Economic Growth Through Imported Knowledge

Economic growth is a process of compounding.¹⁸ The division of labor is extended over time, not just across borders. The extension of per capita wealth through the extension of the division of labor is dependent on the maintenance of social order. It is not just free trade across borders that makes men rich. There must be saving, wise investing, and scientific discovery.¹⁹ There must be social development, which includes a progressive commitment to the moral boundaries imposed by biblical law. What the conquest of Canaan teaches us is that

Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1976), ch. 9; cf. Eugene Wigner, "The Unreasonable Effectiveness of Mathematics in the Natural Sciences," Communications on Pure and Applied Mathematics, XIII (1960), pp. 1–14. (<http://bit.ly/WignerMath>)

16. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcgr>)

17. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 41.

18. Chapter 14.

19. John Jewkes, David Sawyers, and Richard Stillerman, The Sources of Invention, 2nd ed. (New York: Norton, 1969).

God calls to a temporal halt the path of economic development of certain social orders. This is not a random cessation of development. Inheritance and disinheritance are linked covenantally. Jeremiah announced:

Thus saith the LORD against all mine evil neighbours, that touch the inheritance which I have caused my people Israel to inherit; Behold, I will pluck them out of their land, and pluck out the house of Judah from among them. And it shall come to pass, after that I have plucked them out I will return, and have compassion on them, and will bring them again, every man to his heritage, and every man to his land. And it shall come to pass, if they will diligently learn the ways of my people, to swear by my name, The LORD liveth; as they taught my people to swear by Baal; then shall they be built in the midst of my people. But if they will not obey, I will utterly pluck up and destroy that nation, saith the LORD" (Jer. 12:14–17).

Canaan's division of labor was soon to be cut off. It was about to be replaced by Israel's division of labor. Canaan's approach to science and technology had to end. A new social order would use Canaan's physical capital to extend God's dominion. The genocidal disinheritance of Canaan would provide the physical inheritance of Israel. This inheritance was not to include knowledge that was in any way dependent on the invocation of Canaan's gods. "And ye shall overthrow their altars, and break their pillars, and burn their groves with fire; and ye shall hew down the graven images of their gods, and destroy the names of them out of that place" (Deut. 12:3). Israel failed in this exercise of religious intolerance, which is why Joshua warned against invoking the names of regional gods. "That ye come not among these nations, these that remain among you; neither make mention of the names of their gods, nor cause to swear by them, neither serve them, nor bow yourselves unto them" (Josh. 23:7).

God is the Creator, the source of all accurate knowledge. His universalism gives His people an enormous advantage. They are in a position to make productive use of the discoveries of other nations and other religions. But the use of such information is limited by biblical law. To the extent that such information is dependent on the invocation of the name of any other god, it may not lawfully be used by His people.

This means that occult knowledge is forbidden. Knowledge that is available only to the initiate into a cult or secret society is not valid, although this knowledge may be true within limits. But if such knowledge can be separated from the name of the god invoked by the cult, it is eligible to become part of the covenant-keeper's inheritance. An example would be the mathematical knowledge developed within the confines of the Pythagorean cult. Initiation into that oath-bound cult would have been forbidden to covenant-keeping Israelites, but both studying and applying the Pythagorean theorem regarding right triangles would have been legitimate activities. The truth of the theorem is not dependent on the ritual practices of the cult. The theorem became part of the inheritance of the West, which for a millennium meant Christendom.

The key issue is the oath: to swear by. The oath places man covenantally under the god invoked by the oath. Wealth, including knowledge, that is obtainable only through such oath-taking is not part of a legitimate inheritance. If the secrets of the cult pass into the public domain, as Pythagorean mathematics did, then covenant-keepers may lawfully put them to good use. Using Euclidian geometry is valid because there is no oath involved. But to seek membership in the cult in order to gain inside knowledge of its economically advantageous secrets, even to make them public, would be valid only as part of a government-directed spying operation in a war effort, such as was used in the conquest of Canaan: the spies (Josh. 2). It would then be a matter of military conquest, not economic gain. It would be a matter of the sword, not the purse. Industrial spying is therefore invalid, even if done by governments, as it surely is in the modern world. So is joining a secret order that promises business or political success. C. S. Lewis called this the desire for membership in the inner ring, and he warned against it.²⁰

H. Universal God, Regional Capital

God is not threatened by other gods. Over time, His people become less threatened by other religions. The Israelites were forbidden to speak the names of other gods. "And in all things that I have said unto you be circumspect: and make no mention of the name of other gods, neither let it be heard out of thy mouth" (Ex. 23:13). Is this law still in force? If it is in force, is it to be taken literally? Or is it an injunction against invocation? The prophets mentioned the names of other gods. So did Stephen at his stoning (Acts 7:43). This was an aspect of the study of comparative religions: announcing the superiority of God to His rivals. The prohibition against speaking the names of other gods must have been an injunction against another kind of speaking, namely, covenantal or magical invocation.

20. C. S. Lewis, "The Inner Ring" (1944), in Lewis, The Weight of Glory and Other Addresses (New York: Macmillan, 1980), pp. 93–105. (<http://bit.ly/LewisRing>)

After their return from the Babylonian captivity, the Jews did not again go after other gods. Their susceptibility to idolatry had ended. Hellenism and legalism became problems, but idolatry did not. The threat today is the threat of syncretism, also known as pluralism: the acceptance of anti-theistic presuppositions by the covenant-keeping community.²¹

The universality of God and His covenants makes it possible for covenant-keepers to accept the non-oath-bound findings of rival religious worldviews. God's church is not regional, nor was it ever intended to be. It crosses the boundaries of geography and time. The church in the broadest sense is the means of absorbing new information and making such information even more productive. It is to disseminate information and vision. Christendom's productivity is supposed to undermine all covenant-breaking social orders, bringing them face to face with the sanctions of God in history: positive and negative. This offensive conquest is not by the sword but by faith and productivity.

Discoveries always cross borders. Useful knowledge cannot be monopolized for long. The question is: Will covenant-keepers gain and retain the dominant influence in the interpretation and applications of these discoveries, or will their covenantal enemies gain control over them by means of these discoveries? In other words, whose inheritance is it? There can be no neutrality. One side or the other will inherit. The idea that these discoveries are covenantally neutral is incorrect. Truth comes only from God, and this includes the interpretation of theories and facts. Meanwhile, truths that are accepted by covenant-breakers are always misinterpreted because they deny God as the origin of all truth. As time goes on, this misinterpretation becomes more consistent, i.e., more consistently wrong. Truths are not regarded by covenant-breakers as testimonies to the God of the Bible (Rom. 1:20–25).²² Such truths are always held down through unrighteousness, which brings God's judgment in history: "For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness” (Rom. 1:18). The visible sign of such judgment is open homosexuality (Rom. 1:26–27). Legalized homosexuality in any society is a curse of God for corporate unbelief. It is a prelude to corporate destruction.

21. Chapter 15:D. See Appendix H: "Week Reed: The Politics of Compromise."

22. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 2.

So, the benefits of science and technology are always dependent on the proper use of knowledge. If covenant-keepers are unable or unwilling to set the terms of discourse for new discoveries and the application of old ones, then the wealth generated by these discoveries will eventually undermine faith: “And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth” (Deut. 8:17).²³ This will eventually result in negative sanctions: “And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God” (Deut. 8:19–20).²⁴

I. Open Borders

The Israelites were not going to be welcomed by the Canaanites. Even if they had come peacefully, they would not have been welcomed. They represented a threat to the Canaanite social order. They were people who were covenanted to another God. Religious pluralism was impossible. One side or the other would win.

Israel later welcomed strangers from other lands. Why weren’t those immigrants a threat to Israel, just as Israel had been to Canaan? First, because immigrants entered Israel on Israel’s terms: open obedience to God’s civil law was required. Proselyting for a rival god was a capital crime (Deut. 13:6–10). Second, because the gods of such immigrants would not be local gods. These immigrants had left the domain of their regional gods. Idols of non-universal gods were not a major threat to Israel. As for gods that made universal claims, there were none in the pre-captivity, pre-empire Old Covenant era. All rival gods were local. After the Babylonian captivity, the gods of a series of empires shared their pantheon with conquered deities of conquered nations. These were not universal gods in the sense that Israel’s God was: a God who shared no pantheon space with rivals. The gods of Greece were local civic gods,²⁵ or animistic gods,²⁶ or else the contrived Olympian gods, the joint products of Homeric poetry and the pan-Hellenic games. In contrast, Greek philosophy made universal claims, and Hellenism did become a major problem for Jews and Christians. But Hellenism was not tied to idols.

23. Chapter 21.

24. Chapter 22.

Israel allowed open borders because God did not allow public proselyting or public observance of rival religions. The civil order was established by a covenantal oath to God. He, and He alone, was the acknowledged sovereign of Israel. In Elijah's day, this law was being violated by priests of Baal. His confrontation on Mt. Carmel was designed to end this practice. "Then the fire of the LORD fell, and consumed the burnt sacrifice, and the wood, and the stones, and the dust, and licked up the water that was in the trench. And when all the people saw it, they fell on their faces: and they said, The LORD, he is the God; the LORD, he is the God. And Elijah said unto them, Take the prophets of Baal; let not one of them escape. And they took them: and Elijah brought them down to the brook Kishon, and slew them there" (I Kings 18:38–40).

1. Immigration

The main threat of immigration is covenantal, not economic. The increase in the national division of labor that takes place when immigrants arrive is a net benefit. The judicial problem arises because of the rival gods and rival philosophies that immigrants bring with them. The religious pluralism of modern Western politics relegates non-political covenants to adiaphora: things indifferent to political religion, so long as they do not infringe upon the realm of political religion. But we have found that political pluralism is as theocratic as any other religion. It will not tolerate challenges to its final authority from any realm outside of politics. Decade by decade, political religion extends its claims over all the other areas of life.

The modern immigrant brings with him gods that are as universal in their claims as the God of the Bible is. The local gods of ancient paganism are barely remembered, let alone understood. How can a society survive the claims to authority of the representatives of rival universal gods? How can these universal claims be harmonized with the universal claims of modern political religion? Harmonizing these claims has been the long-term national experiment of the Enlightenment era, beginning around 1700.

25. Fustel, Ancient City, III:VI, pp. 146–55.

26. Jane Harrison, Prolegomena to the Study of Greek Religion, 3rd ed. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, [1922] 1991); Themis: A Study of the Social Origins of Greek Religion (1912); Epilogomena to the Study of Greek Religion (1921), both available in online editions.

A businessman likes to have a growing supply of laborers who compete against each other to sell him their labor time. Immigration is a blessing for the employer. It increases the supply of labor, thereby lowering labor costs. But what if, after five years, these immigrants could vote themselves a share of his business? Then he would be more careful about who gains access to the nation. Naturalization makes the immigrant a participant in the modern welfare state: a citizen. He can lawfully exercise the civil sanction of voting. He can therefore gain legal entitlements to other people's wealth. So, modern political pluralism, when combined with the welfare state, creates a state of affairs in which those who already have the vote and capital resist the arrival of immigrants who bring rival philosophies regarding what constitutes the good society and the legitimate means of obtaining it.

The economist reduces everything to economics: cost-benefit analyses. Economics is as relentless in its extension of its reductionism as any other academic worldview. That which is significant politically for an economist is whatever he can reduce to fit economic concepts.²⁷ The economist is unwilling to acknowledge that politics is covenantal even though politics is based on a binding oath of allegiance under a monopolistic legal order, which in turn has its origin in God's common grace civil covenant. Marriage and the church are also covenantal and so do not readily lend themselves to economic reductionism.²⁸ This is why the economist sounds unbelievable when he discusses immigration as if it were little more than international job-seeking. The immigrant no longer brings idols with him. Instead, he brings a worldview tied to another religious order. This worldview has legitimacy equal with all others in a pluralistic political order. Idols in Mosaic Israel did not. When he becomes a naturalized citizen, the modern ex-immigrant can work to impose this worldview by voting.

27. See, for example, James M. Buchanan and Gordon Tullock, The Calculus of Consent: Logical Foundations of Constitutional Democracy (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1962). Over two decades later, Buchanan won the Nobel Prize in economics, presumably for this work more than his subsequent studies. (Tullock, a lawyer with no formal economic training, was not mentioned publicly by the Nobel Committee.)

28. One of the unresolved problems in economics is the economic analysis of prostitution. While the economist argues that "everything has a price," no unmarried economist acknowledges publicly that he much prefers sex from a prostitute to sex in marriage because of prostitution's tremendous cost savings. "Don't buy: rent!" Few men say that renting sexual favors from strangers is a better deal for them than bearing the burden of supporting a wife. Sex that is available for hire makes it inherently less valuable in most would-be buyers' eyes than marital sex.

2. Madison and Rousseau

American Constitutional political theory relies on some version of Madison's theory of factions in Federalist 51 to save republican democracy from Balkanization. Madison argued that political factions would cancel each other out, leaving commitment to the common civil order as the binding national confession. This implicitly assumed that there is a widely agreed-upon common source of justice, although Madison, like the United States Constitution, did not mention natural law. His argument was very close to Rousseau's argument for the absolute sovereignty of the General Will, expressed only through politics, over all other voluntary contracts and institutions. Madison's theory privatizes non-political relations, removing them from issues of state; Rousseau's absorbs all other relations into politics. I call Madison's view political Unitarianism.²⁹ The end result is the same: the common bond of politics.

Because covenantal consensus breaks down when the census reveals diversity, modern pluralistic society faces a crisis: cacophony. As Cornell University professor W. Pearce Williams put it in a 1983 letter to the New York Times, "we live in a consensual society in which we often have to do things we don't want to do, or even think are wrong, because we have agreed to abide by majority rule. Destroy that argument, and the result is not freedom but anarchy—a condition which the United States seems rapidly approaching."³⁰

Immigration is from two sources: foreign countries and mothers' wombs. The abortion movement is an anti-immigration movement of unique commitment. The abortionists resent the welfare implications of motherhood, but they also resent it with respect to the state. They see babies as welfare cases. Margaret Sanger was the founder of Planned Parenthood, still the best organized pro-abortion organization in the United States. In her book, The Pivot of Civilization (1922), she criticized the inherent cruelty of all welfare states. She insisted that organized efforts to help the poor are the “surest sign that our civilization has bred, is breeding, and is perpetuating constantly increasing numbers of defectives, delinquents, and dependents.”³¹ Such charity must be stopped, she insisted. The fertility of the working class must be regulated in order to reduce the production of “benign imbeciles, who encourage the defective and diseased elements of humanity in their reckless and irresponsible swarming and spawning.”³² Swarming (like insects), spawning (like fish): here was marvelous zoological rhetoric from the lionized founder of Planned Parenthood. “If we must have welfare, give it to the rich, not the poor,” she concluded.³³ “More children from the fit, less from the unfit: that is the chief issue of birth control.”³⁴ For abortionists, the womb is an open border. They seek to kill all those who would cross it without authorization.

29. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), pp. 450–52. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

30. Cited in Jaki, The Only Chaos, p. 43.

What is the biblical solution? Respect for covenantal oaths. The marriage oath creates a claim on open entry for the biological fruit of marriage. This legal claim must be defended by the civil government when some mothers seek to revoke it. Second, the civil oath grants authority to impose God’s sanctions. Those who are not under the terms of the civil oath should not be allowed to impose its terms on others. Thus, immigration is economically legitimate. What is not legitimate as a Christian ideal is a civil oath that does not bind men to allegiance to the God of the Bible. God brings negative sanctions against all rival civil oaths, and open immigration leads to two such sanctions: the breakdown of society (anarchy) or the substitution of a theocratic oath to a rival god. Roger Williams’ experiment in tiny Rhode Island—a civil order without an oath to God—became the first operational model of the Enlightenment’s much larger experiment in religious pluralism. We can safely predict concerning how this professedly neutral civil covenant will end: broken.

Conclusion

God told Israel to conquer Canaan by force. The Israelites were prohibited from making any sort of covenant with them. The best way

31. Margaret Sanger, The Pivot of Civilization (New York: Brentano’s, 1922), p. 108; cited in George Grant, Grand Illusions: The Legacy of Planned Parenthood, 2nd ed. (Franklin, Tennessee: Adroit, 1992), p. 27.

32. Sanger, ibid., p. 115; cited in Grant, ibid.

33. Ibid., p. 96; cited in Grant, ibid., p. 28.

34. Sanger, “Birth Control,” Birth Control Review (May 1919); cited in Grant, ibid., p. 27.

to prevent this was to destroy every last one of them, so that the nation would not be in a position to make additional covenants.

This reduction in the available division of labor obviously was a threat to the transfer of local knowledge: either saving knowledge to the Canaanites or destructive knowledge from the Canaanites. The benefits of whatever technical knowledge possessed by the Canaanites would not offset the liabilities of the covenantal worldview which accompanied their technical knowledge. Israel was more vulnerable to the knowledge possessed by Canaan than Canaan was to the knowledge possessed by Israel. This would not always be true, but it took the captivity and the occupation of the land by outsiders—later called Samaritans—to reduce this vulnerability. Any surviving post-conquest local gods of Canaan had by then been visibly defeated by the gods of Assyria, Babylon, and Medo-Persia. In terms of the theology of the ancient Near East, this defeat had removed them permanently as historical forces to contend with or contend for. No society invoked the gods of Canaan after the rise of the empires.

BY LAW OR BY PROMISE?

All the commandments which I command thee this day shall ye observe to do, that ye may live, and multiply, and go in and possess the land which the LORD swore unto your fathers (Deut. 8:1).

The theocentric framework of this law is the dominion covenant: the command to be fruitful and multiply (Gen. 1:27–28).¹ It is an aspect of point three: ethics/law/boundaries. Obedience to God's law produces dominion.

A. Economic Growth

Deuteronomy 8 is by far the most important passage in the Bible dealing with the topic of Adam Smith's classic 1776 book, An Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations. It announced the covenantal pattern for economic growth: grace, subordination, law, sanctions, and inheritance. It listed the unmerited gifts that God gave to Israel, from Israel's deliverance out of bondage to the raw materials of the Promised Land. This is all grace. Twice Moses called upon the Israelites to remember God's grace (vv. 2, 18). This was a call to subordination. Four times he reminded them to keep God's commandments (vv. 1, 2, 6, 11). He spoke of the positive sanction of economic growth (v. 13) and the negative sanction of expulsion from the land (vv. 19, 20). Yet the entire chapter deals with the inheritance: the land of Israel. To maintain this inheritance, the Israelites had to obey biblical law. In other words, their maintenance of the inheritance was ethically conditional.

The passage begins with a call to obedience. Moses warned the generation of the conquest to obey all of God's commandments. The theme of covenantal faithfulness through national obedience is continual in Deuteronomy, for only through corporate covenantal obedience to the Mosaic law could the conquest generation maintain its inheritance. The language of the text is clear: collecting the promised inheritance was conditional. “All the commandments which I command thee this day shall ye observe to do, that ye may live, and multiply, and go in and possess the land which the LORD swore unto your fathers.”

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 4.

This verse raises a theological problem regarding the terms of inheritance. God had sworn to the patriarchs that He would give the land to Israel. He had promised Abraham that the fourth generation would inherit (Gen. 15:16). The theological question is this: Was Israel’s inheritance legally secured by God’s promise or by their obedience to the law?

B. Circumcision and Inheritance

In the context of God’s promise to Abraham that his seed would inherit, Paul wrote: “For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise” (Gal. 3:18). Paul was speaking of Jesus Christ, not the Israelites, as the inheriting Seed. He was speaking of the kingdom of God, not the land of Canaan. Nevertheless, the judicial question was the same in both cases: By law or by promise? Paul argued clearly: by promise. On this passage, Protestantism rests much of its case for salvation by grace rather than works: “That the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ; that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith” (v. 14).

Yet there is no doubt that one legal condition for Israel’s inheritance was circumcision. Abraham was required to circumcise his household’s males (Gen. 17:12–13). The Israelites, in turn, were required to circumcise their household males. The generation of the exodus had failed to do this, so Joshua had the conquest generation circumcised as soon as they crossed the boundary of the Jordan River (Josh. 5:7). The promise to Abraham remained valid, but to qualify judicially as the generation of the conquest, all of the males had to be circumcised. Wasn’t circumcision a work of the law? Yes. So, if inheritance was by circumcision, how could it be by promise?

To make sense of this seeming anomaly, we should seek a solution by considering the judicial nature of the Abrahamic promise. The fourth generation would inherit, God had promised (Gen. 15:16). He had immediately sealed that promise with a covenantal oath-sign: passing a fire between pieces of a dismembered animal (Gen. 15:17). This was a sanctions-bound self-maledictory oath. It meant this: "So let it be done unto Me if I do not bring to pass what I have promised to Abraham." But what constituted a generation? Judicially, this had to mean circumcised sons. A man was not an Israelite by birth; he was an Israelite by covenant. "And the uncircumcised man child whose flesh of his foreskin is not circumcised, that soul shall be cut off from his people; he hath broken my covenant" (Gen. 17:14).

The external mark of this covenant was circumcision. The same was true corporately of the inheriting generation. They would not become that promised generation by birth; they would become that generation by covenant. The promise was secure; nevertheless, conformity to the definitional terms of the promise mandated the work of circumcision: no circumcision—no generation; no generation—no fulfillment of the promise. So, the judicial basis of the fourth generation's inheritance was obedience to God's specially revealed law: circumcision. Yet the judicial basis of the possibility of inheritance was promise.

This two-fold conclusion is inescapable: (1) promise as the judicial basis of God's granting of the inheritance to Israel through Abraham; (2) Israel's obedience as the judicial basis of His transferring it to them as promised. The special form of obedience was the oath. Circumcision was an oath sign.²

Protestant commentators have gone out of their way to avoid discussing the fourth generation's circumcision as the judicial requirement for collecting the inheritance. It is clear why they have done this: the Pauline doctrine of inheritance by promise. While James did not write about the judicial basis of Christ's inheritance, we can be fairly sure what he would have written: inheritance by Christ's obedience. To mark Himself as the heir—the lawful heir—of the promise, Christ had to obey the law. The situation facing the fourth generation was analogous: to mark themselves as the lawful heirs of the promise, they had to obey the law.

Paul wrote of Abraham, "For the promise, that he should be the heir of the world, was not to Abraham, or to his seed, through the law, but through the righteousness of faith. For if they which are of the law be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect"

2. Meredith G. Kline, By Oath Consigned: A Reinterpretation of the Covenant Signs of Circumcision and Baptism (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1968), ch. 3.

(Rom. 4:13–14). But on what is saving faith grounded judicially? Answer: on the substitutionary atonement of Christ. This atonement was grounded judicially in the perfection of Christ, who obeyed the whole of the law of God. He was a perfect sacrifice; no other would have sufficed to placate God's wrath. "Though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered; And being made perfect, he became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him" (Heb. 5:8–9). Christ's legal sonship was marked by His perfect obedience to God's law, even unto death. Analogously, the fourth generation's heirship was marked by their circumcision, even unto risking death, i.e., their temporary military incapacity while inside the boundaries of the Promised Land. They were military invaders, yet they deliberately incapacitated themselves as a nation. They placed their faith in God's promise to Abraham, not in their own military might.

Protestants speak of unmerited grace. With respect to the recipients of grace, grace is indeed unmerited. Men do not merit God's favor on their own account. But with respect to the judicial basis of grace, it is completely merited by the perfect life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Unmerited grace is grounded in Christ's merit through obedience. This merit is a legal claim, and as heirs to grace through their adoption by God through Christ, this legal claim passes to the elect. Salvation is legally claimed by the elect, not on the basis of their obedience, but on the basis of Christ's obedience. Grace is grounded in biblical law, which includes the Abrahamic law of circumcision, through one man's perfect fulfilling of biblical law's stipulations.

So, to discuss Israel's inheritance in terms of promise only or law only is to discuss half of the legal transaction. The inheritance was established by grace through God's promise, but there was supposed to be obedience on the part of the fourth generation. Joshua understood the legal conditions of this inheritance. Israel might, by God's grace, inherit without obedience, but they were supposed to obey. This was Moses' message to them, too: maintenance of the kingdom grant was conditional. As the author of the Hebrews put it, "And being made perfect, he became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him" (Heb. 5:9).

C. Maintaining the Kingdom Grant

"All the commandments which I command thee this day shall ye observe to do, that ye may live, and multiply, and go in and possess the land which the LORD swore unto your fathers" (Deut. 8:1). This was not the announcement of the judicial definition of what constituted the fourth generation, namely, circumcision. This was an announcement of a covenantal link between obedience and inheritance. How can we make theological sense of Moses' words? He invoked the promise while mandating obedience.

First, we must ask: Did Moses expect the blessings listed in Deuteronomy 8 to unfold sequentially? Did he mean to say that the fourth generation had to obey the commandments in order for God to multiply them, to be followed by their conquest of the land? Obviously not, since he was preparing them for the conquest, not for a long period of population growth as the means of military conquest. Their multiplication would come after they had secured the land. Yet the text places multiplication prior to the securing of the land. If we take his words as sequentially meaningful, his call to obedience would make no chronological sense. The conquest would be delayed for another generation. But the fourth generation had to inherit.

Second, we must ask: What was Moses getting at? Answer: the requirement that Israel obey God in order to possess the land, maintain the land, and multiply in the land. Israel obeyed God first by submitting to circumcision. This act of obedience preceded the conquest. While the people might have relied on God's grace to enable them to conquer the land without being circumcised, instead they relied on God's grace to enable them to escape military defeat during their time of physical incapacity.³ In both scenarios, they had to rely on grace: the promise, which Moses cited. They could be sure of the promise. The question was: How best to claim their grace-based inheritance. By refusing to be circumcised or by risking a military set-back? They chose the latter.

Grace precedes law in both God's covenant of creation and His covenant of redemption. He gave the law to Adam (Gen. 2:16) after He had given Adam life and land (Gen. 2:7–14). This is the covenantal pattern: grace precedes law. James Jordan wrote: "God's Word is always promise before it is command. . . . God always bestows the Kingdom as a gift before presenting us with our duties in it."⁴ The kingdom had been bestowed on Abraham as a gift. That is, the land had long ago

3. They knew the story of Shechem: how Simeon and Levi had slaughtered them while the Shechemites were recovering from circumcision (Gen. 34:25–26).

4. James B. Jordan, Covenant Sequence in Leviticus and Deuteronomy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), p. 7. (<http://bit.ly/jjcovseq>)

been assigned to Abraham's heirs. God had transferred the land to Israel by grace and promise, but He had not yet transferred legal title to the new owners. That would come through military conquest. They had received the law at Sinai four decades earlier, not two centuries earlier. They had been tested in the wilderness in terms of the Mosaic law, and the fourth generation had passed these tests. After the conquest, they would have to remain judicially faithful in order to retain possession.

Grace always precedes law in God's dealings with His subordinates. We are in debt to God even before He speaks to us. The land grant was based on the original promise given to Abraham. That promise came prior to the giving of the Mosaic law.⁵ This is why Jordan said that the laws of Leviticus are more than legislation; the focus of the laws is not simply obedience to God, but rather on maintaining the grant.⁶ Israel's basis of maintaining the grant was ethics, not the sacrifices. Man cannot maintain the kingdom in sin.⁷

Moses continued: "And thou shalt remember all the way which the LORD thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep his commandments, or no" (v. 2). This would seem to violate the principle of grace preceding redemption. God had humbled them in order to see whether or not they would obey Him. The giving of the law at Sinai was followed by the negative sanction of national humiliation. Only four decades later was the prospect of inheritance before them. This seems to point to another pattern: law-humiliation-grace.

To whom was Moses speaking? To the heirs of a formerly enslaved nation. The giving of the law did not take place in an historical vacuum. It took place after a series of miraculous deliverances. The giving of the Mosaic law was the culminating act of national deliverance. Grace precedes law, but it does not annul law. Law confirms grace. It ratifies a prior gift of God.

D. Covenantal Predictability and Social Theory

Is the historical fulfillment of God's promises separate from the law? Not according to Moses. Is this fulfillment separate from the recipients' fulfillment of the law? Only partially. Grace may bring fulfillment despite a period of rebellion. Nevertheless, there is a covenantal pattern announced in the law, but especially in Deuteronomy: obedience brings blessings; disobedience brings cursings. Inheritance and disinheritance are not random; they are predictable covenantally. They are not predictable perfectly in all cases because grace is greater than sin. Negative sanctions are sometimes delayed despite sin (e.g., the Amorites in Canaan, Abraham to Moses—an example of common grace). But our affirmation of grace must not become an affirmation of historical indeterminism regarding corporate blessings and cursings. A person who invokes grace in order to deny the consequences of law becomes an ally of covenant-breakers. He has denied the covenant. He has denied the historical relevance of God's law in history. But history does not take place in a judicial vacuum. Other law-orders will be imposed in order to govern men, including Christians. We must decide: God's law or chaos? God's law or tyranny?

5. Ibid., p. 8.

6. Ibid., p. 9.

7. Ibid., p. 11.

Whenever the covenantal predictability of corporate inheritance and disinheritance is denied, a uniquely biblical social theory becomes impossible. This is why Lutheranism has always been incapable of producing independent social theory. Luther was adamant about the irrelevance of Christianity for legal theory. To rulers, Luther wrote: "Certainly it is true of Christians, so far as they themselves are concerned, are subject neither to law [n]or sword, and have need of neither. But take heed and fill the world with real Christians before you attempt to rule in a Christian and evangelical manner."⁸ As for true Christians, "these people need no temporal law or sword. If all the world were composed of real Christians, that is, true believers, there would be no need for or benefits from prince, king, sword, or law."⁹ Luther was an ethical dualist.¹⁰ Because Lutheranism denies any relevance to biblical law in the arrival of corporate blessings, it must invoke ethical dualism: natural law or pagan law for the civil sphere, personal morality for the individual Christian, and silence regarding the church. But what is true of Lutheranism is equally true of any form of Christianity which uses the doctrine of grace to annul the covenantal predictability of corporate sanctions. *When Calvinism abandons faith in covenantal predictability in history, it ceases to be Calvinism; it becomes Lutheran.*¹¹

8. Martin Luther, "Temporal Authority: To What Extent it Should Be Obeyed" (1523), Luther's Works (Philadelphia: Muhlenberg, 1962), XLV, p. 91.

9. Ibid., p. 89.

10. Charles Trinkaus, "The Religious Foundations of Luther's Social Views," in John H. Mundy, et al., Essays in Medieval Life (Cheshire, Connecticut: Biblo & Tannen, 1955), pp. 71–87. Cf. David J. Lose, "The Ambidextrous God: Luther on Faith and Politics," Word & World, XIX (Summer 1999), pp. 260–67.

Protestant social theology has almost always been Lutheran in content, if not form: an unstable mixture of personal Christian morality combined with humanistic, common-ground natural law theory. Personal morality is regarded as having had no meaningful implications for the development of social theory. This delivers social theory into the hands of covenant-breakers and their intellectual allies within the church, who share the covenant-breakers' assumptions regarding the possibility of both ethical neutrality and epistemological neutrality, as well as the irrelevance or even harmful effects of Old Testament law on society. When theologians challenge this unofficial but long-term alliance, they are challenged with some variation of the following: "The LORD look upon you, and judge; because ye have made our savour to be abhorred in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of his servants, to put a sword in their hand to slay us" (Ex. 5:21). Dispensational author David Allen Lewis offered this reason for rejecting Christian Reconstruction: it may upset humanists, who will inevitably become more powerful. "[A]s the secular, humanistic, demonically-dominated world system becomes more and more aware that the Dominionists and Reconstructionists are a real political threat, they will sponsor more and more concerted efforts to destroy the Evangelical church. Unnecessary persecution could be stirred up."¹²

Conclusion

Moses told the conquest generation to obey God's law. Yet he also cited the promise. He said that the long-term success of the conquest was dependent on their continued covenantal faithfulness. Yet the promise God made to Abraham was secure: sealed by an oath-sign.

11. This is what Meredith G. Kline's denial of God's predictable sanctions in history represents. See Kline, "Comments on an Old-New Error," Westminster Theological Journal, XLI (Fall 1978), p. 184. Kline's former student and full-time disciple Michael Horton has been far more open regarding this quest for a Lutheran-Calvinist reconciliation. The judicial basis of such a reconciliation must be Calvinism's acceptance of Lutheranism's ethical dualism, which Horton's two-kingdoms theology promotes. (<http://bit.ly/HortonKingdoms>) In a letter to Christian News (Nov. 13, 1995), a conservative Lutheran publication, he wrote of his organization, CURE, that "we are building a cooperative effort between the Reformed and Lutheran Christians in an effort to restore a Reformation witness." Horton left the Reformed Episcopal Church and joined the Christian Reformed Church in 1995. In 1998, he joined the faculty of Westminster Theological Seminary in Escondido, California, in historical theology.

12. Lewis, Prophecy 2000 (Green Forest, Arkansas: New Leaf Press, 1990), p. 277.

Their conquest of the land was guaranteed. Yet they were told to obey God's laws. There can be no doubt that Moses invoked both the law and the promise. This is what troubles Protestant commentators.

The solution to the problem is to recognize the judicial basis of the promise, which was a form of grace. All grace is grounded judicially on the perfect fulfillment of the whole of God's law. There must be perfect obedience. "For whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all" (James 2:10). There can be no separation of law and promise, for promise is grounded in law. The question is: Whose obedience? The answer is inescapable: Jesus Christ's obedience. So, the fulfillment of any promise rests judicially on Christ's fulfillment of the demands of the law. Grace is present because of the judicially representative character of Christ's fulfillment, just as the curse is present because of the judicially representative character of Adam's Fall. Imputation by God is fundamental: the imputation of Christ's perfection or the imputation of Adam's sin. God looks on each person and imputes—declares judicially—one or the other moral condition. Then He pronounces sentence: "Guilty" or "Not guilty."

The Israelites would soon mark themselves, both literally and symbolically, as lawful heirs to the promise through circumcision. This they did under Joshua. In the wilderness, it had not mattered so much that they were not circumcised, but after they crossed the boundary of the land, they would have remained profane—sacred boundary violators—had they not become circumcised.¹³ To avoid remaining profane, they submitted to circumcision. Then they proceeded to remove the truly profane nations from the land.

Moses was also warning them in this passage about the ethical basis of maintaining the kingdom grant. A nation of covenant-breakers could not indefinitely occupy the Promised Land. God would remove them (Deut. 8:19–20).¹⁴

13. On the biblical concept of the profane, see Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 6.

14. Chapter 22.

MIRACLES, ENTROPY, AND SOCIAL THEORY

And thou shalt remember all the way which the LORD thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep his commandments, or no. And he humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know; that he might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the LORD doth man live. Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell, these forty years (Deut. 8:2–4).

The theocentric focus of this law is the absolute sovereignty of God over the creation, including man. The test of the nation's commitment to God—"what was in thine heart"—was ethics: "whether thou wouldest keep his commandments, or no."

A. Continuous Miracles

God broke the laws of nature in order to sustain His people in the wilderness. This should persuade all men to obey God. God had fed Israel miraculously with manna. In the midst of their national humiliation, there had been life-giving grace. But that was not all: "Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell, these forty years" (v. 4). Their clothes had not worn out. Their feet had not become swollen. Moses made it clear that God's grace had not been a one-time event. It had been a continuous process for four decades. He reminded them of this because a miracle sustained for decades ceases to be regarded as a miracle. It becomes a familiar aspect of daily life. It seems to be an inherent part of the environment, but it isn't. Men expect benefits in this life. When these benefits are continual, men regard them as normal.

This law was not a land law. It related to Israel's wandering, but its intent was man's universal obedience: "And he humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know; that he might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the LORD doth man live." Jesus cited this law to Satan in the famous stones-into-bread temptation (Matt. 4:4).¹ It is clearly a cross-boundary law, which means that it is still binding under the New Covenant.²

A miracle is abnormal. It is a supernatural act of deliverance or blessing which disrupts the normal pattern of events. But the normal pattern of events is itself a manifestation of grace, beginning with life itself. This grace need not imply God's favor; it is nevertheless an unmerited gift to men and angels, both fallen and unfallen.³ Both historical continuity and discontinuity are acts of God's grace. The former is so continuous—a series of life-sustaining acts strung together infinitesimally close—that its gracious character is perceived only through faith, which in turn is an initially discontinuous event that through self-discipline is supposed to become continuous.

The miracles of the wilderness era were so continuous that they took on the appearance of common grace. Moses reminded Israel of the special position which the nation had in God's eyes, as proven by their patch-free clothing. God had actively intervened in history to sustain them in preparation for the promised day of judgment. The day of judgment is a day of sanctions, positive and negative, depending on one's covenantal status. The day of negative sanctions was about to arrive inside the boundaries of Canaan. For the Israelites, this would bring the promised inheritance. For the Canaanites, this would bring the promised disinheritance; their cup of iniquity was at long last full (Gen. 15:16).

B. The Second Law of Thermodynamics

I have written a book on the apologetic uses and misuses—mostly misuses—of the second law of thermodynamics.⁴ I wrote it for two

1. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 1.

2. On cross-boundary laws, see Appendix J.

3. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

4. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview

reasons: (1) to refute a socialist propagandist who had presented a defense of state economic planning in terms of the need to reduce entropy; (2) to refute modern Creation Science insofar as the second law has been invoked to thwart the construction of an explicitly creationist social theory. In both cases, the theorists have misused the second law of thermodynamics.

The first law of thermodynamics is called the law of the conservation of energy. It states that the total energy of the universe—a supposedly closed system—does not change. Potential energy may become kinetic (changing) energy, but total energy does not change. Modern physics is built on this law. The condition described by the first law of thermodynamics is one reason why there can never be a perpetual motion machine. It would have to produce more usable energy (work) than it began with. It would have to do its work and then re-supply itself with an amount of potential energy equal to or greater than it expended in doing the work. This is sometimes called a perpetual motion machine of the first kind.

The second law of thermodynamics states that in a closed system, potential energy can become kinetic energy, but kinetic energy—energy transformed—cannot become potential energy. Therefore, the energy available for usable work declines over time (classical thermodynamics). As an example, temperature moves from hot to cold, but it does not move from cold to hot unless external heat is applied. Another example: a brick may fall from a wall to the ground, but it will not rise from the ground to the wall unless additional energy is added to the process from outside the system, such as someone who lifts it. Put chronologically, time does not move backward. Contemporary humanism teaches that from the moment just after the Big Bang until that frozen waste called the heat death of the universe, energy is dissipated.⁵ Sir Arthur Eddington named this one-way process of energy dissipation through time: time's arrow.

The idea of time's arrow creates a serious cosmological problem for evolutionists. Time's arrow proceeds from order to disorder, whereas evolution's arrow supposedly moves from less order to greater order: from the simple to the complex. These two processes have yet to be reconciled by means of an appeal to the thermodynamic laws governing the universe as a closed system.

(Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988). (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

5. But will electrons quit moving? Will atoms still be there? Does the second law apply to subatomic realm?

In any physical process—potential energy to kinetic energy—there will always be heat loss or heat dispersion, also described as an increase in randomness, within a closed system (statistical thermodynamics). This loss of coherence is sometimes called entropy. Entropy is a measure of the increase in randomness. The work performed by a machine is a one-time event. The energy has been dissipated, some of it into heat loss. In a machine without oil or some other lubricant, the grinding of metal is audible to all: heat is being produced and then dissipated. There is no lubricant in nature that can overcome all of this heat loss. This is entropy's law. This is a second reason why there can be no perpetual motion machine: heat loss. The machine cannot regain all of the energy expended in work because some of that kinetic energy is lost through heat dispersion.

Perpetual clothing is the equivalent of a perpetual motion machine. This passage proves that, in principle, a perpetual motion machine is possible, but it takes supernatural resource inputs to make it run. The system—nature—is not closed all of the time. Whenever it is closed, however, clothing always wears out through friction. Everything wears out. Feet swell and then wear out. People attached to feet wear out. This is the second law of thermodynamics at work. Where work is performed in a closed system—no new infusions of energy or anything else from outside—the second law guarantees that there is a permanent loss of potential energy, so that some day, potential energy will dissipate—become random—and cease to perform any work. The universe eventually will go into permanent retirement, sometimes called the heat death of the universe. This is inevitable, unless . . . unless the second law of thermodynamics is violated by what is known in Christian circles as the final judgment, or unless the second law of thermodynamics is violated by miracles, or unless the second law of thermodynamics is not actually a law but merely a familiar process regionally and temporally that is not in fact universal. Most physicists regard it as universal,⁶ which is why most physicists: (1) deny any final judgment other than the impersonal heat death of the universe; (2) deny the existence of miracles.

Once you admit the existence of miracles that are generated and sustained from outside the system of the universe, you thereby deny the universality of the second law of thermodynamics. If the universe is an open system, then the second law need not always apply. Unless you see God as a kind of energy pipeline operator who siphons off useful energy from other parts of the universe in order to overcome the negative effects of entropy in this region of the universe, you must regard miracles as a violation of the second law. To define miracles as consistent with the second law, you would have to explain the patch-free clothing of the Israelites as having caused a loss of potential energy somewhere else in the immense closed system called the universe. “Entropy still ruled in the wilderness, but its effects on Israelite clothing were offset by God, who drained off potential energy from some other region.” Ultimately, this strictly physical approach to miracles would force Christians to explain the resurrection and ascension of Jesus Christ in terms of permanently lost potential energy. Then they must search for the existence of a heat sink into which wasted energy was dispersed.

6. They are not equally sure regarding the subatomic realm.

C. In the Garden of Eden⁷

Adam had a nose. He had a sense of smell. But what was there to smell? The fragrance of flowers is a product of the second law of thermodynamics: the move from order to disorder. The millions of tiny particles that activate our sense of smell are distributed randomly, which is why we smell them rather than step in them. They do not pile up.

Consider another example. What if Adam had wanted to build an internal combustion engine? Without a carburetor, the liquid known as gasoline would not power an automobile except in one fiery propulsion event. The carburetor breaks up the liquid into tiny droplets and distributes them randomly in a heat chamber where these particles can be ignited safely by an electric spark. Were it not for the second law of thermodynamics, there would be only one explosion, not thousands per minute.

What if Adam had wanted to play a friendly game of solitaire? He would have pulled out a deck of cards and shuffled them. No cheating here! Shuffling a deck of cards makes the order of the cards unpredictable. Why? Because their order has moved toward randomness. Why? Because of the second law of thermodynamics.

This means that the second law of thermodynamics operated before the Fall of man. This was admitted once by Henry M. Morris, who elsewhere has built his apologetic for creationism on the second law. In an essay addressed primarily to scientists rather than the general Christian public, he made this statement regarding the operation of the second law in Eden: “The formal announcement of the second law in its post-Fall form is found in Genesis 3:17–20. . . . Thus, as best we can understand both Scripture and science, we must date the establishment of the second law of thermodynamics, in its present form at least, from the tragic day on which Adam sinned. . . .”⁸ To speak of the “second law in its post-Fall form” and “in its present form at least” is an unobjectionable way to discuss the second law. It suggests that we must distinguish the pre-Fall and post-Fall operations of the second law. This implies that we should distinguish a cursed from an uncursed operation of that law. We live in a cursed-entropy world, not an entropy-cursed world. But, as far as I am aware, nowhere else in his writings did Morris discuss the implications of this distinction, nor do his colleagues in the Creation Science movement. This is a major weakness in that movement. A discussion of entropy prior to Adam’s Fall is long overdue in Creation Science—so overdue that I suspect that a full discussion would raise objections to the ways in which the movement has used the second law in the past, as well as the ways in which the members of the movement have refused to use it.

7. This section is based on “Entropy in the Garden of Eden,” Is the World Running Down?, pp. 124–26.

The correct use of the second law of thermodynamics in Christian apologetics mandates tight constraints. To argue that the world is running down because of entropy is incorrect. Prior to Adam’s rebellion, the second law of thermodynamics operated in a world that was in no way running down. The second law today operates differently from the way it did in Eden. That is, the physical effects of the second law of thermodynamics were in some fundamental way changed by God after the Fall of man. These effects have been cursed.

Entropy is a fact of life, like death and taxes. Prior to the Fall of man, it was equally a fact of life, before death and taxes had appeared. Despite entropy’s cursed effects, we can and should work to achieve longer life spans and lower taxes. The Bible prophesies a future era of longer life spans (Isa. 65:20).⁹ Why not lower taxes to match? Why not reductions in entropy? Entropy is a cost. We can find ways of lowering costs. Motor oil reduces metallic friction and therefore reduces entropy. With respect to entropy's economic costs, they have been steadily reduced since the Industrial Revolution. That entropy exists, there can be no doubt, although if it operates in the subatomic realm, it has not yet manifested itself. That entropy, as a cost of production, can have significant effects on a particular social order is also not doubted. But that a serious social theory can be constructed in terms of entropy as an ever-growing social cost is highly doubtful, as socialist Jeremy Rifkin's failed attempt indicates. He ceased writing about entropy within few years after he announced it as a major intellectual breakthrough, substituting time-management as the culprit of capitalism.¹⁰

8. Henry M. Morris, “Thermodynamics and Biblical Theology,” in Emmett L. Williams (ed.), Thermodynamics and the Development of Order (Norcross, Georgia: Creation Research Books, 1981), pp. 129–30.

9. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 15.

D. Continuity and Discontinuity

The Christian's case against Darwinian evolution can be based on the second law of thermodynamics only on the unstated assumption that today's universe is not governed by the physical laws of the pre-Fall universe. The Christian must be very careful how he uses the second law. He cannot accurately say that entropy did not exist in Eden, because it did operate there. Pollen's move from an ordered to a disordered (random) state—entropy—was what activated Adam's sense of smell. What was missing in Eden was hay fever, not entropy. Entropy was not cursed before the Fall; today it is. But this is not how modern defenders of Creation Science usually state their case. They state it incorrectly, as if the second law of thermodynamics did not operate prior to the Fall. They do not distinguish between the uncursed and cursed effects of the second law; instead, they distinguish between a world before the second law was imposed by God and today's fallen world under its despotic rule. They argue that the second law came into existence as a result of God's curse. Morris writes: "This law states that all systems, if left to themselves, tend to become degraded or disordered. . . . This, then, is the true origin of the strange law of disorder and decay, universally applicable, all-important second law of thermodynamics. Herein is the secret of all that's wrong with the world. Man is a sinner and has brought God's curse on the earth."¹¹ In 1982, he wrote: "It is well to be reminded that the two greatest laws of science—the universal principles of conservation and decay—are merely the scientific formulations of, first, God's completed and conserved work of creation, and second, His curse on the creation because of sin."¹² It is as if he had forgotten his properly qualified statement in 1981: "The formal announcement of the second law in its post-Fall form is found in Genesis 3:17–20. . . . Thus, as best we can understand both Scripture and science, we must date the establishment of the second law of thermodynamics, in its present form at least, from the tragic day on which Adam sinned. . . ."¹³ Morris' inaccurate formulation of the second law is widely cited in creationist circles, where it is invoked repeatedly in the apologetic against Darwinism. Hardly anyone knows about his correct formulation, which would force creationists to qualify this apologetic and thereby weaken it rhetorically, though strengthen it logically.

10. North, Is the World Running Down?, Appendix F: "Time for a Change: Rifkin's 'New, Improved' Worldview."

11. Henry M. Morris, The Genesis Record: A Scientific and Devotional Commentary on the Book of Beginnings (San Diego, California: Creation-Life, 1976), p. 127.

Invoking the second law of thermodynamics is a strictly negative apologetic tactic, and, as we shall see, it falls on deaf humanist ears. The Christian uses this argument to refute a Darwinist's assertion that ours is the only world there has ever been or will ever be. The Christian says: "If this really is the only world there has ever been, then the second law of thermodynamics tells us that things could not have evolved from less order to more order. Entropy denies Darwinism." To which the faithful Darwinian replies: "But the second law applies only to closed systems, and the earth is not a closed system." The proper Christian response is: "Then how did the universe itself evolve from disorder to order?" To which the no longer faithful Darwinian responds: "In the nanosecond of the Big Bang, when the second law did not apply."

The Darwinist must invoke cosmic discontinuity—the evolutionist's equivalent of the Bible's doctrine of creation out of nothing—in order to secure the present continuity of nature's evolutionary processes. Many leading Darwinists have now capitulated to discontinuity: punctuated equilibrium, physically unexplainable, extremely rapid, comprehensive biological transformations of entire species.¹⁴ But this does not shake their faith in the naturalism of the laws of evolution, any more than the existence of miracles shakes the Christian's faith in the universality of the laws of thermodynamics. Each side explains the existence of exceptions to the not-quite universal laws of thermody-

12. Henry M. Morris, Evolution in Turmoil (San Diego, California: Creation-Life, 1982), p. 174.

13. Morris, "Thermodynamics and Biblical Theology" (1981), op. cit., pp. 129–30. Emphasis added.

14. The main proponent in the United States was Harvard University paleontologist Stephen Jay Gould, who died in 2002.

namics in terms of its respective presuppositions regarding the origins of the universe. Neither side is willing to admit that the universe has been governed by the second law of thermodynamics throughout history: from either the garden of Eden or the Big Bang.

The Christian's legitimate apologetic use of the second law of thermodynamics is therefore extremely limited in scope: to force the Darwinist to abandon uniformitarianism, i.e., the original Darwinian doctrine that the processes of nature that we observe today have always been operational. This doctrine is what provided the pre-Darwinian geologists with their evolutionary time scale, which was crucial to their denial of the accuracy of Genesis 1. This discovery of what John McPhee has called "deep time" led to the next intellectual revolution: Darwinism.¹⁵ Darwin adopted Hutton's and Lyell's uniformitarian geology before he restructured biology.¹⁶ But rare is the contemporary Darwinist who is silenced by the uniformitarian argument for cosmic continuity. He is willing to invoke cosmic discontinuities whenever convenient, now that he and his peers have agreed that Darwin's continuity-based arguments have permanently shoved the Bible's God out of the universe and out of men's thinking. Having made such effective epistemological and cultural use of Darwinian continuity, evolutionists today feel secure in invoking discontinuity whenever convenient, in much the same way that the creationists invoke miracles. Punctuated equilibrium—unexplainably huge discontinuities in macro-evolution—is modern Darwinism's equivalent of the Israelites' crossing of the Red Sea.

Darwinists want their cosmic miracles to be impersonal, so as to avoid considering God's final judgment. They want final judgment to be the impersonal eternal heat death of the universe long after they and everything else has died, not the highly personal eternal flames of the lake of fire. In contrast, Christians want their historical miracles to be personal, long before everything has died, in order to invoke God's final judgment. They want to escape the meaninglessness of the impersonal heat death of the universe in order to believe in the meaningfulness of God's highly personal judicial declaration, "Not guilty!"

15. McPhee is quoted by Stephen Jay Gould, Time's Arrow/Time's Cycle: Myth and Metaphor in the Discovery of Geological Time (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1987), p. 2.

16. Robert A. Nisbet, Social Change and History: Aspects of the Western Theory of Development (New York: Oxford University Press, 1969), pp. 182–84.

E. Is the Social World Running Down?¹⁷

Those who invoke the second law as an argument against Darwinism are almost always premillennialists. Most of the others are amillennialists. As pessimillennialists, they also are highly tempted to argue that the social order is analogous to the physical order. It, too, is visibly running down. Nothing can restore it except: (1) the premillennial return of Jesus Christ to set up an earthly millennial kingdom (where the second law will be annulled or else overcome by regular miracles); (2) the amillennial return of Christ at the final judgment (after which the second law will be annulled).

Not many pessimillennialists will actually go into print on this point. In a flyer produced by the Bible-Science Association and the Genesis Institute (same address), we read the following: "The creationist realizes that the world is growing old around him. He understands that things tend to run down, to age, to die. The creationist does not look for the world to improve, but to crumble slowly—as in erosion, decay, and aging."¹⁸ This is a philosophy of self-conscious defeat, a cry of cultural despair. It is also not the kind of philosophy that anyone would normally choose to challenge socialists or other humanists.

1. Social Entropy

The whole idea of social entropy as an aspect of physical entropy is wrong-headed. First, the entropic process of cosmic physical decay takes place in humanistic time scales of billions of years. Such a time scale is irrelevant for social theory, whether Christian or pagan. Societies do not survive for billions of years—not so far, anyway.

Second, what does it mean to say "the world will [or will not] improve"? What world? The geophysical world? What does an ethical or aesthetic term such as "improve" have to do with the physical world? Scientific evolutionists have been careful to avoid such value-laden adjectives with respect to historical geology or biology, at least with respect to the world prior to mankind's appearance. Without a moral evaluator, says the Darwinist, there can be no meaning for the word "improve."

Christians should be equally careful in their use of language. The Christian should argue that God evaluates any improvement or degen-eration in the external world, and therefore men, acting as God's subordinates, also make such evaluations. But there is no autonomous im-personal standard of "world improvement," as any evolutionist readily admits. So, the flyer apparently had as its point of reference not the geophysical world but rather man's social world.

17. This section is based on Is the World Running Down?, ch. 3: "Entropy and Social Theory."

18. What's the Difference? Creation/Evolution? (no date), p. 2.

The flyer says that things tend to run down. "Evolution demands that things 'wind up' even as we see them run down. Therefore the evolutionist looks for things to improve." This implies that Christians should not look for things to improve. Again, what do we mean by "improve"? If things only tend to run down, this implies that sometimes things don't run down. If so, then there must be decay-offsetting progressive forces in operation. What might these be? The main one is the gospel of salvation. Regeneration restores ethical wholeness to men. Another offsetting factor is obedience to the law of God. God's law enables men to rebuild a cursed world. In other words, ethics is fundamental; entropy isn't. This is why entropy, to the extent that any such phenomenon applies to the affairs of men, is only a tendency.

The reason why I keep citing this short document (tract) is because it is the one creationist document I have seen that even mentions social theory, and even then only vaguely. I would have been happy to consider other documents from Creation Scientists that deal with entropy in relation to social theory, but I have been unable to find any. In 1988, I searched the complete set of the Creation Social Sciences and Humanities Quarterly and found nothing on the topic. There is zero interest in this topic in modern evangelicalism. There is almost as little interest in the relationship between creationism and the social sciences. By 1895, 36 years after the publication of Origin of Species, Darwinism had captured virtually every academic field. By 1994, 33 years after the publication of Morris and Whitcomb's Genesis Flood, this thin quarterly magazine ceased publication. It had been published for 16 years. It never had more than 600 subscribers. It never reviewed Is the World Running Down?, despite the fact that its main author, Ellen Myers, was for years on ICE's mailing list. It occasionally would reprint something I had written, but not on the topic of entropy. (Its partial archives are on the Web.)¹⁹ My book was never reviewed in any Creation Science publication that I ever saw. It went down the memory hole. The book was a self-conscious frontal assault on the movement's use of the second law, yet the movement's leaders pretended that it did not exist. Pretense that a major criticism has never been offered is a convenient institutional strategy, but it does not answer the criticism. It merely keeps one's followers in the dark. This is a high-risk strategy for any movement that presents itself to the world and to its followers as both academic and intellectually valid.

19. <http://www.creationism.org/csshs>.

Why this silence on social theory? It may be that the entropy paradigm is so powerful that six-day creationists have become pessimistic about the possibility of constructing the foundations of a self-consciously biblical social science. Perhaps they have been baffled by some variation of this question: "If entropy is the dominant factor in life, how can there be progress in social institutions, including the family and the institutional church?" The answer that I offer is simple enough: both the resurrection and bodily ascension of Jesus Christ have made possible the historical overcoming of many of the cursed aspects of entropy in the physical universe, and to whatever extent that entropy-related curses affect social institutions, these effects can be offset even more rapidly than in the physical realm. Why? Because the three main institutions of society—family, church, and state—are covenantal. Point four of the biblical covenant model—sanctions²⁰—offers legitimate hope in comprehensive healing in history. This healing is both personal and institutional.²¹ The closer we get to man, who is made in God's image, the more the covenant's sanctions of blessings and cursings become visible.

2. Pessimillennialism and Entropy

I suspect that there is a better explanation for pessimillennialists' silence on social theory. It is not that pessimillennialists became paralyzed in their development of social theory by the power of the concept of entropy. Rather, it is the other way around: their pessimillennialism has governed their use of the concept of entropy. Their inherently pessimistic social theory has led to a particular application of the entropy concept: the denial of entropy in the pre-Fall world. They see physical entropy much as they see the social world: inherently debilitating rather than cursed in its effects. They see entropy as the dominant factor in a physical world governed by physical decay; they see disorder as the dominant factor in a social world governed by moral decay. They see isolated islands of physical order in a world of escalating physical disorder; they see isolated islands of social order in a world of escalating social and moral decay. They view the physical universe as declining into oblivion apart from occasional miracles; they see history as declining into oblivion apart from rare events of individual salvation. The physical world must march toward physical chaos until God calls the process to a halt at the final judgment. The social world must also march toward social chaos until God calls the process to a halt at the final judgment. In neither case does the New Testament doctrine of Christ's bodily resurrection and ascension to the right hand of God play any theoretical role. In both cases, the Old Testament's curses are left unaffected by the New Testament's blessings. In both cases, the Old Testament's tale of rebellion and destruction is dominant. In neither case does New Testament biblical theology play any role. The New Testament's message of comprehensive redemption—the Great Commission²²—is denied in the name of the Old Covenant's pre-ascension setbacks.

20. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

21. Gary North, Healer of the Nations: Biblical Blueprints for International Relations (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gnhealer>)

When I published Is the World Running Down? I did not expect Creation Scientists to respond to it in print. I was correct; almost no one did. More to the point, no one in the movement has ever written a book on entropy and social theory. Mine remains the only Christian book that deals with the subject, which minimizes the connections between physical entropy and social entropy. I admit freely that physical entropy imposes costs on production processes, but the key question is social: Which social order best encourages the discovery and implementation of technological reductions in these costs? Creation Scientists do not bother to ask this question. The Creation Science movement has not produced a single social theorist since The Genesis Flood appeared in 1961. This is ominous for the Creation Science movement. It means that the movement's attempt to reconstruct modern natural science has not only failed to persuade the vast majority of natural scientists, it has persuaded no social scientists. Why is this ominous? Because the success of Darwinism can be measured by its penetration of all other academic fields within a single generation.

As I said earlier, three decades after the publication of Darwin's Origin of Species, the worldwide intellectual community had become overwhelmingly Darwinian. In almost every academic discipline in the social sciences and the humanities, Darwinists had laid totally new intellectual foundations; each field had been totally reconstructed to conform to Darwinism. By 1890, the Progressive Movement in the United States was ready to restructure civil government and social theory, including theology, in terms of the Darwinian ideal of scientific central planning.²³ So were Progressivism's cousins in Europe, the Social Democrats. The absence of any similar effort, let alone success, among Creation Science's adherents outside of the natural sciences, indicates that there is either something missing in or radically wrong with the movement's entropy apologetic. This was one of my main themes in Is the World Running Down?»: the incompatibility of Creation Science's entropy apologetic with biblical social theory. Our physical world is not a closed system; neither is our social world. God intervenes in nature and history. He intervened in the corporate life of Israel during the wilderness period, overcoming entropy in the area of apparel.

22. Kenneth Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

3. Pessimillennialism and Social Theory

I argue that the Creation Science movement has a hidden but widely shared eschatological agenda: pessimillennialism. Dispensational premillennialists and amillennialists want to believe that the social world must continue to deteriorate alongside the physical world, and a whole lot faster. They accept what might be called "the uniformitarianism of social deterioration." Evil is always compounding in such a view. This steady increase in evil is fast approaching that point on the social graph when the curve will turn sharply upward and begin to approach infinity as a limit: the exponential curve. In other words, pessimillennialists believe that things will soon get so bad socially that Jesus will just have to come again in person to straighten everything out by force. This time of exponential social evil is almost upon us; therefore, they conclude, the Second Coming is just around the corner. They believe that there is not enough time remaining to reverse this process of deterioration. Furthermore, there is no possibility of doing so: social entropy is as universal as physical entropy is. No long-term reversal of social entropy is compatible with the entropy apologetic. The institutional church is seen as socially impotent; the gospel is seen as exclusively personal; and fulfilling the Great Commission is seen as an impossible dream.

23. Sidney Fine, Laissez Faire and the General-Welfare State: A Study of Conflict in American Thought, 1865–1901 (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1956), Part 2.

Until Creation Science begins to have an impact on social thought, it will be unable to counteract Darwinism, which long ago reconstructed social theory in its own image. The presuppositions underlying modern biological evolution appeared first in the social theories of the eighteenth-century Scottish Enlightenment, not in the natural sciences.²⁴ Then, after 1880, the free market social theory of pre-Darwinian evolutionism was abandoned; replacing it was reform Social Darwinism: state planning. Evolutionistic social theory laid the foundations of biological Darwinism, just as pessimillennialism laid the foundations of Creation Science's entropy apologetic. Until the eschatological agenda of Creation Science is openly discussed, Creation Science will continue to be irrelevant outside of the natural sciences. Until pessimillennialism is abandoned by Creation Science, Creation Science will continue to be irrelevant in the area of social theory. Pessimillennialism makes impossible the development of a specifically biblical social theory.²⁵

Premillennialists presumably believe in "universal social entropy." But there is neither a formula governing social entropy nor any way scientifically to identify or measure this supposed phenomenon, unlike physical entropy. Premillennialists implicitly assume that this universal social entropy will be reversed or offset during the future millennium. They do not say this explicitly, however. Premillennialists refuse to discuss the topic of entropy's operations during the coming millennium. Perhaps they choose not to think about such matters; in any case, they refuse to write about them. Henry M. Morris ignored the topic in his commentary on the Book of Revelation. He said that entropy will be repealed after the final judgment,²⁶ but he was conveniently silent with respect to entropy during the millennial kingdom.

Most premillennialists believe that things will no longer decline morally and socially during the millennium.²⁷ Presumably, premillen-

24. F. A. Hayek, "The Results of Human Action but not of Human Design" (1967), in Hayek, Studies in Philosophy, Politics and Economics (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1967), ch. 6; S. S. Schweber, "The Origin of the Origin Revisited," Journal of the History of Biology, X (1977), pp. 229–316.

25. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

26. Henry M. Morris, The Revelation Record (Wheaton, Illinois: Tyndale House, 1983), p. 441.

27. An exception is accountant-turned-theologian Dave Hunt. See Hunt, Beyond

nialists also believe that the effects of physical entropy will somehow be offset during the millennium. They never discuss this, and so I cannot know for sure what they believe on this point. I doubt that they do, either. On the one hand, if entropy's effects will be offset cosmically, then the millennium will constitute one gigantic miracle. On the other hand, if entropy's effects will be offset at a price by normal scientific and technological progress, then we can in theory do the same thing now without the bodily return of Jesus to rule from Jerusalem or Colorado Springs or wherever He will set up headquarters. In either case, entropy is not a permanently debilitating factor in social organizations. Either a series of miracles will offset it, as took place in the wilderness era, or mankind's efforts in reducing costs will offset it.

Amillennialists see no permanent future reversal of social decline in history; a better day is not coming on this side of the Second Coming. In this sense, amillennialists are what Rushdoony once said they are: premillennialists without earthly hope.

Neither of these pessimillennial creationist groups sees any advantage in devoting time and money to a study of biblical social theory. Why bother? Isn't everything is going to hell in an entropic handbasket? Isn't everything doomed? Wouldn't any investment of time and money in developing a creationist social theory constitute a waste of scarce economic resources, like polishing brass on a sinking ship?

Moses had an answer for such rhetorical questions: no!

Conclusion

A very clever professor of engineering once stated a specific form of the second law of thermodynamics: "Confusion (entropy) is always increasing in society. Only if someone or something works extremely hard can this confusion be reduced to order in a limited region. Nevertheless, this effort will still result in an increase in the total confusion of society at large."²⁸ If knowledge were the product of physical creation—or if life were—then his theorem would be correct in this sin-cursed (but not entropy-cursed) world. But Moses' account of the wilderness indicates that life is not strictly physical. Other laws apply. It is worth noting that the famous physicist, Erwin Schrödinger, insisted that life is governed by laws different from those established by modern physical theory. In his book, What Is Life?, he wrote: “What I wish to make clear in this last chapter is, in short, that from all we have learnt about the structure of living matter, we must be prepared to find it working in a manner that cannot be reduced to the ordinary laws of physics.”²⁹

Seduction: A Return to Biblical Christianity (Eugene, Oregon: Harvest House, 1987), p. 250. For a critique, see Is the World Running Down?, pp. 257–63.

28. W. L. Everitt, Dean of the College of Engineering at the University of Illinois. Cited in Paul Dickenson, The Official Rules (New York: Delacorte Press, 1978), p. 48.

To persuade Israel that promise precedes law, and therefore that grace precedes law, Moses reminded them of their experience in the wilderness. God had overcome the laws of nature by feeding them with manna and by keeping their clothing from wearing out. In modern terminology, God had suspended the second law of thermodynamics. Entropy in these areas had been reduced to zero. There had been neither wear nor tear on their clothing.

This was miraculous. Moses expected Israel to understand this. God’s active intervention into the processes of nature had been continuous for four decades. He had overturned the laws of nature in order to humble the Israelites without killing them. To keep them both humble and alive in the wilderness as a test of their covenantal commitment, He had performed a series of miracles that constituted one long miracle. They had passed the test. Now, Moses was telling them, God would secure the long-promised kingdom grant for them through military conquest. But their continued covenantal corporate obedience would be required by God in order for the nation to maintain this kingdom grant.

This Mosaic world-and-life view offers hope for society. Whenever men remain covenantally faithful through obedience to God’s Bible-revealed laws, social progress is not only possible, it is assured. God’s kingdom grant was given to the church by Jesus after His resurrection: “All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen” (Matt. 28: 18b–20).³⁰ This kingdom grant was sealed by His ascension in history. “Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do; because I go unto my Father. And whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son. If ye shall ask any thing in my name, I will do it" (John 14:12–14).

29. Erwin Schrödinger, What Is Life? The Physical Aspect of the Living Cell (Cambridge University Press, [1944] 1967), p. 81.

30. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 48.

The Great Commission will be fulfilled prior to the final judgment: "Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith, all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted, which did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all" (I Cor. 15:24–28).³¹ The termination of entropy's curse will coincide with the termination of death: the last enemy to be subdued. No more worn out clothes and no more swollen feet: what was in the wilderness evermore shall be, world without end, amen.

31. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 16.

19

CHASTENING AND INHERITANCE

Thou shalt also consider in thine heart, that, as a man chasteneth his son, so the LORD thy God chasteneth thee. Therefore thou shalt keep the commandments of the LORD thy God, to walk in his ways, and to fear him. For the LORD thy God bringeth thee into a good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths that spring out of valleys and hills (Deut. 8:5–7).

The theocentric focus of this passage is stated in the passage: God as the chastener of His son, Israel. He brings sanctions in terms of biblical law. “Therefore thou shalt keep the commandments of the LORD thy God, to walk in his ways, and to fear him.”

A. Israel as God’s Son

Israel’s judicial position as God’s adopted son was the basis of both types of corporate sanctions: positive (Promised Land) and negative (chastening). The proof of God’s negative sanctions would be Israel’s imminent inheritance of the Promised Land: the disinheritance of the Canaanites.

This was not a seed law.¹ Its intent was universal: “Therefore thou shalt keep the commandments of the LORD thy God, to walk in his ways, and to fear him” (v. 6).

Deuteronomy follows Numbers, the book of sanctions.² Moses here told Israel that they must obey God’s commandments in order to escape His chastening, but also because God was about to lead them into the Promised Land. The covenantal link between historical sanctions and earthly inheritance is as unbreakable as the link between God’s revealed law (“commandments”) and sanctions (“chastening”).

1. On seed laws, see Appendix J.

2. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012).

Put another way, the covenantal link between historical sanctions and eschatology is as fixed as the covenantal link between law and historical sanctions. Put a third way, historical sanctions are the covenantal link between law and eschatology. Put comprehensively, theonomy is not simply a matter of God's law; it is a matter of the covenant: God's absolute sovereignty, man's subordinate authority, Bible-revealed law's continuity, historical sanctions' predictability, and postmillennialism. Put as a slogan, theonomy is a package deal.

"Thou shalt also consider in thine heart, that, as a man chasteneth his son, so the LORD thy God chasteneth thee." This warning affirmed the legal status of Israel as the son of God. More than this: Israel was God's firstborn son. "And thou shalt say unto Pharaoh, Thus saith the LORD, Israel is my son, even my firstborn: And I say unto thee, Let my son go, that he may serve me: and if thou refuse to let him go, behold, I will slay thy son, even thy firstborn" (Ex. 4:22–23). As the firstborn son, Israel was entitled to a double portion of the inheritance (Deut. 21:15–17).³ This reflected the greater responsibility of the firstborn son in representing the father and the covenant line. The firstborn was supposed to declare his father's word to the younger sons. The younger sons would grow up under the authority of the firstborn son. His authority was psychologically derived from his age, but it was judicially derived from his status as heir. The heir spoke his father's word authoritatively.

This placed an added responsibility on Israel's shoulders to declare God's commandments to the gentiles. Judicially speaking, the gentiles were the younger sons.⁴ They were not to speak authoritatively to Israel; the opposite was true. This was why God raised up Jonah as a prophet to bring God's covenant lawsuit against Nineveh.

The Promised Land was Israel's double portion. Deuteronomy 8 devotes considerable space to a detailed description of the manifold blessings of the Promised Land (vv. 7–13). There was to be no question in their minds that this constituted a double portion. This was the preferred land. It was not then the barren, parched land that it is today. It was still a land where a ram could get its horns caught in the branches of a thicket on top of a mountain (Gen. 22:13). Today, the mountains of Palestine are barren.⁵

3. Chapter 49.

4. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 37:D.

5. This created a major cinematic problem for the movie Abraham, filmed in Israel

Israel was required to obey God's commandments as a representative son. Israel was under the covenant. In order to declare the covenant authoritatively, a person must be under the terms of the covenant. To remind them that they were under these terms, Moses warned them of God's chastening. There had been negative sanctions imposed on national Israel for her disobedience. These sanctions testified to Israel's status as a son. Chastening was a negative sanction intended to restore the father-son personal relationship. It was not a sanction designed to beat down and destroy. It was not the permanent negative historical sanction that God demanded that Israel impose on the inhabitants of Canaan.

Israel's status as a firstborn son reveals why God told Israel to destroy Canaan. The Canaanites were second-born sons of God: disinherited sons. They were occupying the inheritance of the firstborn son. But why did this give Israel the right to kill them? In the Mosaic law, there was only one case where a family member was authorized to take part in the execution of another family member: when the convicted member had tried to lure the sanctions-bringing member to worship a false God (Deut. 13:6–10).

Canaanites were a threat to Israel because they would eventually lure Israel into false worship. This was the reason that God gave Israel for destroying the Canaanites. The presence of Canaanites in the land would be a constant source of temptation (Ex. 34:11–16). If allowed to remain in the Promised Land, the Canaanites would eventually become bonded to Israel through marriage (Ex. 34:16). As the second-born sons in the household, they would lead Israel into rebellion against the Father. God knew this; so, He announced that He had judged the Canaanites in advance and had found them guilty. Israel had to serve as God's executioner. The firstborn sons and the second-born sons could not occupy the same landed inheritance.

This theme of the inheritance of the firstborn and second-born sons is found repeatedly in Genesis. Again and again, the firstborn son proved to be the disinherited son. It began with Adam's rebellion; the inheritance was transferred to God's chronologically second-born son, Jesus Christ.⁶ The second-born Son became the firstborn judicially.

and starring Richard Harris. The mountain top scene where Isaac was to be sacrificed had no way to introduce the ram. The ram just happened to show up and was conveniently captured off-camera by Abraham.

6. Paul established the distinction between the first Adam and the second or last Adam, Jesus Christ: "And so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit" (1 Cor. 15:45).

This theme of the rebellion of the firstborn continued with Cain's slaying of Abel. Esau was also the firstborn, but God told Rebekah that the younger would rule the elder (Gen. 25:23). This repeated reversal of the legal pattern of inheritance was based on God's grace in re-inheriting the younger brother through adoption, while condemning the disinherited older brother. The Canaanites as elder brothers had gained possession of the land, but as disinherited sons, their claim was invalid. Israel, by God's grace, had become the firstborn son with lawful title.

B. Suffering and Imposing Negative Sanctions

Moses had already reminded them that God had humbled them in the wilderness (Deut. 8:2).⁷ This suffering was a form of chastening. Their suffering was to remind them that they were under the terms of God's covenant as a son. God had already called them to impose His permanent negative historical sanctions on the wilderness side of the Jordan. This had led to the expansion of Israel's inheritance. Reuben (Israel's firstborn), Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh inherited this land (Num. 32:33). This served as a down payment on the national inheritance. God had shown that He would deliver their inheritance to them through military conquest. They were not to fear their enemies.

The four decades of negative sanctions (wandering) were not intended to destroy them but rather to confirm them in the covenant. They were sons, not bastards. "For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth. If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons; for what son is he whom the father chasteneth not? But if ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons" (Heb. 12:6–8). The legal bastards—disinherited sons—were about to be publicly disinherited.

Sonship is by oath consigned. There must be a physical representation of this covenant oath in order for it to become the legal basis of inheritance. The Israelites had not yet been circumcised, which is why they had to be circumcised before they could begin the war to inherit Canaan (Josh. 5:8). Outside of Canaan, they had already begun the conquest, but the actual inheritance of the trans-Jordan lands was delayed until after the defeat of Canaan (Deut. 3:20). The tribes dwelling on the wilderness side of the Jordan also had to be circumcised before lawful title to the inheritance could be legally transferred by God to His firstborn son. Israel's physical suffering at Gilgal was preparatory to the far worse physical suffering of the Canaanites. Israelites had to experience the negative physical sanction of circumcision before they could lawfully impose the negative physical sanction of death inside the boundaries of the Promised Land.

7. Chapter 18.

Those who were formally under the God's covenant sanctions were the only people authorized by God to impose negative civil sanctions in Israel. Citizenship is established by oath. Those who seek to impose negative civil sanctions and participate in the political sacrament of voting must first place themselves formally under the terms of the God's two covenants, church and state.⁸

Conclusion

Moses announced the requirement that Israel, as the son of God, was required to keep God's commandments. God had been humbling them for four decades. Now, He was about to bring them into a bountiful land which would be their inheritance. The sequence was as follows: negative sanctions as a means of maturity through chastening, obedience to God's law as an ethical requirement, and inheritance in history. The chastening, while a negative sanction, was in fact confirmation of their legal position as inheriting sons. So, this negative sanction was a form of grace. Once again, we are reminded that grace precedes law. But this passage also indicates that law precedes the transfer of the inheritance in history.⁹

The second-born gentile sons of Canaan had been disinherited by God in Abraham's day: "But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full" (Gen. 15:16). This verbally imputed disinheritance—what we might call definitive or judicial disinheritance—was to be achieved progressively: "I will send my fear before thee, and will destroy all the people to whom thou shalt come, and I will make all thine enemies turn their backs unto thee. And I will send hornets before thee, which shall drive out the Hivite, the Canaanite, and the Hittite, from before thee. I will not drive them out from before thee in one year; lest the land become

8. This principle of civil law remains covenantally authoritative. It is dishonored in New Testament times by every system of civil government that bases citizenship on anything other than public Trinitarian confession and communing membership in the institutional church.

9. This was true even in Eden. Adam in Eden was supposed to gain experience in obeying God's law before moving outside the garden's boundaries into the world.

desolate, and the beast of the field multiply against thee. By little and little I will drive them out from before thee, until thou be increased, and inherit the land" (Ex. 23:27–30). This disinheritance was to be finally achieved in history: "When the LORD thy God shall bring thee into the land whither thou goest to possess it, and hath cast out many nations before thee, the Hittites, and the Girgashites, and the Amorites, and the Canaanites, and the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites, seven nations greater and mightier than thou; And when the LORD thy God shall deliver them before thee; thou shalt smite them, and utterly destroy them; thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor shew mercy unto them" (Deut. 7:1–2).

The covenant's development in history reflects the structure of the covenant: sovereign grace, hierarchical sonship, law, sanctions, and inheritance. The conquest of Canaan, from God's definitive promise to Abraham regarding the inheritance of Abraham's sons to the final defeat and disinheritance of the Canaanites, is representative of all of man's history. While this covenant sequence was always broken by Old Covenant Israel, as represented by the survival of a remnant of Canaanites in the land, the New Covenant sequence moves toward historical fulfillment of this sequence. "For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth" (Ps. 37:9).

OVERCOMING POVERTY

A land wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarceness, thou shalt not lack any thing in it; a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass (Deut. 8:9).

This description of the Promised Land appears in a passage devoted to dominion. It related to Israel's inheritance of the land, but its ethical intention was universal: "Therefore thou shalt keep the commandments of the LORD thy God, to walk in his ways, and to fear him" (Deut. 8:6).

A. Biblical Scarceness vs. Economic Scarcity

This was not a seed law or land law.¹ It was universal. This description of a land without scarcity seems consistent with the sabbatical year of release from debt: "At the end of every seven years thou shalt make a release. And this is the manner of the release: Every creditor that lendeth ought unto his neighbour shall release it; he shall not exact it of his neighbour, or of his brother; because it is called the LORD'S release. Of a foreigner thou mayest exact it again: but that which is thine with thy brother thine hand shall release; Save when there shall be no poor among you; for the LORD shall greatly bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance to possess it" (Deut. 15:1–4).² But it seems inconsistent with Deuteronomy 15:11: "For the poor shall never cease out of the land: therefore I command thee, saying, Thou shalt open thine hand wide unto thy brother, to thy poor, and to thy needy, in thy land." God's affirmation that they would eat bread without scarceness—the abolition of poverty—did not negate the sabbatical year law, which implied that this law would cease when there was no more poverty in the land. But

1. On seed laws and land laws, see Appendix J.

2. Chapter 35.

He also promised that there would always be poverty in the land. How can all this be sorted out biblically?

The word translated here as “scarceness” occurs only once in the Old Testament. It is derived from a Hebrew word, miskenuth, meaning poverty, which is found only in Ecclesiastes. “Better is a poor and a wise child than an old and foolish king, who will no more be admonished” (Eccl. 4:13).³ “Now there was found in it a poor wise man, and he by his wisdom delivered the city; yet no man remembered that same poor man. Then said I, Wisdom is better than strength: nevertheless the poor man’s wisdom is despised, and his words are not heard” (Eccl. 9:15–16).⁴ Miskenuth in turn derives from the Hebrew word translated as “folly”: siklooth. This word is also confined exclusively to verses in Ecclesiastes, such as in Ecclesiastes 2:13: “Then I saw that wisdom excelleth folly, as far as light excelleth darkness.” Siklooth is derived from sawkal: silliness. “And Samuel said to Saul, Thou hast done foolishly: thou hast not kept the commandment of the LORD thy God, which he commanded thee: for now would the LORD have established thy kingdom upon Israel for ever” (I Sam. 13:13).

By tracing the origins of these words, we see a connection: scarceness, poverty, folly, silliness. The essence of silliness is that men refuse to keep God’s commandments, as Samuel told Saul. Obedience brings wealth. This is the core meaning of Moses’ description of the Promised Land. The land contains a sufficient supply of scarce economic resources to enable a covenant-keeper to eat bread.

This concept is different from the economist’s concept of scarcity. The economist defines scarcity in terms of price. At zero price, the demand for a scarce economic resource will be greater than its supply. This was surely not what Moses had in mind: “. . . a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass” (Deut. 8:9b). Any expenditure of labor is a payment. The copper of Israel was not obtainable apart from labor.⁵

The Promised Land was not outside of history and its cursed scarcity. It was a place with sufficient resources that a folly-avoiding person who obeyed God’s commandments would not suffer poverty. David observed: “I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread" (Ps. 37:25). Poverty in Israel would be abnormal for covenant-keepers if Israel remained faithful to God. This wealth principle was not confined to Mosaic Israel. It is universal.

3. Gary North, Autonomy and Stagnation: An Economic Commentary on Ecclesiastes (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 14.

4. Ibid., ch. 36.

5. The King James translators always translated the Hebrew word for copper as brass, an alloy of copper and zinc.

If the wealth principle is universal, then the question facing all mankind is this: What is the most valuable economic resource? This resource is what all men should seek. The Bible tells us what this resource is. Few men listen. Even fewer seek it.

B. The Ultimate Resource

The ultimate resource is not human creativity, contrary to Julian Simon's book.⁶ Rather, it is God's covenant. Not creativity as such but adherence to God's law is what brings forth the positive human creativity that sustains long-term economic growth. Human creativity can sometimes be perverse, and it then brings forth poverty. Warfare is usually a counter-productive endeavor (James 4:1).

Covenant-keeping is the key to wealth. Covenant-keeping is the wealth formula. A society does not need physical resources to prosper. It needs personal liberty, a private property order, future-orientation (low time preference), a willingness to work hard and wisely in terms of God's moral standards, a widespread acceptance of the moral legitimacy of commerce and profits, and some way to transport products to and from the world outside. The tiny community of Hong Kong since 1945 has become a formidable economic competitor in several fields, most notably in textiles and financial services. The United States government has long been pressured by American textile and clothing manufacturers to legislate import quotas against clothing exported by this geographically tiny (a little over 400 square miles) society of seven million hard-working people,⁷ so competitive are Hong Kong's manufacturers. Hong Kong has almost no natural resources. It has to import at least 90% of everything it consumes. Only one-seventh of its land is arable.⁸ Its only natural resource of any consequence is its harbor. Meanwhile, other parts of the world are awash in natural resources, but they are also awash in envy, crime, government regulations on the economy, and present-oriented people who choose not to save. These societies are marked by their poverty.

6. Julian Simon, The Ultimate Resource (New Brunswick, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1981). The phrase is Drucker's: Peter Drucker, Landmarks of Tomorrow (New York: Harper & Bros., 1959), p. 180.

7. In 1945, about 600,000 lived there. Alvin Rabushka, Hong Kong: A Study in Economic Freedom (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979), p. 11.

8. Ibid., p. 12.

The land of Israel had many natural resources. It also had access to the Mediterranean Sea. It was “A land of wheat, and barley, and vines, and fig trees, and pomegranates; a land of oil olive, and honey” (Deut. 8:8). The threat to Israel’s prosperity was not the threat of natural resource depletion. God did not warn them to use civil government coercion to conserve resources. He warned them against forgetting where they had received these resources:

Beware that thou forget not the LORD thy God, in not keeping his commandments, and his judgments, and his statutes, which I command thee this day: Lest when thou hast eaten and art full, and hast built goodly houses, and dwelt therein; And when thy herds and thy flocks multiply, and thy silver and thy gold is multiplied, and all that thou hast is multiplied; Then thine heart be lifted up, and thou forget the LORD thy God, which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage (Deut. 8:11–14).⁹

Covenantal forgetfulness would eventually produce covenantal faithlessness. This would lead to God’s corporate negative sanctions against them (vv. 19–20). If they enjoyed the gifts without remembering and worshipping the Giver, then their prosperity would not survive. It was God’s covenantal administration that would enable them to prosper in the Promised Land.

C. Land and Labor

The list of resources emphasized agriculture, herding, and mining. These were traditional occupations in the ancient world, along with seafaring, trade, and textiles. The Promised Land’s geography offered all of these industries. The economist generally refers to these resources as land.¹⁰ The Promised Land was filled with resources. The Israelites could therefore look forward to prosperity. They were not expected by God to believe in Hong Kong economics: compounding creativity that makes land valuable mainly as a consumer good rather than land that supplies raw materials. Even today, Hong Kong’s eco-

9. Chapter 21.

10. In this technical sense, the sea is land. Because of its liquid status, the sea and rivers present problems for assigning ownership. That which flows is difficult to isolate; that which cannot be isolated is difficult to own and disown. It is this problem which leads to pollution, both liquid and air-borne: using water and air as free resources to reduce production costs.

conomic success is almost beyond the willingness of university-educated people to understand, accept, or believe. This was especially true prior to 1980. As Rabushka wrote in 1979, “One can, I think, count the number of American economists who study Hong Kong’s political economy on the fingers of one hand, or at most two.”¹¹

1. Faith in Land

The idea that widespread prosperity can be attained without the natural resource of land is not readily believed. This was especially true before Bill Gates became the richest man in the world at age 30 by owning and improving software code. To go from an investment of $50,000 in 1980¹² to about $500 billion in 1999¹³ by means of magnetic ones and zeros embedded on pieces of plastic—plus the ability to persuade millions of buyers that these inexpensive pieces of plastic are useful—would have appeared impossible in 1981. Today, however, creating this kind of personal wealth seems possible only by doing highly creative things with magnetic ones and zeros.

Nevertheless, a great deal has changed in people’s thinking since 1980. This change accelerated rapidly among the West’s intellectual elite after the highly popular (in the Western media, but not in the USSR) Soviet Premier Mikhail Gorbachev publicly admitted the collapse of the Soviet economy in 1989, which in fact had not collapsed at all, since it had never been sufficiently productive to have collapsed. The Soviet Union had always been little more than a Third World country, i.e., dependent on government aid and loans from Western banks. It had an insane economic system, a fact made hilariously clear in Leopold Tyrmand’s 1972 book, The Rosa Luxemburg Contraceptive Cooperative. Communist nations’ poverty had been visible to anyone who visited them with open eyes and no socialist presuppositions, i.e., people other than Western intellectuals.¹⁴ What collapsed in 1989 was 11. Rabushka, Hong Kong, p. 2.

12. The price that Microsoft paid to buy the rights to QDOS from Seattle Computer Products, which Microsoft then sold to IBM for the not-yet-invented IBM-PC. Microsoft retained the rights to license MS-DOS.

13. The imputed value of all Microsoft shares in November, 1999: its market capitalization. By November, 2011, the value was down to $225 billion, with the dollar’s purchasing power reduced by 35%. Of course, if existing share holders all tried to sell their shares to get access to cash, the value of the shares would fall dramatically. But Bill Gates for years has been selling off shares constantly, becoming a true multi-billionaire and philanthropist.

14. Sylvia R. Margulies, The Pilgrimage to Russia: The Soviet Union and the Treat-

Western intellectuals' faith in the productivity of the state's direct ownership of the means of production. This collapse was seen within a few months in America's book stores: $24.95 books written by Marxist college professors were being sold in discount bins for a dollar or two. After the official suicide of the USSR on December 31, 1991, such books became very difficult to find except for a few titles in university book stores, where tenured Marxist professors who pretend that their worldview hasn't become a joke, even among their liberal academic colleagues, still assign them.

2. The Wealth Formula

What God told Israel was this: the maintenance of the kingdom grant was conditional. They had to keep God's commandments. He did not tell them that He would miraculously add new supplies of iron and copper if they proved to be obedient. He would multiply them and their flocks. He would multiply their vines. They would get wealthier, step by step. The heart of this system of economic growth was the covenant: law, positive corporate sanctions, and compound economic growth. God gave them the wealth formula. They did not adopt it. This had to wait until the late eighteenth century. When men at long last accepted it, they entered into the world of compound economic growth, where growth in output of two percent per year for two centuries brings personal wealth beyond the dreams of kings in 1800. Computer technology has converted silicon—sand—into wealth beyond anything ever dreamed by the ancient and medieval magicians and alchemists. But the modern world has reversed the covenantal imagery of blessing. "That in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore; and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies" (Gen. 22:17). God views sand as cheap and children as valuable. The modern world sees children as a liability and sand as an asset.¹⁵ This is ment of Foreigners, 1924–1937 (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1968); Paul Hollander, Political Pilgrims: Travels of Western Intellectuals to the Soviet Union, China, and Cuba (New York: Oxford University Press, 1981).

15. The United States Supreme Court legalized abortion in 1973. Two years later, beachfront property in southern California began to soar in value even faster than other southern California real estate did. Sand was now seen as being both scarce and desirable. A beach bum's lifestyle—clinging, irritating sand and blinding sun, with its cancer-causing, wrinkle-producing, "skin like leather by age 35" tanning—became the lifestyle of choice for present-oriented rich people. They became willing to pay extreme price premiums for truly mediocre housing to gain easy access to this unpro-why the modern world is headed for judgment. A good, old fashioned plague would change modern man's imputation of economic value. So would the bankruptcy of government-funded pension plans.

D. What the Land Might Lack

Trade is the voluntary, non-coercive means by which a person who has more of some item than he wants, compared to how much he wants what someone else has, is able legally to get ownership of the other person's goods. Each person enters into an exchange believing that he will be better off after the exchange.

This is as true statistically of nations as of individuals. Residents of a nation that lacks some resource can buy it from residents in another nation. For example, in the late 1970s, Hong Kong imported 85% of its food and exported 90% of its manufactures.¹⁶ Meanwhile, some nation grew the food that it sold to Hong Kong. Hong Kong residents wanted food more than extra clothing; the other nation's residents wanted clothing more than extra food. Hong Kong was in effect manufacturing food; its trading partner was in effect growing clothing. The same sort of arrangement categorizes trade between the United States and Japan.¹⁷

It was not necessary that God fill the Promised Land with every conceivable natural resource. It was only necessary that He give them His law and the grace to obey it, which allows men's creativity to flourish. Creativity is the basis of economic growth. Raw materials have always been available. What makes them valuable is men's knowledge of productive, customer-satisfying things to do with them. What makes them worth searching for and digging up is the income potential provided by other men with other things to exchange. He who has the productive skills that produce the finished products that customers desire to buy will not lack anything in whatever land God places him, but only for as long as there is freedom.

ductive, responsibility-avoiding lifestyle. I grew up in that once middle-income environment, 1953–59, Manhattan Beach, and was happy to leave. In 2011, Manhattan Beach was the most sought-after real estate by the rich in the United States: "Where the Rich Are Moving," CNBC.com. <http://bit.ly/MBrich>. My family had moved away in 1962, selling their two houses for little money.

16. Rabushka, Hong Kong, pp. 2–3.

17. See Gary North, "Growing Toyotas, Manufacturing Soybeans," The Freeman (Jan. 1993). (<http://bit.ly/GrowingToyotas>)

Conclusion

The Promised Land was not a land literally flowing with milk and honey. It was a land that possessed great advantages, not the least of which was its location on a widely used trade route. It had minerals. It had room for sheep. It had a climate fit for agricultural production. It had not yet been stripped of its fertility by millennia of ecological exploitation and neglect.

The key to prosperity in the land of Israel was covenantal faithfulness, not government-planned resource conservation. To continue to eat bread without scarceness, Israel would have to avoid the folly of covenant-breaking. The land was bountiful, which was appropriate for an inheritance. But the land was to be understood as a manifestation of God's grace. Subordination follows grace; law follows subordination; sanctions follow law; and an inheritance either multiplies, stagnates, or contracts in terms of men's sanctions and God's. For those who kept the covenant, the land would lack nothing, even as Hong Kong lacks nothing. When a nation is productive, it can buy whatever it does not have. When God said "thou shalt not lack any thing in it," He did not mean that the land contained everything they needed. It would contain the people of the covenant. Covenantal faithfulness, not minerals and climate as such, would enable them to escape the burden of poverty.

21

THE ASSERTION OF AUTONOMY

When thou hast eaten and art full, then thou shalt bless the LORD thy God for the good land which he hath given thee. Beware that thou forget not the LORD thy God, in not keeping his commandments, and his judgments, and his statutes, which I command thee this day Lest when thou hast eaten and art full, and hast built goodly houses, and dwelt therein; And when thy herds and thy flocks multiply, and thy silver and thy gold is multiplied, and all that thou hast is multiplied; Then thine heart be lifted up, and thou forget the LORD thy God, which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage; Who led thee through that great and terrible wilderness, wherein were fiery serpents, and scorpions, and drought, where there was no water; who brought thee forth water out of the rock of flint; Who fed thee in the wilderness with manna, which thy fathers knew not, that he might humble thee, and that he might prove thee, to do thee good at thy latter end; And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth (Deut. 8:10–17).

The theocentric focus of this law is God as the gracious Provider. It has to do with maintaining the kingdom grant: “Beware that thou forget not the LORD thy God, in not keeping his commandments, and his judgments, and his statutes, which I command thee this day.” The issue is law: point three of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. Continually Thanking God

God demands thankfulness on the part of the recipients of His grace. The message here is clear: covenant-keepers can become spiritually forgetful as a direct result of the visible blessings of God. As a result of the gift, they forget the Giver. That covenant-breakers forget the God who gave them their blessings should come as no shock, but this warning was directed at covenant-keepers.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler Texas: Institute for Christian Economic, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

Because the sin of covenantal forgetfulness is universal, this law was not a land law or a seed law.² Theologians who argue that this law was exclusively a land law want to escape from its implication: God brings sanctions in history against those who forget Him. When they argue that this was a land law that was unique to Mosaic Israel, they strip the covenant of its predictability and therefore also its authority in history. Those who forget God are supposedly in no worse shape in history, and perhaps far better shape, than those who remember Him.³

Forgetfulness is an aspect of point two of the biblical covenant model: hierarchy. The covenantally forgetful man forgets something quite specific: his complete dependence on the grace of God. Moses here listed the external blessings that God had given them in the wilderness, a hostile place that would not sustain a large population. They had received water out of the rock and a daily supply of food. In the wilderness, the generation of the conquest had been kept humble and subordinate by their reliance on God's miracles.⁴ God would soon give them blessings after they conquered the Promised Land. The transfer of inheritance from Canaan to Israel would be an aspect of God's comprehensive deliverance of the nation out of bondage and into freedom. Their freedom would initially be accompanied by a discontinuous increase in their external wealth: military victory. Then this wealth would multiply.

B. Miracles as Welfare

The move from Egypt to Canaan is a model of the move from slavery to freedom. The model of a free society is not Israel's miraculous wilderness experience, where God gave them manna and removed many burdens of entropy.⁵ The predictable miracles of the wilderness era were designed to humble them, not raise them up. The wilderness experience was not marked by economic growth but by economic stagnation and total dependence. They were not allowed to save extra

2. On land laws and seed laws, see Appendix J

3. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), ch. 3: "Halfway Covenant Ethics." (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

4. Chapter 18.

5. Chapter 18

portions of manna, which rotted (Ex. 16:20). On the move continually, they could not dig wells, plant crops, or build houses. At best, they may have been able to increase their herds, as nomads do (Num. 3:45; 20:4; 32:1). The wilderness experience was a means of teaching them that God acts in history to sustain His people. The wilderness economy with its regular miracles was not to become an ideal toward which covenant-keepers should strive. Israel longed for escape from the wilderness. It was God's curse on the exodus generation that they would die in the wilderness.

The wilderness economy was a welfare economy. The Israelites were supplied with basic necessities, even though the people did not work. But they lacked variety. People without the ability to feed themselves were fed by God: same old diet. People without the ability to clothe themselves were clothed by God: same old fashions. Israel wandered aimlessly because the exodus generation had refused to march into war (Num. 14). They were not fit to lead; so, they had to follow. They were welfare clients; they had no authority over the conditions of their existence. They took what was handed out to them. And, like welfare clients generally, they constantly complained that their life style just wasn't good enough (Num. 11).⁶ They had been unwilling to pay the price of freedom: conquest. God therefore cursed them to endure four decades of welfare economics. The only good thing about the wilderness welfare program was that it did not use the state as the agency of positive blessings. No one was coerced into paying for anyone else's life style. God used a series of miracles to sustain them all. There was no coercive program of wealth redistribution. Israel was a welfare society, not a welfare state.

The lure of the welfare state remains with responsibility-avoiding men in every era. It was this lure which attracted the crowds to Jesus. "Jesus answered them and said, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Ye seek me, not because ye saw the miracles, but because ye did eat of the loaves, and were filled" (John 6:26). They wanted a king who would feed them. They viewed Jesus as a potential candidate for king because He could multiply bread. They associated free food with political authority. He knew this, so He departed from them (John 6:11–15).

Men in their rebellion against God want to believe in a state that can heal them. They believe in salvation by law. They prefer to live under the authority of a messianic state, meaning a healer state, rather than under freedom. They want to escape the burdens of personal and family responsibility in this world of cursed scarcity. They want to live as children live, as recipients of bounty without a price tag. They are willing to sacrifice their liberty and the liberty of others in order to attain this goal.

6. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 7.

One mark of spiritual immaturity is the quest for economic miracles: stones into bread. The price of this alchemical wealth is always the same: the worship of Satan. "And when the tempter came to him, he said, If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread. But he answered and said, It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God" (Matt. 4:3–4).⁷ Modern welfare economics teaches that the state can provide such miracles through positive economic policy, i.e., by taking wealth from some and transferring it to others, either directly or through monetary inflation. This belief is the presupposition of the Keynesian revolution, which dominated twentieth-century economic thought, 1936–1990. John Maynard Keynes actually described credit expansion—the heart of his system—as the “miracle . . . of turning a stone into bread.”⁸

When Israel crossed into the Promised Land, the identifying marks of their wilderness subordination were removed by God: the manna and their permanent clothing. This annulment of the welfare economy was necessary for their spiritual maturation and their liberation. The marks of their subordination to God would henceforth be primarily confessional and ethical. The only food miracle that would remain in Israel would be the triple crop two years prior to a jubilee (Lev. 25:21).⁹ God promised to substitute a new means of Israel’s preservation: economic growth. No longer would they be confined to manna and the same old clothing. Now they would be able to multiply their wealth. The zero-growth world of the welfare society would be replaced by the pro-growth world of covenantal remembrance. But then they would forget the source of their economic success.

7. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 1.

8. Keynes (anonymous), Paper of the British Experts (April 8, 1943), cited in Ludwig von Mises, “Stones into Bread, the Keynesian Miracle,” Plain Talk (1948), reprinted in Henry Hazlitt (ed.), The Critics of Keynesian Economics (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1960), p. 306. (<http://bit.ly/HazlittCKE>)

9. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 27.

Conclusion

Moses warned the generation of the conquest that their success in the future will be based on the same crucial factor that had sustained the generation of the exodus: the God of the covenant. God was the source of deliverance. He is the source of the inheritance. He is the source of any continuity of success over time.

Covenant-breaking people do not believe this. Thus, they will be tempted to acknowledge the gift, but forget the giver. They will not attribute their success to random forces. They will attribute it to the might of their own hand, i.e., their autonomy. They will see themselves as the be-all and end-all in history: alpha and omega.

Moses did not warn them here that Israel will worship other gods. That went without saying. Moses repeatedly warned them against idolatry. Here, the issue was different: the source of their wealth. They would someday claim to be the source, not some local deity. They would seek to substitute themselves as the god of covenant sanctions. They would seek to establish a new hierarchy of covenantal authority.

This had been Adam's sin. He would decide who was correct about the results of eating the forbidden fruit: either God or the serpent. The agent with the power of determining the final truth of God's word is either God or a pretender. Moses warned that Adam's act of rebellion would be played out again in the Promised Land. He did not mention Adam, but the sin was the same: claiming to be the source of covenant sanctions. Adam acted as though he thought he would not die. The Israelites would act as though they had produced their wealth autonomously. If there is a central sin of all modern economic thought, this is it: attributing to man and his works the wealth of nations. Free market economists praise individuals, while collectivists praise committees. To man be the glory, Amen.

ECONOMIC GROWTH AS COVENANTAL CONFIRMATION

But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth the power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant with you which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day (Deut. 8:18).

The theocentric issue here is the covenant, which is associated with point two of the biblical covenant model.¹ Exodus is the second book in the Pentateuch. It is the book of the commandments, which are collectively called the book of the covenant (Ex. 24:7).

Moses prefaced this passage with a prophecy (vv. 1–17). God was about to give them a land of milk and honey. Moses warned them that, as a covenanted nation, they will be tempted to rebel after years of living in the Promised Land. They will be afflicted with covenantal forgetfulness.² They will not attribute to God their deliverance from Egypt and their miraculous survival in the wilderness. They will be tempted to assert their autonomy from God by claiming that the might of their hands gave them this wealth (v. 17). This is rebellion: the substitution of a new hierarchy for the original one. It is comparable to Adam's rebellion.

Moses then reminded them of the source of their wealth: God. Their wealth in the Promised Land will be part of a system of covenantal sanctions. They must view their wealth in terms of God's covenant, not the might of their own hands, i.e., autonomy.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. Chapter 21.

A. The Power to Get Wealth

This passage is a command: “But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (v. 18). This verse is one of the most important verses in the Bible regarding wealth. Covenantally speaking, this is the Bible’s most important verse on the nature and purpose of wealth. It states that wealth is a means of God’s establishment of His covenant.

The covenant is established by grace. God brings covenant-breakers under His covenant through adoption. Israel’s adoption by God is the biblical model (Ezek. 16:6–13). Adoption takes place by God’s declarative judicial act: God announces His lawful claim on His children. God told Moses: “And thou shalt say unto Pharaoh, Thus saith the LORD, Israel is my son, even my firstborn: And I say unto thee, Let my son go, that he may serve me: and if thou refuse to let him go, behold, I will slay thy son, even thy firstborn” (Ex. 4:22–23). God’s claim superseded Pharaoh’s false claim of ownership. God’s deliverance of Israel out of Egypt’s bondage was His declaration of a superior claim of jurisdiction. Liberty under God was the alternative to servitude under Pharaoh.

God delivered Israel progressively out of bondage: out of Egypt, through the wilderness, and into Canaan. So, the judicial reality of Israel’s definitive liberation by God was established visibly through Israel’s miraculous deliverance from the burdens of Adam’s curse. Israel survived in the wilderness through a series of miracles: the overcoming of scarcity (manna and water), the overcoming of entropy’s curse (wear and tear).³

Why the need for progressive deliverance? Why not instant liberation? Moses gave them the answer: their need for humility. God had humbled them in order to prove them (vv. 2, 16). They had not been morally fit to inherit Canaan immediately after their deliverance from Egypt. The first generation was still a nation of slaves. They had the slave’s mentality. They could not forget the onions of Egypt (Num. 11:5). They remembered onions and forgot God. This element of covenantal forgetfulness would remain Israel’s great temptation until their return from the exile. They kept forgetting that God was the source of their blessings. They kept returning to idolatry.

Their power to get wealth in the Promised Land was analogous to their experience of miracles in the wilderness. The wilderness miracles were designed to strengthen their faith in a God who delivers His people in history and who fulfills His promises to His people in history. The problem was this: the continuity of these miracles became a part of Israel's predictable environment. Israel began to take them for granted. Moses twice repeated the fact that God had humbled them in the wilderness (vv. 2, 16). Moses wanted them to understand that the threat of being humbled is always present with the promise of covenantal blessings in history. The wilderness miracles had been designed by God to remind Israel that God was their deliverer. Moses then extended this principle: wealth was to remind them that God is their deliverer.

3. Chapter 18.

God delivers men visibly through covenantal blessings. These blessings can be measured: "And when thy herds and thy flocks multiply, and thy silver and thy gold is multiplied, and all that thou hast is multiplied. . ." (v. 13). What is visible to all testifies to the existence of a covenantal realm of bondage and deliverance that is invisible. This is a manifestation of the covenantal principle of representation (point two): the visible testifies to the existence of the invisible. "For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead" (Rom. 1:20a).⁴ Jesus' miracles of healing were examples of this principle of representation. They authenticated His messianic office under God (Matt. 9:2–7).

The visible blessings of God in history are to remind men of the blessings of God in eternity. The visible curses of God in history are to remind men of the curses of God in eternity. But in Old Covenant Israel, there were no clear distinctions between eternal negative sanctions and eternal positive sanctions. Not until the last section of the Book of Daniel was the doctrine of the bodily resurrection clearly enunciated (Dan. 12:2–3). The grave seemed to cover all men equally. The distinction between paradise and hell is a New Testament doctrine. So, the focus of Old Covenant's covenantal sanctions was historical.

B. Compound Economic Growth

Moses enunciated here for the first time in recorded history the doctrine of permanent economic growth. In all other ancient societies, history was seen as cyclical. Men viewed history much as they viewed nature. The fruitfulness of spring and summer would inevitably be overcome in the fall and winter. The idea of linear history—temporal beginning and end—was not believed, because the covenant-breaking world rejected the cosmic judicial basis of linear history: creation, Fall, redemption, and temporal consummation. The twin idols of nature and history were cyclical in covenant-breaking religion. Only the new idol of autonomous philosophy offered some possibility of linear development: the growth of knowledge. But this came late in ancient man's history. Philosophy appeared in Greece at about the time that Israel was sent into exile and ceased worshipping the carved idols of Canaan.

4. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 3.

In Israel, the doctrine of compound economic growth (Deut. 8) preceded by nine centuries the doctrine of the bodily resurrection (Dan. 12:2). Moses taught Israel that compound economic growth is possible through covenantal faithfulness. If Israel remembered God as the source of their wealth—an act of covenantal subordination—and continued to obey His law as a nation, then God would shower the nation with even more wealth. This wealth was designed to confirm the covenant. God's covenantal blessings and cursings had been visible in the wilderness, Moses reminded them. The curses were designed to humble them, he said. Then what of the prophesied blessings? Moses was equally clear: they were designed to confirm the covenant. God would continue to deal with Israel covenantally, which meant that they could expect visible blessings and visible cursings in terms of their own ethical response to these blessings. Do not forget who provides these blessings when blessings multiply, Moses warned. These external blessings would not be covenantally neutral. They would be signs of the continuing covenantal bond between God and Israel.

Economic growth was an aspect of the Mosaic covenant. There is no biblical indication that this was changed in the New Covenant. The existence of God's covenant should be recognized in the compounding of wealth. If visible blessings confirm the covenant over time—a progressive fulfillment—then economic growth is in principle as open-ended as the covenant. The covenant is perpetual; so is the possibility of long-term economic growth. Moses told them that economic growth would not automatically cease because nature is cyclical. History is not cyclical. Economic growth can compound through the seasons because the covenant transcends the seasons.

Sanctification is progressive. The blessings of God are supposed to compound because the visible confirmation of God's covenant in history is designed to reconfirm the terms of the covenant to each succeeding generation. Each generation is to experience positive feedback: blessings, remembering, obedience, blessings. This process of economic growth is what makes possible an ever-increasing inheritance. God's gracious kingdom grant is progressively appropriated by the heirs through the progressive confirmation of the covenant. The goal is the conquest of the whole earth through conversion and confirmation. "And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen" (Matt. 28:18–20).⁵

C. The Idea of Progress and Inheritance

The ideal of economic growth parallels the idea of progress in history. Moses made it clear that the covenantal faithfulness of Israel was not a static ideal. History is progressive because corporate sanctification is progressive. It is not simply that history is linear; it is also progressive. This section of Deuteronomy is important because it sets forth the ideal of progress. God had delivered Israel from bondage. He had led them through the wilderness. Now, in fulfillment of His promise to Abraham, He was about to lead them into the Promised Land. In the Promised Land, they could legitimately expect the multiplication of both their numbers and their wealth. "And when thy herds and thy flocks multiply, and thy silver and thy gold is multiplied, and all that thou hast is multiplied" (v. 13). This multiplication process is basic to the fulfillment of the dominion covenant given to Adam and Noah. But this process is at bottom covenantal, not autonomous. It is an aspect of God's positive historical sanctions in response to corporate covenantal faithfulness.

1. Linear History and Corporate Sanctification

To sustain corporate progress, two ideas must be widespread in a culture: the idea of linear history and the idea of progressive corporate sanctification. When the idea of linear history is absent, men do not sustain hope in the future of corporate progress, for progress must inevitably be swallowed up in the retrogressive phase of the next historical cycle. The Great Reversal will overcome the hopes and dreams of all men. It will cut short every program of social improvement. The discontinuity of reversal will always overcome the continuity of progress.⁶ In short, if history is not linear, the visible inheritance will eventually be destroyed. The visible distinctions between covenant-breaking societies and covenant-keeping societies will disappear or be made operationally irrelevant by the magnitude of the Great Reversal. Such an outlook requires the following re-writing of the second commandment: “Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them: for I the LORD thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me, and doing the same unto them that love me, and keep my commandments.”

5. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

When the idea of progressive corporate sanctification is absent, men do not sustain hope in either the supposed mechanism or the supposed organicism of progress. Progress is, at best, limited to an elite core of individuals: a matter of inner discipline, secret knowledge, capital accumulation (e.g., money-lending), or mystical retreat from history. When a society loses faith in corporate progress, its citizens lose a major incentive to forego consumption in the present for the sake of greater future income. Men become more present-oriented than people in societies that retain faith in corporate progress. They apply a higher rate of discount (interest) to future income. The rate of economic growth slows as the rate of saving drops. If there is no possibility of sustained covenantal progress based on a distinction between the earthly fate of the wicked vs. the earthly fate of the righteous, then the present consumption of capital is the obvious policy. Solomon summarized this view: “There is a vanity which is done upon the earth; that there be just men, unto whom it happeneth according to the work of the wicked; again, there be wicked men, to whom it happeneth according to the work of the righteous: I said that this also is vanity. Then I commended mirth, because a man hath no better thing under the sun, than to eat, and to drink, and to be merry: for that shall abide with him of his labour the days of his life, which God giveth him under the sun" (Eccl. 8:14–15).⁷ In short, if there is no visible corporate sanctification, then the visible corporate inheritance will be dissipated.

6. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), chaps. 4, 7, 8. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

2. Cyclical History

The pagan ancient world did not have a doctrine of compound economic growth, because it had no doctrine of sustainable corporate progress. J. B. Bury wrote in 1920 that the idea of progress requires faith in the inevitability of mankind's autonomous advancement. This advancement must not be the result of any outside intervention; it must be man's gift to man.⁸ It is not sufficient for the development of the idea of progress that men recognize the existence of advancement in the past. The question is this: Must there be inevitable long-term advancement in the future?⁹ Belief in progress is an act of faith.¹⁰ Classical Greece did not possess this faith.¹¹ "But, if some relative progress might be admitted, the general view of Greek philosophers was that they were living in a period of inevitable degeneration and decay—in-avoidable because it was prescribed by the nature of the universe."¹² As Bury noted, Greek science "did little or nothing to transform the conditions of life or to open any vista into the future."¹³ What was true of Greek thought was equally true of every ancient society except Israel.

Science was stillborn in every society in which belief in cyclical history was dominant.¹⁴ Physicist and historian Stanley Jaki presented a series of masterful expositions of the relationship between the Greeks' view of cyclical history and their failure to extend the science they discovered. The Christian ideal of progress made possible the advancement of Western science; it was not Renaissance science that launched the modern idea of progress. Contrary to Ludwig Edelstein,¹⁵ the

7. Gary North, Autonomy and Stagnation: An Economic Commentary on Ecclesiastes (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), , ch. 31.

8. J. B. Bury, The Idea of Progress: An Inquiry into Its Growth and Origin, rev. ed. (New York: Dover, [1932] 1955), p. 5.

9. Ibid., p. 7.

10. Ibid., p. 4.

11. Idem.

12. Ibid., p. 9.

13. Ibid., p. 7.

14. Stanley L. Jaki, Science and Creation: From Eternal Cycles to an Oscillating Universe, rev. ed. (Edinburgh: Scottish Academic Press, 1986). Cf. Jaki, The Savior of Science (Washington, D.C.: Regnery Gateway, 1988), ch. 1; The Only Chaos and Other Essays (Lanham, Maryland: Academic Press of America, 1990), ch. 5.

15. Ludwig Edelstein, The Idea of Progress in Classical Antiquity (Baltimore, Mary-

Greeks did not take seriously the idea of progress, for they believed, among other anti-progress ideas, in the Great Year of the cosmos: the 26,000-year rotation of the heavens, an idea that was denounced by several church fathers from Origen to Augustine.¹⁶ Belief in this Great Year was common in many ancient societies. It was important in Platonic thought.¹⁷ Priests and astrologers noticed the precession of the equinoxes.¹⁸ Ancient astronomers knew that every few thousand years, the pole star changes. We know today that the wobbling of the earth's axis is the cause; the earth whirls like a spinning top with an inclined axis. Ancient societies explained this odd movement in terms of the unbalanced rotation of the heavens. The heavens were seen as rotating around the earth as if the stars were part of a system analogous to a broken mill.¹⁹ Paralleling this, classical thought developed the cyclical idea of an original golden age which was followed by degeneration,²⁰ and which will be followed by a new golden age.

Edelstein saw the documentary evidence of classical optimism as being "widely dispersed"²¹—another phrase for "scattered and unsystematic." He saw the idea as "popular in antiquity," but his presentation of the scattered and fragmentary evidence is insufficient to prove his case. Edelstein, as is the case with the vast majority of modern historians, saw in Renaissance science the recovery of the lost classical scientific heritage.²² Yet the primary origin of the details of Renaissance science was the deliberately unacknowledged science of the late middle ages, a fact demonstrated by physicist Pierre Duhem in 10 detailed volumes. The demonstrated fact of the medieval origins of modern science has been ignored or actively suppressed by the humanist academic world. The first five volumes of Duhem's Le Système du Monde were in print in 1917; the second five volumes appeared only in 1954–59. In between, the French academic community and publishing world suppressed their publication because they undermined one of the most cherished myths of the Enlightenment, namely, that medieval land: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1967).

16. Jaki, The Only Chaos, pp. 74–75.

17. Karl Popper, The Open Society and Its Enemies, 2 vols., The Spell of Plato, 4th ed. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1963), I, p. 19, and the footnotes: pp. 208–19.

18. See any standard encyclopedia under "precession."

19. Giorgio de Santillana and Hertha von Dechend, Hamlet's Mill: An essay on myth and the future of time (Boston: Godine, [1969] 1977), ch. 9.

20. Hesiod, Works and Days, lines 109–201.

21. Edelstein, Idea of Progress, p. xxxii.

22. Ibid., p. 141.

science was “medieval.” The story of this exercise in humanist academic censorship has been written by Jaki.²³ Duhem is still unknown to most historians. An exception is Robert Nisbet, who offered two brief, favorable sentences in his History of the Idea of Progress (1980).²⁴ Yet Nisbet repeatedly relied on Edelstein’s book to defend his own view that the classical world accepted the idea of progress.²⁵

It was Christianity, with its doctrine of creation, Fall, redemption, and the Great Commission (Matt. 28:18–20), that brought together the Old Covenant idea of God’s positive corporate sanctions and the New Covenant idea of world transformation. The twin doctrines of the bodily resurrection of Jesus Christ and His ascension to the right hand of God made possible the overcoming of the more cyclical Old Covenant pattern of man’s ethical Fall, his ethical redemption by God, and a subsequent fall. Christ’s resurrection and ascension were definitive historical acts of victory over the familiar cycle of fall-redemption-fall. “And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished. If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable. But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the firstfruits of them that slept” (I Cor. 15:17–20).²⁶ Christ’s bodily resurrection set forth the personal model; His bodily ascension set forth the civilizational model. The ascension proved His post-resurrection claim of total power over history (Matt. 28:18–20).

D. Finitude: Things and Time

Twice, God told mankind to multiply: Adam (Gen. 1:28) and Noah (Gen. 9:1). This command was a call to fill the earth. This is the dominion covenant. But it was also necessarily a call for man to acknowledge the limits of time. At some point in the future, the dominion covenant will be fulfilled. That day will mark the end of history. “Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies 23. Stanley L. Jaki, “Science and Censorship: Hélène Duhem and the Publication of the ‘Système du Monde,’” Intercollegiate Review (Winter 1985–86), pp. 41–49. Cf. Jaki, Uneasy Genius: The Life and Work of Pierre Duhem (Boston: Martinus Nijhoff, 1984).

24. Robert A. Nisbet, History of the Idea of Progress (New York: Basic Books, 1980), pp. 78, 101.

25. Ibid., ch. 1.

26. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 16.

under his feet" (I Cor. 15:24–25). At that point, a new covenantal order will come into existence: an eternal order.

There is no possibility of permanent long-term growth in a finite universe. Nothing compounds indefinitely. At some point, the population reaches the limits of growth. At any positive rate of growth, wealth approaches infinity as a limit when the curve turns upward and becomes what we call an exponential curve.²⁷

1. The Realm of the Quantum

The only thing in recent history—or any history—that does seem to grow without meaningful limits is the capacity of computer chips, which doubles every 18 months, possibly every year.²⁸ At this rate of growth, the computer chip will equal man's brain capacity sometime in the first third of the twenty-first century. Then, a year later, it will be twice as large. A year after that, four times as large, and so on. If this growth of chip capacity really is a law—Moore's law rather than Moore's observation—then men will face in the mid-twenty-first century the implications of a continuing theme in modern philosophy and, more graphically, science fiction: the replacement of man the decision-maker by one of man's tools. The data storage capacity of the microchip will equal man's brain in, say, 2030. Then, a year later, this chip capacity will double. And so on, ad infinitum. If knowledge is power, then impersonal computer systems will gain power to the extent that their computational ability is equated with knowledge.

The cost of building a single chip production plant is running into the billions of dollars. At some point, the cost of pursuing Moore's law should reach the limits of capital available to build the production facilities.²⁹ The big questions are these: Will the chips ever be used to create less expensive chip production facilities? Will microchips be used to design microfactories? Will the capacity of the chips overcome the cost of capital? Will the "intelligence" of the chips lower the cost of their production? If so, then we will have arrived at a state of affairs in which the law of decreasing returns is overcome in one area of life, and the most important area economically: the cost of obtaining usable information (though not necessarily wisdom).

27. Gary North, "The Theology of the Exponential Curve," The Freeman (May 1970); reprinted in Gary North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 8. (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>)

28. This is known as Moore's law. This "law" was articulated in 1965 by Gordon Moore, co-founder of Intel Corp., the creator of the modern microcomputer chip. Ray Kurzweil says that chip capacity is now doubling every year. Kurzweil, "The Law of Accelerating Returns" (March 7, 2001). This is published on his website, www.kurzweilai.net. A similar law to Moore's is Metcalfe's law: the cost-effectiveness of computer networks increases by the square of the number of terminals. George Gilder in 1997 added a third "law" governing telecommunications bandwidth. He forecasted that the supply of bandwidth will triple every year for the next 25 years. Gilder Technology Report (Feb. 1997), p. 1.

29. Interview with Gordon Moore: Peter Leyden, "Moore's Law Repealed, Sort Of," Wired (May 1997).

Raymond Kurzweil, a developer of computerized machines that convert written text into voice patterns, thereby allowing the blind to read, stated that most of the cost of a computer comes from the chips, and all but about 2% of the cost of the chips derives from the cost of the information embodied on them.³⁰ George Gilder concluded: "Driving the technology in the quantum era will not be Goliath fabs [fabrication factories] that can produce millions of units of one design but flexible design and manufacturing systems that can produce a relatively few units of thousands of designs."³¹

The linear increase in the speed of the chips seems to violate a fundamental economic law: the law of diminishing returns.³² But even if exponential linearity is possible in the quantum realm of the microcosm, as Gilder asserted, men so far can gain access to this microcosmic realm only through physical production of the gateways into the microcosm: the chips themselves. The non-quantum realm of chip manufacturing is still governed by the law of diminishing returns, as enormous capital losses in chip manufacturing testify from time to time. Yet even if this ever ceases to be true, there is still no reason to accept Gilder's moral vision: "Overthrowing matter, humanity also escapes from the traps and compulsions of pleasure into a higher morality of spirit."³³ Gilder has confused the realm of the quantum with the human spirit, a mistake going back to Kant's theory of the noumenal realm. The antinomies separating the realm of the quantum from the realm of molecular reality are analogous to those separating Kant's noumenal from his phenomenal. The impersonal quantum realm has no ethics; neither does the impersonal phenomenal realm of cause-and-effect science. This is the problem with Kant's nature/ freedom or 30. Cited in George Gilder, Microcosm: The Quantum Revolution in Economics and Technology (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1989), p. 328.

31. Ibid., p. 329.

32. I wrote this in 1997. In 2001, Kurzweil proposed the law of accelerating returns.

33. Ibid., p. 381.

science/personality dualism.³⁴ The God of the Bible is shoved out of both realms. So is His law. So are His sanctions.

2. Population Growth Consumes Space

We live in the space-time continuum, however much we can make use of quantum physics. We are not subatomic creatures. The impossibility of indefinite compound growth of both humanity and man's wealth points to the limit of time. There will come a time when the physical room for mankind's multiplication will no longer allow any extension of the covenantal process of dominion. At that point, the Genesis command to multiply must end. A new cosmic order will be imposed by God, i.e., a new covenantal order (II Peter 3:10). Progressive sanctification in history will have fulfilled the terms of the dominion covenant.

Our world is generally governed by the laws of thermodynamics, even though there are exceptions, e.g., miracles.³⁵ The first law of thermodynamics establishes the fixity of matter-energy: the finitude of the creation. This law is as important covenantally as the second law, which establishes a one-way move from potential energy to used-up energy that can no longer do any work. Both laws point to finitude. Both laws establish theoretical limits to growth. Sections of the universe can be rearranged by man, but to do this, man must reduce the available energy or matter of the universe. This matter-energy is finite. Because of the cursed nature of the second law, so is time. Time's arrow moves in only one direction.

At today's rates of change, the second law seems to establish a cosmic limit of eons of time. How much time, no one can say for certain, but the estimates tossed out by cosmologists are never less than tens of billions of years. In stark contrast, human population growth accelerates the coming of the end of eschatological time, for it approaches infinity as a limit at an accelerating rate after the growth curve becomes exponential. The tens of billions of years supposedly remaining until either the heat death of the universe or the collapse back to the omega point of another Big Bang—though smaller than the first one, says the second law—are covenantally little more than conceptual side shows. Astronomical time becomes irrelevant eschatologically in the face of mankind's compounding population growth. What is significant eschatologically is population growth: the biological ability of man's population to reach the environmental limits of growth within a few centuries, or a few millennia if life outside the earth is environmentally sustainable. At 2% growth per annum, it will not take tens of billions of years for mankind to fill up the cosmos. Six billion people growing at 2% per year become 327 billion people in two centuries, 2.4 trillion in three centuries, or (I think improbably) 52 quadrillion, 600 trillion in eight centuries.³⁶

34. Richard Kroner, Kant's Weltanschauung (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1914] 1956).

35. Chapter 18.

Of course, there can be catastrophes. Population growth can be reversed. So can economic growth. But the West's attainment of sustained positive economic growth rates in the range of over two percent per year since the late eighteenth century has placed before mankind a believable vision of wealth beyond the dreams of avarice. When it comes to compound growth, a little goes a long way remarkably fast.

E. The Zero-Growth Movement

The ideology underlying the zero-growth movement—both population growth and economic growth—rests on a recognition that mankind will reach its environmental limits to growth relatively soon unless the compounding process ceases (which I think it will). There is a legitimate sense of foreboding associated with this temporal limit, a realization that man's definition of himself and his meaning in history will change radically when mankind's population reaches its environmental limits, which will not take two centuries if present growth rates continue. This sense of foreboding is the sense of impending doom, either eschatological or cultural—the transformation of the Enlightenment's commitment to growth. The defenders of the zero growth school of thought call for coercive state action to begin to impose judicial limits to growth now, before mankind's population reaches its environmental limits. They want men to begin to come to grips emotionally with the limits of growth. They correctly sense that there is some eschatological connection between nature's limits and man's temporal limits. There is a connection: the fulfillment of the dominion covenant and therefore its temporal annulment, either through a new revelation from God, which the New Testament does not allow (Rev. 22: 18), or else the end of time.

Biblically speaking, long-term compound growth of both men and per capita wealth is the result of covenantal faithfulness. The judicial condition for maintaining such growth is freedom. The zero-growth movement therefore challenges freedom in the name of saving the environment. It is quite open in its call to place political restraints on economic freedom. Mankind's ability to multiply both men and things over time is seen as the great threat to the survival of "the good life," as defined by academics and intellectuals who have already attained historically great wealth, especially leisure. If the price of extending such freedom and therefore such wealth to the masses of humanity is the continuation of economic growth, and if humanity keeps multiplying because of its increasing wealth, therefore making mandatory even greater economic growth, then the zero-growth movement is ready to establish a new international world order that will use coercion to end the growth process.

36. A two percent rate has a doubling date of about 36 years: $73/2$.

The zero-growth movement is a movement of "haves" who are determined to keep most of what they have and deny an opportunity to the "have nots." The multiplication of scarce positional goods—goods that reflect social status and which lose their utility as status goods when lots of people can buy them³⁷—threatens the present social order in which the rich and their well-paid spokesmen are visibly on top. By calling a halt to aggregate economic growth, the zero-growth movement seeks to stabilize today's production of positional goods and the wealth to buy them.

The zero-growth movement is to positional goods in general what California's Coastal Land Commission is to socially prime waterfront area property. Such property would lose its status as socially prime if agents of the middle class could buy up valuable land and build time share apartments and condominiums for re-sale. Thus, the land's present owners have used the state to prohibit such purchases. In the name of preserving the natural environment, the present owners of this highly unnatural environment—expensive homes, electricity lines, phone lines, etc.—keep out the riff-raff. They have made it illegal for their money-seeking neighbors to sell property to your agents and mine: real estate developers. The phrase "real estate developers" is a hated phrase in socially prime circles, for it means "the middle class."³⁸

37. Fred Hirsch, The Social Limits to Growth (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1978), p. 11.

38. Thomas Sowell, Pink and Brown People and Other Controversial Essays (Stanford, California: Hoover Institution Press, 1981), p. 104. This essay appeared originally in the Los Angeles Herald Examiner (March 23, 1979): "Those Phony Environmentalists."

Meanwhile, the middle class does the same thing to the lower middle class through zoning commissions. Zoning commissions keep apartments and mobile home parks out of middle-class neighborhoods. The freedom of buying and selling threatens today's distribution of socially positional real estate. Existing owners of such real estate cannot afford to buy all of these goods, so they use the state to restrict such purchases by newcomers. This raises the social value of existing property by lowering its market value. This is a state subsidy to those present owners of real estate who seek maximum status income rather than maximum money income.

F. Idolatry, Autonomy, and Power

Moses warned Israel of the major temptation that lay ahead: "And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth" (v. 17). The wealth that would inevitably come from God as a way to confirm their keeping of the covenant would lead them into temptation. The covenant's ethically governed cause-and-effect sanctions in history would not sustain their faith in God. Israel would forget the sovereign Giver. They would attribute their wealth to another sovereign: themselves.

1. Idolatry

We know that Israel constantly worshipped idols until the era of the exile. These idols were fertility gods. Yet Moses' warning did not identify idolatry as the great threat to Israel, but rather self-worship. Moses did not warn them that they would attribute to idols the source of their wealth, yet this is what they did do for the next eight centuries. Israelites did not sacrifice their children by requiring them to pass through secular universities; they required them to pass through fire (II Kings 17:17; Ezek. 23:37). How can we reconcile this seeming discrepancy between idolatry and self-worship?

The pre-exilic idol was a representational link between man and the supernatural. By making their requests known to the idol, men sought their own ends. But the idol was not regarded as autonomous; it was part of the continuum between man and cosmic sources of power. The idol had to be constructed by man. This creative act transferred to man partial authority over the process of environmental manipulation. The god represented by the idol required man to become part of this creative process. Without man and the work of his hands, the god represented by the idol would lack something important: man's piety and fear. The god would also not be fed. For paganism, unlike Old Covenant religion, sacrifices and oblations were the care and feeding of gods.³⁹

Pagan religion is a system of mutually beneficial transactions. Man gets what he wants by placating a god who wants something from man. Man and god are part of a larger cosmic process in which each of them achieves his goals through a division of labor. Both man and his god confront impersonal fate, impersonal chance, or both, depending on the situation, and each requires the services of the other in order better to attain his own goals. Neither can claim absolute autonomy, for each is entwined in impersonal cosmic forces, and each works most effectively in cooperation with the other.

2. Shared Authority

Then in what sense could the covenant-breaking Israelite say to himself that the power of his hands had brought him his wealth? Only in the sense of his shared authority in the process of wealth-getting. He would beg before an idol, and the god represented by this idol would then include him in the process of wealth-creation. It was man's request and man's ritual obeisance that made possible the creation of wealth. An idolatrous man would subordinate himself to an idol in some proscribed sense—some set of formal ritual boundaries—but not in the way that a covenant-keeper subordinates himself to a God who is completely autonomous and above the creation's processes. In idolatrous religion, there is no complete autonomy, but there is also no complete subordination. Both pagan man and his god were involved in a cosmic battle against impersonal forces and boundaries. Sometimes they joined forces; sometimes they did not. Pagan man saw his gods as only relatively more powerful than he was. It was a matter of degree. Thus, by linking himself to an idol, man could increase his likelihood of getting his own way by conforming ritually to a relatively more powerful being. But classical paganism saw man and god as co-laborers in the fields of fate or luck/chance.⁴⁰

39. Jacob Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16, vol. 3 of The Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday, 1991), p. 148.

40. Charles Norris Cochrane, Christianity and Classical Culture: A Study of Thought and Action from Augustus to Augustine (New York: Oxford University Press, [1944] 1957), pp. 157–59. (<http://bit.ly/cnccacc>). Reprinted by the Liberty Fund, Indianapolis, Indiana.

By placating a god through idolatrous worship, pagan man believed that he could in some way manipulate this god into doing man's will. Man's cleverness in getting a good deal determined the degree of his success as a bargainer. Man knew that he could not get something for nothing out of the deity, but he sought transactions that were weighted heavily in man's favor: something for practically nothing. The closer he came to this favorable exchange rate, the better he could claim, "My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth." By getting a god to do man's will on man's terms, pagan religion sought greater autonomy. What pagan man did not want was a god who drove a hard bargain. But the God of the Bible drives a very hard bargain: unconditional surrender (as I titled my 1981 book). Pagan man remained pagan because he rejected this God.

3. Autonomy as Power Over Nature

Man's quest for autonomy is a quest for power: self-made law. In the West, what is called autonomy is power over nature. To gain such power, mankind requires knowledge of nature's processes and sufficient capital to exploit this knowledge. Law is generally regarded as natural, i.e., outside of man, yet discoverable by man. In the most consistent forms of humanism, however, law is seen as man-made, i.e., an order imposed on the "raw stuff" of nature by man's creative mind. This suggestion seems crazy to most "common sense" rationalists, but it is inherent in Kant's revision of philosophical categories. In his Critique of Pure Reason, Kant concluded: "Thus the order and regularity in the appearances, which we entitle nature, we ourselves introduce. We could never find them in appearances, had not we ourselves, or the nature of our mind, originally set them there."⁴¹ So, the judicial debate in the West has been between the advocates of judge-discovered law (e.g., English common law) and legislator-made law (e.g., European civil law).⁴² Neither side accepts the legitimacy of God-revealed law. Such a view would undermine man's claim to autonomy.

In contrast to Western rationalism, Eastern mysticism seeks an escape from law and nature by immersion in the cosmic unity, which is impersonal and non-judgmental. Buddhist D. T. Suzuki announced: "Buddhism does not condemn this life and universe for their wickedness as was done by some religious teachers and philosophers. The so-called wickedness is not radical in nature and life. It is merely superficial.⁴³ The Eastern mystic sees both nature and law as illusions, as fetters on true understanding. But the nirvana of selflessness involves a surrender of personal autonomy in order to gain autonomy from nature and law: incorporation into the monistic one.⁴⁴ There is also pantheism, which completely denies man's autonomy and seeks immersion in monistic nature. But Eastern mystical man is as adamant as Western rational man regarding the illegitimacy of God-revealed law in the sense of publicly declared universal standards. Revealed law points to an autonomous God who dictates to an eternally subordinate man. Eastern man is willing to forfeit his autonomy for the sake of ontological wholeness, but only to impersonal, monistic, non-judgmental forces.

41. Immanuel Kant, Critique of Pure Reason (1781), A 125. Trans. Norman Kemp Smith (New York: Macmillan, 1929), p. 147.

42. Cf. N. Stephen Kinsella, "Legislation and the Discovery of Law in a Free Society," Journal of Libertarian Studies, XI (Summer 1995), pp. 134–81.

Autonomy is a unique characteristic of God. God alone establishes the law. Man is a creature; he must conform himself to nature's laws or else seek to escape from nature, which also means escaping from meaning and sensibility. So, what Western man means by autonomy is a knowledge of impersonal law which gives him the ability to gain control over nature for his own ends. Knowledge is power. While man does not make the law, as the discoverer of law he can use it to manipulate nature. He seeks a profitable bargain from nature. It is not that he created the law; he merely exploits it for his own purposes. This is also the goal of idolatrous pagan man: not autonomy from his deity, but a cost-effective manipulation of nature through his deity. Modern man subordinates himself to an impersonal law-order with limited jurisdiction him in order to gain a lever over nature. Similarly, pagan man subordinates himself to a personal deity of limited jurisdiction in order to gain a lever over nature. Modern man acknowledges his subordination to law in general in order to exercise control over things in particular. Pagan man acknowledges his subordination to a local deity in order to exercise control over things in particular. Modern man hopes to use the law to beat the law. Pagan man hopes to use the deity to beat the deity. Both seek power.

43. D. T. Suzuki, Outlines of Mahayana Buddhism (New York: Schocken Books, [1907] 1963), p. 128. Schocken Books is a Jewish publishing house.

44. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), Appendix C:B.

G. The Curse on the Quest for Autonomy

Moses foretold blessings if Israel obeyed God: an extension of the nation's wealth beyond the inheritance from Canaan. But if they rebelled, they could expect an analogous disinheritance: "And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God" (vv. 19–20).⁴⁵

Here Moses raised the issue of false worship, which is always enmeshed in man's quest for autonomy. While they would claim that the might of their hands had created their wealth, in fact they would worship false gods. They would claim autonomy, but they would practice idolatry. They would claim to be in control, but in fact they would find themselves in moral bondage. God would then apply his corporate sanctions in history. Israel would be expelled from Canaan as surely as the Canaanites had been. Not all of the Canaanites were expelled by Israel (Josh. 15:63; cf. 17:12–13). Similarly, not all of the Israelites were taken into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar; he left the poorest people behind (II Kings 24:14).

God promised to visit the same kinds of sins with the same negative sanctions. Inside the boundaries of Israel, false worship would no longer be tolerated. The Promised Land was under the covenant. The nation would visibly come under negative sanctions if they worshipped other gods.

So, long-term economic growth cannot be sustained by any society unless its members honor the terms of biblical law. This does not mean that only confessing nations can experience economic growth. It does mean that when prosperous nations grow lax about enforcing the biblical principles of civil law, they will find that their wealth dissipates. The blessings of external covenant-keeping will fade when men cease to honor the civil principles of biblical law: private property, freedom of exchange, restitution, honest weights and measures, and so on. But will men honor these principles even though they do not honor the God who established them? This question has not been resolved.

45. Chapter 23.

H. The Transformation of 1800

We come to the most important unanswered historical question in man's history. It is this:

How did it happen that, beginning approximately in 1880 in the United Kingdom compound economic growth of between 2% and 3% per annum began and has not been reversed?

In 1800, world population was about one billion people. Today, it is approaching seven billion. This is expected to go to nine billion by 2050.

In 1798, an anonymous book by Rev. T. Robert Malthus, a self-taught economist, appeared: An Essay on Population. It predicted that there would be no long-term increase in per capita wealth, due to the rise of population. This prediction was conventional to a fault. Never before had rising per capita wealth not been overcome by rising population. The prediction was wrong. A similar prediction was made by Paul Ehrlich in his 1968 book, The Population Bomb. It became a best-seller. In its opening paragraph, it predicted the following: "The battle to feed all of humanity is over. In the 1970s hundreds of millions of people will starve to death in spite of any crash programs embarked upon now. At this late date nothing can prevent a substantial increase in the world death rate. . . ." The prediction was wrong. The world's population doubled over the next four decades, and per capita income rose.

Some economic historians date the Industrial Revolution around 1780. Others believe that sustained growth came in 1820. By selecting 1800, I am not too far out of line.

There are two aspects of the question. First, what changed in 1800 that could not have changed in 1800 B.C.? Second, why did this change take place in the tiny Island in Northwest Europe and not somewhere else?

Economic history as an academic profession has been operating since the early decades of the twentieth century. Some very intelligent practitioners have devoted their careers to answering this question. No one has come close to persuading his peers, let alone persuade non-economic historians. I studied economic history with two of them: Herbert Heaton, who was one of the founders of the profession, and Hugh Aitken, who edited The Journal of Economic History in the 1970s. They had no answer.

It is not just academic historians who have asked it. An islander in New Guinea asked a visiting physiologist and ornithologist, Jared Diamond, how it was that Westerners have so much cargo. Cargo was the islanders' designation to wealth as a result of their initial contacts with American troops that built airfields during World War II. The flying machines brought in so many goods. Diamond thought long and hard about the answer. He wrote a best-selling book, which became a three-par television documentary: Guns, Germs, and Steel (1997). He wound up as a professor of geography, a third academic field. He is widely respected. But his answers do not provide a solution to the question: Why Great Britain?

On the magnitude of what has taken place since 1800, two studies stand out: Gregory Clark's Darwinian explanation, A Farewell to Alms (2007) and Dierdre McCloskey's first two volumes of a proposed six-volume set, Bourgeois Virtues (2006) and Bourgeois Dignity (2010). McCloskey's book, Bourgeois Dignity, provides evidence on what could not have caused this transformation: thrift,⁴⁶ capital equipment,⁴⁷ the rise of greed,⁴⁸ the Protestant ethic (as formulated by Max Weber),⁴⁹ capital accumulation,⁵⁰ expropriation of poor workers,⁵¹ accumulation of human capital (e.g., education),⁵² transportation breakthroughs,⁵³ natural resources,⁵⁴ coal,⁵⁵ foreign trade,⁵⁶ the slave trade,⁵⁷ expropriating foreign tribes,⁵⁸ commerce,⁵⁹ changes in property rights,⁶⁰ and science.⁶¹ McKloskey's question has not been answered. "If the spinning jenny was such a swell idea in 1764 CE [academic lingo for A.D., imported from Judaism], why was it not in 1264, or 264, or for that matter 1264 BCE. If factories extracted surplus value in 1848, why not in 46. Dierdre McCloskey, Bourgeois Dignity: Why Economics Can't Explain the Modern World (Chicago: University of Cbiucago Press, 2010), ch. 14.

47. Ibid., ch. 15.

48. Ibid., ch. 16.

49. Ibid., ch. 16.

50. Ibid., ch. 17.

51. Ibid., ch. 18.

52. Ibid., ch. 19.

53. Ibid., ch. 20.

54. Ibid., ch. 21.

55. Ibid., ch. 22.

56. Ibid., chaps. 23–25.

57. Ibid., ch. 26.

58. Ibid., ch. 27.

59. Ibid., ch. 28.

60. Ibid., chaps. 33–36.

61. Ibid., ch. 38.

1148? Thus the economic puzzle of the Industrial Revolution.”⁶² These are not trick questions. McCloskey has served as the president of the Economic History Association.

McCloskey has offered a thesis whose proof must wait until the third volume. The change had to do with rhetoric: the acceptance in Holland around 1600 of the legitimacy of commerce and innovation. This new outlook spread to Great Britain in the eighteenth century, and from there to the United States and Europe. This new outlook favorable to entrepreneurship made the difference. So, a change in belief regarding ethics and status was the basis of the great transformation.

I am favorable to the thesis. I want to believe it. It is consistent with my lifetime of study of just this question. But, to prove it, McCloskey must show that a major change that took place in Dutch theology and then ethics, a change that spread to the British Isles. Which ideas changed that were completely different?

I offer this suggestion: a completely new view of progress. This transformation did take place: a shift from amillennialism to postmillennialism. There were postmillennial Dutch theologians, according to the former South African Calvinist theologian, F. N. Lee. In a letter to me dated May 1, 2011, he listed these: De Bres, Gellus, the Dordt Dutch Bible, Maresius, Voetius, Leusden, Huernius, Cocceius, Calovius, d’Outre n, Van der Kamp, Witsius, the two Vitringas, Hoornbeek, Essenius, Groenewegen, Koelman, Lampe, Hoekendijk, Brakel, and á Marck. Postmillennialism for the first time in man’s history offered a theological defense of linear, progressive wealth: meaning progress in the earthly kingdom of God that need not be reversed. I can think of no other significant explanation for a change in opinion regarding the relationship between ethics and the future.

Conclusion

Deuteronomy 8 sets forth the covenantal basis of compound economic growth. It ties sustained economic growth to corporate covenant-keeping. In doing so, it establishes eschatological limits to growth. In a finite world, nothing grows forever. Therefore, long-term economic growth as a predictable reward for corporate covenant-keeping becomes a testimony to the potential brevity of history. This brevity can be overcome through corporate covenant-breaking—the quest for autonomy—and God’s predictable negative historical sanctions. Deu- teronomy 8 moved the discussion of time from the cosmos to the covenant. It moved from cosmically imposed cyclical history⁶³ to God-imposed linear history. In doing so, this passage broke with ancient cosmology. Modern evolutionism's cosmology is equally incompatible with it.

62. Ibid., p. 377.

Covenantal history is not subsumed under vast quantities of cosmic time; on the contrary, it is determinative of cosmic time. Covenant sanctions, not the second law of thermodynamics, determine the limits of history. Deuteronomy 8 establishes not merely the covenantal possibility of compound economic growth but also the covenantal requirement of such growth. A failure of a society to achieve this is a sign of its covenant-breaking status, whether permanent or temporary.

This brings me to a conclusion: the zero-growth movement is a covenant-breaking movement with a covenant-denying eschatology. Humanism's "limits to growth" philosophy is misconstrued. It focuses on physical limits to growth—inescapable in a finite world—in order to call men to impose anti-growth policies through political coercion. The biblical goal is to call on mankind to extend existing environmental limits to growth through production, including especially the production of additional human beings. Our awareness of the existence of final limits to growth should inspire us to pursue growth through personal capital accumulation and the de-capitalization of the state. The environmental limit of time is our great enemy, not the environmental limit of raw materials, including living space. By extending man's dominion to the final limits of the environment's ability to sustain human life, man reaches the eschatological limit of time. It is our God-assigned task to fill the earth, not to impose political limits on growth. The biblical concept of "fill the earth" does mean there are final limits.

The traditional plea of the foreign missions fund-raiser is woefully incomplete: "When that last sinner is brought to saving faith in Jesus Christ, Christ will return in glory!"⁶⁴ On the contrary, Christ will return in glory when mankind has fulfilled the dominion covenant, which includes the Great Commission.⁶⁵ That last sinner, whoever he or she may be, will complete the Great Commission, but only after mankind has completed the dominion covenant. The ideal of growth will never end in history. It is an eschatological corollary of history. Our task as covenant-keepers is to bring on the end of history by working to reach mankind's limits to growth.

63. Mircea Eliade, Cosmos and History: The Myth of the Eternal Return (New York: Harper Torchbooks, 1959).

64. I heard just such a plea sometime around 1965. I heard it again in early 1997 at a church-sponsored missions conference. Eschatology affects missions.

65. Gentry, Greatness of the Great Commission.

DISINHERITING THE HEIRS

And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God (Deut. 8:19–20).

The theocentric principle undergirding this warning is the doctrine of God as the sanctions-bringer in history. The chapter deals with maintaining the kingdom grant through obedience to God's law. "Thou shalt also consider in thine heart, that, as a man chasteneth his son, so the LORD thy God chasteneth thee. Therefore thou shalt keep the commandments of the LORD thy God, to walk in his ways, and to fear him" (Deut. 8:5–6). They would lose the land grant if they worshipped other gods. The mark of this false worship would be disobedience: "ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God."

A. To Perish

The language of negative sanctions here is absolute. These sanctions were historical. This law was not a seed law. It did not apply exclusively to tribal relationships. It was a land law because it applied to Israel's survival inside Canaan's boundaries. But was it exclusively a land law? That is, does the same negative sanction of national removal from the land threaten every covenanted nation? This seems unlikely. Invasion, perhaps, but not actual removal. Mass conversion to a rival faith, yes, as in North Africa, 632–732, and Constantinople, 1453, but not actual removal. What Israel did to Canaan was a one-time event: genocide. Similarly, what Assyria did to the Northern Kingdom, and Babylon did to Judah were unique events, analogous to what Israel had done to Canaan: kidnapping.

We can also ask: Do nations lawfully covenant with God in New Testament times? This text does not say, but the context of this text was a universal aspect of the covenant: covenantal forgetfulness and God's desire that all nations obey Him. "Therefore thou shalt keep the commandments of the LORD thy God, to walk in his ways, and to fear him" (v. 6). Thus, if forgetfulness is a permanent covenantal problem, then it must still apply to nations, for the nation is the context of the Great Commission (Matt. 28:18–20).¹

The Hebrew word translated as "perish" is elsewhere translated as "destroy." In this context, the word seems to mean total destruction: the same degree of destruction that God was asking them to bring against the Canaanites. God had used Israel to destroy Arad completely, whose newly ownerless land Israel had then inherited, as promised. "And Israel vowed a vow unto the LORD, and said, If thou wilt indeed deliver this people into my hand, then I will utterly destroy their cities. And the LORD hearkened to the voice of Israel, and delivered up the Canaanites; and they utterly destroyed them and their cities: and he called the name of the place Hormah" (Num. 21:2–3). The destruction of Canaan was to be comparable:

Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye are passed over Jordan into the land of Canaan; Then ye shall drive out all the inhabitants of the land from before you, and destroy all their pictures, and destroy all their molten images, and quite pluck down all their high places: And ye shall dispossess the inhabitants of the land, and dwell therein: for I have given you the land to possess it. And ye shall divide the land by lot for an inheritance among your families: and to the more ye shall give the more inheritance, and to the fewer ye shall give the less inheritance: every man's inheritance shall be in the place where his lot falleth; according to the tribes of your fathers ye shall inherit. But if ye will not drive out the inhabitants of the land from before you; then it shall come to pass, that those which ye let remain of them shall be pricks in your eyes, and thorns in your sides, and shall vex you in the land wherein ye dwell. Moreover it shall come to pass, that I shall do unto you, as I thought to do unto them (Num. 33:51–56).

This was a command in the form of a prophecy. God warned the Israelites that if they did not bring total destruction to the Canaanites, the Canaanites would remain in the land to vex them spiritually. If Israel then worshipped the gods of Canaan, God would impose the negative sanction that He had instructed Israel to bring against Canaan. Nevertheless, this language of total destruction was conditional. There was always to be the possibility of forgiveness on God's terms when He dealt with Israel. This meant that there would not be total destruction. Moses warned them; then he comforted them:

1. Kenneth L. Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

Take heed unto yourselves, lest ye forget the covenant of the LORD your God, which he made with you, and make you a graven image, or the likeness of any thing, which the LORD thy God hath forbidden thee. For the LORD thy God is a consuming fire, even a jealous God. When thou shalt beget children, and children's children, and ye shall have remained long in the land, and shall corrupt yourselves, and make a graven image, or the likeness of any thing, and shall do evil in the sight of the LORD thy God, to provoke him to anger: I call heaven and earth to witness against you this day, that ye shall soon utterly perish from off the land whereunto ye go over Jordan to possess it; ye shall not prolong your days upon it, but shall utterly be destroyed. And the LORD shall scatter you among the nations, and ye shall be left few in number among the heathen, whither the LORD shall lead you. And there ye shall serve gods, the work of men's hands, wood and stone, which neither see, nor hear, nor eat, nor smell. But if from thence thou shalt seek the LORD thy God, thou shalt find him, if thou seek him with all thy heart and with all thy soul. When thou art in tribulation, and all these things are come upon thee, even in the latter days, if thou turn to the LORD thy God, and shalt be obedient unto his voice; (For the LORD thy God is a merciful God;) he will not forsake thee, neither destroy thee, nor forget the covenant of thy fathers which he sware unto them (Deut. 4:23–31).²

So, on the one hand, there would be what God described as total destruction. On the other hand, captivity abroad would be substituted for total destruction. "And ye shall perish among the heathen, and the land of your enemies shall eat you up" (Lev. 26:38). Israel would perish as captives perish, not as the families of Korah and Dathan had perished: "They, and all that appertained to them, went down alive into the pit, and the earth closed upon them: and they perished from among the congregation" (Num. 16:33).³

2. Chapter 10.

3. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 7.

B. The Prophesied Seed

There was one promise that was not conditional: Jacob's. "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be" (Gen. 49:10). This was a messianic prophecy, not a covenantal prophecy. Old Covenant messianic prophecies were not ethically conditional. Nothing that man could do to rebel against God would in any way hinder the scheduled advent in history of the Messiah.

This being the case, the corporate negative historical sanction of destruction could not be total. The language of total destruction had to be interpreted in terms of the messianic prophecies. The destruction of Israel would be analogous to the destruction of Canaan: not total, as God had required, but partial, as Israel had actually imposed. A remnant of Canaan remained in the land; so would a remnant of Israel also remain during the Babylonian captivity. "And he [Nebuchadnezzar] carried away all Jerusalem, and all the princes, and all the mighty men of valour, even ten thousand captives, and all the craftsmen and smiths: none remained, save the poorest sort of the people of the land" (II Kings 24:14). A remnant of captives also would return.

God did not intend that the language of total destruction be interpreted literally, for He had already given Israel a pair of promises that made total destruction impossible. First, there would be an inheriting seed of Judah. Second, there would be an opportunity to repent in a foreign land. The symbolism (rhetoric) of Deuteronomy 8:19–20 was not to be understood by Israel as negating the eschatology of the messianic promises and the ethically conditional status of pre-Messiah covenantal lawsuits against Israel. Judicial theology always governs biblical symbolism; the latter is in service to the former.⁴

The promised messianic inheritance assured Israel of some minimal degree of continuity. The inheritance would not be completely removed from the nation at least until Shiloh appeared. Israel would not be removed from the face of the earth, although Israel might be removed from the face of the land. This physical removal was the covenantal threat set before them in Deuteronomy 8:19–20. Part of the landed inheritance would be removed from them and transferred to others. Upon their return, the old laws of landed inheritance would be modified to include strangers. Israel would no longer have a monopoly of ownership in the Promised Land. "And it shall come to pass, that ye shall divide it by lot for an inheritance unto you, and to the strangers that sojourn among you, which shall beget children among you: and they shall be unto you as born in the country among the children of Israel; they shall have inheritance with you among the tribes of Israel. And it shall come to pass, that in what tribe the stranger sojourneth, there shall ye give him his inheritance, saith the Lord GOD" (Ezek. 47:22–23).

4. This is a basic principle of the hermeneutics of Christian Reconstruction and the Calvinist tradition generally.

Israel could not lay claim to Canaan unconditionally. Israel would gain legal title through conquest, but this legal title was no better than their corporate maintenance of the terms of ownership. These terms of ownership were covenantal. They involved biblical law. God reserved the right to evict Israel from the land if the terms of His contract were not honored.

Bodily eviction was the primary threatened sanction here. God would use another nation to sweep them out of the land, just as He would soon use them to sweep out the Canaanites. God is jealous; He would not tolerate false worship by His people. The negative sanction of disinheritance would remind them of their conditional status as inheriting sons. The Babylonian captivity would remind them of this conditional inheritance. Upon the remnant's return from captivity, the new terms of landed inheritance would remind them that landed inheritance would no longer rest legally on the original conquest under Joshua. It would rest on a family's mere presence in the land at the time of the captives' return, even a gentile family (Ezek. 47:21–23). The judicial threat of Deuteronomy 8:19–20 was this: if Israel did not preserve the monopoly of God's public worship in the land of Israel, God would not preserve Israel's monopoly of landed inheritance.

This post-exilic inclusion of strangers in the inheritance pointed to a broadening of the covenant to include the gentiles. With the fulfillment of the messianic prophecies, the gentiles became co-heirs of the entire covenantal inheritance. "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus. And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. 3:27–29). This lay in the distant future in Moses' day.

C. Predictable Corporate Sanctions

Deuteronomy 8:19–20 established specific negative sanctions. The law of the covenant did not stand alone. To this law were attached sanctions. In this instance, the negative sanction of national eviction was built into the Mosaic law. To discuss God's covenant law-order apart from God's predictable corporate sanctions in history is at best a theological mistake and at worst a mark of self-conscious antinomian rebellion. It is comparable to discussing history apart from eternity and its two-fold sanctions. To say that heaven and hell are not predictable is to deny Christian orthodoxy. In fact, the open denial of a literal hell and a literal lake of fire is the premier mark of heresy in the modern world. This denial of predictable sanctions has also been moved from eternity to history. It is widely believed among Protestant scholars today that there are no predictable divine sanctions in history.

This denial of predictable historical sanctions, if true, would make impossible the creation of a uniquely biblical social theory. If God does not bring predictable corporate sanctions in history in terms of His Bible-revealed law, then Christians and Jews must adopt some version of natural law theory or democratic theory or some other humanist system of man-imposed sanctions in their search for social predictability. Sanctions are an inescapable concept in social theory. It is never a question of sanctions vs. no sanctions. It is always a question of which sanctions imposed by whom in terms of which law-order. There is no escape from this limit on man's thinking. If there were no predictable relationship between biblical law and sanctions, there could be no biblical social theory. Without biblical social theory, there can be no accurate social theory. Social theory is either biblical or else incorrect, as is equally true of all human thought.⁵

1. Political Theory

Political theory is a subset of social theory. This is because politics is a subset of a more comprehensive system of sanctions: a higher law and therefore higher sanctions. In modern humanist political theory, political representatives are believed to represent larger social forces. As such, representatives impose civil sanctions as agents or legal representatives of these forces. These forces may be seen as personal or impersonal, but they are always believed to be partially predictable by man.

5. Greg L. Bahnsen, Van Til's Apologetic: Readings and Analysis (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: P&R, 1998), pp. 496–529.

The justification for civil sanctions always rests on a formal appeal to a specific theory of justice. Justice is always defined as a coherent system of law and sanctions. In all widely held theories of politics, justice can be legitimately sought in the realm of politics only because justice is understood as being broader than politics. Men believe that they must submit to negative institutional sanctions because they believe that these sanctions in some way will prevent or forestall the imposition of even more threatening negative sanctions by something more powerful and more menacing than man and his sanctions.

Consider a simple example. Residents of urban areas located close to earthquake faults elect political representatives who pass laws establishing building codes that reduce the threat of collapse during an earthquake. The impersonal seismic forces that produce earthquakes are understood as governed by the laws of geology. These laws can be studied and catalogued. While individual earthquakes may not be predictable very far in advance, the statistically predictable occurrence of earthquakes in general is widely believed. This predictability is what justifies the building codes. Negative civil sanctions for violating these building codes are regarded as legitimate because of the statistical predictability of earthquakes. The lesser threat of civil sanctions is justified in terms of the larger threat of collapsing buildings.

The laws of geology do not autonomously justify such building codes. There must be an added element of moral law. An earthquake is a disrupter of the peace—an invader from below. The state is seen as the preserver of the peace. Building codes therefore help to preserve the peace, just as fire codes do. Other arguments could also be introduced: the state as insurer, protector, or healer. These additional elements are used today to justify civil building codes in seismically vulnerable regions. Conclusion: a knowledge of physical laws is necessary but not sufficient to justify negative civil sanctions. Social theorists should also consider the effects on society of physical laws.

On what basis are laws against certain immoral public acts justified? What if there were no overarching system of moral law with predictable sanctions attached? That is, if God did not threaten to bring coercive sanctions against society in general for tolerating certain immoral acts, would there be a legitimate reason for the state to bring coercive sanctions against those who commit such acts? This is the issue of what is commonly designated as a victimless crime. Economist and legal theorist F. A. Hayek wrote: "At least where it is not believed that the whole group may be punished by a supernatural power for the sins of individuals, there can arise no such rules from the limitation of conduct towards others, and therefore from the settlements of disputes.”⁶ In short, “no God—no victim.”

The judicial case against the sale of addictive drugs might be made in terms of addiction as a potential source of crime. Question: On what judicial or moral basis can negative civil sanctions be imposed on potential causes of future crimes? Wouldn't this open the door to civil sanctions against all sorts of not-yet-crimes and might-become-crimes? Could the state then be restrained from becoming tyrannical? The state would then replace God as the perceived victim of victimless crimes. Its majesty would be seen as threatened by such activities, and many are the actions that might challenge this majesty. If drug addiction is uniquely threatening to social peace, those who defend the imposition of civil sanctions against addictive drug sales must make their case based on the statistical relationship between widespread addiction and crime. This is because the case for negative civil sanctions against the sale of addictive drugs cannot be made directly from biblical law. There is no biblical civil law against drunkenness except in the case of the rebellious son. But gluttony is also specified in the text as a mark of his rebellion (Deut. 21:20).⁷ No one suggests negative civil sanctions against the sale of fattening foods—or at least no one had at the time that I wrote this sentence.⁸

Governments have passed many laws against the sale of drugs in response to the steady increase in middle-class addiction, which has accompanied the breakdown of biblical faith. The nineteenth century, which had few such laws, was not cursed by an addicted population. Humanist society has failed. Laws against drug sales cannot restore the lost faith in God and meaning. They merely raise the price of rebellion, but at the cost of a great loss of honest people's liberties.

6. F. A. Hayek, Rules of Order, vol. 1 of Law, Legislation and Liberty (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1973), p. 101.

7. Chapter 50.

8. On July 23, 2002, a class-action lawsuit in the United States was filed against four fast-food companies. The companies are accused of selling dangerous products that make people fat. This is tort law, but if the plaintiffs' case is successful, this could lead to civil laws regulating the fat content of food, or at least laws requiring some kind of disclaimer by the sellers.

2. Sanctions and Social Theory

Modern social theory has abandoned the idea that God brings predictable sanctions in history in terms of His law. This includes most Christian social theory, such as it is. Theonomy is the main exception to this rule. For humanist social theory, the idea of God's sanctions in history is relegated to adiaphora: things indifferent to the humanist faith. Mirroring this humanistic outlook is modern Christian theology, which relegates civil law to adiaphora. For humanists, God's law and His sanctions in history are irrelevant to their worldview; for most Christians, God's law and sanctions in history are equally irrelevant to their worldview. On this shared testimony, the humanist-pietist alliance has rested for three centuries.⁹ Political pluralists have always declared this confession of faith, from Roger Williams (1630s) to the Christian Coalition (1990s).¹⁰ To the extent that Christians are beginning to consider the possibility that God brings predictable corporate sanctions in history, to that extent they have moved away from political pluralism and toward theonomic covenantalism.¹¹

9. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

10. As I wrote in this book's Foreword, the Christian Coalition is a political action organization. It was created in 1989 by the satellite/cable television multimillionaire entrepreneur Pat Robertson, who had resigned from the Southern Baptist ministry in 1988 before he made an unsuccessful run in 1988 for the Republican Party's nomination for President. In its 1995 political testament, Contract With the American Family, the organization announced the standard pluralist-Unitarian worldview that has governed the United States since the late nineteenth century. Ralph Reed, Jr., then its Executive Director, proclaimed: "We believe in an America where all citizens are judged on the content of their character, and not on their gender, race, religion, or ethnic background" (pp. ix-x). This is the standard pluralist-humanist litany, "without respect to race, color, creed, or national origin." It places character above theological confession (creed). It defines the content of character apart from the Bible. The document correctly invokes Roger Williams as the originator of the American doctrine of the separation of church and state (p. 5) It rewrites colonial history, just as third-rate humanist high school history textbooks have done for a century, by claiming that the Puritans had fled from "the European system of officially sanctioned 'state religions'" which "benefited neither the state nor the religion involved" (p. 5). In fact, Massachusetts and Connecticut maintained state-established Congregational churches well into the 1800s: Connecticut, 1818; Massachusetts, 1833. The document calls for tax-funded education that maintains "traditional values" (p. 13), which was exactly what Unitarian Horace Mann called for when he promoted the public school movement in Massachusetts in the 1830s: traditional values stripped of all theological content. Contract With the American Family (Nashville, Tennessee: Moorings, a division of Random House, 1995) is subtitled: A bold plan by Christian Coalition to strengthen the family and restore common-sense values. This is an appeal to something resembling eighteenth-century Scottish common-sense rationalism, which did not survive Darwinism and modern existentialist philosophy. The last major institution to defend Scottish rationalism was Princeton Theological Seminary, which went liberal in 1929. See Gary North, Crossed Fingers: How the Liberals Captured the Presbyterian Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1996), ch. 10. (<http://bit.ly/gncrossed>)

The dividing issue here is the question of the source of our knowledge of these laws and also their divinely imposed sanctions. If the source is believed to be shared by all rational men irrespective of their belief in the Bible as the unique, revealed word of God, then natural law theory undergirds social theory, either as some variant of medieval scholasticism or right-wing Enlightenment humanism. In both cases, Protestants find themselves under the domination of humanism, either by way of Greece or Scotland, Aristotle or the two Adams: Ferguson and Smith. On the other hand, if the source of this knowledge is not shared, but is found exclusively in the Bible, then theonomic covenantalism undergirds social theory.

D. Sanctions and Sovereignty

Rushdoony wrote that the source of a society's law is its god.¹² His friend T. Robert Ingram had written the same thing a decade earlier. "Clearly the law giver in any case is the highest authority for any people. The origin of its law is its god."¹³ This is an accurate observation, but it is incomplete as stated. The source of a society's sanctions is also its god. I will go further: if a society distinguishes sharply between the source of its law and the source of its sanctions, the latter is the god of that society. In general, however, societies regard the source of law and sanctions as the same.

There is always some degree of schizophrenia regarding a society's god because there are multiple sources of sanctions in history. In the twentieth century, Protestants gave lip service to God as sovereign over history, yet they also denied that God's law has any place in civil law codes. But if God is over history, yet without predictable sanctions in history, He becomes analogous to the god of deism. Christian social theory then becomes something analogous to Scottish Enlightenment moral philosophy. Protestant Christians for three centuries have gone a long way down this road in the direction of operational deism. They affirm that God brings sanctions against societies, but not in terms of biblical law. God supposedly brings sanctions in terms of natural law. He is said to have revealed Himself equally clearly to all rational men regarding His universal but theologically neutral moral law, i.e., natural law. This universal revelation is said to supersede biblical law, which was supposedly annulled by the New Testament. This removes fundamental law from the Bible and transfers it to logic, custom, or power. It therefore establishes the political sovereignty of man, who no longer must confess faith in the God of the Bible in order to rule legitimately in civil society.

11. See Appendix C, section on "Pietism and Politics." See also Appendix H: "Week Reed: The Politics of Compromise."

12. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 5.

13. T. Robert Ingram, The World Under God's Law: Criminal Aspects of the Welfare State (Houston, Texas: St. Thomas Press, 1962), p. 3.

To the degree that a system of cosmic or social sanctions is regarded as unpredictable in history, to the same degree are sanctions-bringing representative agents freed from observing the details of cosmic or social law. They can substitute other laws that are in no clear way governed by cosmic or social law. The sovereignty of God progressively becomes the sovereignty of man, which in turn elevates the sovereignty of the state, which is seen increasingly as the ultimate sanctions-bringer in history. The hierarchy of politics then supersedes all others.

Conclusion

The covenantal threat listed here was disinheritance. Moses was preparing the conquest generation for a military campaign. The military spoils would be the long-deferred inheritance: Canaan. The threat of disinheritance was a powerful threat for such a group. Israel had waited 470 years for the fulfillment of God's promise to Abraham. Now, at the very time of fulfillment, Moses warned them that if they broke covenant with God by worshipping other gods, God would remove them from the land. The first step toward apostasy, Moses warned, was their vain imagining that they, rather than God, were the source of their wealth (v. 17).¹⁴

The threat was their removal from the land. God would remove them as surely as He would soon remove the present inhabitants. This promise of disinheritance was no less reliable than the promise of inheritance to Abraham. Inheritance was about to take place; they could rest assured that disinheritance would also take place. If they worshipped the gods of Canaan, God would remove them from those regions in which local deities were believed to exercise their sovereignty.

14. Chapter 21.

If Israelites attributed to themselves and their adopted local gods the wealth they would enjoy in Canaan, God would deal with them in the same way. This warning established a fundamental principle of covenant theology: similar corporate sins bring similar negative corporate sanctions in history.

Whenever those who call themselves by God's name refuse to believe this judicial principle, even going so far as to deny its continuing authority, they find themselves on the defensive. Those who worship other gods and obey other laws promise positive sanctions in history. If those who are chosen by God to worship Him and obey His laws refuse to acknowledge the threat of God's negative corporate sanctions in history, they become "we, too" social theorists. "Our way is just as good as your way." This eventually becomes, "Our way is pretty much the same as your way, since God is the author of universal truth. Your way obviously works—positive sanctions abound—so we will restructure our way to mimic your way." As dispensational publicist Tommy Ice put it, "Premillennialists have always been involved in the present world. And basically, they have picked up on the ethical positions of their contemporaries."¹⁵ In this, they have not been alone. Christian social theorists have been doing this from the beginnings of systematic Christian social theory in the medieval West. They have followed the lead of the early church's apologists, who imported the wisdom of Greece in the name of common-ground truth. They have attempted to combine Jerusalem and Athens. The result has been a compromised intellectual defense of the Christian faith.¹⁶ There comes a time when Christian theologians should abandon traditions that have compromised their critiques of their religious and epistemological enemies. So should Christian social theorists.

15. Tommy Ice, response in a 1988 debate: Ice and Dave Hunt vs. Gary North and Gary DeMar. Cited in Gary DeMar, The Debate Over Christian Reconstruction (Atlanta, Georgia: American Vision, 1988), p. 185. (<http://bit.ly/gdmdebate>)

16. Cornelius Van Til, A Christian Theory of Knowledge (Nutley, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1969), ch. 4; cf. Van Til, Christianity in Conflict (Syllabus, Westminster Seminary, 1962).

OVERCOMING THE VISIBLE ODDS

Hear, O Israel: Thou art to pass over Jordan this day, to go in to possess nations greater and mightier than thyself, cities great and fenced up to heaven, A people great and tall, the children of the Anakims, whom thou knowest, and of whom thou hast heard say, Who can stand before the children of Anak! Understand therefore this day, that the LORD thy God is he which goeth over before thee; as a consuming fire he shall destroy them, and he shall bring them down before thy face: so shalt thou drive them out, and destroy them quickly, as the LORD hath said unto thee. Speak not thou in thine heart, after that the LORD thy God hath cast them out from before thee, saying, For my righteousness the LORD hath brought me in to possess this land: but for the wickedness of these nations the LORD doth drive them out from before thee. Not for thy righteousness, or for the uprightness of thine heart, dost thou go to possess their land: but for the wickedness of these nations the LORD thy God doth drive them out from before thee, and that he may perform the word which the LORD sware unto thy fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Understand therefore, that the LORD thy God giveth thee not this good land to possess it for thy righteousness; for thou art a stiffnecked people (Deut. 9:1–6).

Moses here presented a prophecy. This prophecy, as with most biblical prophecies, had an ethical component. God always deals with men covenantally, and the covenant rests on God's law.¹ This prophecy announced the near-term fulfillment of God's original promise to Abraham. That promise had linked Israel's victory to Canaan's immorality: "But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full" (Gen. 15:16). The iniquity of the Amorites was now full. The day of the Lord was at hand.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

The Israelites were commanded to begin the conquest. This command rested on God as sovereign over history. His prophecy regarding the fourth-generation's conquest of Canaan was about to come true. The theocentric nature of this prophecy is obvious. God's decree is sovereign.

This was a land law.² It related to the conquest. But it had implications far beyond the conquest. It related corporate disobedience to defeat in history as a general principle.

A. The Day of the Lord

"Hear, O Israel: Thou art to pass over Jordan this day." This announcement was not supposed to be taken literally. The Israelites did not cross the Jordan that day. Moses still had a great deal more to tell them, as the length of the remainder of this commentary indicates. Moses did not die that day. After he died, the nation mourned 30 days (Deut. 33:8). Then they crossed the Jordan. So, what did Moses mean by "this day"?

The "day" referred to here was the day of the Lord. This phrase refers in Scripture to a period of divine judgment that constitutes a turning point in a society's history. The phrase, "the day of the Lord," does not occur in the Bible until the prophets; it occurs most often in the Book of Isaiah. Generally, it refers to a period of negative corporate sanctions.³ "Howl ye; for the day of the LORD is at hand; it shall come as a destruction from the Almighty" (Isa. 13:6). Occasionally, the phrase "that day" is used to describe a time of national restoration: positive corporate sanctions. "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people, which shall be left, from Assyria, and from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush, and from Elam, and from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the islands of the sea. And he shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth" (Isa. 11:11–12). The day of the Lord was a period of national sanctions: inheritance and disinheritance. Usually, it meant dis-

2. On land laws, see Appendix J.

3. "For the day of the LORD of hosts shall be upon every one that is proud and lofty, and upon every one that is lifted up; and he shall be brought low" (Isa. 2:12). "And the loftiness of man shall be bowed down, and the haughtiness of men shall be made low: and the LORD alone shall be exalted in that day" (Isa. 2:17). "Therefore the LORD will cut off from Israel head and tail, branch and rush, in one day" (Isa. 9:14).

inheritance for rebellious Israel and inheritance for some invader. In this context, however, it meant Israel's inheritance and Canaan's disinheritance.

The Bible uses the language of heavenly transformation to describe covenantal-political transformations. This is clear in Isaiah's prophecy regarding the defeat of Babylon by Medo-Persian kingdom (Isa. 13:1).

Behold, the day of the LORD cometh, cruel both with wrath and fierce anger, to lay the land desolate: and he shall destroy the sinners thereof out of it. For the stars of heaven and the constellations thereof shall not give their light: the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine. And I will punish the world for their evil, and the wicked for their iniquity; and I will cause the arrogancy of the proud to cease, and will lay low the haughtiness of the terrible. I will make a man more precious than fine gold; even a man than the golden wedge of Ophir. Therefore I will shake the heavens, and the earth shall remove out of her place, in the wrath of the LORD of hosts, and in the day of his fierce anger" (Isa. 13:9–13).⁴

This same cosmic language was invoked prophetically by Jesus to describe the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70: "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken" (Matt. 24:29).⁵ The Bible uses the language of cosmic transformation to describe national disinheritance: the end of an old world order. An old world order is then replaced by a newer world order. The final new world order in history is Jesus Christ's. No other will ever replace it. "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever" (Dan. 2:44).

The time period of judgment normally lasts for longer than a day, but the final consummation comes on one day, the day of final judgment being the archetype. It is marked by either the total destruction of the unrighteous or their unconditional surrender.⁶ The siege of Jerusalem, which ended the Old Covenant order, took far more than a day, but it was consummated with a day of destruction: the burning of the temple—not by official command—by a pair of Roman soldiers. The Jewish defector Josephus, who became a court historian for the Roman emperor, referred to this as “that fatal day.”⁷ This fiery event marked the demise of the Mosaic priesthood in Israel. It also marked the origin of Rabbinic Judaism, or as Neusner called it, “the Judaism of the two Torahs,” i.e., the Old Testament and the Mishnah/Talmud.⁸ The teachers of the oral law had followed the Pharisees rather than the Sadducees; their ideas triumphed among the Jews after the fall of Jerusalem.⁹ From that time on, those who proclaimed themselves as the legitimate heirs of Moses added their respective authoritative commentaries on the Old Testament: the New Testament for Christians and Mishnah/Talmud for Jews.¹⁰ In both cases, the respective interpretive commentaries were assumed by their adherents to take precedence operationally over the Old Testament, although neither group challenged the authority of the Old Testament.¹¹ Both sides acknowledged the radical covenantal discontinuity that had taken place with the burning of the temple. The Old Order was gone forever. It cannot possibly replace the New World Order of Jesus Christ, for no order ever will.

4. David Chilton, Paradise Restored: A Biblical Theology of Dominion (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1985), pp. 98–99. (<http://bit.ly/dcpardise>)

5. Ibid., p. 100.

6. North, Unconditional Surrender.

This is why dispensational theology is utterly wrong about: (1) the removal of the church from history by the Rapture; (2) the absence of every trace of the New Testament order during the interim period of seven years until Christ returns bodily to set up His millennial kingdom; and (3) the substitution of a Jewish theocratic-bureaucratic order during the millennium, where temple sacrifices of bulls and sheep and goats will be restored. Although dispensational theologians refuse to say this in print, these animal sacrifices would have to replace the

7. Flavius Josephus, The Wars of The Jews, VI:IV:5.

8. Jacob Neusner, An Introduction to Judaism: A Textbook and Reader (Louisville, Kentucky: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1991), p. 157. Neusner is the most prolific scholarly author in modern history. His bibliography runs over 950 books: a book every two weeks for 40 years. (<http://bit.ly/Neusner950>). For a partial list, see <http://bit.ly/NeusnerBooks>.

9. Herbert Danby, The Mishnah (New York: Oxford University Press, [1933] 1987), p. xiii.

10. An exception is the Karaite sect of Judaism, which acknowledges the authority only of the Pentateuch. They organized themselves as a separate sect in the eighth century, A.D. Paul Johnson, A History of the Jews (New York: Harper & Row, 1987), p. 169.

11. Jacob Neusner, Judaism and Scripture: The Evidence of Leviticus Rabbah (University of Chicago Press, 1986), p. xi.

Lord's Supper. The Lord's Supper is said by dispensationalists to memorialize the death of Christ. What will the "memorials" (Scofield's term)¹² of the animal sacrifices symbolize? There is no equality possible; one sacrificial "memorial" or the other must be authoritative.

There will be no revival of a Jewish theocratic order,¹³ because Jesus Christ is not a bigamist with two brides and a different sacramental system for each of them. The gentile church is not Leah, with the Jewish church serving as Rachel, or vice versa. There is only one bride for the Bridegroom. There is also only one final world order: Jesus Christ's. It will never be broken by an eschatological discontinuity: the Rapture, followed by a Great Tribulation period. We learn this from Jesus' parable of the wheat and the tares. "He said unto them, An enemy hath done this. The servants said unto him, Wilt thou then that we go and gather them up? But he said, Nay; lest while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat with them. Let both grow together until the harvest: and in the time of harvest I will say to the reapers, Gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them: but gather the wheat into my barn" (Matt. 13: 28–30). Jesus explained: "The enemy that sowed them is the devil; the harvest is the end of the world; and the reapers are the angels. As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire; so shall it be in the end of this world" (vv. 39–40). There will be no uprooting of either wheat or tares, the church or the rebels, until the end of time.¹⁴

Moses told Israel that a day of covenantal discontinuity had now arrived. There would soon be a covenantal displacement in the land of Canaan. The Levitical laws governing landed inheritance (Lev. 25) and all the other Mosaic land laws would soon have a meaningful geo-

12. See the comments on Ezekiel 43:19 in the original Scofield Reference Bible (New York: Oxford University Press, 1909), p. 890, and suggestion number one in the New Scofield Reference Bible (Oxford, 1967), p. 888n. Suggestion number one is that these animal sacrifices will be memorials, just as Scofield wrote. Suggestion number two simply scraps the whole temple-sacrifice scheme by allegorizing the passage—a familiar approach of dispensational "hermeneutical literalists" whenever their professed hermeneutics leads them into some embarrassing exegetical dead end. The authors were too timid to say which suggestion they preferred.

13. If, as the dispensationalists argue, "Israel always means Israel and not the church," then the millennial age must be Jewish. Dispensationalists appeal to the Psalms to describe the restored kingdom. As postmillennialist O. T. Allis wrote in 1945, "According to Dispensationalists the Psalms have as their central theme, Christ and the Jewish remnant in the millennial age." Oswald T. Allis, Prophecy and the Church (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1945), p. 244.

14. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 29.

graphical context. A new world order was about to replace the Canaanites' old world order. The magnitude of this covenantal discontinuity would be visible to all. Everyone would know in retrospect that God alone had been behind this transformation because of the disparity in physical size between the winners and the losers. The multitude of Israelite ants would consume the Anakim elephants.

B. The Bigger They Are

The Anakim were large people, probably Goliath-sized. Goliath was a little over nine feet tall (I Sam. 17:4). Spies sent by Moses to survey Canaan had reported: "And there we saw the giants, the sons of Anak, which come of the giants: and we were in our own sight as grasshoppers, and so we were in their sight" (Num. 13:33). The region around Canaan had been the home of several groups of these giant peoples. "The Emims dwelt therein in times past, a people great, and many, and tall, as the Anakims; Which also were accounted giants, as the Anakims; but the Moabites call them Emims" (Deut. 2: 10–11). The Hebrew word translated "giant" is rawfaw.

Og of Bashan was a giant. He was described by Moses as the last of them. "For only Og king of Bashan remained of the remnant of giants; behold, his bedstead was a bedstead of iron; is it not in Rabbath of the children of Ammon? nine cubits was the length thereof, and four cubits the breadth of it, after the cubit of a man" (Deut. 3:11). A man who sleeps in a bed that is over 13 feet long and six feet wide is either a giant or else worries a lot about falling out of bed. Og's size did him no good militarily. "And the rest of Gilead, and all Bashan, being the kingdom of Og, gave I unto the half tribe of Manasseh; all the region of Argob, with all Bashan, which was called the land of giants" (Deut. 3:13). The military success of Israel over Og of Bashan was a trans-Jordan preliminary testament: Israel would inherit Canaan despite the presence of giants.

Which giants? Wasn't Og the last of them? In what sense was Og the last of the remnant of giants, when Anakim still dwelt in Canaan? Moses said: "For only Og king of Bashan remained of the remnant of giants." What did Moses mean by this? Was Og even larger than the others? The size of his bed indicates that he was. A man the size of Goliath does not need a bed over 13 feet long. Og was the largest giant of all, the last of the original race mentioned in Genesis 6:4.¹⁵ Canaan's 15. The legend of these giants can be found in Hesiod's Theogony, lines 53–54.

Anakim were accounted as giants (Deut. 2:11, 20). When God enabled Israel to conquer Og, He showed Israel that the “not quite giants” would not be a large problem.

Other tribes of peoples accounted as giants had been conquered by Israel’s relatives, Esau and Ammon. “That also was accounted a land of giants: giants dwelt therein in old time; and the Ammonites call them Zamzummims; A people great, and many, and tall, as the Anakims; but the LORD destroyed them before them; and they succeeded them, and dwelt in their stead: As he did to the children of Esau, which dwelt in Seir, when he destroyed the Horims from before them; and they succeeded them, and dwelt in their stead even unto this day” (Deut. 2:20–22). If the heirs of evil Esau and the even more evil Ammon had inherited the lands of the giants, then Israel should not fear the Anakim. The issue was ethics, not size, as the text indicates.

Israel in David’s time faced Philistine heirs of the giants. In each case, the giants lost their battles with individual challengers from Israel (II Sam. 21:16–22). The old phrase, “the bigger they are, the harder they fall,” is well illustrated by the fate of the giants.

C. Counting the Costs

Moses had sent out spies to survey the land and report back (Num. 13). The sight of the giants had terrified some of the spies (v. 33). What they had personally seen made a greater impression on them than what they had heard from God through Moses. Then Joshua and Caleb reminded them of what they had heard. “If the LORD delight in us, then he will bring us into this land, and give it us; a land which floweth with milk and honey. Only rebel not ye against the LORD, neither fear ye the people of the land; for they are bread for us: their defence is departed from them, and the LORD is with us: fear them not. But all the congregation bade stone them with stones. And the glory of the LORD appeared in the tabernacle of the congregation before all the children of Israel” (Num. 14:8–10). This did not persuade the skeptics; in fact, it outraged the other spies. When men’s hearts are rebellious, what they see means more to them than what God has told them. That was the 10 spies’ problem. Each of them substituted “I saw with my own eyes” for “Hear, O Israel.”

This is probably an eighth-century work contemporary with the ministry of Isaiah. See also Jane Ellen Harrison, Themis: A Study of the Social Origins of Greek Religion, 2nd ed. (New Hyde Park, New York: University Books, [1927] 1962), pp. 452–53.

We are told to count the cost of our actions. Jesus warned His listeners regarding the cost of discipleship. He used analogy of military planning. “Or what king, going to make war against another king, sitteth not down first, and consulteth whether he be able with ten thousand to meet him that cometh against him with twenty thousand? Or else, while the other is yet a great way off, he sendeth an ambassage, and desireth conditions of peace. So likewise, whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple” (Luke 14:31–33).¹⁶ This requirement to count the cost led to Moses’ decision to send out the spies. But what 10 of the dozen spies forgot was this: facts are to be interpreted in terms of God’s word. Facts are not autonomous; there are no “brute facts.” Facts are always interpreted facts. They are interpreted correctly by God because they have been created by God. They are what God says they are because He created them that way. Van Til has put it this way: “The non-Christian assumes that man is ultimate, that is, that he is not created. Christianity assumes that man is created. The non-Christian assumes that the facts of man’s environment are not created; the Christian assumes that these facts are created.”¹⁷ The spies were supposed to interpret what they saw by what God had told them. Accurate interpretation begins and ends with hearing and believing the word of God.

Israel was facing what appeared to be enormous odds against the nation. The spies’ own eyes seemed to tell them this. But men’s eyes tell them nothing apart from men’s faith. Our eyes may confirm our faith, fail to confirm it, or confuse us, but they do not operate autonomously. The information that eyes provide must then be interpreted. The Israelites were told to estimate the odds in terms of God’s promise to Abraham regarding the sins of Canaan: “But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full” (Gen. 15:16).

D. Judicial Blindness and Deafness

Soon after Moses announced the crossing of the Jordan, he revealed to Israel the rules of warfare. The first rule: “When thou goest out to battle against thine enemies, and seest horses, and chariots, and a people more than thou, be not afraid of them: for the LORD thy God is with thee, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt” (Deut. 20:1). God subsequently warned them in the midst of the conquest of Canaan: “Be not afraid because of them: for to morrow about this time will I deliver them up all slain before Israel: thou shalt hough [ham-string] their horses, and burn their chariots with fire” (Josh. 11:6b). Israel defeated the initial wave of charioteers, just as God had promised (Josh. 11:9). But the Israelites refused to believe their own eyes, just as they had refused to believe their own eyes at the Red Sea. “And the children of Joseph said, The hill is not enough for us: and all the Canaanites that dwell in the land of the valley have chariots of iron, both they who are of Beth-shean and her towns, and they who are of the valley of Jezreel” (Josh. 17:16). “And the LORD was with Judah; and he drave out the inhabitants of the mountain; but could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron” (Jud. 1:19).

16. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 35.

17. Cornelius Van Til, The Christian Theory of Knowledge (n.p.: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1969), p. 14.

Israel’s theological inheritance to each succeeding generation was reduced by the power of sight over hearing. They would not listen to God’s written word and His prophets. The Bible speaks of hearing and seeing as ethical. What is foundational is not the physical acuity of man’s sight and hearing, but a man’s covenantal framework of interpretation. Isaiah wrote:

Also I heard the voice of the Lord, saying, Whom shall I send, and who will go for us? Then said I, Here am I; send me. And he said, Go, and tell this people, Hear ye indeed, but understand not; and see ye indeed, but perceive not. Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and shut their eyes; lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and convert, and be healed. Then said I, Lord, how long? And he answered, Until the cities be wasted without inhabitant, and the houses without man, and the land be utterly desolate, And the LORD have removed men far away, and there be a great forsaking in the midst of the land” (Isa. 6:8–12).

God inflicted judicial blindness on the nation. Israelites would see and hear, yet they would not perceive the covenantal meaning of what they saw and heard. This biblical principle of judicial blindness was basic to Jesus’ use of parables:

And the disciples came, and said unto him, Why speakest thou unto them in parables? He answered and said unto them, Because it is given unto you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given. For whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance: but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath. Therefore speak I to them in parables: because they seeing see not; and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand. And in them is fulfilled the prophecy of Esaias, which saith, By hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and shall not perceive: For this people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed; lest at any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and should understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them. But blessed are your eyes, for they see: and your ears, for they hear (Matt. 13: 10–16).¹⁸

Paul also quoted Isaiah's words in his final recorded lecture to the Jews: "Go unto this people, and say, Hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and not perceive: For the heart of this people is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes have they closed; lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them" (Acts 28:26–27). The hearing that should govern men's decision-making is covenantal hearing.

E. Comparative Degrees of Moral Rebellion

The text says that God would soon give the victory to the Israelites despite their unrighteousness. "Not for thy righteousness, or for the uprightness of thine heart, dost thou go to possess their land: but for the wickedness of these nations the LORD thy God doth drive them out from before thee, and that he may perform the word which the LORD sware unto thy fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob" (v. 5). Three ideas are present here: (1) Israel is not righteous; (2) the Canaanites are more unrighteous than Israel; (3) God's promise to Abraham will be fulfilled.

The original promise had included a prophecy regarding the sins of the Amorites: they would be filled, i.e., their national boundaries of tolerable rebellion would be breached. The promise of land for Abraham's heirs was not devoid of a specific prophecy regarding the ethical condition of the Canaanites. The fulfillment of the promise was therefore as secure as the fulfillment of the prophecy. The element of ethical conditionality had been present in the original terms of the promise.¹⁹

18. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 27.

19. Chapter 17.

The promise not only did not annul the ethical stipulations of God's covenant with Abraham, its fulfillment would soon confirm that covenant, Moses said. But the Israelites were not to regard the fulfillment of the original promise as a confirmation of their righteousness. They were only to regard the fulfillment as confirming the Canaanites' even greater unrighteousness. The filling up of the Canaanites' iniquity had placed a chronological boundary around Canaan: the day of the Lord. The Canaanites would not extend their dominion over the land beyond this chronological boundary, which was both an ethical-covenantal boundary and a prophetic boundary. God had announced to Abraham, "Thus far and no further" regarding Canaan's sins and its time remaining. Now He would fulfill His promise.

1. Canaanites Were Worse

Esau had defeated giants; so had Ammon (Deut. 2:20–22). Yet Esau and Ammon were not paragons of national virtue. Ammonites were so evil that it took 10 generations of covenant membership to enable an Ammonite to become a citizen of Israel (Deut. 23:3). Yet God had delivered the giants into their hands. This victory was not evidence of the righteousness of either Esau or Ammon. Compared to the giants, however, they were better.

Moses warned Israel not to misinterpret the victory that lay ahead. "Speak not thou in thine heart, after that the LORD thy God hath cast them out from before thee, saying, For my righteousness the LORD hath brought me in to possess this land: but for the wickedness of these nations the LORD doth drive them out from before thee" (Deut. 9:4). The Israelites could not legitimately regard themselves as morally deserving of the victory. Israel deserved nothing special, but the Canaanites deserved worse. Their evil had multiplied over time. Their debts to God had compounded. Their day of reckoning had almost arrived. The Israelites were to serve as agents of God's judgment. Morally speaking, the Israelites were in much the same condition as the deceased reprobate at whose funeral the best that the eulogizer could say about him was this: "His brother was worse." Israel, as God's adopted son, was better than the Canaanites, the disinherited sons of Adam.

Autonomous man has no legal claim on God. The temptation of Israel was to regard the impending military victory as a sign of their superior ethical standing before God. The lure, once again, was autonomy. "For my righteousness the LORD hath brought me in to possess this land” was the ethical equivalent of “My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth” (Deut. 8:17).²⁰ Both assertions rested on a belief in Israel’s autonomy. Moses warned them: “Understand therefore, that the LORD thy God giveth thee not this good land to possess it for thy righteousness; for thou art a stiffnecked people” (Deut. 9:6). Then he recounted their experience in the wilderness: “Remember, and forget not, how thou provokedst the LORD thy God to wrath in the wilderness: from the day that thou didst depart out of the land of Egypt, until ye came unto this place, ye have been rebellious against the LORD. Also in Horeb ye provoked the LORD to wrath, so that the LORD was angry with you to have destroyed you” (vv. 9–10). The cause, Moses reminded them, was the golden calf incident (vv. 12–14). Part of the inheritance from the exodus generation to the conquest generation was a tendency to rebellion.

The threat then had been national destruction. It still was (Deut. 8:19–20).²¹ When God had threatened to destroy them after the golden calf incident, Moses had interceded with God, appealing to His name and reputation. “Wherefore should the Egyptians speak, and say, For mischief did he bring them out, to slay them in the mountains, and to consume them from the face of the earth? Turn from thy fierce wrath, and repent of this evil against thy people. Remember Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, thy servants, to whom thou swarest by thine own self, and saidst unto them, I will multiply your seed as the stars of heaven, and all this land that I have spoken of will I give unto your seed, and they shall inherit it for ever. And the LORD repented of the evil which he thought to do unto his people” (Ex. 32:12–14). It would have been futile for Moses to have invoked Israel’s righteousness as the basis of God’s extension of mercy. This was still true for the generation of the conquest.

2. The Adamic Covenant

Canaanite civilization was unrighteous. More than this: it was progressively unrighteous. It kept getting worse. It had therefore reached its temporal limits. It had reached its boundaries of dominion. Canaan was about to forfeit its inheritance.

If the unrighteousness of Canaan had progressed to such a degree that God was willing to impose total negative sanctions, then there must have been a standard of righteousness governing Canaan. Negative sanctions without law is tyranny. God is no arbitrary tyrant. Then on what lawful basis does God impose negative sanctions? Paul wrote that the negative sanction of death rules in history because the law of God condemns all of Adam's heirs. "Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned: (For until the law sin was in the world: but sin is not imputed when there is no law. Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, who is the figure of him that was to come" (Rom. 5:12-14). In short, no negative sanctions –no law. The converse is also true: if negative sanctions, then law.

20. Chapter 21.

21. Chapter 23.

Canaan was under covenantal stipulations. This was the judicial basis of God's prophecy against Canaan. Canaan had violated God's law long enough. The day of reckoning had arrived. This implies that Canaanites were under law. Which law? Answer: covenantal law to which historical sanctions were attached.

This raises a crucial question: Which covenant? Canaan had not formally covenanted with God as Abram had (Gen. 15:18). Canaanites were not under the law of the covenant in the way that Abraham's heirs were. The transfer of inheritance was nevertheless about to take place based on Canaan's violation of God's law. How could this be?

The answer is found in the Adamic covenant. There is a universal covenant between God and Adam's heirs. It operates in history. Societies progress in terms of their conformity to the law of this covenant. Societies also are cut short in history in terms of this law: the second commandment. Moses had just reiterated the second commandment: "Thou shalt not bow down thyself unto them, nor serve them: for I the LORD thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me" (Deut. 5:9). This warning was not limited to Israel, since it spoke of God-haters, i.e., covenant-breakers. The second commandment was the judicial basis of the negative sanctions that Israel was about to impose on Canaan: the Canaanites' sincere worship of false gods.

The Adamic covenant has corporate sanctions. It is not just a law governing individuals. Not only do individuals die, civilizations also die. Not only does God kill individuals, He also kills civilizations. God would soon prove this to Canaan and Israel. Deuteronomy, as the book of the inheritance, is both a testament and a testimony to the fact that God kills societies. He executes judgment in history in terms of the Adamic covenant's stipulations. Adam ate from the forbidden tree; so, Adam's heirs can distinguish good from evil, just as the serpent promised. They cannot legitimately plead ignorance of the law. That they actively suppress God's truth in unrighteousness, worshipping the creature rather than the Creator (Rom. 1:18–22), testifies to their covenantal knowledge of the truth, not their lack of knowledge.²²

Any suggestion that God does not hold all mankind responsible for obeying His law must come to grips with the destruction of Canaan. Why did God speak to Abraham of the growing iniquity of the Amorites if there was no ethical standard governing Amorite civilization? Because God brought judgment on Canaan, we must ask: By what standard?

Moses had warned Israel in the passage immediately preceding this one that if Israel worshipped other gods, God would bring the same judgment against Israel that He was about to bring against Canaan (Deut. 8:19–20).²³ By worshipping other gods, men honor the laws of other covenants. Covenants have stipulations. To adopt other laws besides God's law constitutes rebellion.

How can God legitimately hold covenant-breakers in the Adamic sense responsible for breaking a corporate law-order that they have never publicly affirmed? Answer: because they are covenant-breakers in Adam, and they are also covenant-breakers on their own account. Adam and his heirs are under corporate covenant law as surely as they are under individual covenant law. Whole societies perish as surely as individuals die. The question then is: How do Adam's heirs know about the law-order under which they operate and for which God holds them corporately responsible? Paul provided the answer: the work of the law is written in every person's heart. "For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves: Which shew the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the mean [intervening] while accusing or else excusing one another" (Rom. 2:14–15).²⁴

22. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 3.

23. Chapter 23.

24. On the distinction between the work of the law written in an unregenerate person's heart and the law written in the regenerate person's heart, see John Murray, The Epistle to the Romans, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1965), I, pp. 74–76. Cf. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 4.

3. Natural Law and Common Grace

In the history of Western political theory, this judicial knowledge has been referred to as natural law. In one sense, such knowledge is in-born and therefore natural. It is built into the hearts of all rational men. In another sense, it is supernatural: as an image of God, each man reflects God. Such knowledge is not sufficient to bring all men to saving faith, but it is sufficient to condemn them before God. Such knowledge is sufficient to enable them to perceive the external requirements of the common law. The question is: Will they obey what they know to be true? The biblical answer is simple: "Only if God gives them the grace to obey." Grace in this sense is an unearned gift from God, i.e., a gift earned by Jesus Christ on the cross, but not earned by the recipients on their own account. Calvinist theologians often call this unearned gift common grace. Calvin called it general grace.²⁵ Common grace enables men to obey at least some of the works of the common law in their hearts. But when this common grace is removed from them in history, societies march into the valley of the shadow of death.

Moses announced that Canaan was nearing the end of its long march to destruction. Those Christians who deny the existence of common grace in history have a major exegetical problem with Israel's conquest of Canaan. Why was Canaan condemned by God? By what standard was Canaan condemned? How had Canaan filled up its cup of iniquity by Joshua's day? What should Christians call those historical means by which God had earlier prevented them from following the dictates of their rebellious hearts? If the cup of iniquity was full in Joshua's day, what had retarded the level of iniquity in Abraham's day? Without the concept of common grace, and specifically corporate common grace, these questions are unanswerable covenantally.²⁶

Sects that refuse to acknowledge the existence of common grace are unable to develop an explicitly biblical social theory or political theory. They must therefore sit under the academic and judicial tables of covenant-breakers, praying to God that a few scraps will fall from the tables occasionally to feed them (Matt. 15:22–27).²⁷ They necessarily must view the history of the church as one long march into the shadow of death. They necessarily must adopt a view of Christians as perpetual crumb-eaters in history. In other words, they necessarily must adopt pessimillennialism, either premillennialism or amillennialism.²⁸ They must reject an eschatology that insists that Christianity will triumph in history, for such a triumph would mean that the positive sanctions of saving faith are in some way related judicially to the negative sanctions that disinherit covenant-breakers in history. This triumphant scenario raises the issue of corporate common grace and its removal from covenant-breaking societies in history. In short, they cannot explain the covenantal relationship between Israel and Canaan, between Christ and Caesar. So, they simply ignore it.

25. John Calvin, The Institutes of the Christian Religion (1559), II:II:17. Ford Lewis Battles translation, 2 vols. (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1960), I:276. See Battles' footnotes on the same page.

26. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcrg>)

27. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 34.

There is no neutrality. To deny common grace is to affirm a universal common law-order other than God's covenant law. Some law-order must rule society; sanctions must be applied in terms of some system of law. By denying common grace in history, sectarian Christians necessarily affirm the sovereignty of natural law over God's revealed law. They affirm the legitimacy of Adamic law over Bible-revealed law. They affirm covenant-breaking man's superior authority to interpret Adamic law apart from God's special grace of biblical revelation. If predictable sanctions in history are not imposed by God in terms of the stipulations of His Bible-revealed law, which has precedence over natural (Adamic) law, then predictable sanctions in history must be governed by Adamic common law. One set of sanctions must become dominant in society: either those that are attached to biblical law or those that are understood by covenant-breaking men to be attached to what they regard as uncursed natural law. There is no equality pos- sible here: one law-order must dominate the others. The predictability of corporate historical sanctions will be assessed by men in terms of biblical law or natural law or man-made law.

28. The Protestant Reformed Church openly denies common grace and affirms amillennialism. For a scholarly critique of the anti-postmillennial presentations of the Protestant Reformed Church's senior theologian, see Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1997), Appendix A: "Cultural Antinomianism." (<http://bit.ly/klghshd>) That theologian's belated response was a book that did not refer to Gentry's critique, but instead offered a series of brief, unfootnoted chapters that had been editorials in the denomination's magazine. He referred to postmillennialists other than Gentry, and to books other than Gentry's. His book was published nine years after Gentry's original critique in the first edition. David J. Engelsma, Christ's Spiritual Kingdom: A Defense of Reformed Amillennialism (Redlands, California: Reformed Witness, 2001). The book offered neither a bibliography nor an index. In response to Gary DeMar's criticism that Engelsma never offered footnotes, he insisted that footnotes are not necessary, since the magazine "is written for believers, not for scholars and theologians" (p. 42). This is not the best way to phrase the matter. Are we to conclude that scholars and theologians are not believers? On Engelsma's theology, see Appendix I, subsection on "Amillennialism."

The triumph of Israel over Canaan tells us which law-order is dominant—biblical law—but those who deny common grace do not get the message. They are forced to explain the victory of Israel over Canaan as some sort of anomaly in history. So also must they explain the victory of Christ over Caesar, i.e., the replacement of pagan Rome by Christianity. As far as cultural dominance in history is concerned, critics of common grace think that God is on the side of covenant-breakers. Their worldview is straightforward: evil must get more powerful over time, while Christianity must get weaker.²⁹

The question then arises: Why should Christians attempt to develop biblical social theory? Isn't this in effect wasted effort eschatologically, an exercise in intellectual futility? By their actions, pessimillennialists and the critics of common grace theology have demonstrated that this is exactly what they believe. They have counted the costs of dominion, which include the personal costs of developing an explicitly biblical social theory. They have compared these estimated costs with the estimated benefits of success. They have weighed in the balance biblical social theory and biblical social action, and they have found both wanting. Why? Because their risk-reward estimates have been affected by their pessimillennialism. They have echoed the 10 spies: "And there we saw the giants, the sons of Anak, which come of the giants: and we were in our own sight as grasshoppers, and so we were in their sight" (Num. 13:33). They have made it clear that they believe that in New Covenant history, God is on the side of covenant-breaking societies.

F. Which Side Is God On?

The most important question in estimating the costs of any risky action is this: Will God be pleased with what I am about to undertake? To estimate the height of the Anakim was not difficult. The difference in physical stature between the Anakim and the Israelites was obvious. Their eyes told them: seek peace, avoid confrontation. But what they saw was not the heart of the cost-benefit analysis. The heart of the matter was their heart before God. Were they going to believe His promise or their own eyes?

29. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

Their problem was this: rebellious hearts make bad estimates. After God had told the exodus generation that their representatives' treatment of Joshua and Caleb had doomed them to death in the wilderness, they decided that it was time to march into battle.

And they rose up early in the morning, and gat them up into the top of the mountain, saying, Lo, we be here, and will go up unto the place which the LORD hath promised: for we have sinned. And Moses said, Wherefore now do ye transgress the commandment of the LORD? but it shall not prosper. Go not up, for the LORD is not among you; that ye be not smitten before your enemies. For the Amalekites and the Canaanites are there before you, and ye shall fall by the sword: because ye are turned away from the LORD, therefore the LORD will not be with you. But they presumed to go up unto the hill top: nevertheless the ark of the covenant of the LORD, and Moses, departed not out of the camp. Then the Amalekites came down, and the Canaanites which dwelt in that hill, and smote them, and discomfited them, even unto Hormah" (Num. 14:40–45).

Not until the next generation came to maturity did Israel have a victory at Hormah (Num. 21:3).³⁰

The Israelites were not supposed to go into battle unless the war had been authorized by the priesthood. The tribes were to march into battle only after the priests had blown the trumpets. "And the sons of Aaron, the priests, shall blow with the trumpets; and they shall be to you for an ordinance for ever throughout your generations" (Num. 10:8). Bloodshed had to be preceded by the payment of atonement money to the priests (Ex. 30:12–13).³¹ Under the Mosaic covenant, the priesthood had the exclusive authority to decide whether God was on the side of Israel. Their declaration alone sanctioned the war in God's eyes; without this sanction, a war should not have been sanctioned in the nation's eyes.

The West has always placed the authority to declare war exclusively in the hands of the national civil government. The churches historically have had no interest in challenging this state of affairs. At most, the medieval church claimed the right to impose a few of the rules of warfare, such as truce days. Today, secular agencies do this, most notably the International Red Cross. Once a war is declared by the government, the churches immediately become vocal supporters of the war effort.³² There is no further discussion about the legitimacy of the war. Whatever discussion takes place must take place before the war breaks out. Those who favor peace lose the debate completely on the day that war is declared. All debate ends. One mark of a society that has lost faith in its moral foundations is the existence of such debate after a war begins. For example, in the American Civil War (1861–65), by late 1864, after the fall of the city of Atlanta, when the Confederacy was beginning to be seen by its supporters as a lost cause militarily, a few Southern preachers began to voice doubts about both the moral legitimacy of slavery and the justness of the Confederacy's cause. After the war ended in defeat, almost no Southerner publicly lamented the demise of slavery.³³ The shock of military defeat had changed their minds. Moral legitimacy had been determined on the battlefield; the South's preachers merely reflected the military results.³⁴

30. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 12.

31. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 58.

Conclusion

Moses told the Israelites that the day of the Lord had arrived. It was a day of historical sanctions: positive for Israel and negative for Canaan. While its completion would take place only under Joshua—a six-year day of vengeance—the day had already begun.

The day of the Lord is always a day of sanctions. Moses warned Israel: the fact that God was going to use Israel to bring negative corpor-

32. American clerics who opposed America's entry into World War I in 1917 sometimes suffered civil sanctions: arrest and imprisonment. A Church of the Brethren pastor was sent to prison for having recommended to his congregation that they refuse to buy war bonds. He was tried after the armistice in 1918 and sentenced to prison for 10 years, later commuted to a year and a day. H. C. Peterson and Gilbert C. Fite, Opponents of War, 1917–1918 (Seattle: University of Washington Press, [1957] 1968), pp. 118–19. As the authors pointed out, clerical opponents of the war were usually from smaller, poorer churches. Ibid., p. 117. For publishing an anti-war book on prophecy, The Finished Mystery, in July, 1917, eight leaders of the Jehovah's Witnesses, including Joseph Rutherford, were sentenced to 20 years in prison in June, 1918, after World War I had ended. A Federal appeals court overturned this decision in 1919. James J. Martin, An American Adventure in Bookburning In The Style of 1918 (Colorado Springs: Ralph Myles Press, 1989), pp. 16–17. Martin's account is more accurate than Peterson and Fite's (pp. 119–20).

33. One who did was the Presbyterian theologian Robert Dabney. See his book, A Defence of Virginia [And Through Her, of the South] (New York: Negro University Press, [1867] 1969).

34. Richard E. Beringer, et al., Why the South Lost the Civil War (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1986), ch. 14: "God, Guilt, and the Confederacy in Collapse."

ate sanctions against Canaanites should not lead them to conclude that they had any legal claim on God based on their own righteousness. They would replace Canaan as God's agents in the land, but their legal claim to the land was based on two things only: God's promise to Abraham and the two-fold boundary that God had placed on Canaan's iniquity, ethical and temporal. God's announcement of "no further dominion" for Canaan was not to be regarded as an announcement of unconditional dominion for Israel. Dominion is by covenant, and God's covenant is always ethically conditional. The covenant has stipulations to which predictable historical sanctions are attached. These sanctions are the basis of extending the inheritance. Canaan had forfeited its inheritance by breaking the Adamic covenant's corporate stipulations. These stipulations were common-grace stipulations.

The Canaanites looked invincible. They were in fact highly vulnerable. They were guaranteed losers in history, according to the Abrahamic promise, which was in fact an integral aspect of the Abrahamic covenant. This promise was a prophecy regarding the temporal limits of corporate rebellion. Canaan's transgression of the Adamic covenant's boundaries would bring predictable negative sanctions in history. The prediction was the Abrahamic promise: "But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full" (Gen. 15:16).

SONSHIP, SERVITUDE, AND INHERITANCE

I prayed therefore unto the LORD, and said, O Lord GOD, destroy not thy people and thine inheritance, which thou hast redeemed through thy greatness, which thou hast brought forth out of Egypt with a mighty hand. Remember thy servants, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; look not unto the stubbornness of this people, nor to their wickedness, nor to their sin: Lest the land whence thou broughtest us out say, Because the LORD was not able to bring them into the land which he promised them, and because he hated them, he hath brought them out to slay them in the wilderness. Yet they are thy people and thine inheritance, which thou broughtest out by thy mighty power and by thy stretched out arm (Deut. 9:26–29).

The theocentric reference point here is God's legal status as Israel's owner. Israel was God's inheritance, i.e., His property. To the extent that Israel extended its national inheritance, God would extend His. This relationship was representative. Israel was required to act as God's agent, even as Adam was required to act as God's agent. The issue here was ethics. Moses had begged God not to judge Israel in terms of the ethical rebellion of Israel: "the stubbornness of this people, nor to their wickedness, nor to their sin." Moses had reminded God that the legal basis of sonship is God's promise of sonship. "Remember thy servants, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob." The ethical basis of sonship is obedience, which was why Israel had been in such great trouble.¹

1. The ethical basis of sonship is why God's ethically flawless son had to die as the legal representative for all of God's adopted sons. This is presumed by the entire history of the covenant, but it is not stated here.

A. Moses as the Replacement Patriarch

Moses summarized here the results of his verbal exchange with God in Exodus 32, when God had offered to establish Moses as the patriarch of a new nation. That exchange had involved God's offer of sonship to Moses, in effect making him a new Abraham.

And the LORD said unto Moses, I have seen this people, and, behold, it is a stiffnecked people: Now therefore let me alone, that my wrath may wax hot against them, and that I may consume them: and I will make of thee a great nation. And Moses besought the LORD his God, and said, LORD, why doth thy wrath wax hot against thy people, which thou hast brought forth out of the land of Egypt with great power, and with a mighty hand? Wherefore should the Egyptians speak, and say, For mischief did he bring them out, to slay them in the mountains, and to consume them from the face of the earth? Turn from thy fierce wrath, and repent of this evil against thy people. Remember Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, thy servants, to whom thou swarest by thine own self, and saidst unto them, I will multiply your seed as the stars of heaven, and all this land that I have spoken of will I give unto your seed, and they shall inherit it for ever. And the LORD repented of the evil which he thought to do unto his people (Ex. 32:9–14).

Moses had immediately interceded with God by appealing to God's reputation. If God slew Israel, the Egyptians would say that He could not deliver on His promises. This would tarnish God's reputation, Moses implied. Moses appealed to the integrity of God's name, not to the non-existent integrity of Israel. God honored this appeal to His own honor. He spared Israel.

God had promised Moses an inheritance: a new nation. As the patriarch of such a nation, Moses would be acclaimed and honored. In response, Moses reminded God that it was God's honor that was primary. As the patriarch of a new nation, Moses would gain the authority to direct their future, to lead them in the paths that he would choose. In effect, this new nation would become Moses' servant, his inheritance. His name would be on them. Moses would in fact replace Abraham as the founding patriarch, for the promise to Abraham would be broken by the destruction of Israel. Either Israel would not conquer in the fourth generation, contrary to God's promise (Gen. 15:16), or else Abraham's name would be extended in history only by Moses' adopting a new nation. But that would have violated Jacob's promise regarding Judah's bearing of the sword until Shiloh came (Gen. 49:10).

Moses countered God's offer by invoking the names of the patriarchs with whom God had made His covenant. That is, he appealed to God's word. Finally, in the speech to the conquest generation, he said that he had told God that Israel was God's inheritance (Deut. 9:26, 29). To have given Moses a completely new inheritance, God would have had to disinherit Israel completely. That would have been the same as disinheriting His own word, Moses implied. This argument saved Israel, which remained God's inheritance.

B. God's Name Was on Israel

God had placed His name on the Israelites through His covenant with Abraham. He had changed Abram's name to Abraham (Gen. 17:5). Similarly, he had changed Jacob's name to Israel (Gen. 32:28). The authority to name someone is a mark of foundational authority. Adam named the animals (Gen. 2:19); then he named Eve (Gen. 2:23). In both cases, God had brought to Adam the living objects to be named. Adam was the father of the human race. God had created Adam, marking God as mankind's father. God's authority was higher than Adam's, for He had created Adam and had named Adam. In this judicial sense, God's name was on Adam.

Because God had delegated to Adam authority over the creation (Gen. 1:26),² He had Adam name the living creatures under his immediate authority. So, God's name was on the creation directly, for He had created it, yet it was also on the creation indirectly, because Adam had named the animals, and His name was on Adam. The world is therefore God's lawful inheritance, both directly and indirectly. God's authority is both direct (providential) and indirect (covenantal). That is to say, His authority is simultaneously unmediated and mediated. This is why the Bible affirms God's absolute predestination and man's full responsibility for his own actions. "And truly the Son of man goeth, as it was determined: but woe unto that man by whom he is betrayed!" (Luke 22:22).

God had disinherited Adam by cursing his body and the ground for his transgression (Gen. 3:17–19)³ and casting him out of the garden (Gen. 3:24). But before issuing His curse, God had promised the serpent that Eve would have an heir who would bring negative sanctions against the serpent's seed (Gen. 3:15). God did not execute Adam on the day of Adam's transgression, for to have done so would have cut off Adam's seed. This would have made impossible the promised seed's ability to bring sanctions against the seed of the serpent. God extended common grace—a gift unmerited by the recipients—in the form of extended life and dominion in history to the serpent, to Eve, and to Adam. He did this for the sake of the promised seed.⁴ This seed was Jesus Christ, who would inherit through Abraham. Paul wrote: "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ" (Gal. 3:16).

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 3.

3. Ibid., ch. 11.

God's name is on God's Son. His Son was incarnate in history in the person of Jesus Christ. God's name was therefore also on Abraham, for through Abraham would God's incarnate Son come in history. There was no escape from this judicial naming. As surely as the promised seed would come in history to crush the head of the serpent, so was God's name on Abraham and his descendants. As surely as Adam was God's servant, so were Abraham and his descendants God's servants. This office of servantship was in fact sonship. God told Moses: "And thou shalt say unto Pharaoh, Thus saith the LORD, Israel is my son, even my firstborn" (Ex. 4:22). But how had Israel been restored to sonship after God's disinheritance of Adam? Through covenantal adoption.

Again the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, Son of man, cause Jerusalem to know her abominations, And say, Thus saith the Lord GOD unto Jerusalem; Thy birth and thy nativity is of the land of Canaan; thy father was an Amorite, and thy mother an Hittite. And as for thy nativity, in the day thou wast born thy navel was not cut, neither wast thou washed in water to supple thee; thou wast not salted at all, nor swaddled at all. None eye pitied thee, to do any of these unto thee, to have compassion upon thee; but thou wast cast out in the open field, to the lothing of thy person, in the day that thou wast born. And when I passed by thee, and saw thee polluted in thine own blood, I said unto thee when thou wast in thy blood, Live; yea, I said unto thee when thou wast in thy blood, Live (Ezek. 16:1–6).

Israel was God's inheritance because His name was on Israel through adoption. God had named Jacob Israel, which reflected His position as Israel's adopter. God's inheritance was His possession. The entire nation was spoken of by Moses as being God's inheritance. It was this judicial claim by God on national Israel which alone had saved Israel from God's wrath. By invoking the legal language of inheritance, Moses had stayed the hand of God at the time of the golden calf. Now Moses reminded his listeners of their position as God's inheritance. But this inheritance was reciprocal. God became Israel's inheritance. Moses stated this explicitly with respect to the Levites, who had no landed inheritance in Mosaic Israel. "Wherefore Levi hath no part nor inheritance with his brethren; the LORD is his inheritance, according as the LORD thy God promised him" (Deut. 10:9). What was true of Levi as the priesthood of Israel in relation to the other tribes was also true of Israel as the priesthood of humanity in relation to the other nations.

4. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), pp. 57–59. (<http://bit.ly/gndcgg>)

C. From Servitude to Sonship

This judicial position of being God's inheritance is a position of blessedness. "Blessed is the nation whose God is the LORD: and the people whom he hath chosen for his own inheritance" (Ps. 33:12). Nevertheless, to be part of another person's inheritance is to be his slave. Possessing such an inheritance down through the generations was lawful in Israel under the jubilee code, but this inter-generational slavery was limited to heathen slaves who had begun their term of bondage when they were outside of the national covenant. "Both thy bondmen, and thy bondmaids, which thou shalt have, shall be of the heathen that are round about you; of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids. Moreover of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you, which they begat in your land: and they shall be your possession. And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession; they shall be your bondmen for ever: but over your brethren the children of Israel, ye shall not rule one over another with rigour" (Lev. 25:44–46).⁵

This Mosaic law revealed a covenantal principle: better to be a slave in the household of faith than to be a free man outside the covenant. This principle did not end with Jesus' fulfillment of the jubilee law

5. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 31.

(Luke 4:18–21).⁶ Its administration did, however. Under the New Covenant, the highest ideal is liberty: “Art thou called being a servant? care not for it: but if thou mayest be made free, use it rather” (I Cor. 7:21).⁷ This liberty is possible because the covenant of redemption is no longer tied exclusively or uniquely to membership in any geographically and historically bounded nation. The mediatory status of national Israel in the Mosaic covenant of redemption is forever annulled. Old Covenant Israel is no longer God’s son. Old Covenant Israel was definitively disinherited at the crucifixion: the veil of the temple separating the holy of holies from the common area was torn from top to bottom (Matt. 27:52). Old Covenant Israel was progressively disinherited through its persecution of the New Testament church, and finally disinherited at the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. After that, Old Covenant Israel ceased to exist.⁸ Its successor, Rabbinic Judaism, possesses neither a temple nor an animal sacrifice system. The covenantally valid sacrificial fires of the temple were extinguished forever when the unauthorized fire lit by a pair of Roman soldiers burned the temple to the ground after the siege of Jerusalem ended.⁹ The Mosaic covenant has been forever annulled.

Under the Mosaic covenant, servanthood was a blessing because it was a form of preliminary sonship. The possibility of redemption from bondage was always present through adoption by another Israelite.¹⁰ Meanwhile, the servant was under the household covenant of the master. This brought blessings that were not available outside the household of faith.

The Mosaic covenant was itself a form of sonship that involved servanthship. The transfer of the inheritance from father to son was marked by a change in practical status from servant to son. We see this illustrated in the New Covenant’s replacement of the Old Covenant. Because the New Covenant has replaced the Old Covenant, covenant-keeping gentiles can become sons.

For ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ.

6. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

7. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 8.

8. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

9. Ibid., ch. 23.

10. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 30:K.

There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus. And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise. Now I say, That the heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be lord of all; But is under tutors and governors until the time appointed of the father. Even so we, when we were children, were in bondage under the elements of the world: But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, To redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father. Wherefore thou art no more a servant, but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ (Gal. 3:26–4:7).

With the advent of the Son of God in history, Israel was offered its long-awaited opportunity to move from inheritance-servitude to inheritance-sonship. The price of this transition was two-fold: (1) Israel's public acknowledgment of Jesus as the Messiah; (2) Israel's public consent to the extension of adoptive sonship status to the prodigal sons, i.e., the gentiles. But Old Covenant Israel, like the older brother in the parable of the prodigal son (Luke 15:28), was hard-hearted. The older brother in the parable complained to his father that the father had never slain a fatted calf for him. Where was his reward as the firstborn son?¹¹ This was Israel's constant complaint to God. "Where is our reward? We have been faithful. Where is our fatted calf?" Moses warned them in this passage: with the golden calf in Israel's background, they should all be content with the fact that God had not slain the nation at the foot of the altar.

A recurring theme in the Old Covenant is the rebelliousness of the older brother, whose inheritance ordinarily was the double portion (Deut. 21:17).¹² Instead, the younger son inherited because of the older brother's rebellion, e.g., Seth over Cain, Isaac over Ishmael, Jacob over Esau, Joseph over Reuben, Ephraim over Manasseh, David over Eliab, and ultimately Jesus over Adam. The rebellious firstborn resents the faithful second-born. "And Eliab his eldest brother heard when he spake unto the men; and Eliab's anger was kindled against David, and he said, Why camest thou down hither? and with whom hast thou left those few sheep in the wilderness? I know thy pride, and the naughtiness of thine heart; for thou art come down that thou mightest see the battle” (I Sam. 17:28). Then the younger brother inherits through his covenantal faithfulness.

11. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 37.

12. Chapter 49.

The Jews should have remembered all this when Jesus told His parable of the prodigal younger brother who repented and the stiff-necked older brother who complained. The older brother refused to rejoice with his father at the return of the younger brother in humility. His father’s joy meant nothing to him; he cared only about the honor shown to his prodigal brother. His brother’s humility had regained his access to the household and its rewards. What was the public mark of his brother’s humility? His willingness to enter his father’s household as a servant, not as a son (Luke 15:21). He understood that servanthship is preferable to life outside the household of faith. This realization is the only basis of a return to sonship for prodigal sons. The sons of Adam are all prodigal sons.

Conclusion

Moses designated Israel as God’s inheritance. The Israelites’ status as God’s inheritance placed them in the judicial position of servants, yet also as lawful sons. They owed God service, for the inheritance is lawfully at the disposal of the heir. They were also subordinate to God as the lawful heir. This is why Jesus’ parable of the servants who kill the heir of the master so outraged the Jews (Matt. 21:38–46).¹³

The inheritance does not exercise authority over its owner. Moses made it clear to them that their status as God’s inheritance placed them in a special judicial position: subordinate. What he did not say, but which was implied by biblical theology, is this: legitimate sonship always begins with servanthship (Gal. 4:1–7). Even sin-free Adam was not allowed to touch all of God’s inheritance. Servanthship is the training required of all lawful sons. As the inheritance of God, Israel could prove its legal status as the son of God. Israel would then inherit the kingdom of God. The implied warning was clear: should Israel rebel against its judicial status as God’s inheritance—as bondservants in the household of faith—God would disinherit Israel, just as He had threatened to do after the golden calf incident. Next time, there might not be a Moses to plead with God for mercy.

13. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 43.

SONSHIP, OBEDIENCE, AND IMMIGRATION

And now, Israel, what doth the LORD thy God require of thee, but to fear the LORD thy God, to walk in all his ways, and to love him, and to serve the LORD thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul, To keep the commandments of the LORD, and his statutes, which I command thee this day for thy good? Behold, the heaven and the heaven of heavens is the LORD'S thy God, the earth also, with all that therein is. Only the LORD had a delight in thy fathers to love them, and he chose their seed after them, even you above all people, as it is this day. Circumcise therefore the foreskin of your heart, and be no more stiff-necked (Deut. 10:12–16).

The fear of God is the theocentric focus of this passage. The decisive issue here is obedience. “And now, Israel, what doth the LORD thy God require of thee, but to fear the LORD thy God, to walk in all his ways.”

A. The Covenantal Function of Fear

Covenantal faithfulness begins with fear (Prov. 9:10). Fear, obedience, and love were united in this passage. Israel was told to obey God. The basis of this fear was legally grounded in God's status as Creator: “Behold, the heaven and the heaven of heavens is the LORD'S thy God, the earth also, with all that therein is.” The passage's logic is sharp: from man's obedience to God's ownership. Man's absolute obedience is required by God because God is the absolute owner of the universe. This ownership included Israel, which owed a special debt to God as God's chosen nation. “Only the LORD had a delight in thy fathers to love them, and he chose their seed after them, even you above all people, as it is this day” (v. 15). God's cosmic ownership identifies this law as a universal law. It was not a seed law or a land law.¹

The fourth generation would soon be circumcised at Gilgal (Josh. 5:7). The circumcision of their flesh would visibly bond them with Abraham, but this circumcision of their flesh would not be sufficient to maintain the kingdom grant. They would have to obey God's law. Moses referred to this as the circumcision of the heart.

Paul made extensive use of this metaphor in his development of the New Covenant's extension of the Old Covenant's promises and inheritance to the gentiles. The central issue is ethics, Paul insisted, not circumcision. "For circumcision verily profiteth, if thou keep the law: but if thou be a breaker of the law, thy circumcision is made uncircumcision. Therefore if the uncircumcision keep the righteousness of the law, shall not his uncircumcision be counted for circumcision? And shall not uncircumcision which is by nature, if it fulfil the law, judge thee, who by the letter and circumcision dost transgress the law? For he is not a Jew, which is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision, which is outward in the flesh: But he is a Jew, which is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God" (Rom. 2:25–29). This is exactly what Moses told them in this passage. It is not who you are but what you do that determines how God deals with you. God does not regard persons in declaring His formal judgments. "For the LORD your God is God of gods, and Lord of lords, a great God, a mighty, and a terrible, which regardeth not persons, nor taketh reward" (Deut. 10:17).

B. Sonship and Inheritance

Moses was making a crucial covenantal observation. It was in fact the most important aspect of the Mosaic Covenant: the mark of true sonship is the circumcised heart.² Ethics is more important than ritual. The true son is the son who obeys his father. It was this message that the Israelites forgot or denied by their actions, generation after generation, culminating in the nation's consummate rebellion: the crucifixion of Jesus Christ. Jesus drove home Moses' message in his parable of the two sons: "But what think ye? A certain man had two sons; and he came to the first, and said, Son, go work to day in my vineyard. He answered and said, I will not: but afterward he repented, and went. And he came to the second, and said likewise. And he answered and said, I go, sir: and went not. Whether of them twain did the will of his father? They say unto him, The first. Jesus saith unto them, Verily I say unto you, That the publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you. For John came unto you in the way of righteousness, and ye believed him not: but the publicans and the harlots believed him: and ye, when ye had seen it, repented not afterward, that ye might believe him" (Matt. 21:28–32). The true Son of God, the true heir of Abraham, was murdered by the would-be heirs. Jesus' next parable revealed that He knew exactly what they would do to Him: the parable of the husbandmen who killed the heir (Matt. 21:33–46).

1. On land laws and seed laws, see Appendix J.

2. In defense of my estimation of the centrality of this passage, I cite Paul. "Therefore if the uncircumcision keep the righteousness of the law, shall not his uncircumcision be counted for circumcision? And shall not uncircumcision which is by nature, if it fulfil the law, judge thee, who by the letter and circumcision dost transgress the law? For he is not a Jew, which is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision, which is outward in the flesh: But he is a Jew, which is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God" (Rom. 2:26–29).

Circumcision was the physical mark of subordination to the Mosaic covenant. Circumcision was the Old Covenant's oath-sign.³ Every biblical covenant must be ratified by an oath, and this oath invokes negative sanctions on the covenant-breaker.⁴ The negative sanction of the cutting of the flesh was the judicial equivalent of invoking negative sanctions on the oath-taker for disobeying God's law. The covenant's oath-sign invokes positive and negative historical sanctions in terms of the covenant's stipulations. Circumcision did not guarantee Israel's inheritance; it merely invoked positive sanctions for obedience, which in turn would ensure the inheritance.

Moses was warning his listeners: obedience to God was a more important sign of sonship than circumcision was. Circumcision invoked God's sanctions, but these sanctions were applied in terms of God's law. Point four of the biblical covenant model—oath/sanctions—refers the oath-taker back to point three: ethics. The physical mark of the Old Covenant was circumcision. But the other visible mark was of much greater importance: obedience to the law. Circumcision without obedience brings God's negative sanctions. Jesus warned: "Every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire. Wherefore by their fruits ye shall know them. Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven” (Matt. 7:19–21).⁵ Circumcision without obedience was a curse, not a blessing.

3. Meredith G. Kline, By Oath Consigned: A Reinterpretation of the Covenant Signs of Circumcision and Baptism (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1968), ch. 3.

4. Ibid., pp. 40–43.

Moses’ words in this passage reflect the biblical covenant model. God, as the sovereign owner of heaven and earth (point one), established His covenant with representatives (point two): the patriarchs of Israel. He has placed Israel under His law (point three), to which are attached sanctions (point four). These sanctions are invoked by circumcision; they are applied by God in terms of obedience or disobedience. Corporate inheritance is the ultimate positive sanction in history: the kingdom of God on earth.

His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth (Ps. 25:13).

For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth (Ps. 37:9).

But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace (Ps. 37:11).

Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth” (Matt. 5:5).⁶

While Israel’s inheritance is not specifically mentioned in this passage, this is the central theme of the Deuteronomy. Moses did identify that generation as part of Abraham’s promised seed, “even you above all people, as it is this day” (v. 15).

Israel could not rely on circumcision as the judicial basis of its national inheritance. Maintaining the kingdom grant is always an ethical task.⁷ Israel’s rituals were symbols of cleansing and restoration, but they were useless if they were not accompanied by a change of heart and behavior. Circumcision would condemn Israel if the nation committed the sins of Canaan. Circumcision would bring the Mosaic covenant’s negative corporate sanctions. Deuteronomy is the second reading of the law because the Mosaic law was the written testament that specified the terms of the national inheritance.

5. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 18.

6. Ibid., ch. 4.

7. James B. Jordan, Covenant Sequence in Leviticus and Deuteronomy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), p. 9. (<http://bit.ly/jjcovseq>)

C. Sons and Strangers

Sons inherit; strangers in the household do not. This had been Abram's dilemma. "And Abram said, Lord GOD, what wilt thou give me, seeing I go childless, and the steward of my house is this Eliezer of Damascus?" (Gen. 15:2). The judicial question is this: Who is the true son with a lawful claim on the inheritance?

The true sons of God are those who obey Him. This fact raised a major question for Israel, one which they never answered correctly: Can a stranger become a son? The answer was covenantally obvious, but it was repulsive to Israel: yes. The stranger, if he acts as a son should act, is entitled to become the lawful heir. The son, if he acts as a stranger to the covenant, is to be disinherited (Matt. 21:28–32).

Adopted sons replace biological sons as the lawful heirs. This is the message of the New Covenant. The gentiles could become sons on the same basis that the Jews could: obedience to God's covenant, i.e., adoption. This obedience is imputed by God to adopted sons on the judicial basis of Christ's perfect ethical fulfillment of the criteria of sonship. Both Jews and gentiles need adoption, Paul wrote to the Galatians: "But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, To redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father" (Gal. 4:4–6). Adoption had always been open to gentiles in Israel, but it took up to 10 generations for the heirs of some strangers to achieve this (Deut. 23: 3). Under the New Covenant, adoption required a new oath-sign, baptism, and a new Passover, the Lord's Supper. As had been the case with the Mosaic Covenant's rituals, these new oath-bound rituals were not to be regarded as substitutes for obedience.

And hereby we do know that we know him, if we keep his commandments. He that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him (I John 2:3–4).

And whatsoever we ask, we receive of him, because we keep his commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in his sight (I John 3:22).

And he that keepeth his commandments dwelleth in him, and he in him. And hereby we know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit which he hath given us (I John 3:24).

By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God, and keep his commandments (I John 5:2).

The true son does the will of his father. By identifying a man's works, others can identify his covenantal father. This covenantal concept of sonship was why the circumcised stranger was a threat to the self-esteem of covenant-breaking Israelites. The visible obedience of covenant-keeping strangers testified against the sonship of covenant-breaking Israelites.

Those who were the biological heirs of the conquest generation had an inheritance in the land. Immigrant strangers could not inherit rural land except through their adoption into a family line of the conquest generation. But they could buy houses in the cities (Lev. 25: 29–30), and they could become full citizens in the cities after several consecutive generations of circumcised heads of households. They could become full sons of the covenant even though they could not inherit rural land. This eventually placed a heavy social and psychological premium on the possession of a claim to rural land. Land rather than ethics became the chief differentiating factor in the minds of covenant-breaking heirs of the conquest generation.

D. Sacrosanct Land

The land became sacrosanct in the thinking of those Israelites who placed formal title to land above obedience as the true mark of sonship. "The land, the land" became their cry. The supreme mark of their disinheritance would be their removal from the land. Recognizing this sinful outlook in advance, Moses warned: "And it shall come to pass, that as the LORD rejoiced over you to do you good, and to multiply you; so the LORD will rejoice over you to destroy you, and to bring you to nought; and ye shall be plucked from off the land whither thou goest to possess it. And the LORD shall scatter thee among all people, from the one end of the earth even unto the other; and there thou shalt serve other gods, which neither thou nor thy fathers have known, even wood and stone. And among these nations shalt thou find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest: but the LORD shall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind" (Deut. 28:63–65).

Assyria removed Israelites from the land in the Northern Kingdom in 722 B.C. In 586 B.C., Babylon removed most of those living in the Southern Kingdom.⁸ A comparative handful returned from the Babylonian captivity in 538; the vast majority remained behind in Babylon. Moses saw this, too. "And ye shall be left few in number, whereas ye were as the stars of heaven for multitude; because thou wouldest not obey the voice of the LORD thy God" (Deut. 28:62). Only a remnant returned to Israel, as Jeremiah had foretold: "And I will gather the remnant of my flock out of all countries whither I have driven them, and will bring them again to their folds; and they shall be fruitful and increase" (Jer. 23:3). Rome removed most of them permanently from the land in 135 A.D. after Simon bar Kochba's abortive rebellion (132–35).⁹ The diaspora had begun.

Without the laying on of hands (semikah), which could be done lawfully only inside the boundaries of the land of Israel, a Jewish court under Phariseism had no authority to impose the punishments mandated in the Bible. The development of an alternative system of sanctions became a major task of Judaism after the failure of Bar Kochba's rebellion and the forced dispersion of the Jews by the Roman authorities.¹⁰ The problem of rule outside the land had appeared earlier, however, with the destruction of the temple. The holiness of Israel could no longer be based on the presence of the temple in the land. The Jews became in their own eyes the holiness of God, replacing the temple. This meant that all Jews everywhere participated in this holiness. To attest to this separate judicial condition of holiness, they needed to be judged by Jewish law, and this law could invoke sanctions that were valid only inside the boundaries of Israel.

The holiness of the Jews had been a major doctrine of the Pharisees even before A.D. 70. This placed the Pharisees in a dominant position within Judaism after A.D. 70.¹¹ The Romans placed Gamaliel at the head of the Jews' local system of patriarchal rule.¹² From the fall of Jerusalem until Bar Kochba's rebellion, the Jewish leaders began the

8. Not all, however: "But Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard left certain of the poor of the land for vinedressers and for husbandmen" (Jer. 52:16).

9. Jewish historian Heinrich Graetz reported that Bar Kochba persecuted no one except Jewish Christians, who refused to take up arms against Rome. Heinrich Graetz, A History of the Jews, 6 vols. (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1893), II, p. 412.

10. George Horowitz, The Spirit of Jewish Law (New York: Central Book Co., [1953] 1973), p. 93.

11. Jacob Neusner, An Introduction to Judaism: A Textbook and Reader (Louisville, Kentucky: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1991), pp. 160–61.

12. Ibid., p. 159. This Gamaliel was the son of Paul's teacher: Paul Johnson, A History of The Jews (New York: Harper & Row, 1987), p. 150.

work of codifying the Pharisees' oral law, but it remained oral.¹³ The greatest early codifier was Rabbi Akiba, born around A.D. 50, who as an old man died at the hands of the Romans after the failure of Bar Kochba's rebellion, which Akiba had supported.¹⁴ He had publicly identified Bar Kochba as the Messiah.¹⁵ Late in the second century A.D., Rabbi Judah Ha-Nasi ("the Prince" or "the Patriarch") completed the codification of the Pharisees' oral tradition. This was the Mishnah.¹⁶ The Talmud, a detailed and seemingly unstructured series of comments on the Mishnah, was completed in Babylon around A.D. 500.¹⁷

These developments, which sealed off Judaism from the surrounding Roman culture, moved in a direction opposite from developments in the early church. The New Testament's inclusion of gentiles into the kingdom's inheritance was an extension of Moses' original principle of sonship through obedience. Baptism merely speeded up the process of inclusion: from several generations (Deut. 23:3–8) to immediate covenantal membership. Inclusion became definitive at the time of baptism; the Mosaic law's multi-generation progressive inclusion process for immigrants was annulled along with the jubilee law.

E. Visible Economic Evidence of Civil Justice

Moses went from a warning regarding stiffnecked rebellion to a discussion of God as the judge: "For the LORD your God is God of gods, and Lord of lords, a great God, a mighty, and a terrible, which regardeth not persons, nor taketh reward" (Deut. 10:17). Here is a God to be feared. He cannot be bought off. An attempted bribe brings no benefits in God's court.

The proof of God's imperviousness to any attempt to deflect His judgment is His treatment of those who are in no position to offer a bribe. God executes righteous judgment for the afflicted: orphans, widows, and strangers. "He doth execute the judgment of the fatherless and widow, and loveth the stranger, in giving him food and raiment" (v. 18). These three groups were the Mosaic law's symbols—its representatives—of the judicially defenseless in Israel. Members of these

13. Ibid., p. 158.

14. Ernest R. Trattner, Understanding the Talmud (New York: Thomas Nelson & Sons, 1955), pp. 101–102.

15. Ibid., p. 137. The source for this is the Jerusalem Talmud, Ta'an 4:7, 68d.

16. Graetz, History of the Jews, II, pp. 460–61.

17. Trattner, Understanding the Talmud, p. 55.

groups could not execute judgment in Israel. Who, then, would represent them in a court of law? God would, Moses warned. And since He would, His earthly judges had better do the same. "Love ye therefore the stranger: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt" (v. 19). By reminding them of their stay in Egypt, Moses recalled the penalty of injustice: national destruction. He also reminded them of the positive historical sanctions shown by God to covenant-keepers who are unrighteously afflicted by covenant-breakers: "Thy fathers went down into Egypt with threescore and ten persons; and now the LORD thy God hath made thee as the stars of heaven for multitude" (v. 22).

This was a clear prophecy of what would happen to Israel if the nation's leaders handed down corrupt judgments that respected persons or bribes. Israel's experience would recapitulate Egypt's experience. If Israel's judges did not honor the rule of law in its courts, treating strangers the same as Israelites, then Israel would be brought low.

Israel had been a stranger in Egypt. At first, Egypt had treated Israel well. This had been manifested by Pharaoh's elevation of Joseph as second in command. Egypt had survived the famine because the Pharaoh had honored Joseph's advice. Egypt received a blessing through the stranger in her midst. Had Pharaoh returned Joseph to prison, where he had been brought under negative judicial sanctions unrighteously by Potiphar, Egypt would have suffered a disaster. Egypt's treatment of this stranger within her gates would determine Egypt's fate.

In a later generation, a new Pharaoh brought the Israelites under bondage. This arrangement seemed to be profitable for a time. The Pharaoh gained the benefit of cheap slave labor for at least a generation. But this could not become a permanent relationship under the law of God. The debt relationship for this evil—the negative sanctions—compounded over time. The debts came due at the exodus. Egypt was destroyed.

When had Israel's population growth taken place? During the good times, the days of liberty in Egypt. The multiplication of Israel was what had frightened the Pharaoh of the oppression (Ex. 1:9). That is, strangers flourished in Egypt. This is an important mark of a righteous society: strangers flourish. The rule of law, if the law is just, provides the judicial framework for economic growth. Immigrants are notoriously thrifty and hard working compared to those who stayed behind in the old country. What we call the Puritan work ethic, which includes future-orientation and thrift, enables the immigrants to prosper. A society that oppresses strangers is unjust. The blessings of justice can be seen in communities of immigrants who prosper and eventually grow wealthy enough to move out of their cultural ghettos in a generation or two. This has been the experience of the United States.¹⁸ It has made the United States unique in modern history, especially prior to 1924, when the immigration laws were drastically tightened.¹⁹

Moses warned Israel to deal justly with orphans, widows, and strangers. Yet if Israel did this, resident aliens would flourish economically according to their talents and their work ethic. If Israelites resented their success, as Egyptians had resented Israel's success, and began dishonoring God's law by perverting justice to strangers, then the days of vengeance would come. On the other hand, Israel's covenantal success would be manifested by the economic success of resident aliens. The Mosaic law even provided for the sale of poor Israelites into household servitude to resident aliens (Lev. 25:47–52). The sign of God's blessing would be rich strangers in the land. To attempt to tear them down through judicial discrimination would call forth God's judgment against the nation.

The essence of envy is the desire to tear down someone else merely because he is superior. Envy was the motivation of the Philistines in filling in Isaac's wells with dirt (Gen. 26:15).²⁰ They did not confiscate these wells for their own use; instead, they destroyed his inheritance from his father. They were not made richer, but Isaac was made poorer. This is the heart, mind, and soul of envy. When a society compromises the rule of law in order to tear down economically successful people, it kills the judicial goose that lays the golden eggs. When a society knows this and does it anyway, it has become consumed with envy. Its earthly reward will be an increase in judicial arbitrariness, bureaucracy, and poverty, as well as class resentment. It will grow worse, for the sin of envy cannot be placated. There is always someone who is superior in some respect.²¹

18. Thomas Sowell, Ethnic America: A History (New York: Basic Books, 1981).

19. America's problem, unlike Mosaic Israel's, is that the civil oath does not pledge citizens to obedience to God and God's revealed law. Thus, the immigrant can gain citizenship while maintaining the religious oath which he brought with him. Because Western nations impose only secular oaths on their citizens, immigrants who retain their alien religious oaths undermine the remnants of the Christian social order that created the West. They are allowed to impose political sanctions in terms of religious worldviews hostile to Christianity. The experiment in secular civil government is not yet completed. It will end badly.

20. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Bible (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 27.

F. The Open Invitation

The uncircumcised alien could prosper in Israel when God's law was enforced. This was another indication to Israel that physical circumcision was not the heart of the matter; ethical circumcision was. The covenantal issue was obedience to God's law. If a resident alien producer served Israelite customers efficiently, he would prosper. The Mosaic law invited aliens to come to Israel and serve those living in Israel by producing on a free market. The Mosaic law's promise of equal justice would recruit productive people to Israel—clearly a benefit to customers in Israel. Political envy and jealousy were held at bay by the Mosaic law. The stranger's wealth would not be extracted from him by coercive, arbitrary civil laws. Private property would be secure when the Mosaic law was enforced.

This open invitation to immigrate to Israel was a means of increasing Israel's wealth. Attracting productive people is even better than discovering valuable raw materials. Human creativity is more valuable in the long run than raw materials are, whose prices tend to fall in relationship to the price of labor in a growing economy.²² Again and again in history, societies that find themselves in possession of valuable raw materials have fallen behind economically within a century or less because governments extract the mineral wealth. The state grows larger, strangling the productivity of its citizens. The monarchy of Spain after 1500 is the classic example. It controlled access in and out of its American empire. It controlled the choke points of commerce. This way, the king made sure that he received his 20% share of the precious metals mined in his American colonies.²³ Spain's government and monopoly controlled all aspects of commerce.²⁴ Spain's monarchs misjudged the source of Spain's continuing wealth. The goose that would lay the most golden eggs in the Americas was not Spain's mining monopoly; rather, it was the system of economic liberty that prevailed above the

21. Helmut Schoeck, Envy: A Theory of Social Behavior (New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, [1966] 1969), pp. 251, 336. The novel by L. P. Hartley, Facial Justice, is a classic statement of the insatiable nature of envy (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1960).

22. Julian Simon, The Ultimate Resource (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1981).

23. Curtis P. Nettels, The Roots of American Civilization, 2nd ed. (New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1963), p. 43.

24. Ibid., p. 45.

Rio Grande River. Curtis Nettels, a specialist in American colonial history, concluded regarding South America: “In the end the stifling effects of regulation contributed a major cause of the successful revolt of the colonies during the Napoleonic wars.”²⁵

Spain enjoyed the wealth of the South American and Mexican gold mines for almost two centuries, but by the end of the seventeenth century, Spain’s economy had visibly begun to fall behind England’s and even the Netherlands’, whose national income rested on trade rather than mining. The absence of gold mining above the Rio Grande in early North America made its economic triumph far more likely in the long run. Men seeking liberty and individual economic opportunity came by the tens of millions to the United States. Liberty made the difference economically, not gold. A nation’s gold mines eventually run out; liberty need not run out. Whether it does or doesn’t depends on a society’s ethics.

G. Immigration and Membership Oaths

The possibility of immigration raised the issue of economic inheritance. Strangers in Israel could become legal heirs through adoption by Israelite families. Blood-line inheritance was not the basis of the Mosaic Covenant. The Mosaic Covenant was not a blood-line covenant. It was an ethical-judicial covenant. Men were by oath consigned, not by blood consigned. Israelites could not lawfully pass laws or make judicial decisions that discriminated against strangers. They could not lawfully place discriminatory judicial penalties on strangers. Legislated envy was illegal in Israel. The gentile had a protected position in Israel’s legal code. He could buy a lawful inheritance inside Israel’s walled cities (Lev. 25:29–30). Ultimately, he had a possibility of becoming a co-heir through adoption.

One mark of a free society is that strangers can flourish economically. The encouragement of immigration is part of biblical law. The problem comes when the national civil covenant establishes citizenship apart from a confession of faith, i.e., a covenantal oath of allegiance to the God of the Bible and His law. When inheritance is by mere physical presence, or by a pledge of allegiance to a secular state, immigration becomes a covenantal threat to those who are already dwelling in the land. When the state is used as a means of coercive wealth distribution—e.g., the modern welfare state—then the immigrant becomes an economic threat to taxpaying citizens: a potential drain on their wealth. Initially, he receives resources from the state because he is poor. Later, his children can become citizens and vote for additional support from the state.

25. Ibid., p. 47.

The ultimate form of immigration is birth. The abortion movement in the United States was founded on class hatred by dedicated racists and eugenicists such as Margaret Sanger, who cried out against the foreign-born working class because its members were “benign imbeciles, who encourage the defective and diseased elements of humanity in their reckless and irresponsible swarming.”²⁶ “More children from the fit, less from the unfit” she declared; “that is the chief issue of birth control.”²⁷ Sanger and her ideological associates wanted to reduce the flow of immigrants, who were crossing borders and crossing birth canals. The first step in their legislative agenda was achieved through the legalization of birth control devices: the elimination of a negative judicial sanction on voluntary exchange. The second was the 1924 United States immigration law: the imposition of new negative sanctions against immigrants. The third was the legalization of abortion by the United States Supreme Court in 1973: the removal of negative sanctions against abortionists and the imposition of permanent negative sanctions against infants.

H. Adoption in Family, Church, and State

Biblical inheritance is by sonship. Sonship is attained by means of covenant oath and obedience. Biblically speaking, sonship is legally open to anyone who is willing to affirm the covenantal oath: in family, church, and state. The biblical model for sonship is adoption.

In family affairs, the head of the household initiates the adoption offer at his discretion. Adopted sonship is not automatically granted to everyone who seeks it. The family is a private institution grounded in biology (Gen. 2:24) as well as by a covenant oath of mutual intimacy and sexual exclusivity. With respect to the Adamic family’s civil status, the terms of its confession are private even though the state lawfully regulates certain aspects of membership, such as its biological heterosexuality, and also enforces inheritance. No child is a bastard under biblical civil law on the basis of his married parents’ refusal to confess the faith established by God's law for the two other public covenantal institutions, church and state. Neither is a child who was not born into a family entitled to membership merely because he confesses a married couple's confession. Family covenant membership is automatic through birth.²⁸ There must not be legal discrimination against the Adamic covenant family based on the issue of confessional content other than the promise of exclusive mutual bonding. This is not true of church and state.

26. Margaret Sanger, The Pivot of Civilization (New York: Brentano’s, 1922), p. 125; cited in George Grant, Grand Illusions: The Legacy of Planned Parenthood (Franklin, Tennessee: Adroit Press, 1992), p. 27. Sanger’s book is on the Web.

27. Sanger, “Birth Control,” Birth Control Review (May 1919); cited in idem.

In church and state, an open membership offer—the offer of adoption—is automatically extended to the general public with the original incorporation of either of these covenantal organizations. Church and state are public monopolies: the monopoly of the sacraments and the monopoly of life-threatening violence. God has established rules governing both of these monopolistic institutions. Those people who have gained early access to the benefits of membership are not allowed by God to close these benefits to newcomers. Membership in both covenantal organizations is open to all comers on the original terms of the covenant. In neither church nor state are officers allowed by God to discriminate against anyone who seeks membership by means of a covenant oath. Trinitarian Protestant churches have violated God's law in the past, for local congregations for generations screened members by race. So has an anti-immigration Trinitarian state. So has anyone who seeks to substitute a covenantal oath in either institution that denies the theology of the Athanasian creed. Public sonship is by public Trinitarian oath. To substitute a new oath is to substitute a new covenant.²⁹

This does not mean that Christians' opposition to immigration is illegitimate when the state has adopted a non-Trinitarian confession. Christians may legitimately seek to substitute a Trinitarian covenant, which will require votes. If they see that certain immigrants who confess a rival and highly aggressive religion are becoming eligible for citizenship, then as a defensive political strategy for the sake of the extension of the kingdom of God, they may legitimately seek to work politically to cut off such immigration as part of their goal of establishing a Trinitarian confession for the nation. But for those Christians who

28. What distinguishes the Christian family from the Adamic family is infant baptism. Children are supposed to be baptized as infants, thereby transferring to the institutional church covenantal authority over the children through the parents. Baptists and non-Christians deny the validity of this legal arrangement.

29. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), Part 3. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>) deny the legitimacy of a Christian nation—the vast majority of Protestant Christians today—any opposition to immigration is made in terms of non-confessional considerations. This constitutes discrimination based on economic, racial, or other considerations. The Bible condemns all such judicial discrimination except against citizens of enemy nations during a declared war, which would in effect constitute an invasion, or against immigrants afflicted with contagious deadly diseases, which would also constitute an invasion.

Conclusion

The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. It is also the beginning of wealth. The circumcision of the heart—obedience to God—is the basis of maintaining God’s inheritance and expanding it. The circumcised heart is the mark of legitimate sonship.

This opened the possibility of inheritance to strangers in Mosaic Israel. The immigrant, if he consented to circumcision, could look forward to urban citizenship for his heirs. Even if he remained uncircumcised, he was entitled to civil justice in terms of the Mosaic law. The rule of law mandated by God: “One law shall be to him that is home-born, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you” (Ex. 12:49).³⁰ The Mosaic law’s protection of private property was universal.

This was a major incentive for productive strangers to immigrate to Israel. They could enjoy the fruits of their labor despite their alien legal status. There is no question that this aspect of the Mosaic law was an aspect of Israel’s evangelism to the world (Deut. 4:5–8).³¹

30. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 14.

31. Chapter 8.

OATH, SANCTIONS, AND INHERITANCE

Thou shalt fear the LORD thy God; him shalt thou serve, and to him shalt thou cleave, and swear by his name. He is thy praise, and he is thy God, that hath done for thee these great and terrible things, which thine eyes have seen. Thy fathers went down into Egypt with three-score and ten persons; and now the LORD thy God hath made thee as the stars of heaven for multitude (Deut. 10:20–22).

The theocentric focus of this passage is the fear of God, the God who does terrible (fearful)¹ things. The overall context of this passage is obedience. “And now, Israel, what doth the LORD thy God require of thee, but to fear the LORD thy God, to walk in all his ways, and to love him, and to serve the LORD thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul” (Deut. 10:12). The verse following this passage reinforces this ethical theme. “Therefore thou shalt love the LORD thy God, and keep his charge, and his statutes, and his judgments, and his commandments, alway” (Deut. 11:1).

A. Fulfilled Promises

God is sovereign over history, as Israel’s history had demonstrated. Such fear should lead to covenantal swearing, Moses said: “to him shalt thou cleave, and swear by his name.” Because of the presence of a covenantal oath, this law is a universal law. It was not a seed law or land law, although it had to do with the inheritance of Canaan. It has to do with inheritance in general because the passage assumes the presence of a covenantal oath.

Israel’s oath-bound covenantal subordination had resulted in the fulfillment of two of God’s three promises to Abraham. First, the promise of numerous descendants: “And he brought him forth abroad, and said, Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them: and he said unto him, So shall thy seed be" (Gen. 15:5). The second promise had also been fulfilled: collecting the inheritances of Egypt's firstborn. "And he said unto Abram, Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years; And also that nation, whom they shall serve, will I judge: and afterward shall they come out with great substance" (vv. 13–14). The third prophetic promise had not yet been fulfilled when Moses spoke to the elders of Israel, but it soon would be: the inheritance of Canaan. "But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full" (v. 16).

1. The Hebrew word for fear (v. 20) and terrible (v. 21) is the same.

The fulfillment of the first two promises was supposed to produce confidence in the fulfillment of the third: national inheritance. The fulfillment of all three promises was supposed to motivate the nation to even greater covenantal faithfulness. "Therefore thou shalt love the LORD thy God, and keep his charge, and his statutes, and his judgments, and his commandments, alway" (Deut. 11:1). Joshua and the older members of his generation as children had seen God's historical sanctions on Egypt; the younger members and their children had not. "And know ye this day: for I speak not with your children which have not known, and which have not seen the chastisement of the LORD your God, his greatness, his mighty hand, and his stretched out arm, And his miracles, and his acts, which he did in the midst of Egypt unto Pharaoh the king of Egypt, and unto all his land" (vv. 2–3). God had destroyed Egypt's army by burying them all in the Red Sea (v. 4); He destroyed Dathan and Abiram by having the earth swallow them (v. 6). The older members had seen all this with their own eyes (v. 7). This was supposed to make the conquest generation obedient. "Therefore shall ye keep all the commandments which I command you this day, that ye may be strong, and go in and possess the land, whither ye go to possess it" (v. 8). The sight of God's sanctions in history is to become a means of covenantal reinforcement.

B. Eschatological Inheritance

The exodus generation would have to inherit, as Abraham had inherited, through their heirs. They had been told this a generation earlier. "But your little ones, which ye said should be a prey, them will I bring in, and they shall know the land which ye have despised" (Num. 14:31). The exodus generation had to content itself with inheriting eschatologically. Their victorious heirs would represent them. They would achieve their victory through their heirs, just as God had promised mankind in His curse on the serpent (Gen. 3:15).

Eschatological inheritance is worth very little for men without saving faith, especially present-oriented men without faith in the future. Israel was about to become a nation of immigrants. The immigrant's future-oriented ideal of making a better life for his children and his grandchildren makes him a thrifty, hard-working, uncomplaining servant in society. Rarely do his grandchildren sustain either his eschatological vision or his savings rate. They assume that what they possess is normal and almost cost-free rather than the unique inheritance of two generations of thrift and hard work. They become historically forgetful. They become forgetful regarding the way to wealth: a high savings rate and service to the customer. Covenantal forgetfulness was the crucial economic threat to Israel, which was about to become a nation of newly arrived immigrants. Beware, Moses warned, that "thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth" (Deut. 8:17).²

The older generation's weakness had been present-orientation: a refusal to be content with eschatological inheritance. As soon as Moses told them that they would not be allowed to conquer Canaan, they rushed into a forbidden war with Amalek (Num. 14:44–45). They immediately became overconfident when they should have been humble before pagan covenant-breakers for a generation. Previously, they had lacked confidence when they should have been humble before God and therefore confident regarding their imminent victory over covenant-breakers. In both cases, they did not have confidence in the predictability of God's historical sanctions: (1) negative corporate sanctions on Canaanites through Israel inside the land; (2) negative corporate sanctions on Israel through Amalekites outside the land.

These decisive events had been uniquely covenantal. First, the Israelites had not believed in the historical relevance of point one of the biblical covenant model: (1) the sovereignty of God over the events of history; (2) His unique judicial presence with them as a nation. Second, they had not accepted their national office as God's representative agent in bringing negative corporate sanctions against Canaan. Third, they had not believed God's revelation to them: imminent victory over Canaan, said Joshua and Caleb; imminent defeat by Amalek, said

2. Chapter 21.

Moses. Fourth, they had initially sought to avoid imposing God's sanctions and then had sought to impose sanctions on their own. Fifth, they had no patience with the doctrine of eschatological inheritance. They were present-oriented.

C. Promise and Continuity

Moses pointed to the growth of Israel's population. They had arrived in Egypt as a handful; now they were a multitude. He cited the words of God to Abram: the stars of heaven. God's promise to childless Abram had been fulfilled. The change in name to Abraham—father of nations or multitudes—had been fulfilled.

God's revelation to Abram 470 years earlier had been reliable. The Israelites could see with their own eyes that God's promise had been fulfilled. But this had been equally true of the preceding generation. They had not believed their own eyes. They had not acknowledged that they were living proof of the reliability of the covenantal promise to Abram.³ They had not understood that God's oath in history had come true in history. They had not looked to their own history, including their immediate history, with the eyes of faith. The fulfillment of God's oath to Abram had been ignored by the exodus generation. It had made no impact on their thinking, their words, or their actions.

The Israelites of the exodus generation did not acknowledge the importance of continuity in history. The judicial basis of Israel's continuity was God's oath to Abram. That which followed this oath had confirmed the terms of the oath. The oath had not been mere words; it had been a prophecy. This prophecy had come true in their generation. But the fathers of the conquest generation had refused to acknowledge that the fulfillment of God's oath in history had transferred to them a heavy degree of responsibility. They no doubt understood that this was the case, but they refused to acknowledge it. They were determined not to enter the Promised Land. They had no desire to transfer leadership to their sons under Joshua, even though Joshua's generation had been identified prophetically by God as the inheriting generation (Gen. 15:16). They preferred not to inherit. They clung to their authority in the wilderness rather than transfer it to their sons and march into Canaan. They preferred to allow death to transfer this authority four decades later. They preferred wandering in the wilderness to seeing the fulfillment of God's covenant oath to Abram in their lifetimes.

3. He had not yet been re-named in Genesis 15.

God's oath to Abram was the basis of their covenantal inheritance as sons of Abraham. Their very self-definition was tied to God's oath. This meant that it was tied to everything that had happened since then, for the events since the days of Abraham had confirmed the oath. It was a true oath because it had been fulfilled as promised. Moses reminded the conquest generation: the handful had become a multitude, as promised. The God of Israel could foresee the future because He decreed the future. The decree of God is sovereign over history. Faith in this principle would enable the conquest generation to fulfill the promise regarding the fourth generation. The inheritance was assured, Moses told them.

Why was he so sure? Because he understood the history of Israel from the days of Abram. He understood that continuity in history is covenantal. The continuity of history rests on God's covenant oath and His sanctions in history. These historical sanctions confirm the original oath and bring it to pass in history. This means that inheritance in history is covenantal. It rests on God's oath. But God's oath is tied to God's law. This is why men are required to obey God. The fear of God produces obedience to God's law. Obedience brings God's positive sanctions. Positive sanctions bring the inheritance.

D. Continuity and Conquest

Point five of the biblical covenant model is continuity. But this implies succession in history. The Book of Deuteronomy makes it plain that covenantal continuity involves inheritance. It is not merely that Israel persevered as a nation. Israel inherited the Promised Land. Israel's perseverance was not supposed to be merely biological; it was to be cultural and economic. Israel was to take possession of wells that others had dug and vineyards that others had planted. Israel was not to wander in circles in the wilderness. God's promise to Abram had been more than mere national survival; it had involved the promise of inheritance.

The promise had been numerical: from no sons at all to sons like the stars of heaven. That is, the fulfillment of the promise could be visibly measured in history. Obviously, that promise had been figurative. Moses knew from the numbering exactly how many people constituted Israel. The symbolic language of the measureless stars of heaven had pointed to a future census. The language of immeasurability had pointed to measurability, i.e., confirmation. The impossible would come true. Abraham's new name would in fact be confirmed in history. He was not merely to be the father of a handful; he was to become the father of nations. God asked him to believe this, which he did. Then it came true.

Covenantal continuity is the continuity of growth. It is not the continuity of mere survival; it is the continuity of conquest. It is not the continuity of life in the historical shadows; it is the continuity of dominion. It is not the continuity of mere confession; it is the continuity of kingdom extension. Whenever God's people refuse to acknowledge that the continuity promised to God's people in history is a continuity of conquest, dominion, and kingdom extension, they begin to act like the exodus generation. Their lack of faith produces timidity. Timidity produces half-hearted measures. The lack of success of half-hearted measures reinforces their lack of faith. They dwell in the wilderness and call it the Promised Land in history. They spiritualize the language of victory. They call a stalemate in the wilderness a triumph of the kingdom.

Moses was preparing them for conquest. He did this by telling them again and again to fear God. Why should they? Because God is the God of the oath. He is the God of oath-bound sanctions in history. These historical sanctions confirm His oath by bringing expansion and victory to His people. Moses was rallying the troops of the fourth generation by calling to their attention the history of God's dealings with earlier generations. He was calling them to military conquest in history; so, he reminded them of their demographic expansion in the past.

Moses told them to swear by God's name. This was a call to covenant renewal. They were to swear their oath to the God who had sworn an oath to Abram. The promises attached to that oath had been fulfilled. This oath-bound God "hath done for thee these great and terrible things, which thine eyes have seen." What they had seen was preliminary to what they would soon see: the defeat of Canaan. The defeat of Canaan had been part of the original oath (Gen. 15:16). There was no legitimate reason to hold back any longer. The inheritance was at hand.

Conclusion

Moses told them to fear God and swear allegiance to Him. He offered as evidence the fulfillment of the seemingly impossible promise to Abraham: the multiplication of his heirs. Israel had grown from seventy people to a multitude. Moses appealed to a positive corporate sanction—multiplication—as a justification of the requirement to fear God and swear allegiance to Him. Moses could also have mentioned the prophesied capitalization of Israel through the disinheritance of Egypt's firstborn, which was God's second promise to Abraham.

The third promise to Abraham, as yet unfulfilled, was Israel's inheritance of the land. This had been an eschatological inheritance for the exodus generation, just as Abraham's inheritance had been eschatological: multiplication of his heirs, their spoiling of the Egyptians, and the conquest of Canaan. The fulfillment of this third aspect of the inheritance was as sure as the first two had been. What had seemed impossible to Abram had already come true. Now the third stage of the inheritance was about to come true. Moses was arguing from the oath-bound covenant to the inheritance by way of historically fulfilled prophecy. The Abrahamic covenant's oath had invoked positive sanctions in history. These were sanctions of inheritance: heirs, capital, and land. Although Moses here mentioned only the multiplication of Abraham's seed, the other two sanctions were part of the original promise. The Israelites were therefore required to obey God's law (Deut. 11:1). Moses made it clear that all three aspects of the covenant are linked judicially: obedience to God's law, predictable oath-bound corporate sanctions in history, and corporate inheritance in history.

RAIN AND INHERITANCE

For the land, whither thou goest in to possess it, is not as the land of Egypt, from whence ye came out, where thou sowedst thy seed, and wateredst it with thy foot, as a garden of herbs: But the land, whither ye go to possess it, is a land of hills and valleys, and drinketh water of the rain of heaven: A land which the LORD thy God careth for: the eyes of the LORD thy God are always upon it, from the beginning of the year even unto the end of the year. And it shall come to pass, if ye shall hearken diligently unto my commandments which I command you this day, to love the LORD your God, and to serve him with all your heart and with all your soul, That I will give you the rain of your land in his due season, the first rain and the latter rain, that thou mayest gather in thy corn, and thy wine, and thine oil (Deut. 11:10–14).

The theocentric focus of this prophecy is God as the Caretaker of the land who is sovereign over the weather. The prophecy's goal was to encourage obedience: "And it shall come to pass, if ye shall hearken diligently unto my commandments which I command you this day. . . ."

A. Egypt vs. Canaan

While God's general administration over the earth is still a feature of His sovereignty, this prophecy was specific: specific boundaries, specific topography, and specific weather. This prophecy was not universal. It was tied to the land of Canaan. As we shall see, the New Covenant established a different principle for weather. It is no longer predictable in terms of national ethics.

The fulfillment of this prophecy would take place within the boundaries of the Promised Land: "Take heed to yourselves, that your heart be not deceived, and ye turn aside, and serve other gods, and worship them; And then the LORD'S wrath be kindled against you, and he shut up the heaven, that there be no rain, and that the land yield not her fruit; and lest ye perish quickly from off the good land which the LORD giveth you" (Deut. 11:16–17).

1. Rain vs. Nile

Canaan, Moses promised, would be very different from Egypt. One visible difference would be the source of water. The comparison was between watering with one's foot and watering from on high. What did it mean, "waterest with thy foot"? This probably referred to Egyptian irrigation. The Nile was the only source of water in Egypt. A series of man-made canals directed the water to various regions. Farmers tapped into the water supplied by these canals. A farm's irrigation system may have employed a series of small, foot-activated water wheels to direct the flow. This was W. M. Thompson's suggestion in 1880. He had seen nineteenth-century Egyptian peasants use such devices. Or the verse may have referred to the farmer's moving of dirt with his foot to plug one furrow in order to direct the water into another furrow.¹ In either case, irrigating by foot was a time-consuming, labor-intensive process. Much of the farmer's labor would have been devoted to directing the precious water into the seeded soil.

This would not be a farmer's main burden in the Promised Land. In Canaan, God would bring water from the sky. From the beginning of the year to the end, God's eyes would be upon this land (v. 12). This was a clear benefit compared with Egypt, where the survival of the nation depended on the brief period each year in which the Nile flooded. This was the only source of Egypt's water and therefore its prosperity. Not so in Canaan. Under God's direct authority, the rain and the sun would nourish the land to enable it to produce its wealth.

There was another important aspect of this blessing: the reduction of administrative bureaucracy. We know that whenever ancient societies depended heavily on national irrigation systems and sophisticated technologies of flood control, they became centralized bureaucracies that were controlled by those with the astronomical and technical information necessary to plan agriculture.² Wittfogel calls these centralized civilizations hydraulic economies. "Time keeping and calendar making are essential for the success of all hydraulic economies. . . ."³

1. W. M. Thompson, The Land and the Book, 3 vols. (New York: Harper & Bros., 1880), I, p. 22.

2. Karl A. Wittfogel, Oriental Despotism: A Comparative Study of Total Power (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1957).

3. Ibid., p. 29.

He classified Egypt as a hydraulic economy.

2. Calendars and Control

We know that ancient Egypt possessed a sophisticated astronomical calendar that charted the stars.⁴ One specialist in the ancient world's systems of measurement has reported that the Egyptians as early as the first dynasty had measured the geography of the Nile down to minutes of both longitude and latitude, from the equator to the Mediterranean Sea. This could not have been done, he argues, without highly advanced astronomical knowledge.⁵ Egypt was the classic model of an imperial bureaucracy.⁶ It is not far-fetched to connect Egypt's bureaucracy to Egypt's dependence on a single source of water.

The land of Canaan was a very different environment from Egypt. Its source of water was the heavens. There could be no centralized control of the water supply. There was no way to gain a special advantage through knowledge of the calendar combined with knowledge of the rise and fall of a single river. The knowledge of the seasons was available to any observant farmer. Knowledge of the timing of the rain would not become the monopoly of any priestly caste. This necessarily decentralized power in Israel.

As for the calendar, the priests had to share this knowledge with the people. The three annual journeys to Jerusalem had to be timed perfectly (Ex. 23:14–17). So did the day of atonement (Lev. 16:29–30). The nation had to be told in advance when these times were so that people could plan their journeys. The times of the year were to remain common knowledge in Israel. The firstfruits offering had to be made at Pentecost, 50 days after Passover (Ex. 34:22; Lev. 23: 15–17). The feast of Booths or Tabernacles was linked to the harvest (Lev. 23:39–43). The Israelites understood the agricultural calendar.

The specialized knowledge of the calendar was also a major factor in priestly control over the ancient classical world.⁷ Each city had a

4. Henri Frankfort, et al., The Intellectual Adventure of Ancient Man: An Essay on Speculative Thought in the Ancient Near East (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1946] 1977), p. 81.

5. Livio C. Stecchini, "Astronomical Theory and Historical Data," in The Velikovsky Affair: The Warfare of Science and Scientism, ed. Alfred de Grazia (New Hyde Park, New York: University Books, 1966), p. 167.

6. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 2.

7. Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Insti- different calendar because it had different gods and different festivals.⁸ In Greece, the Olympic games were a common festival, but different cities had different calendars.⁹ Not so in Israel. The festivals were not tribal. They were confined to one location, which later became Jerusalem. The tribes journeyed to that city. There was one God, one calendar, one series of national festivals.¹⁰

The sabbatical year of release (Deut. 15),¹¹ in which the reading of the law to the assembled nation would occur (Deut. 31:10–13),¹² had to be known to all men in Israel, including strangers. This would in turn provide knowledge of the timing of the jubilee year (Lev. 25). None of this was secret information. Knowledge of God's law and knowledge of the calendar were linked.

The tribes had possession of information regarding their boundaries. This decentralized another form of knowledge in Israel: geography. The four types of specialized knowledge by which Egyptian bureaucrats controlled the nation—astronomy, the calendar, flood cycles, and geography—were either possessed by all Israelites or were irrelevant to agriculture in Israel.

God controlled the water supply, Moses said. For as long as Israelites believed this, the priesthood could not plausibly assert power over the affairs of the nation based on their special meteorological knowledge. In fact, the opposite was true: the false religion of the priests of Ahab's reign was the cause of God's withholding of rain (I Kings 17:1). A prophet who opposed the official priesthood to the point of commanding their collective execution (I Kings 18:40) was the mediatorial source of water in Israel: an anti-bureaucratic figure if there ever was one.

B. Linear Time, Eschatological Time

Time for Israel was not cyclical; it was linear. It was linear because it was eschatological. Dozens of prophecies were tied to Israel's future. Jacob-Israel's prophecy regarding the coming of Shiloh was the main one: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from tutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955), III:VII:2, pp. 158–60.

8. Ibid., p. 160.

9. Idem.

10. Chapter 31.

11. Chapter 36.

12. Chapter 75.

between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be" (Gen. 49:10).

Astronomy in the ancient world produced a cyclical worldview. The priests' knowledge of the specific positioning of the heavens throughout the year was extremely sophisticated—far beyond that possessed by most educated people in modern times. The ancients knew about the wobbling of the earth's axis, although they explained this in terms of the wobbling of the heavens.¹³ They knew about the 26,000-year cycle of the pole stars. This "great year" led to a cyclical view of history.¹⁴

They did not know about the hydrologic cycle: bodies of water-evaporation-condensation-rain. They had a more direct view of rain-fall: the intervention of some deity. Moses called it "the rain of heaven." God views the land from heaven. He cares for the land. He sends the rain. The absence of rain should be seen as a covenantal curse: "Take heed to yourselves, that your heart be not deceived, and ye turn aside, and serve other gods, and worship them; And then the LORD'S wrath be kindled against you, and he shut up the heaven, that there be no rain, and that the land yield not her fruit; and lest ye perish quickly from off the good land which the LORD giveth you" (Deut. 11:16–17). This warning was fulfilled under Ahab (I Kings 17).

Thus, the cycle of rain was not to be understood as a cycle in the sense of providing a model for time. Israel's agricultural cycle would be cyclical: rain, sun, harvest, and planting, but always within the framework of the three annual feasts and festivals. These festivals were eschatological, always looking ahead toward the coming of the Messiah and His kingdom. The rain cycle was therefore covenantal. It would be governed by the nation's obedience or disobedience to God's law.

Here was a crucial distinction between Israel and all other ancient nations: nature was not seen as normative. Its processes were seen as dependent on the nation's covenantal faithfulness. The operations of nature in Israel were different from its operations outside the borders of the land. The Mosaic Covenant's land laws and seed laws were unique to Israel, for they were tied to the messianic prophecies, especially the prophecy regarding Shiloh.¹⁵ Inside Israel's borders, nature

13. Giorgio de Santillana and Hertha von Dechend, Hamlet's Mill: An essay on myth and the future of time (Boston: Godine, [1969] 1977).

14. Chapter 21:E

15. North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 33.

was an aspect of the special grace of the Mosaic Covenant (Deut. 11:13–15). Outside these borders, the common grace of the Adamic covenant applied: “. . . for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust” (Matt. 5:45b).¹⁶

Jacob had gone down into Egypt because the common curse of nature had impoverished him. God’s special grace had been shown to Egypt through Joseph’s ability to interpret Pharaoh’s dream. Egypt had grain for sale during the famine; Palestine did not. God did not spare Egypt from nature’s curse by interfering with nature’s processes. He spared Egypt by a special revelation in advance. God had a plan for the sons of Jacob. This plan was larger than the plans of the decision-makers. As Joseph said to his brothers, “But as for you, ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good, to bring to pass, as it is this day, to save much people alive” (Gen. 50:20).

Egypt’s salvation in a time of famine had been based on the Pharaoh’s power to tax one-fifth of the crops of Egypt (Gen. 41:34). He had the power to place Joseph in charge of the entire operation: “And he made him to ride in the second chariot which he had; and they cried before him, Bow the knee: and he made him ruler over all the land of Egypt” (Gen. 41:43). This power was derived from two sources: Egypt’s faith in the Pharaoh as a god and the priesthood’s knowledge of the cycles of the Nile. Joseph exempted the priesthood from his famine-driven purchase of the land of Egypt in the name of Pharaoh (Gen. 47:22). This indicates that the priests had been the allies of Pharaoh in maintaining Pharaoh’s power over the nation. The Mosaic law prohibited the exercise of such power by any king in Israel (Deut. 17:16–17).¹⁷ Israel’s covenant-governed hydrologic cycle reinforced this prohibition.

C. The Biblical Doctrine of Economic Growth

Because the Mosaic Covenant was eschatological, Israelites could legitimately expect long-term per capita economic growth in response to their faithfulness. The cyclical pattern of rain-sun-harvest would not become a restriction on Israel’s development. On the contrary, the covenantal basis of this cycle guaranteed compound growth in response to national covenantal faithfulness. The agricultural cycle was not dominant inside Israel's borders; covenant law, its sanctions, and linear time were.

16. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 10.

17. Chapter 41.

The Mosaic Covenant's positive sanction of growth—population and productivity—meant that the Israelites were not prisoners of nature. Nature is subordinate to God, and God ruled Israel by a covenant. The Israelites could gain control over nature through national obedience. In Egypt, the priests and perhaps other initiated specialists controlled the output of agriculture through their guild's knowledge of the calendar and the Nile's flood pattern. Salvation was by knowledge and power, not national obedience. In Israel, none of this was the case. The wealth of national Israel would be the product of ethics: the special grace of the Mosaic Covenant. Its positive economic sanctions were population growth and increased wealth per capita. The biblical model for economic growth was based on the existence of visible economic blessings as the means of covenantal confirmation. "But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day" (Deut. 8:18).¹⁸

A cyclical worldview denies the long-run possibility of such positive economic sanctions. So does the modern world's zero economic growth model.¹⁹ The ancients believed that a cycle of growth would always be undermined by a cycle of decay. The cosmic age of gold was followed by ages of debased metals.²⁰ This pattern of decay was dominant in the thinking of cyclical cosmologists. The great year would repeat its cycle, and social cycles must reflect this cosmic cycle.²¹

Moses denied the existence of any cosmic cycle when he told the people that rain would come in terms of the covenant. The Mosaic Covenant was eschatological. Its sanctions had to be interpreted in terms of linear eschatology, not the great year. There would be only one Messiah, not an endless series of them.

The Bible's primary theme is this: the transition from wrath to grace. There would not be another Adam to repeat the transgression of the first Adam. On the contrary, the Messiah would be a superior Adam, a second Adam whose fulfillment of the terms of the covenant

18. Chapter 21.

19. Gary North, Authority and Dominion, Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 55. The economist most closely associated with this worldview is E. J. Mishan.

20. Hesiod, Works and Days, lines 105–200.

21. Mircea Eliade, Cosmos and History: The Myth of the Eternal Return (New York: Harper Torchbooks, 1959).

would forever replace the Adamic covenant and its tests and sanctions. The New Heavens and the New Earth would replace the present cosmic order. Yet there must be eschatological continuity between history's New Heavens and the New Earth and eternity's.

For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people: and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying. There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed (Isa. 65:17–20).²²

This prophesied era cannot refer to eternity, for sinners will still be dwelling among the righteous. Death will still be present among the saints, which is not a feature of the redeemed and resurrected world of eternity. So, the prophesied millennial blessing of extended life expectancy is historical. No verse in Scripture more clearly refutes the amillennial system of interpretation.²³ This is why the amillennialist theologian Archibald Hughes, in his book, A New Heaven and New Earth (1958),²⁴ refuses comment on this passage. He writes as though this passage did not exist, despite the fact that his book invokes its language. He commented exclusively on the New Testament's passages where this phrase occurs. He knew exactly what he was doing. He refused to discuss the historical aspects of kingdom inheritance in a book devoted to the eternal inheritance. This is the heart of amillennialism: it asserts a radical discontinuity between New Covenant history and eternity.²⁵

The Mosaic Covenant's optimistic eschatological worldview made

22. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 15.

23. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), pp. 98–106, 213–14. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>) That this passage represents a crucial exegetical problem to amillennialism is recognized by David J. Engelsma, theologian of the Dutch-American Protestant Reformed Church. Engelsma, Christ's Spiritual Kingdom: A Defense of Reformed Amillennialism (Redlands, California: Reformed Witness, chaps. 15–17. He is responding to my challenge in Millennialism and Social Theory. On Engelsma's eschatology, see Appendix I, Section C:1.

24. Archibald Hughes, A New Heaven and a New Earth: An Introductory Study of the Coming of the Lord Jesus Christ and the Eternal Inheritance (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1958).

25. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, p. 123.

possible the hope of sustained positive sanctions: a permanent inheritance. The Bible affirms that this covenantal inheritance cannot be dispersed or destroyed in eternity. It will begin to manifest itself in history. Over and over, the Old Testament affirms this fact:

His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth (Ps. 25:13).

For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth (Ps. 37:9).

But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace (Ps. 37:11).

This inheritance is the kingdom of God. It is a kingdom visibly manifested by its dominion in history. Daniel told Nebuchadnezzar:

Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay, and brake them to pieces. Then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold, broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshingfloors; and the wind carried them away, that no place was found for them: and the stone that smote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth (Dan. 2:34–35).

And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever. Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it brake in pieces the iron, the brass, the clay, the silver, and the gold; the great God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter: and the dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure (Dan. 2:44–45).

Sustained economic growth is not only possible; it is normative. It remains an ethical obligation for every covenant-keeping society. This economic implication of the eschatology of the Mosaic Covenant was not annulled by the New Covenant. The fact that Shiloh came to fulfill the terms of the Mosaic Covenant did not annul its eschatology. On the contrary, Jesus Christ announced that His definitive fulfillment of the Mosaic Covenant in history must be progressively implemented in history by His followers (Matt. 28:18–20).²⁶ We call this the Great

26. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 48.

Commission. Commission is the correct word: this world-transforming task has been commissioned to us, and we are paid a very high commission: 90%. God contents Himself with a mere 10%: the tithe.²⁷ As any salesman will tell you, a 90% commission structure is a very great commission.

Conclusion

Moses told the Israelites that their inheritance in the Promised Land would be something unique: an agricultural cycle marked by covenantal sanctions, positive and negative. Their covenantal faithfulness would determine which category of sanctions they would experience. The covenant, not miracles, would soon become normative inside Israel's national boundaries.

The Mosaic Covenant's eschatological foundation would therefore govern the Mosaic economy in the broadest sense, Moses told them. Negative corporate sanctions would not become permanent; positive corporate sanctions could become permanent. Paganism's cyclical pessimism has no covenantal foundation, Moses implicitly was telling them. Covenant-keepers will inevitably inherit the earth in history. The kingdom of God is the universal kingdom in history because it is the universal kingdom in eternity. While the Old Covenant did not speak about eternity, it spoke very clearly about history. It taught that history is covenantal, not cyclical. Moses said that this fact would be seen by all Israel in the rain of heaven.

27. Gary North, The Covenantal Tithe (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2011).

LAW, SANCTIONS, AND INHERITANCE

Therefore shall ye lay up these my words in your heart and in your soul, and bind them for a sign upon your hand, that they may be as frontlets between your eyes. And ye shall teach them your children, speaking of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. And thou shalt write them upon the door posts of thine house, and upon thy gates: That your days may be multiplied, and the days of your children, in the land which the LORD sware unto your fathers to give them, as the days of heaven upon the earth (Deut. 11:18–21).

The theocentric focus of this law is the authority of the specially revealed law of God. The words are the law. This usage conforms to the use of the Hebrew word dabar (“word”) as “commandment” in Exodus 34:28: “And he was there with the LORD forty days and forty nights; he did neither eat bread, nor drink water. And he wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant, the ten commandments.” The association of the number “ten” with “commandments” occurs only with the word dabar.¹

A. Mastery of the Law

The laying up of God’s words in one’s heart and soul is described here as if the words were to be written on one’s hand or written down on pieces of paper and pasted to one’s forehead. The language here is allegorical. God’s words are not literally stored up in the blood-pumping organ we call the heart. They are, however, stored away in the obedient covenant-keeper’s soul. They are to guide his actions. These words must be reinforced throughout the day by personal obedience and by teaching the next generation by word and deed.

The context of this passage is God’s law (v. 20). Obeying the laws of God is to become a way of life for all men. The covenant-keeper is supposed to talk about the law from morning to night as he works beside his children. The law governs every aspect of our lives, and so we are to talk about it throughout the day. Our very conversations are to remind us of the comprehensive nature of God's law. Because God's law is comprehensive, our discussion of the law is to be comprehensive. Every covenant-keeper is to become an expert in the law of God. He is to think about it, discuss it, and explore its implications every day. Men are to discuss God's law daily because they are to honor it daily through obedience. Men are to use their own words to build ethical hedges around their lives. Their own words should serve as constant ethical reminders: guideposts. To argue that this law was exclusively a land law is to deny the previous sentences in this paragraph.

1. See also Deuteronomy 4:13, 10:4.

Yet there was a sense in which this command was a land law. The Ten Commandments were to be written down on the doorposts of every home. This was a literal requirement under the Mosaic economy. In the United States in the 1950s, families often placed a rubber doormat in front of the door that said, "welcome." Those who came in were first supposed to wipe off the dirt from the soles of their shoes by standing on the doormat and rubbing their shoes on it. Symbolically, the Israelites were to wipe off their evil behavior from their souls when they entered a home.

In modern times, Orthodox Jews seek to obey this law in a literal fashion. They place a tiny scroll of the Ten Commandments inside a small storage device called a mezuzah, which is then affixed to the front door of the home or business. The problem with their interpretation of this law is that the scroll inside a mezuzah can't be seen. The device can easily become a kind of talisman. I have seen a Jew kiss his fingers and then touch the mezuzah on leaving his business. This is thought to be a way to show respect, but the problem is that the stipulations of the law itself are not visible. This makes the mezuzah analogous to the Ark of the Covenant, where the tables of the law were stored. The idea of having the Decalogue written on the doorposts was that it could be read by all literate people who passed through the door. The same was true of all gateways. This included the gates of the city, where the judges met to decide cases. This law required that the Ten Commandments be written on the equivalent of the wall of a civil court.

Is this law still in force? The New Covenant indicates that there has been a definitive shift from external writing to internal writing. The Epistle to the Hebrews twice asserts that the New Covenant has fulfilled the prophecy of Jeremiah 33:31–33: “For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people” (Heb. 8:10). “This is the covenant that I will make with them after those days, saith the Lord, I will put my laws into their hearts, and in their minds will I write them” (Heb. 10:16). I regard this as analogous to the circumcision of the heart, which is the fulfillment of the requirement of the circumcision of the flesh. “But he is a Jew, which is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God” (Rom. 2:29). The circumcision of the heart annulled the Old Covenant’s requirement of the circumcision of the flesh. Similarly, embedding the law of God into the heart in the New Covenant annulled the law requiring the Israelites to write the Ten Commandments on their doorposts and gates. It is not that the Israelites were not also required to place the law in their hearts. They were, as this Deuteronomic passage indicates. But this external requirement is no longer judicially binding on covenant-keepers under the New Covenant. The replacement of circumcision with baptism is the reason. Covenantal circumcision is now exclusively inward and judicial. So is the requirement of covenantal law-posting.

B. Enjoying the Inheritance

There is a positive sanction attached to the law governing judicial instruction: “That your days may be multiplied, and the days of your children, in the land which the LORD sware unto your fathers to give them, as the days of heaven upon the earth” (Deut. 11:21). Long life in the land is a universally desirable gift from God. Nobody appeared a second time before any king in the ancient world with the greeting: “O, King, live briefly.” He said, “O, King, live forever.”²

The promise of long life connects law and sanctions judicially. In this case, the connection is stated positively: teach your children God’s law, and both you and they will enjoy long life. This is an extension of the fifth commandment: “Honour thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee” (Ex. 20:12).³ Paul wrote: “Children, obey your parents in the Lord: for this is right. Honour thy father and mother; (which is the first commandment with promise;) That it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long on the earth" (Eph. 6:1–3). There should be no question that Paul regarded the judicial link between obedience to parents and long life on earth as a New Covenant phenomenon. This means that the fifth commandment was not a land law whose visible corporate sanction was tied exclusively to the Mosaic economy in Israel. The positive sanction of long life for obedience to parents has not been annulled by the transition from the Old Covenant to the New Covenant. This implies that the positive sanction of long life for teaching one's children about God's law has also not been annulled. What has been annulled is the circumscribed geographical focus of the public reign of the original laws: the land of Israel. Covenant-keepers are no longer promised that they will live long in the land of Israel in peace and prosperity, handing down the inheritance. Paul made it clear: the promise now applies to the whole earth. The New Covenant rests on the Great Commission. The predictable sanctions of God's law now apply everywhere that the gospel is preached and the covenant is affirmed corporately. This is what it means to disciple the nations. They are brought under the discipline—the sanctions—of God's covenant.

2. I Kings 1:31; Nehemiah 2:3; Daniel 2:4; 3:9; 5:10; 6:6, 21.

3. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 25.

This is extremely significant for the development of Christian social theory. The covenantal link between God's Bible-revealed law and His predictable corporate sanctions in history has not been broken by the advent of the New Covenant. In the case of Deuteronomy 11:21, the connection was rigorously covenantal: (1) God has given His people the land (transcendence); (2) parents teach children (hierarchy); (3) God's law is put into the heart (ethics); (4) Israelites can live long in the land sworn by God to the fathers (oath); (5) their children can also live long in the land (succession).

C. Inheritance and Disinheritance

The land would be someone's inheritance, either Israel's or the Canaanites'. The alternative was for the land to return to the beasts, which God would not allow (Ex. 23:29). Mankind, not the beasts, is to exercise dominion over nature (Gen. 1:26;⁴ 9:1–3⁵). The conservationist rhetoric about the sacred wilderness rests on bad theology. For Israel to inherit, the Canaanites would have to be disinherited. This is the model for eschatology: the expansion of God's kingdom in history must come at the expense of Satan's kingdom. To argue otherwise is to argue that Satan's visible kingdom must expand at the expense of God's, which is exactly what amillennialists argue, and dispensational premillennialists also argue regarding the "Church Age."

4. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 3.

5. Ibid., ch. 18.

1. Confidence and Fear

At the final judgment, Satan and his covenantal subordinates will be totally disinherited (Rev. 20:10). Covenant-keepers will then openly inherit the whole earth, and both it and they will be relieved of the burden of sin and its curses (Rev. 21).⁶ The conquest of Canaan was a type of the final judgment. What would be the basis of Israel's inheritance? Judicially, it would be obedience: the covenantally representative obedience of the coming Messiah (Isa. 53). But obedience was not the whole story; it never is. Sanctions are attached to God's law. The sanctions in this case would be confidence (positive) and fear (negative).

For if ye shall diligently keep all these commandments which I command you, to do them, to love the LORD your God, to walk in all his ways, and to cleave unto him; Then will the LORD drive out all these nations from before you, and ye shall possess greater nations and mightier than yourselves. Every place whereon the soles of your feet shall tread shall be yours: from the wilderness and Lebanon, from the river, the river Euphrates, even unto the uttermost sea shall your coast be. There shall no man be able to stand before you: for the LORD your God shall lay the fear of you and the dread of you upon all the land that ye shall tread upon, as he hath said unto you (Deut. 11:22–25).

The Israelites were supposed to have confidence in God as totally sovereign over history. Next, they were supposed to trust Moses' words as representing God. Third, they were supposed to trust God's law. Fourth, they were supposed to trust God's prophecy of the fear which He would place in the hearts of the Canaanites. Obedience to God's law was the key. Their obedience would prove their faith in God and Moses' words in God's name. If they obeyed God's law, they would inevitably inherit the Promised Land.

6. This final conquest over sin is denied by the heretical position known by its defenders as "full preterism." This is the preterism presented in the obscure nineteenth-century book, The Parousia, by J. Stuart Russell. For my critique of Russell, see Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012). Appendix.

2. Ethics

The crucial theological point here is that inheritance is fundamentally ethical. Obedience to God's law is the inescapable component of inheritance. Faith in God is important, but faith without works is dead faith (James 2:17–20). It does not count. It is analogous to someone who believes that the stock market will rise, but who then refuses to invest his money in terms of what he believes. He refuses to "put his money where his mouth is." He does not participate in the rise. His accurate forecast haunts him after it turns out to be true. This, too, is a model for eschatology. "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal: For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also" (Matt. 6:19–21).⁷ The person who views the inheritance as ultimately eschatological must see to it that he structures his life in terms of the covenantal stipulations governing this inheritance. "For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul? (Matt. 16:26).⁸

The Israelites would not be allowed to claim this victory without risk, nor would they possess it overnight. "I will not drive them out from before thee in one year; lest the land become desolate, and the beast of the field multiply against thee. By little and little I will drive them out from before thee, until thou be increased, and inherit the land" (Ex. 23:29–30). (There is nothing sacred about wilderness areas. They are merely as-yet undomesticated regions, like the garden of Eden prior to Adam.) The promise to Abraham regarding the fourth generation's inheritance of the land was God's definitive eschatological announcement regarding the conquest (Gen. 15:16). The military conquest of Canaan would be the progressive fulfillment of this prophecy. The eventual displacement of the Canaanites would be the final aspect of this prophecy. To achieve this, the Israelites had to trust God's promises.

7. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 13.

8. Ibid., ch. 35.

3. Eschatology

This is the model for biblical eschatology. The inheritance of the earth in history by God's covenant people is definitive, for Jesus Christ is the only lawful heir. Jesus has transferred this inheritance to His church (Matt. 28:18).⁹ This was the fulfillment of what He had told the Jews: "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43). The process of inheritance in history is ethical: ever-increasing obedience to God's law, which is followed by ever-increasing positive economic sanctions that confirm the covenant. "But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day" (Deut. 8:18).¹⁰ Covenant-keepers are required to redeem the world for God, i.e., buy it back. They are not to use military conquest or force; that was a one-time event for Israel. They must buy it back by preaching the gospel, obeying God's law, and faithfully employing the wealth that God pours down on them because of their obedience. Covenant-keepers will inherit the earth progressively through their obedience to God's law, their confidence in the transforming power of the gospel, their ability to meet customer demand efficiently, their biological multiplication, their tithing to the church, and their charitable service. "He that is faithful in that which is least is faithful also in much: and he that is unjust in the least is unjust also in much" (Luke 16:10).¹¹

If there were no predictable corporate sanctions attached to God's Bible-revealed law, we could have no legitimate confidence in the future success of the kingdom of God in history. Our eschatological hopes would be exclusively post-mortem. But the Bible teaches that whatever takes place on earth is a down payment—an earnest—for what will take place beyond the final judgment. History points to eternity; earth points to heaven. Jesus warned Nicodemus: "If I have told you earthly things, and ye believe not, how shall ye believe, if I tell you of heavenly things?" (John 3:12). At the final judgment, covenant-keepers will inherit the earth; covenant-breakers will be completely disin-herited (Matt. 25:31–46). But final judgment is preceded by progressive judgment in history. What takes place in history mirrors the final inheritance and disinheritance, so as to provide a covenantal warning in history. There must be sufficient continuity between history and eternity to provide covenant-keepers with legitimate confidence and to provide covenant-breakers with legitimate fear. The mandated conquest of Canaan is the model for history, which in turn is the model for eternity. The failure of the Israelites to complete the conquest is not the model, for Christ's resurrection and ascension have taken place in history: the empowerment of His people.

9. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

10. Chapter 21.

11. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 38.

D. Teaching One's Children

The proper method of writing the law on the heart is by instruction. Parents are to instruct their children in the details of God's Bible-revealed law throughout the day. This is good for the children and better for the parent. The parent cannot in good faith utter that famous disclaimer, "Do as I say, not as I do."¹² The law of God requires obedience. There is no legitimate escape from the stipulations of biblical law. We are to keep the whole of biblical law in our mandated quest for perfection.¹³ The child should be able to see consistency between what the parent says and does.

The children are to internalize biblical law—write it in their hearts—through hearing it and seeing their parents applying it daily by obeying it. They are to mimic their parents, and in doing so, they reinforce the law of God, which is already written on their hearts through the grace of conversion. They are to achieve progressively what regeneration has already done for them definitively. The progressive transition from wrath to grace involves God's preparation of the heart for the law. At the time of redemption, God creates a special place in a covenant-keeping man's conscience that is designed to house God's law. Then the covenant-keeper is supposed to work all of his life to fill up this designated area of his conscience with practical knowledge of the law. As he increases his understanding of how the laws are to be applied in specific cases, he becomes a mature Christian.

12. "Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ" (I Cor. 11:1).

13. "And when Abram was ninety years old and nine, the LORD appeared to Abram, and said unto him, I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect" (Gen. 17:1). "Thou shalt be perfect with the LORD thy God" (Deut. 18:13). "He is the Rock, his work is perfect: for all his ways are judgment: a God of truth and without iniquity, just and right is he" (Deut. 32:4). "Let your heart therefore be perfect with the LORD our God, to walk in his statutes, and to keep his commandments, as at this day (I Kings 8:61). "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect" (Matt. 5:48).

Successful teachers tell us that the very process of teaching increases the teacher's understanding of the material taught. The process reinforces what the teacher knows, imbedding it in his mind. If he does not teach it, the material fades from his thinking. Like notes taken in college and never reviewed or taught, yet never thrown away, the note-taker's memory of them fades. James wrote: "But be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves. For if any be a hearer of the word, and not a doer, he is like unto a man beholding his natural face in a glass [mirror]: For he beholdeth himself, and goeth his way, and straightway forgetteth what manner of man he was. But whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed" (James 1:22–25). Moses warned Israel not to permit the forgetfulness born of inaction. The mental notes taken in childhood must be reviewed and renewed throughout life. The very act of imparting this knowledge to children throughout the normal events of the day is a means of retaining the law and writing it in one's heart.

The Calvinist philosopher Cornelius Van Til described his early years growing up on a Dutch farm in the late nineteenth century:

Ours was not in any sense a pietistic family. There were not any great emotional outbursts on any occasion that I recall. There was much ado about making hay in the summer and about caring for the cows and sheep in the winter, but round about it all there was a deep conditioning atmosphere. Though there were no tropical showers of revivals, the relative humidity was always very high. At every meal the whole family was present. There was a closing as well as an opening prayer, and a chapter of the Bible was read each time. The Bible was read through from Genesis to Revelation. At breakfast or at dinner, as the case might be, we would hear of the New Testament, or of 'the children of Gad after their families, of Zephon and Haggi and Shuni and Ozni, of Eri and Areli.' I do not claim that I always fully understood the meaning of it all. Yet of the total effect there can be no doubt. The Bible became for me, in all its parts, in every syllable, the very Word of God. I learned that I must believe the Scripture story, and that 'faith' was a gift of God. What had happened in the past, and particularly what had happened in the past in Palestine, was of the greatest moment to me.¹⁴

14. Cornelius Van Til, Why I Believe in God (Philadelphia: Committee on Christi-

His parents understood the need of presenting the Bible to their children day by day. The children learned that the Bible was very important to their parents. It therefore became important for the children. Years later, Van Til would tell his students at Westminster Seminary that his father used to teach him and his brother as the three of them worked in the fields on their hands and knees. His brother's son Henry later followed in his uncle's footsteps to become a professor and author.¹⁵ Henry's son also became a professor and an author.¹⁶ This inheritance began in the fields, with a father teaching his sons the Bible and the catechism. The father was planting more than physical seeds as they worked.

E. The Christian School

The day came when Van Til's parents sent him to a Christian school. He remembered his vaccination decades later. "I can still feel it."¹⁷ The school was itself a form of vaccination: a vaccination against covenant-breaking. The school was an extension of his family. His parents had vowed at his baptism to instruct him in God's ways. "It was in pursuance of this vow that they sent me to a Christian grade school."¹⁸ The school taught a curriculum from the point of view of his Dutch Calvinist parents. "In short, the whole wide world that gradually opened up for me through my schooling was regarded as operating in its every aspect under the direction of the all-powerful God whose child I was through Christ. I was to learn to think God's thoughts after him in every field of endeavor."¹⁹

Sending children to a Christian school was common to conservative Dutch households in his day, and remains so. The Christian school has kept the Dutch community together in the United States, and it has kept Dutch Calvinists together in the secular, covenant-breaking Netherlands. The Christian school provides specialized education that parents are not always capable of providing. The school is based on the biblical principle of the division of labor: "Now ye are the body of an Education, Orthodox Presbyterian Church, n.d.), pp. 5–6.

15. Henry R. Van Til, The Calvinistic Concept of Culture (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1959).

16. L. John Van Til, Liberty of Conscience: The History of a Puritan Idea (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1972).

17. Van Til, Why I Believe in God, p. 6.

18. Ibid., p. 7.

19. Idem.

Christ, and members in particular. And God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues" (I Cor. 12:27–28).²⁰

The school provides specialized instruction. This instruction replaces the father's time in the fields or wherever he works. With the vast increase in the division of labor since the Industrial Revolution of the late eighteenth century, a father is less and less able to pass his skills to his sons. He works away from home, and his skills rarely match his sons' abilities or interests. They learn their morality from him, but not their occupations.

In the eighteenth century and earlier, wealthy families hired tutors for their own children. The wealthy in England have for two centuries sent their sons to boarding schools in order to separate them from their families. This is also done by the wealthiest old families in the United States.²¹ Separating young sons from their families is a rite of passage into the elite of both societies. This transfers influence to the elite prep schools and then a handful of elite universities. The less wealthy have had to settle for a classroom setting: more students per instructor and therefore a lower cost per family.

Education today is overwhelmingly formalized. From age five through graduate school (age 30?), the student is educated in the classroom. Formal education is tied to the printed word. Apprenticeship one-on-one with a master craftsman has been replaced by classroom bureaucracy and written examinations. People who are skilled at taking written examinations, but unskilled in making a living in a competitive market, teach children about how to make a living in a competitive market or, more likely, how to be successful in bureaucratic careers. The teachers in both systems reproduce themselves: craftsmen (few) or bureaucrats (many).

The modern state seeks to steal the legacy of the faithful: the hearts and minds of their children. The educational bureaucrats today have imposed a massive system of ideological kidnapping on the voters. This is the inherent nature of all compulsory education, regulated education, and tax-funded education. Education is not neutral. The bureaucrats have built a gigantic system of humanist indoctrina-

20. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 15.

21. Nelson Aldrich, Jr., Old Money: The Mythology of America's Upper Class (New York: Knopf, 1988), pp. 144–58.

tion with funds extracted from all local residents in the name of a hypothetical, religiously common-ground education. This justification has always been a covenant-breaking lie, from Unitarian Horace Mann's public schools in Massachusetts in the 1830s until today.²² From the late nineteenth century until today, leading American educators have been forthright in their public pronouncements of their agenda. This agenda is deeply religious. John Dewey, the "father" of progressive education, dedicated humanist, and philosopher stated his position plainly: "Our schools, in bringing together those of different nationalities, languages, traditions, and creeds, in assimilating them together upon the basis of what is common and public in endeavor and achievement, are performing an infinitely significant religious work."²³ More than this: "In such a dim, blind, but effective way the American people is conscious that its schools serve best the cause of religion in serving the cause of social unification. . . ."²⁴

Conclusion

Moses gave Israel a command and a promise: law and sanctions. He told them to mark their dwelling places by the law of God. He told them to teach their children the law. In doing this, they would hide the law in their hearts (Ps. 119:11). If they did this, Moses said, they would be visibly blessed with large families. They would enjoy "the days of heaven upon the earth" (Deut. 11:21).

The covenantal link between obedience and visible sanctions was basic to this passage. The inheritance was defined in terms of heirs and their possession of land. Paul wrote that the same link still operates under the New Covenant (Eph. 6:1–3). There is no way covenantally to break the link uniting law-keeping, positive sanctions, and inheritance, any more than there is a way to break the link uniting law-breaking, disobedience, and disinheritance. These links make possible the development of biblical social theory. Being possible, the development of an explicitly biblical social theory is a covenantal mandate, part of the dominion covenant itself.

22. R. J. Rushdoony, The Messianic Character of American Education: Studies in the History of the Philosophy of Education (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1963).

23. John Dewey, "Religion and Our Schools," Hibbert Journal (July 1908); reprinted in Education Today, edited by Joseph Ratner (New York: Putnam's, 1940), p. 80. This document is reprinted photographically in David Noebel, et al., Clergy in the Classroom: The Religion of Secular Humanism (Manitou Springs, Colorado: Summit Press, 1995), p. 19. Many other statements like Dewey's appear in this highly revealing book.

24. Ibid., pp. 80–81; in Noebel, ibid., pp. 19–20.

Because Christian theologians for nineteen centuries have ignored or even denied the existence of these judicial links in the New Covenant era, the church has not been able to develop an explicitly biblical social theory. The result is today's Babylonian captivity of the church. Like the Hebrews during the original Babylonian captivity, most Christians prefer ghetto life outside the Promised Land to the rigors of a life of rebuilding the nation's broken wall and the crumbling homes of their forefathers. Only a remnant has decided to return. This remnant has yet to build up the high walls of Jerusalem. Its members are laying the marker stones, however. This work is necessary before the serious work of reconstruction begins.

One of the reasons why the idea of the God-mandated task of Christian reconstruction suffered a three-century hiatus, from the late seventeenth century to the late twentieth century, was the almost universal hostility of the church to the suggestion that the Bible-revealed laws of God are part of an integrated system that is still binding on society. Christians generally give lip service to the Ten Commandments (Ex. 20), yet they ignore the Decalogue's unity with the case laws that followed (Ex. 21–23).²⁵ Few modern Christian scholars have understood that the case laws of Exodus were applications of the judicial principles set forth in the Decalogue. Rushdoony did, and his Institutes of Biblical Law (1973) marked the awakening from the slumber that had overtaken Christian moral theorists since 1673: the publication of Richard Baxter's A Christian Directory. The demise of Protestant casuistry by 1700 left Protestants without revelational guidelines for civic morality. The case-law specifics that illustrate the Ten Commandments faded from most Protestants' memories.

The rise of biblical higher criticism in mid-seventeenth England came as a response to the Puritans' affirmation of biblical law as a guide for society, including civil government. Critics of the authority of the Old Testament argued that the Old Testament is a literary work, not a valid source of universally binding judicial standards.²⁶ This intellectual development paralleled and encouraged the rise of the Enlightenment, which sought to sever both natural science and social theory from biblical judicial standards.

25. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990).

26. Henning Graf Reventlow, The Authority of the Bible and the Rise of the Modern World (London: SCM Press, [1980] 1984; Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1985).

The attitude of the higher critics toward the Mosaic law had been in the church from the early centuries. In this sense, Anglo-American Puritanism represented a break with church history. The higher critics provided a new justification for the long hostility of Christians toward the Mosaic law: the unreliability of the texts of the Old Testament rather than the annulment of the Mosaic law by the New Testament. This explanation was not welcomed by Anglo-American mainline churches until after 1874, when Old Testament higher criticism was imported from Germany and promoted by university scholars. Yet the critics' hostile attitude toward biblical law had prevailed in Anglo-American churches for almost two centuries by 1875. The Enlightenment's humanists had made common cause with the church's moral theologians in affirming natural law and natural reason as the sources of valid standards for science and social theory. This informal operational alliance still exists, despite the almost universal collapse of faith in natural law theory among humanists as a result of Darwinism's attack on any concept of permanently binding laws in a world of changing environments and evolving species.²⁷

Critics of biblical law have recognized that biblical law is an integrated system. First, biblical law relies on the presupposition that God rules over the universe: theocracy ("God rules"). Second, there are parallel hierarchical systems of law-enforcement in church, state, and family. Christians generally accept the principle of theonomy with respect to churches and families, but they reject it with respect to civil government. This rejection has been basic to the humanist-pietist alliance, which is now breaking down because humanists are systematically using the state to encroach on the Christian family and the church in the name of common-ground principles of morality and law that have precedence over biblical family law and biblical church law. Third, biblical law is revelational, which implies that non-biblical law-orders are invalid in God's eyes. This challenges natural law theory and all forms of political pluralism. This is an affront to the Enlightenment, whose principles most Christians have adopted with respect to civil government. Fourth, biblical law and biblical sanctions are a unity. This means that there really is hell, which is the Enlightenment's most hated concept. The unbreakable unity of God's law and God's sanctions also implies that civil governments should impose the Bible's mandated civil sanctions. This suggestion is an affront to all humanists. Such a view of civil law points to the final judgment and therefore God's sovereignty over man: a down payment (earnest) in history of eternity. Biblical civil sanctions are therefore rejected by all humanists and most Christians, who have adopted Enlightenment social and political theories in the name of a socially responsible Christianity. Fifth, God's sanctions in history produce predictable winners (covenant-keepers) and losers (covenant-breakers) in history. This in turn points to the triumph of Christendom in history. In short, such a system of sanctions-based social and cultural inheritance is inherently postmillennial. Eschatologically, this suggestion is unacceptable to pessimillennial Christians, whose name is legion.

27. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, Appendix A.

The result is the Babylonian captivity of the church. Unlike the original Babylonian captivity, captives today rejoice in their chains. They call this system of officially neutral political pluralism freedom. They seem genuinely surprised when their humanistic captors continually shorten the chains and tighten the bands.

End of Volume 1

INHERITANCE AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON DEUTERONOMY

VOLUME 2

Other Books by Gary North

- An Economic Commentary on the Bible*, 31 vols. (2012)
Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)
An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)
Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)
Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)
Government by Emergency (1983)
Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)
75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)
Coined Freedom (1984)
Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)
Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)
Honest Money (1986)
Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)
Dominion and Common Grace (1987)
Inherit the Earth (1987)
Liberating Planet Earth (1987)
Healer of the Nations (1987)
The Pirate Economy (1987)
Is the World Running Down? (1988)
When Justice Is Aborted (1989)
Political Polytheism (1989)
The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)
Victim's Rights (1990)
Westminster's Confession (1991)
Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar
The Coase Theorem (1992)
Salvation Through Inflation (1993)
Rapture Fever (1993)
Tithing and the Church (1994)
Crossed Fingers (1996)
The Covenantal Tithe (2011)

INHERITANCE AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON DEUTERONOMY

VOLUME 2

GARY NORTH

Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy
Volume 2

Copyright © Gary North 1999, 2012
Second Edition

Published by:
Point Five Press
P.O. Box 2778
Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Volume 1

| | |
|--|------|
| Foreword | xi |
| Preface | xxxi |
| Introduction | 1 |
| Part I: Transcendence/Presence (1:1–5) | |
| 1. The God Who Brings Judgment in History (Deut. 1:1–5) . | 17 |
| Part II: Hierarchy/Representation (1:6–4:49) | |
| 2. A Delayed Inheritance (Deut 1:6–8) | 23 |
| 3. Delegated Authority and Social Order (Deut. 1:9–13) | 36 |
| 4. The Face of Man (Deut. 1:17) | 44 |
| 5. Bureaucratic Counsel (Deut. 1:21–23) | 52 |
| 6. The Skills of Foreign Trade (Deut. 2:4–6) | 63 |
| 7. Transferring the Inheritance (Deut. 3:27–28) | 71 |
| 8. Evangelism Through Law (Deut. 4:5–8) | 78 |
| 9. Hear, Fear, and Testify (Deut. 4:9–10) | 84 |
| 10. Removing the Inheritance (Deut. 4:25–28) | 96 |
| Part III: Ethics/Law/Boundaries (5–26) | |
| 11. Judicial Continuity (Deut. 5:1–5) | 108 |
| 12. Sabbath and Liberation (Deut. 5:14–15) | 116 |
| 13. Law and Sanctions (Deut. 5:32–33) | 125 |
| 14. The Wealth of Nations (Deut. 6:1–3) | 133 |
| 15. Law and Inheritance (Deut. 6:4–9) | 145 |
| 16. Genocide and Inheritance (Deut. 7:1–5) | 161 |
| 17. By Law or By Promise? (Deut. 8:1) | 182 |
| 18. Miracles, Entropy, and Social Theory (Deut. 8:2–4) | 191 |
| 19. Chastening and Inheritance (Deut. 8:5–7) | 209 |
| 20. Overcoming Poverty (Deut. 8:9) | 215 |
| 21. The Assertion of Autonomy (Deut. 8:10–17) | 223 |
| 22. Economic Growth (Deut. 8:18) | 228 |
| 23. Disinheriting the Heirs (Deut. 8:19–20) | 251 |

| | |
|--|-----|
| 24. Overcoming the Visible Odds (Deut. 9:1–6) | 263 |
| 25. Sonship, Servitude, and Inheritance (Deut. 9:26–29) | 283 |
| 26. Sonship, Obedience, and Immigration (Deut. 10:12–16) | 291 |
| 27. Oath, Sanctions, and Inheritance (Deut. 10:20–22) | 306 |
| 28. Rain and Inheritance (Deut. 11:10–14) | 313 |
| 29. Law, Sanctions, and Inheritance (Deut. 11:18–21) | 323 |

Volume 2

| | |
|---|-----|
| 30. Common Grace (Deut. 12:1–3) | 339 |
| 31. Communal Meals (Deut. 12:5–10) | 358 |
| 32. The Murderous Gods of Canaan (Deut. 12:28–31) | 369 |
| 33. The Lure of Magic (Deut. 13:1–5) | 376 |
| 34. Commerce and Covenant (Deut. 14:21) | 395 |
| 35. Tithes of Celebration (Deut. 14:22–29) | 407 |
| 36. The Charitable Loan (Deut. 15:1–5) | 429 |
| 37. Lending and Dominion (Deut. 15:6) | 445 |
| 38. Consuming Capital in Good Faith (Deut. 15:19–22) | 453 |
| 39. Individual Blessing (Deut. 16:14–17) | 461 |
| 40. Casuistry and Inheritance (Deut. 16:18–20) | 468 |
| 41. Israel's Supreme Court (Deut. 17:8–13) | 483 |
| 42. Boundaries on Kingship (Deut. 17:14) | 500 |
| 43. Levitical Inheritance Through Separation (Deut. 18:1–2) | 517 |
| 44. Landmarks and Social Cooperation (Deut. 19:14) | 526 |
| 45. The Penalty for Perjury (Deut. 19:15–19) | 536 |
| 46. A Hierarchy of Commitments (Deut. 20:5–7) | 551 |
| 47. A Few Good Men (Deut. 20:8) | 559 |
| 48. Limits against Empire (Deut. 20:10–18) | 567 |
| 49. Fruit Trees as Covenantal Testimonies (Deut. 20:19–20) | 584 |
| 50. Double Portion, Double Burden (Deut. 21:15–17) | 594 |
| 51. Executing a Rebellious Adult Son (Deut. 21:18–21) | 608 |
| 52. Lost and Found (Deut. 22:1–4) | 629 |
| 53. Nature's Roots and Fruits (Deut. 22:6–7) | 643 |
| 54. The Rooftop Railing Law (Deut. 22:8) | 649 |
| 55. Laws Prohibiting Mixtures (Deut. 22:9–11) | 659 |
| 56. The Fugitive Slave Law (Deut. 23:15–16) | 670 |
| 57. Usury: Yes and No (Deut. 23:19–20) | 679 |
| 58. Vows, Contracts, and Productivity (Deut. 23:21–23) | 692 |
| 59. Free for the Picking (Deut. 23:24–25) | 704 |

Volume 3

| | |
|---|-----|
| 60. Collateral, Servitude, and Dignity (Deut. 24:6) | 727 |
| 61. Wages and Oppression (Deut. 24:14–15) | 744 |
| 62. Gleaning: Charitable Efficiency (Deut. 24:19–22) | 766 |
| 63. Unmuzzling the Working Ox (Deut. 25:4) | 782 |
| 64. Levirate Marriage and Family Name (Deut. 25:5–6) | 796 |
| 65. Just Weights and Justice (Deut. 25:13–16) | 812 |
| 66. The Firstfruits Offering (Deut. 26:1–3) | 844 |
| 67. Positive Confession (Deut. 26:12–15) | 850 |
| Part IV: Oath/Sanctions (27–30) | |
| 68. Landmark and Curse (Deut. 27:17) | 857 |
| 69. Objective Wealth and historical Progress (Deut. 28:4–5) . . | 865 |
| 70. Credit as a Tool of Dominion (Deut. 28:12–13, 43–44) . . | 884 |
| 71. The Covenant of Prosperity (Deut. 29:9–15) | 896 |
| 72. Captivity and Restoration (Deut. 30:1–5) | 901 |
| 73. Life and Dominion (Deut. 30:19–20) | 908 |
| Part V: Succession/Inheritance (31–33) | |
| 74. Courage and Dominion (Deut. 31:4–8) | 914 |
| 75. Law and Liberty (Deut. 31:9–13) | 921 |
| 76. A Covenantal Song (Deut. 31:16–18) | 930 |
| Conclusion | 933 |

Volume 4

| | |
|---|------|
| APPENDIX A—Modern Economics as a Form of Magic | 983 |
| APPENDIX B—Individualism, Holism, and Covenantalism | 971 |
| APPENDIX C—Syncretism, Pluralism, and Empire | 984 |
| APPENDIX D—The Demographics of American Judaism | 998 |
| APPENDIX E—Free Market Capitalism | 1017 |
| APPENDIX F—The Economic Re-education of Ronald J. Sider . . | 1052 |
| APPENDIX G—Strong Drink | 1068 |
| APPENDIX H—Weak Reed: The Politics of Compromise | 1075 |
| APPENDIX I—Eschatology, Law, and Pietism | 1084 |
| APPENDIX J—Categories of the Mosaic Law | 1111 |

COMMON GRACE AND LEGITIMATE INHERITANCE

These are the statutes and judgments, which ye shall observe to do in the land, which the LORD God of thy fathers giveth thee to possess it, all the days that ye live upon the earth. Ye shall utterly destroy all the places, wherein the nations which ye shall possess served their gods, upon the high mountains, and upon the hills, and under every green tree: And ye shall over throw their altars, and break their pillars, and burn their groves with fire; and ye shall hew down the graven images of their gods, and destroy the names of them out of that place (Deut. 12:1–3).

The theocentric focus of this law is the illegitimacy of all other forms of worship. The passage is preceded by a call to obedience: “And ye shall observe to do all the statutes and judgments which I set before you this day” (Deut. 11:32).

A. Illegitimate Gods

In the case of the gods of Canaan, illegitimacy meant illegality. To destroy the name of every god of Canaan was a morally mandatory act on the part of the Israelites. There was no neutrality possible. There also was no possibility of a nameless God in Israel. Either God’s name would be destroyed inside the boundaries of Israel or else the Canaanite gods’ names would be destroyed. God made it clear: their idols had to be smashed. As with their idols, so with their names: total elimination. “. . . make no mention of the name of other gods, neither let it be heard out of thy mouth” (Ex. 23:13b). This was a land law.¹ It is no longer in force. It had to do with the destruction of Canaanite civilization and the theology of the ancient world: Canaan’s gods as local deities tied to the land.

1. On land laws, see Appendix J.

God refused to accept equality with other deities. This is as true under the New Covenant as it was in the Old. “Then Paul stood in the midst of Mars’ hill, and said, Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things ye are too superstitious. For as I passed by, and beheld your devotions, I found an altar with this inscription, TO THE UNKNOWN GOD. Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you” (Acts 17:22–23). The Athenians had added an unidentified god to their pantheon of deities just to make sure some unacknowledged god would not bring negative sanctions against them because they had ignored him. The God of the Bible was being treated by Athens as if He were one of these nameless gods. But the God of the Bible cannot be placated with an altar to no god in particular, or with any altar at all. Paul announced: “God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands; Neither is worshipped with men’s hands, as though he needed any thing, seeing he giveth to all life, and breath, and all things” (Acts 17:24–25). An occasional public sacrifice does not impress Him. He is the Creator God. What God demands is the sacrifice of every person’s life, in every area of his life. “I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service” (Rom. 12:1). God calls all men to devote the whole of their lives.² This has to include civil affairs. But the modern church rejects this conclusion.

B. Smashing Idols

The conquest of Canaan was a military action. The Canaanites were to be completely destroyed (Deut. 7:1–5).³ After the destruction of Canaan, only the Amalekites deserved total destruction, because of the evil they had shown to Israel during Israel’s wilderness wandering. God had established a covenant of total destruction with Israel against Amalek: “And the LORD said unto Moses, Write this for a memorial in a book, and rehearse it in the ears of Joshua: for I will utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven. And Moses built an altar, and called the name of it Jehovah-nissi: For he said, Because the LORD hath sworn that the LORD will have war with Amalek from generation to generation” (Ex. 17:14–16). Samuel reminded Saul of this covenant: “Samuel also said unto Saul, The LORD sent me to anoint thee to be king over his people, over Israel: now therefore hearken thou unto the voice of the words of the LORD. Thus saith the LORD of hosts, I remember that which Amalek did to Israel, how he laid wait for him in the way, when he came up from Egypt. Now go and smite Amalek, and utterly destroy all that they have, and spare them not; but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass” (I Sam. 15:1–3). Saul lost his kingship for showing mercy to Amalek’s king and also for allowing the Israelites to keep Amalek’s domesticated animals as spoils.⁴ Samuel hacked Agag to pieces in order to demonstrate God’s covenant of total destruction (I Sam. 15:33). This was an extension of a pre-conquest covenant of destruction. After Canaan was captured, no new war of annihilation was valid (Deut. 20:10–18).⁵

2. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 9.

3. Chapter 16.

That the annihilation of Canaan was to be a one-time event is seen in the jubilee inheritance law. Every half century, ownership of every piece of rural land reverted back to the heirs of the families of the conquest generation (Lev. 25:13).⁶ But after Israel’s return from the exile, the jubilee law was to be altered. “And it shall come to pass, that ye shall divide it by lot for an inheritance unto you, and to the strangers that sojourn among you, which shall beget children among you: and they shall be unto you as born in the country among the children of Israel; they shall have inheritance with you among the tribes of Israel. And it shall come to pass, that in what tribe the stranger sojourneth, there shall ye give him his inheritance, saith the Lord GOD” (Ezek. 47:21–23).⁷ Non-Israelites were not to be driven out, nor were they to be disinherited. Why not? Because the gods of Canaan by then had been annihilated in the hearts of men.

4. “But Saul and the people spared Agag, and the best of the sheep, and of the oxen, and of the fatlings, and the lambs, and all that was good, and would not utterly destroy them: but every thing that was vile and refuse, that they destroyed utterly. Then came the word of the LORD unto Samuel, saying, It repenteth me that I have set up Saul to be king: for he is turned back from following me, and hath not performed my commandments” (I Sam. 15:9–10).

5. Chapter 47.

6. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 24.

7. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 22.

C. God, Stars, and History

The ancient world believed that to defeat a city was to defeat that city's god or gods. To the degree that a conquering army spared the lives of the citizens of a defeated city, to that extent was mercy granted by the conquerors' god to the losers' god. To build an empire, a conquering nation either had to remove the citizens of a defeated city and replace them with people who worshipped the empire's gods, or else the empire had to incorporate the defeated city's gods into the pantheon of the empire. Where no provision for such incorporation existed theologically in the culture of the victor, the victor had to annihilate or completely dispossess the losers. This meant destroying all traces of their gods.

It was assumed that the gods of the two armies battled each other. In other words, what took place on the battlefield was matched by a conflict in heaven.⁸ If there was conflict on the battlefield, there had to be conflict in heaven. There was no cosmic unity in paganism's nature; there was no absolute God who controlled what comes to pass in history. "On first looking upon the external world, man pictured it to himself as a sort of confused republic, where rival forces made war upon each other."⁹ Two ways to conceive of unity in the cosmos, through impersonal forces, are by fate and astrology. The belief that the heavens above are related to events on the earth below is the theoretical basis of astrology, a common belief in the ancient world and even today.

The ancient world believed that the heavens were related to earthly history. Immanuel Velikovsky went so far as to argue that the Greek myth that Athena was born out of Zeus' forehead had its origin in the fact that the planet Venus was born in historical times: a spin-off (literally) of the planet Jupiter. Venus was originally a comet, he said, and it caused the events of the exodus.¹⁰ While I do not think he was correct—God did not use Venus to bring the plagues of the exodus on Egypt—there is no doubt that the heavens and the gods were closely associated in ancient thought. This includes biblical thought. "The kings came and fought, then fought the kings of Canaan in Taanach by the waters of Megiddo; they took no gain of money. They fought from heaven; the stars in their courses fought against Sisera" (Jud. 5:19–20). This is not to be interpreted literally; these words appear in Deborah's song. Songs are exercises in symbolism.

8. Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955), Book III, Chapter XV, pp. 205–6.

9. Ibid., III:II, p. 121.

10. Immanuel Velikovsky, Worlds in Collision (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1950), p. 172.

There is a biblical analogy between stars and earthly affairs. The king of Babylon was described with an angelic-heavenly analogy: a star-angel who sought to surpass God's other star-angels. "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning! how art thou cut down to the ground, which didst weaken the nations! For thou hast said in thine heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God: I will sit also upon the mount of the congregation, in the sides of the north: I will ascend above the heights of the clouds; I will be like the most High" (Isa. 14:12–14). (Lucifer was the morning star in the ancient world, i.e., Venus, but only when it preceded the appearance of the sun. It was called Hesperos when it followed the sun.) The host of heaven is described as stars.

And out of one of them came forth a little horn, which waxed exceeding great, toward the south, and toward the east, and toward the pleasant land. And it waxed great, even to the host of heaven; and it cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them (Dan. 8:9–10).

And the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind (Rev. 6:13).

And there appeared another wonder in heaven; and behold a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his heads. And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth: and the dragon stood before the woman which was ready to be delivered, for to devour her child as soon as it was born (Rev. 12:3–4).

Literal stars did not fall on earth, nor will they, contrary to dispensationalism's proclaimed hermeneutics of prophetic literalism.¹¹ God defeated Satan's angelic host in history because of the incarnation of Jesus Christ in history. Satan and his host were cast out of heaven in the days of John's Apocalypse. In fact, the full transition from the Old Covenant to the New Covenant was marked by the casting down of Satan to earth. Preliminary phases of this casting down began during 11. Charles Caldwell Ryrie, Dispensationalism Today (Chicago: Moody Press, 1965), pp. 45–46. Cf. Ryrie, Dispensationalism (Chicago: Moody Press, 1995), p. 40.

Christ's ministry. "And the seventy returned again with joy, saying, Lord, even the devils are subject unto us through thy name. And he said unto them, I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven" (Luke 10:17-18). The final act of Satan's heavenly disinheritance was post-crucifixion.

And there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought and his angels, And prevailed not; neither was their place found any more in heaven. And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent, called the Devil, and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world: he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him. And I heard a loud voice saying in heaven, Now is come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Christ: for the accuser of our brethren is cast down, which accused them before our God day and night. And they overcame him by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony; and they loved not their lives unto the death. Therefore rejoice, ye heavens, and ye that dwell in them. Woe to the inhabitants of the earth and of the sea! for the devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time. And when the dragon saw that he was cast unto the earth, he persecuted the woman which brought forth the man child (Rev. 12:7-13).

My point here is that the ancient world viewed reality as a supernatural realm. Men, local gods, and the heavenly orbs interacted in history. For example, the appearance of the star of Bethlehem was noted by non-Jewish star-gazers. They also understood what it meant: the birth of a long-prophesied king. They asked Herod: "Where is he that is born King of the Jews? for we have seen his star in the east, and are come to worship him" (Matt. 2:2). With the end of the Old Covenant, these cosmic relationships ceased. The fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 completed the prophecies regarding stars falling from heaven: the end of the Old Covenant order and with it, the Mosaic order, with its temple sacrifices. Prior to A.D. 70, there were good reasons to believe in connections between the heavens and the earth. These reasons were covenantal, not astrological or astronomical. Men were to acknowledge that God governs both heaven and earth. The world is governed in terms of ethics, for God created the world. The prophet Amos said: "Ye who turn judgment to wormwood, and leave off righteousness in the earth, Seek him that maketh the seven stars and Orion, and turneth the shadow of death into the morning, and maketh the day dark with night: that calleth for the waters of the sea, and poureth them out upon the face of the earth: The LORD is his name: That strengtheneth the spoiled against the strong, so that the spoiled shall come against the fortress. They hate him that rebuketh in the gate, and they abhor him that speaketh uprightly” (Amos 5:7–10).

D. Genocide as Deicide

The destruction of Canaan would necessarily involve the destruction of Canaan’s gods, Moses announced. A defeated army meant the defeat of that army’s gods. This was the theology of Canaan and the nations around Canaan.

This was not biblical theology. A defeat of Israel on the battlefield would be a sanction against the nation for its unrighteousness. The Israelites would be subjected militarily or carried into captivity as God’s predictable sanction against national rebellion, Moses repeatedly warned. This would not testify to God’s weakness, but to His sovereignty. The victors who thought otherwise would be punished. “For thus saith the LORD of hosts; After the glory hath he sent me unto the nations which spoiled you: for he that toucheth you toucheth the apple of his eye. For, behold, I will shake mine hand upon them, and they shall be a spoil to their servants: and ye shall know that the LORD of hosts hath sent me” (Zech. 2:8–9). Only with the transfer of the kingdom’s inheritance to a new nation, the church of Jesus Christ, would final destruction come to Old Covenant Israel. Jesus warned Israel’s leaders: “Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof” (Matt. 21:43). This was an implied threat: the destruction of Israel except insofar as Israel united covenantally with this new nation in terms of the New Covenant (Rom. 11).¹²

Canaanite culture was so evil in God’s sight that it had to be destroyed. Israel would soon serve as God’s sanctions-bringer in history. There was to be no mercy shown, because the evil of Canaanite culture was too great. To show mercy to the Canaanites would be the equivalent of accepting the evils which they had practiced. It would be a grant of mercy to their gods. This is why Moses demanded the total annihilation of both men and idols. By publicly removing the Canaanites from history, God would demonstrate His wrath against evil. He had already partially done this with Egypt. This partial destruction had terrified the

12. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 8.

Canaanites, according to Rahab (Josh. 2:9–11). God had already done it completely with the Canaanite cultures beyond the Jordan: Arad and Bashan.

The gods of the land of Canaan would become a snare to Israel. The very survival of these gods would testify either to Israel's military weakness (the biblical view) or God's inability to bring to pass what He had promised to Abraham: full inheritance (Canaan's view). Such military weakness would be interpreted by Israel in terms of Canaanite theology: the partially successful defense of Canaan's old order against the new order of Israel. That is, the gods of Canaan would be seen as possessing partial sovereignty in history. The absolute sovereignty of God would be understood by covenant-breaking Israelites as a myth because of the very survival of Canaan's gods and Canaan's original residents. In short, neither mercy nor military weakness was allowed to Israel by God during this one-time conquest.

The gods of the ancient world were local gods: gods of the city or family. These gods were said to rule within certain geographical boundaries. Their power was tied to geography and to the rites practiced by their followers. Fustel wrote of classical religion, "There was nothing more sacred within the city than this altar, on which the sacred fire was always maintained."¹³ In Roman religion, a break in the fire's continuity was considered catastrophic. Any Vestal virgin who allowed Rome's sacred fire to go out in the was buried alive as a sanction.¹⁴

The perpetual fire on God's altar became central liturgically to Mosaic Israel (Lev. 6:13), but this had not been true in pre-Mosaic covenantal religion, nor would it be true during Israel's future captivity. Israel as a nation could continue to exist and even prosper without this altar, as the Assyrian-Babylonian captivity later indicated, but God did demand sacrifice inside the land, and the altar's fire was basic to this requirement. The fiery altar represented purification, as it did in all ancient religions, but this purification was judicially representative, not magical. It did not cleanse anything based on its heat or its transformation of the cosmos. It judicially represented God's sanction on sin. It applied to dead animals' flesh and the fruits of the field the punishment that man deserved. It did not feed God. Israel's religion was judicial religion, not magical religion.

Israel was told to break down Canaan's altars. There could be no rival sacred fire in Israel—not in the home, the city, or anywhere else.

13. Fustel, Ancient City, III:VI, p. 146.

14. Ibid., p. 147.

“Burn their groves with fire,” Moses said. These destructive fires were not sacred fires. They were merely military acts. It did not require a Mosaic priest to officiate at the destruction of a sacred Canaanite altar. So it would be for Israel in A.D. 70, when Roman soldiers burned the temple. No priest officiated. This fire ended the sacred character of fire in Israel.¹⁵ Judaism, a replacement religion of Old Covenant Israel,¹⁶ has no sacred fire and no burnt offerings.

E. The Spoils of War and Common Grace

The destruction of Canaan’s altars served as a representative destruction of Canaan’s culture. With the exception of Jericho, which had to be completely destroyed, the economic inheritance of Canaan became part of Israel’s inheritance. If the Israelites killed the Canaanites and smashed their implements of worship, they were entitled to the spoils of war.

This means that the products of a culture are not inherently tainted by the ethics of that culture. This fact legitimizes trade. It is neither ritually polluting nor immoral to exchange goods and services with someone who practices a rival religion. The fact that a Canaanite had created something of value as a testament to his own faith or religious premises did not pollute the item he created unless it was actually used in some cultic rite. Canaan’s sacred implements were targeted for destruction, but the common implements of life that testified to the Canaanites’ false view of the sacred became legitimate spoils of war.

This points to a theological distinction between common grace and special rebellion. The sacred groves of Canaan were in fact unholy groves, i.e., profane groves in which covenant-breakers transgressed God’s standards of righteous worship. The lawful boundaries of God’s sacred worship had been violated repeatedly in Canaan, which is why their groves were profane. That which is profane is sacred space that has been violated by a transgression.¹⁷ Special rebellion had polluted these groves so thoroughly that Israel had to smash them. But the other aspects of Canaan’s culture—orchards, houses, fields, etc.—were part of the realm of the common. They were neither sacred nor profane. The realm of the common is analogous to the trees of Eden, except for the forbidden tree and tree of life after the Fall: open to all men without covenantal restriction. Thus, the capital of Canaan, like the capital of Egypt, could lawfully become part of Israel's inheritance.

15. Jacob Neusner, An Introduction to Judaism: A Textbook and Reader (Louisville, Kentucky: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1991), p. 157.

16. Jacob Neusner, Judaism and Scripture: The Evidence of Leviticus Rabbah (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986), p. xi.

17. On sacred, profane, and common, see North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 6D, H.

Common grace is defined as God's unmerited gifts to men irrespective of their covenantal confessions.¹⁸ Men do not earn these gifts, nor is God required to provide these gifts by anything other than His autonomous choice. But, by His healing common grace, God enables men of many religious confessions to become productive. This productivity benefits mankind. In the final analysis, God does this for the sake of His people, who will progressively inherit the earth in history.

If the saints will not inherit in history, then the productivity and wealth of covenant-breakers are supplied by God primarily for the purpose of condemning them in eternity, as the rich man in the parable was condemned (Luke 16:19–25).¹⁹ Their very productivity will condemn them: "For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more" (Luke 12:48b).²⁰ There would therefore be no continuity between the process of inheritance and disinheritance in history and God's declaration of final inheritance and disinheritance in eternity. The process of corporate covenantal sanctions in history would then have nothing predictable to do with the corporate sanctions in eternity: saved vs. lost.²¹ In short, the bodily resurrection and ascension of Christ in history—God's positive sanctions for Christ's perfect covenant-keeping—would have nothing predictable to do with the outcome of the Great Commission in history (Matt. 28:18–20).²² This, few Christian theologians are willing to affirm explicitly, yet most of them hold such a viewpoint.

The complete disinheritance of Canaan was God's means of destroying the works of unrighteous men. But, rather than destroying their capital assets, God through Israel destroyed them and their ritual implements for worshipping their gods. Even in the unique case of

18. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

19. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 40.

20. Ibid., ch. 28.

21. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), ch. 7. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

22. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 48.

Jericho's assets, the precious metals were to go to the temple (Josh. 6:19). The special grace of God would thereby overcome the special rebellion of Jericho.

Because of the extent of the rebellion of the Canaanites, Israel could not lawfully enslave them. Canaanites were not allowed to remain inside the boundaries of the land. To have allowed this would have meant allowing the continuing presence of agents of Canaan's local deities. They would become evangelists for a false religion. Because pagan religion was expressly a religion of the land, the mere presence of Canaanites would testify falsely to the partial sovereignty of Canaan's gods. Any assertion of the partial sovereignty of any god except the Bible's God is inescapably a denial of the religion of the Bible. Thus, the presence of Canaanites inside Israel's boundaries posed too great a threat for Israel to bear safely. The Israelites would eventually interpret the mere presence of Canaanites as a partial victory of Canaan's gods over Moses' God, rather than blaming their own fears and their disobedience to God. Such a false view of God would lead to Israel's rebellion and false worship: idolatry.

The trickery of the Gibeonites overcame this rule, but they became slaves to the temple (Josh. 9:27). Individual Israelites could not profit from the trickery of Gibeon; the Levites alone did. The special grace of God overcame His declaration of genocide against Gibeon, but the priestly tribe alone profited. The Gibeonites and their labor did not become part of the common grace inheritance of individual families outside of Levi. Only Levi's burdens would be reduced.

F. Genocide and Economic Inheritance

The annihilation of Canaan's population and the destruction of Canaan's implements of worship were mandated by God in order to demonstrate His absolute sovereignty. The Canaanites had rebelled long enough. Their evil had compounded too far for God to tolerate it any longer. Their cup of iniquity was full (Gen. 15:16). In terms of the pagan theology of the ancient world, the continuing toleration of Canaan would have constituted God's incomplete victory over His rival gods, i.e., His limited sovereignty. In terms of Moses' warning, Israel's toleration of Canaanites would have meant that His people were playing the harlot, or would soon do so, with the gods of Canaan. Showing mercy to Canaanites would represent an ethical failure on Israel's part.

Genocide was required inside the boundaries of the Promised Land because the Israelites were spiritually weak. If the Canaanites remained in the land, the Israelites would be lured into the power religions of Canaan, just as they had been lured into the worship of the golden calf. Inside the land's boundaries, the Canaanites had claimed sovereignty for their local gods. This claim had to be visibly refuted by Israel's annihilation of the Canaanites. For Israel to inherit the Promised Land, the Canaanites had to be disinherited. So did the gods of Canaan and the theology of Canaan. Dominion religion had to overcome power religion by military action this one time. The spiritual vulnerability of Israel had to be offset by a complete military victory.

But such was not to be. They were too weak spiritually to impose God's negative sanctions completely. They did not totally annihilate the Canaanites. As Moses prophesied, Israel then fell into sin and idolatry. The incomplete military victory of the Book of Joshua was followed by the repeated military defeats of the Book of Judges. The Israelites imposed incomplete military sanctions against Canaan; their enemies outside the land subsequently imposed far more complete military sanctions against the Israelites. From this bondage the judges repeatedly delivered them.

This requirement of annihilation did not apply to the economic assets of Canaan, which could be claimed by the Israelites as part of their inheritance: the spoils of war. Canaan's capital was the product of false local religions, but it was also part of the general dominion covenant: mankind's mandatory subduing of the earth (Gen. 1:26).²³ The more general dominion covenant took precedence over the special rebellion of Canaan. Only those highly specialized capital goods that were expressly designed for false worship came under the ban. With the exception of the precious metals of Jericho, which were set aside for the tabernacle (Josh. 7:24), even the gold and silver implements of Canaan's worship could be claimed by the conquering Israelites, though obviously not in the form of idols. Melted down—transformed from specific to general economic uses—the precious metals of Canaanite religion could become the lawful inheritance of the Israelites. Here was another reason to burn the groves of Canaan: Israelites could lawfully confiscate any gold and silver. The common grace of God, as seen in the lawful use of Canaan's precious metals, added an incentive for the special judgment of God against the special rebellion of Canaan.

23. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 3.

G. The Rejection of Christendom

“And ye shall overthrow their altars, and break their pillars, and burn their groves with fire; and ye shall hew down the graven images of their gods, and destroy the names of them out of that place. Ye shall not do so unto the LORD your God” (vv. 3–4). The principle here is obvious: mandated negative sanctions were imposed against Canaan’s gods; none was imposed against God. To leave Canaan’s idols intact was illegal; to impose negative sanctions on God’s ritual implements was also illegal. There could be no judicial equality between God and Canaan’s deities. There was no judicial neutrality possible. To assert the equality of Canaan’s gods with the God of the Bible was to assert a world without the jealous God of the Bible.

1. Pluralism and Atheism

The modern West is theologically pluralistic. It has been marked by a functional atheism unknown in any previous social order. Most people say that they believe in a god of some kind. Only in the formerly Communist, former East Germany is admitted atheism as high as 60% of the population.²⁴ Operationally, however, the public institutions of the West are atheistic. The state is officially neutral religiously in the United States, and the state demands sacrifice of 40% or more of the citizenry’s income. In Western European nations, what passes for tax-funded Christianity is theological liberalism, which is humanism in clerical robes. God’s name has been publicly disenfranchised. The ideal of Christian civilization—Christendom—is ridiculed by Christians and humanists alike as theocratic oppression, “medievalism,” and “triumphalism.” Professed religious neutrality is the civil order of the day. Civil neutrality has been a myth highly useful to humanists in the early stages of their infiltration and transformation of Christian society.

The only alternative to Christian triumphalism is Christian defeatism, but “defeatism” is word avoided like the plague by the eschatological defeatists who publicly ridicule triumphalism. Conservative theological seminaries universally reject postmillennialism’s triumphalism. In this, they are joined by the humanists, who govern the present “neutral” social order. It is as if the leaders of Mosaic Israel had joined political forces with the leaders of Canaanite society in order to create a common pluralist civil order. This pluralist-syncretist impulse was exactly what Moses warned against. It always means the defeat of God's people and their political subservience to His enemies.

24. Reported by Andrew Greeley, “Religion Around the World,” a joint report of the International Social Survey Program and the National Opinion Research Center. National & International Religion Report (May 31, 1993), p. 2.

There is no legitimate confessional neutrality. There is no permanent common confession in history between Christ and antichrist. "He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth abroad" (Matt. 12:30). There is no middle ground between Christian social defeatism and Christian social triumphalism. There is therefore no permanent eschatological neutrality. Eschatology cannot legitimately be dismissed as an aspect of adiaphora: things indifferent to the faith. But this is not believed by the vast majority of those who call themselves evangelical Christians today. In the name of both amillennialism and premillennialism, the ancient ideal of Christendom is dismissed as impossible in history and therefore illegitimate as a goal.

2. The Kingdom of God, Sort Of

Pessimillennialist pietists assert such incoherent judicial statements as this one: "But the Kingdom of God is a rule, not a realm." What does this mean? It means that there is no biblically revealed civil law of God worth enforcing by the state solely on the basis of its status as biblically revealed. The kingdom of God supposedly has neither a uniquely biblical civil law nor appropriate civil sanctions. This means that God is on permanent leave as king in history. A king with no realm is not a king; he is merely: (1) an abdicated monarch; (2) a publicly rejected monarch who used to have a realm; or (3) a would-be monarch without enough dedicated followers to enforce his claim. This means that "Thus saith the Lord!" is judicially irrelevant unless it is accompanied by "Thus saith religiously neutral common-ground logic." The god of such a confessionally neutral civil realm is self-proclaimed autonomous man. Anyone who asserts that "religious neutrality is a myth" without concluding that "political pluralism is therefore equally a myth" is suffering from self-delusion and confusion on an intellectually crippling scale.

Pessimillennialists assert a two-stage kingdom of God: today's exclusively internal, spiritual manifestation of God's kingdom—"for Christians only"—and an exclusively future comprehensive kingdom, when Jesus will come back to rule over His presently nonexistent realm. They write such things as this: "Jesus spoke about a Kingdom that had come and a Kingdom that was still to come—one Kingdom in two stages. . . . The second stage, which will take place when Christ returns, will assert God’s rule over all the universe; His kingdom will be visible without imperfection.”²⁵ The authors are telling us in no uncertain terms that there is no judicial, confessional, and civilizational continuity in history between the first stage and the second stage of God’s kingdom.

In the first stage, God supposedly has no realm. His people must therefore content themselves throughout history with life in the confessional equivalent of pre-Mosaic Canaan. They live today in what is fast becoming a new Sodom, yet they seek to persuade each other that all we need to do today is to restore the social order of Ur of the Chaldees. If this blindness continues, they will eventually find themselves, as Lot found himself, crying out to Sodomites: “Behold now, I have two daughters which have not known man; let me, I pray you, bring them out unto you, and do ye to them as is good in your eyes: only unto these men do nothing; for therefore came they under the shadow of my roof” (Gen. 19:8). Like Lot, they naively believe their homes somehow possess a widely acknowledged immunity from social evil in today’s common-confession civil order. They think that a common-confession state will protect their rights as confessional Christians in the family and the church. But the humanist state is at war with the Christian family and the Christian church. The humanist state demands subservience by the family and the church. This was also true in the Roman Empire, which is why the war between Christianity and pagan Rome was absolute: a war to the death.

Christians today believe in the possibility of a permanent common civil confession between Christianity and humanism. In more insightful moments, modern evangelicalism prophesies a coming revival of Roman Empire-like tyranny. This was Francis Schaeffer’s point in How Should We Then Live? (1976). In fact, he thought that the coming “imposed order” might be worse than Rome’s. As an alternative, he called for a return to the Bible, not as a utilitarian solution to cultural problems, but as a moral requirement. “It means the acceptance of Christ as Savior and Lord, and it means living under God’s revelation.” But, as a consistent premillennialist, he had never accepted the theocratic ideal of Christendom for the era prior to the millennium. The best that Christians can legitimately hope for, he said, is minority status. “Such Christians do not need to be a majority in order for this influence on society to occur.”²⁶

25. Charles Colson and Ellen Santilli Vaughn, Kingdoms in Conflict (New York: William Morrow, 1987), pp. 84, 85. Colson went to jail in the late 1970s after several years of serving as President Richard Nixon’s senior political hatchet man. He wrote a book about his conversion: Born Again. He founded Prison Fellowship.

This made no sense, given his premillennial eschatology. His book and his film series of the same name surveyed the systematic growth of religious self-consciousness on the part of non-Christians in the West: their dedication to removing every trace of Christian influence. The film series began with a section on the persecution of Christians by the Roman Empire. There is no doubt as to what he privately thought must come: something far worse for the church, namely, the Great Tribulation. He was post-tribulational. But he was not willing to admit forthrightly to his film audience and to his readers that this was the underlying eschatological presupposition of his life’s work. This was why his book was not a call to explicitly Christian social action, but rather a survey of what the church has given up; not an explicitly biblical blueprint for social and cultural reconstruction, but rather a cataloguing of Christendom’s surrender and hand-wringing disguised as an intellectual’s cultural critique; not a call for the progressive establishment of God’s kingdom on earth in history, but rather a program of religious common-ground anti-abortion politics—yet somehow in the name of a non-utilitarian Christianity. He forthrightly denied the legitimacy of a confessional Christian nation.

In the Old Testament there was a theocracy commanded by God. In the New Testament, with the church being made up of Jews and Gen tiles, and spreading all over the known world from India to Spain in one generation, the church was its own entity. There is no New Testament basis for a linking of church and state until Christ, the King returns. The whole “Constantine mentality” from the fourth century up to our day was a mistake. Constantine, as the Roman Emperor, in 313 ended the persecution of Christians. Unfortunately, the support he gave to the church led by 381 to the enforcing of Christianity, by Theodosius I, as the official state religion. Making Christianity the official state religion opened the way for confusion up till our own day. There have been times of very good government when this interrelationship of church and state has been present. But through the centuries it has caused great confusion between loyalty to the state and loyalty to Christ, between patriotism and being a Christian.

26. Francis A. Schaeffer, How Should We Then Live?: The Rise and Decline of Western Thought and Culture (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, 1976), p. 252.

We must not confuse the Kingdom of God with our country. To say it another way: “We should not wrap Christianity in our national flag.”²⁷

What he really meant is that we should not wrap our nation in Christianity’s flag. But every nation must be wrapped in some religious flag. There is no religious or ethical neutrality, after all. So, we must ask ourselves, what flag did Francis Schaeffer prefer that we wrap our nation in? He never said, but since there is no neutrality, there will always be a flag (i.e., a public symbol of political sovereignty). It flies high today in the name of neutrality, flapping over the public school system. It flies high every time a nation defaults from an explicit religion. That flag is the flag of secular humanism.

Jesus was described by Colson as a “King Without a Country.”²⁸ Yet this is hardly what Jesus announced: “Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof” (Matt. 21:43). Jesus has a country: His church. This universal country is supposed to permeate every country on earth, bringing them all under covenantal subordination to Jesus Christ: “Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost” (Matt. 28:19).²⁹ One piece of evidence of such national subordination is the Trinitarian confession of the nation’s civil covenant. Because Christians have ceased to believe this, they first allowed and then promoted the substitution of other oaths and other covenants, but always in the name of a purer, higher, and more mature Christianity.

3. Kingdom Oath

The ideal of Christendom is out of favor today. Christendom is the cultural manifestation of the Trinitarian kingdom of God, a social order founded on a confession of faith in the Trinitarian God of the Bible. The rejection of the legitimacy of the visible kingdom of God—and, by implication, of the Great Commission which underlies it—is universal, even inside the churches. The universal commitment today is to political pluralism and the ideal of a religiously oath-less civil order.³⁰ But there are always oaths; the question is: To which god? The God of the Bible or some rival god?

27. Francis A. Schaeffer, A Christian Manifesto (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, 1981), p. 121.

28. Colson, Kingdoms in Conflict, ch. 6.

29. Kenneth L. Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

The most popular rival god today is the state. Men must swear allegiance to the state and its constitution, not to God and His Bible, when they seek or confirm their citizenship in today's "neutral" societies. Christian evangelicals accept this arrangement as both normal and normative. Yet there has never been a single treatise written by any Bible-affirming Protestant Christian apologist for pluralism that shows how the Bible's required sanctions against false worship are consistent with political pluralism, i.e., a common civil oath. Christians speak today in defense of pluralism as if such a general treatise had been written three centuries ago, with dozens of monographs and textbooks following it through the centuries. They act as though the civil religion of political pluralism is consistent with—an extension of—the Bible. It never occurs to them that political pluralism is a form of polytheism: equal time for all religions in civil affairs, equal time for all law-orders, equal time for covenant-breakers and the gods they represent. The god of the state then is elevated to the throne of civil power. This god banishes all gods whose spokesmen do not acknowledge its sovereignty in history. Christian political pluralists' insistence on "equal time for Jesus" eventually is replaced by humanism's "no time for Jesus." The Christians' anguished cries of "Unfair!" accomplish nothing significant. Having surrendered political sovereignty to a supposedly neutral civil order, Christians find that this order is not neutral. Even so, most Christians still acquiesce in principle to the false claims of this civil order.

There is no neutrality. There can be no mutually acceptable covenant between Christ and Satan. Each insists on sovereignty. But Christ's spokesmen have, for well over three centuries, insisted that there is such a covenant in the civil realm. The result has been exactly what Moses said it would be: the cultural displacement of biblical religion by its enemies. First, the Trinitarians surrendered the civil confession to the unitarians. Then both groups surrendered the civil confession to the secularists. Christians now find themselves in the absurd position calling for a restoration of the long-defunct common-ground unitarian confession in the name of traditional civil liberty. The humanists laugh in derision, having long since absorbed the unitarians into their ranks. The supposedly naked public square is in fact fully clothed in the clerical robes of humanism.

30. See Appendix H: "Week Reed: The Politics of Compromise."

Conclusion

The annihilation of Canaan was to be a one-time event. Other rules of war applied to nations outside the boundaries of Canaan (Deut. 20).³¹ God did not require that the names of gods outside the land not be mentioned. The focus of God's concern was Canaan and its gods. After the exile, the inheritance pattern of the jubilee year was to be extended to gentiles living in the land at the time of Israel's return (Ezek. 47:21–23).³² The law was altered because the conditions had altered. Never again would Israel be tempted to worship the gods of Canaan, for the authority represented by those gods had been totally vanquished by the invading empires. Never again did Israel worship the gods of Canaan.

The New Testament does not authorize either genocide or a prohibition against any mention of the names of other gods. The civil issue in the New Testament is political sanctions, not military sanctions. The legitimate possession of the civil authority to declare and enforce God's Bible-revealed civil law is both necessary and sufficient for covenant-keepers: sanctions by Trinitarian oath. The names of other gods may be spoken. The relevant covenantal question is: Whose name do citizens invoke in the civil oath? In other words, by whose name are civil sanctions invoked? Here, no neutrality is possible. The quest for such neutrality is the quest for political polytheism.

31. Chapters 48, 49.

32. North, Restoration and Dominion, ch. 22.

31

COMMUNAL MEALS AND NATIONAL INCORPORATION

But unto the place which the LORD your God shall choose out of all your tribes to put his name there, even unto his habitation shall ye seek, and thither thou shalt come: And thither ye shall bring your burnt offerings, and your sacrifices, and your tithes, and heave offerings of your hand, and your vows, and your freewill offerings, and the first lings of your herds and of your flocks: And there ye shall eat before the LORD your God, and ye shall rejoice in all that ye put your hand unto, ye and your households, wherein the LORD thy God hath blessed thee. Ye shall not do after all the things that we do here this day, every man whatsoever is right in his own eyes. But when ye go over Jordan, and dwell in the land which the LORD your God giveth you to inherit, and when he giveth you rest from all your enemies round about, so that ye dwell in safety; . . . (Deut. 12:5–10).

This passage has to do with boundaries: point three of the biblical covenant.¹ “But unto the place which the LORD your God shall choose out of all your tribes to put his name there, even unto his habitation shall ye seek, and thither thou shalt come.” God’s name was to be placed publicly on Israelite society. He had marked out the land with His name. The basis of their maintenance of this land grant was obedience. “Ye shall not do after all the things that we do here this day, every man whatsoever is right in his own eyes.”

Here is the theocentric focus of this law: God as the owner of Israel. God was to become central to the life of the nation. This shared confession would unify the nation. The unity of Israel was grounded in the unity of God (Deut. 6:4). At the same time, the plurality of Israel was grounded in the plural nature of God (Gen. 1:26; 11:7). This plurality was to serve as the basis of Israel's system of tribal localism and political decentralization. Israel's primary unity was confessional, ecclesiastical, and priestly. Israel, like God, was to be both one and many.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

A. An Anti-Polytheistic Priestly Law

Canaan was a polytheistic culture. Israel was monotheistic, though not unitarian. God is plural in His unity. "Let us make man in our image" (Gen. 1:26a). "Go to, let us go down, and there confound their language" (Gen. 11:7a). This language is dismissed by unitarians as a so-called "plural of majesty," meaning unitarian majesty. On the contrary, such language announced early and emphatically that God is plural, which is why He is majestic. The persons of the Trinity operate as the ultimate team.

The equal ultimacy of unity and plurality in the Godhead is the ontological foundation of mankind's various covenantal incorporations: the coming together of many in a display of unity. Canaanitic culture was pluralistic because it was polytheistic. There was no single place of sacrifice and ritual celebration in Canaan. The cities worshipped different gods. Canaan was not incorporated as a unitary social order. City by city, society by society, Israel captured the land. Altar by altar, the gods of Canaan fell. Canaanite society possessed no sacrificial unity. Divided, it fell.

Moses warned Israel that a new order would soon be incorporated in Canaan: unified nation, unified confession, unified celebrations. Israelites would henceforth be required to journey to a central location to eat their sacrificial meals. These common meals would mark the end of Israel's pilgrimage in the wilderness. The three feasts would be celebrated familistically and nationally, not tribally. The dozen land-holding tribes had no covenantal function during the national feasts. The Levites would officiate at the celebrations; the other tribes would have no role. The tribes could not become what the cities of Canaan were: separate centers of formal worship, each with its own god. This pointed clearly to the centrality of worship rather than the centrality of politics as the basis of national incorporation.

The great sin of Jeroboam was not his political secession from national Israel, which God imposed as a punishment on King Rehoboam for his ruthless increase in taxation (I Kings 12:14–15). Jeroboam's great sin was his creation of a new priesthood and new places of worship, which constituted idolatry (vv. 15–33). His motive was political. He interpreted Israel's unity in terms of politics. "If this people go up to do sacrifice in the house of the LORD at Jerusalem, then shall the heart of this people turn again unto their lord, even unto Rehoboam king of Judah, and they shall kill me, and go again to Rehoboam king of Judah" (v. 27). This was a politician's assessment of covenantal unity. He reimposed the multiple worship centers that had prevailed in pre-Mosaic Canaan: "Whereupon the king took counsel, and made two calves of gold, and said unto them, It is too much for you to go up to Jerusalem: behold thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt. And he set the one in Bethel, and the other put he in Dan" (vv. 28–29). It was this which God had expressly prohibited: "Take heed to thyself that thou offer not thy burnt offerings in every place that thou seest: But in the place which the LORD shall choose in one of thy tribes, there thou shalt offer thy burnt offerings, and there thou shalt do all that I command thee" (Deut. 12:13–14). Jeroboam abolished the Hebrews' centralized worship because he regarded politics as above worship, whether in Jerusalem or in his newly established Northern Kingdom. His idolatry was political. This is covenant-breaking man's perpetual temptation: to elevate politics over worship, man's kingdom over God's kingdom.

God withered Jeroboam's hand when the new king attempted to bring sanctions against a prophet who condemned the new worship (I Kings 13:4). The king then begged the prophet to restore his hand, which he did. Then the king invited him to share a meal with him. "And the man of God said unto the king, If thou wilt give me half thine house, I will not go in with thee, neither will I eat bread nor drink water in this place: For so was it charged me by the word of the LORD, saying, Eat no bread, nor drink water, nor turn again by the same way that thou camest" (vv. 8–9). Jeroboam understood the covenantal function of a shared meal. So did the prophet, who refused to eat what was obviously a political meal in the presence of the king. He refused to sanctify Jeroboam's political idolatry.²

2. In the United States, politicians occasionally meet with religious leaders of all faiths at "prayer breakfasts." These events are held mainly for the benefit of the politicians, who thereby deflect public criticism by those religious leaders in attendance and also by others who naively interpret these events as in some way holy. These are common grace events that solidify support for political polytheism.

B. Lawful Administrators

There would be blessings in the Promised Land, Moses said. The main blessing would be land; the secondary blessing would be peace; the tertiary blessing would be wealth. These positive sanctions were to be accompanied by sacrifice at a central place of worship. “But when ye go over Jordan, and dwell in the land which the LORD your God giveth you to inherit, and when he giveth you rest from all your enemies round about, so that ye dwell in safety; Then there shall be a place which the LORD your God shall choose to cause his name to dwell there; thither shall ye bring all that I command you; your burnt offerings, and your sacrifices, your tithes, and the heave offering of your hand, and all your choice vows which ye vow unto the LORD” (Deut. 12:10–11).

The required national sacrifice included a shared meal or series of shared meals. “And ye shall rejoice before the LORD your God, ye, and your sons, and your daughters, and your menservants, and your maid-servants, and the Levite that is within your gates; forasmuch as he hath no part nor inheritance with you” (v. 12). The focus of the national celebration was familial, but the Levite, as a member of the ecclesiastical tribe, was to be invited into these family festivals. His tribe was in charge of the covenantal sacrifices; he was therefore entitled to share in the familial celebration.

We see here three blessings: land, peace, and bread.³ The land was administered by families; peace was administered by civil government; bread was administered ecclesiastically. I use the word administered here covenantally: an oath-bound minister of God who allocates the assets under his lawful jurisdiction. He acts as God’s steward or trustee. What is significant here is this: bread is covenantally ecclesiastical, not familial. Families owned the land that produced the grain that made bread-making possible, but the priestly tribe had primary claim on the bread. They were lawfully entitled to a tenth of the land’s net output (Num. 18:21).⁴ This is because they administered the sacrifices.

3. The phrase, “peace, land, bread,” is attributed by historians to Lenin in the days immediately preceding the Bolshevik revolution in Russia. I have been unable to find any document written by Lenin that indicates that he ever said it. The story was given a worldwide audience by the literary critic, Edmund Wilson, in his summary, not based on a primary source by Lenin, of Lenin’s supposed speech when he arrived at the Finland station in 1917. Wilson, To the Finland Station (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1940] 1953), p. 470.

4. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 10.

So, the Levites were the administrators—the representative agents—over the bread of the nation.⁵ Their God-given legal claim on a token payment marked them as the source of bread in the land. They represented God when they collected the families' tithes. They acted in God's name and on His behalf. "And all the tithe of the land, whether of the seed of the land, or of the fruit of the tree, is the LORD'S: it is holy unto the LORD" (Lev. 27:30). The land was administered by families, but the church had the fundamental legal claim over the output of the land: bread. The Levites therefore had to be invited in by families to share in the familial meals during the communal sacrifices. The Levites had first claim on these meals.

It is imperative that we understand that the Levites' legal claim to a tenth of every family's bread was not based on the social services which they provided.⁶ It was based on their lawful administration of the sacrifices. As evidence, consider the fact that they did not have to be invited in to share a family meal back home. Their lawful claim to participation in the families' meals existed only during the national festivals, which centered around the sacrificial and sacramental flame of the altar.

C. Local and National Incorporation

The Levites were spread across the nation. They lived in cities inside every tribe's jurisdiction. Israel's families were told to share their meals with "the Levite that is within your gates" (v. 12). This indicates that a local Levite journeyed to the central location alongside residents of his region. The local Levite joined with local families to share meals in a distant city. The tribal bond no longer functioned in the place of sacrifice. The national geographical bond did.

The tribes maintained a separate legal existence. They had influ-

5. Joseph served as Egypt's priest when he allocated grain and bread in Egypt. He was Egypt's administrator over bread. Joseph in effect had replaced Egypt's chief baker, who had been executed two years earlier, as Joseph had prophesied in prison (Gen. 40:22).

6. On this point, Rushdoony was dangerously wrong. He saw their claim as based on their role as providers of social services. He insisted that families administered the tithe by allocating it to the representatives they deemed God's best servants. He wrote in 1979, "What we must do is, first, to tithe, and, second, to allocate our tithe to godly agencies. Godly agencies means far more than the church." R. J. Rushdoony and Edward A. Powell, Tithing and Dominion (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1979), p. 9. For a detailed critique of Rushdoony's ecclesiology, which centers on his view of the allocation of the tithe, see Gary North, Tithing and the Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994), Part 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnttithing>)

ence over families through the laws of landed inheritance (Lev. 25). They had influence over geography because of the same laws of inheritance. They defended their own land. This meant that civil jurisdiction—bearing the sword—was in the hands of tribal captains. In this sense, Israelite tribal law mirrored the Canaanite system. What distinguished Israel from Canaan institutionally was its common theological confession, including the mark of circumcision, and common national celebrations. First, confession: “Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God is one LORD” (Deut. 6:4). Second, there were common national celebrations, which are the focus of this passage. Common theological confession bound Israel to one God by oath. Common celebrations bound Israel to one God by eating. The celebrations imposed an economic loss: costs of making the journey and any offerings. They also involved economic gains to those who were normally not included in family celebrations: the local Levites.

The overwhelming majority of the costs associated with national incorporation were ecclesiastically imposed. The costs of the journey, the sacrificial offerings, and the shared meals were all imposed by laws regulating ecclesiastical sacrifices. Families were bound to the nation by means of theological confession and common sacrifice, which involved a journey to a common location. At the center of Israel covenantally were an implied ecclesiastical oath (circumcision), an altar, and the Ark of the Covenant, which contained the tables of the law (Deut. 31:26). None of these centralizing features of Israelite society was uniquely tribal.

The incorporation of the one and the many in Israel was both confessional and ecclesiastical. Mosaic civil law was enforced primarily by tribal units of government, but neither the civil law nor its required negative sanctions had its origin in tribal civil governments. Because civil law enforcement was administered primarily by tribal governments in Mosaic Israel, this means that the unifying forces of Mosaic Israel were not primarily civil. The tribes were subordinate to the nation, but the nation was constituted by theological confession and maintained by ecclesiastical sacrifice. The authority of these two foundations of incorporation was affirmed economically: losses imposed by the costs of centralized worship. The tithe was paid locally to local agents of the cross-boundary national tribe: Levi. The mandated national celebrations required the participation of local Levites as guests at the family meals.

This law applied to all other holy offerings and sacrifices, which could not be lawfully offered in the local community (Deut. 12:17–18). The Levites would always possess legal access to the family's communion meals in the city of sacrifice. "Take heed to thyself that thou forsake not the Levite as long as thou livest upon the earth" (v. 19). To refuse the Levite was to invite excommunication, and with it, the loss of citizenship.

D. Intermediary Authorities

One of the fundamental themes in Western political theory and also social theory has been the debate over the legitimacy of intermediary institutions. Conservative political theory ever since Edmund Burke's Reflections on the Revolution in France (1790) has invoked local units of civil government as possessing lawful authority. At least in theory, local units of civil government are supposed to be the most important units except during a war. Radical political theory has affirmed the opposite ever since Jean Jacques Rousseau's Social Contract (1762). The bond that unites men is said to be their political participation in a unitary national state, which incorporates the General Will of the people. In between the national state and the individual there is no legitimate realm of independent civil authority.⁷

This debate over political theory has been paralleled in social theory. A consistent follower of Rousseau denies the legitimacy of any claim to independent authority made by non-civil, intermediary institutions generally, not just local or regional civil governments. In contrast, a consistent follower of Burke affirms superior authority of local non-civil institutions—family, church, voluntary association—over the claims of the state, especially the national state, outside of narrowly circumscribed areas of civil authority. Independent, decentralized social institutions are viewed as a necessary restraint on illegitimate state power.⁸

What no longer appears in Western thought is any suggestion that intermediary authorities possess superior authority to the individual. We can find intellectual defenses of one institution as possessing superior authority to another institution, but not superior authority to the individual, unless the institution is the state. The individual is said to possess ultimate authority in relation to all intermediary institutions, which exist to serve individuals, not the other way around. This outlook was not true of medieval social theory, and surely not of ancient political theory, which asserted the omnipotence of the state, which men (not women) participated in through the family or other collective unit.⁹ Antiquity had no concept of the rights of the individual.¹⁰ For the Greeks, the polis or city-state was supreme.¹¹

7. Robert A. Nisbet, "Rousseau and the Political Community," in Nisbet, Tradition and Revolt: Historical and Sociological Essays (New York: Random House, 1968), ch. 1.

8. Robert A. Nisbet, Conservatism: Dream and Reality (New Brunswick, New Jersey: Transaction Publishers, [1986] 2002), pp. 50–66.

It took over two centuries for the debate between Burke and Rousseau to be concluded in the West. With the unexpected, overnight, non-violent collapse of the Soviet Union in December of 1991, the ideological victors were the secular conservatives and secular nineteenth-century liberals, whose economic theories of decentralized private ownership have paralleled Burke's defense of political and social decentralization.¹² The manifest failure of the Soviet Union's central economic planning at long last persuaded the West's intellectuals of the worthlessness of Communism, both as an economic system and a political system. Nevertheless, seven decades of Communist terrorism had not persuaded most of them of the utter illegitimacy of Communism as an ideology. As long as Western intellectuals believed that Communism was making sufficient economic progress to maintain its machinery of terror, most of them refused to voice more than occasional token objections to Soviet Communism's barbarism.¹³ Many of them respected the power that such barbarism conferred on Communism's rulers. Western intellectuals believe in state power as the primary means of transforming society. This is why they abandoned respect for Communism without a blink after 1991. Stripped of their power, the Communists were stripped of their legitimacy in the humanistic West. The Western intellectuals' much-beloved Premier Gorbachev disappeared overnight, only to surface two years later as

9. Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955), III:XVII, pp. 219–23.

10. Jacob Burckhardt, The Greeks and Greek Civilization, ed. Oswyn Murray (New York: St. Martins, [1872] 1999), p. 53.

11. Ibid., pp. 56–58.

12. Adam Smith and Edmund Burke respected each other's opinions. Burke had read and adopted Smith's economics, while Smith is said to have commented: "Burke is the only man I ever knew who thinks on economic subjects exactly as I do without any previous communication having passed between us." Cited in Isaac Kramnick (ed.), Edmund Burke (Englewood-Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1974), p. 100. The same quotation appears in Russell Kirk, The Conservative Mind: from Burke to Santayana, rev. ed. (Chicago: Regnery, 1954), p. 19.

13. Jean-Francois Revel, The Flight from Truth: The Reign of Deceit in the Age of Information (New York: Random House, [1988] 1991).

the head of a heavily endowed non-profit foundation promoting world government for the sake of ecology. This Red premier had turned into just another Green.¹⁴ He had become a Western intellectual, devoid of personal power.¹⁵ So, nobody in authority has paid much attention to him. Conservatives dismissed him as a red turned green . . . for the sake of green (dollars).

There was a reason for the intellectuals' overnight dismissal of Communism. For two centuries, all but a few of them have worshipped at the altar of pragmatic economic growth. Communism was "the god that failed" for only a handful of Western intellectuals.¹⁶ It was never a god for most of them. Economic pragmatism remains their god. This god is now seen as having brought negative corporate sanctions against the god of Communism. Western intellectuals today blandly dismiss Communism as merely a failed scientific experiment that happened to cost 100 million lives¹⁷—a noble experiment, a few of them might say in private,¹⁸ but now passé. Their pragmatic god is still on his throne in their hearts, dispensing blessings and cursings.

The Mosaic law had elements of both Burke and Rousseau. There

14. He was the political leader who had long ignored warnings from Russian engineers regarding the unsafe status of Chernobyl-type nuclear reactors, and who was in charge when the 1986 Chernobyl disaster took place. This has all been politely ignored by the Western intellectuals.

15. When he ran for president in Russia in 1996, he received so few votes that his candidacy was not statistically visible. Boris Yeltsin, his old antagonist, was elected over a Communist who no longer called himself a Communist. The ex-Communists had no further use for a loser like Gorbachev in 1996, just five years after his removal from office.

16. The phrase comes from a 1949 collection of essays by ex-Communist liberals and socialists: The God That Failed, edited by Richard H. Crossman. This was the only variety of anti-Communism that was taught on college campuses until the 1980s.

17. Stéphane Courtois, et al., The Black Book of Communism: Crimes, Terror, Repression (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1999), p. 4. This assumes that the total was 20 million deaths in the Soviet Union, which is a low estimate. It may have been 60 million.

18. Felix Somary recorded in his autobiography a discussion he had with the economist Joseph Schumpeter and the sociologist Max Weber in 1918. Schumpeter expressed happiness regarding the Russian Revolution. The USSR would be a test case for socialism. Weber warned that this would cause untold misery. Schumpeter replied: "That may well be, but it would be a good laboratory." Weber replied: "A laboratory heaped with human corpses!" Schumpeter retorted: "Every anatomy classroom is the same thing." Felix Somary, The Raven of Zurich (New York: St. Martin's, 1986), p. 121. I am indebted to Mark Skousen for this reference. The USSR became what Schumpeter predicted, an anatomy classroom filled with corpses, but with this variation: unlike medical classrooms, the USSR killed people to gain its huge supply of corpses. So did Red China. So did Marxist Cambodia.

is no question that intermediary institutions played a major role in Mosaic civil law, for the tribal civil governments were the primary agencies of law enforcement. This was Burkean. So was the Mosaic law's devaluation of civil government when compared to family and ecclesiastical governments. The Mosaic law's system of national sacrifices and festivals was a unique mixture of familism and centralized ecclesiastical representation. Intermediary civil institutions (tribes) had no covenantal role to play in the Mosaic law's reconciliation of the one and the many through national incorporation. People participated at the national festivals either as family members or as priests. The priests had a lawful claim on the families' culinary rites of celebration: meals. Indeed, the common meal was the rite of reconciliation: between man and God, between family and priesthood. The state had no covenantal role to play here; neither did the tribe.

Conclusion

The reconciliation of the one and the many is the Trinity. This reconciliation was reflected in the communal rites of Mosaic Israel. The meals were mandated national celebrations that involved economic sacrifice. Families journeyed to a common location marked off from the rest of Israel by the presence of the altar and the Ark. Participation in the rites of celebration was secured by theological confession, which in turn was marked by circumcision. A common theological confession unified the nation under the Mosaic law's covenantal sanctions: "Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God is one LORD" (Deut. 6:4).¹⁹ Common meals in a common place also unified the nation under the Mosaic law's covenantal sanctions.

The nation secured its incorporation through confession and communal eating. The church does the same. The centrality of confession and communion in Mosaic Israel should be obvious. It was not only a civil oath that bound the nation (Ex. 19), but also an ecclesiastical oath. The Mosaic law mandated national festivals after Israel inherited the land of Canaan. The inheritance was secured by means of negative military sanctions, but it was to be maintained by non-military sanctions. It was secured by civil action, but was to be maintained by ecclesiastical action. Israel fought in tribal units, but the nation celebrated nationally as family units that were made holy by two things: a journey to the place of the altar and the presence of Levites at family meals.

19. Chapter 15.

The national celebration imposed economic losses on families.

Enlightenment political theory has substituted civil confession for theological confession as the basis of establishing national incorporation. It has substituted voting for eating as the basis of maintaining national incorporation. From Machiavelli to Hobbes, from Locke to Madison, the message was the same: national incorporation is by civil oath alone.

What is astounding is that this Enlightenment confession is today regarded by Protestants and most Catholics as a statement of Christian principles. The enemies of Christianity have triumphed over Christianity in the civil realm because they have persuaded Christians of the illegitimacy of Trinitarian confession as the basis of national incorporation. The result has been the substitution of massive taxation for the tithe, bread and circuses for bread and wine. This is empire's familiar pattern of development, from the Roman Empire to all the other evil empires that seek to revive it. They will all perish, to be replaced in history by a common kingdom that is established by Trinitarian confession and maintained by communion meals eaten in the presence of ecclesiastical authorities. This thought is distressing news for Enlightenment political theorists and their spokesmen inside the churches and Christian college classrooms.

THE MURDEROUS GODS OF CANAAN

Observe and hear all these words which I command thee, that it may go well with thee, and with thy children after thee for ever, when thou doest that which is good and right in the sight of the LORD thy God. When the LORD thy God shall cut off the nations from before thee, whither thou goest to possess them, and thou succeedest them, and dwellest in their land; Take heed to thyself that thou be not snared by following them, after that they be destroyed from before thee; and that thou enquire not after their gods, saying, How did these nations serve their gods? even so will I do likewise. Thou shalt not do so unto the LORD thy God: for every abomination to the LORD, which he hateth, have they done unto their gods; for even their sons and their daughters they have burnt in the fire to their gods. What thing soever I command you, observe to do it: thou shalt not add thereto, nor diminish from it (Deut. 12:28–31).

The theocentric focus of this law was obedience to God's Bible-revealed law. "Observe and hear all these words which I command thee." God offered a practical reason for this obedience: "that it may go well with thee, and with thy children after thee for ever, when thou doest that which is good and right in the sight of the LORD thy God." Law is linked to sanctions.

Sanctions, in turn, are linked to inheritance. There is a war for the inheritance in history. Disinherited sons claim the inheritance. This war is covenantal. It involves all five points of the covenant.¹ It is a war over sovereignty, authority, law, sanctions, and inheritance. As such, it is at bottom ethical. The gods that men worship are reflected in the laws that men obey. "What thing soever I command you, observe to do it: thou shalt not add thereto, nor diminish from it" (Deut. 12:32).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992). (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010).

Those who affirm and obey God's Bible-revealed law are identified here as the true heirs. Those who deny the authority of God's Bible-revealed law and disobey it are the false heirs.

A. Sacrificing the Future

This passage begins with a prophecy: "When the LORD thy God shall cut off the nations from before thee, whither thou goest to possess them, and thou succeedest them, and dwellest in their land" (v. 29). Title to their land will surely be transferred to Israel. The question facing Israel was the question of how to maintain the kingdom grant. I wrote in Boundaries and Dominion:

Leviticus presents the rules governing this kingdom grant from God. This land grant preceded the giving of these rules. Grace precedes law in God's dealings with His subordinates. We are in debt to God even before He speaks to us. The land grant was based on the original promise given to Abraham. That promise came prior to the giving of the Mosaic law.² This is why James Jordan said that the laws of Leviticus are more than legislation; the focus of the laws is not simply obedience to God, but rather on maintaining the grant.³ The basis of maintaining the grant was ethics, not the sacrifices. Man cannot maintain the kingdom in sin.⁴ The fundamental issue was sin, not sacrifice; ethics, not ritual.⁵

God warned them against dallying with the rituals of Canaan's gods. He warned them, "enquire not after their gods, saying, How did these nations serve their gods? even so will I do likewise" (v. 30). But the primary issue was not liturgy; it was ethics. It was the prohibition against murder. "Thou shalt not do so unto the LORD thy God: for every abomination to the LORD, which he hateth, have they done unto their gods; for even their sons and their daughters they have burnt in the fire to their gods" (v. 31). The great evil of Canaan's rituals was the willful destruction of their own children in formal sacrifice: ethics (point three) encapsulated in ritual (point four).

Human sacrifice is the greatest ritual evil in history, and it was widespread prior to the spread of the Christian gospel. Classical

2. James B. Jordan, Covenant Sequence in Leviticus and Deuteronomy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), p. 8. (<http://bit.ly/jjcovseq>)

3. Ibid., p. 9.

4. Ibid., p. 11.

5. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), p. 9.

Greece and Rome both practiced human sacrifice,⁶ although history textbooks do not mention this, and even specialized historical monographs ignore it or mention it only in passing. This historical blackout is an aspect of the successful re-writing of history by humanists who rely, generation after generation, on their peers' glowing accounts of a supposedly secular classical world, an academically satisfying world in which formal religion was socially peripheral and mostly for political show. The fact that a vestal virgin was buried alive as a sanction against either her unchastity or allowing the ritual fire to go out⁷ is an historiographical inconvenience, and so it is rarely mentioned. Vesta was the sacred fire of Rome, a goddess. She was the incarnation of moral order, both in Greece and Rome.⁸ Vesta's ritual requirements had the sanction of execution attached to the virgin priestesses. Where we find the imposition of the death penalty, we do not find a socially peripheral issue. Centuries later, the sacrificial bloodshed of Mexico's Aztecs in the late fifteenth century reached the limits of this ritual abomination.⁹ The remarkable speed of that perverse civilization's disinheritance by the Spanish and their Indian allies, from 1519 to 1521, should give pause to the academic world, which does not take seriously covenantal cause and effect. (Modern legalized abortion more than matches the efficiency of the Aztecs' slaughter, but not as a ritual practice.)

A visible manifestation of the essence of covenant-breaking man's religion is his willful cutting off of his own legacy. This is a variation of the crime of attempted suicide—the suicide of the entire race. “But he that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul: all they that hate me love death” (Prov. 8:36). In the name of confiscating the lawful inheritance from covenant-keepers, the covenant-breaker destroys it. He is driven by envy. In the name of securing an inheritance for his heirs, he kills his heirs. Here is a biblical example:

And Joshua adjured them at that time, saying, Cursed be the man before the LORD, that riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho: he shall lay the foundation thereof in his firstborn, and in his youngest son

6. Lord Acton, “Human Sacrifice” (1863), in Essays in Religion, Politics, and Morality, 3 vols. (Indianapolis, Indiana: LibertyClassics, 1988), III, ch. 19.

7. Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955), III:VI, p. 147.

8. Ibid., I:III, pp. 30–32.

9. Serge Gruzinski, The Aztecs: Rise and Fall of an Empire (New York: Abrams, [1987] 1992), pp. 49–56.

shall he set up the gates of it (Josh. 6:26).

In his days did Hiel the Bethelite build Jericho: he laid the foundation thereof in Abiram his firstborn, and set up the gates thereof in his youngest son Segub, according to the word of the LORD, which he spake by Joshua the son of Nun (I Kings 16:34).

B. Comparative Religion

God forbade the Israelites to name the names of the gods of Canaan. "And in all things that I have said unto you be circumspect: and make no mention of the name of other gods, neither let it be heard out of thy mouth" (Ex. 23:13). Was this a ban against historical scholarship? Was this prohibition to be taken literally?

The language here is covenantal. Naming the name of a god was in this context an act of invocation. It was an act of worship. Calling upon a god is an act of religious subordination. To invoke the name of a god is to acknowledge formally that he brings sanctions in history. The context of Deuteronomy 12:30 was historical study for the sake of covenantal subordination: ". . . enquire not after their gods, saying, How did these nations serve their gods? even so will I do likewise." The prohibition of false worship took the form of a universal prohibition against mentioning the names of the gods of Canaan. To ignore the area of comparative religion is to ignore the possibility that false worship can be introduced in the name of progressive reform as well as the restoration of ancient practices. To be able to recognize a proposed progressive innovation as the restoration of an ancient abomination is an advantage. Without a knowledge of the past, it becomes more difficult for guardians of orthodoxy to defend its boundaries.

There is no doubt that the rulers of Israel spoke the names of foreign gods. "Woe to thee, Moab! thou art undone, O people of Chemosh: he hath given his sons that escaped, and his daughters, into captivity unto Sihon king of the Amorites" (Num. 21:29). "Wilt not thou possess that which Chemosh thy god giveth thee to possess? So whomsoever the LORD our God shall drive out from before us, them will we possess" (Jud. 11:24). But Chemosh was not a god of Canaan. Its geographical area of sovereignty was outside the boundaries of Israel. Foreign gods did not pose the same degree of covenantal threat to Israel that the gods of Canaan did, for they were not perceived as exercising sovereignty inside the boundaries of the Promised Land. To invoke the names of foreign gods was a violation of the first commandment (Ex. 20:3), but for false worship to become socially significant, there had to be some basis for people to believe that cause and effect in history were influenced by the god invoked. This god had to be able to impose sanctions on behalf of those who invoked his name. Because the ancient world outside of pre-exilic Israel did not invoke the name of any finally sovereign god, the social threat to Israel came from the pre-conquest local gods of Canaan.

What about local gods? Could Israelites lawfully speak their names? I believe they could, although I am not sure that this was the case. I argue that invocation is not the same as classification. The prophet Jeremiah spoke Baal's name as part of his covenant lawsuit (Jer. 7:9; 11:13). But Baal was a god of Moab (Num. 22:41). It may be that the word, meaning "master" or "owner," was widely applied in Israel to rival gods. But as for the specific names of the gods of pre-conquest Canaan, the Bible is silent.

After the exile, there seems to have been no application of this law. The sovereignty of the pre-conquest gods of Canaan was finally destroyed by the Assyrians and Babylonians. The new world of empires was openly polytheistic. Many gods resided in the pantheon of each empire. The cultural threat of exclusively local gods ended forever in Israel. The threat of polytheism and syncretism still existed, but Israel's defensive position as a nation under foreign domination restricted the spread of polytheism. A polytheist in post-exilic Israel was a traitor to the nation, a collaborator with the enemy. He would have been ostracized. The threats to orthodoxy in post-exilic Israel were legalism and pagan philosophy. It was the lure of Greek philosophy and culture, with its common-confession universalism and its aestheticism, that pulled cosmopolitan Jews away from Moses.¹⁰ Meanwhile, legalists planted thickets of ritual hedges around the Mosaic law. The kernel of orthodoxy was either ground into flour and leavened with Hellenistic universalism or else smothered by the legalism of the Pharisees.

In modern times, the academic study of comparative religion has again become a threat to theological orthodoxy, not because the advocates of academic comparative religion invoke the sanctions of rival gods, but because they deny the supernatural existence of all gods. Academic comparative religion is a form of cultural relativism—indeed, the supreme form. It insists that the details of both theology and ritual change through time and across borders. This superficial academic polytheism is converted into implicit atheism by its universalism. Here is the supposedly universal aspect of all religion: the common man's faith in supernatural beings and forces that do not exist. The universalism of religion is the universalism of error in the face of either as-yet unsolved questions or as-yet rejected answers. Religion's sanctions are said to be exclusively personal and social; all of the gods invoked by their disciples are equally without power. Men, not gods, impose sanctions in history, say the advocates of academic comparative religion. All of the gods have been disinherited by rational men, we are told, save one: the god of humanity. To inherit in history—the only inheritance that supposedly matters—men must invoke the god of humanity. It is this god alone that brings predictable positive sanctions to those who invoke its name and who subordinate themselves to its representative agents: customers (economic sanctions) and voters (political sanctions). All the other natural and social forces in history are understood by humanists as impersonal.

10. Martin Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism: Studies in their Encounter in Palestine during the Early Hellenistic Period, 2 vols. (Philadelphia: Fortress, [1974] 1981), I, p. 313.

Comparative religion in post-conquest, pre-exilic Israel posed the threat of the elevation of local gods above the God of the Bible. Comparative religion in the modern world poses the threat of the de-throning of the God of the Bible and His banishment to the common pantheon of all other gods, save one: the god of humanity. This pantheon of gods no longer occupies the acropolis on the highest hill of the city. More likely, a local television transmission tower does.

The threat of comparative religion is the threat of idolatry. Idolatry invokes gods other than the God of the Bible, gods who are believed to be the most powerful sanctions-bringers in history. Ancient comparative religion invoked local gods; modern comparative religion invokes a universal god: mankind. The issue of sanctions in history necessarily raises the issue of inheritance in history. To inherit, men must ally themselves to the god who really does bring sanctions in history.

Conclusion

God told Moses that He would disinherit the gods of Canaan. He would do so by enabling the Israelites to disinherit the Canaanites. But He warned them not to worship the gods of defeated Canaan.

While the ancient world believed that the gods of a city that had lost a war were defeated along with the city's army, the fact is that the Israelites were sorely tempted to worship the gods of Canaan, despite Israel's victory over Canaanite cities. Moses warned that the presence of a remnant of surviving Canaanites would be interpreted by Israel as though the gods of Canaan had overcome the God of the Bible, despite the fact that Israel had overthrown the idols of Canaan. Despite the fact that the losers had lost, the Israelites were tempted to worship the losers' gods. The losers became the winners in Mosaic Israel. Foreign agents had to destroy the remnants of Canaan's gods: Assyria and Babylon. These conquerors served as God's rod of discipline. "O Assyrian, the rod of mine anger, and the staff in their hand is mine indignation" (Isa. 10:5).

Israel's military defeat of Canaan should have meant the defeat of Canaan's gods. Only because Israel was ethically rebellious did traces of Canaan's old culture and old theology survive. These remnants of evil then served as evil leaven, just as Moses had warned. Only after the second defeat of Canaan's gods, as a result of the defeat of Israel by Assyria and Babylon, were the gods of Canaan finally disinherited. Israel had to be temporarily disinherited in order for Canaan's gods to be permanently disinherited.

THE LURE OF MAGIC: SOMETHING FOR NOTHING

If there arise among you a prophet, or a dreamer of dreams, and giveth thee a sign or a wonder, And the sign or the wonder come to pass, whereof he spake unto thee, saying, Let us go after other gods, which thou hast not known, and let us serve them; Thou shalt not hearken unto the words of that prophet, or that dreamer of dreams: for the LORD your God proveth you, to know whether ye love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul. Ye shall walk after the LORD your God, and fear him, and keep his commandments, and obey his voice, and ye shall serve him, and cleave unto him. And that prophet, or that dreamer of dreams, shall be put to death; because he hath spoken to turn you away from the LORD your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt, and redeemed you out of the house of bondage, to thrust thee out of the way which the LORD thy God commanded thee to walk in. So shalt thou put the evil away from the midst of thee (Deut. 13:1–5).

The theocentric framework of this law is the love of God. The test of covenant-keepers' love of God is their willingness to obey God's law. "Ye shall walk after the LORD your God, and fear him, and keep his commandments, and obey his voice." The test is ethics.

A. The Mosaic Prophet's Judicial Role

Proper worship necessitates obedience to God's revealed law, Moses said. Worship, like wisdom, begins with the fear of God. Once again, Moses warned Israel to obey God's commandments. This is the continuing ethical theme of the Book of Deuteronomy, which constituted the second giving of the law. The point of this obedience, given the position of Deuteronomy as book five of the Pentateuch, is inheritance. Covenant-keeping was the basis for maintaining the national inheritance. It still is, but to affirm this is to break with modernism in its broadest interpretation.

This was a civil law because it mandated a penalty that could only be lawfully enforced by the civil government: execution. God tested Israel's love of Him by seeing whether the civil authorities would execute any prophet who came publicly in the name of another god. If they did execute him, the nation proved its love for God. If they refused, the nation did not love God. This was a cut-and-dried test.

This passage dealt with those people who claimed to be prophets. A prophet had a specific judicial function in Mosaic Israel: to declare to a God-designated audience God's direct revelation regarding the future. God would test their corporate faith by evaluating their behavior in response to the prophet's challenge. The biblical prophet delivered a covenant lawsuit against someone or against some group. If the listeners did not repent, the prophet warned, God would bring negative corporate sanctions against them. Sometimes the prophet's message was repentance.¹ Jonah's covenant-lawsuit against Nineveh is a representative example: "Repent or else be destroyed within forty days." Publicly, Jonah prophesied destruction only, but the possibility of their corporate repentance, and therefore their avoidance of negative corporate sanctions, had been implicit from the beginning (Jonah 4:2). Sometimes, however, the prophet's role was limited to provoking a confrontation prior to God's imposition of negative corporate sanctions. Elijah's confrontation with Ahab prior to the drought is representative (I Kings 17:1–5).

The prophet was usually outside the priestly hierarchy. He was rarely a member of the priestly tribe of Levi. Samuel, for example, was an Ephraimite (I Sam. 1:1).² Samuel anointed Saul, and he later announced God's sanction against Saul (I Sam. 15:28). The prophet at times announced that the nation was not obeying the law of God. He demanded in God's name that the existing legal order and the nation's dominant social practices be abandoned. This implied that his God-given authority was superior to that of the civil and ecclesiastical authorities. In the name of God's law, the prophet demanded the scrapping of the existing legal and social order.

The listeners' obvious response was: "Who are you to say?" When a man came before the nation in the name of the true God and His Bible-revealed law, he was inescapably a revolutionary in the eyes of a

1. Not always, however: Moses' prophetic role was not intended to gain Pharaoh's repentance. See below: section C, "Something for Nothing."

2. If Eli adopted him, which is possible, then Samuel was a member of Levi.

covenant-breaking Establishment. The covenantal question then arose: "In God's eyes, who is the authorized representative of the nation's God-sanctioned Establishment?" A related question arose: "What evidence does this man present which testifies to his office as a prophet?" This was what the fiery competition on Mt. Carmel between Elijah and the court prophets was all about (1 Kings 18). This was a case of competing claims by competing prophets: 850 (v. 19) to one. Which prophet possessed the final authority to command the execution of the rival? Elijah issued this challenge. "And Elijah came unto all the people, and said, How long halt ye between two opinions? if the LORD be God, follow him: but if Baal, then follow him. And the people answered him not a word" (1 Kings 18:21). He demanded that the representatives of the nation decide. He ignored King Ahab altogether because the king possessed no authority to decide. He appealed directly to representatives of the tribes.

When the king's prophets lost the competition, thereby identifying their judicial status as false prophets, Elijah commanded the civil representatives of the nation kill them all, which they did (1 Kings 18:40). This was in accord with Deuteronomy 13:1–4. Yet Elijah was not a civil magistrate. No civil court had convicted these men. Nevertheless, under the Mosaic law, he possessed the lawful authority to command this public execution by representatives of the nation.

A prophet may have been able perform signs and wonders. He may even have predicted the future accurately. His possession of supernatural abilities—outside the normal space-time continuum—testified in part to his special legal status. This was partial evidence of his special relationship with God, but it was not sufficient to prove his claim of God-given authority. Far more important than signs and wonders was his theological orthodoxy. A true prophet had to come in the name of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. It did not matter what signs and wonders he performed if he came in the name of another god. His signs and wonders might be deceptions, or they might even be authentically supernatural, but his message was itself a deception. No god other than the Bible's God could be lawfully worshipped publicly inside the borders of Israel. The prophet's ability to perform signs and wonders—below-cost shortcuts in the normal space-time continuum—had to be accompanied by orthodox theological confession. The differentiating mark between magic and prophecy was theological confession.

The law governing prophets was valid for as long as the office of prophet existed and as long as Israel possessed civil authority in the land. The office of prophet no longer exists. Neither does Mosaic Israel. The office ended with the Old Covenant in A.D. 70. So did Mosaic Israel. No one today possesses the God-given authority to announce to ordained church officers and civil officers that the judgment of God will fall on society or his audience if they do not obey his words. No private citizen can lawfully command the execution of 850 other men. A prophet who does not in principle possess the God-given authority to command the public execution of rebellious men is no prophet. Such authority was basic to the office of Mosaic prophet.

Some charismatics and Pentecostals assert that the office of prophet still exists. I have yet to read any theological defense by them of their position, which would have to prove the following: (1) the prophet offers a covenant lawsuit against men, including civil magistrates; (2) if the authorities disobey the prophet, God will impose specific negative sanctions against them and all those under their authority, and these sanctions are announced in advance by the prophet; (3) the capital civil sanction against false prophecy, which itself enforced Old Covenant prophecy, is still in force.

B. Boundaries and Prophecy

Men are creatures before God. They are under His authority. They are also under the constraints of the creation. They are not originally creative. They are re-creative as subordinates who are made in God's image.

1. Making Improvements

It is legitimate for men to re-work the creation by means of their knowledge of the laws governing the creation. Adam was told by God to dress the garden (Gen. 2:15). This means that God told Adam to re-work the creation. Adam was told to improve his environment. The world was originally created good, but Adam possessed the power and the lawful authority to make it better. He also had the responsibility to make it better. But he could lawfully exercise this authority only as a creature who acknowledged his limitations. He was required by God to acknowledge by his actions his belief in his own creaturehood and his subordination to God. He was not allowed to eat from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. He understood this, and he told Eve. She represented Adam, who in turn represented God. She spoke a prophetic word to the serpent: "But of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, God hath said, Ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die" (Gen. 3:3). She added a new element, a kind of hedge: not touching the fruit. God had told Adam only not to eat it. Then she violated her own prophetic word. So did Adam. God then brought a covenant lawsuit against the serpent, Eve, and Adam, in the order of their rebellion, from lower to higher, in terms of His original prophetic word to Adam.

Prophecy concerned ethical boundaries: violate them, God warned, and predictable negative sanctions will come. Some of these sanctions will come predictably in history; all will come predictably in eternity. The prophet's job was to warn his audience of the adverse consequences of breaking God's covenant. The boundaries were enforced by God. Violate His ethical boundaries, and you will experience unpleasant consequences, the prophet warned. These ethical boundaries were testified to by the prophet's ability to overcome creational boundaries, some times called laws of nature. The Old Covenant prophet was empowered by God to escape these conventional limits because this ability testified to his authority in announcing both the ethical boundaries and the predictability of their attached sanctions. Violating the laws of nature was the prophet's means of calling a halt to the nation's violation of the laws of God.

2. Boundaries and Magic

To acknowledge the lawful boundaries that God has placed around man is to worship God by obeying Him. We are not to pursue our goals by means of magic. What is magic? It is any attempt to invoke any supernatural authority other than the God of the Bible, asking this force to alter man's environment by means of causation that is beyond temporal cause and effect. Magic is a method of calling on supernatural personal forces to alter the normal processes of either nature or history. Without supernatural intervention, man's ritual manipulations and invocations are powerless. A voodoo doll is a powerless implement of magical incantation apart from demonic intervention.

The element of repeatability is missing in magic because the supernatural cause is sometimes absent or powerless or obstinate. The supernatural cause of the sought-for outcome is not predictably present in the way that the ordinary means of temporal causation are predictably present. The personal "catalyst" that makes possible the magical series of events is invoked, not employed. It is a conscious servant or accomplice, not an unconscious tool.

A prophet might seek to affirm his judicial office by altering nature at a distance or by forecasting events. If Israelites who were skilled craftsmen in this particular manipulation of nature or skilled forecasters of historical trends could not replicate his performance in a statistically significant number of cases, the self-proclaimed prophet did not thereby validate his office. He may have been a prophet, or he may have been a clever trickster, or he may have been a magician. The judicially compulsory evidence of his office as prophet was his verbal orthodoxy. The crucial test of his office was not his performance of signs and wonders; it was his confession of faith.

Modern science officially rejects the possibility of causation at a distance in the absence of some physical connection, with one gigantic exception—gravity³—and many very tiny ones: subatomic physics (the quantum). Science rejects the suggestion that demons and angels intervene in history. It also rejects the ability of God to do this. It denies that any such God exists. It asserts the autonomy of the cosmos. Modern scientific man is therefore a fool (Ps. 14:1; 53:1).

3. Idolatry

Herbert Schlossberg argued that there are two pagan idols: nature and history.⁴ The quest for signs and wonders is a mark of these two idols. Schlossberg said that all social idols are idols of history. This would seem to include philosophy.⁵ Historically, after the Israelites returned from the captivity, they ceased to worship the idols of Canaan. Simultaneously, philosophy arose in Greece and spread across the Mediterranean world. Hellenism became the preferred idol of choice among socially cultured Israelites until the fall of Jerusalem. Pharisaic legalism, which also arose in the post-exilic era, was a domestic theological error.⁶ Legalism was defended in the name of Israel's God. Hellenism was defended in terms of a universal wisdom that transcended

3. The theory of interplanetary ether was nineteenth-century science's attempt to escape the concept of mass attracting at a distance in a vacuum.

4. Herbert Schlossberg, Idols for Destruction: Christian Faith and Its Confrontation with American Society (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, [1983] 1993), p. 11.

5. There is a sense in which autonomous man regards philosophy as the mediating factor between nature and history.

6. Martin Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism: Studies in their Encounter in Palestine during the Early Hellenistic Period, 2 vols. (Philadelphia: Fortress, [1974] 1981), I, p. 313.

divisive supernatural revelation.

The primary covenantal issue of idolatry is transcendence. Something or someone is proclaimed as superior to God. In operation, this issue becomes ethical. An idol is any representative manifestation in history (point two) of a law-order that substitutes for God's (point three). Moses made it plain in Deuteronomy, over and over, that obedience to God's commandments is the visible test of one's confessional orthodoxy. A man who would subsequently call on Israelites to disobey these commandments, Moses said, was to be regarded as a fool. If he also named the name of another god, he was to be executed. "And that prophet, or that dreamer of dreams, shall be put to death; because he hath spoken to turn you away from the LORD your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt, and redeemed you out of the house of bondage, to thrust thee out of the way which the LORD thy God commanded thee to walk in. So shalt thou put the evil away from the midst of thee" (Deut. 13:5).

C. Something for Nothing

For a man to escape the limits of temporal creation means that he can gain something for what appears to be nothing. By subordinating himself to supernatural powers that are forbidden by God, a man can sometimes escape the limits of temporal cause and effect. This ability to go beyond commonly repeatable causation offers to some initiates of occultism the possibility of gaining wealth, power, and influence over others. This lure is powerful. Men are impressed with magic, which seems to offer them access to a below-cost realm of human action, a realm that is in some unstated way connected to the realm of conventional causation.

The text indicates that signs and wonders were possible in the Old Covenant world. Moses himself had been in a battle of signs and wonders when he and Aaron challenged the priests of Egypt. The test was the test of the snakes. Moses' snakes ate the Egyptians' snakes. But the test decided nothing, for Pharaoh's heart was hardened. The visible test of the comparative signs and wonders did not persuade him (Ex. 7:10–14).

The message of the Bible is that while power is persuasive, orthodox confession is inherently more powerful. Moses' confession of faith through Aaron (Ex. 7:2) was more powerful than Pharaoh's confession of faith, and this was demonstrated by the victory of Aaron's serpents

(Ex. 7:12).⁷ Moses' confession did not change Pharaoh's mind, because the power of God in hardening Pharaoh's heart was more powerful than the persuasive power of the signs and wonders. God deliberately kept Pharaoh from changing his mind and therefore from changing his confession—an explanation that is rejected by all Arminians. But Arminians cannot escape Paul's words: "What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid. For he saith to Moses, I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion. So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy. For the scripture saith unto Pharaoh, Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might shew my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth" (Rom. 9:14–18). The absolute sovereignty of God with respect to salvation is manifested in history by His absolute sovereignty over every man's confession. "The king's heart is in the hand of the LORD, as the rivers of water: he turneth it whitherso ever he will" (Prov. 21:1).

Moses, in his office as a prophet (Deut. 34:10), was not sent by God in order to change Pharaoh's mind. He was sent to provide God with an occasion to demonstrate God's power in history: predictable sanctions. The end result inside the boundaries of Egypt was the transfer of the inheritance of Egypt's recently deceased firstborn sons to Israel (Ex. 12:35–36). The Egyptians had long believed that they could get something for nothing out of Israel: slave labor and the inheritance. At the time of the exodus, this generations-long miscalculation was exposed for all to see. The Egyptians had believed that the state's coercion of Israel would remain profitable: an efficient allocation of scarce resources. They were called to account by God at the time of the exodus. The tyranny of Egyptian socialism's commitment to a world of something for nothing led to a national economic disaster, as it always does. The historical model of all socialism is Pharaoh's Egypt: bureaucratic, tyrannical, and ultimately disastrous for those in charge.⁸ The events of 1989–91 in Eastern Europe and the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics were merely recapitulations of the Egyptian model. These systems broke down economically, politically, and socially in a com-

7. If the serpents of Pharaoh's prophets were mere trickery, then Moses' theological confession meant nothing. Aaron was merely a superior trickster.

8. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985).

prehensile collapse—remarkably, without much bloodshed.⁹

The magician seeks to gain his ends by escaping from some of the limits of his own creaturehood. The creation places limits on him that he deeply resents, just as Adam resented the boundary around the forbidden tree. The magician seeks to escape the requirement that, in order to gain a new set of circumstances, he must give up something of value. He wishes to increase his wealth—to improve his circumstances—by holding onto his wealth and augmenting it in ways that do not threaten his wealth. He wants personal economic growth—an increase in the options available to him—without a threat to his net worth. He does not care who provides this for him. He also does not care if others in the economy suffer losses in order to provide his gains. He cares only about his own advancement and the advancement of those working with him. He is convinced that magic will provide these gains. He may even believe that his risk-free gains come at no one's expense. But whatever his belief regarding the source of his gains, he believes that he does not have to offer something of greater value in the estimation of a trading partner than what ever he expects to receive in exchange.

Yet even he suspects that there is never something for nothing. He is at risk. He knows that if he performs his invocation incorrectly, he could lose everything. He knows that the supernatural power invoked has the power to provide benefits from outside the space-time continuum. The threat of loss is inescapable: such a power can also impose costs from outside the space-time continuum. This is the reason for the extreme concern of the magician regarding the details of incantations, formulas, and rituals. Because of the risk of dealing with supernatural forces that are personal, jealous, and quite possibly malevolent, the experienced magician is extremely cautious. The details of supernatural rituals become as important to him as the details of scientific procedure are for scientists when dealing with explosives or viruses. The malevolent whims of the supernatural force invoked by the incantation or formula are more of a threat to the magician than the outcomes of most of nature's formulas are for the scientist or the craftsman. Tools do not seek revenge against their users. Demons do.

The magician seeks to obtain something for nothing. It is not that he seeks personal gain at minimal expenditure. We all do this. What he seeks is access to wealth or power outside the realm of ethical law and scientific law. He substitutes ritual for ethics. Ritual seems cheaper than ethics. In doing so, he risks something very important for the sake of something far less important. “For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?” (Matt. 16:26).¹⁰

9. Marxist politicians, having re-named their parties, returned to favor politically within a few years in some of these Eastern European nations. Eastern Europeans had not been prepared for freedom and responsibility in 1990. The moral erosion and escape from personal responsibility fostered by socialism had done its work. The lure of something for nothing is still very strong.

D. The Annulment of the Mosaic Office of Prophet

The two-fold test of the prophetic office was this: accurate predictions of the immediate future and adherence to the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The death penalty was mandatory for any prophet whose predictions failed to come true—signs and wonders (Deut. 13:1–5) or any other event (Deut. 18:22)—or who announced the sovereignty of any other god (Deut. 18:20). There was a very high risk for anyone claiming to be a prophet whose words had not been put into his mouth by God. Or so it seemed. But in times of widespread apostasy, there was little risk for a false prophet for speaking a false word. In times of apostasy, the word of God is not honored. The false prophet is honored; the true prophet is not. So, negative civil sanctions would be imposed on the true prophet, which was the case in Israel again and again. Then God’s corporate negative sanctions would come with a vengeance.

1. Jesus as a Prophet

Jesus Christ’s ministry was the fulfillment of the prophetic office, which He annulled when He came in judgment in the final act of corporate negative sanctions against Old Covenant Israel: the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.¹¹ He knew what was in store for Him and what would then be in store for Israel. He warned the religious rulers that this would be the case, for it had always been the fate of prophets to be put under negative sanctions by the rulers of Israel, leaving the nation exposed to God’s wrath.

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! because ye build

10. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 35.

11. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

the tombs of the prophets, and garnish the sepulchres of the righteous, And say, If we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets. Wherefore ye be witnesses unto your selves, that ye are the children of them which killed the prophets. Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers. Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell? Wherefore, behold, I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes: and some of them ye shall kill and crucify; and some of them shall ye scourge in your synagogues, and persecute them from city to city: That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel unto the blood of Zacharias son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar. Verily I say unto you, All these things shall come upon this generation. O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! Behold, your house is left unto you desolate (Matt. 23:29–38).

2. The Bible's Prophetic Monopoly

The completion of the New Testament era of revelation with the destruction of Jerusalem completed the judicially binding revelation of God. All of the New Testament's manuscripts were written before the final revocation of the Old Covenant in A.D. 70. This includes the Book of Revelation.¹² This means that the Bible has supplanted the covenantal authority of any man to announce formally, on threat of historically unique supernatural sanctions, the annulment of any biblical law that came prior to his ministry. Similarly, he cannot lawfully announce new universally binding laws in God's name. The office of prophet no longer exists; the Bible is God's only final word in history.

The Mosaic law's prophet could lawfully tell kings to change the nation's laws on threat of immediate national punishment. A true prophet's ability to perform signs and wonders verified two things: (1) his ability to invoke supernatural sanctions to enforce his covenant lawsuit; (2) his ability to see that God would defend the prophet's lawsuit by imposing specific sanctions. Such authority belongs to no man today. No man today speaks with the same authority as the completed Bible. No man can lawfully invoke publicly God's specific historical sanctions in a specific time frame. He can only invoke the general cov-enantal sanctions that apply to the kind of sin under consideration. He can speak prophetically only in the sense of warning men of the sanctions to come; he cannot lawfully invoke sanctions in the way that an Old Covenant prophet could: guaranteed in the immediate future in the name of God. “And Elijah answered and said to the captain of fifty, If I be a man of God, then let fire come down from heaven, and consume thee and thy fifty. And there came down fire from heaven, and consumed him and his fifty” (II Kings 1:10). This power is no longer granted by God to anyone who speaks in His name. The very possession of power analogous to this is evidence of false prophecy; it is demonic. Such power was necessary to validate a prophet’s word, which was given to him by God only because God’s judicially authoritative revelation had not yet been completed. The prophet was authoritatively inspired. In the world after the final replacement of the Old Covenant in A.D. 70, no one is authoritatively inspired. If he were, his words would possess formal equality with the Bible, and because of the immediate nature of his inspiration, superior operational authority.

12. Kenneth L. Gentry, Before Jerusalem Fell: Dating the Book of Revelation (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/klgbjf>)

This does not mean that an evangelist on the foreign mission field cannot lawfully counteract curses that are invoked by some shaman or witch doctor. He can and should. The test of supernatural power is at stake. But the evangelist is not imposing negative supernatural sanctions. He is short-circuiting negative supernatural sanctions. Any evangelist who seeks conversions by publicly invoking supernatural negative sanctions, imposed physically and at a specific time, is imitating Satan. Praying an imprecatory psalm¹³ against public law breakers is legitimate for a lawfully ordained officer. Calling down literal fire from heaven is not.

3. Civil Law

The question arises: What is the lawful role of civil government in suppressing false prophecy? Is this law still in force? “And that prophet, or that dreamer of dreams, shall be put to death; because he hath spoken to turn you away from the LORD your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt, and redeemed you out of the house of bondage, to thrust thee out of the way which the LORD thy God commanded thee to walk in. So shalt thou put the evil away from the midst of thee” (Deut. 13:5).

If the office of true prophet no longer exists, then what is the cov-enantal, judicial threat to society of a false prophet? There is none. The threat of God's corporate negative sanctions no longer exists with respect to false prophecy, since the promise of God's corporate positive sanctions no longer exists with respect to true prophecy, having been annulled by the New Covenant. Then on what basis can a civil government lawfully impose negative sanctions against a false prophecy that does not come true? There seems to be none. The office has been annulled. So have the related sanctions.

13. Imprecatory psalms include Psalm 83:9–18; 68:1–2; 79:6, 10–12.

A false prophet under the Mosaic law was judicially analogous to a private citizen today who makes a policeman's uniform, dons it, and then tells people what to do in the name of the law. This is illegal: the assertion of civil authority not ordained by a lawful government. The false prophet in Israel made a similar assertion. The sanction against this illegitimate assertion was public execution. If there were no office of policeman today, there would be no need of civil laws against imitating one. If every police uniform were regarded as merely a funny costume, there would be no justification for imposing civil sanctions against someone who wears such a costume and then announces his authority in the name of the law. If a costume does not imply sanctions-bearing authority, it is judicially harmless. If it is judicially harmless, it is beyond civil sanctions.¹⁴

The Bible is now complete. It serves as prophet. It tells people what is required of them. The voice of God is in print. No other voice can claim equal authority. Thus, there is no judicial role for a prophet in the post-A.D. 70 New Covenant era. There have been no false prophets since A.D. 70 because there have been no true prophets. Today, there are only misguided or corrupt people who claim to be prophets. Their claim should be dismissed, not by civil law, but by ecclesiastical law. Church members who make such claims, and who demand that Christians do what they say rather than obey lawfully constituted church authorities, are to be placed under negative church sanctions. If they persist in their claims, they may have to be excommunicated. They are not to be executed.

Conclusion

There is no way to gain something for nothing apart from the grace of God. Even here, the covenantal limits of creation are still in force. God extends grace to individuals and societies because He revoked deserved blessings from His Son, Jesus Christ, in the latter's sacrifice on Calvary. The payment was made by Jesus Christ. By grace, Christ's representative victory over sin and death is extended by God to men. "For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit" (I Peter 3:18). That which is a below-cost benefit for the recipients of God's grace has been paid for. Some men gain something valuable for nothing because Jesus Christ suffered something terrible for righteousness. Thus, the Bible testifies to the covenantal illegitimacy of the economic quest for something for nothing.

14. A trademarked costume is protected by civil law, but only as a matter of torts: private party vs. private party. The threatened sanctions are a matter of restitution.

The magician can perform signs and wonders. What distinguished him from the prophet under the Old Covenant was confession. The prophet warned men that they should not expect something for nothing. They should not expect to keep the fruits of righteousness apart from the continual investment required to sustain it: covenantal faithfulness. The prophet warned men that they should not expect something (fruits) for nothing (sin). If men persisted in the pursuit of something for nothing, they would reap judgment. The day of reckoning would come. This was the prophet's message. It was a covenantal lawsuit based on an orthodox confession of faith. That a true prophet might perform signs and wonders—what appeared to be something for nothing—was in fact a confirmation of the fact that there is never something for nothing. When men gain something for nothing, they do so only because they are recipients of grace, which rests judicially on supernatural payment by a representative. The pursuit of something for nothing eventually brings God's judgment: negative sanctions.

The magician also was beyond conventional historical limits, but his message was different. He performed his miracles in terms of a different confession. He promised more of the same—power on demand—for those who conformed to another god. Such a god could not bring permanent below-cost benefits, Moses warned. God would bring negative corporate sanctions on Israel if the nation believed such a prophet. More than this: God would bring negative sanctions on Israel if Israel's civil government failed to execute false prophets. This covenantal connection between widespread law-breaking and predictable corporate negative sanctions was the justification of civil sanctions: the threat of God's corporate negative sanctions if a public evil was not brought under the threat of civil sanctions. The magistrate acted as a surrogate for God, imposing Bible-mandated negative sanctions on specific covenant-breakers as a way to head off God's corporate negative sanctions. This is equally true in New Covenant times.

The reason why this Mosaic civil sanction is no longer mandated is because the office of prophet has ceased. The Bible has replaced the prophet under the New Covenant. No man speaks with authority equal to, and therefore superior to, the Bible. The threat of false prophecy is no longer civil. No private party lawfully commands civil rulers in the name of God on threat of God's immediate negative sanctions. The office of Mosaic prophet has no judicial authority today. Neither does the office of false prophet. The state therefore does not need a penalty in order to defend the true prophet's authority from false prophets.

COMMERCE AND COVENANT

Ye shall not eat of any thing that dieth of itself; thou shalt give it unto the stranger [geyr] that is in thy gates, that he may eat it; or thou mayest sell it unto an alien [nokree]: for thou art an holy people unto the LORD thy God. Thou shalt not seethe a kid in his mother's milk (Deut. 14:21).

There is no explicit reason given in the Bible for either of these prohibitions. This makes it difficult to identify the theocentric focus of either prohibition. They are clearly holiness laws. Holiness is an aspect of point three of the biblical covenant: boundaries.

The first law is clearly a land law. The dietary laws were laws that applied to covenanted residents of the Promised Land, or those men who had an inheritance in Israel through circumcision. This law dealt with unclean meat.¹ The land laws ended with the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Peter in a vision was told by God to eat unclean animals (Acts 10). Paul wrote: "As concerning therefore the eating of those things that are offered in sacrifice unto idols, we know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is none other God but one" (I Cor. 8:4).

The first law governed ritually clean animals that died naturally. The second law governed a specific case: seething a kid in its mother's milk. The second law has no specific economic application that I can see. The first law does. Theologically, these are separate verses.

A. Holiness Laws

The first prohibition cannot have had anything to do with health, since the law specified that strangers in the land were allowed to eat such meat. God would not deliberately have threatened the health of a resident alien. To call biologically contaminated meat a gift would have been a terrible misuse of language. The Hebrew word for “gift” here is found throughout the Old Testament. God’s gifts to mankind and to Israel were in no way polluted or threatening; neither was this gift. So, this law was based on something other than health issues.

1. On land laws, Appendix J.

The Mosaic law prohibited the eating of animals that had died naturally. The sanctions attached to this prohibition were mild. “And every soul that eateth that which died of itself, or that which was torn with beasts, whether it be one of your own country, or a stranger, he shall both wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even: then shall he be clean” (Lev. 17:15). Because this law applied to the resident alien, it was not exclusively ecclesiastical, since the uncircumcised stranger or “protected stranger”² [geyr] did not belong to the congregation. But there were no civil penalties mentioned. So, with respect to the stranger, the law against eating such meat was merely a suggestion. The matter of ritual cleanliness did not affect him. If he ever did approach the tabernacle, which was the only place where ritual uncleanness was a threat to him or to the nation, it would have been to offer sacrifice (Num. 15:29). In this case, he was under the purity restrictions. Otherwise, he was not holy to the degree that an Israelite was, so the threat of uncleanness was of no importance to him, just so long as he did not attempt to approach the tabernacle, thereby committing a boundary violation.

He was holy in the sense of being set apart—holy—as a resident in Israel, a person living under Mosaic civil law. He was set apart to this degree: he was a beneficiary of the common grace of God that overflowed within the land’s boundaries because of the special grace shown to Israel. He was set apart by God in a way that a resident of another land was not. He could eat such meat, but it was not legal to sell it to him. It had to be a gift. One presumption of this law was that a stranger in economic need was threatened by poverty more than Israel was threatened by a stranger who ate such meat. It was lawful for an Israelite to make a gift of prohibited meat to him. For the inconvenience of a ritual washing, the Israelite could remove any ritual pollution that might extend beyond evening. If the resident alien had qualms about eating such meat, he could sell it to a non-resident alien [nokree], just as an Israelite could.

2. Jacob Milgrom, The JPS Torah Commentary: Numbers (New York: Jewish Publication Society, 1990), p. 398.

B. Degrees of Holiness

I have covered the topics of sacred, profane, and common at some length in chapter 6 of Boundaries and Dominion. I discussed why the sacred can be profaned by a boundary violation, but the common cannot be. The sacred character of something creates the possibility of a ritual boundary violation. We cannot profane something that is common.

The closer a person came to the holy of holies, the more dangerous he became: to himself and to Israel. God did not tolerate anyone except the high priest to enter the holy of holies, and then only once a year (Ex. 30:10; Lev. 16:34). A boundary violation in this case threatened the nation. God might depart from the holy land of Israel.

A holy object must be protected from violation. What was the holy object in question in this verse? The Israelite? The meat? The land? The covenant? The tabernacle? Another Mosaic law points to the status of the Israelite as holy: the law governing the clean animal slain in the field by wild beasts. “And ye shall be holy men unto me: neither shall ye eat any flesh that is torn of beasts in the field; ye shall cast it to the dogs” (Ex. 22:31). The meat of an animal that had died of sickness, old age, or an accident was not holy. It was not to be set aside to God for His exclusive use. On the contrary, it was to be consumed inside the holy land only by two classes of foreigners: resident aliens [geyr] and foreign visitors [nokree].

The Israelite could not lawfully eat it, but he could touch it in order to transport it. If he touched it, he became unclean (Lev. 11:39), but this was not much of a burden. To cleanse himself ritually, he merely had to wash himself and his clothes. “But all other flying creeping things, which have four feet, shall be an abomination unto you. And for these ye shall be unclean: whosoever toucheth the carcass of them shall be unclean until the even. And whosoever beareth ought of the carcass of them shall wash his clothes, and be unclean until the even” (Lev. 11:23–25). “And he that beareth the carcass of them shall wash his clothes, and be unclean until the even: they are unclean unto you” (Lev. 11:28). If an Israelite was not planning to approach the tabernacle, his unclean status did not matter.

The Israelite could pick up the dead animal and transport it to a commercial center. He could then lawfully sell it to a visiting foreigner. He could also give it to a resident alien who was willing to live under God’s civil laws. This alien was the equivalent of a refugee. He was not a citizen, nor was he a member of the congregation, but he was a lawful member of the community.

This indicates two degrees of holiness: the Israelite and the resident alien. It also indicates non-holy status: the non-resident alien. The resident alien was entitled to special consideration in the Mosaic law. For example, he could not lawfully be charged interest when he sought an emergency loan (Lev. 25:35).³ However, it was legal to charge interest to a nokree (Deut. 23:20).⁴ In this case, the resident alien could be given an asset that was illegal for an Israelite to use for himself. The non-resident alien could be charged a price.

If an Israelite wanted to profit from his dead animal, he could sell it to a non-resident alien. He could not lawfully profit from a resident alien. He could not lawfully enter into commerce in this instance with a resident alien. This would have tended to direct the prohibited meat into commerce. Most people prefer profit to charity most of the time. The meat of animals that had died of natural causes would have tended to wind up on the tables of travelers and foreign businessmen.

The living animal had been ritually clean, no matter who owned it, but it was prohibited to Israelites because of the way it had died. So, the difference in holiness had to be in the judicial status of its original owner. The Israelite was a priest to the nations. He was under God's national covenant. The resident alien was voluntarily under the laws of the land on a permanent basis, but he had not sworn a covenantal oath to God. The visiting stranger was under the law only temporarily. The relationship between the person and the land seems to have been the distinguishing issue here. The Israelite was tied to the land covenantally. The resident alien was tied to the land residentially. The stranger was tied to the land commercially. The commercial tie was seen as having no judicially permanent status. There was no oath-bound bonding in commerce. This is a general principle of biblical economics: the transitory character of commerce. It possesses no covenantal aspect; it is contractual, not covenantal.

The holiness of the land of Mosaic Israel was presumed by this law. The degree of holiness of people was tied to the permanence of their connection to the land. The land was holy, so the meat could not lawfully be consumed by those who had an oath-bound connection to the land. In the mouths of the permanent residents of God's holy land, the meat became profane. In the mouths of the less permanent resident aliens, it became profane if it had been purchased. In the mouths of non-residents, it was not profane at all. The most pure individual could not eat the meat because of his permanent connection to the land. The less pure individual could not buy the meat because of his voluntary connection to the land. The impure individual could buy the meat because of his commercial connection to the land.

3. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 28.

4. Chapter 57. Cf. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 49:C.

With the coming of the New Covenant, the land of Israel began to lose its covenantal status. With the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, it lost its covenantal status completely. There is no longer any holy land except in a travel brochure—a distinctly commercial artifact. The non-holy status of the land was not changed by the formation of the State of Israel in 1948, contrary to Zionists and dispensationalists. God dwells equally with all of His chosen Trinitarian people today; they approach Him judicially only in oaths and sacraments.⁵ Land ownership in the New Covenant has moved from the legal status of holy to that of commerce. While land ownership may possess special characteristics because of the commitment that men some times have to a family residence, their constant movement from place to place has undermined this traditional commitment. In the United States, where one-fifth of the population moves each year, land ownership is no longer widely regarded as fundamentally different from the ownership of other forms of wealth. The mobility of people has undermined any lingering sense of the holiness of land. Men move geographically today in terms of the free market's demand for their labor or their land. This has led to the psychological de-sacralization of land.⁶ This psychological de-

5. God has a special protecting relationship with the Jews as self-professed covenantal heirs of Old Covenant Israel insofar as He preserves their separate identity in history. He does this in order to fulfill Paul's prophecy regarding Old Covenant Israel, the branch which God has cut off: "And they also, if they abide not still in unbelief, shall be grafted in: for God is able to graff them in again. For if thou wert cut out of the olive tree which is wild by nature, and wert grafted contrary to nature into a good olive tree: how much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive tree?" (Rom. 11:23–24). But these disinherited heirs of Moses can reclaim their share of the inheritance only by becoming Christians and joining Christ's church. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 8.

6. It has also led to a loosening of the bond between the owner and the physical object owned. Schumpeter wrote in 1942: "Dematerialized, defunctionalized and absentee ownership does not impress and call forth moral allegiance as the vital form of property did." Joseph Schumpeter, Capitalism, Socialism, and Democracy (New York:

sacralization process is less advanced in Europe and parts of Asia, but as the free market extends its influence, mobility replaces permanence in every area of life. The free market erodes the sense of geographical community. Neither the local community nor the land retains men's permanent allegiance. Consumer demand extends its sovereignty as men seek to maximize their incomes. Consumer demand is constantly changing; so are men's residences.⁷

C. Commerce and Purity

The biological purity of meat was not a judicial question. Neither was the ritual purity of the meat. The ritual purity of the eater was.

Because the eater's degree of holiness was based on his degree of permanence in the holy land, the meat was available for limited commerce. The market value of the meat would be determined by the market demand for it. The Israelite owner could act as the economic agent of two kinds of aliens: resident and non-resident. The seller could not legally accept an economic bid by a resident alien. The Israelite decided which alien would receive the carcass of the animal. Charity would govern the transfer of ownership to the resident alien; commerce would govern the transfer to the non-resident alien.

The purity of the land became an economic advantage to the non-resident alien: subsidized meat. He would be the only legal bidder in the auction for this kind of meat. This is another way of saying that it paid foreigners to do business inside the boundaries of Israel. The non-resident alien had an advantage over the residents of the land: oligopolistic⁸ access to the free market for this form of meat.

The purity of the land therefore served as an economic barrier to entry against a foreigner's resident alien status. A non-resident alien would forfeit his legal access to this segment of the meat market if he decided to take up permanent residence. He might occasionally be given free meat, but he could no longer bid commercially for this form of meat. This was a cost of becoming a resident. Yet the imposition of this cost was unique: the loss of an indirect subsidy. A nation that offered an indirect subsidy to non-resident foreigners was unique in the ancient world.

Harper, [1942] 1947), p. 142.

7. Part of this mobility is a product of government-guaranteed long-term loans in which part of the risk of default by the debtor is borne by taxpayers rather than lenders. This coercive arrangement has subsidized mobility and has undermined community. So have government-funded highway systems.

8. Technically speaking, oligopsonistic: one class of lawful buyers.

God did not waste this form of meat, yet He did impose tight holiness restrictions on His people. The animal would not be totally worthless just because it had died of natural causes. There would be a market for its meat. This saved the Israelite from a total loss. But this law did impose some loss on the Israelites: a restricted market. There were economic costs of holiness.

Concerns about holiness did not eliminate the market in this case. Did they eliminate the market in other cases? What about unclean animals? Were they under similar restrictions: total for Israelites, partial for resident aliens, and non-existent for non-residents? Could an Israelite lawfully sell pork to non-resident aliens?

The purity laws were designed for the sake of the land. The degree of one's legal connection to the land marked the degree of restriction in the case of the animal that had died naturally. Such deaths would occur from time to time. The economic question was this: How to minimize this loss without compromising the purity of the land? The law allowing meat sales to non-resident aliens reduced the risk to Israelites of raising ritually clean animals. There would at least be some local demand for such dead beasts. But had this specific limitation on unavoidable losses been applied generally, it would have led to the commercialization of unclean foods. For example, had it been legal for Israelites to sell pork to non-resident aliens, some Israelites would have begun commercial ventures for this purpose. The land would have become filled with unclean beasts, thereby increasing the likelihood of prohibited contacts by Israelites with such beasts. So, in order to reduce the economic loss imposed by the unforeseen death of a clean animal, the Mosaic law made two exceptions to the rule against eating ritually clean animals that died naturally. This reduced economic risk in the clean-animal industry. But the Mosaic law did not encourage the production of unclean animals by opening up a local market for them. Commerce was not supposed to increase the number of ritually impure animals; it was merely to decrease the economic risk of an unforeseen loss of a clean animal.

This law must have increased the slaughter of sick but ritually clean animals. The owner's risk of losing access to the broader commercial market increased as a clean animal aged or grew sick. He knew that if it died, the market for its remains would shrink dramatically. To avoid the requirement of providing non-resident aliens with an economic subsidy—reduced competition for such meat on the demand side—the Israelite had to kill the animal before it died of natural causes. Also, a weak animal would become easy prey of wild beasts. If they got to the animal first, only the dogs would benefit. It should be clear that the economics of the Mosaic law encouraged the slaying of clean animals. The holiness of the land led to the slaying of ritually clean animals. Blood would be shed for the benefit of the righteous. The blood of animals would be poured into the land. “Only ye shall not eat the blood; ye shall pour it upon the earth as water” (Deut. 12:16).⁹

D. The Annulment of the Mosaic Land Laws

The fact that meat which was prohibited to an Israelite could lawfully be sold to a non-resident alien indicates that this law was a land law. He who had no legal attachment to the land had legal access to a commercial market for such meat. The purity of the land was not threatened by the consumption of such meat by aliens. The holiness of the land was not threatened in this case by the eating habits of those with no covenantal connection to the land.

This is another piece of evidence that the Mosaic food laws were land laws, not health laws or laws of moral purity. I have developed this thesis in my commentary on Leviticus.¹⁰ The food laws protected the land’s holy status as God’s place of residence. These laws tended to keep foreigners out of the nation who might otherwise settle there. Food laws were barriers to entry. People had to change their diets or their budgets when they entered Israel. People do not like to change their diets or their budgets. It takes a strong-willed person to make a break with his nation’s culinary tradition. If this break must become permanent, it takes considerable will. The cost of maintaining an imported diet was high. It was legal, but the availability of prohibited meat¹¹ would have been reduced below what it would otherwise have been, had there been no dietary laws. Those who were not covenanted with the God of Israel would have had either an emotionally difficult time adjusting their diets or a costly time inside the land for not adjusting.

The holy status of the land of Israel ended with the advent of the church. Jesus had predicted this to the Jews: “Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation

9. See also Leviticus 7:26–27; 17:10–14; 19:26; Deuteronomy 12:23; 15:23.

10. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 21:C.

11. It would have been salted or smoked; there was no refrigeration.

bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43). This prophecy was definitively fulfilled with His death and resurrection: the giving of the Great Commission to the church (Matt. 28:18–20).¹² It was extended progressively after the sending of the Holy Spirit to the church (Acts 2). It was finally fulfilled with the fall of Jerusalem, when the temple sacrifices ended forever.

E. The Annulment of the Mosaic Food Laws

The Mosaic food laws had no connection with health considerations. God had not subjected Noah and Abraham to increased health risks by allowing them to eat whatever they wanted. God's covenant with Abraham looked forward to the conquest of the land, but it did not impose either land laws or food laws. The food laws were holiness laws established to reinforce the holiness of the land. This is why they were announced by Moses, not by Abraham or Noah. After the fall of Jerusalem, these laws were finally annulled. But Jesus had already announced their definitive demise. "Not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man; but that which cometh out of the mouth, this defileth a man" (Matt. 15:11). Peter had received a revelation from God regarding the definitive annulment of the food laws.

On the morrow, as they went on their journey, and drew nigh unto the city, Peter went up upon the housetop to pray about the sixth hour: And he became very hungry, and would have eaten: but while they made ready, he fell into a trance, And saw heaven opened, and a certain vessel descending unto him, as it had been a great sheet knit at the four corners, and let down to the earth: Wherein were all manner of four footed beasts of the earth, and wild beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air. And there came a voice to him, Rise, Peter; kill, and eat. But Peter said, Not so, Lord; for I have never eaten any thing that is common or unclean. And the voice spake unto him again the second time, What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common. This was done thrice: and the vessel was received up again into heaven (Acts 10:9–16).

Peter understood what this revelation meant. As he announced to Cornelius, the centurion: "Ye know how that it is an unlawful thing for a man that is a Jew to keep company, or come unto one of another nation; but God hath shewed me that I should not call any man common or unclean” (Acts 10:28). This was an announcement by God to the world that the land of Israel had definitively lost its separate judicial status. Peter forgot. Paul later called it to his attention.

12. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

But when Peter was come to Antioch, I withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed. For before that certain came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles: but when they were come, he withdrew and separated himself, fearing them which were of the circumcision. And the other Jews dissembled like wise with him; in-somuch that Barnabas also was carried away with their dissimulation. But when I saw that they walked not uprightly according to the truth of the gospel, I said unto Peter before them all, If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews? (Gal. 2:11–14).

Calvin was adamant about the abolition of the Mosaic food laws. In his commentary on Acts 15, he ridiculed those who would revive any aspect of the food laws. Calvin was a master of invective, and we see it here:

As touching meats, after the abrogating of the law, God pronounceth that they are all pure and clean. If, on the other side, there start up a mortal man, making a new difference, forbidding certain, he taketh unto himself the authority and power of God by sacrilegious boldness. Of this stamp were the old heretics, Montanus, Priscillianus, the Donatists, the Tatians, and all the Encratites. Afterwards the Pope, to the end he might bind all those sects in a bundle, made a law concerning meats. And there is no cause why the patrons of this impiety should babble that they do not imagine any uncleanness in meats, but that men are forbidden to eat flesh upon certain days, to tame the flesh. For seeing they eat such meats as are most fit, both for delicacy and also for riot, why do they abstain from eating bacon, as from some great offence, save only because they imagine that that is unclean and polluted which is forbidden by the law of their idol? With like pride doth the tyranny of the Pope rage in all parts of life; for there is nothing wherein he layeth not snares to entangle the miserable consciences of men. But let us trust to the heavenly oracle, and freely despise all his inhibitions. We must always ask the mouth of the Lord, that we may thereby be assured what we may lawfully do; forasmuch as it was not lawful even for Peter to make that profane which was lawful by the Word of God.¹³

Anti-bacon babblers: Calvin had no toleration for such as these!

13. John Calvin, Commentary upon the Acts of the Apostles, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker, [1560] 1979), I, pp. 422–23.

Any attempt to revive the Mosaic food laws for any reason is a move leading out of the church. The only biblical food laws today apply exclusively to the Lord's Supper, a mandatory meal for Christians that is legally barred to non-Christians and non-members of Christian churches. Lawful access to the Lord's Supper is by formal ecclesiastical oath and oath-sign: baptism.

Ever since Vatican II (1963–65), Roman Catholics have been allowed to eat meat on Fridays. The prohibition had been based on abstinence for Good Friday's sake, not the Mosaic food laws' sake. Paul criticized this attitude as marking those who have departed from the faith (I Tim. 4:1): "Forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth" (I Tim. 4:3).¹⁴ Today, the prohibition against meat on Fridays does not exist. Catholics have finally adopted the Protestants' position. It took a long time. There has been no admission by the hierarchy that the Protestants were right after all. That is not how bureaucracies operate. The truth is, theological modernists have infiltrated the Roman Catholic Church. This would be an even more embarrassing official admission. An embarrassed silence covers the decision to abolish meatless Fridays. So, Catholics can now eat meat, but the Church, despite official proclamations by the Pope, welcomes homosexuals into its seminaries. A 2002 article in Newsweek reported that at St. John's Seminary in Camarillo, California, 30% to 70% of its students are either homosexuals or bisexuals. The school's rector admits that the figure may be as high as 50%. He also said, "I think we do a good job recruiting solid candidates, and welcome the opportunity to do better."¹⁵ Meanwhile, heterosexual men are avoiding the priesthood in droves.¹⁶ The Church was better off with meatless Fridays and fewer liberals. But those days are dead and gone.

Conclusion

The law allowing the sale of certain meats to non-resident aliens reduced the burden of an unforeseen loss due to the unexpected death

14. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 5.

15. David France, "Gays and the Seminary," Newsweek (May 20, 2002). (<http://bit.ly/SeminaryGays>) of a clean animal. This law also preserved the holiness of the land by placing restrictions on Israelites and resident aliens. The non-resident alien received an indirect economic subsidy because of this law. He could buy what Israelites and resident aliens could not.

16. Michael S. Rose, Goodbye, Good Men: How Liberals Brought Corruption into the Catholic Church (Washington, D.C.: Regnery, 2002).

The resident alien who bought such meat from an Israelite committed no civil crime. The Israelite who sold it to him did commit an ecclesiastical infraction. With respect to the locus of law enforcement, the food laws were to be enforced by priests, Levites, and family members; they were not civil laws. They had civil implications—citizenship through church membership—but not civil sanctions. If a non-resident alien sold such meat to a resident alien, neither of them committed an infraction, for neither was under the ecclesiastical covenant. This law was ecclesiastical, not civil. No civil penalties were specified. If an alien ate pork, the holiness of the land was not threatened. But ecclesiastical law did restrict what covenant-keeping Israelites could do with meat. This in turn affected market prices, which would have made unclean meat more expensive by reducing its production in Israel.

Prices were affected in Israel by the dietary laws, but there is no indication that these laws applied to resident aliens, other than the general prohibition of eating blood (Lev. 17:13), which was a Noachic law (Gen. 9:4) that is still in force (Acts 15:20, 29). This would explain why there were herds of pigs in Jesus' time (Matt. 8:30–32). Israelites could not lawfully produce unclean meat commercially, but resident aliens could. Resident aliens had faced a major problem when the jubilee law was enforced (which may have been never) in pre-exilic times: they could not buy permanent ownership of rural land. When enforced, this law would have tended to eliminate the permanent commercialization of unclean animals. The jubilee law surely would have made the development of permanent herds of such beasts unlikely, for the resident alien could not have counted on access to rural land after the jubilee. Only in the post-exilic era, when resident aliens at the time of Israel's return gained lawful permanent access to the land (Ezek. 47:21–23),¹⁷ would such herds have become more likely.

17. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 22.

TITHES OF CELEBRATION

Thou shalt truly tithe all the increase of thy seed, that the field bringeth forth year by year. And thou shalt eat before the LORD thy God, in the place which he shall choose to place his name there, the tithe of thy corn, of thy wine, and of thine oil, and the firstlings of thy herds and of thy flocks; that thou mayest learn to fear the LORD thy God always. And if the way be too long for thee, so that thou art not able to carry it; or if the place be too far from thee, which the LORD thy God shall choose to set his name there, when the LORD thy God hath blessed thee: Then shalt thou turn it into money, and bind up the money in thine hand, and shalt go unto the place which the LORD thy God shall choose: And thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for oxen, or for sheep, or for wine, or for strong drink, or for whatsoever thy soul desireth: and thou shalt eat there before the LORD thy God, and thou shalt rejoice, thou, and thine household, And the Levite that is within thy gates; thou shalt not forsake him; for he hath no part nor inheritance with thee. At the end of three years thou shalt bring forth all the tithe of thine increase the same year, and shalt lay it up within thy gates: And the Levite, (be cause he hath no part nor inheritance with thee,) and the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, which are within thy gates, shall come, and shall eat and be satisfied; that the LORD thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hand which thou doest (Deut. 14:22–29).

The theocentric focus of this law is stated in the text: “that thou mayest learn to fear the LORD thy God always” (v. 23). The context of this chapter is holiness. “For thou art an holy people unto the LORD thy God, and the LORD hath chosen thee to be a peculiar people unto himself, above all the nations that are upon the earth” (Deut. 14:2). This separated aspect of Israel was an aspect of boundaries: point three of the biblical covenant.¹

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012).

I have quoted the entire passage because there could be confusion if it is not seen as a unit. There is already sufficient confusion when it is seen as a unit. Sorting out the implications of Israel's system of tithes is a difficult process, as we shall see.

A. National and Local Festivals

Men fear nature, especially in agricultural societies. They seek ways to reduce this fear. "Save for a rainy day," men are told. They trust in our own devices. God told Israel that under His covenant, there would be plenty of sunny days ahead for covenant-keepers. He would provide the capital necessary to fund their celebrations. The discipline of tithing was designed to acknowledge their fear of God and reduce their fear of nature and history. The tithes of celebration were especially useful in this regard. They were a form of holy wastefulness. This wastefulness included the consumption of intoxicating liquors.² It was "eat, drink, and be merry, for tomorrow we live."

The initial tithe mentioned in this text was to be consumed by families and Levites at a central location (vv. 22–23). The central feasts were not tribal affairs. They were familistic, ecclesiastical, and national. Was this feast to be funded by a second tithe in addition to what was owed yearly to the Levites? The text indicates that it was. This tithe was used to fund the family's expenses at one of the three annual festivals, presumably Booths ("Tabernacles"), the post-harvest feast.

There was a second tithe of celebration: a third-year tithe (v. 28). This festival took place locally. Levites were invited, but so were strangers, widows, and orphans (v. 29). The presence of strangers indicates that this was not an ecclesiastical festival. Was it civil? Or was it something else entirely? Until we know what agency enforced it—which the text does not say—we cannot be sure.

These tithes were imposed by God. If the nation obeyed Him and paid them, He promised to bless them (v. 29). The question is: Were these civil taxes? God did not threaten to impose negative corporate sanctions on Israel if the state refused to impose penalties for any one's failure to tithe and participate in the festivals. Who, then, was the victim of a crime? For this to have been a matter of civil government, the invited attendees would have had to possess a lawful civil claim on other people's wealth. Not to have brought one's tithe to the festival would have been a matter of theft. There would have been some system of state-imposed restitution available to the victims. But the primary victims were the families that owed God the money. The lion's share of these expenditures was to be consumed by the actual wealth producers. The judicial problem here is to identify the earthly victims who could lawfully bring a lawsuit against the non-tithers. If these victims were widows, strangers, and orphans in general, how could they prove damages in particular? If this was impossible, then on what judicial basis could the state have acted on their behalf to collect from non-tithers in general in order to allocate to specific claimants?

2. See Appendix G: "Strong Drink."

This law stated that a tithe on the land was to be eaten in a central city (v. 24). All land-owning and land-leasing Israelites were required to journey to Jerusalem, presumably at the post-harvest feast of Booths. "Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, The fifteenth day of this seventh month shall be the feast of tabernacles for seven days unto the LORD" (Lev. 23:34). They were to celebrate together. They had to bring a tithe of their crops, which they would consume at the festival. To avoid carrying heavy crops to a distant city, and also to allow them to eat other crops brought in from other regions, they were allowed to sell their crops in their home city and buy whatever they wanted in Jerusalem.

This celebration was to serve as a reminder that their wealth did not depend on their efforts alone. This additional tithe might otherwise have been invested, but it had to be consumed. Men were asked to place their faith in God more than in thrift. The celebration declared: "There's a lot more where this came from!"

This was a tithe on the increase of rural land, as were all of the tithes in Israel. The annual tithe went to the Levites to compensate them for not being allowed to own rural land. It was their inheritance (Num. 18:21). The tithe was not left in the hands of the people who had produced it. I call the annual Levitical tithe the first tithe, following rabbinic tradition. It was Levi's inheritance.

In contrast was the second tithe: the tithe of national celebration. While the Levite had to be invited by land-owning families to celebrate (v. 27), he was not entitled to all of it or even the bulk of it. This was not the case in the first tithe. Rabbis have concluded that this was a second tithe.³ I agree with this assessment.

The first tithe was uniquely the possession of the Levites. It was therefore a matter of property rights. It was enforceable by civil courts.

3. Herbert Danby, note to Maaser Sheni ("Second Tithe"), which is a section of the First Division, Zera'im ("Seeds"), The Mishnah (New York: Oxford University Press, [1933] 1987), p. 73n.

B. The First Tithe

This was the tithe owed to the Levites as the tribe without an inheritance in land. “But the tithes of the children of Israel, which they offer as an heave offering unto the LORD, I have given to the Levites to inherit: therefore I have said unto them, Among the children of Israel they shall have no inheritance” (Num. 18:24). It was owed to them because they had no landed inheritance in rural areas. Their legal claim on the income of others was based on their lack of any original claim on the land. All net income in the land, except for the income of priests and Levites when they serving the Lord in ecclesiastical callings, was subjected to the first tithe.⁴

The seventh year was a year of simultaneous debt release throughout the land (Deut. 15).⁵ In that year, the land was to lie fallow (Lev. 25:4–5).⁶ A tithe was owed on whatever grew of its own accord and was harvested. It was owed on new animals born during the year. It was owed by those who derived income from sources other than agriculture.

Any attempt to explain the tithes of celebration as substitutes for the first tithe is an argument in favor of the expropriation of the Levites’ lawful inheritance. They had no inheritance in land, but they had a substitute inheritance: the tithe. To argue that these other tithes were substitutes is to argue that the Levites were disinherited by this law. They would have had to forfeit their income in order to make celebrations possible for land owners. Clearly, a tithe of celebration was an additional tithe. The questions are: Who had to pay it? Who enforced it?

C. The Second Tithe

The second tithe was a tithe solely on agricultural output. The text is clear on this. “Thou shalt truly tithe all the increase of thy seed, that the field bringeth forth year by year. And thou shalt eat before the LORD thy God, in the place which he shall choose to place his name there, the tithe of thy corn, of thy wine, and of thine oil, and the first-

4. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: [1997] 2012), ch. 10.

5. Chapter 36.

6. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 23.

lings of thy herds and of thy flocks. . .” (vv. 22–23). Those who lived in cities did not pay it. All income not derived from agriculture was exempt. Agricultural land owners paid the second tithe in six out of seven years.

The second tithe had to be consumed in the central city of worship. This is why the prohibition in Deuteronomy 12:17–18 against eating the tithe in one’s own gates has to refer to the national tithe of celebration: “Thou mayest not eat within thy gates the tithe of thy corn, or of thy wine, or of thy oil, or the firstlings of thy herds or of thy flock, nor any of thy vows which thou vowest, nor thy freewill offerings, or heave offering of thine hand: But thou must eat them before the LORD thy God in the place which the LORD thy God shall choose, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter, and thy manservant, and thy maidservant, and the Levite that is within thy gates: and thou shalt rejoice before the LORD thy God in all that thou puttest thine hands unto.”

If the central city was too far away for a family to carry the tithed goods, the family could sell the goods locally for money. This money had to be spent on food and drink at the celebration (v. 25). The rabbis concluded that these agricultural goods could be redeemed lawfully only by an added payment of one-fifth to the Levites.⁷ This rule is not found in this text. The rabbis appealed to what appear to be similar texts, such as this one: “And all the tithe of the land, whether of the seed of the land, or of the fruit of the tree, is the LORD’S: it is holy unto the LORD. And if a man will at all redeem ought of his tithes, he shall add thereto the fifth part thereof” (Lev. 27:30–31). The rabbis were incorrect. The law in Leviticus governed an item owed to God, such as an animal, that the family wanted to keep. For the privilege of buying back what was God’s, the family paid a 20% premium to the Levite. This was money paid in lieu of the Levites’ receiving the designated commodity. This was not the situation with the second tithe. There was no element of redemption in this tithe. This tithe was under the authority of the family, not the Levite. The family was not redeeming something that belonged to God. It was merely changing the form in which the tithe would be carried to Jerusalem.

The Levites had a claim to part of the second tithe: participation in meals. Strangers, widows, and orphans did not.

When widely obeyed, this law would have led to an increase in the demand for money locally at the time of the national festival. The demand for money would have increased at a higher rate in regions farther away from the central city, because of the higher transportation costs. The price of agricultural goods would have been lower than in Jerusalem in these distant areas, which is another way of saying that there was an increased demand for money locally. At the same time, demand for agricultural goods would have increased in the central city because travelers brought their money into the city to buy the food consumed during the celebration: "More money chasing fewer goods."

7. Danby, op. cit., p. 73.

The fall in the price of agricultural goods in the outlying regions and the parallel rise in the money price of such goods in the central city would have produced profit opportunities for specialists in agricultural transportation. They would have been able to buy goods in the distant regions in order to move them to the central city and sell them to the attendees. They would have "bought low and sold high." Moving goods from places where they are in low demand to a place where they are in high demand is an important market service. It would have been performed by specialists. Families would have estimated which was more profitable to them: carrying the bulky goods to Jerusalem vs. paying higher prices for them there.

D. The Third Tithe

This tithe was long ago called the third tithe. Tobit, written in the third century before Christ, referred to it.

But I alone went often to Jerusalem for the feasts, as it is ordained for all Israel by an everlasting decree. Taking the first fruits and the tithes of my produce and the first shearings, I would give these to the priests, the sons of Aaron, at the altar. Of all my produce I would give a tenth to the sons of Levi who ministered at Jerusalem; a second tenth I would sell, and I would go and spend the proceeds each year at Jerusalem; the third tenth I would give to those to whom it was my duty, as Deborah my father's mother had commanded me, for I was left an orphan by my father (Tobit 1:6–8; New Revised Standard Version).

Josephus, in his Antiquities of the Jews, written late in the first century A.D., wrote this:

Besides those two tithes, which I have already said you are to pay every year, the one for the Levites, the other for the festivals, you are to bring every third year a third tithe to be distributed to those that want; to women also that are widows, and to children that are orphans. But as to the ripe fruits, let them carry that which is ripe first of all into the temple; and when they have blessed God for that land which bare them, and which he had given them for a possession, when they have also offered those sacrifices which the law has commanded them to bring, let them give the first-fruits to the priests (IV:VIII:22–23; Whiston translation).

Nevertheless, Jewish commentators have regarded the second and third tithes as one.⁸ Their interpretation is incorrect. There was a third tithe. It was different in at least two ways from the second tithe. First, the celebration was held locally. Second, non-citizens in the community were invited in to celebrate, in addition to Levites. “At the end of three years thou shalt bring forth all the tithe of thine increase the same year, and shalt lay it up within thy gates: And the Levite, (because he hath no part nor inheritance with thee,) and the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, which are within thy gates, shall come, and shall eat and be satisfied; that the LORD thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hand which thou doest” (vv. 28–29). This was a tithe of celebration, but it was communal rather than national. It was a tithe for the sake of the judicially dispossessed.

There may have been a third distinction having to do with the tax base: a tithe on any increase, not just agricultural. This depends on the meaning of this verse: “At the end of three years thou shalt bring forth all the tithe of thine increase the same year, and shalt lay it up within thy gates” (v. 28). If we interpret these words as governed by the context of the second tithe, then this was a substitute for the second tithe. But the substitution clearly was not strict. The festival was held locally. Local residents other than Levites were invited. Town residents were likely to be members of the same tribe as the rural land owners who lived in the surrounding area. I regard this celebration as tribal. It was not national. The question arises: Did the third tithe apply to all income? If we see this tithe as primarily tribal, and if we also see the cities as part of the tribes’ inheritance, then the third tithe may have been required on all forms of net income. On the other hand, if this is interpreted within the context of the introductory verses, it applied only to agriculture.

8. John Gill, An Exposition of the Old Testament, 4 vols. (London: Collingridge, [1763] 1852), I, p. 745. Gill had greater knowledge of the primary sources of early Judaism than any other Christian Bible commentator. His contemporary, John Lightfoot, came close. Alfred Edersheim, a convert from Judaism, knew the sources well, but he not a Bible commentator.

This may seem like a small matter, but it is central to understanding welfare economics from the biblical perspective. If the tithes of celebration were tithes exclusively on the land, imposed because the land was not part of the Levites' original inheritance and from which they were excluded by the jubilee law, then the state had a legitimate role in enforcing these tithes. It was a matter of defending the original agreed-upon terms of the allocation of private property at the time of the conquest. But the celebration tithes were consumed mainly by the producers. The Levites had a claim only on a small portion of this wealth. Also, the third tithe went in part to subsidize attendance by non-Levites. On what legal basis did they possess a claim on the income of anyone else? What legal principle undergirded this law, assuming that this law mandated state wealth-redistribution? If the state was authorized to enforce the third tithe on land owners, then the Mosaic law did authorize a form of coercive wealth-redistribution, although extremely small, in this instance.

In the third year, this special tithe of celebration was shared with those residents who were not eligible, apart from adoption, to become citizens in the local tribe. This tithe is generally referred to as the poor tithe, but a prosperous stranger or widow was also to be invited. The rabbinic assumption was that members of these four categories—widows, orphans, strangers, and Levites—would have been poor, but there is no reason to assume that Levites were poor.

The correct classification of these attendees is judicial, not economic. The stranger and the orphan (a minor) were not eligible to serve in the Lord's army. They could therefore not be citizens. The Levite had no inheritance in the land. He could not be a citizen in the tribe in which his city was located unless it was a Levitical city. He served in a separate military unit, one which defended the Ark of the Covenant.⁹ The widow, though the head of a household, was not eligible to serve in the army. She was an heir only through her husband and her children when they reached adulthood. She could not hold civil office because she was not under the family authority of a man who was himself eligible to serve in the army and therefore as a judge.¹⁰ While any of these guests at the festival may have been poor, the criterion for being invited to the festival was not their poverty.

9. North, Sanctions and Dominion, ch. 2:B–C.

10. I conclude that Deborah served as a judge because she was married and not a widow.

Rather, it was their lack of judicial standing as citizens. They were not eligible to hold civil office in the local tribe. Thus, to call this third-year tithe a poor tithe is incorrect, although Jewish tradition so labels it. It had to do with the beneficiaries' judicial status, not their economic status.

E. The Levites' Lawful Inheritance

The Levites had no rural landed inheritance in Israel. The other tribes did. The tithe on the land was the Levites' inheritance. This leads me to a conclusion: anything that undermined the tithe on the land undermined Levi's inheritance. If the interpretation of any Mosaic law led to the legalization of an exemption from the first tithe, this interpretation had the economic effect of disinheriting Levi.

If those who enjoyed the fruit of the land could gain a competitive advantage over other land owners by legally refusing to pay the first tithe, then the Levites would be steadily disinherited. If a leaseholder or land owner could legally have retained an extra 10% per year, six years out of seven, using this money to invest in tools, seeds, or whatever, stewardship over the land would have been exercised increasingly by non-tithers. This would have been true in the case of covenant-breaking Israelites as well as covenant-breaking resident aliens.

This leads to a very important conclusion, one which I had not seen before I began interpreting the laws governing the tithes of celebration. There was an implicit clause built into God's original grant of land: the primary tithe of the land belonged to Levi. This was Levi's inheritance. This clause guaranteed that Levi could not be disinherited by covenant-breakers who refused to pay the first tithe. Because the other tribes inherited rural land, Levi inherited the first tithe.

The state enforces contracts. Under the Mosaic covenant prior to the exile, the appropriate civil sanction for refusing to pay tithes on the land must have been the disinheritance of the tithe-protester. This sanction was applied on the basis of Levi's lawful inheritance. It was not a civil enforcement of an ecclesiastical obligation. It was a civil enforcement of Levi's tribal inheritance. The judicial issue was Levi's inheritance, not the theological commitment of the land's steward. My conclusion is that the resident alien could lease rural land, but he had to pay the first tithe to the Levites. The original owner could not alienate—literally—Levi's inheritance by leasing his land to an alien. Levi had an enforceable legal claim on a portion of the output of the nation's rural land. This means that the civil government enforced the payment of the first tithe. This was not a matter of the state subsidizing the church. It was a matter of lawful inheritance: the enforcement of legal title. As surely as a family's title to rural land was enforceable by the state, so was the Levites' title to the first tithe. The Mosaic tithe was therefore different from the New Testament's tithe. The church has no legal claim on the public's income, or even on its members' income. This solves the judicial problem of the first tithe, but not the many problems of the second and third tithes.

Were the tithes of celebration part of Levi's inheritance? Part of these tithes was. The Levites had to be invited to the festivals. The legal question is this: Could the economic portion of this obligation have been met without the participation of the land's steward in the festival? That is, could he have paid the Levites a portion of these tithes, thereby fulfilling his obligation? The law does not say. We must guess. It is not an easy guess.

The Levites had a right to attend the celebrations, i.e., participation in the life of the nation, which included celebrations. Did this mean that the Levites had a right to celebrate in the presence of those who served as the land's stewards? Was there more to their claims beyond money for food? If we answer yes, then the non-Israelite leaseholder or excommunicated Israelite had to attend the celebrations on threat of civil sanctions. What sanctions? The law does not say. Perhaps it was the forcible removal of the leaseholder from the property. If so, this would have been a very costly penalty, at least during Israel's agricultural phase.

Who was authorized to enforce the claims of the Levites? If this law was strictly ecclesiastical, then the Levites had this power: excommunication. This certainly would have been a self-interested enforcement system. The judges would have been the stated beneficiaries of the law. Did they possess this authority to judge in first-tithe cases? They shared this authority. The tithe was owed to them because they were the priestly tribe, and also because they had a legal claim based on their lack of landed inheritance. Both church and state were authorized by God to enforce the first tithe.

Then why not also the second and third tithes, at least with respect to participation by the Levites? There seems to be no good reason not to assume that this was the case. The problem comes with respect to institutionally enforceable claims by the other participants: widows, orphans and strangers. This raises the issue of Israel as a welfare state. Did the Mosaic civil law force one group of residents to finance annual festivals for others? It is not easy to make such a case based on the textual evidence here.

These were feasts to honor God: “that thou mayest learn to fear the LORD thy God always.” They were feasts to which Levites had to be invited. Were the feasts somehow exclusively civil and therefore compulsory? Only to the extent that the Levites possessed a civil legal claim on being invited to attend. At most, the civil character of these festivals, if any, would have authorized the state to enforce a claim on some food and drink—hardly a major expense. The suggestion that the state had the authority to compel attendance at a religious festival is foreign to everything else we know of the Mosaic law. But if the state did possess this authority, we have problems: the resident alien and the excommunicated Israelite. These people were legally able to lease rural land, even though they could not purchase it in pre-exilic Israel. This raises some important judicial issues, which are never discussed by the commentators.

F. Alien Leaseholders

It is clear from the text that the second tithe was a tithe on the produce of the land. This raises the question of the leaseholder. It was legal for an owner to lease his land to another person for up to 49 years—until the jubilee (Lev. 25:10).¹¹ The question arises: Could this leaseholder have been a resident alien? The Bible does not say. It was legal to lease out the land to another person (Lev. 25:25–28). It was also legal to sell oneself to a resident alien (Lev. 25:47–54).¹² We must discover the answer by means of other principles of biblical law, as well as by their implications. What is said here of a resident alien is also true of an excommunicated Israelite.

Next, was a resident alien or an excommunicant required to pay any tithe of celebration? The text does not say. It would make the expositor’s task much easier if it did.

The tithe of celebration was a tithe on the land’s produce, year by year. Did the alien or excommunicant have to attend these festivals and spend his tithe? That is, did the state have the right to compel anyone to attend a festival? Clearly, the Levites did not possess ecclesiastical authority when dealing with an alien or an excommunicant. I can see nothing in the Mosaic law to indicate that the state possessed such authority.

11. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 24.

12. Ibid., ch. 31.

Did the state or the church lawfully enforce these tithes? If it was only the church, then the church's threat of excommunication and, as a result, loss of citizenship held no terrors for an uncircumcised resident alien. He was not a citizen. Then what was the meaningful sanction against him if he refused to pay this tithe? Could the state have forced the resident alien to leave the leased land? If so, was he entitled to a refund from the Israelite land owner whom he had paid? That would have placed a heavy burden on the land owner, who had put his money to other uses. Removal from the land was a heavy economic burden on a family that refused to attend a festival. It would have amounted to confiscation of property on a huge scale. On whose behalf? To what victim had the alien owed the tithe? To God by way of Himself, mainly. It does not seem biblical to argue that the state had any jurisdiction over the resident alien in this matter, with the possible exception of paying for a Levite's food and drink, who was owed support based on the original land distribution. Yet even this was unlikely. The Levites' claim was on the first tithe. A man who refused to attend a festival owed nothing to someone else.

My conclusion is that no covenantal agency possessed the authority to enforce attendance or support by a resident alien or excommunicant. This conclusion, however, leads to an unexpected conclusion. If it was lawful for a resident alien or an excommunicant to avoid paying all tithes of celebration, he could operate with a much lower overhead than a covenant-keeping Israelite could. He could spend the money locally or else reinvest it. He would have been able to purchase capital by avoiding the celebrations. Over time, this would have given him a major advantage, as his extra returns compounded. The non-participating resident alien would have had an advantage over Israelites in bidding for control over the land. This would have tended to transfer stewardship over land to those who were not heirs of the conquest. They could have leased the land from Israelites, paid a token amount to finance food once a year for a local Levite, and invested the difference. Other things being equal, they would eventually have displaced the Israelites from agriculture. The Israelite land owners would have done well by leasing their land to aliens and excommunicants, so they would not have remained on the land.

Therefore, if the tithe law was not enforced by the state, the celebration tithes would have tended to push (lure) tithe-paying Israelites off their land and into the cities, leaving non-tithing resident aliens and excommunicated Israelites in control of the land. Such people did take control of the land during Israel's exile, but this was understood a curse on Israel. Did the Mosaic law subsidize a result which was similar to the result of the captivity? Was land stewardship distributed in favor of covenant-breakers? This, surely, is an unexpected application of the Mosaic law.

Under such an interpretation, this tithing law was self-defeating. It was a tithe on agriculture only. Urban Israelites escaped it, and so could resident aliens who leased rural land for farming. Who, then, would pay it? A strange law, indeed!

An alternative to this interpretation is to deny that the resident alien or excommunicant had the right to lease land in Mosaic Israel, precisely because he could not be effectively pressured ecclesiastically to celebrate in Jerusalem. If any such a prohibition on land ownership had been enforced, there would have been costs imposed on Israel's economy. Owners would have received lower bids for leasing their land, since aliens and excommunicated Israelites would not have been allowed to bid. The land would not have been used by the most efficient producers. Of course, the tithes of celebration were not imposed for short-term efficiency's sake.

The problem here is that a covenant-keeping resident alien would have been discriminated against by such a prohibition. Why shouldn't he have been allowed to act as a steward of the land? On what legal grounds could he have been excluded? Wasn't one law in Israel to govern all men (Ex. 12:49)?¹³ What was the covenantal basis of such an exception? Where was the justice of such an exclusion? The fact that some resident aliens might not pay the tithes of celebration was not much of a reason to exclude aliens from leasing agricultural land.

G. Who Enforced the Third-Year Tithe?

The third tithe confuses things even more. Others besides Levites were to be invited in. Did the land owner owe them a place at his table, on threat of civil sanctions? Was the civil government the enforcing agent? If it was, then we have here an example of the welfare state in action. Unlike the Levites, these guests had no legal claim based on the original inheritance. If the state lawfully forced a recalcitrant land owner to invite them in, then they were not guests. They were welfare state clients. They were beneficiaries of state coercion. Did God mandate such a system in His law?

13. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 14.

Then there is the question of who was required to pay. Was it every local Israelite or just local land users? On what legal basis would landless people in a town have owed the guests anything? Not by a distinction between original landed inheritance and the absence thereof. Urban land had not been part of the original inheritance that was excluded from the Levites. Levites lived in towns and could buy property. Were landless urban dwellers required to subsidize other landless urbanites, who had no civil claim on the output of non-rural property? Was this an incipient form of state-funded "bread and circuses" in the Mosaic law?

Well, which is it? How was this law enforced? Here are the four choices. First, the state compelled land owners and leaseholders to attend religious festivals on threat of losing their land or some other civil sanction. Second, the state compelled land owners and leaseholders to provide free meals for an indeterminate number of strangers during third-year festivals, with double restitution to these unidentified victims if they refused to pay. Third, because the state could not legally compel payment of celebration tithes, it prohibited non-tithing resident aliens and excommunicants from leasing rural land, in order to avoid indirectly subsidizing non-tithers. Fourth, the state had no authority in this area; instead, the Levites lawfully enforced the celebration tithe laws. But because the Levites had this exclusively ecclesiastical authority, they had no way of enforcing these laws on resident aliens and excommunicants, i.e., they had no meaningful sanctions to impose. Therefore, because no covenantal institution possessed effective negative sanctions in this area, non-paying resident aliens and excommunicants would have gained a competitive advantage in agriculture and would have steadily displaced paying Israelites from the land. Because non-tithers would progressively dominate the land, and urban Israelites were not required to pay, this law had to become a dead letter. It was inherently unenforceable. If so, then why did God announce it?

Let us review the options in greater detail. Did the state impose negative sanctions for non-attendance? If so, this law violated the biblical legal principle of victim's rights.¹⁴ Who was the victim of a refusal to attend? To whom did the criminal owe restitution? To himself? This makes no sense.

Did the state compel wealth-redistribution? The feasts were by invitation only. In this sense, this law was like the gleaning law (Deut. 24:19–22).¹⁵ Those with assets—land owners—were required by God to invite others to share their wealth. But this was not a civil law. No bureaucrats provided the land owners with lists of those who had to be invited. Then who were the identifiable victims? Which uninvited strangers had a legal claim on which land owner's hospitality? Which widows? Which orphans? How did the judges allocate the percentage owed by land users to specific uninvited victims? How would such assessments have been determined without creating an arbitrary judicial system? This view of state power is so far removed from the Mosaic law that it, too, makes no sense.

Did the state prohibit resident aliens and excommunicants from leasing land—not just nonpaying ones, but all of them? To allow only paying ones to lease land would have meant that the state had the power to compel attendance by removing nonpaying ones from the land. We are back to the first choice: state compulsion. So, did biblical law discriminate, on the basis of ecclesiastical membership, against would-be farmers? If so, Israel was not merely a theocracy; it was an ecclesiocracy. But the Mosaic law indicates that Israel was not an ecclesiocracy. Is this law an exception? This is possible, but I am unwilling to take this huge exegetical step. Surely such a view of this law's implications violates the principle of the rule of law.

This leaves one final choice: this law was institutionally unenforceable. We must therefore accept its economic implication: non-tithers would have possessed a competitive advantage in farming. This would have moved non-tithers onto the land and tithers into the cities, where they would no longer have been required to pay celebration tithes.

H. Old Wineskins

Built into the Mosaic land laws were at least two self-destruct clauses. This law was one of them. The other one was the jubilee land law. The jubilee law mandated that rural land be returned to the heirs of the conquest every half century. A growing population—one of God's promises to Israel for obeying His law—meant ever-smaller parcels of land. This in turn meant a declining share of family income derived from agricultural output. This tithe law was a parallel law. Over time, the covenantal faithfulness of Israel would have reduced the value of any tithe on income from land. As time went by, no family could count on much from its landed inheritance. Meanwhile, the costs of celebrating would have gone up. The larger the population, the more expensive festival rent rates in Jerusalem would be.

14. Gary North, Victim's Rights: The Biblical View of Civil Justice (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnvictim>)

15. Chapter 62.

This law pointed ahead to a day when the old wineskins of the Mosaic land laws would be broken by the new wine of population growth. The Mosaic land laws were inherently anti-rural. They subsidized urbanization. This is not surprising. Biblical eschatology points to a city: Zion, the city of God (Zech. 8; Rev. 21; 22). Israel's land laws were designed to push Israelites off the land and into the cities. Eventually, these laws would have pushed them out of the Promised Land. When enforced, the jubilee inheritance law would have promoted emigration out of Israel. It would have pushed men into occupations that were connected to foreign trade rather than domestic agriculture. The rural land inheritance law therefore promoted contact with foreigners. This was an aspect of the dominion covenant. It was to serve as a means of evangelism. The story of Israel, her laws, and her God was to spread abroad (Deut. 4:5–8).

The landed inheritance of Canaan was temporary. Men who paid careful attention to the Mosaic law would have seen that Israel was like Eden: a temporary training camp for worldwide dominion. The land of Israel was both a boot camp and headquarters. The diaspora was an inescapable concept for Israel. Either the nation would rebel against God, avoid population growth, and be carried into captivity, or else it would obey God, grow, and extend God's kingdom across the face of the earth. In either case, they could not remain bottled up inside Israel's geographical boundaries. Israel chose the first approach, twice: pre-exilic and post-crucifixion.

In between the conquest and the Babylonian captivity, what about the implicit subsidy to nonpaying resident aliens and excommunicants? Other things being equal, they would have inherited rural land—not as owners but as actual users. But the per capita value of this landed inheritance would have fallen steadily in times of national obedience: ever-smaller plots. Besides, other things are not equal. This law was given “that the LORD thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hand which thou doest.” Obedience to God would have brought national blessings. Even with growing festival nonparticipation in the countryside, the urban faithful would have continued to celebrate voluntarily with their growing nonagricultural incomes, leaving the nonparticipants to fall behind economically in the country side. The push of God’s kingdom in history is toward urban life.

I. New Testament Annulment and Restoration

The three temple-related annual festivals were aspects of Israel’s land laws and seed laws.¹⁶ The national festivals maintained geographical and ritual unity among the geographically dispersed tribes. These mandated journeys to a central location reminded the tribes of the centrality of the temple-altar, the Ark of the Covenant, the tablets of the law, and the geographically dispersed tribe of Levites. These celebrations were times of common confession.

There is no New Testament indication that any comparable national ceremony is to bind New Testament churches or residents of any covenanted Christian nation. The national feasts were tied explicitly to Jerusalem and the tabernacle; nothing like this geographical centrality exists under the New Covenant. The New Covenant substitutes the sacraments and decentralized worship for the temple festivals.

The third-year tithe of local celebration was not associated with the temple. It was a tribal affair. It involved a voluntary tax on the land and, if the inclusive language is taken literally, also on town residents. Those who were the contractual stewards of the land were required by God to pay both of these tithes, but no agency enforced this. One cost of leasing the land was participation in the festivals. But no one was forced by threat of formal sanctions to bear this cost.

Judicially, the second and third tithes were Mosaic land laws. The third tithe was also a seed law, having to do with the tribes. It required a communal celebration in local cities. These tithe laws were tied judicially to the conquest of Canaan. They were annulled when Israel’s unique status as owner of the Promised Land ceased in A.D. 70. Israel’s kingdom inheritance was transferred to the church, as Jesus had predicted (Matt. 21:43). Therefore, like the other land laws and seed laws, these two tithes did not extend into the New Covenant. Nevertheless, as examples of communal celebration, they serve us well. Christmas is a common time of communal celebration in the West. The American tradition of feeding the homeless a turkey dinner at Christmas bears a faint trace of the old Mosaic practice. But these common meals, while funded by the higher classes, have rarely been attended by them. There is no social mixing today of property owners, widows, orphans, and strangers. Something socially healing has been lost with the annulment of the older festival pattern.

16. On land laws and seed laws, see Appendix J.

Medieval Catholicism annually celebrated over one hundred holy days (holidays).¹⁷ Spain had 150 saints days and festival days as late as 1620.¹⁸ Beginning with Luther's recommendation, Protestants drastically reduced the number of such holidays.¹⁹ This led to an increased number of work days in Protestant nations. It also led to a sabbatarian rest pattern of one day in seven. This development has very nearly destroyed the idea of a church calendar. Liturgical churches that are closer to the medieval pattern are more likely to pay attention to the church calendar; the Presbyterian and Anabaptist traditions do not. In Puritan Massachusetts in the late seventeenth century, it was illegal to celebrate Christmas. The government assessed a fine for any violation.²⁰ Religious celebrations are suspect in the Puritan tradition. In some instances today, Christmas and Easter are not celebrated by strict Presbyterians, although this is rare.

With the rise of the trade union movement, the number of paid holidays increased. The number of religious holidays in Protestant nations is still small, usually consisting of Christmas eve and day, and Easter weekend. Christian celebrations today are generally confined to families and local churches. There is no equivalent of Mosaic Israel's compulsory national feast of celebration.

If the second and third tithes were annulled because of the replacement of Israel's covenant by the church, what of the Levitical tithe? It was a tribal entitlement. It was given to Levi in place of rural land. On what legal basis does it survive in the New Testament, since the other dozen tribes lost their landed inheritance? There are no priests who offer lawful sacrifices in the New Covenant.

17. Christopher Hill, Society and Puritanism in Pre-Revolutionary England, 2nd ed. (New York: Schocken, 1967), p. 146.

18. Ibid., p. 148.

19. Ibid., pp. 149–51.

20. May 11, 1659: Nathaniel B. Shurtleff (ed.), Records of the Governor and Company of the Massachusetts Bay in New England, 5 vols. (Boston: William White, Commonwealth Printer, 1853), V, p. 366.

J. Melchidezek

The tithe that constituted the first tithe is the most theocentric of all the economic laws of the Bible. It places God at the center of creation, i.e., the sovereign agent over creation. From at least the days of Abram to today, this primary tithe has been mandatory. The first mention of the tithe appears in Genesis 14, after Abram had returned from his victorious battle over Chedorlaomer. This took place before God established His covenant with Abram. This was a pre-circumcision practice. “And Melchizedek king of Salem brought forth bread and wine: and he was the priest of the most high God. And he blessed him, and said, Blessed be Abram of the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth: And blessed be the most high God, which hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand. And he gave him tithes of all” (Gen. 14:18–20). Only after Abram paid his tithe to a priest did God establish His covenant with him (Gen. 15).

Melchizedek’s announcement was theocentric: “. . . the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth: And blessed be the most high God, which hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand.” To pay a tithe to God’s priest was therefore Abram’s legal obligation. This was his acknowledgment that God is who Melchizedek said He is. Abram affirmed Melchizedek’s confession of faith by paying his tithe to Melchizedek. Abram subordinated himself to God confessionally by subordinating himself economically to the priest who represented God. He confessed a believable confession by affirming the truth of Melchizedek’s representative, mediatorial confession in Abram’s name and in God’s name. His public economic subordination to God’s priest validated his personal confession. He put his money where his mouth was. Only after he did this did God establish His covenant with him. In short, the historical basis of the Abrahamic covenant was Abram’s prior confession through economic subordination to God’s ordained priest. The meaning of Abram’s payment should be clear: *confessing man’s tithe is owed to the church.*²¹ This has never been clear to the church. Because of its confusion on this matter, the church of Jesus Christ has taken what amounts to a vow of poverty, thereby becoming a mendicant order: begging for Jesus.²²

There can be no question that such ecclesiastical positioning calls

21. Gary North, The Covenantal Tithe (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2011). Cf. Gary North, Tithing and the Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994). (<http://bit.ly/gntithing>)

22. North, Tithing and the Church, ch. 4.

into question the believability of the church's confession regarding the sovereignty of God in history. It may mimic Melchizedek's words, but it does not mimic Melchizedek's authority. Yet the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews affirmed that Jesus is the heir of Melchizedek, whose office is greater than any Levitical priest's:

For this Melchisedec, king of Salem, priest of the most high God, who met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings, and blessed him; To whom also Abraham gave a tenth part of all; first being by interpretation King of righteousness, and after that also King of Salem, which is, King of peace; Without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God; abideth a priest continually. Now consider how great this man was, unto whom even the patriarch Abraham gave the tenth of the spoils. And verily they that are of the sons of Levi, who receive the office of the priesthood, have a commandment to take tithes of the people according to the law, that is, of their brethren, though they come out of the loins of Abraham: But he whose descent is not counted from them received tithes of Abraham, and blessed him that had the promises. And without all contradiction the less is blessed of the better (Heb. 7:1–7).

The very office of Jesus as high priest comes from His inheritance of Melchizedek's office, who was superior to Abraham. This argument places the church as the legitimate successor and heir of Mosaic Israel, for the church traces its covenantal claim on the inheritance to Melchizedek, who was superior to Abraham. Yet the modern church ignores all this, for it refuses to lay judicial claim to a tenth of the income of its members. In refusing to assert its rightful claim to the tithe, the church publicly denies its authority as heir of Melchizedek through Jesus Christ. It compromises its confession of Melchizedek's confession: "Blessed be Abram of the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth: And blessed be the most high God, which hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand." The modern church refuses to affirm this confession, with its declaration that God brings predictable sanctions in history. It therefore refuses to impose a negative sanction on those members who refuse to tithe to the church: the revocation of voting membership.²³ Communicant members who refuse to place themselves under ecclesiastical authority should not be entitled to impose ecclesiastical authority over other members. Or, in the familiar slogan, "he who pays the piper calls the tune." Non-tithing members should not call the judicial tunes, including the election of those officers in charge of allocating church funds. But modern churches have ignored this principle, leading to their capture by theological liberals, who love to call the tunes with other people's money, an outlook they have in common with political liberals, who use tax funds rather than church funds to call the tunes.

23. Ibid., ch. 3.

Conclusion

Land owners were told by God to voluntarily set aside an extra 10% of their net agricultural income in six years out of seven in order to fund the national tithes of celebration. In the sabbatical year, land owners still had to attend feasts in Jerusalem, but they did not have to invite in strangers, widows, and Levites. Participation in these national feasts was to be financed by a special tithe on all rural land. Given the expenses and burdens of travel, it is likely that the feast of Booths served as the national tithe-feast. In the third year, however, rural land-owning families were required to allocate an additional tithe for a local celebration, inviting widows, orphans, strangers, and Levites to attend.

At these feasts, the head of a rural family was not to conserve funds. The family and its guests were required to consume the entire tithe. Nothing was to be held back. This was God's celebration. This freedom from economic restraints was manifested by the authorization of intoxicating drink as part of the national celebrations. This law countered excessive future-orientation. The future is in God's hands, just as the present is. The present has its lawful rewards. To "save for a rainy day" was legitimate in Mosaic Israel; on the other hand, never to celebrate God's sunny days was illegitimate. As an ethical model, the Mosaic tithes of celebration are valid in the New Covenant. They are not ecclesiastically mandatory, however.

The first tithe was Levi's inheritance in lieu of rural land. It was imposed on all rural land-generated income in Israel. This inheritance was enforceable in a civil court. It was a tribal inheritance, not an ecclesiastical inheritance as such.²⁴ The civil sanction was not specified. Loss of citizenship was one possibility. Actual confiscation is another. The tithe today is not connected to the conquest generation's distribution of land. It is therefore no longer a civil matter.

24. The New Covenant tithe is a Melchizedekan tithe, not a Levitical tithe (Heb. 7). This is why the state cannot legitimately enforce it. It is the church's moral claim on God's covenant people, not a legal claim enforceable in a civil court.

What of the second and third tithes on the land? They were neither civil nor ecclesiastically enforced, with the possible exception of payment for Levites' festival meals.

Because of the economic burden of these laws, nonpaying resident aliens and excommunicants would have gained control over rural agricultural land, other things being equal. God's grace, however, does not make things equal. He promised to bless the nation if they obeyed. If rural renters had refused to pay but urban dwellers did pay, God would have honored the urban faithful. This is why there are limits to humanistic economic analysis. The economists do not see the covenantal structure of economics, including growth theory.

The value of the land's output in a family's budget would have fallen over time in a growing population. This meant that there would come a day when these festival laws would be annulled by God in order to meet the new environment: urban life, emigration, and falling income from small-scale agriculture. The celebration tithe laws were old wineskins: designed by God to be broken, either by apostate rural non-tithers or by successful covenant-keepers who went abroad and did not return to the annual festivals except on rare occasions.

The first tithe extends into the New Covenant by way of Melchizedek. Jesus Christ is the high priest in the order of Melchizedek. Tithes are paid to Him by means of payments to His institutional church.

36

THE CHARITABLE LOAN

At the end of every seven years thou shalt make a release. And this is the manner of the release: Every creditor that lendeth ought unto his neighbour shall release it; he shall not exact it of his neighbour, or of his brother; because it is called the LORD'S release. Of a foreigner thou mayest exact it again: but that which is thine with thy brother thine hand shall release; Save when there shall be no poor among you; for the LORD shall greatly bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance to possess it. Only if thou carefully hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to observe to do all these commandments which I command thee this day (Deut. 15:1–5).

The theocentric focus of this law is God's sabbath: point four of the biblical covenant. Its context is law in general: "to observe to do all these commandments which I command thee this day." This is ethics: point three.

A. Debt Relief

There had to be scheduled periods of rest in the Promised Land: for the land itself, for agricultural workers, for domesticated farm animals, and for at least one form of debt: the morally mandatory, non-interest-bearing charitable loan. God had rested on the seventh day; Israel was to rest in the seventh year. The law of the sabbath was announced in the fourth commandment. This placed it under point four of the biblical covenant model: oath/sanctions.¹

The release from work was a positive sanction. So was the release from debt. "Forgive us our debts" (Matt. 6:12) remains a valid prayer.²

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 24.

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 12.

This release from debt was called the Lord's release. The Hebrew word here translated as "release," shawmat, means "rest" or "throw down." The mandatory resting of the land in the seventh year is related grammatically to the release from debt: "But the seventh year thou shalt let it rest and lie still; that the poor of thy people may eat: and what they leave the beasts of the field shall eat. In like manner thou shalt deal with thy vineyard, and with thy oliveyard" (Ex. 23:11).³

God's blessings are once again said to be tied to national obedience. Israel's inheritance of the land was conditional. Law, positive sanctions, and inheritance were a covenantal unit. This means that law, negative sanctions, and disinheritance were equally a covenantal unit. The positive sanction of rest was explicitly tied to the maintenance of the national inheritance. This rest included rest from debt. This was a land law: "for the LORD shall greatly bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance to possess it" (v. 4b). It was tied to Israel's system of covenantal release.

B. Loans to the Poor

There was an annulment provision in this law of debt release. It would not apply when there were no longer poor people in the land (v. 4a). This should be regarded as hyperbolic language. "For the poor shall never cease out of the land: therefore I command thee, saying, Thou shalt open thine hand wide unto thy brother, to thy poor, and to thy needy, in thy land" (v. 11). But the fact remains that in some unique way, this law was connected judicially to the presence of poor people in the land. This exclusionary clause should alert us to the possibility that this law was not universal in scope or application. It was tied in some way to both the poor and the land.

Moses explained the application of this law. It was explicitly related to poor people. "If there be among you a poor man of one of thy brethren within any of thy gates in thy land which the LORD thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not harden thine heart, nor shut thine hand from thy poor brother: But thou shalt open thine hand wide unto him, and shalt surely lend him sufficient for his need, in that which he wanteth" (Deut. 15:7–8). There was a strong element of moral obligation here.⁴

What did the word mean, "wanteth"? The same Hebrew word,

3. North, Authority and Dominion, Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 53.

4. North, Authority and Dominion, Ibid., ch. 49.

khawsare, is used to describe God's care for them in the wilderness. They lacked nothing. "Yea, forty years didst thou sustain them in the wilderness, so that they lacked nothing; their clothes waxed not old, and their feet swelled not" (Neh. 9:21). Yet the exodus generation had complained continually that they lacked everything good which they had possessed in Egypt. In response, God kept them wandering in the wilderness. He disinherited that generation. So, the idea of "want" in this context is serious poverty, where one's work or life is in danger. Such a lack of basic necessities is not common to covenant-keepers: "The LORD is my shepherd; I shall not want" (Ps. 23:1).

There were sanctions attached to this law because it was a subset of a larger category of biblical laws: charity. "He that giveth unto the poor shall not lack: but he that hideth his eyes shall have many a curse" (Prov. 28:27). These promised negative sanctions were individual. God imposed them directly on individuals, apart from any intermediary covenantal authorities. He did not threaten the community with negative corporate sanctions. Thus, these were not laws governing covenantal institutions. These laws were neither civil nor ecclesiastical. There is no suggestion that any covenantal institution had the either the right or the obligation to threaten formal negative sanctions against individuals who disobeyed this law. The Bible is clear about the presence of these individual sanctions in history. Charity laws were not a subset of the land laws.

The mandated discipline here was self-discipline. The man with money to lend was to consider the plight of the poor man. He was to evaluate the causes of the poor man's poverty. Having determined that the person was not poor because of bad habits, the man with money was to lend generously. If he did, he would be rewarded: a positive sanction. "Beware that there be not a thought in thy wicked heart, saying, The seventh year, the year of release, is at hand; and thine eye be evil against thy poor brother, and thou givest him nought; and he cry unto the LORD against thee, and it be sin unto thee. Thou shalt surely give him, and thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him: because that for this thing the LORD thy God shall bless thee in all thy works, and in all that thou puttest thine hand unto" (vv. 9–10). Again, it was God, not the state, who would reward the generous lender. This is why this law had nothing to do with civil sanctions. Biblical civil sanctions are exclusively negative. The Bible does not authorize compulsory wealth redistribution.⁵

C. The Israelite Bondservant

After the discussion of morally obligatory lending, the text introduces what appears to be a wholly unrelated topic: the Israelite bondservant. This bondservant was to be released in the seventh year.

And if thy brother, an Hebrew man, or an Hebrew woman, be sold unto thee, and serve thee six years; then in the seventh year thou shalt let him go free from thee. And when thou sendest him out free from thee, thou shalt not let him go away empty: Thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock, and out of thy floor, and out of thy winepress: of that where with the LORD thy God hath blessed thee thou shalt give unto him. And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bond man in the land of Egypt, and the LORD thy God redeemed thee: therefore I command thee this thing to day (vv. 12–15).

There is something missing here: an explanation of the difference between this kind of Israelite bondservant and the Israelite bondservant described in Leviticus 25:

And if thy brother that dwelleth by thee be waxen poor, and be sold unto thee; thou shalt not compel him to serve as a bondservant: But as an hired servant, and as a sojourner, he shall be with thee, and shall serve thee unto the year of jubile: And then shall he depart from thee, both he and his children with him, and shall return unto his own family, and unto the possession of his fathers shall he return. For they are my servants, which I brought forth out of the land of Egypt: they shall not be sold as bondmen. Thou shalt not rule over him with rigour; but shalt fear thy God. (Lev. 25:39–43).⁶

Here is an Israelite bondservant who was purchased by another Israelite. He remained a bondservant until the jubilee. This could be as long as 49 years. Yet the text in Deuteronomy 15 insists that the Israelite bondservant be released in the seventh year. How can these two laws be reconciled?

5. David Chilton, Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators: A Biblical Response to Ronald J. Sider, 3rd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1982] 1996). (<http://bit.ly/dcsider>)

6. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Five Point Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 29.

1. A Question of Collateral

The person described in Leviticus 25 was a person with no land to return to. What redeemed him from bondage was the return of his land at the jubilee (Lev. 25:13).⁷ Because he had no land in the interim, he could find himself without the means to repay a commercial loan. He defaulted on his loan, and he was then sold into bondage to repay it. The presumption here is that he no longer held title to any land. He was landless until the jubilee. He had no collateral for the loan other than his own labor. So, when he defaulted, he lost his freedom.

The collateral for a loan could be either goods or services. Goods could easily be pledged and transferred at the time of default. Labor services could be transferred, too, but they involved the loss of freedom for a specified period of time. If goods were pledged, their transfer redeemed the loan. But what was the value of a person's labor services? To assess this, there had to be a labor market. There was a market for long-term labor services. We would call it a slave market. An Israelite's enslavement was legally limited; it could not exceed 49 years. This limitation did not apply to foreigners (Lev. 25:44–46).⁸ Why not? Because an Israelite's redemption out of bondage was by rural land ownership: part of the original inheritance attained by the conquest generation.⁹ When the Israelite bondservant's land was returned to him, he could return to his land. He thereby gained redemption from bondage.

There was another distinguishing factor: the circumstances of a loan. The Israelite who had no land to pledge for a loan was considered a poor risk. He had lost control over his land for some reason. Perhaps he had lost it by having to repay a previous loan. So, the lender wanted security for his loan. He wanted long-term labor services that would command a market price high enough to guarantee his repayment.

2. An Interest-Free Loan

What of the poor man in Deuteronomy 15:12? He was morally entitled to a loan. More than this: he was entitled to an interest-free loan.

7. Ibid., ch. 24.

8. Ibid., ch. 31.

9. A Levite's judicial basis of citizenship was his legal claim on the tithe. He may have owned a home in a city, but this was not the legal basis for his liberation at the jubilee.

"If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as an usurer, neither shalt thou lay upon him usury" (Ex. 22:25).¹⁰ "And if thy brother be waxen poor, and fallen in decay with thee; then thou shalt relieve him: yea, though he be a stranger [geyr], or a sojourner [to shawb]; that he may live with thee. Take thou no usury of him, or increase: but fear thy God; that thy brother may live with thee. Thou shalt not give him thy money upon usury, nor lend him thy victuals for increase" (Lev. 25:35–37).¹¹ A poor man had a superior claim on a righteous man's loanable funds. This was not a commercial loan. Commercial loans were legitimate. The non-resident alien [nokree] had no claim to an interest-free loan. "Unto a stranger [nokree] thou mayest lend upon usury; but unto thy brother thou shalt not lend upon usury" (Deut. 23:20a).¹² But an interest-free loan was morally compulsory in Mosaic Israel in a way that a commercial loan was not.

The poor man who sought an interest-free loan could be asked to pledge his cloak, but it had to be returned to him by evening (Ex. 22:26).¹³ This kept him from pledging an asset that was already pledged, but it meant that only a nearby neighbor would lend to him—a person who would know his character and the reasons for his present poverty.

The interest-free loan proved that the borrower was at risk of bondage only until the sabbatical year of release. He was not at risk until the jubilee. The presence of interest proved that he was at risk for a longer period: until the jubilee. The zero-interest loan was morally obligatory on the lender. The interest-bearing loan was not. The person seeking an interest-bearing commercial loan had no moral claim on the prospective lender. He was at greater risk in case he defaulted.

In the year of release, the lender was to provide the borrower with capital: "Thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock, and out of thy floor, and out of thy winepress: of that wherewith the LORD thy God hath blessed thee thou shalt give unto him" (Deut. 15:14). "It shall not seem hard unto thee, when thou sendest him away free from thee; for he hath been worth a double hired servant to thee, in serving thee six years: and the LORD thy God shall bless thee in all that thou doest" (v. 18). There was no such obligation on the lender when a long-term

10. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 49.

11. Ibid., ch. 29.

12. Chapter 57.

13. Gary North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 49.

Israelite bondservant departed in the jubilee year. He would return to his land empty-handed. But the poor man who defaulted on a charitable loan apparently had land to return to.

I wrote the following in my extended commentary on Leviticus, Boundaries and Dominion, chapter 29.

* * * * *

A man's willingness to bear the risk of up to six years of bond service for his failure to repay a loan established the loan as a morally compulsory, zero-interest, charitable loan. Unless the poor borrower was willing to take this risk, he had no moral claim on the lender. Yet it is clear from the text that Israelites could lawfully be sold into servitude until the next jubilee year. This bondage was a means of debt repayment. So, if servitude of up to 49 years was possible, why did the threat of no more than six years of bondservice judicially identify a morally compulsory charitable loan?

The answer is found in the issue of legal access to the inheritance. A man who was so poor that he was willing to risk bondservice until the next sabbatical year, but who was unwilling to put up his land as collateral, had a moral claim on a zero-interest charitable loan. He had a property to return to. He was poor, but he was obviously not so present-oriented or risk-oriented that he would use his inheritance as collateral. His poverty was temporary. He had an inheritance to return to in the sabbatical year after a period of bondservice. His post-crisis goal was liberty and dominion: self-government. So, he used his own potential servitude as collateral to secure the charitable loan.

The borrower who was willing to use his inheritance as collateral in a business loan, or someone who had already leased out his land until the next jubilee year, was not equally protected by the Mosaic law. He had no moral claim on a zero-interest charitable loan. Either this was a business loan, in which the element of moral obligation was not involved, or else the person was economically incompetent: he had already leased his inheritance, yet he still wanted a loan. For this person, the time limits on bondservice that were offered by the sabbatical year of release were inoperative. He could be placed into bondservice until the next jubilee year.

Access to the inheritance served as the debtor's sanctuary. If he had not leased out his land, or if he had not lost it because he had used it as collateral to secure a non-charity loan that later went bad, he could not be placed in bondservice for longer than six years. God reminded the debtor that retaining possession of his inheritance was very important in God's eyes. Debtors who were willing to place their inheritance at risk to secure a business loan, or who had already leased out their land, were regarded by the Mosaic law as second-class debtors. They had no moral claim on a zero-interest loan; they also did not possess a sanctuary from bondage: they could serve beyond six years, i.e., until the next jubilee trumpet sounded.¹⁴

* * * * *

What if the man released in the sabbatical year did not want to face the trials of life? In that case, he could choose to remain with the lender. The subsequent passage sets forth the ritual terms of permanent bondservice: the pierced ear (Deut. 15:16–17). This covenantal mark of bondage obligated only him, not his adult heirs. If he came into bondage as a poor man by way of a default on an interest-free charity loan, his adult heirs could not be obligated to stay with him. He took the oath of allegiance in his own name only.

D. Commercial Loans

A failure to recognize the character of this loan as a charitable loan leads to a second error: a failure to recognize the presence of commercial loans in ancient Israel. Combined, these two errors produce a serious historical and analytical error: the perception of Mosaic Israel as a noncommercial society in which the universal phenomenon of interest-producing loans did not exist because of the Mosaic law.

Whenever we see such a line of reasoning, we can be sure that the author has an assumption disguised as a conclusion, namely, that the Mosaic law is inapplicable in today's world. The Mosaic law is thought to be suitable only for an older era, an agricultural era, an era in which such modern economic categories as interest were not operational. This assumption leads to either of two additional errors: (1) the concept of interest is not universal, but is merely an artifact of modern capitalism; or (2) the category of interest is universal, so the Mosaic law is anti-capitalistic.

14. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 29:A.

1. Willingale's View

In a remarkably inaccurate interpretation of the Mosaic economy, A. E. Willingale argued in 1962 that there was no commercial lending in ancient Israel prior to the monarchy. Willingale wrote:

Loans in Israel were not commercial but charitable, granted not to enable a trader to set up or expand a business but to tide a peasant farmer over a period of poverty. Since the economy remained predominantly agricultural up to the end of the Monarchy, there developed no counterpart to the commercial loan system already existing in Babylonia in 2000 B.C. Hence the legislation contains not mercantile regulations but exhortations to neighborliness.¹⁵

Willingale was wrong. There were commercial loans in Israel. He did not recognize that the jubilee year's debt law that governed the indentured servitude of a Hebrew brother (Lev. 25:39–41) had to refer to a commercial loan or a profit-seeking consumer loan that had not been the product of a crisis in the debtor's life. Had it been an interest-free charitable loan, he would have gone free in the sabbatical year. He would not have had to wait for the jubilee year to regain his freedom and return to his family's farm.

Willingale in 1962 faced the problem that faces every Bible-believing theologian today who attempts to comment on biblical issues for which he has no training in the academic discipline involved—in this case, economic theory. There is no body of academic materials available to him that has been written by Bible-believing scholars who have reconstructed their academic disciplines in terms of biblical revelation. This is why Christian reconstruction is necessary, and also why it is hated by those Christian scholars who are unwilling to reconsider their academic specialties and careers in terms of the authority of the Bible.

Willingale was quoted on this matter as an expert by dispensational theologian and pastor Gene A. Getz.¹⁶ Getz then used Willingale's error to prove to his satisfaction—though not mine—that Deuteronomy's economic laws are no longer valid in the New Testament era because the Mosaic Israel was designed for a rural, non-commercial economy. Getz ignored the obvious: Willingale's analysis does not solve the problem of analyzing Israel's economy after the monarchy, 15. "Debt," New Bible Dictionary, 2nd ed. (Wheaton, Illinois: Tyndale House, 1982), pp. 275–76.

16. Gene A. Getz, A Biblical Theology of Material Possessions (Chicago: Moody Press, 1990), p. 264.

which, according to Willingale, was urban and commercial.

Getz wanted to find a New Testament loophole for Deuteronomy 28: the link between national covenantal faithfulness and wealth, and national covenantal rebellion and poverty.¹⁷ “Willingale reminded us that this unique economic setting in Israel ‘changes in the New Testament.’ Israel now existed in a totally different situation culturally and economically. The Jews had to adapt their laws to a commercial economy.”¹⁸ Getz affirmed a discontinuity between the Mosaic economy and the New Testament economy. Even in terms of his own argument, Getz placed this discontinuity a millennium too late. According to Willingale, the Jews would have had to adapt their laws a millennium before Christ. Getz did not mention this problem for his thesis regarding the New Covenant inapplicability of Deuteronomy 28.

2. Spiritualizing Away God’s Law

Getz was a pietist. The theological tradition known as pietism asserts a radical discontinuity between the judicial requirements of the Old Covenant and the New Covenant. The pietist views Christianity as a religion of the heart, not a religion of the marketplace, whether economic or political.¹⁹ Getz sought to undermine the continuing judicial authority of the Mosaic law in both church and state. He spiritualized away its meaning. First, he rejected the Mosaic law’s binding authority. Then he invoked a vague and undefined spirit in order to avoid the accusation of being an antinomian. “At the same time, we must not bypass the spirit of these laws.”²⁰ I ask: What spirit? With what negative sanctions for violating the spirit? Getz wanted deliverance from the Mosaic law, yet he also invoked an undefined, toothless version of the law. He spiritualized away the law, yet he also sought to retain biblical ethics. All dispensational theologians produce this sort of exegesis regarding biblical law, as do most non-dispensational theologians. This methodology of judicial spiritualizing is a standing testimony against dispensationalism’s self-proclaimed hermeneutical principle of exegetical literalism.²¹ Yet the dispensationalist does not honor this principle

17. Chapter 68.

18. Getz, Material Possessions, p. 265.

19. See Appendix I.

20. Ibid., p. 266.

21. Perhaps the leading dispensational theologian after the death of Lewis Sperry Chafer was Dallas Seminary’s Charles C. Ryrie. In 1965, he wrote: “Therefore, the second aspect of the sine qua non of dispensationalism is the matter of plain hermeneutics. The word literal is perhaps not so good as either the word normal or plain, but of interpretation. He honors another: “literal whenever convenient.” He picks and chooses the passages which he interprets literally, just as all other Bible-believing interpreters do.

The dispensational theologian is a literalist regarding unfulfilled Old Testament prophecies about the Jews or the temple—prophecies that the church for almost two millennia has maintained were fulfilled by the church before A.D. 70 (preterism) or are in the process of being fulfilled by the church. He insists that these prophecies must be fulfilled after the Rapture (pre-tribulationism) or after the Great Tribulation but before the Second Coming (post-tribulationism). Yet he is equally ready to find hidden meanings in the dimensions of the temple, or allegories about Jesus in its stones. He is also ready to spiritualize out of church history the New Testament’s application of almost every law in the Old Testament—and, in principle, all of them, including the Ten Commandments.²² Getz wrote: “Heretofore, we have noted that most of God’s promises for being faithful with material possessions relate to eternity and not to this earth.”²³ Getz knew exactly what Deuteronomy 28 teaches, and he sought to escape its clear teaching.²⁴ Here we have one more poorly executed attempt to escape from the Mosaic law and its corporate sanctions in history. In doing so, Getz attempted to strip riches of all covenantal significance—in America, the richest society in history. He also removed from Christi-in any case it is an interpretation that does not spiritualize or allegorize as nondispensational interpretation does. The spiritualizing may be practiced to a lesser or greater degree, but its presence in a system of interpretation is indicative of a nondispensational approach.” Ryrie, Dispensationalism Today (Chicago: Moody Press, 1965), pp. 45–46. In his 1995 revision, he backed off. He added these qualifications: “To be sure, literal/historical/grammatical interpretation is not the sole possession or practice of dispensationalists, but the consistent use of it in all areas of biblical interpretation is. This does not preclude or exclude correct understanding of types, illustrations, apocalypses, and other genres within the basic framework of literal interpretation.” Ryrie, Dispensationalism (Chicago: Moody Press, 1995), p. 40. This transformed his previous unsupported but uncompromising definition of literalism into a muddled, unsupported statement.

22. Former Dallas Seminary professor S. Lewis Johnson publicly rejected the Ten Commandments as the heart of legalism. Legalism for him meant the Ten Commandments. He approvingly quoted fundamentalist Presbyterian pastor Donald Gray Barnhouse, who argued that “It was a tragic hour when the Reformation wrote the Ten Commandments into their creeds and catechisms and sought to bring Gentile believers into bondage to Jewish law, which was never intended either for the Gentile nations or for the church.” S. Lewis Johnson, “The Paralysis of Legalism,” Bibliotheca Sacra, (April/June 1963), p. 109.

23. Getz, Material Possessions, p. 233.

24. Ibid., pp. 265–66.

ans who follow his interpretation any possibility of developing an explicitly biblical economic theory.

He did not tell his readers what his hermeneutical principles were. He did not explain, let alone justify, why he devoted almost his entire book to New Testament passages on property, almost completely ignoring the Old Testament's teachings. I have written thousands of pages of books on the economics of the Pentateuch. By 1990, I had published three volumes: one on Genesis and two on Exodus 1–20. Chilton's Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators appeared in 1981 and was in its third edition in 1990. Yet not one reference to these books appears in Getz's footnotes or his bibliography. When it came to biblical theology, Getz avoided three-quarters of the Bible.

Getz ignored completely the economics of the Old Covenant, except to dismiss Deuteronomy 28. Yet he called his book biblical theology. He seemed unaware of the massive deception involved in both his hermeneutics and his title. Dispensationalists are incapable of thinking covenantally or judicially, for there are neither laws nor historical sanctions in their doctrine of the New Covenant during the so-called Church Age. For them, everything significant socially is found in relationships, feelings, and either legalism (the laymen) or a rejection of legalism in the name of an undefined spirit of interpretation (the scholars). They are antinomians regarding biblical law. They seek to improve on biblical law, either by replacing it with men's laws (legalism) or by undefined spiritual feelings (antinomianism). This is why the dispensational movement has yet to produce its first book on New Testament social theory or social ethics. It has no explicitly biblical theory of social causation. It shares this weakness with Lutheranism.

E. New Testament Applications

The New Testament Christian faces an even more rigorous requirement than the Old Covenant saint did: "But love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again; and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be the children of the Highest: for he is kind unto the unthankful and to the evil" (Luke 6:35).²⁵ Even a poor non-resident alien is now to become the beneficiary. The man with assets is to lend to this person without hope of repayment. A charity loan is still governed by the Old Covenant rule: no interest.

25. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 10.

Does this mean that every potential borrower's request must be granted? No; the charity loan is still limited by the rule that evil is not to be subsidized. The moral character and habits of the borrower must be known to the lender. The lender must make an evaluation: Is this a truly poor man whose economic troubles are not of his own making? There is no obligation on anyone's part to subsidize incompetence born of immoral or present-oriented behavior.

The person with assets to lend may choose to have a representative agency make this evaluation for him. He may decide to loan money to the agent or organization, allowing someone else to decide who deserves an interest-free loan. Such loans are to be made on the same basis as the Mosaic charitable loan: no interest. We are not to loan money at interest to charitable organizations. The idea of interest-paying church bonds is abominable.²⁶ If churches or non-profit Christian organizations choose to raise money, let the members and supporters donate extra money (best), or borrow the money in the commercial loan market and give it to the church (second-best), or lend this money at zero interest (third-best). If Christian organizations must borrow money at interest, let them borrow from unbelievers or commercial banks. But this is a third-best decision, for it places the church in a subordinate position to covenant-breakers: the servanthood of the debtor. It is a dark day when God's church is in debt to unbelievers through commercial banks. It may have to be done, but it is a dark day when it is done.

In modern times, there is no provision for collateralized labor, i.e., a period of legally enforceable debt servitude. For charitable loans, this is a good rule; for commercial loans, it is not. Today, there is also no national year of release. This is legitimate; Israel's national sabbatical year was an aspect of the Mosaic land laws: the inheritance. Furthermore, the jubilee was an aspect of the original conquest. It no longer has any judicial or covenantal purpose.

The New Testament rule governing charity loans has broadened the Mosaic limits. Christians are to lend at zero interest to the righteous poor without hope of any repayment. The absence today of an enforceable period of debt servitude does not affect this obligation. If anything, it reinforces it. The very absence of such a period of ser-vitute points to the New Testament's rule: lend without hope of repayment.

26. Gary North, "Stewardship, Investment, and Usury: Financing the Kingdom of God," in R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), Appendix 3.

Would it be illegitimate for a society to legislate such a requirement, though not a period longer than the six-year limit of Deuteronomy 15? We must ask: On what basis? If the sabbatical year was a land law, which it appears to have been, then the annulment of Mosaic Israel's special covenantal position removes that as a justification. What covenantal legal principle might legitimately be substituted? Not the sabbath law. Paul was clear: "One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind" (Rom. 14:5).²⁷ The enforcement of the sabbath is not to become an aspect of judicial sanctions. The locus of enforcement has shifted to the individual.²⁸

There was never any moral obligation to make commercial loans under the Mosaic covenant. This is still the case. There remains a moral obligation to loan at zero interest to the brother in the faith or a righteous resident alien. This law had nothing to do with seed or land. This is why the uncircumcised resident alien was morally entitled to a zero-interest emergency charity loan. It was a law governing personal relations among people who agreed to live under the legal terms of God's civil covenant. It was a land law, but not a Promised Land law. It was a covenantal land law: a cross-boundary law that would apply to any nation formally covenanted under God.

Today, Western nations are only rarely formally covenanted under God, and none acknowledges the Bible to be the supreme law of the land. There is therefore no equal moral obligation to lend to resident aliens. This biblical obligation depends on the society's view of debt and the moral outlook of the poor neighbor. If the poor man is an honest man who is in a crisis through no fault of his own, then he is morally entitled to a zero-interest charity loan from a true believer in the God of the Bible. But, like the poor man in Exodus 22:26, he can legitimately be asked to surrender his cloak as collateral. This is a means of seeing to it that he does not indebt himself to many lenders simultaneously. This is an institutional restraint on debt servitude which should be honored today. To lend, hoping for nothing in return is one thing; to devise a system which encourages poor people to run up large debts on the basis of no collateral or multiple loans on the same piece of collateral is something else. Honest, hard-working, otherwise future-oriented people should not be encouraged to become servants to debt. Extending credit to present-oriented people who are willing to pay high rates of interest on commercial or consumer loans is legitimate (Deut. 15:6).²⁹ It is not legitimate to encourage future-oriented people who are trapped by circumstances beyond their control to go ever-deeper into charitable debt. They should also be encouraged to repay all debts to avoid a life of servitude. A sign of spiritual maturity is debt-free spending. A sign of even greater spiritual maturity is interest-free charitable lending.

27. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 14.

28. North, Authority and Dominion, Part 2, ch. 24.

There is no longer a six-year debt limit on this moral obligation to repay. The New Testament extends greater mercy, but it imposes greater moral maturity in paying off debts and avoiding them in the first place. Paul wrote: “For yourselves know how ye ought to follow us: for we behaved not ourselves disorderly among you; Neither did we eat any man’s bread for nought; but wrought with labour and travail night and day, that we might not be chargeable to any of you: Not because we have not power, but to make ourselves an ensample unto you to follow us. For even when we were with you, this we commanded you, that if any would not work, neither should he eat” (II Thess. 3:7–10).

Conclusion

The interest-free loan was a charitable loan. It was morally obligatory, though not legally obligatory, for an Israelite with surplus assets to loan to a poor Israelite brother or a poor resident alien on an interest-free basis. Such a loan involved the threat of a six-year maximum period of bondservice in case of a default. Liberation day was the national sabbatical year, which was also the year of release for all charitable loans. This was a very different kind of loan from an interest-bearing commercial loan that was collateralized by an Israelite’s land or labor until the next jubilee. In the case of a non-Israelite, a default on a large commercial loan could lead to inter-generational slavery (Lev. 25:44–46).³⁰

The early church and the medieval church misinterpreted the Mosaic laws governing charitable debt. A series of church councils and decrees placed extensive prohibitions on interest-bearing loans.³¹ This hampered the growth of industry for over a thousand years. It also placed Christians into debt to Jews, who had no restrictions on lending at interest to gentiles. This created great hostility on the part of gentiles, and it led to repeated violence and defaults on loans, especially by gentile governments.

29. Chapter 37.

30. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 30.

The sabbatical year is no longer required, for this law applied only to Canaan, when the date of Israel's entry into the land could be accurately determined. The sabbatical year was tied to the calendar of the feasts. With the New Testament, the locus of sabbath enforcement has been transferred to the individual conscience.³² There is no longer a nationally applicable, legally enforceable sabbatical year.

31. J. Gilchrist, The Church and Economic Development in the Middle Ages (New York: St. Martins, 1969), Documents. Gilchrist provides translations of numerous texts, from Nicea (325) on, that dealt with usury. The premier study of the late medieval church's position is John T. Noonan, The Scholastic Analysis of Usury (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1957). For a summary, see Noonan, "The Amendment of Papal Teaching by Theologians," in Charles E. Curran (ed.), Contraception: Authority and Dissent (New York: Herder & Herder, 1965), pp. 41–75.

32. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 24.

LENDING AND DOMINION

For the LORD thy God blesseth thee, as he promised thee: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow; and thou shalt reign over many nations, but they shall not reign over thee (Deut. 15:6).

The theocentric aspect of this law is dominion: the extension of God's kingdom in history through the voluntary subordination of covenant-breaking nations. Dominion is an aspect of point three of the biblical covenant. The blessing was a positive sanction—grace precedes law—but the correct response was money-lending.

A. International Money-Lending

The public's hostility to money-lending is universal—as universal as the practice is widespread. There are passages in the Old Testament that indicate such hostility.¹ There has been a long ecclesiastical tradition that has restricted or prohibited lending at interest.² Then why does this law appear in the middle of a passage that restricts interest-bearing loans? Why should lending at interest be regarded as Israel's proper response to God's blessing?

This law had nothing to do with lending to the poor, yet it appears in the middle of a passage dealing with loans to the poor. It stands in contrast to the remainder of the passage. The contrast between loans

1. Exodus 22:25; Leviticus 25:36–37; Deuteronomy 23:19; Nehemiah 5:7, 10; Psalms 15:5; Proverbs 28:8; Isaiah 24:2; Jeremiah 15:10; Ezekiel 18:8, 13, 17; 22:12.

2. J. Gilchrist, The Church and Economic Development in the Middle Ages (New York: St. Martins, 1969), Documents. Gilchrist provides translations of numerous texts, from Nicea (325) on, that dealt with usury. The premier study of the late medieval church's position is John T. Noonan, The Scholastic Analysis of Usury (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1957). For a summary, see Noonan, "The Amendment of Papal Teaching by Theologians," in Charles E. Curran (ed.), Contraception: Authority and Dissent (New York: Herder & Herder, 1965), pp. 41–75.

to the poor and loans to foreign nations is obvious. The Hebrew capitalist was to extend both kinds of loans. They were not the same kind of loan. The underlying motivation was also not the same. The loan to the poor brother or permanent resident alien (Lev. 25:35–37) was a charitable loan. The loan to the foreigner was not.

There was no prohibition against taking interest from a loan to a foreigner. What applied to the foreigner temporarily living in the land also applied to foreigners living abroad.

Thou shalt not lend upon usury to thy brother; usury of money, usury of victuals, usury of any thing that is lent upon usury: Unto a stranger [nokree] thou mayest lend upon usury; but unto thy brother thou shalt not lend upon usury: that the LORD thy God may bless thee in all that thou settest thine hand to in the land whither thou goest to possess it (Deut. 23:19–20).³

How does a person lawfully accumulate capital needed to lend? By spending less than he receives. That is, he accumulates capital by becoming a net exporter of goods and services. He takes in more money than he spends on consumer goods and services.

What is true of an individual is equally true of a nation. I do not necessarily mean merely a nation-state; I mean a nation: a covenantally oath-bound society. To become an international money-lending society, a nation must be filled with people who are net exporters of goods and services. They can lend abroad only because they sell abroad. Even if they sell newly mined gold or silver, they are nevertheless exporters. If they are not involved in mining, then they have money to lend abroad because they have earned money from abroad, which they subsequently lend to people in those societies that have run trade deficits with them. We call an excess of income in money a trade surplus. Yet, technically, there has to be equality: value for value. Nobody in commerce gives away free money. Money must be earned. So, in the broadest sense, trade creates a balance (equality) of payments surplus (inequality). But how can there be a surplus if there is balance? Because there is a balance of assets: goods and services (assets) exported = goods and services (assets) imported + money loaned out (future income: asset). This equation applies also to an individual who is accumulating capital.

The motivation for the initial contact between a foreign borrower and an Israelite lender was probably international trade. The language barrier was overcome because of the motivation of making a profit.

3. Chapter 57.

Why would a foreigner want a loan from an Israelite? Why would he want this dependence on a foreigner? The most obvious reason was to finance additional trade. The foreigner planned to bring additional goods to sell to the Israelite. To finance more goods to bring into Israel, the foreigner requested a loan. He could take gold or silver back to his country, purchase goods, and bring them to Israel. If the profit margin on the sale of the goods was high enough, he was ready to pay a rate of interest to the Israelite.

The Israelite was ready to lend because he wanted a rate of return on his money. The foreigner was willing to pay more interest than a competing Israelite because of the import operation's profit opportunity. Because the lender probably had an on-going business relationship with the foreigner, he was willing to trust him. If the borrower defaulted, he would lose access to an outlet for his goods.

This explains why an individual Israelite importer would serve as a money-lender to a foreign exporter of foreign goods. But, at some point, the Israelites would run out of money to buy foreign goods. The importer would run out of money to lend to the foreign exporter. Therefore, for Israelites to serve as national money lenders, they would have to export more goods than they imported. They would have to run what is usually called a favorable balance of trade. Why favorable? Because the exporting nation takes in more money than it spends abroad on imported goods. But all trade must balance. Why, then, can an exchange be favorable? Because it allows the exporting nation to buy production goods in the nation it exports to. Instead of buying consumer goods and services in exchange for exported goods and services, individuals in the exporting nation buy foreign capital, i.e., production goods. Or they make loans to foreign purchasers of the exported goods.

Assume that the foreigner wanted to buy an item from an Israelite seller. Instead of paying cash, he borrowed the money from the Israelite exporter or from a lender in Israel. Or he may have agreed to pay a rate of interest for the value of the goods received from the Israelite exporter. In this case, no money changed hands. The foreigner paid for the item by means of a promise to pay. Over time, Israel's citizens built up capital abroad. They were paid a return on these investments. More money or goods or services flowed back into Israel as time went on. The process could continue for as long as Israel could find foreign buyers for its goods and borrowers for its loans. Capital owned by Israelites would increasingly be located abroad.

For a nation to become an international money-lender, it must become an international exporter. It must enjoy a competitive advantage in international trade in order to gain an international advantage in money-lending. In fact, there can be no trade surplus without either money-lending abroad or purchases of foreign capital. To make the investments abroad, the exporting nation must be more efficient in selling its goods and services abroad than the importing nations are in selling theirs in return.

God told Israel to become an exporting nation. He did not say this explicitly. He said it implicitly when He told Israel to become a money-lending nation. He called Israel into the world trade markets. He told the Israelites to become more efficient producers than foreign nationals.

God called on Israelites to establish business contacts abroad. This would require their gaining mastery of foreign languages, as well as an understanding of foreign laws, currencies, and business practices. Israel was not to isolate itself from the rest of the world.

B. Extending the Covenant

Not only did God call Israelites to become familiar with foreign economic practices, He called them to demonstrate to foreigners the productivity of God's covenant. God's law was to become a means of evangelism (Deut. 4:5–8).⁴ One proof of success for God's law would be Israel's greater productivity. Members of an importing nation who borrow from an exporting nation recognize the efficiency of the exporters. The presence of Israelite goods imported from abroad would testify to the efficiency of the exporters. As time went on, successful businessmen in foreign nations would learn the Israelites' secrets of economic success. They would have to imitate these practices in order to compete. After all, if they had nothing worth buying, Israel would cease trading with them.

Exporting is a means of cultural conquest. This form of conquest is not based on war. It is based on voluntary cooperation. But to export more goods than it imports, a nation must become a net exporter of capital. One form of capital exporting is money-lending.

For citizens of a foreign nation to have maintained the advantage of access to desirable goods imported from Israel, its economic representatives would have had to deal honestly with Israelite exporters and money-lenders. If its agents cheated Israel by defaulting on loans, and if the nation's courts upheld this, then the residents would suffer a reduction in the flow of goods and services.

4. Chapter 8.

Here is a legitimate reason to seek wealth: to become an international money-lender. There is a reason to become a money-lender: to increase the influence of your covenant-keeping society. The lender is the master over the borrower (Prov. 22:7).⁵ To seek such mastery over other nations is legitimate. To be in a financial position to lend to citizens of covenant-breaking nations is a blessing of God. His kingdom is advanced by such lending. Conversely, it is a curse to be in debt to citizens of other nations.

The text here is not talking about what is today called foreign aid, which is in fact state-to-state aid: using tax money extracted from the residents of one nation to fund state-funded projects in another nation.⁶ The text is talking about the aggregate debt or credit positions of a covenant-keeping society: the net effects of voluntary, individual decisions to lend to or borrow from foreigners.

C. Future-Orientation and Hierarchy

Everyone values the present more than the future, for responsibility is in the present. So is enjoyment and opportunity. But future-orientation is vital for planning. Without it, men would not save in the present for the sake of the future. The value of money would collapse. Who would hold money in the present if he did not plan to spend it in the future?⁷

We discount the present value of future income. This rate of discount is called the rate of interest. A complete discounting of the future would produce an infinite rate of interest. No one would sacrifice any present consumption for the sake of future consumption. Paul expressed this idea in terms of the Christians' faith in the bodily resurrection. "If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not? let us eat and drink; for tomorrow we die" (I Cor. 15:32).

5. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 67.

6. P. T. Bauer, Dissent on Development: Studies and debates in development economics (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1972), pp. 95–135.

7. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1990] 2012), Appendix J.

When people are highly future-oriented, they are willing to lend money or goods at lower rates of interest than less future-oriented people are willing to lend. They have what Mises called low time-preference. When people are present-oriented, they are willing to pay high rates of interest.⁸ Edward Banfield called these two groups upper class (future-oriented) and lower class (present-oriented).⁹ There is a profitable voluntary transaction possible between members of both groups: a future-oriented person can profitably lend to present-oriented person. This transaction is profitable on both sides. Both actors get what they want. But there is a superior and inferior in the relationship. “The rich ruleth over the poor, and the borrower is servant to the lender” (Prov. 22:7). While a present-oriented person gains access to the money or goods that he wants immediately, in exchange for a promise to repay the lender in the future, he does not gain this advantage at zero cost. He becomes a servant. But this is his choice. It is not a matter of compulsion.

The Bible makes it very clear that there are legitimate hierarchies in this life. One of these hierarchies is economic: lender over debtor. Another is social: master over servant. These hierarchies are individual. They are also social. They are also international.

This verse clearly recommends becoming an international lender. It very clearly discourages becoming an international debtor. This is another way of saying that it is an advantage to be future-oriented and a disadvantage to be present-oriented. The covenant-keeper is supposed to be future-oriented. He is supposed to be thrifty. Accumulating capital for the purpose of becoming a lender is a good thing for covenant-keepers.

Entire societies are characterized by a specific time orientation. Israel was to become a future-oriented society. When this happened, Israel would become a net lender of money. Surrounding nations would achieve their goals—present gratification—in exchange for future repayment. Israel would achieve its national goal—the extension of foreign trade and money-lending—by providing what the surrounding nations wanted: present gratification. Those on each side of the transaction would achieve their goals, but the result would be a hierarchy, with Israel on top.

8. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State: A Treatise on Economic Principles, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), ch. 6:3.

9. Edward C. Banfield, The Unheavenly City: The Nature and Future of Our Urban Crisis (Boston: Little, Brown, 1970), pp. 48–54.

It is a mistake to consider both positions—higher and lower, master and servant—as equal. Such a view reflects a false ethical neutrality. Freedom is better than servitude. This is why Paul told Christians slaves, “Art thou called being a servant? care not for it: but if thou mayest be made free, use it rather” (I Cor. 7:21).¹⁰ The Mosaic law indicates that it is better to be on top than on the bottom, a money-lender rather than a money-borrower. Jesus reinforced this view in his parable of the fearful steward who buried his coin. The owner reproved the steward: “Thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers, and then at my coming I should have received mine own with usury” (Matt. 25:27).¹¹

As is true of every individual, not every nation can be a net exporter of goods and capital. Not every nation can be equal in productivity all of the time. There cannot be an exact balance of trade at all times. Each side gets what its members want, but the side that wants dominion rather than subordination has chosen the better goal. The question then becomes one of means. The Bible teaches that the correct means is the export of goods, services, and loans, not the export of armies.

Conclusion

This verse makes it clear that the nation of Israel was to become a money-lending nation by means of international trade. It was to become a trade surplus nation, i.e., a net exporter of goods, services, and money. The money exported (lent) out had to come from the surplus of exports over imports. Goods flowed out; money and goods flowed in. The lower the amount of present goods that flowed in, the larger the amount of future goods that would flow in later.

This is the model followed in the post-World War II era by the Asian “tigers”: first Japan; then Hong Kong, Taiwan, South Korea, and Singapore. Today, China is following their lead. Their domestic economies have been export-driven. Their export businesses have learned how to compete in international markets. Their citizens in the aggregate have run net trade surpluses by becoming international lenders. This process is a unit: two sides of the same coin. Then the coin is lent at interest.

10. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 8.

11. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 47.

CONSUMING CAPITAL IN GOOD FAITH

All the firstling males that come of thy herd and of thy flock thou shalt sanctify unto the LORD thy God: thou shalt do no work with the firstling of thy bullock, nor shear the firstling of thy sheep. Thou shalt eat it before the LORD thy God year by year in the place which the LORD shall choose, thou and thy household. And if there be any blemish therein, as if it be lame, or blind, or have any ill blemish, thou shalt not sacrifice it unto the LORD thy God. Thou shalt eat it within thy gates: the unclean and the clean person shall eat it alike, as the roebuck, and as the hart (Deut. 15:19–22).

The theocentric principle here is simple: God should get paid first. He was entitled to the unblemished firstborn males. The requirement of unblemished animals was an aspect of God's holiness: boundaries. God set aside certain animals for Himself. He owned them in a unique way, analogous to His special ownership of the forbidden tree in the garden.

A secondary theological principle, which governed the blemished firstborn, was this: the covenant's positive sanctions are predictable for covenant-keepers. God required covenant-keeping Israelites to consume their capital publicly as a way to testify to their confidence in the truth of this covenantal principle.

A. Sacrificing the Firstborn

This law was a land law.¹ It was a Passover law.

And it shall be when the LORD shall bring thee into the land of the Canaanites, as he swore unto thee and to thy fathers, and shall give it thee, That thou shalt set apart unto the LORD all that openeth the matrix, and every firstling that cometh of a beast which thou hast; the males shall be the LORD'S. And every firstling of an ass thou shalt redeem with a lamb; and if thou wilt not redeem it, then thou shalt break his neck: and all the firstborn of man among thy children shalt thou redeem. And it shall be when thy son asketh thee in time to come, saying, What is this? that thou shalt say unto him, By strength of hand the LORD brought us out from Egypt, from the house of bondage: And it came to pass, when Pharaoh would hardly let us go, that the LORD slew all the firstborn in the land of Egypt, both the firstborn of man, and the firstborn of beast: therefore I sacrifice to the LORD all that openeth the matrix, being males; but all the firstborn of my children I redeem (Ex. 13:11–15).

1. On land laws, see Appendix J.

The negative sanction of the slain animal was to testify against covenant-breakers. Pharaoh was the archetype of every covenant-breaker. Egyptians under his covenantal authority saw their firstborn sons die: the ultimate negative sanction in Old Covenant history, and in most other cultures as well. The slaying of the firstborn animal represented God's negative sanction against sinners: death. It represented Adam: the firstborn son who rebelled against God, which called forth negative sanctions.

These laws of sacrifice were ecclesiastical. Biblical civil law does not threaten negative sanctions for men's refusal to extend positive sanctions to others. Biblical civil law threatens negative sanctions against those who impose negative sanctions on others.

This does not mean that these laws had no civil implications. They did. The violator could be excommunicated, and an excommunicated man lost his citizenship. He moved from the legal status of Israelite to the legal status of stranger. He therefore could not serve as a judge. No longer being under the negative sanctions of the church, he could no longer remain eligible to impose negative civil sanctions on others. Israel was a theocracy. Dual confessions, ecclesiastical and civil, were required from those who possessed lawful civil authority.

B. Sacrifices Mandated an Immediate Loss

God owned the firstborn. When the firstborn males of clean animals arrived, they had to be eaten before the Lord in Jerusalem. The firstborn were signs of God's blessing. This law required men to consume the tokens of their economic future. These animals were not allowed to be trained to do any work. They were not to become capital assets. The people of Israel were required to squander a portion of their assets to the glory of God: holy wastefulness.

Clean, unblemished firstborn animals were set apart as holy sacrifices. Clean, blemished firstborn animals were set apart for a meal of celebration locally. As with the tithes of celebration,² this was an aspect of holy wastefulness. Israelites were to rejoice in complete confidence: “There’s lots more where that came from!”

The donkey was set apart for execution, although it could be redeemed with a lamb (Ex. 13:13; 34:20). The donkey was not a sacrificial animal, nor could it be lawfully eaten, since it was unclean. It was a work animal, a beast of burden. It could be ridden or hooked up to a cart.

What of unclean animals other than donkeys? They had to be redeemed by a money payment, just as a firstborn son was. “Every thing that openeth the matrix in all flesh, which they bring unto the LORD, whether it be of men or beasts, shall be thine: nevertheless the firstborn of man shalt thou surely redeem, and the firstling of unclean beasts shalt thou redeem. And those that are to be redeemed from a month old shalt thou redeem, according to thine estimation, for the money of five shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary, which is twenty gerahs. But the firstling of a cow, or the firstling of a sheep, or the firstling of a goat, thou shalt not redeem; they are holy: thou shalt sprinkle their blood upon the altar, and shalt burn their fat for an offering made by fire, for a sweet savour unto the LORD” (Num. 18:15–17). The point was, there had to be either death or redemption.

Regarding an unblemished clean animal: “Thou shalt eat it before the LORD thy God year by year in the place which the LORD shall choose, thou and thy household” (v. 22). This applied to the unblemished firstborn. These animals belonged to God. They were an economic liability: they had to be transported to the central city of sacrifice. It was likely that this would be done during one of the three annual festivals. In the meantime, these firstborn animals had to be cared for. They would absorb capital.

An unclean beast could not be lawfully consumed or offered. For these, the Israelite had to pay the market price plus 20% to the priest. “And if it be any unclean beast, of which they do not offer a sacrifice unto the LORD, then he shall present the beast before the priest: And the priest shall value it, whether it be good or bad: as thou valuest it, who art the priest, so shall it be. But if he will at all redeem it, then he shall add a fifth part thereof unto thy estimation” (Lev. 27:11–13).³

2. Chapter 35.

3. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 36:B.

The clean beast without a blemish was eaten by its owner, but only after it had been taken to the central city. The clean beast that had a blemish was eaten by its owner in the gates of the nearby city. A donkey either had to be redeemed by a money payment or a lamb had to be sacrificed in its place. These were consumption goods, not visible testimonies of the future. They could not become capital goods except in the case of the donkey, for which the owner sacrificed a lamb. Such acts of consumption acknowledged publicly that God is in control of history. He deserves a sacrifice. He will also bring additional wealth into the households of faithful Israelites. The economic loss involved in the sacrifice testified to a man's faith in this system of covenantal cause and effect, a system of covenantal causation that operates predictably in history.

With respect to blemished animals, the law was less burdensome: "Thou shalt eat it within thy gates." This saved transportation costs. These animals were not sacrifices in the sense of burnt offerings. They were communal meals: "the unclean and the clean person shall eat it alike" (v. 22). The word "unclean" applied to those who ate the meal. It could not have applied to the food eaten. Israelites could not lawfully eat unclean foods. But they could lawfully eat with strangers in certain ritually required meals. More than this: they were required to eat with strangers. They even had to pay for the meal. The foreigner was more likely to dwell in a walled city, where he could buy, sell, and inherit real estate. He was to be invited to share in the festivities. He was to be made welcome. He was to be made aware of the fact that Israelites regarded themselves as under the protective covenant of God. The positive sanctions associated with the productivity of the firstborn could be safely squandered in a festival meal. Here was a nation that had such confidence in the reliability of God's covenant sanctions that people were willing to consume their firstborn animals at a party in which covenant-breakers were invited. This was clearly a form of evangelism.

C. A Statement of Faith

When God required the Israelites to eat the firstborn male animals, He was requiring them to make a statement of faith: they had confidence in the future. God would enable the female animal to bring additional offspring into the world. Even miscarriages could be overcome through national covenantal faithfulness. "There shall nothing cast their young, nor be barren, in thy land: the number of thy days I will fulfil" (Ex. 23:26).⁴ God was with Israel in a special, redemptive way. Israelites were required to acknowledge this ritually and economically. A way to acknowledge their confidence of the future was to consume capital in partying.

A shared meal was an important tool of evangelism. First, it pointed to the gentile as a co-laborer under the dominion covenant. He, too, had a legitimate role in the subduing of the earth (Gen. 1:26).⁵ His work is acceptable to God.⁶ Although the uncircumcised stranger was not a recipient of special grace, he was a recipient of common grace.⁷ The shared meal of the blemished animal was a means of common grace. The animal could not be used on God's altar, but it had to be used to benefit the uncircumcised resident. His judicial status as a covenant-breaker was his lawful claim to access to the meal. As to which covenant-breakers would be invited, this was up to the Israelite, but someone from among the class of unclean men had to be invited.

Second, the shared meal pointed to the need of the Israelite to maintain contacts with uncircumcised residents within the gates of the city. If a man eats a meal with another man, there is a degree of fellowship present. Those who eat together normally talk together. The obvious question from the covenant-breaker would have been: "Why did you invite me? I'm not an Israelite." This would have served as a means of testimony regarding God's deliverance of Israel in history, just as the children's question did at the family's Passover meal (Ex. 12:26–27).

Clearly, the blessings of God were to pass down to covenant-breakers who lived in Israel. The blessings in this case were paid for by the sacrifice of a capital asset. This was another example of Israel's uniqueness in the ancient world. The stranger was to participate ritually in the life of the nation. This did not entitle him to citizenship; only circumcision and inter-generational covenantal faithfulness could do that (Deut. 23:2–8). He could not participate in the Passover meal apart from circumcision (Ex. 12:48). But people of his judicial status

4. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 55.

5. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 3.

6. This means that his work is acceptable to covenant-keepers. The wealth supplied by his productivity can lawfully be purchased by covenant-keepers, thereby increasing their wealth.

7. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcrg>) were entitled to participate in ritually required meals. I am aware of no other nation in the ancient world whose code of law offered the foreigner equal access to the civil courts (Ex. 12:49),⁸ real estate ownership (Lev. 25:29–30), ecclesiastical membership (Ex. 12:48), and fellowship. The law of God served as a means of evangelism (Deut. 4:5–8).⁹

D. The Future-Orientation of Biblical Covenantalism

The sacrifice of the firstborn was an act governed by a worldview that was future-oriented. The Israelite was told to suffer a present loss for the sake of the covenant. The covenant imposed economic costs in the present, but it promised positive sanctions in the future. Participation in ritual sacrifices and meals was an external requirement that was to encourage covenant-keepers to think in terms of costs and benefits over time. This particular sacrifice—the firstborn male—was uniquely geared to imparting this message. The primary Old Covenant sign of God’s blessing in history—the firstborn son¹⁰—had to be redeemed, and the firstborn animal had to be sacrificed, paid for, or, in the case of the donkey, redeemed by the slaying of a lamb.

The sacrificial system, like the tithe, was a means of manifesting God’s future-orientation. He is sovereign over history. He brings His decree to pass. Israel was supposed to look to the future for the culmination of the inheritance. “For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth. For yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be: yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall not be. But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace” (Ps. 37:9–11). This is the theme of Psalm 37.¹¹ The present is important, for it is the locus of decision-making and responsibility, but the future is important as the locus of fulfillment. The righteous man will sacrifice a portion of the wealth of the present for the sake of fulfillment in the future. The sacrificial system was designed to compel the public honoring of this

8. North, Authority and Dominion, Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 14.

9. Chapter 8.

10. “Reuben, thou art my firstborn, my might, and the beginning of my strength, the excellency of dignity, and the excellency of power” (Gen. 49:3). “He smote also all the firstborn in their land, the chief of all their strength” (Ps. 105:36).

11. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 6.

principle by individual covenant-keepers. Participation in public rituals was supposed to reinforce men's faith in this principle. External observance was supposed to reinforce internal acceptance; internal acceptance was supposed to reinforce external observance.

This system of circular reinforcement between external and internal law-keeping is a fundamental principle of all law-making. Laws do not make men good. Man is not saved by law in a special grace sense, but good laws reinforce good ideals. Laws that most people accept as moral and legitimate create habitual patterns of behavior. Habits make certain behavioral patterns less costly to individuals, more automatic, and therefore more predictable by others. By increasing men's predictability, good habits extend the division of labor. Other men trust their fellows to perform in predictable ways. This lowers risk. It lowers costs. Economics teaches that when the price of something is lowered, more of it will be demanded. Social cooperation increases when men's good habits become ingrained. This increases the division of labor and therefore increases total output per unit of resource input. Wealth increases.

A future-oriented person is an upper-class person.¹² He makes decisions in terms of a lower rate of interest than a present-oriented person. He discounts the present value of future goods by a lower rate.¹³ A future-oriented person is willing to forfeit present consumption (i.e., save) for the sake of future income at a rate of interest that does not lead a present-oriented person to save. A society filled with future-oriented people will have a faster rate of growth, other things being equal, than a society of present-oriented people.

Israel was supposed to be future-oriented. God's assignment to the Israelites was for them to extend the kingdom of God on earth. This is every person's assignment (Gen. 1:27–28; 9:1–17), but Israel was to honor it. Nevertheless, future-orientation was not sufficient to enable them to achieve this goal. They had to put God first. They had to acknowledge ritually that God was the source of their blessings. It was not their future-orientation alone that provided their blessings; it was God.

12. Edward C. Banfield, The Unheavenly City: The Nature and Future of Our Urban Crisis (Boston: Little, Brown, 1970), pp. 48–50.

13. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State: A Treatise on Economic Principles, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute [1962] 2009), ch. 6:3.

Conclusion

The sacrifice of the firstborn animal imposed an economic loss on every Israelite family. This loss had to be borne without complaint for the sake of the future. The sacrifice of the animal was to serve as a testimony regarding God's deliverance of Israel from Egypt. It therefore was a testimony to God's sovereignty over history. God would continue to deliver Israel if Israel remained faithful. The covenant's negative sanctions had to be imposed on the firstborn so that the covenant's positive sanctions would continue to be showered on Israel. For the sake of present testimony to sons and strangers, as well as for the sake of future blessings, the present loss of the firstborn or its redemption price had to be borne, preferably enthusiastically. "Every man according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give; not grudgingly, or of necessity: for God loveth a cheerful giver" (II Cor. 9:7).¹⁴

14. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 9.

INDIVIDUAL BLESSING AND NATIONAL FEASTING

And thou shalt rejoice in thy feast, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter, and thy manservant, and thy maidservant, and the Levite, the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, that are within thy gates. Seven days shalt thou keep a solemn feast unto the LORD thy God in the place which the LORD shall choose: because the LORD thy God shall bless thee in all thine increase, and in all the works of thine hands, therefore thou shalt surely rejoice. Three times in a year shall all thy males appear before the LORD thy God in the place which he shall choose; in the feast of unleavened bread, and in the feast of weeks, and in the feast of tabernacles: and they shall not appear before the LORD empty: Every man shall give as he is able, according to the blessing of the LORD thy God which he hath given thee (Deut. 16:14–17).

The theocentric principle governing these three festival laws is the national covenant, which included foreigners. The festivals were to be held at a central location. This was a matter of geographical boundaries (point three).¹ The festivals were tied to blessings. This was a matter of sanctions (point four).²

A. Citizenship and Feasting

This chapter in Deuteronomy recapitulates the laws governing the three mandatory national feasts. These were holy periods or holy days. From such celebrations we derive the word “holidays.” Holidays are days that are set apart by law for special activities. Holiness is an aspect of point three of the biblical covenant model: boundaries.

These were clearly ecclesiastical laws. They had to do with priestly activities.³ All three feasts had to be celebrated by the adult males of the nation at a central location. The negative sanction attached to the law of the feasts was excommunication. The text does not state this explicitly, but the requirement of the festival laws was a journey to the central city where the priestly sacrifices were to be performed.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

2. Ibid., ch. 4.

This does not mean that there was complete separation between the civil and ecclesiastical covenants. At the feast of Booths (Tabernacles), one year in seven, the entire law had to be read publicly to the assembled nation (Deut. 31:10–13).⁴ This included civil law. This event took place in the sabbatical year, the year of debt release (v. 10). Strangers had to attend (v. 12). While strangers were not citizens in the sense of judges, they were beneficiaries of the Mosaic civil law. The implication is that attendance at the reading of the law, which included civil law, was required. Then what would have been the appropriate civil sanction against strangers who failed to attend? The law is silent. It was not loss of citizenship; they were not citizens. It was not expulsion from the land; they could have been property owners in the cities. Property rights were defended in Israel; this is basic to the rule of law. There does not appear to have been a civil sanction for non-attendance. Presumably, the sanction was ecclesiastical: exclusion from the right to participate at the national feasts, where the poor and strangers were to be welcomed into the family feasts. The civil covenant was not the focus of concern in the festival laws, except one year in seven. The ecclesiastical covenant, which extended to strangers who wanted to participate, was the concern.

Nevertheless, there was one civil implication of the stranger's refusal to participate in the feasts. A circumcised stranger was on the road to full citizenship. Israel allowed outsiders to apply for citizenship, i.e., membership in the congregation. Depending on which nation he came from, this took either three generations or 10 (Deut. 23:3–8). Any refusal on his part to participate in the national feasts would have led to his excommunication. He would no longer have had lawful access to the Passover, which circumcised strangers possessed (Ex. 12:48). His excommunication would have revoked the covenantal validity of his circumcision. This would have delayed his heirs' inheritance of citizenship for an extra generation. Once again, we see the unbreakable relationship governing biblical law, oath-sanctions, and lawful inheritance.

3. On priestly laws, see Appendix J.

4. Chapter 75.

B. Covenantal Participation

The five representatives listed in this law were identified repeatedly in the Mosaic law as representatives of the oppressed. The manservant and maidservant were under the jurisdiction of the family. The fatherless and the widow were not part of the family, but they were to be invited by other families to participate in the prosperity of the community (Deut. 14:28–29).⁵ Finally the stranger or resident alien (geyr) who had placed himself under God's law was to be invited.

Verse 12 provides the reason: "And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in Egypt: and thou shalt observe and do these statutes." Israel's experience in Egypt was representative of injustice and oppression. What had happened to them in Egypt should not happen to the politically and economically weak in Israel. Those who were under the law were to be treated well. The issue was the covenant. Those who were under the civil covenant were bound by oath to obey the civil law. The rule of law was mandatory in Israel. Israel's righteousness before God, like every judge's righteousness, was manifested in the courts.

One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you (Ex. 12:49).⁶

One law and one manner shall be for you, and for the stranger that sojourneth with you (Num. 15:16).

Ye shall have one law for him that sinneth through ignorance, both for him that is born among the children of Israel, and for the stranger that sojourneth among them (Num. 15:29).

Cursed be he that perverteth the judgment of the stranger, fatherless, and widow. And all the people shall say, Amen (Deut. 27:19).

These were civil commandments. They had to do with civil courts: the place where negative sanctions were imposed. But the requirement went beyond negative civil sanctions; it involved God's positive sanctions: "He doth execute the judgment of the fatherless and widow, and loveth the stranger, in giving him food and raiment. Love ye therefore the stranger: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt" (Deut. 10:18–

5. Chapter 35.

6. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 14.

19). The laws governing the three annual ecclesiastical feasts were part of this general obligation to love the stranger. The positive sanctions of participation were ecclesiastical. Mosaic civil law did not invoke positive sanctions, because positive civil sanctions can only be funded by the imposition of negative sanctions on others.

C. Expensive Celebrations

In my commentary on Leviticus, I devoted space to the economics of the three centralized feasts. I concluded that the economic burden must have been in the range of at least 15% of gross income, not counting travel and lodging costs, and not counting forfeited income. Adding these costs, the total burden may have been closer to 25%, the estimate of Rabbinic tradition.⁷ This was a very heavy burden. It had to be borne in faith. But the increased wealth of the nation would have pointed to the reliability of God's covenantal promises. The law specifically stated that the testimony of personal economic prosperity was to be considered by each celebrant in estimating what he could afford to spend at the festivals. In faith, men were to open their wallets in a common celebration three times a year.

The costs of the festivals had another important function. They kept money away from the civil government. This kept the state from expanding. This is never mentioned in the commentaries.

The Israelites were told that God would reward them, and that they had to celebrate this bounty. The blessings of God were guaranteed: "Be cause the LORD thy God shall bless thee in all thine increase, and in all the works of thine hands, therefore thou shalt surely rejoice" (v. 15b). This promise was corporate. Yet there was also the assumption of individual blessings: "Every man shall give as he is able, according to the blessing of the LORD thy God which he hath given thee" (v. 17). The individual blessings would vary; hence, the individual was required to give of his increase in celebration. He was not to hold back in his rejoicing, for God had not held back His blessings.

Moses was telling them that God's deliverance of the nation out of Egyptian bondage and wilderness wandering was the down payment on the promised inheritance. Blessings in the land would verify the presence of God among His people. So, economic growth was basic to the covenant's system of sanctions. The people would be able to afford the three national celebrations. These celebrations would be very expensive, but they would be affordable to the poorest man in Israel. Every man could risk walking away from his labors for up to seven weeks a year (depending on his distance from Jerusalem).

7. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), Introduction, section H.

The blessings would fund the celebrations. This was God's promise of great economic blessings because the costs of celebration would be high. He was promising His covenantal blessings. These blessings would confirm His covenant. They would verify His presence among them, not just in a spiritual sense but in an economic sense. The covenant's blessings would be visible in history. Israel's mandatory response was to take a large portion of their blessings and reinvest this in national celebrations. They would come together in the presence of God because God had blessed them nationally and individually, as promised in the Mosaic law itself. God was with them individually in their local communities, as seen in their economic prosperity. Their mandatory response was to take a substantial portion of their wealth and squander it in celebration. In this sense, the celebrations were to serve as exercises in faith. God called on them to pour their profits back into the nation. The nation was not to be regarded as a political entity. On the contrary, the lion's share went into celebrations. The state could not lay claim to a large portion of the nation's wealth because this otherwise discretionary income was not legally discretionary. One important effect of this law was the binding of both the state and the priesthood.

D. Fighting Condition

Not only were church and state to be kept trim by this law, so were the people. The mandated festivals can be considered as a national military fitness program. God's holy army would be in training. Every man had to walk to the nation's central place of worship three times a year. Only those who were on a journey could skip two of the three feasts: Firstfruits and Booths.⁸

Had the celebrations been legal in their home towns, the Israelites would have been tempted to consume their capital in calories. This would have been a form of gluttony. This was prohibited by the Mosaic law. Gluttony was a mark of rebellion. Parents were required to act as prosecuting agents in a covenant lawsuit against gluttonous sons:

8. I presume this because of the law governing Passover, which allowed a late celebration because of journeys (Num. 9:10).

“And they shall say unto the elders of his city, This our son is stubborn and rebellious, he will not obey our voice; he is a glutton, and a drunkard” (Deut. 21:20).⁹ “For the drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty: and drowsiness shall clothe a man with rags” (Prov. 23:21).¹⁰ Thus, Solomon warned: “When thou sittest to eat with a ruler, consider diligently what is before thee: And put a knife to thy throat, if thou be a man given to appetite. Be not desirous of his dainties: for they are deceitful meat” (Prov. 23:1–3).

There was no prohibition against eating meat. In fact, the opposite was true. The people were to enjoy the fat of the meat they brought to be sacrificed. In Moses’ parting account of God’s dealings with Israel, past and future, he focused on fat. Israelites were allowed to eat the fat of the land, including animals. But the people were not to become bloated. A nation of obese people would testify to the nation’s subordination to false gods. Moses adopted the imagery of obesity to describe the nation’s rebellious spiritual condition.

For the LORD’S portion is his people; Jacob is the lot of his inheritance. He found him in a desert land, and in the waste howling wilderness; he led him about, he instructed him, he kept him as the apple of his eye. As an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings, taketh them, beareth them on her wings: So the LORD alone did lead him, and there was no strange god with him. He made him ride on the high places of the earth, that he might eat the increase of the fields; and he made him to suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock; Butter of kine, and milk of sheep, with fat of lambs, and rams of the breed of Bashan, and goats, with the fat of kidneys of wheat; and thou didst drink the pure blood of the grape. But Jeshurun waxed fat, and kicked: thou art waxen fat, thou art grown thick, thou art covered with fatness; then he forsook God which made him, and lightly esteemed the Rock of his salvation. They provoked him to jealousy with strange gods, with abominations provoked they him to anger. They sacrificed unto devils, not to God; to gods whom they knew not, to new gods that came newly up, whom your fathers feared not (Deut. 32:9–17).

The Mosaic law encouraged the consumption of fat, but it also mandated exercise. God’s gifts were not to be misused. Men were not to shovel their net income into their mouths. They were not to eat their own futures. In an agricultural society, wealth is understood as having to do with excess food. Being fat in such a society would have been an aspect of what today is called “conspicuous consumption.” Fat was allowed by the Mosaic law. The language of fatness was invoked by Moses to symbolize God’s blessings. But fat was not to compromise anyone’s physical mobility. A man’s extra weight had to be paid for on journeys to Jerusalem three times a year. There was a strong incentive for the obese person to reduce his intake of food. The kind of obesity that is the result of lust for food was equated with the lust to distort one’s senses with alcohol to the point of irresponsibility.¹¹ Fat was allowed—indeed, it was mandated at the feasts. Alcohol was also allowed (Deut. 14:26).¹² But gluttony and drunkenness were prohibited.

9. Chapter 31.

10. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 74.

Conclusion

God promised covenantal blessings for Israel’s covenantal faithfulness. The national festivals were part of this system. They were expensive events that required the men of Israel to gather in one place at the same time. These festivals were God’s way of establishing a sense of national community under His law. Israel would be more than tribes and cities. Israel was a holy nation.

11. The judicial issue of drunkenness is responsibility before God. Any substance or practice (e.g., a discipline that produces a demonic trance) that distorts one’s senses so that one becomes unable to judge his surroundings responsibly must be avoided. An exception is where the individual places himself legally and physically under the authority of others, as is the case in the administration of anesthetics.

12. See Appendix G.

CASUISTRY AND INHERITANCE

Judges and officers shalt thou make thee in all thy gates, which the LORD thy God giveth thee, throughout thy tribes: and they shall judge the people with just judgment. Thou shalt not wrest judgment; thou shalt not respect persons, neither take a gift: for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous. That which is altogether just shalt thou follow, that thou mayest live, and inherit the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee (Deut. 16:18–20).

The theocentric focus of this law was the impartial judgment of God. This has to do with a faithful application of God’s law to specific judicial cases. The issue is justice, which is an aspect of dominion. While the central issue is obedience, the specific application is judgment: point four of the biblical covenant. More than any passage that I have considered before in this commentary, this one seems to be out of place: in the section of Deuteronomy relating to point three: law.

A. Rendering True Judgment

This was not a land law. It was a cross-boundary law.¹ Men are to render honest judgments in history because God does. “Wherefore now let the fear of the LORD be upon you; take heed and do it: for there is no iniquity with the LORD our God, nor respect of persons, nor taking of gifts” (II Chron. 19:7). Men’s covenantal judgments in history are to conform judicially to God’s covenantal judgments in history and eternity.

In rendering covenantal judgment, men are required to think God’s thoughts after Him as creatures. They can do this because they are made in God’s image. *The essence of man’s status as God’s image-bearer is his ability to render judgment.*² This is why Satan tempted mankind through the serpent by telling Eve to eat from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. Adam and Eve were supposed to render judgment against the serpent in terms of God's revealed word.³ The covenantal hierarchy⁴ of God > man > creation was to be preserved by man's representative act of rendering God's judgment against Satan's representative agent, the serpent. Adam and Eve were to render judgment against Satan by refusing to follow the serpent's advice, i.e., his false rendering of judgment against God's revealed word. The essence of the temptation in the garden was the rendering of judgment for or against God's revealed word, for or against the serpent's word. Adam and Eve were to render a joint verdict of "guilty" against the serpent. His crime was having testified falsely against God's word. They were to impose the appropriate sanction by crushing his head. They could not judge Satan directly, but they could kill his covenantal representative. Because they refused to do this, God prophesied that a son of Adam who would do this (Gen. 3:15).

1. On land laws and cross-boundary (universal) laws, see Appendix J.

2. You might want to commit this sentence to memory. It is important.

To this law were attached positive sanctions: life and property. "That which is altogether just shalt thou follow, that thou mayest live, and inherit the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee" (v. 20). The state was in no position to provide the sanction of life. That was God's prerogative. These sanctions were not civil sanctions, for they were positive sanctions. They would come in response to honest judgment. God would give Israel life and inheritance if Israel's judges rendered honest judgment.

This law governed the establishment of local civil courts. These courts could not have been ecclesiastical, for this law made no reference to priests or Levites. The ecclesiastical covenant was not here invoked by Moses. This means that the civil covenant was the focus of this law. Officers and judges were civil magistrates.

B. Stoning and Hierarchy

This raises the judicial issue of stoning. Here are two reasons why stoning was required by the Mosaic law as the proper means of public execution. First, stoning conforms to the imagery of the crushed head.

3. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1987] 2012), Appendix E: "Witnesses and Judges."

4. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

A stone is most likely to be fatal when it crushes the head. Second, stoning allows joint participation in the judicial act of enforcing civil sanctions. Both Adam and Eve would have participated in the execution of the serpent, not just Adam.

Men imposed this sanction before God revealed His law to Moses. The practice of stoning was understood by both the Egyptians and the Israelites: “And Pharaoh called for Moses and for Aaron, and said, Go ye, sacrifice to your God in the land. And Moses said, It is not meet so to do; for we shall sacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians to the LORD our God: lo, shall we sacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians before their eyes, and will they not stone us? We will go three days’ journey into the wilderness, and sacrifice to the LORD our God, as he shall command us” (Ex. 8:25–27). In the wilderness era, Moses despaired: “And Moses cried unto the LORD, saying, What shall I do unto this people? they be almost ready to stone me” (Ex. 17:4). The penalty against coming close to Mt. Sinai when God revealed His presence to the nation was stoning, both of man and beast (Ex. 19:13). For an animal to gore a man calls forth stoning (Ex. 21:28–29, 32). Goring a human is a breach of the covenant’s hierarchical order: man over animal. Only after these events and case laws did the Mosaic law mandate stoning against those who testified falsely about God. False prophets were to be stoned (Deut. 13:1–5). So were members of an Israelite household who tempted other members to worship a false god (Deut. 17:2–6). Finally, an unmarried woman who had sex with another man before marriage, and who did not tell her betrothed husband about this in advance, could be accused of this crime by her newly wedded husband.⁵ The penalty was stoning (Deut. 22:21).

What did these crimes have in common? A violation of the covenantal hierarchy: a goring beast over a human being, a false prophet over the community, a rebellious family member over the others, a false wife over her husband. Whenever a major violation of point two of the biblical covenant took place, the appropriate sanction was stoning: crushing the head.⁶

5. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 47:C.

6. That such a suggestion appalls modern Christians indicates the extent to which pluralism has undermined Christian social thought. The crime of treason against God no longer is regarded as a crime by modern man; hence, the appropriate Mosaic sanction is considered barbaric. In a society in which blasphemy is a trifle, stoning is an offense.

C. Hierarchy, Casuistry, and Economic Growth

The Mosaic legal system, like all legal systems, was hierarchical: point two of the biblical covenant model. The issue here was authority, namely, the voice of authority. Someone must speak God's word authoritatively and representatively in history. Rendering covenantal judgment is a representative act. This is why point two of the covenant—hierarchy, representation, authority—is always connected with point four: rendering judgment, imposing sanctions. In declaring God's word in history, God was above Moses, Moses was above the civil judges, and the civil judges were above the people. God revealed His law to Moses, who taught God's law to civil magistrates, who then served as judges.

1. Judge-Declared Law

The judges were required by God to render judgment in specific cases. This meant that they were required by God to apply the Mosaic law to disputes that would arise between men. The judges were therefore required by God become experts in the art of casuistry: the application of general legal principles and specific case law precedents to new situations. The general legal principles were the Ten Commandments. The case laws were specific biblical laws that extended the Ten Commandments to recognizable historical situations.⁷ By means of casuistry, the judges were supposed to bring justice to Israel. Over time, a body of judicial opinion and precedents would be accumulated which would serve as judicial wisdom. Judicial precedents would then extend the rule of law. Men would begin to think covenantally, judging their own actions in advance. This would not be judge-made law; it would be judge-declared law. God makes the law; His judges are to apply it in history and even in eternity. Jesus announced to His disciples at the Passover meal: "And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me; That ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Luke 22:29–30). Paul announced to the church at Corinth: "Know ye not that we shall judge angels? how much more things that pertain to this life?" (I Cor. 6:3).⁸

The original revelation of the Mosaic law was top-down: from God

7. North, Tools of Dominion, ibid.

8. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary of I Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 6.

to Moses to the judges. This top-down hierarchical element was to be re-confirmed in Israel once every seven years, when the entire nation was to be assembled at a common location, and the entire law was to be read to them publicly (Deut. 31:10–13).⁹ But this event was comparatively rare. The teaching of God's revealed law would normally have been conducted locally: by the Levites, who were judicial specialists, and by the civil judges in actual cases. The Levites were agents of God who declared God's revelation and who served as judges in ecclesiastical disputes. The civil magistrates were officers ordained through the civil covenant who possessed the power of the sword: the monopoly of physical coercion. They declared the civil law publicly and applied it to men's bodies (whipping¹⁰ and capital punishment¹¹) and their property (fines¹² and restitution¹³).

2. Legal Predictability

When both parties are fairly certain that the law's sanctions will be imposed on the disputant who loses the case, the person with the weaker case has an incentive to settle out of court. This reduces the number of cases that are brought to trial. A successful legal system is one in which the high predictability of the law leads to increased self-government and a reduction in the number of cases brought to trial.¹⁴ A vast increase in the number of court cases is evidence of the break down in the rule of law: the clogging of the courts.¹⁵

The greater the predictability of the courts, the greater the incentive for men to cooperate with each other. Why? Because the greater predictability of the judge's application of the law's sanctions reduces the cost of predicting the results of human action. As with any other scarce resource, as the price is lowered, more is demanded. The price of the division of labor is reduced by predictable law. The division of

9. Chapter 75.

10. "Forty stripes he may give him, and not exceed: lest, if he should exceed, and beat him above these with many stripes, then thy brother should seem vile unto thee" (Deut. 25:3).

11. For a list of cases, see Authority and Dominion, Appendix M, Addendum.

12. Fines must be used to compensate victims of unsolved crimes, not as revenue sources for the state. Ibid., chaps. 37:D:3; 41:C.

13. Exodus 22:1–13.

14. F. A. Hayek, The Constitution of Liberty (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960), p. 208.

15. This has been the situation in the United States since the 1960s: Macklin Fleming, The Price of Perfect Justice (New York: Basic Books, 1974).

labor is increased by an increase in the rule of law: more people take advantage of the opportunities offered by increased social cooperation. This increased division of labor raises the output of cooperating individuals. The decentralized decisions of individuals become more predictable. This reduces the cost of obtaining that most precious of all scarce economic resources, accurate knowledge of the future. We can predict more accurately what other people will do when we and they abide by the rules. F. A. Hayek, the free market economist and legal theorist, argued that individual creativity and flexibility are secured by fixed rules. "The maximal certainty of expectations which can be achieved in a society in which individuals are allowed to use their knowledge of constantly changing circumstances for their own equally changing purposes is secured by rules which tell everyone which of these circumstances must not be altered by others and which he himself must not alter."¹⁶ As I wrote in Authority and Dominion:

F. A. Hayek made a point, which must be taken seriously by those who seek to explain the relationship between Christianity and the advent of free enterprise capitalism in the West. "There is probably no single factor which has contributed more to the prosperity of the West than the relative certainty of the law which has prevailed here."¹⁷ Economist Thomas Sowell's comments are especially graphic: "Someone who is going to work for many years to have his own home wants some fairly rigid assurance that the house will in fact belong to him—that he cannot be dispossessed by someone who is physically stronger, better armed, or more ruthless, or who is deemed more 'worthy' by political authorities. Rigid assurances are needed that changing fashions, mores, and power relationships will not suddenly deprive him of his property, his children, or his life."¹⁸

Hayek quite properly denied the validity of the quest for perfect certainty, since "complete certainty of the law is an ideal which we must try to approach but which we can never perfectly attain."¹⁹ His anti-perfectionism regarding the rule of the law is also in accord with the anti-perfectionism of Christian social thought in the West.²⁰ Christianity brought with it a conception of social order which made

16. F. A. Hayek, Law, Legislation and Liberty, vol. 1, Rules and Order (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1973), pp. 108–109.

17. Hayek, Constitution of Liberty, p. 208.

18. Thomas Sowell, Knowledge and Decisions (New York: Basic Books, 1980), p. 32.

19. Hayek, Constitution of Liberty, p. 208.

20. Benjamin Warfield, Perfectionism (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1958). This is an abridged version of his two-volume study, published posthumously by Oxford University Press in 1931 and reprinted by Baker Book House in 1981.

possible the economic development of the West.²¹

What always threatens the rule of God's law in history is the judge who departs from the Bible-revealed law of God. The judge who substitutes his own wisdom for biblical law or the body of legal opinion derived from it is a threat to biblical civil justice. So is the judge who seeks bribes for rendering judgment that deviates from God's fundamental law and constitutional laws. Bribes pervert justice. It is the court's task to extend justice. Civil justice in turn makes possible capitalism's increase of a society's wealth. The positive sanction of wealth is the outcome of civil justice.

In the period immediately preceding the conquest, Moses revealed this case law, which recapitulates Leviticus 19:15: "Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty: but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour." It recapitulates Deuteronomy 1:17: "Ye shall not respect persons in judgment; but ye shall hear the small as well as the great; ye shall not be afraid of the face of man; for the judgment is God's: and the cause that is too hard for you, bring it unto me, and I will hear it." Its theocentric focus was God's judgment. God is not a respecter of persons when He judges any man. God does not look at the person's class position, money, good looks, or any other distinguishing feature. He does not accept bribes to corrupt His judgment. He looks at His law and the person's thoughts, words, and actions, and He judges the degree to which the person before Him has conformed to or deviated from His law. In other words, God applies His law to historical circumstances. He interprets it and makes assessments in terms of it. God practices the judicial art of casuistry. He does not wait until the end of time to render judgment. He renders preliminary judgments in history. As creatures made in His image, men are required by God to do the same: thinking God's thoughts after Him, declaring His law, and applying sanctions in terms of His law. Men are to render righteous judgment. They do this through biblical casuistry.

In our day, biblical casuistry is a lost skill. Worse; it is a skill widely derided as theocratic and therefore illegitimate. This is not merely the opinion of covenant-breakers; it is announced with equal fervor and confidence by Christians: social theorists (few in number since 1700 precisely because of this hostility to biblical casuistry), church leaders, civil leaders, and people in the pews. But there is no escape from the requirements of casuistry. If men do not render judgment in terms of God's fundamental law—the Ten Commandments—and God's biblically revealed constitutional laws, which have extended the Ten Commandments to real-world cases,²² then they must render judgment in terms of some other law-order. Judges dare not remain silent if social order is to be maintained. Disputes will be settled: in covenantal courts or by clan feuds or on battlefields. Sanctions must be imposed in order to settle disputes. The judicial question is this one: By what standard? It was no accident that Rushdoony chose this as the title of his 1959 study of the philosophy of Cornelius Van Til. Van Til had attacked the idea of a common-ground, autonomous, religiously neutral, universal natural law, but he suggested nothing to take its place. Rushdoony concluded that the only biblically valid alternative to natural law theory is theonomy. He did not begin working out the theonomic answers to social, legal, and economic questions until the second half of the 1960s.

21. North, Authority and Dominion, p. 1340.

D. Sanctions and Inheritance

Verse 20 reads: "That which is altogether just shalt thou follow, that thou mayest live, and inherit the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee." There can be no question about the unbreakable covenantal connection between the law's sanctions and inheritance. The art of rendering biblical judgment is the art of deciding guilt or innocence in terms of biblical law. But this must involve judicial sanctions. To the law are attached sanctions. The imposed sanctions must fit the violation. This is the biblical principle of the lex talionis: an eye for an eye.²³

The original context of this principle of justice was abortion: "If men strive, and hurt a woman with child, so that her fruit depart from her, and yet no mischief follow: he shall be surely punished, according as the woman's husband will lay upon him; and he shall pay as the judges determine. And if any mischief follow, then thou shalt give life for life, Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, Burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe" (Ex. 21:22–25). It is indicative of the contemporary crisis in Protestant thought that legalized abortion did not become the target of widespread Protestant political opposition until several years after the United States Supreme

22. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973).

23. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 38.

Court handed down Roe v. Wade in 1973. But after 1980, a growing minority of evangelicals began to organize against legalized abortion. It was this public issue that dragged Francis Schaeffer into political activism.²⁴

Because there can be no neutral zone in the abortionist's office between a dead baby and a live one, the myth of neutrality is definitively denied in matters of abortion. This inescapable fact of abortion persuaded Schaeffer's son to write A Time for Anger: The Myth of Neutrality.²⁵ Whenever the myth of neutrality fades, the conflict between rival religious world views escalates. The always mythical zones of neutrality between Christianity and humanism are recognized increasingly as being mythical. This pressures Christians and humanists to go their respective ways to develop their respective views of what constitutes a legitimate earthly kingdom. Both sides then seek to use their vision of the kingdom to shape society.

Theocracy is therefore an inescapable concept. It is never a question of theocracy vs. no theocracy. It is a question of which theocracy. The issue of legalized abortion has dragged evangelical Protestants into the political arena, forcing them to abandon their previous pietism-quietism, forcing them to come up with theologically precise answers to the crucial judicial and ethical question: By what standard? The moment a Christian raises this question, he must confront the issue of theocracy vs. pluralism, not just in the church and family, but in civil government.²⁶ This is why the issue of legalized abortion has led Christians to issue manifestos that sound theocratic. They are theocratic. They undermine Enlightenment pluralism, which has served as the judicial basis of modern Western society ever since the late eighteenth century. But because modern Christians have embraced Enlightenment pluralism in the name of Christ, there is an inevitable schizophrenia in their manifestoes.²⁷

By what standard? Anglo-American Protestants have resisted dealing with this crucial question from an explicitly biblical point of view ever since the end of Oliver Cromwell's Protectorate with his death in 24. Francis A. Schaeffer, Whatever Happened to the Human Race (1976); reprinted in The Complete Works of Francis A. Schaeffer: A Christian Worldview, 5 vols. (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, 1982), V, A Christian View of the West, pp. 281–410.

25. Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, 1982.

26. See Appendix H: "Week Reed: The Politics of Compromise."

27. On the unresolved schizophrenia of Francis A. Schaeffer's book, A Christian Manifesto (1981), see Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), pp. 180–85. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

1658, but legalized abortion is now forcing their hand. Peter's injunction is before them: "But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts: and be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you with meekness and fear" (I Peter 3:15). This hope is more than faith in the world beyond the grave. It is hope that someday, infants will not be deliberately sent to their graves, which include trash bin "dumpsters" located behind the offices of abortionists.

The covenantal issue of sanctions cannot legitimately be separated from the covenantal issue of inheritance. This is obvious in the case of abortion. "Who will inherit?" is the fundamental issue of the death penalty: the earthly one as well as the eternal one. Abortion imposes the death penalty on those who have done neither good nor evil (Rom. 9:11). When abortion is legalized by the civil government, abortionists become agents of the state, for only the state has the right to impose the death penalty. In the name of personal privacy for women, the United States Supreme Court necessarily swore in an army of executioners: mothers, physicians, nurses, and their support staffs. A civil oath—a swearing in—is unofficial and implicit in the authorization of abortion, but it is nonetheless binding. This is why an entire social order is at risk from the judgment of God when it allows its civil representatives to delegate such powers of execution to private citizens. Biblically, these executioners are no longer private citizens; they are agents of the state, which is in turn an agent of the corporate society. As with a citizens' posse that is sworn in by a sheriff, so are the executioners sworn in by the state. Members of a sworn-in posse have a delegated though circumscribed right to kill those who resist their authority. So do abortionists and their assistants in a nation that has legalized abortion. Today, abortionists possess greater judicial immunity from civil action than a posse does.

E. Justice and Positive Sanctions

We return to the issue of positive sanctions: "That which is altogether just shalt thou follow, that thou mayest live, and inherit the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee" (v. 20). The positive sanctions of extended life and land were extensions of the Mosaic seed laws and land laws. These laws were the result of Jacob's messianic prophecy regarding Judah: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be" (Gen. 49:10). Seed laws and land laws were laws confined to Israel. They were not cross-boundary laws.²⁸ The question arises: Were the promises of verse 20 more than extensions of the seed laws and land laws? This raises a subsidiary question: Does this connection between civil justice and personal possessions extend into the New Covenant? That is, was this law a cross-boundary law that applied beyond the borders of Mosaic Israel? Or was it confined historically and geographically to Israel?

This hermeneutical question raises the issue of covenantal continuity. Meredith G. Kline's dictum regarding the mystery of God's New Covenant historical sanctions comes into play: "And meanwhile it [the common grace order] must run its course within the uncertainties of the mutually conditioning principles of common grace and common curse, prosperity and adversity being experienced in a manner largely unpredictable because of the inscrutable sovereignty of the divine will that dispenses them in mysterious ways."²⁹ If correct, this would negate the possibility of an explicitly biblical social theory. Christians would have to look either to autonomous nature or autonomous man to provide the predictable sanctions that make possible both social cohesion and social theory. The existence of cross-boundary laws that were binding outside of Mosaic Israel, and are still binding today, is what makes possible Christian social theory.

Is there a principle of continuity between this Mosaic principle and New Covenant law? There is no doubt that the general judicial principle of not respecting persons in judgment is a cross-boundary law. Peter cited this principle in his confession to Cornelius after Peter's vision of the clean and unclean beasts: "Then Peter opened his mouth, and said, Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons: But in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him" (Acts. 10:34). This is a fundamental New Covenant principle.

For there is no respect of persons with God (Rom. 2:11).

But he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons (Col. 3:25).

My brethren, have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, with respect of persons (James 2:1).

28. On the categories of Mosaic law, see Appendix J.

29. Meredith G. Kline, "Comments on an Old-New Error," The Westminster Theological Journal, XLI (Fall 1978), p. 184.

And if ye call on the Father, who without respect of persons judgeth according to every man's work, pass the time of your sojourning here in fear (I Peter 1:17).

The question, then, relates to the covenantal connection between rendering civil justice and God's external blessings. Did life and land serve as representative blessings for a broader class of blessings? Or were they narrowly circumscribed extensions of Mosaic Israel's seed laws and land laws?

The exegetical problem facing us here is to identify the covenantal basis of the extension of both long life and property ownership into the New Testament economy. I argue that the non-theonomist has the burden of proof to prove discontinuity. But the non-theonomist insists that it is the theonomist's burden to prove continuity. So, for the sake of argument (since I know I can win it in this instance), I shall willingly bear this burden.

The solution is found in Paul's citation of the fifth commandment. "Honour thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee" (Ex. 20:12).³⁰ Paul wrote: "Children, obey your parents in the Lord: for this is right. Honour thy father and mother; (which is the first commandment with promise;) That it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long on the earth" (Eph. 6:1–3). The Greek word for earth applies to specific geographical locations. Examples: "And thou Bethlehem, in the land of Juda, art not the least among the princes of Juda: for out of thee shall come a Governor, that shall rule my people Israel" (Matt. 2:6). "Arise, and take the young child and his mother, and go into the land of Israel: for they are dead which sought the young child's life" (Matt. 2:20). The Greek word for land can also refer to the whole earth: "Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth (Matt. 5:5)."³¹ The continuity between both the command and specific sanctions of the Mosaic law and New Testament inheritance should be obvious.

Paul's letter to Ephesus was not intended to persuade gentiles that in order to receive long life, church members would have to move to Israel. Yet this would have to be the argument of anyone who denies the covenantal continuity between the promise of long life on the land in the fifth commandment and Paul's citation of this law to strengthen his case regarding the child's obligation to obey his parents.

30. North, Authority and Dominion, 25.

31. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 4.

The most general law governing the case law application of Deuteronomy 16:18–20 was not Jacob's promise that Judah would bear the sword in Israel until Shiloh came (Gen. 49:10). Rather, it was the fifth commandment. Because the fifth commandment and its sanctions extend into the New Covenant era,³² Deuteronomy 16:18–20 has to be interpreted as a cross-boundary law, not a land law or a seed law. Obviously, it was not a priestly law. This is why we can be legitimately confident that when judges render civil justice in terms of God's revealed law without respect to persons, this will produce the blessing of long life. The enforcement of biblical civil law will also protect private property. The word land in this passage represents inherited property in general. In fact, it asserts the right of inheritance.

F. Health and Wealth

Deuteronomy 16:18–20 informs us that there is a positive economic correlation between honest judgment and life. First, civil judges who refuse to take bribes or pervert justice thereby secure men's inheritances. Secure inheritances represent a defense of private property, including contracts. Second, judicial respect for private property is the legal basis of free market capitalism. Third, free market capitalism consistently increases per capita wealth. Fourth, increased per capita wealth increases average life expectancy. Long life is a visible blessing which is positively correlated with increased per capita wealth. As a nation's per capita wealth increases, so does the average life expectancy of its residents. So does their general health.³³

The measurable blessing of increased life expectancy is revealed statistically in decreasing rates for life insurance premiums. Those theologians, such as Kline, who deny any measurable correlation between corporate obedience to God's covenantal law and corporate

32. The non-theonomist is in a bind exegetically. The original law is part of the Mosaic covenant: the Ten Commandments. He must argue that the sanctions attached to the fifth commandment, while valid today, do not imply covenantal continuity. But this is refuted by Paul's citation of the entire commandment, including the positive sanctions for obedience. Paul singled out this law as the first law with a promise. He did not call into question the promise, i.e., this law's sanctions. On the contrary, he affirmed the promise.

33. Aaron Wildavsky, Searching for Safety (New Brunswick, New Jersey: Transaction, 1988), pp. 58–75; John D. Graham, Bei-Hung Chang, and John S. Evans, "Poorer Is Riskier," Risk Analysis, XII, No. 3 (1992). John C. Shanahan and Adam D. Thierer, "How to Talk About Risk: How Well-Intentioned Regulations Can Kill," Heritage Talking Points, No. 13 (Washington, D.C.: Heritage Foundation, 1966), p. 14. (<http://bit.ly/RiskTalk>) blessings must demonstrate that decreasing term insurance rates are not correlated to corporate covenantal faithfulness, i.e., external obedience to God's law. They must first deny that the West's increased life expectancy came as a result of widespread adherence to the stipulations to God's law, most notably laws protecting private property (Ex. 20:15), including contract law. Then, second, they must prove it.

The Mosaic law informs us, and the history of the West confirms, that the civil government's enforcement of God's Bible-revealed civil law increases national wealth in the long term. The continuing trustworthiness of verse 20's covenantally linked promises—private property, honest judgment, and life—has been verified by the history of the West, especially since the late eighteenth century, when the rule of civil law produced the Industrial Revolution in England, which spread within one generation to the European Continent and the United States. The rule of law was emphasized by Protestantism's concept of individual conscience, self-government, limited civil government, and eschatological future-orientation.³⁴ Wealth increased steadily as never before in history in response to Protestantism's worldview in the field of economics.

Conclusion

The same covenantal connections linking life, property ownership, and faithful civil judgment are found in the sanction attached to honoring one's parents. Long life (a measurable blessing) in the land (secure inheritance) for honoring parents (a legal stipulation) is affirmed in Exodus 20:14. He who would in any way deny the covenantal link between the stipulations of biblical law and visible, positive, corporate sanctions must deny the continuing validity of the fifth commandment. He must also explain how Paul's citation of the fifth commandment and its sanctions in Ephesians 6:2 does not re-confirm Exodus 20:14. In short, he must apply an antinomian hermeneutic to the New Testament. He must argue for a radical judicial discontinuity between the two covenants, despite the fact that the author of Hebrews twice

34. Postmillennialism first appeared in a comprehensive, developed form in the Protestant West in early seventeenth-century Holland, Scotland, and England. See The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, VI (Summer 1979), Symposium on Puritanism and Progress. The belief in the possibility of long-term compound economic growth for society did not exist prior to seventeenth-century Puritanism. This positive eschatology was secularized by the Enlightenment in the next century. Robert A. Nisbet, "The Year 2000 And All That," Commentary (June 1968).

cited as fulfilled Jeremiah's prophecy that the law will be written in the hearts of men as being fulfilled in the New Covenant (Heb. 8:10–11; 10:16).

Antinomianism is the denial of biblical law and its sanctions in New Testament times. It threatens the judicial inheritance of the West. This, in turn, threatens the economic inheritance of the West: the increasing per capita wealth made possible by free market capitalism. Whether this antinomianism is the scholastic variety, the Lutheran variety, the Reformed variety, or the dispensational variety, the result is the same: the undermining of covenant-keeping men's faith in the positive corporate results of corporate covenantal faithfulness. This loss of faith then undermines the development of an explicitly biblical social theory, including economics.

ISRAEL'S SUPREME COURT

If there arise a matter too hard for thee in judgment, between blood and blood, between plea and plea, and between stroke and stroke, being matters of controversy within thy gates: then shalt thou arise, and get thee up into the place which the LORD thy God shall choose; And thou shalt come unto the priests the Levites, and unto the judge that shall be in those days, and enquire; and they shall shew thee the sentence of judgment: And thou shalt do according to the sentence, which they of that place which the LORD shall choose shall shew thee; and thou shalt observe to do according to all that they inform thee: According to the sentence of the law which they shall teach thee, and according to the judgment which they shall tell thee, thou shalt do: thou shalt not decline from the sentence which they shall shew thee, to the right hand, nor to the left. And the man that will do presumptuously, and will not hearken unto the priest that standeth to minister there before the LORD thy God, or unto the judge, even that man shall die: and thou shalt put away the evil from Israel. And all the people shall hear, and fear, and do no more presumptuously (Deut. 17:8–13).

The theocentric focus of this law is God's office as a judge. God is the final Judge.¹ As in the case of the previous chapter, this one seems to relate more to sanctions: point four.² As we shall see, however, the passage deals with a particular judicial issue: jurisdiction.

This is the issue of boundaries: point three.³

1. The final negative sanction is eternal death (Rev. 20:14–15).

2. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

3. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012).

A. Church and State

The settlement of disputes between men is supposed to reflect the final settlement of disputes between God and man. In God's court, there will be a final settlement. Every case will be brought to a conclusion. There will be either reconciliation or permanent separation between the Judge and the judged.

The office of priest—he who offers sacrifices as man's representative—ended in A.D. 70.⁴ The question is: Has the ecclesiastical minister replaced the priest? Does the church still possess authority in supplying representatives who hand down civil judgments? This is the crucial covenantal question that this chapter must answer. If the answer is yes, then the absolute judicial separation of church and state is a false Enlightenment myth.

God's authority on the throne of judgment is unitary in the sense of His unified being (Deut. 6:4). Yet this authority is also plural: "let us" (Gen. 1:26; 11:7). God's court reflects God's being: both one and many. A human court is not God's heavenly court, yet it must reflect the one and the many of God's heavenly court. The equal ultimacy of the one and the many cannot be achieved through ontology: unified being. It must therefore be achieved subordinately, i.e., representatively. This is why, in Israel's supreme court, both church and state were represented. Israel's voice of civil authority at the highest level was not legitimate if it was restricted to civil magistrates.

B. A Question of Jurisdiction

No social order can survive without civil sanctions. Under the biblical civil covenant, these sanctions are exclusively negative. The state is not a supplier of positive sanctions except in its capacity as the judge of those who have committed crimes whose proper sanction is restitution. The state then transfers wealth from the criminal to the victim. But the state is not the source of the positive sanctions showered on the victim; it is only the arbitrator. It compels the law-breaker to return to the victim that which lawfully belongs to the victim, including compensation for his suffering and the statistical risk he bore of not discovering who had committed the crime.⁵ Normally, this requires double restitution (Ex. 22:4). In short, the state is the lawful enforcer.

4. This, of course, is a Protestant interpretation of the office.

5. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 43:C.

It possesses a God-given, covenantal monopoly of violence in order to enforce justice (Rom. 13:1–7).⁶

In Deuteronomy 17:8–13, Moses presented a case law application of the general principle of the hierarchy of covenantal judgment. In Exodus 18, he set up a system of appeals courts.⁷ Here he made an application of the general law of appeals. Two men have come into a local court. They are equals in influence. This makes the case too difficult for a local court to judge. “If there arise a matter too hard for thee in judgment, between blood and blood, between plea and plea, and between stroke and stroke, being matters of controversy within thy gates: then shalt thou arise, and get thee up into the place which the LORD thy God shall choose” (v. 8). The case was to be transferred to a higher court in which the judges were not part of the local community. In modern law, this is called a change of venue. The Mosaic law acknowledged that in difficult cases between prominent persons, each with his own supporters, each with a strong case, local judges may not be qualified to render judgment. The cases are too hard. This is the language of Exodus 18: “And they judged the people at all seasons: the hard causes they brought unto Moses, but every small matter they judged themselves” (v. 26).

The mandated solution was to assemble a group of judges, civil and ecclesiastical, to consider the case. There is no question that Moses was here describing a civil dispute. The mandatory sanction for disobedience to the supreme court was execution. The church in Israel did not possess the power of the sword except in defending against trespassers of the boundaries around the tabernacle (Num. 18:3, 22). All of Deuteronomy 17 deals with civil law, but ecclesiastical judges played a role in the legal process.

This court’s decision was final. It had to be obeyed. Nevertheless, there is no indication that the case in question had been a matter of capital sanctions prior to the court’s final judgment. But once this court had declared final judgment, both participants had to obey. The person who was declared guilty had to follow the directive of the court. He was not executed, which means that this was not a capital infraction. But contumacy—presumptive resistance to the supreme court—was a capital offense.

6. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 11.

7. North, Authority and Dominion, Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 19.

This indicates that the supreme court's word was judicially representative of God's word. Its word was final in history. But this word was not exclusively civil or ecclesiastical. It was both. The judge, as a representative of the civil covenant, declared his judgment only in association with the priests. There had to be a united declaration. This kept the state from becoming judicially autonomous. Similarly with the church: the priests had no lawful way to enforce their judgment physically without the cooperation of the civil magistrate. Autonomy was not a legitimate option at the highest judicial level.

This joint declaration of judgment was analogous to a joint declaration of war. The two silver trumpets had to be blown by the Aaronic priests before the princes could lead the nation into battle. One trumpet was blown initially to assemble the princes. Not until both were blown by the priests was the princes' decision to go into battle ratified (Num. 10:1–9).⁸ Church and state had to agree to the war.

Any party in the civil dispute who rebelled against the terms of the joint declaration faced death. What had been a matter to be solved by economic restitution now moved to a new level of criminality. It moved from restitution through money to restitution through execution. The resisting party was to be delivered into God's heavenly court for final sentencing. Certain acts demand that the convicted criminal be transferred to God's court. One of these acts was resistance to a final determination by Israel's supreme court.

The cost of law enforcement in this case was borne by the civil government. The civil government had a cost-effective means of reducing resistance to its official decisions: the threat of execution. The resisting party had considerable incentive to count the cost of his non-compliance. This cost was very high: his permanent removal from the jurisdiction of any man's court.

The formal declaration by the supreme court moved the dispute from man's word to God's word. The person who resisted coming to terms with his opponent prior to the supreme court's declaration could say to himself: "I'm not going to comply. I don't have to comply." But the word to which he had not had to comply was the word of another individual. There had not yet been a covenantal declaration. But after the court made its final judgment, the threat of the most permanent civil sanction was inserted into the actor's cost-benefit analysis. He was no longer facing man's word; he was facing God's. He was therefore no longer facing an individual's sanctions, such as the other party's refusal to trade with him in the future. The negative sanction had moved from economics to life itself.

8. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press [1997] 2012), ch. 2:A.

C. An Increase in Predictability

Whenever this sanction was consistently imposed within the boundaries of Israel, the Israelites would have found that their lives had become more predictable. The law would have been taken seriously by everyone. An execution or two every few years would have sent a very clear message to all Israel regarding the costs of resistance to the law. This was the intent of this law: "And all the people shall hear, and fear, and do no more presumptuously" (v. 13).

When large numbers of people fear the civil law, their actions become more predictable whenever the courts are predictable. The law becomes more predictable when the courts become more predictable. An increase in the predictability of the law reduces the costs of decision-making. People know generally what the law requires. They also know that the judges will impose the specified sanctions attached to the law. The last remaining element of uncertainty is the reaction of the guilty party. Will he comply with the court's declaration? This case law made it clear: God expected the guilty party to comply. God expected the state to see to it that the guilty party complied. The person who refused to comply with the court's declaration would not get another opportunity to break any law.

Israel's solution to the settlement of private disputes was very different from Athens' solution. In private disputes, the Athenian court did not enforce its judgments unless there was a matter of state concern involved. The matter was turned over to the victorious party for enforcement.⁹ Justice was available, but only to families strong enough to enforce the court's decision.

With greater legal predictability, society reduces its costs of production. When men know what the law requires, and when they know that convicted law-breakers in the society have a great incentive to comply, they can more easily predict the actions of others. This increases the predictability of other decision-makers in society. This in turn decreases the cost of cooperation. One of the most familiar laws of economics is this: when the cost of production of something is re- duced, more of it will be supplied. Producers see an opportunity to make a profit: by increasing production, they can take advantage of the newly discovered difference between production costs and consumer prices. By reducing the cost of predicting other people's actions, this law, including its specified capital sanction, would have tended to increase the output of labor in Israelite society. This would have increased the wealth of those living under the Mosaic law's jurisdiction. By reducing the likelihood that others would refuse to comply with the law, this law increased the likelihood that men would honor their promises. This would also have increased the value of contracts. A contract is an agreement that increases the predictability of other people's actions in the future. The greater the expected value of a contract, the more people who will seek out others to deal with.

9. G. Glotz, The Greek City and its Institutions (New York: Barnes & Noble, [1929] 1969), p. 249.

This leads to a very important principle of Christian economics: predictable covenantal law and covenantal sanctions undergird the humanly unplanned development of a contractual society. The covenantal basis of contract law is manifested in this case law. The threat of execution for non-compliance with the state's interpretation of what a contract requires will increase the likelihood that men will take care in drafting their contracts and complying with their terms.

There is nothing in the New Covenant that annuls this principle of civil court authority. There is no New Covenant principle that authorizes reduced civil sanctions for non-compliance with the supreme court's decision. There is nothing that changes the specified sanction. In fact, the severity of the specified sanction is what demonstrates the supreme authority of the court. To reduce the sanction is to undermine the authority of the supreme court. Any argument on the part of non-theonomists that the New Covenant has nothing to say about such matters is implicitly an undermining of civil authority and therefore a subsidy to criminals. In any case, if the New Covenant really has nothing to say about such judicial matters, then the consistent New Covenant theologian should excuse himself from the discussion. He has nothing to say, for the New Covenant supposedly has nothing to say. On the whole, Christians in the West have willingly excused themselves from such discussions since about 1700, which is why social theory, criminal law, and politics have become battlegrounds between left-wing Enlightenment humanists and right-wing Enlightenment humanists.

Why this silence by Christians? Perhaps because they have recognized the underlying theocratic nature of this law and all civil law. This Mosaic law had an important qualification: Israel's supreme civil court was neither wholly civil nor wholly ecclesiastical. The supreme court's authority to enforce its word was legitimate only because this decision of the civil judges came only after consultation with, and the support of, the priests.

D. The Priests the Levites

The phrase in verse 9, "the priests the Levites," first appears in the Bible in this verse. If we are to understand the scope of this law, we must understand the meaning of this phrase. In Deuteronomy 18, we are given a clearer picture of who these priests-Levites were. They were those Levites who served as tabernacle-temple priests. They had to reside in the city where the tabernacle was located. They were not Levites who lived in local communities. The priests officiated at the sacrifices (Deut. 18:1–8). This means that these priests held sacramental offices. They were ordained to special ministerial office, which required them to be present at the altar. In some cases, they actually sold their real estate in their home cities: "They shall have like portions to eat, beside that which cometh of the sale of his patrimony" (Deut. 18:8).

The presence of priests on the nation's supreme civil court gave veto power to the church. The supreme representative function of the supreme court could not lawfully be exclusively civil. The civil oath did not authorize exclusive judicial authority at the highest level, i.e., the final court of appeal. This balance of authority served as a check on the state. The state's agents could not unilaterally declare God's law in the most difficult cases that divided men.

E. Separation and Inheritance

The permanent separation of covenant-breakers from God at the final judgment leads to a transfer of inheritance: from the guilty parties to the innocent victims. The New Heaven and New Earth in its post-final judgment, consummated form will be inhabited solely by covenant-keepers (Rev. 21:1–4; 7–8). This model of final inheritance/disinheritance is the judicial basis of the prophecy that the righteous will inherit the earth in history. "For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth. For yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be: yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall not be. But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace” (Ps. 37:9–11). History will reflect the outcome in eternity.

The postmillennial implications of these passages are obvious. Amillennialism’s theory of history as a permanent stalemate between covenant-breakers and covenant-keepers, with the church in permanent remnant status, or the church as progressively under oppression,¹⁰ is contradicted by Isaiah’s prophecy concerning the historical manifestation of the New Heaven and New Earth, in which, unlike the scene in Revelation 21:4, death will still exist. Isaiah 65:17–23 presents a promise of permanent inheritance, in which righteousness is the basis of inheritance, and therefore disinheritance by covenant-breakers is no longer a threat.¹¹

The progressive transfer of inheritance in history will resemble Egypt’s transfer of wealth to the Israelites at the exodus. The inheritance of the Egyptians’ firstborn sons was transferred to God’s firstborn son, Israel. This is normative for history. So far, it has not been normal because of the repeated apostasy of the church, but that which has been normal in the past is not that which is normative. It is also not a permanent condition.

There were a few cases under the Old Covenant in which there was no inheritance by Israel, where disinheritance was absolute. God imposed total destruction on a few cities. Sodom and Gomorrah are the archetypes. Lot did not inherit the wealth of Sodom. Arad’s cities were totally destroyed by Israel (Num. 21:3). Jericho was totally destroyed (Josh. 6:24). Saul lost his kingship because he refused to destroy Amalek totally (I Sam. 15:35; 16:1). But in the vast majority of cases in the conquest of Canaan, Israel inherited the capital assets of the defeated nations. This was part of God’s original plan of inheritance: it was to be achieved through the disinheritance of covenant-breakers. “And it shall be, when the LORD thy God shall have brought thee into the land which he sware unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give thee great and goodly cities, which thou buildedst not, And houses full of all good things, which thou filledst not, and wells digged, which thou diggedst not, vineyards and olive trees, which thou plantedst not; when thou shalt have eaten and be full. . .” (Deut. 6:10–11). Solomon later summarized this process: “A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov. 13:22).¹²

10. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), pp. 76–94. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

11. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 15.

F. New Testament Applications

The New Testament equivalent of the priest-Levite is the ordained church officer who has the right to administer the sacraments and to restrict unauthorized people's access to the sacraments. This officer holds the keys to the kingdom (Matt. 16:19). He has the authority to declare people excommunicate. That is, he lawfully can exercise judgment with respect to a man's eternal inheritance. To the extent that inheritance in history is correlative to inheritance in eternity, he possesses the right indirectly to determine inheritance in history.

1. Inheritance in History

The biblical covenant makes it clear that the righteous will inherit in history. This historical outcome is denied by pessimillennialists. This is another reason why point five—eschatology—influences point four: sanctions. It also influences point two: hierarchy. This is why the modern Christian is not really neutral regarding the continuing authority of Mosaic law. He does not really believe that the New Testament has nothing to say about this, despite his initial assurances to the contrary. He insists that the New Testament has abolished all traces of the Mosaic civil law, or at least all those traces that call into question the Enlightenment's theory of religiously neutral civil law and political pluralism, which he devoutly accepts.¹³ He rejects point five of the biblical covenant, and therefore he rejects points two and four: the suggestion that a minister of the sacraments has any lawful advisory and veto function in a civil court. He sides with the humanists in a joint effort to deny that the church has any legitimate official authority in civil judgments. Prior to 1650, such a joint declaration would have been considered unthinkable in the West outside of the tiny New England commonwealth of Rhode Island.

The most important church council in history was the Council of Nicea, held in 325. It settled for all time the question of the divinity of Jesus Christ. To deny Christ's equality with God is to deny the Christian faith. The church has accepted this declaration ever since. Yet this international ecclesiastical assembly was called to serve by the Emperor Constantine, who wanted this issue settled. It got settled theologically at the Council of Nicea, although it was not settled militarily and socially for several centuries.¹⁴

12. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 41.

13. See Appendix H: "Week Reed: The Politics of Compromise."

The Westminster Assembly first met on July 1, 1643. The British Parliament, in its rebellion against King Charles I, had called for the Assembly in the previous November. Parliament, not the Anglican Church, which opposed Parliament, chose the Assembly's representatives. The Westminster "divines" were in fact political appointees. The Assembly was advisory to the Parliament. The members were paid by Parliament to attend.¹⁵ The Westminster Assembly ratified Parliament's authority by putting the following declaration into the Confession: the civil magistrate "hath power to call synods, to be present at them, and to provide that whatsoever is transacted in them be according to the mind of God."¹⁶ This passage was removed by the American Presbyterian Church in the revision of 1787–88, at the same time that the United States Constitution was being ratified. The Whig view of the separation of church and state was ratified in both constitutional documents: by the removal of a section in the ecclesiastical covenant, and by the inclusion in the civil covenant of a prohibition against religious test oaths for Federal office-holding.¹⁷

2. The Protestant Solution: Abdication

The modern Protestant is a child of the Enlightenment in his political outlook. The political religious pluralism which was regarded as heretical by the church, East and West, for 1700 years is today universally accepted by Protestants as somehow innately Christian and, in the words of unitarian skeptic Thomas Jefferson, "self-evident." The modern secular state has issued its declaration of independence from God, and American Protestants have not only agreed, they have hailed this as the very work of God in history, their source of liberation. No one has put it any more starkly than former Presidential aide and con-

14. The invading Ostrogoths were Arians.

15. Gary North, Crossed Fingers: How the Liberals Captured the Presbyterian Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1996), Appendix C. (<http://bit.ly/gncrossed>)

16. Westminster Confession of Faith (1646), XXII:3.

17. Article VI, Section III. See Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), pp. 385–91. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

victed felon (pre-conversion) Charles Colson: "Thus two typically mortal enemies, the Enlightenment and the Christian faith, found a patch of common ground on American soil."¹⁸ He regarded this as a great breakthrough in civic freedom. As one of modern American evangelicalism's most respected figures, Colson's opinion is representative.

In the best-selling popular history of colonial America, The Light and the Glory, two Protestant authors wrote of "the divine origin of its [the Constitution's] inspiration. . . ."¹⁹ Furthermore, "it is nothing less than the institutional guardian of the Covenant Way of life for the nation as a whole!"²⁰ Yet they recognized that it is "a secularizing of the spiritual reality of the covenant. It can thus never be the substitute for a covenant life totally given to the Lord Jesus Christ."²¹ This should be obvious to any Christian. But their statement is also covenantally incomplete. The crucial question is this: What is the New Covenant basis of the civil covenant in "a covenant life totally given to Jesus Christ"? The two authors did not raise this question, for the question no longer occurs to modern American Christians, even among those few who adopt the word "covenant." Yet the father of one of the authors served as Chaplain of the United States Senate, and later became the posthumous subject of a best-selling book and a Hollywood movie.²² The "covenant life totally given to Jesus Christ" is arbitrarily confined to three spheres: personal, ecclesiastical, and familial. Without any supporting exegesis of the Bible, American Protestants for over two centuries have assumed that the civil covenant has no legal connection to Christ, and should not.

Meanwhile, the United States Supreme Court has outlawed public prayer in tax-funded schools (1963), as well as the teaching of creation in these schools (1991). It has legalized abortion on demand in the name of a woman's right to privacy (1973). Christian political activists who oppose all three decisions seem to think that these decisions were in no way connected to the United States Constitution's declaration of

18. Charles Colson, Kingdoms in Conflict (1987), p. 119. This book was jointly published by William Morrow, a secular publishing firm, and Zondervan Publishing House, a fundamentalist publishing firm.

19. Peter Marshall and David Manuel, The Light and the Glory (Old Tappan, New Jersey: Revell, 1977), pp. 343–44.

20. Ibid., p. 348.

21. Idem.

22. Catherine Marshall, A Man Called Peter: The Story of Peter Marshall (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1951).

covenantal independence from God and the church in 1788. The secularization of the Supreme Court, they believe, has nothing to do with the actual wording of the Constitution. Christian activists today suffer from near-terminal naiveté.

Protestantism has accepted of the Enlightenment's doctrine of pluralism. Roman Catholicism laid the foundations for this capitulation by its acceptance of Stoic natural law theory by way of Aristotle. Scholasticism's acceptance of Aristotelian logic set the precedent. The Reformers offered no substitute, and by the mid-seventeenth century, late-medieval scholastic categories of politics were imported into the Presbyterian tradition. The footnotes in Samuel Rutherford's Lex, Rex (1644) are filled with references to members of the Dominicans' school of Salamanca. These men were brilliant jurists, as well as economists who pioneered concepts of free pricing, monetary theory, and interest as a time-based phenomenon that were in some ways superior to Adam Smith's theories over two centuries later.²³ Their epistemology was rationalist, as Scholasticism always was.

In the same year that Lex, Rex was published, Roger Williams' Bloudy Tenant of Persecution appeared. His defense of religiously neutral civil government so appalled Parliament that they ordered all copies burned. It was based on natural law theory. But before the book appeared, Williams had secured a Parliamentary charter for Rhode Island that allowed him to conduct an experiment in his theory of neutral civil government.²⁴ That "lively experiment" in polity a century and a half later conquered the colonial American mind.

Without a state church, early modern era Protestants saw no way to secure a voice in civil affairs that Christian political theory had demanded for seventeen centuries. The rise of Oliver Cromwell in 1644 as the military master led to the extension of liberty of worship to all Protestant sects. The Independents would not tolerate an intolerant state church. Scottish Presbyterianism's attempt to secure such a monopoly²⁵ was anathema to them. Cromwell's victory made impossible the Presbyterians' demand for a state church. The restoration of Charles II to the throne in 1660 did not reverse this toleration, although the King imposed the Act of Uniformity in 1662, which led to the departure of 2,000 Puritan ministers from their pulpits.

23. Murray N. Rothbard, Economic Thought before Adam Smith: An Austrian Perspective on the History of Economic Thought (Brookfield, Vermont: Elgar, 1985), ch. 4.

24. Edwin Scott Gaustad, Liberty of Conscience: Roger Williams in America (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1991), p. 85.

25. See Jane Lane, The Reign of King Covenant (London: Robert Hale, 1956).

Who should represent the church in the civil courts? This question has had no answer in Protestant nations since the late seventeenth century. Which ministers should be eligible to serve? Which groups calling themselves churches should be eligible to serve? This was no problem for Mosaic Israel, which had only one lawful priesthood.

The correct answer—"ministers of churches that affirm an historic Trinitarian creed"—was too narrow for Enlightenment humanists and Protestant Independents, and too broad for the Presbyterians. Protestants have been deadlocked since the seventeenth century. The result has been the progressive secularization of the United States' civil order: from Scholastic natural law theory to Newtonian natural law theory to Madison's grand experiment, a Constitution stripped of any theory of law. In the opinion of the Framers, the preservation of liberty is a matter of technique rather than ethics: designing proper institutional checks and balances in the allocation of political power. But these checks and balances have steadily fallen prey to the sovereignty of the Supreme Court, which the Constitution's authors regarded as the least powerful branch of the Federal government, but which has become the most powerful. The Supreme Court renders final judgment—point four—on the legality of what the other two branches do. The Court therefore has become the voice of authority: point two.²⁶

In Mosaic Israel, the supreme court could not represent one covenant; it had to represent two: church and state. This is the system of checks and balance announced by God through Moses, but modern man, both Christian and non-Christian, regards the Mosaic judicial settlement as a source of tyranny. Judicial checks and balances are seen today exclusively as intra-civil government matters—national, state, and local—but never as matters of inter-government relations, i.e., civil and ecclesiastical.

3. A Royal Priesthood

The New Covenant, like the Old Covenant, rests on an oath of loyalty: allegiance to God. There are four areas where this covenant oath seals a legal bond: personal, ecclesiastical, familial, and civil. The modern Christian generally acknowledges the legitimacy of the first three covenantal Trinitarian oaths, but as a loyal son of the Enlightenment, he denies the fourth.

26. North, Political Polytheism, ch. 10.

If the fourth covenant were honored, this principle would become a judicial reality: he who is not sealed by covenant oath (point four) may not lawfully exercise covenantal authority (point two) to interpret the law (point three) invoking and applying covenant sanctions (point four). To declare covenant sanctions is to affect the inheritance (point five) in God's name (point one). Only those who are under the covenant through an oath possess this authority. The political questions become: Whose covenant? Whose oath?

To gain the eternal blessings of God, a person must swear a personal covenant oath to the God of the Bible, whose Son and Messiah is Jesus Christ. To gain the blessings of the sacraments, a person must come under the authority of the institutional church. To gain the blessings of a Christian marriage, a person must have sworn oaths one and two. So also with biblical citizenship. But this is denied by most Christians today. They are sons of the Enlightenment.

Biblical citizenship, above all, is the authority to become a judge, either through membership in the military or as a judge. A judge includes the office of voter and the office of juror. He who is not a citizen may not vote or serve on a jury. If he has not sworn a loyalty oath to the state, he is not a citizen. If he has not also sworn the first two oaths—personal and ecclesiastical—he is not to become a citizen in a biblical commonwealth.²⁷

The connection between the Mosaic covenant's theory of priestly participation in the supreme court and a modern nation's supreme court is this: there must be representatives of Trinitarian churches on the nation's supreme civil court. But what about Israel's local courts? The priests served there, too (Deut. 19:17).²⁸ This indicates that priests were sent by the temple-officiating priesthood to serve in local communities as co-judges.

The officiating Mosaic priests were centrally located. The place of sacrifice became their temporary home. This is no longer the case. There is no central place of sacrifice. But there is a central place where the supreme civil court meets. This is in part a matter of tradition, at least for now, but it is also a matter of personalism. There is more to courts than the formal gatherings of court's judges.

27. The Enlightenment attacked this doctrine of oath-bound Christian citizenship. Humanists sought the legal authority to impose civil sanctions on Christians in the name of another God: autonomous man. They did not wish to live inside the boundaries of God's Bible-revealed law. So, they created a theory of political citizenship which invokes a loyalty oath only to the state—a state devoid of any Trinitarian demarcation. Their theory of citizenship is today universally accepted by Protestantism and American Catholicism.

28. Chapter 45:E.

The New Testament's covenant oath is priestly. The promise of Exodus 19:6 has been fulfilled:

And ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation (Ex. 19:6a).

But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should shew forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light: Which in time past were not a people, but are now the people of God: which had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy (I Peter 2:9–10).

Peter's language is important for political theory. The New Covenant's priestly status is royal, i.e., kingly. The Protestant Reformation's doctrine of "every man a priest," i.e., every redeemed person a priest, is an extension of part of Peter's declaration. But the Reformation did not affirm the parallel doctrine: every redeemed person a king. This was a major theological and social omission. This political principle implies universal civil suffrage among adult church members. Tentative beginnings of this doctrine arose only in the next century, particularly during the English Civil War (1642–49). The sect known as the Levellers wanted to extend the vote to all male rate-payers in church or state.²⁹

The covenantal basis of both doctrines was announced by Peter: every redeemed, covenantally bound person is both a priest and a king. This does not deny the fact that there are still ordained officers in church and state who exercise greater authority than those whom they represent. Hierarchy is an inescapable aspect of the covenant. So is ordination. But the concept of the priestly-kingly believer in Christ leads to the concept of covenant ratification in both spheres: church and state. Members of churches and citizens of states lawfully possess the veto. On regular occasions, a majority of them must be allowed to extend positive sanctions to a representative, thereby imposing negative sanctions on his rivals. The bottom-up authority of the covenant matches its top-down authority. Without the imposition of covenant sanctions, there can be no covenantal representation. Ordained representatives must truly represent both parties to the covenant: God and man. Both God and man must authorize an office-holders' continuing possession of authority. Officers of both church and state must be held responsible by those whom they represent. Leviticus 4 set forth a sacrificial structure that established this judicial principle: *God holds a nation's citizens corporately responsible for the sins of their representatives, both ecclesiastical and civil.*³⁰ How, then, are the people to sanction civil representation? Democratic politics is a consistent application of Peter's announcement. The political question then becomes: Who has lawful access to the exercise of the vote? The New Covenant's answer is this: "Those who are under oath-bound covenantal sanctions to the Trinitarian God of the Bible in both church and state."

29 62. William Haller, Liberty and Reformation in the Puritan Revolution (New York: Columbia University Press, 1955), p. 325. "Leveling" did not refer to property ownership. It referred to right to vote. The Diggers and the Fifth Monarchy men were the communists of the English Civil War era.

The priesthood of all believers secures the priestly status of every jury and every court whose members are all members in good standing of Trinitarian churches. Then why doesn't this principle of the universal priesthood solve the judicial problem of church-state relations at the level of the supreme court? Why is there still a necessity of a mixed court containing judges and sacramental officers? Because of the principle of checks and balances. There must be a division of authority. In every supreme court that lawfully imposes physical sanctions, there must be representation of the church. Someone who has the right to declare a person excommunicate must have a veto power on every supreme civil court. The civil authority must not assert its own exclusive counsel at the highest level. The checks and balances necessary to restrict civil government from becoming tyrannical must include a veto in the possession of sacramental officers. This is the message of Deuteronomy 17:8–12.

Conclusion

Israel's supreme civil court was to include representatives of two covenants: civil and ecclesiastical. This law authorized the priests to veto the decision of a judge. The law speaks of a joint declaration: "According to the sentence of the law which they shall teach thee, and according to the judgment which they shall tell thee, thou shalt do." This law brought the power of the civil government in support of contracts. The threat of execution for one's refusal to adhere to the court's declaration placed the rebel under severe pressure to conform. This would have increased the predictability of the marketplace. Disputes over the interpretation of contracts would have ended with the supreme court's judgment.

30. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 4.

This law brought contract law under the authority of the civil courts, which had jurisdiction over contracts. Contract law was not an extension of the state, but it was under the authority of the state. Yet, in the Hebrew commonwealth, the state had no final jurisdiction. The joint declaration of representatives of church and state kept the institution from attaining final authority in civil law. No aspect of biblical law is more hostile to Enlightenment political philosophy than Deuteronomy 17:8–13. The doctrine of the separation of church and state was from the beginning an attempt to create a monopoly of violence for the civil government by revoking the church's veto of the civil magistrate at the highest judicial level. Marxian Communism was one product of Enlightenment political philosophy: left-wing Enlightenment humanism.³¹ The extension of the United States Constitution's secular roots by the United States Supreme Court after 1960 was another: right-wing Enlightenment humanism.³²

31. Gary North, Marx's Religion of Revolution: Regeneration Through Chaos (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1968] 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnmrro>)

32. North, Political Polytheism, ch. 10.

BOUNDARIES ON KINGSHIP

When thou art come unto the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee, and shalt possess it, and shalt dwell therein, and shalt say, I will set a king over me, like as all the nations that are about me. . . (Deut. 17:14).

The theocentric focus of this law is God's office as King of kings.

A. God's Sovereignty and Israel's King

This was a land law.¹ It governed the office of king, an optional office in Old Covenant Israel. This biblically authorized office has not existed since the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. In fact, it has not existed in history since the exile. Men have called themselves kings, and they have acted as kings, but they have not been legitimate, in the same sense that neither priest nor prophet has been legitimate. All three Old Covenant offices were completed by Christ and annulled.

Moses' assumption here was that Israel would conquer the land of Canaan. There was a strong element of prophecy: predictions accompanied by ethical commands. The laws governing kingship in Israel assumed that Israel had already conquered the land. This is another instance in the Bible where grace precedes law, which is a fundamental principle of God's covenantal dealings with men. God would give them a military victory comparable to their deliverance out of Egypt. This victory would then serve as the historical basis of kingship. Without prior grace, there would be no earthly king over Israel. The very presence of an earthly king in Israel was supposed to remind them of the visible grace of God in history. Only because God is the sovereign master over history and the deliverer of His people in history could the Israelites ever set a king over themselves. The Israelites' mandatory presupposition of earthly kingship was supposed to be the absolute sovereignty of God over history. The Mosaic doctrine of kingship rested on this doctrine: Israel's true king was God. This was the theocentric focus of the kingship laws.

1. On land laws, see Appendix J.

The Mosaic law provided for the establishment of kings in Israel. This is not to say that God required kingship in Israel. He did not. Israel broke these kingship laws when the people demanded a king four centuries later. Their motivation was not theocentric; it was humanistic. Samuel reminded them of the theocentric focus of Israel's kingship: God's gracious deliverance. "And ye have this day rejected your God, who himself saved you out of all your adversities and your tribulations; and ye have said unto him, Nay, but set a king over us. Now therefore present yourselves before the LORD by your tribes, and by your thousands" (I Sam. 10:19). God had revealed to Samuel that the Israelites were substituting a new covenant. This new covenant necessarily involved the rejection of the God of the Mosaic covenant: "And the LORD said unto Samuel, Hearken unto the voice of the people in all that they say unto thee: for they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them" (I Sam. 8:7).

God told Samuel to do what they asked. God gave them enough rope to hang themselves. He told His prophet to go along with them, anointing the new king in God's name. There would be four kings over Israel's united kingdom, but early in the reign of the fourth king, Rehoboam, there was a revolt which divided Israel into two kingdoms (I Kings 12).² This, too, was part of God's covenantal order: He visits the iniquity of the fathers unto the third and fourth generation of those who hate Him (Ex. 20:5).³ The glory of the Davidic kingdom and the wealth of Solomon's kingdom were aspects of God's covenantal curse on Israel: magnificent rope for a national hanging. "And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God" (Deut. 8:19–20).⁴ When they demanded a king, they began a journey into covenantal disobedience that led to Babylon. When they returned from the exile, they never again had an Israelite as a king. Final civil authority was imposed on them from headquarters outside the land: Medo-Persia, regional Hellenism, and Rome.

2. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 20.

3. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 22.

4. Chapter 23.

The Mosaic law mandated restraints on Israel's kings. It placed specific boundaries on the king. One of these was that the king not multiply wives for himself. David and Solomon self-consciously defied this law. The pinnacle of Israel's glory came during the reigns of two kings who defied the Mosaic laws of kingship. David multiplied wives. Solomon multiplied wives and gold. Visible rebellion was accompanied by visible blessings: rope. The bills eventually came due. Rehoboam demanded the taxes necessary, he believed, to finance the kingdom that his father had consolidated. The visible splendor of earthly power and glory does not come cheaply. Rehoboam's demand for higher taxes led to a successful tax revolt that divided kingship in Israel. The centralized kingdom was decentralized by political revolution. This is the inevitable fate of every kingdom in history. God the king will not tolerate indefinitely the claims of rival kings and kingdoms.

B. Decentralized Civil Government

Kingship in the ancient pagan world was associated with divinity. The king was frequently regarded as a divine-human link. This was not merely a judicial link; it was an ontological link. The king or emperor was believed to participate in the being of God.⁵ Even today, the emperor of Japan is officially said to be a descendent of the gods.⁶

This belief has historical roots, according to the Bible. There was such a divine-human king in Old Covenant history: Melchizedek, king of Salem. The Epistle to the Hebrews describes him: "Without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God; abideth a priest continually" (Heb. 7:3). The language of this epistle indicates that Melchizedek was a theophany, in the same way that the burning bush was. He held two offices: priest and king. This was not permitted to an Israelite king. The two offices had to be kept separate. Kings could not lawfully offer priestly sacrifices (I Sam. 13:9–14; II Chron. 26:19).

The separation of church and state was fundamental in the Mosaic

5. R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1971] 2007), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rjroam>) law. There were two national judicial chains of command in Israel, civil and ecclesiastical. The high priest's office was separate from kingship. The priesthood unilaterally exercised the sword only in a defensive perimeter around the tabernacle. The Mosaic law was divided structurally between ecclesiastical law and civil law. The centralization of power that was implied by kingship could not lawfully centralize ecclesiastical power under the state. There could be no Melchizedekan king-priest in Israel.

6. "Emperor Jimmu," Wikipedia.

To call for an earthly king was Israel's public admission of political defeat. There is no question of the biblical legitimacy of kingship, for the Mosaic law established provisions governing the office. There is also no question that it was a second-best arrangement. The people of Israel abdicated when they had Samuel ordain a king. For four centuries (I Kings 6:1), they had possessed the authority to follow or reject their judges. They also held a veto. Although Deborah's song retroactively ridiculed those tribes that had not heeded her call to do battle against Sisera (Jud. 5:16–17), there was no question that she had not possessed lawful authority over them to compel their participation. Furthermore, without a joint declaration of war by the princes and the priests (Num. 10), Israel could not lawfully go to war. Israel was to be ruled by princes and judges, who were to consult with the Levites. Political leadership was decentralized in Israel because their king was God. There had to be a high priest in Israel; there did not have to be a king. Visible sovereignty was supposed to be ecclesiastical far more than civil. The final voice of civil authority was to be a corporate body: judges and priests who would declare God's judgments in specific cases (Deut. 17:9).⁷ The presence of priests on this supreme civil court was designed to keep civil authority from becoming autonomous.

To maintain such a decentralized civil government, the Israelites would have to retain their confidence that God was truly in their midst and that He revealed Himself through His ordained representatives, both ecclesiastical and civil. The inauguration of a king was a public declaration that the nation no longer wanted its legal status as a thoroughly decentralized kingdom of priests. God recognized this, and He instructed Samuel to tell them this. The king would centralize tax collection and extract a tithe from them (I Sam. 8:15, 17).⁸ They did not heed Samuel's warning. Either they did not believe Samuel or they did not care. Either they believed that they could place limits on the king's taxing power or else they believed that the trade-off was worth it. They wanted to be like the nations around them. God granted them this request.

7. Chapter 41.

8. North, Disobedience and Defeat, ch. 14.

In Moses' day, God knew they would eventually inaugurate a king. This is why He graciously had Moses announce tight boundaries on the king's legitimate authority. He gave the Israelites guidelines—a blueprint—that would enable them to identify when their king was moving toward apostasy, rebellion, and tyranny. Saul, a terrible king, did not openly violate them. David and Solomon did. Rehoboam, surely a third-rate king, imposed new taxes at the beginning of his reign. For this, the Northern Kingdom seceded. God kept Israel decentralized by authorizing a divided kingdom under Jeroboam and therefore two kingly lines.

C. Covenantal Boundaries

Deuteronomy's first kingly law established that only an Israelite could occupy the office: "Thou shalt in any wise set him king over thee, whom the LORD thy God shall choose: one from among thy brethren shalt thou set king over thee: thou mayest not set a stranger over thee, which is not thy brother" (Deut. 17:15). This law governed the nation's civil and ecclesiastical representatives. In Israel, a joint ordination was mandatory for establishing kingship: church and state. Samuel anointed Saul, but he first went before the civil representatives of the nation to warn them not to raise up a king: a political creation of the congregation. Later, when Solomon's authority to reign as king was challenged by a rebellion by his brother Adonijah, the priests and the people decided in his favor. "And Zadok the priest took an horn of oil out of the tabernacle, and anointed Solomon. And they blew the trumpet; and all the people said, God save king Solomon" (I Kings 1:39). This joint ordination procedure was even clearer in the case of young Joash, who replaced murderous Queen Athaliah.

And when Athaliah heard the noise of the guard and of the people, she came to the people into the temple of the LORD. And when she looked, behold, the king stood by a pillar, as the manner was, and the princes and the trumpeters by the king, and all the people of the land rejoiced, and blew with trumpets: and Athaliah rent her clothes, and cried, Treason, Treason. But Jehoiada the priest commanded the captains of the hundreds, the officers of the host, and said unto them, Have her forth without the ranges: and him that followeth her kill with the sword. For the priest had said, Let her not be slain in the house of the LORD. And they laid hands on her; and she went by the way by the which the horses came into the king's house: and there was she slain. And Jehoiada made a covenant between the LORD and the king and the people that they should be the LORD'S people; between the king also and the people. And all the people of the land went into the house of Baal, and brake it down; his altars and his images brake they in pieces thoroughly, and slew Mattan the priest of Baal before the altars. And the priest appointed officers over the house of the LORD. And he took the rulers over hundreds, and the captains, and the guard, and all the people of the land; and they brought down the king from the house of the LORD, and came by the way of the gate of the guard to the king's house. And he sat on the throne of the kings (II Kings 11:13–19).

Deuteronomy 17:15 told the people what they could not lawfully do: ordain a stranger as king. The king had to be eligible to be a judge, i.e., a citizen. Citizenship was covenantal. This citizenship principle established that only a circumcised male who was a member of the congregation, or the daughter or wife of a citizen (e.g., Deborah),⁹ could lawfully be ordained to impose civil sanctions. He had to be under covenantal sanctions, marked in his flesh, in order to be eligible for kingship in Israel. This meant that in order for a man lawfully to impose civil covenantal sanctions, he had to be under ecclesiastical covenantal sanctions. A king's flesh had to reveal his implicit self-maledictory oath before God, which had been taken on his behalf by his circumcising parent, who had acted as a household priest.

Circumcision was a physical manifestation of what was to be an inward ethical condition. Moses had already warned Israel: "Circumcise therefore the foreskin of your heart, and be no more stiffnecked" (Deut. 10:16). The stiffnecked person was someone who would not heed God's word. He was a rebel. The circumcised man might not be circumcised in heart, which was why Moses here revealed other marks of the circumcised heart in a man possessing supreme civil authority: one wife, no horses, and not much money.

After Israel returned from the Assyrian-Babylonian exile, its supreme civil rulers would no longer be circumcised. The people had no

9. She was a judge. She commanded the army, but only as a United States President does: as a civilian. She could not legally be drafted into the army. Only men were mustered (numbered) in God's holy army. I conclude that her civil authority as a judge stemmed either from her husband or father, although the text in Judges does not say this. The judicial issue is circumcision: the mark of being under the covenant's negative sanctions.

further say over who would rule over them. The final authority in civil government did not reside in a court in Jerusalem; it resided in some foreign capital. The history of Israel was a transition from judgeship to domestic kingship to foreign empire. Under foreign rulers, both at home and abroad, Israel was to learn the true meaning of kingship. Israel got its wish: to live as the other nations did—as a subordinate nation in a foreign king’s international empire.

D. Military Boundaries

The horse was an offensive weapon. Horses were the basis of both the cavalry and chariots. There were to be few horses in the king’s stable: “But he shall not multiply horses to himself, nor cause the people to return to Egypt, to the end that he should multiply horses: forasmuch as the LORD hath said unto you, Ye shall henceforth return no more that way” (v. 16). The horse was a tool of empire. Israel’s kings could not lawfully multiply them.

The kingdom of God vs. the empire of man: here was the choice before Israel. Israel’s civil order was to be decentralized. Decentralized societies cannot become empires without abandoning their political decentralization. Republican Rome is the most famous example in history: when Rome became an empire, she ceased being a republic. Decentralized societies lack what every empire requires: an offensive military force. A king or his functional equivalent is the commander of every empire. There must be a chain of command with one person serving as the final voice of authority in an empire. The military model requires one-man rule.¹⁰ One-man rule is required in wartime, for the same reason that there can be only one captain on a ship: someone must be held personally accountable for making life-and-death decisions. When a decentralized society suffers a defensive war, this one-man rulership is temporary. A decentralized nation is difficult to lure into an offensive war: there is no king to promote such a war for his glory, and many powerful local leaders who oppose it, knowing that their power will be transferred upward when war begins. When Israel

10. In England’s nineteenth-century naval empire, the Prime Minister served in place of the king. Today’s largest empire, the United States, does not rule directly over other nations, but rules as first among equals in an international world order. As with England a century ago, the United States’ main international concern is commerce. The largest private United States banks have more long-term authority in the maintenance of this commercial empire than the politicians do, which was also the case in England’s empire.

anointed a king, the nation took the first step toward empire. The next step after this was a stable of horses.

Egypt had been an empire based on chariots. There were limits on what chariots could accomplish. Chariots had failed to keep Israel inside Egypt's boundaries. No Israelite king was to send Israelites down to Egypt to buy horses or to learn the arts of horse-based warfare. Horses were forbidden to Israel's kings because empire was forbidden. Israel would be defended by God, just as she had been at the Red Sea. Israelites were not to put their trust in horses.

Some trust in chariots, and some in horses: but we will remember the name of the LORD our God (Ps. 20:7).

Woe to them that go down to Egypt for help; and stay on horses, and trust in chariots, because they are many; and in horsemen, because they are very strong; but they look not unto the Holy One of Israel, neither seek the LORD! (Isa. 31:1).

An Israelite army without horses was at the mercy of God, not the mercy of Egypt. To preserve the inheritance of Israel, the king had to conform to God's Bible-revealed laws, for he was the nation's supreme civil representative. A stable full of horses would serve as a symbol of the king's trust in military might rather than God's preserving hand. An arms race in offensive weaponry in Israel would testify to a national loss of faith. Men of valor seated on slow-moving donkeys or on foot would be sufficient to defend the borders of Israel and preserve the inheritance. There were other chariots on call: "And Elisha prayed, and said, LORD, I pray thee, open his eyes, that he may see. And the LORD opened the eyes of the young man; and he saw: and, behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha" (II Kings 6:17). Chariots of fire, not chariots of horses, were to constitute Israel's strategic defense initiative.

E. Marital Boundaries

"Neither shall he multiply wives to himself, that his heart turn not away" (17a). Saul had only one wife (I Sam. 14:50). Ahab had only one wife, probably out of fear of upsetting her. Ahab's kingship proves that monogamy was no guarantee of righteousness. David had an unknown number of wives and concubines (II Sam. 5:13), in addition to his eight listed wives.¹¹ Solomon, of course, was the world record-holder: 700

11. Michal (I Sam. 18:27–28), Abigail (I Sam. 25:39), Ahinoam (II Sam. 2:2), Bath-wives and 300 concubines, i.e., wives without dowries (I Kings 11:3). The problem was, as is said of Solomon, “his wives turned away his heart” (I Kings 11:3).

The prohibition on polygamy applied in the Old Covenant only to kings. The most likely reason why the king was singled out in this regard was his access to foreign wives. These marital alliances were not merely biological; they were covenantal. They were therefore political. These wives would likely be part of military alliances with foreign kings. David’s wife Maacah was the daughter of a king (II Sam. 3:3). The multiplication of foreign wives was a lure into polytheism, for with foreign wives might come foreign gods. A king’s polygamy could easily lead to polytheism. Polytheism was the obvious way for a king to reconcile in his competitive household the imported gods of his wives and their sons. Foreign wives could accept this solution, for the gods of the ancient Near East were polytheistic. This is what happened to Solomon.

From the viewpoint of a foreign king seeking to undermine Israel, an alliance through his daughter’s marriage to an Israelite king was ideal. This was a low-cost strategy of subversion. The Israelite king’s polytheistic example could undermine Israel in all four covenants: personal, ecclesiastical, civil and familial. The family was therefore the weak link in the religion of Israel. So concerned was God to preserve the monotheism of the Israelite family that He demanded the death penalty for any family member who tempted another member to worship a false God (Deut. 13:6–10). The prosecuting family members were to cast the first stones after the errant member’s conviction (v. 9). This was because witnesses were required to cast the first stones under Mosaic law (Deut. 17:7).¹²

F. Treasury Boundaries

The text continues: “. . . neither shall he greatly multiply to himself sheba (II Sam. 11:27), Maacah, Haggith, Abital, and Eglah (II Sam. 3:3–5).

12. Jesus understood the implications of this civil law: “And the brother shall deliver up the brother to death, and the father the child: and the children shall rise up against their parents, and cause them to be put to death” (Matt. 10:21). “Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter in law against her mother in law. And a man’s foes shall be they of his own household. He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me: and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me” (Matt. 10:34–37).

silver and gold" (17b). These precious metals could be used to build monuments to kingly power: public works projects. These public works projects honor the king or the state. They must then be permanently maintained through permanent taxation, unless the state is willing to admit defeat and transfer their ownership to private organizations.¹³ Precious metals could be used to build up an offensive army: the way of empire.¹⁴ They could be used in profligate moral dissipation by the king and his court.¹⁵ It was a violation of God's law for a king to use his authority to extract so much wealth from the population that the excess revenue could be hoarded in the form of money.

G. Judicial Boundaries

The king was told to become familiar with the Mosaic law. "And it shall be, when he sitteth upon the throne of his kingdom, that he shall

13. The national highway system built by the United States Federal government in the late 1950s and 1960s is now becoming a major financial drain on state and local finances as these roads and bridges steadily wear out. Governments did not set aside gasoline tax revenues to pay for the roads' replacement. The consumption of capital took place over several decades. Now the budgets of these governments are constrained by massive debt and by political promises regarding welfare: the support of the poor. Even worse in this respect is the century-old underground water systems of older United States cities, especially in the Northeast.

14. Such hoards of precious metals do not last long in wartime; the costs of warfare are too high. But the presence of a hoard of precious metals in reserve might lure a short-sighted king into starting a war that would outlast his hoard. The problem with a war paid for by the king's precious metals is that his army must gain a string of victories over wealthy opponents in order to replenish his dwindling supply of gold. The offensive military campaign becomes self-reinforcing. To maintain the conquests, wealth must be extracted from the conquered peoples, who resent the imposition. The Roman Republic did not extricate itself from its military victories. The government used the wealth extracted from the provinces to maintain local control over them. Little of this wealth flowed back into Rome's treasury except immediately after an initial military victory. Private Roman citizens kept most of the booty. Bribery and extortion became common with local governors and Rome's senators. A. H. M. Jones, The Roman Economy: Studies in Ancient Economic and Administrative History (Totowa, New Jersey: Rowman & Littlefield, 1974), pp. 115–21. The republic became an empire. Eventually, the cost of maintaining it led to bankruptcy and mass inflation. Ibid., ch. 9.

15. Isaiah warned: "His watchmen are blind: they are all ignorant, they are all dumb dogs, they cannot bark; sleeping, lying down, loving to slumber. Yea, they are greedy dogs which can never have enough, and they are shepherds that cannot understand: they all look to their own way, every one for his gain, from his quarter. Come ye, say they, I will fetch wine, and we will fill ourselves with strong drink; and tomorrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant" (Isa. 56:10–12). The court at Versailles under Louis XIV and Louis XV left a mountain of royal debt and oligarchical moral debauchery for Louis XVI to deal with. He and the old order did not survive the ordeal (1789–94).

write him a copy of this law in a book out of that which is before the priests the Levites: And it shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the days of his life: that he may learn to fear the LORD his God, to keep all the words of this law and these statutes, to do them: That his heart be not lifted up above his brethren, and that he turn not aside from the commandment, to the right hand, or to the left: to the end that he may prolong his days in his kingdom, he, and his children, in the midst of Israel” (Deut. 17:18–20).

First, at the time of his accession to the throne, he was to copy the law in his own hand. He had to be literate. A king in Israel could not lawfully claim that he had not read the law. He had not only read it; he had written it down. To maintain this kingly inheritance, his son would have to be able to read. This writing down of the law was a joint brain-hand exercise: suitable for memorization. Also, by writing down the law, he was submitting to the treaty of the great king. i.e., God Himself, whose laws and sanctions are in the text.

Second, the priests kept the original copy. This meant that the priests were the law-keepers in Israel. They were the ones with exclusive access to the original source document of Moses’ judicials. The king could not tamper with this document. He could not retroactively write new copies of the law in order to mislead the judges of the nation. He was not to become a forger who might later be identified as such by some higher critic of the Bible. He was not sovereign over the law. He was under its authority, as preserved in written form by the priests. Priestly authority was superior to kingly authority in the area of law, and this was to be acknowledged by the king by his act of copying the law from the priests’ version.

Third, he was required to read the law continually. He was to learn to fear God and to keep God’s law. The sign of his fear of God would be his obedience to God’s revealed law. This would keep him in his place: “That his heart be not lifted up above his brethren, and that he turn not aside from the commandment, to the right hand, or to the left” (v. 20a).

Fourth, there was a positive sanction attached to this law: “. . . to the end that he may prolong his days in his kingdom, he, and his children, in the midst of Israel” (v. 20b). This was an extension of the fifth commandment’s promise: “Honour thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee” (Ex. 20:12). By honoring God by obeying His law, the king could bring the blessings of long life and extended authority to himself and his heirs. The law specifically identified the land as “his kingdom.” To preserve his family’s kingly line, he had to obey.

H. Taxes and Control

Centralization means a transfer of authority away from the individual. Taxes imposed by a central government are transmitted to an agency of government more distant from the taxpayer than local governments. The taxpayer has less influence over the spending of this money. This means that the spending preferences of the individual are usually compromised by the collecting agency. His preferences are drowned out by the preferences of other taxpayers and special-interest political pressure groups. The central collecting agency can play off one competing group against another. This allows the civil government’s decision-makers to substitute their spending preferences for those of the taxpayers. Meanwhile, organized opposition to specific taxes will be sporadic and diffused.¹⁶

The king in Israel faced competing demands for the money he collected. There is always heavy demand for free money. Those desiring access to the king’s money might even be located outside the country. The king, as the official representative of all the people, had more claims on the use of his funds than any local government faced. The spending decisions made by a king were therefore more complex. Meanwhile, the taxpayer found it difficult to gain the king’s support for the taxpayer’s preferred project. His preferences were drowned in the noise of competition.

This noise transferred greater power to the king and his agents. The more complex the problems facing the king, and the more noise there was in the competition for access to the funds, the greater the flexibility of the king in spending the taxpayers’ money. This means greater arbitrariness and less of a restraining effect by the law. The more money collected by the king, the more detailed the law book had to be to govern the allocation of the revenue. A rule of bureaucracy is this: the thicker the law book, the more arbitrary the decisions. If the law book is too thick to make it easy for anyone to coordinate the details of the law, the bureaucrat has fewer restraints on his decision-making. This is another reason why the Bible’s law book is comparatively thin—thin enough to be read to the assembled population once every seven years (Deut. 31:10–12).¹⁷

16. Milton Friedman and Rose Friedman, Free to Choose: A Personal Statement (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1980), pp. 292–94.

The Mosaic law established a political order in which civil power was decentralized. There could be a king, but for four centuries, there wasn't. Civil government's decision-making was kept at the local level. So was tax revenue. This decentralization made it possible for local taxpayers to have a greater voice in the distribution of their funds. It also allowed them to place pressure on the government when taxes got too high. It was far more difficult to restrict a distant king's power over the purse. It took a political revolution under Jeroboam to reduce the burden of Rehoboam's taxes (I Kings 12). Revolution is an expensive, risky, and infrequent occurrence in the affairs of nations.

I. Tax Tyranny

When the Israelites first proposed a king to Samuel, the prophet warned them of the dire consequences that would surely follow. The king would tax them equal to the tithe (I Sam. 8:15, 17). This threat of looming tax tyranny did not deter them, any more than dire warnings against the establishment of a national income tax deterred voters in the early twentieth century. The people wanted a king in Israel; similarly, the people have wanted a savior state in the twentieth century, with the high tax rates necessary to fund such a would-be savior state. The twentieth century produced tax rates far above the tithe. To get back to a mere tithe, which Samuel warned was tyranny, most of the civil governments of the modern world would have to cut taxes by three quarters. To get back to the tax level of tyrannical Egypt under Joseph (Gen. 47:26)—God's curse on Pharaoh-worshipping Egypt through Joseph—modern welfare states would have to cut taxes by at least half.¹⁸

This fact is evidence that the modern world has adopted political tyranny in the name of freedom and economic justice. The modern secular world has strayed so far from belief in the God of the Bible that it regards tax tyranny as liberty. Tax reformers who call for a 20% national flat tax—leaving intact all state and local taxes—are dismissed by the vast majority of intellectuals and elected politicians as crackpot defenders of a near-libertarian state. Meanwhile, the modern church refuses to call for massive tax cuts in the name of the Bible. The operating alliance between secular humanists and the Old Testament-rejecting pietists has led to the establishment of the would-be savior state, which promises healing to all mankind. This is modern man's version of salvation by law. Christians affirm its legitimacy in the name of their rejection of Old Testament law. They argue that the acceptance of Old Testament civil law is a form of legalism.

17. Chapter 75.

18. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 35.

This has led Christians, step by step, into a political alliance with modernists, whose version of salvation by humanistic civil law has become a universal faith in the once-Christian West. In the same way that the Israelites demanded a king because the pagan nations around them had kings, so have Bible-affirming Christians voted for politicians who have imposed tax tyranny in the name of the savior state, i.e., the welfare state. They have not understood that there is a relation between biblical law and freedom. Neither did the Israelites.

The modern welfare state was the creation of Otto von Bismarck, who advocated state-funded pensions and health insurance in the 1880s in order to undermine the Social Democrats (socialists) and the liberals (laissez-faire) who were challenging his authority to rule over Germany's government.¹⁹ Germany, which had by then become the center of state-funded education and biblical higher criticism, became the West's model for the welfare state after 1890.²⁰ Bismarck called his program "applied Christianity," but it was actually applied force for the purpose of increasing state power. He told his biographer in 1881, "Anybody who has before him the prospect of a pension, be it ever so small, in old age or infirmity is much happier and more content with his lot, and much more tractable and easy to manage, than he whose future is uncertain."²¹ He also told him, "The State must take the matter into its own hands, not as alms-giving, but as the right that men have to be taken care of when, with the best will imaginable, they become unfit for work. . . . This thing will make its own way; it has a future. When I die, possibly our policy will come to grief. But State Socialism will have its day; and he who shall take it up again will assuredly be the man at the wheel."²² In 1889, shortly after his forced retirement, Bismarck's tax-funded pension plan was voted into law.

19. He could not persuade the German parliament in 1881 to vote for government funding of health insurance, but it did vote for state-mandated health insurance (1883) and accident insurance (1884), to be co-funded by workers and employers. But, economically speaking, workers funded the employers' share, too. The employers would have been willing to pay the workers the same money in salaries. The payment was simply a cost of doing business. It went to insurance rather than wages.

20. A. J. P. Taylor, England's prolific socialistic historian, wrote: "German social insurance was the first in the world, and has served as a model for every other civilized country. The great conservative became the greatest of innovators." Taylor, Bismarck: The Man and the Statesman (New York: Knopf, 1955), p. 203.

21. Moritz Busch, Our Chancellor (Bismarck): Sketches for a Historical Picture, trans. William Beatty-Kingston, 2 vols. (New York: Books for Libraries, [1884] 1970), II, p. 217.

Christians want to live in a society like the pagan nations around them. This is especially true of Christians in college classrooms who have earned advanced academic degrees from state-funded universities and state-accredited private secular universities, which today serve as the institutional equivalent of Nebuchadnezzar's school for the sons of conquered nations (Dan. 1). This lust of covenant-keepers to conform to the latest manifestations of covenant-breaking society has undermined the covenants from the day that the nation of Israel ratified the national covenant in Exodus 19. The unwillingness of covenant-keepers to filter and then restructure imported ideas, institutions, and practices by means of God's Bible-revealed law places them at the mercy of the ethical standards of their enemies.

Conclusion

The king, as the final voice of civil authority, was not to replace the supreme court, which had to include priests (Deut. 17:8–13). The priests could exercise a judicial veto.²³ Yet because the king possessed an army and personal authority, he would inevitably become a major source of judicial interpretation. He would threaten the system of co-judgeship in which the priests served as counsellors to civil judges. The authority to declare the law in God's name and then to enforce it is the foundation of covenantal authority. The state has the power to enforce the law physically. In a covenantally rebellious society, the fear of the state is greater than the fear of excommunication. The state becomes the most feared interpreter of the law.

This is why Absalom used the promise of wise judicial declaration as his primary weapon in his subversion of his father's throne.

And Absalom rose up early, and stood beside the way of the gate: and it was so, that when any man that had a controversy came to the king for judgment, then Absalom called unto him, and said, Of what city art thou? And he said, Thy servant is of one of the tribes of Israel. And Absalom said unto him, See, thy matters are good and right; but there is no man deputed of the king to hear thee. Absalom said moreover, Oh that I were made judge in the land, that every man which hath any suit or cause might come unto me, and I would do him justice! And it was so, that when any man came nigh to him to do him obeisance, he put forth his hand, and took him, and kissed him. And on this manner did Absalom to all Israel that came to the king for judgment: so Absalom stole the hearts of the men of Israel" (II Sam. 15:2–6).

22. Ibid., II, pp. 321–22.

23. Chapter 41.

Absalom promised to do what Moses could not do: render perfect justice to all-comers. His offer would not have been believable had the king not already undermined the supreme court's function by arrogating judicial authority to himself, and through his own person, to the autonomous state.

Foreign kings repeatedly made trouble for Israel, from the day that Chedorlaomer kidnapped Lot (Gen. 14) to the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. The Pharaoh of the oppression was the archetype of what a king could become if left unchecked by law and God's historical sanctions. There had been only one exception: Melchizedek. Abram had gone to meet him, bringing tithes to him and receiving bread and wine from him. But Melchizedek was different from the other kings: he was also the priest of Salem. He lawfully possessed both offices: king and priest (Gen. 14:8). He was a royal priest. He, too, was an archetype—not for individual kingship, but for corporate kingship. Israel as a nation of priests was to imitate Melchizedek.

Israel was set apart by God at Sinai. The nation took an oath there to obey God's law (Ex. 19). God then gave them His law (Ex. 20–23). At Sinai, God had prophesied that they would become a kingdom of priests (Ex. 19:6). They were not yet such a kingdom, He implied, but someday they would be. It was the fulfillment of this prophecy by the church that Peter announced: "But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should shew forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light" (I Peter 2:9).

Implicit in Peter's doctrine of the institutional church as a holy nation is the call for a return to the decentralized Israel of the judges era, though without a high priest. Decentralization is to be both civil and ecclesiastical, for Jesus Christ is the high priest after the order of Melchizedek (Heb. 5:10) and therefore a king (Heb. 7:1–2). He reigns exclusively from heaven, not from an earthly holy of holies. But it took until 1918 for the Christian West to come to grips with the civil implications of the doctrine of the bodily ascension of Christ. By the end of World War I, when the kings at last departed, Christendom had also departed. It was not Christianity that finally abolished kings; it was the Enlightenment, both left wing and right wing.

LEVITICAL INHERITANCE THROUGH SEPARATION

The priests the Levites, and all the tribe of Levi, shall have no part nor inheritance with Israel: they shall eat the offerings of the LORD made by fire, and his inheritance. Therefore shall they have no inheritance among their brethren: the LORD is their inheritance, as he hath said unto them (Deut. 18:1–2).

The theocentric focus of this priestly law is God's identification of Himself as the Levites' inheritance. This law governed the separation of the tribes: boundaries.

A. Landless Levites

This was a land law.¹ It had to do with landed inheritance inside the boundaries of Israel. Inheritance through separation was basic to the Mosaic covenant.² God separated Israel from the nations. He also separated the tribes. He separated the Levites from the other 12 tribes. The Levites would inherit an office that allowed them geographic proximity to God's dwelling place in the tabernacle. The cost of this inheritance was their forfeiture of any inheritance in rural Israel. God separated them for service to Him. He therefore separated them judicially from their brethren. The economic marks of this judicial separation were two-fold: their lack of jubilee-guaranteed rural landed inheritance and their lawful claim on the tithe (Num. 18:26).³

Levites could not normally inherit rural land, according to the jubilee laws. Instead, they were entitled to a tithe from their rural brethren.

1. On land laws, see Appendix J.

2. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 21.

3. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 10.

ren. There was a reason for this: the other tribes did not have lawful access to tabernacle service. The separation of Levi from rural land was an aspect of God's separation of the other tribes from His presence. God identified Himself as the Levites' inheritance. The Levites' inheritance of God was accompanied by their legal claim on the tithe.

And the LORD spake unto Aaron, Thou shalt have no inheritance in their land, neither shalt thou have any part among them: I am thy part and thine inheritance among the children of Israel. And, behold, I have given the children of Levi all the tenth in Israel for an inheritance, for their service which they serve, even the service of the tabernacle of the congregation. Neither must the children of Israel henceforth come nigh the tabernacle of the congregation, lest they bear sin, and die. But the Levites shall do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation, and they shall bear their iniquity: it shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations, that among the children of Israel they have no inheritance. But the tithes of the children of Israel, which they offer as an heave offering unto the LORD, I have given to the Levites to inherit: therefore I have said unto them, Among the children of Israel they shall have no inheritance (Num. 18:20–24).

The connection between the tithe and liturgical service is obvious in this text. The Levites alone had control over the sacrifices; therefore, they alone had a legal claim on the tithe. There was nothing voluntary about this claim on the productivity of others. As surely as an Israelite had to worship God according to the ritual requirements of the tabernacle, so did he have to pay his tithe to the Levites. His payment was for services rendered: atoning services rendered to God in the name of the people. The tithe had nothing to do with non-liturgical services to the community, such as teaching, music, or anything else. The Israelite had no independent authority to send his tithe to agents who met his social needs or anyone else's.⁴ The tithe went to God through His church. No other agency had a legal claim on the tithe. This has not changed in New Testament times.

What has changed is the tribal aspect of the tithe. The Levites' inheritance was part of the tribe's lack of inheritance in rural land. This made the tithe a matter of civil law, just as the enforcement of the jubilee year was the be civil. The Levites possessed an enforceable claim on the tithe. The church does not.

4. Gary North, Tithing and the Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994), ch. 9. (<http://bit.ly/gntithing>)

B. The Geography of Mosaic Inheritance

The Levites could not inherit rural land except in a very special situation, when a priest inherited land because of an owner's broken vow of land pledged to God (Lev. 27:20–21).⁵ As an heir of God, a priest could inherit this land under the provisions of the jubilee. Under no other circumstances could a non-priestly Levite inherit rural land. He could only lease it until the next jubilee.

By separating Levites from rural land, the Mosaic law prevented the centralization of landed wealth by the one tribe that had no geographical boundaries: Levi. The Levites would have to content themselves with tithe money, voluntary offerings, and urban real estate, which was not under the jubilee's provisions in non-Levitical walled cities. Within their own cities, the jubilee year did apply to Levites (Lev. 25:33). This kept Levites tied geographically to cities, which were located inside the boundaries of specific tribal allotments. Their regional influence would come through their urban wealth and their social position as counsellors who were experts in God's law. It would not come through their amassing of rural land: pockets of civil influence inside other tribal communities. Citizenship was possible inside cities, for covenant-keeping men had access to membership in God's holy army, but their citizenship was by adoption into a tribe. If this was the tribe of Levi, its influence was mainly indirect: not through votes inside another tribe's council but rather through non-voting theological and judicial influence.

The other tribes were required to keep their distance from the inner courts of the tabernacle. It meant death for them to approach the holy of holies, where the Ark of the Covenant rested: death by armed Levites or death by God (Num. 3:5–10). The concentric boundaries of the holy of holies were protected by the armed representatives of the three Levitical families: Merari (outermost ring), Gershon, and Kohath (innermost ring).⁶ After Israel's return from the Babylonian captivity, there was no further mention of the Ark. The holy of holies still remained holy in Israel, but there was no longer a pair of the original covenantal documents inside the Ark.

The Bible does not say whether the tithes were collected locally, then sent to a central warehouse, and then redistributed nationally to every Levite on some pro-rated share. The high expense of transporting goods implies that Levites were paid from local storehouses. This meant that the prosperity of a local Levite was dependent on the prosperity of residents in his region. The Levite was economically dependent on the local community's success.

5. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 36.

6. North, Sanctions and Dominion, ch. 3.

A Levite could volunteer for service at the tabernacle (Deut. 18:6). This service was sacramental (v. 7). Sacramental service mandated equal income for services rendered, but the Levite could also receive income from the long-term leasing out of his inheritance (v. 8). Income from sacramental service was tithe-free; income from the sale-lease of his property or other investments had to be tithed.⁷ If he had owned a house in a Levitical city, he could lease it out to someone else. He had the right to return and buy back his property at any time (Lev. 25:32). His house would automatically be returned to him or his heirs in the jubilee (Lev. 25:33).

The unique geographical presence of God with members of one tribe established this tribe's legal claim on a tenth of the net income of their brethren. The text speaks of God as the Levites' inheritance (v. 1). This inheritance was geographical, occupational, and revelational.

The Levites had to defend the Ark of the Covenant. This responsibility was in part liturgical and in part covenantal: an aspect of the oath. They lawfully possessed the authority of the sword inside the boundaries of the tabernacle area (II Chron. 23:7). Because of the holiness of the Ark, the Levites had a unique geographical calling before God and men. The Levites' roots in Israel were tied to the Ark of the Covenant and the sacrifices and defense associated with it.

The Levites served God inside the geographical boundaries surrounding the Ark of the Covenant: a radius of 2,000 cubits. Joshua told the invading tribes regarding the invaders' formation: "Yet there shall be a space between you and it, about two thousand cubits by measure: come not near unto it, that ye may know the way by which ye must go: for ye have not passed this way heretofore" (Josh. 3:4). This was the same distance of ownership of land surrounding the Levitical cities. "And the suburbs of the cities, which ye shall give unto the Levites, shall reach from the wall of the city and outward a thousand cubits round about. And ye shall measure from without the city on the east side two thousand cubits, and on the south side two thousand cubits, and on the west side two thousand cubits, and on the north side two thousand cubits and the city shall be in the midst: this shall be to them the suburbs of the cities" (Num. 35:4–5).

7. Ibid., ch. 3:D:2.

Land was basic to the Mosaic law's system of inheritance. Land was part of the seed laws, which also dealt with inheritance.⁸ The Levites were God's inheritance in Israel. God set them apart for special service to Him. He did not let them place their financial hopes on rural land, which was the inheritance of the other tribes. This was a major advantage to the Levites, for there could be no legitimate economic hope in rural land if Israel kept God's covenant law. The multiplication of the Israelite population—long life (Ex. 20:12) coupled with no miscarriages (Ex. 3:26)—would have shrunk the size of each inheriting generation's family plot. We might even call this God's plot against family plots. The Levites would have been owners of urban real estate, which would rise in value as Israelites moved from the farms and aliens moved to Israel. God placed them in the geographical centers of future economic growth, assuming that the nation kept God's covenant. Teaching the nation to do this was a major task of the Levites. God attached a positive economic sanction to the success of the Levites' calling. They would do well by doing good. The value of their inheritance would grow.

The Levites would speak for God throughout the land. Their separation from tribal land made them a dispersed tribe. Their separation from the other tribes locally was an aspect of their separation from the other tribes liturgically.

C. The Levites' Occupational Separation

No other tribe could offer burnt offerings to God. Levites were the designated intermediaries in between God and members of other tribes. In payment for the services associated with sacrifices, the Levites were to receive tithes and offerings. The priests of the sanctuary—the holy, set-apart area—who were selected from the family of Aaron (Num. 18:1), were to receive a tithe of this tithe (Num. 18:26).

This specialized and judicially restricted liturgical service had to be funded. Because liturgical service was mandatory for the renewal of both the ecclesiastical and civil covenants,⁹ it was funded by a mandat-

8. On seed laws, see Appendix J.

9. Families also participated in the national feasts, but they did so as members of the ecclesiastical community. The feasts were not means of family covenant renewal, for there are no means of family covenant renewal. The family covenant of the marriage partners is broken only by death, either biological or covenantal. Ray R. Sutton, Second Chance: Biblical Blueprints for Divorce and Remarriage (Ft. Worth, Texas:

ory tithe. This was not a voluntary payment, for attendance was not voluntary. This payment moved upward from individuals to Levites because of God's appointment of the Levites as His covenantal spokesmen in the national hierarchy. There was a top-down flow of ecclesiastical authority from God to the people, and the Levites were at the top of this earthly hierarchy. They possessed a monopoly because of their proximity to the Ark of the Covenant, which contained the two stone tablets of the law, the founding covenantal documents.¹⁰ That Levites were the nation's senior spokesmen is indicated by the fact that they, not the state, had a specified claim on the net rural income of the nation, and that any attempt on the part of a king to collect an equally large percentage of income was tyrannical (I Sam. 8:15, 17). The church, not the state or the family, was the central institution in Israel.¹¹

The Levites' lawful claim on covenant-keeping men's income was based on their God-ordained monopoly of liturgical service. Their occupation was closed to members of other tribes. To become a Levite, a man had to be adopted into the tribe, and this required the payment of an expensive entry fee by the adoptee on behalf of himself and every member of his family (Lev. 27:2–8).¹²

D. The Levites' Revelational Separation

The high priest had access to God's word directly. He possessed the urim and thummim. "And thou shalt put in the breastplate of judgment the Urim and the Thummim; and they shall be upon Aaron's heart, when he goeth in before the LORD: and Aaron shall bear the judgment of the children of Israel upon his heart before the LORD continually" (Ex. 28:30). "And he shall stand before Eleazar the priest, who shall ask counsel for him after the judgment of Urim before the LORD: at his word shall they go out, and at his word they shall come Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rssecond>) It is lawfully broken when children leave their parents' household to marry (Gen. 2:24). A failure to participate in a mandatory feast did not break the legal requirements of a family, such as staying married or honoring parents. An individual Israelite was required to attend, whether or not he was a member of a family. A circumcised stranger could also attend, although to gain this privilege, any male in his household also had to be circumcised (Ex. 12:48).

10. Meredith G. Kline, The Structure of Biblical Authority, rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1975), Part 2, ch. 1.

11. This is equally true today. The church extends into eternity (Rev. 21, 22). The family and the state do not.

12. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 35.

in, both he, and all the children of Israel with him, even all the congregation" (Num. 27:21). This access was not granted to Levites and other priests.

The priests had access to the written Mosaic law and the written revelation of the Bible, beginning with the Pentateuch. At some point, probably early in Israel's history, these scrolls were copied down for use locally by the other Levites. The decentralized system of synagogues in Jesus' day used scrolls of the Bible (Luke 4:17). Access to written revelation made the Levites specialists in rendering judgment, both civil and ecclesiastical. But this occupational specialization was not uniquely the possession of the Levites. Judges had equal civil authority (Deut. 17:8–13).¹³

The priesthood shared this declarative authority with prophets. The prophet had superior authority. The prophet's authority was greater than the king's (II Sam. 12) and the priesthood's. Moses' authority as a prophet (Deut. 34:10) was greater than Aaron's authority as a priest. But the office was a temporary one, and any misuse of it was a capital crime.

I will raise them up a Prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth; and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him. And it shall come to pass, that whosoever will not hearken unto my words which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him. But the prophet, which shall presume to speak a word in my name, which I have not commanded him to speak, or that shall speak in the name of other gods, even that prophet shall die. And if thou say in thine heart, How shall we know the word which the LORD hath not spoken? When a prophet speaketh in the name of the LORD, if the thing follow not, nor come to pass, that is the thing which the LORD hath not spoken, but the prophet hath spoken it presumptuously: thou shalt not be afraid of him (Deut. 18:18–22).

With greater authority comes greater responsibility (Luke 12:42–48).¹⁴ False prophecy was a capital crime in Israel because the prophet was the supreme judicial authority. The proof of his authority was his ability to invoke successfully God's direct sanctions. But he was not to rule on a throne or offer sacrifices in the temple. His was not a permanent office. He was called by God to render supreme judgment in times of national apostasy when civil judges and Levites were not speaking God's word, and who were therefore speaking the word of another god. His authority was based on God's direct revelation to him and God's imposition of sanctions invoked by him. He was the designated agent, called directly by God, who brought a formal covenant lawsuit against the nation, which included the nation's ordained leaders.

13. Chapter 41.

14. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

Because the prophet did not possess a permanent office, he had no lawful claim on anyone's income. Such a claim is possessed only by someone who is ordained by God through a formal process of ordination. Ordination is both institutional and covenantal. It is invoked by covenantal oath. The prophet's calling was not necessarily so invoked.

The prophet was not necessarily a member of a Levitical family that possessed a lawful covenantal claim on another family's money. This issue has nothing to do with contractual claims, which are not established by covenantal oath. Here I am speaking of covenantal claims that can be transferred by oath to a successor. A king normally transferred to his son his legal claim on a portion of the income of the people. The son's right of kingly inheritance had to be confirmed by ecclesiastical anointing, as Solomon's was (I Kings 1:39).¹⁵ A Levite could pass to his sons his legal claim to tithes and offerings. A prophet did not possess any such claim; his son could not inherit it.

The Levites possessed no claim of immediate revelation from God except through the high priest. Their expertise in the law was occupational. That is, their claim to knowledge of revelation was not a monopoly. It was shared by civil judges. The Levites had a claim on men's income. So did civil judges. The prophet did not. God's direct revelation to and direct calling of the prophet were not accompanied by a legal claim on someone else's money. The office of Levite and judge, which did involve such a legal claim, did not imply access to direct revelation. The prophet's authority rested solely on his possession of direct revelation from God, yet he had no lawful economic claim in his capacity as a prophet. Any assertion by a prophet of a covenantally authorized claim on someone else's money would have constituted prima facie evidence of the illegitimacy of his call by God. Court prophets hired by the king or appointed under his authority were sure to be false prophets. Judah's King Jehoshaphat suspected as much when he heard Ahab's 400 assure the two kings that they would be victorious over the

15. Jehoiada the priest rallied the Levites to defend the kingship of Joash. The Levites defended the young king by means of swords (II Chron. 23:1–8).

Syrians. He asked for a second opinion. He wanted to hear from a prophet who was not on Ahab's payroll (I Kings 23:7).

The Levites were separated by God to study His law and pronounce judgments. This separation was an aspect of the division of labor. Not only was it a generational phenomenon, unlike the prophet's office, it was not monopolistic. It was shared by civil judges. Their knowledge was therefore based on specialized study rather than uniquely supernatural intervention by God. Their inheritance was based on liturgical separation, not revelational separation. Revelational separation, which the prophet possessed, was not accompanied by legal claims on other people's income. This made the prophetic office not only highly risky judgmentally—imprisonment or death if you prophesied accurately to unrighteous leaders, execution if you prophesied falsely to righteous men—but risky economically. Prophesying was a calling,¹⁶ not an occupation.

Conclusion

The Levites possessed no guaranteed inheritance in rural land. They did possess a jubilee-guaranteed inheritance inside Levitical cities (Lev. 25:33). As a substitute for landed inheritance, God gave them as their inheritance a claim to a tithe on other men's net income. This made them dependent on the productivity of other men.

Their ecclesiastical claim on other men's income was based on the liturgical monopoly which they possessed. This monopoly had a geographical aspect. Only Levites could lawfully approach the innermost sanctum of the tabernacle, and only the high priest could enter it. The Ark of the Covenant was the holiest object in Israel. It had to be defended. The Levites possessed this occupational assignment. They retained it after their return from Babylon, although the Ark seems to have disappeared. This assignment ended when the Romans destroyed the temple in A.D. 70.

Their civil claim on other men's income was based on their lawful inheritance of the tithe in lieu of rural land. This civil claim ended in A.D. 70.

16. I define a calling as the most important work a person can do in which he would be most difficult to replace. Only rarely is a person's calling his occupation.

LANDMARKS AND SOCIAL COOPERATION

Thou shalt not remove thy neighbour's landmark, which they of old time have set in thine inheritance, which thou shalt inherit in the land that the LORD thy God giveth thee to possess it (Deut. 19:14).

The theocentric focus of this law is God's ownership: the judicial issue of boundaries.

A. Ownership as Exclusion

God owned the land of Canaan. As the original owner, it was His right to determine who would manage it for Him. He could lawfully exclude anyone from occupying a piece of land, in the same way that He excluded Adam and Eve from the forbidden tree. *Ownership, above all, means the legal right to exclude.*¹ So does stewardship, as a form of delegated ownership. God was about to transfer stewardship over this land from the Canaanites to the Israelites. That is, he was about to use Israel to exclude Canaanites from the land they were occupying. More to the point, for Israel to inherit the land, which God had promised to Abraham, Canaanites would have to be disinherited. Inheritance/disinheritance is the fundamental theme of Deuteronomy.

Because God planned to take up residence in Israel in a special way (Num. 35:34), His ownership of the land of Israel was special. He owned the whole world in general, but He owned the land of Canaan specially. "The land shall not be sold for ever: for the land is mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with me" (Lev. 25:23). Also, He owned all nations generally, but He owned Israel specially. "But now thus saith the LORD that created thee, O Jacob, and he that formed thee, O Israel, Fear not: for I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by thy name; thou art mine" (Isa. 43:1). He established laws governing rural land ownership inside the nation's boundaries (Lev. 25)² that had not applied before, and which would no longer apply in the same way after the exile, when gentiles living in the land would be included under the jubilee laws (Ezek. 47:21–23).³ These laws finally ended when God ceased to dwell with Israel as a nation after A.D. 70. The disinheritance of Israel was marked by the annulment of the jubilee laws. These laws had never applied outside of the land of Israel. They had not been cross-boundary laws. They were land laws.⁴

1. The model is God's exclusion of the forbidden tree.

B. Permanent External Boundaries

The original allocation of land to the families of the conquest generation in the days of Joshua was supposed to remain unchanged. Down through the generations, there would be subdivisions of the original properties within each family, but the external boundaries were to remain unchanged. These boundaries marked the inheritances of the original families. Moses told Israel that God would distribute each family's inheritance through surveyors, judges, and lot-casters (Num. 26:52–56).⁵ God was sovereign over this casting of lots.

Every Israelite family was required to honor God's original allocation. Only after Israel's return from the exile did God allow new boundaries for those families that had lost track of their original boundaries, or whose claims had been replaced by foreigners brought into the land by the conquering Assyrians and Babylonians. Prior to the exile, any tampering with the evidence of this original allocation was a form of theft of God's property. God's agents had subdivided the land, and in so doing, they had allocated the responsibilities of stewardship. The jubilee law placed limits on the permanent transfer of these responsibilities. These responsibilities (liabilities) were inseparable from the land (asset). No family could lawfully sell these assets-responsibilities or forfeit them to repay a debt.⁶

The jubilee land law was important for what it silently implied: in

2. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 24.

3. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 22.

4. On land laws and cross-boundary laws, see Appendix J.

5. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 14.

6. The one exception was the refusal to pay a vow to a priest (Lev. 27:20–21). See North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 36:E–F.

the absence of such a law, it was lawful to transfer such stewardship responsibilities. It was lawful to delegate these assets-responsibilities until the next jubilee year. Any suggestion that economic liability cannot legally be delegated or transferred is incorrect—as incorrect as the suggestion that economic assets cannot legally be delegated or transferred. The jubilee law testifies to the fact that economic liability and responsibility can lawfully be delegated, and, in the absence of such a law, can be permanently transferred. The whole point of the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:26)⁷ is that God delegated a great deal of responsibility to Adam, who in turn delegated some of it to Eve, and would have delegated it to his children. It was the very legality of this transfer that gave Satan his opportunity to steal the inheritance by deceiving Eve and corrupting Adam. “And Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression” (I Tim. 2:14).

This law was repeated in Deuteronomy 27:17: “Cursed be he that removeth his neighbour’s landmark. And all the people shall say, Amen.” There had to be a public affirmation—an amen—on the part of the people. The fundamental issue here was inheritance. The jubilee land laws were supposed to provide continuity between the original allocation and the future. There could not be any legal long-term alienation of rural land. There was an eschatological reason for this restriction on the sale of land. The Mosaic land laws were aspects of the seed laws, and the seed laws were messianic, having to do with Jacob’s prophecy regarding Shiloh (Gen. 49:10). The tribes had to be kept separate in order for Jacob’s prophecy to come true. The land laws were a means of keeping the tribes separate.⁸

To move a neighbor’s landmark was an act of theft. It was not an easily achieved deception in open terrain. The more accurate the measuring devices, the more difficult the deception. The ancient world had extraordinarily accurate measuring devices, as the dimensions of the Cheops pyramid indicate.⁹

7. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 3.

8. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 17.

9. Peter Tompkins, Secrets of the Great Pyramid (New York: Harper & Row, 1971). See especially the appendix by Livio Stecchini. See also Giorgio de Santillana and Hertha von Dechend, Hamlet’s Mill: An essay on myth and the frame of time (Boston: Gambit, 1969).

C. The Civil Sanction

Moving a landmark was an act of theft. The penalty for theft was double restitution: “If the theft be certainly found in his hand alive, whether it be ox, or ass, or sheep; he shall restore double” (Ex. 22:4).¹⁰ This must have been a monetary payment. The civil sanction could not have been the forfeiture of rural property. This was not any man’s right to transfer. A convicted criminal could not alienate his family’s land. Double restitution must have been made by the transfer of some other form of property besides land.

A successful theft constituted the disinheritance of one’s neighbor. What was the value of this disinheritance? There was no market for the sale of rural land in Mosaic Israel. That was because it was illegal to disinherit one’s heirs. There was a long-term leasehold market. The maximum term of the lease was 49 years: until the next jubilee (Lev. 25:27). The technical problem was for judges to estimate a market price for the stolen asset, despite the fact that there was no market for permanent transfers of land under the jubilee law. They could not simply double the prevailing lease price, which would expire at the next jubilee. The next jubilee might be in a year, so the lease price would have been low. The theft, however, was intended to be permanent. A more accurate assessment of the market value of the stolen land would have been its lease price, with payment in advance, at the beginning of the most recent jubilee cycle. They could double this price to establish the restitution price. Of course, 49 years is not the same as the permanent transfer of ownership. But the price of any income stream that is purchased on a 49-year lease basis, with payment in advance, is close to the price for a much longer lease period. Also, the higher the rate of interest on long-term loans, the closer that the upfront cash payment will be for both lease periods. The discounted present market value of income received in year 49 is close to the discounted present market value of income received in year 99.

D. Graves and Boundaries

There was a major difference between Israel and the other nations, including Greece and Rome: the lack of sacred land. There was no sacred land in Israel. There was sacred space: the place where the Ark of the Covenant was housed. The most sacred space in Israel was inside the Ark. After the return of the Ark from Philistia on the cart drawn by the oxen, it arrived at Bethshemesh. God's judgment came against the residents in the early days of the Ark's arrival. "And he smote the men of Beth-shemesh, because they had looked into the ark of the LORD, even he smote of the people fifty thousand and threescore and ten men: and the people lamented, because the LORD had smitten many of the people with a great slaughter" (I Sam. 6:19). This many deaths indicates that the whole city was involved. A generation of men died, leaving their wives without husbands. This would have drastically speeded up the inheritance process in the region. Not surprisingly, the survivors invited the people of Kirjath-jearim to take away the Ark. They did, and it remained with them for about a century before David brought it back to Jerusalem.¹¹

10. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia; Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 43.

Sacred space had to do with God's unique judicial place of residence. The idea of God's judicially restricted presence differentiated Israel from the other nations. Animism was rampant in the ancient world. Demons were believed to reside in the neighborhood. Their presence led to the development of a common theological outlook. Men believed that particular plots of land served as the residences of local gods and also the spirits of deceased male heads of household. Land was inalienable in ancient Greece, for the local god of a family had nothing to do with the god of another family. The domestic god conferred on the family its right to the soil. The family's hearth, like the family's tomb, could not lawfully be moved. Neither could either be occupied by others. Fustel wrote: "By the stationary hearth and the permanent burial-place, the family took possession of the soil; the earth was in some sort imbued and penetrated by the religion of the hearth and of ancestors." This, he said, was the origin of the idea of private property.¹² He was incorrect. Private property originated when God delegated to Adam authority over the earth, but then retained ownership of the forbidden tree. It was God's "no trespassing" declaration that established the principle of private property. God's right to exclude man was a boundary that man had to honor, on threat of death. God delegated no authority over that tree. Then He departed. His declaration of man's exclusion established private property.

11. James Jordan, Through New Eyes: Developing a Biblical View of the World (Brentwood, Tennessee: Wolgemuth & Hyatt, 1988), p. 224. (<http://bit.ly/jjneweyes>)

12. Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955), Book I, Chapter VI, p. 67.

Israel's religion was founded on the public rejection of all other religions, including animism. Animism is a religion of local gods. The God of Israel was the God of the whole earth. He could dwell with Israel outside the land. Thus, He could threaten the Israelites with temporary exile without threatening their existence as a holy nation. "And it shall come to pass, that as the LORD rejoiced over you to do you good, and to multiply you; so the LORD will rejoice over you to destroy you, and to bring you to nought; and ye shall be plucked from off the land whither thou goest to possess it. And the LORD shall scatter thee among all people, from the one end of the earth even unto the other; and there thou shalt serve other gods, which neither thou nor thy fathers have known, even wood and stone. And among these nations shalt thou find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest: but the LORD shall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind" (Deut. 28:63–65). Because God is the universal God, their exile would in no way break their covenant with Him. On the contrary, their exile would confirm the covenant: predictable corporate negative sanctions in history. The Old Covenant was primarily judicial, not geographical. It had been renewed through verbal ratification by the nation at Mt. Sinai, which was located outside the land (Ex. 19).¹³ He would still be their God in a foreign land. The fact that an invading nation—Assyria—would remove most of the population and substitute foreigners as permanent residents of the land in no way polluted the land. It was Israel's sin that had polluted the land, not these foreigners (later known as Samaritans). In fact, Ezekiel told Israel that resident aliens would be under the jubilee land laws after the Israelites returned to the land (Ezek. 47:21–23).¹⁴

This geographical sequence of events would have been inconceivable in ancient Greece. The boundaries of each family's land were guarded by large stones called Termini. These stones were regarded as gods. "The Terminus once established according to the required rites there was no power on earth that could displace it. It was to remain in the same place throughout all ages."¹⁵ It was the same in ancient Rome. "To encroach upon the field of a family, it was necessary to overturn or displace a boundary mark, and this boundary mark was a god. The sacrilege was horrible, and the chastisement severe. According to the old

13 Gary North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 20.

14. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 22.

15. Fustel, Ancient City, II:VI, pp. 68–69.

Roman law, the man and the oxen who touched a Terminus were devoted—that is to say, both men and oxen were immolated in expiation.”¹⁶

The Old Testament rarely mentions tombs, graves, and burial. This indicates that such matters were not considered important ritually, let alone theologically. Burial was a family matter, as when Jacob buried Rachel (Gen. 35:20). There was no officiating priest. Moses’ body was not marked by any pillar, and its location was immediately forgotten (Deut. 36:4). The only reference to burial in the Mosaic law governs the death of sinners hanged on a tree: “And if a man have committed a sin worthy of death, and he be to be put to death, and thou hang him on a tree: His body shall not remain all night upon the tree, but thou shalt in any wise bury him that day; (for he that is hanged is accursed of God;) that thy land be not defiled, which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance” (Deut. 21:22–23). Touching a grave was a minor infraction: “And whosoever toucheth one that is slain with a sword in the open fields, or a dead body, or a bone of a man, or a grave, shall be unclean seven days” (Num. 19:16). All that was required was ritual sprinkling (v. 18).

The land of Israel was important as God’s dwelling place. It was not important as the burial place for Israelites. The crucial covenantal issue was ethics, not ritual-based piety. If the nation broke the covenant, God threatened to depart from the land. He would no longer defend them Israel invasion. Where a man was buried had significance only if he was outside the land. Joseph had asked that his bones be taken out of Egypt at the exodus. This had to do with God’s promise of land to Joseph’s forefathers (Gen. 50:24). It was a covenantal issue, not a ritual issue. It had to do with the fulfillment in history of a covenantal promise. The fact that very few Jews returned to Israel after the exile did not make gentiles of those who remained behind in Medo-Persia. Their dispersion beyond the boundaries of Israel was implied from the beginning: the promise of zero miscarriages (Ex. 23:26)¹⁷ and long life (Ex. 20:12)¹⁸ were promises guaranteeing a population explosion to covenant-keeping Israel. Israel’s geographical boundaries were not supposed to incarcerate the Israelites.

16. Ibid., p. 69.

17. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 55.

18. Ibid., ch. 25.

D. Social Peace and Cooperation

The law of landmarks upheld private property. As such, it was an application of the eighth commandment: “Thou shalt not steal” (Ex. 20:15).¹⁹ Moving a marker was a way to steal the future value of an asset. But this asset—land—had another function: marking the boundaries of the original land distribution. A theft of land was a theft of God’s property. He had allocated the land in Joshua’s generation. This allocation was designed to separate tribes from each other, thereby honoring Jacob’s messianic prophecy regarding Shiloh.

This law governed neighbors and close relatives. It acknowledged that theft is a great temptation for those who are one’s closest covenantal associates. The threat to landed property in Mosaic Israel was either one’s immediate neighbors or an invading foreigner. This law implied that God would be the enforcer, since slight adjustments of markers are not easily detectable. But this also implied that men were willing to risk the wrath of God for the sake of relatively minor shifts in ownership. A major alteration of a boundary would have been obvious. Either the boundary-mover was a thief for the sake of theft, since not much property was involved, or else he planned a long-run confiscation, a little bit at a time. In either case, this was serious criminal behavior.

The nature of this crime would have led to family conspiracies. There can be little doubt that families on both sides of a landmark would have been well aware of its location. Generations of inherited property were at stake. Members of families would have known what would eventually be their inheritance. This is why family members would have had to conspire together to get away with such a theft. Anyone who attempted such a theft on his own who did not conspire with his family would have risked facing a family member in court serving as a witness for the victim. The sanctions against the false witness appear in the next section (vv. 15–21).²⁰

For one family to tamper with the boundary markers of its neighbor meant that intra-tribal conflicts would increase. This was obviously a crime that threatened social cooperation in the community. When neighbors cannot trust neighbors not to steal, it is difficult for a community to enjoy the division of labor. There is too much hostility and distrust.

19. Ibid., ch. 28.

20. Chapter 45.

But the threat was more than inter-family conflicts; it was equally intra-family conflicts. Within the boundaries of the original land grant there would have been new landmarks, generation by generation. If the jubilee was actually enforced, then there would have been additional markers, generation by generation. Each male heir of each original conquering family was entitled to a portion of the original land. The parcels of land would have grown smaller over time in the face of a growing population. As the plots grew smaller, as testified to by the boundary markers, the nation would have been reminded that they could place no faith in rural land as a long-term source of income. They would have to move off the land eventually. The dominion covenant could not be fulfilled inside the boundaries of Israel. Neither could it be fulfilled inside the boundaries of a family's rural inheritance. The heirs would have to be separated from their original inheritance in the land if they were to prosper economically. The markers were to testify to this covenantal reality, generation by generation.

Conclusion

The defense of private property is necessary for the extension of social cooperation and the division of labor. This law, because it dealt with contiguous property that was marked off by visible boundaries, dealt with neighbors. The preservation of social peace in a community is a high priority. It was an even higher priority in Mosaic Israel, where enforcement of the jubilee made it highly unlikely new neighbors could become permanent residents. Disputes over property could result in long-term conflicts or even feuds. Because family conspiracies would have had to underlie any plan to move a marker, this crime threatened social cooperation even more than other kinds of theft.

"Good fences make good neighbours," wrote the American poet Robert Frost. He made a good point. Moving a fence is a lot more difficult than moving a single boundary marker. But building a fence is more expensive than sticking a marker in the ground. Unless the fence lies entirely on one person's property, thereby reducing his available land by a greater percentage than his neighbor's land, neighbors must come to an agreement regarding the width of the fence, the construction materials, etc. A good fence that separates property equally along the line of the fence implies prior good relations between neighbors. The fence helps to maintain this cooperation. A fence is a manifestation of the private property order. By allowing men to exclude others, it encourages cooperation. When the fruits of this cooperation can readily be distributed in terms of the value which each party has put into the joint effort, there is an incentive for joint efforts. Boundaries around property acknowledge the owner's right to exclude. When these boundaries are enforced by law and social custom, the individual can more safely open the gate to others. When you have the legal right to remove visitors, you can more safely invite them for a visit. Good fences, in the broadest sense, make good neighbors, in the broadest sense.

THE PENALTY FOR PERJURY

One witness shall not rise up against a man for any iniquity, or for any sin, in any sin that he sinneth: at the mouth of two witnesses, or at the mouth of three witnesses, shall the matter be established. If a false witness rise up against any man to testify against him that which is wrong; Then both the men, between whom the controversy is, shall stand before the LORD, before the priests and the judges, which shall be in those days; And the judges shall make diligent inquisition: and, behold, if the witness be a false witness, and hath testified falsely against his brother; Then shall ye do unto him, as he had thought to have done unto his brother: so shalt thou put the evil away from among you (Deut. 19:15–19).

The theocentric principle here is that God is a true witness. He does not lie. God, as the supreme Judge, does not respect persons.¹ The context of this passage is disobedience. It begins with the problem of sin, and it ends with the problem of evil. Both are aspects of ethics: point three.² But judgment is associated with point four: sanctions.

A. Witnesses

The law of God is to be applied impartially, meaning without respect to persons. The civil magistrate's evaluation also must not be in terms of the class (wealth) or status (social position) of either the victim or the accused.³ Showing respect of persons in the exercise of

1. Deuteronomy 1:17; 16:19; II Chronicles 19:7; Proverbs 24:23; 28:21; Lamentations 4:16; Acts 10:34; Romans 2:11; Ephesians 6:9; Colossians 3:25; James 2:1, 9; I Peter 1:17.

2 2. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

3. On the modern sociological distinction between class and status, see Robert A. Nisbet, The Sociological Tradition (New York: Basic Books, 1966), ch. 5.

judgment is one of the major sins of mankind, in both church⁴ and state. This was not a land law.⁵

Deuteronomy 19:15–19 presents the civil standard governing false witnesses. The standard is lex talionis: an eye for an eye. “And thine eye shall not pity; but life shall go for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot” (Deut. 19:21). That which the false witness had hoped to achieve—having the court impose a specific negative civil sanction against his intended victim—he himself would bear. The cost of offering false testimony was commensurate with the cost of being a victim of false testimony. It was risky to become a false witness in Mosaic Israel. The more flagrant the false testimony, the riskier it became.

The biblical texts do not identify the witness specifically as a witness for the prosecution. This does not necessarily mean that the defense’s witnesses had to participate in the stoning. If a witness had confirmed the testimony of the accused, it would seem to be excessively stringent for the law to require him to participate in the execution. On the other hand, the witness serves as a defender of the court’s authority. The court has declared the accused guilty. Why shouldn’t he participate in the execution? On this basis: his unwillingness to participate actively in what he regards as an unjust decision. Participation would violate his conscience. He is not to rebel against the court, but he need not become an active executioner.

Consider a witness for the prosecution in a criminal trial. The court is God’s court. The state may be acting as the prosecutor on God’s behalf. This was always the case in murder trials, where the victim could not bring charges. The witness for the prosecution is always an agent of this court. He is also an agent for the person bringing the accusation. God delegates to the state the authority and requirement to execute people convicted of capital crimes. The historically permanent civil sanction of death removes the convicted person from the local jurisdiction of the earthly court and transfers him into God’s heavenly

4. “For if there come unto your assembly a man with a gold ring, in goodly apparel, and there come in also a poor man in vile raiment; And ye have respect to him that weareth the gay clothing, and say unto him, Sit thou here in a good place; and say to the poor, Stand thou there, or sit here under my footstool: Are ye not then partial in yourselves, and are become judges of evil thoughts? Hearken, my beloved brethren, Hath not God chosen the poor of this world rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to them that love him? But ye have despised the poor. Do not rich men oppress you, and draw you before the judgment seats?” (James 2:2–6).

5. On land laws, see Appendix J.

court. The witness is therefore acting as God's designated judicial agent through the court.

What about a witness for the defense? Witnesses for the defense were also under court sanctions. They were not allowed to lie under oath. What if they did? Were they under the threat of the court's sanctions? Yes. False witnessing was not allowed. Then what was the appropriate sanction? We return to the lex talionis: eye for eye. If they deliberately testified falsely, thereby persuading the court to release a guilty person back into society, they came under the sanctions that should have been applied to him. The court cannot lawfully prosecute the defendant a second time if he has been declared innocent by a jury,⁶ but it can prosecute the perjurer. This is not double jeopardy. The perjurer judicially represents the criminal whose testimony the perjurer has set free. The criminal has been set free; the perjurer takes his place. Judgment is upheld. The appropriate civil sanction is applied. The victim is not left with a sense of injustice. The person who inflicted the damage has not paid for his crime, but his substitute has. This is an application of the biblical principle of substitutionary atonement. If someone who is in a lawful position to pay the victim does so on behalf of the criminal, the victim is not to pursue the matter any further. The false witness is in a legal position to make this substitutionary payment, and the court is supposed to insist that he make it. The text does not say this specifically with respect to a witness for the defense, but the principle of the substitutionary atonement makes it clear that such a substitute is legitimate. When the sanction is imposed on the false witness, the judicial matter is settled. Peace may then be restored to society. This is a major goal of biblical law. The accused should be placated when the court imposes on the conspirators the penalty that would have been imposed on him.

6. This assumes that the common law's prohibition against double jeopardy is enforced. I regard this principle as biblical. When God declares a man not guilty, he is forever not guilty (Rom. 8:39). The state in this sense is to imitate God. When double jeopardy is prohibited by civil law, this restrains the state from becoming tyrannical, bankrupting innocent people by endless trials. The principle does not restrict the enforcement of ecclesiastical law. Gary North, Crossed Fingers: How the Liberals Captured the Presbyterian Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1996), pp. 831–32. (<http://bit.ly/gncrossed>)

B. Common Grace, Common Oath, and Common Sanctions

What about witnesses who were not circumcised? Were they permitted to testify? Here I must make deductions based on what is required of witnesses for the prosecution. But this raises questions regarding the basis of judicial decision-making.

The problem here is the theory of knowledge. Knowledge is not neutral. If this is the case, then the Christian philosopher should ask: What is the epistemological common ground between covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers? The Calvinist philosopher-theologian Cornelius Van Til said it is the common knowledge of God in every person—the sense of deity.⁷ It is also the common ground of creation, both Adamic and general.⁸ The covenant-breaker suppresses this knowledge (Rom. 1:18–20).⁹

How can a covenant-breaker's testimony be regarded as equal in judicial value to a covenant-keeper's testimony? The answer is in the existence of court sanctions. A convicted perjurer will suffer the same sanctions that would have been imposed by the court on his victim, had his perjury been successful. In other words, because all witnesses are under the same negative sanctions, their oaths before the court are considered equally valid. These confessions are not eternally equal, but they are historically equal.

God's common grace¹⁰ allows covenant-breakers to interpret the world sufficiently accurately to enable them to live productive lives. One aspect of this productivity is their ability to perceive and interpret events sufficiently accurately as to make their words reliable in business affairs. This same principle applies to their oath-bound court testimony.

The Mosaic civil sanction against perjury by a witness is clear: the perjurer must suffer the same penalty that would have been applied to his potential victim. He has sought to impose civil sanctions; now those sanctions are imposed on him.

7. Cornelius Van Til, The Defense of the Faith, rev. ed. (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1963), ch. 8.

8. Greg L. Bahnsen, Van Til's Apologetic: Readings and Analysis (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: P&R, 1998), pp. 418–20.

9. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 3.

10. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

The biblical principle of an eye for an eye—the lex talionis—is imposed on a convicted false witness. If he testified falsely against the accused, and this is discovered by the judges, then he becomes subject to the penalty that would have been imposed on the victim. This threat brings civil sanctions into the picture. The witness comes under civil sanctions, which means that he comes under the laws of the civil covenant. But must he confess faith in the God of the civil covenant in order to come under its sanctions?

The witness for the prosecution was required by law to cast the first stone. Did this make him a judge? Wasn't he imposing judgment in the name of God? Yes, but only at the instruction of the court. He did not declare judgment; he merely contributed information to those who would declare judgment. As an agent of the court, he did cast the first stone. He did not do this on his own authority.

Because he was not a citizen, he did not evaluate the evidence, i.e., he did not serve as a judge. He did act on behalf of the court in casting the first stone. This sanction would have been imposed on him had he been convicted of perjury. He was under oath-bound negative civil sanctions. He was therefore bound by an oath of obedience, irrespective of the absence of his personal confession of faith in the God of the covenant. A civil oath invoked covenant sanctions: the stones of justice. If the court convicted the accused, the prosecution's witness would participate in the execution as one who was formally under the court's civil sanctions. But he was already under these civil sanctions as a resident of Israel.

Only the citizen was eligible to declare God's judgment as a judge, an office closer to a modern juror than a robed judge. The non-citizen did not possess this authority. A person did not have to be a citizen in order to testify. The casting of stones was not a mark of citizenship; it was a mark of subordination to the Mosaic civil covenant, including its sanctions. What was invoked by the non-citizen witness was not God's direct sanctions, either on Israel or on him; rather, it was God's indirect sanctions through the court. He who would be required by law to cast the first stone would also have the first stone cast at him if he was convicted of perjury in a capital trial. The sanction was valid for all those who came under the Mosaic civil covenant and who then committed capital crimes. This included strangers in the land. But if they subordinated themselves to these sanctions, they also had the authority to impose them, as agents of the court, though not as citizens. They served as agents of the court when they served as witnesses for the prosecution.

C. The Cost of Obtaining Accurate Information

The punishment should fit the crime. This is the biblical principle of justice that undergirds the lex talionis. Similarly, the court's cost of obtaining accurate information should be proportional to the crime. A society that spends as much money in court to convict a bicycle thief as it does to convict a murder is indirectly subsidizing murderers. Resources are not unlimited. Court costs are positive. If the court is spending as much to prosecute bicycle thieves as murderers, the society will experience fewer stolen bicycles and more murders. The court should not require the same thoroughness of investigation in a minor case as it does where a person's life is on the line. A society that cannot allocate court expenses in terms of the severity of the criminal acts under examination will find itself burdened with injustice. This is the condition of modern Western jurisprudence. Perhaps the best example is a case that was settled in November, 1996, a libel trial that had become the longest trial in English history: over 292 days. The lawsuit had been brought by the McDonald's Corporation against a pair of unemployed people who had accused the company of having promoted poor nutrition, exploited children, encouraged litter, mistreated animals, and destroyed rain forests. The couple eventually lost the case, but they had no money to pay the plaintiff's huge legal fees, as English law requires.¹¹

The biblical law of perjury helps to balance the court's cost of obtaining information. The court does not threaten a witness with the risk of subsequently being brought to trial and convicted of a capital crime for having lied regarding a minor crime. If the threat is too great, witnesses will not readily volunteer. On the other hand, witnesses in a capital crime will be hesitant to participate in a conspiracy to bring false information before the court. The court's benefit (i.e., reduced cost) of screening out false information by means of a threat of perjury sanctions is partially offset by its cost of not obtaining accurate information because of witnesses who fear testifying.

Because false testimony is easier for one person to commit than many, this law mandates multiple witnesses for the prosecution. "One witness shall not rise up against a man for any iniquity, or for any sin, in any sin that he sinneth: at the mouth of two witnesses, or at the mouth of three witnesses, shall the matter be established” (v. 15). The testimony of one false witness is insufficient to convict the accused unless supporting impersonal evidence is very strong. But false witnesses involved in a conspiracy face a problem: all of them know that they are lying. They know that for their lie to be successful, the defense must not be able to prove collusion among the witnesses. But more than one person is involved in the deception. If one participant’s conscience gets the better of him, he may reveal the existence of a conspiracy.

11. Sarah Lyall, "Britain's Big 'McLibel Trial' (It's McEndless, Too)," New York Times (Nov. 29, 1996).

One way for the defense to persuade a conspirator to admit the truth is to offer him future immunity for his true testimony and an accusation against the others. The principle of victim’s rights allows the victim to offer forgiveness to anyone who has victimized him. He can be selective in this judgment. If the criminal has offered to confess his sin, the victim is in a legal position to forego the application of the biblically mandated sanctions.¹² The state must honor the victim’s assessment.¹³ In modern law, the criminal who testifies for the state is said to offer state’s evidence. In a case of false witness, a perjurer offers either victim’s evidence or defendant’s evidence.

Because of this possibility, the larger the conspiracy, the greater the likelihood that the conspiracy will be revealed by one of the participants. Betrayal does not require either a stricken conscience or an offer of immunity from the victim. The very nature of the motivation of secrecy can lead to a betrayal. The sense of power that knowing a secret conveys to the participants can itself lead to betrayal. Georg Simmel wrote in 1908: “The secret contains a tension that is dissolved in the moment of revelation. This moment constitutes the acme in the development of the secret; all of its charms are once more gathered in it and brought to a climax. . . . The secret, too, is full of the consciousness that it can be betrayed; that one holds the power of surprises, turns of fate, joy, destruction—if only, perhaps, of self-destruction. For this reason, the secret is surrounded by the possibility and temptation of betrayal. . . .”¹⁴ The betrayer becomes a big shot—even bigger, perhaps, than what he would have been had he remained a cooperating participant in the conspiracy.

12. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 33:F.

13. Idem.

14. The Sociology of Georg Simmel, trans., ed. Kurt H. Wolf (New York: Free Press, 1950), pp. 333–34.

A prosecuting attorney is not allowed knowingly to bring in a false witness. Neither is a defense attorney. They are agents of the court, bound by the court's rules of procedure. A conspiracy to mislead the court brings the court's penalty on any attorney who knowingly uses a false witness to testify. The goal of the court is to obtain accurate information. A conspiracy to mislead the court is a serious infraction. It is an assault on the court and an assault on the accused.

By requiring multiple witnesses for the prosecution (accusation), the state makes possible cross-examination of more than one person. Their stories can be compared and evaluated for consistency. Lies can be detected more easily. The prosecution has to prove its case. The defense has an easier time of it. The Bible does not teach explicitly that the accused must be assumed to be innocent, but the person who is making the accusation has a greater burden of proof. In this sense, the accused is presumed to be innocent. The conflicting stories are not assumed to be of equal weight judicially. This would lead to a stalemate. In the case of a stalemate, the accused would not be convicted by the court. The accused has the advantage.

D. Perjury Sanctions Threaten Both Parties

If a man brings an accusation against another, and the accused says that the other man is not telling the truth, this is not necessarily the same as saying that the accuser is lying. The accuser may be misinformed. But if the accused says that the accuser is a false witness who is deliberately telling a lie, then the accused is putting the accuser at risk. The accused must not commit perjury. He must not accuse the other person of telling a lie if the accuser is telling the truth.

What if the accused person resorts to perjury? What are the consequences? The lex talionis principle applies. First, if he stole something, he owes double restitution to his victim (Ex. 22:4).¹⁵ But if in addition he has lied about the accuser, saying that the accuser has committed perjury, he has not merely stolen; he has attempted to place his accuser under penalties. The lying criminal will then have to pay double restitution on these penalties, as well as the original restitution payment. When the criminal compounds the sin, he compounds his obligation.

Consider the alternative interpretation: the convicted person does not owe double restitution for his false accusation against the accuser.

15. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 43.

If his ineffective lie on the witness stand goes unpunished, he owes double restitution for the original crime, which he would have owed anyway. Lying to the court would then be a rational decision: the criminal is no worse off by his false accusation against the victim, and he may reduce the likelihood of being convicted for the theft. This would subsidize lying on the witness stand. But biblical law's goal is to reduce criminal behavior and protect the victim. Thus, the implication of this law is that lying to the court increases the liar's risk. Double restitution on the original infraction is insufficient. It repays the victim for the original infraction; it does not repay him for the second.

E. Priests and Judges

The conflicting parties "shall stand before the LORD, before the priests and the judges, which shall be in those days; And the judges shall make diligent inquisition" (vv. 17b–18a) First, the joint assembly of priests and judges constituted a representative assembly. This assembly represented God. To stand before this assembly was to stand before the Lord. The priests and judges would hand down judgments in the name of the Lord: ecclesiastical and civil. They served as spokesmen for God in history. In civil affairs, a court speaks for God. Under the Mosaic covenant, the priests had to be present in this civil assembly. Just as the priesthood's representative agents had to blow the two trumpets in order for Israel's holy army to be lawfully assembled and sent into battle (Num. 10:5–8), so did priests have to be present at this court. The priests had a civil function in Mosaic Israel: to offer counsel regarding the written law. They also were in a position to excommunicate a false witness. They gathered information by being present in civil court. This did not restrict them from conducting a separate trial in a church court, but they were there to hear the evidence in civil court.

The judges conducted the inquiry, according to this text. The priests were there to provide counsel and legitimacy, but the civil representatives conducted the investigation. The court might hand down negative sanctions. The investigatory work of the court was therefore conducted by civil officers.

Today's courts are strictly civil. In the United States, a witness for decades was sworn in by having him repeat an oath to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help him God, with his left hand on a Bible, Old and New Testaments, and his right hand pointed skyward. This was a Christian oath because of the presence of a Christian Bible. In the late twentieth century, this practice was modified. Atheists affirmed that they would tell the truth. They did not need to invoke God's name or place a hand on the Bible. They came under the sanctions of the earthly court. They did not imply through affirmation their belief in a heavenly court. Their testimony was accepted as equal in authority to any other witness's testimony. This procedure is legitimate biblically. The witness is under the court's sanctions, just as a stranger was in Mosaic Israel.

The question arises: What about the presence of a priest on the court? Covenantally, there are no priests today, for the sons of Aaron are gone, and there is no altar of sacrifice. The office is as defunct as the office of prophet.¹⁶ Does this fact invalidate the Mosaic law governing civil courts? Or is there an implied continuity of office from Old Covenant to New Covenant? Is the Trinitarian ecclesiastical minister the covenantal heir of the Mosaic priest? Should an ecclesiastical minister or ministers be present on the court to provide counsel and legitimacy? A civil magistrate is a minister (Rom. 13:4).¹⁷ He speaks in God's name. Must a civil court also include ecclesiastical ministers? To answer all this, we must first consider the structure on Mosaic civil government.

F. Federalism: Mosaic vs. Enlightenment

The Mosaic law provided a system of federalism between church and state. The church was part of Israel's federal judicial order. The civil government could not unilaterally speak in God's name when handing down formal decisions in which sanctions were involved. It could not unilaterally start a war nor decide between witnesses. In both cases, a representative of the church had to be present. This was true of Israel's supreme court (Deut. 17:8–13).¹⁸

1. State Jurisdiction

Modern federalism seeks a balance of power and authority within the divisions of civil government: executive, legislative, and judicial; national, state, and local. But modern federalism is exclusively civil. It assumes that the church has neither a legitimate claim nor any legit-

16. Chapter 33.

17. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 11.

18. Chapter 41.

imating function in civil government. The biblical doctrine of the separation of church and state has become a doctrine of exclusively secular authority: the separation of supernatural religion and state. Humanism proclaims that those ministers known as civil magistrates possess exclusive authority to speak in the name of God in civil cases. The state is said to have exclusive jurisdiction—law-speaking—in applying physical and monetary negative sanctions. The theocracy of modern federalism is an exclusively civil theocracy. The autonomous people rather than God are said to legitimize civil government. This corporate sovereign, whether Rousseau's General Will or Madison's "We, the People," must be represented by a voice of authority which speaks in the name of the sovereign and him only. This sovereign is seen as exclusively natural, not supernatural. Therefore, no ecclesiastical representative is said to possess lawful authority in civil matters except insofar as he may be a citizen, like any other citizen.¹⁹ The church has no representation in the state. While there are exceptions to this general rule, such as bishops who sit in England's House of Lords, which does not initiate legislation, the West has moved toward the elimination of church authority in civil government since the late eighteenth century.

The doctrine of separation is justified by modern, post-Enlightenment Christians in the name of protecting the church from secular influence. But this argument cuts two ways. It is used by secularists to protect the state from Christian influence. The idea is that there is some neutral common law that derives its authority from something broader than the Bible or Christianity. This broader judicial authority is considered superior to biblical authority in the realm of politics, which today encompasses just about everything.

The kingdom of politics is as comprehensive in its claims as is the kingdom of God. Christians today have accepted the majority of these claims, reserving only small zones of supposed autonomy from the kingdom of politics. These claims of immunity are constantly being challenged by the state. To accommodate the claims of the state, Christians have all but abandoned the ideal of the kingdom of God in history as a realm as comprehensive as Adam's kingdom. The suggestion that the Great Commission extends as far as Adam's Fall did is rejected by most Christians, for such a suggestion raises the issue of theocracy: the rule of God's law. The Great Commission has been re-defined to include the Christian family, the Christian church, the humanist-accredited college and theological seminary, and the Christian school—usually state-certified—but not the civil government.²⁰

19. In the United States Constitution (1788), the outlawing of religious test oaths for U.S. government office-holders was the means of asserting this autonomy (Article VI, Section III). Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), pp. 385–85, 389–92. (<http://bit.ly/polpol>)

2. Biblical Federalism

This passage proves that in the Mosaic civil order, the priesthood had a role to play in civil government. To deny that this role has been transferred to the ecclesiastical ministry under the New Covenant is to argue for a covenantal discontinuity. The New Covenant's abolition of the Mosaic priesthood is the obvious way to make such a claim. But if the abolition of the priesthood becomes the basis of the discontinuity, then some aspect of the Mosaic priesthood that was connected to animal sacrifices has to be associated with civil justice. With the abolition of the sacrifices, the ecclesiastical ministry has supposedly lost its role in civil justice. If, however, the basis of the priest's participation in a civil court was the priest's expertise in biblical law and the political need to create a federalism of covenantal authority in civil justice, then there is no civil discontinuity between the Mosaic priesthood and the New Covenant's ecclesiastical eldership. In this case, modern humanistic civil justice is illegitimate biblically and must be reformed. The monopoly of the secular state over civil justice then cannot find justification in the Bible.

The doctrine of the complete separation of church and state has been a convenient way for Christians to escape any responsibility for dealing with questions of civil government and political theory from an explicitly biblical viewpoint. They have preferred to defer to today's ideological heirs of the Enlightenment Whigs²¹ or Enlightenment social democrats²² on such matters. To justify this deferral, they have adopted some version of secular natural law theory, long after Darwinism had completely undermined the philosophical basis of secular natural law theory.²³ In fact, Christian social theorists are among the last re-

20. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

21. See Appendix H: "Week Reed: The Politics of Compromise."

22. David Chilton, Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators: A Biblical Response to Ronald J. Sider, 3rd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1981] 1996). (<http://bit.ly/dcsider>)

23. R. J. Rushdoony, The Biblical Philosophy of History (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1969] 2000), p. 7. (<http://bit.ly/rjrbph>) maintaining defenders of natural law theory. The predecessors of the humanists with whom they seek an accommodation had abandoned the theory by 1900. From the early days of the church, natural law theory has been the basis of the surrender by Christian theologians and moralists to humanists. The habit seems unbreakable, even when the humanists have abandoned natural law theory.

Conclusion

The text says that the judges had the responsibility of investigating and evaluating the conflicting testimonies of rival parties. They had to decide if one person was deliberately lying. If he was, then he was to be placed under a civil sanction. The sanction was clear: whatever penalty the state would have imposed on the victim had the testimony of the false witness been believed. Equity in this instance was based on lex talionis: eye for eye. The justification was the elimination of a public evil: “so shalt thou put the evil away from among you.”

Then why were the priests there? The text does not say. I think there are three reasons. First, to provide counsel regarding God’s written law. Second, to gather information in order to declare a false witness excommunicate. There would be a double witness against false witness. Third, to provide legitimacy to the court.

There had to be civil sanctions if there was civil law. The sanction was to be commensurate with the infraction. Because the sanction was the same in both cases, the rule of law was affirmed. There could be no favoritism on the part of the court. The fear of offering false witness was to be comparable to the fear of being convicted by false witness. The false witness had to consider the consequences of his testimony. He had to count the cost (Luke 14:28–30).²⁴ He had to consider the damage that his testimony would cause another person. To assist him in his process of cost accounting, the Mosaic law specified that if he was shown to be a false witness, he would suffer the same penalty that he had sought to inflict on his victim.

There is no indication that this aspect of the Mosaic law has been annulled by the New Covenant. On the contrary, the New Covenant affirms the principle. More than this: the New Covenant order was sealed forever by God’s final judgment against Israel’s false testimony. The false testimony given against Jesus Christ—that He was not who and what He said He was—led to the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, thereby ending forever the Old Covenant order.²⁵ The Sanhedrin had sentenced Christ to death, knowing that their procedures were illegal, even in terms of their own law.²⁶ God sentenced Old Covenant Israel to death, a sentence carried out in A.D. 70.

24. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 35.

Is there continuity of the other aspect of this law, i.e., the presence of priests in a civil court's procedure? The presence of representatives of both church and state made the covenantal implications clear. The state must not hand down judgments irrespective of the church's interpretation of what constitutes righteous judgment. The priest was a counsellor and a legitimizer. He did not conduct the actual investigation, but he could respond to questions regarding equity.²⁷ His main assignments in this case were to serve as a source of legitimacy for the court and to protect the citizenry from a monopolistic civil government that would refuse to acknowledge any authority but its own in rendering civil judgment. There was to be no absolute separation of church and state in Mosaic Israel. This constituted a system of federalism. It refuted the idea of civil autonomy/monopoly.

The would-be false witness was warned to count the cost of his action. This cost was the same as the cost borne by the victim of his false testimony. There was an equality of sanctions. This is why Adam's rebellion was attempted regicide and parricide.²⁸ This is why there was a death penalty attached to the eating of the tree's fruit. Adam had in principle had agreed to act as the serpent's agent in bringing a covenant lawsuit against God by publicly challenging God's supposedly false claim of absolute authority. By violating the tree's boundary, he handed down judgment against God in the name of the serpent. The

25. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdays>)

26. Under the Pharisees' interpretation of Judaic law, if the court paid a witness, this invalidated his testimony. Bekhoroth 4:6, in The Mishnah, ed. Herbert Danby (New York: Oxford University Press, [1933] 1987), p. 534. The court had paid Judas 30 pieces of silver to identify Jesus, i.e., to provide witness that this was the man they planned to accuse. "Then Judas, which had betrayeth him, when he saw that he was condemned, repented himself, and brought again the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests and elders, Saying, I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood. And they said, What is that to us? see thou to that" (Matt. 27:3–4). Then the execution of Jesus took place. Judas repented of his act before the sentence was carried out. The Jews did not. Judas paid with his life (v. 5). So did Old Covenant Israel.

27. This indicates that God's examination of Adam and Eve was done in His judicial capacity as king rather than priest.

28. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1987] 2012), Appendix E.

proof that his accusation was false was his own death. He had failed to count the cost accurately.

God, on the day of judgment, will serve as a witness. If He has granted salvation by grace through faith, He will serve as a witness for the defense.

A HIERARCHY OF COMMITMENTS

And the officers shall speak unto the people, saying, What man is there that hath built a new house, and hath not dedicated it? let him go and return to his house, lest he die in the battle, and another man dedicate it. And what man is he that hath planted a vineyard, and hath not yet eaten of it? let him also go and return unto his house, lest he die in the battle, and another man eat of it. And what man is there that hath betrothed a wife, and hath not taken her? let him go and return unto his house, lest he die in the battle, and another man take her (Deut. 20:5–7).

These laws related to participation in God's holy army. They therefore related to citizenship in Israel. These laws were aspects of point three of the biblical covenant: the ethical and judicial separation of God's people. These were holiness laws. Holiness is an aspect of part three of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. The Economics of the Firstfruits Offering

The first two laws of military exemption had something to do with the right to enjoy the fruits of one's labor. Death on the battlefield was not to separate a man from these fruits. Yet the exemptions were not permanent. In the case of a newly married man, the exemption lasted one year (Deut. 24:5). The fourth exemption, fear, I cover in the next chapter.

The first two laws of military non-participation were land laws: new house, new vineyard.² They had to do with sacrifices: priestly. These sacrifices no longer exist. Neither does the priesthood. The

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

2. On land laws, see Appendix J.

third exemption was a seed law: newlywed.³

In what way did a man's right to enjoy a preliminary return on a long-term capital investment reflect a property right of God? I offer three plausible answers: the tithe, the firstfruits offering, or both.

The problem with designating the tithe alone as God's property right rather than the firstfruits offering (or both) is that the tithe is God's permanent right of return. The two exemptions were not permanent. In contrast, the firstfruits offering was a preliminary offering in addition to the tithe. The firstfruits offering was a kind of down payment to God for God's down payment on the harvest. Firstfruits were offered three times on the day after Passover (Lev. 23:1–12), at the feast of Firstfruits (Pentecost) (Ex. 34:22), and at the feast of Booths (Tabernacles) (Ex. 23:16; 34:22; Lev. 23:39–40). In the case of Booths, when the harvest was complete, others in the community were to be invited in to share the wealth.

Thou shalt observe the feast of tabernacles seven days, after that thou hast gathered in thy corn and thy wine: And thou shalt rejoice in thy feast, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter, and thy manservant, and thy maidservant, and the Levite, the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, that are within thy gates. Seven days shalt thou keep a solemn feast unto the LORD thy God in the place which the LORD shall choose: because the LORD thy God shall bless thee in all thine increase, and in all the works of thine hands, therefore thou shalt surely rejoice (Deut. 16:13–15).⁴

To understand what was involved in this law of military exemption, we must begin with a fundamental biblical economic principle: the individual serves as the economic agent (steward) of God. God had delegated to individual Israelites the task of building up the capital base necessary to increase His firstfruits. This is why a producer's right to collect the firstfruits of a newly finished capital asset—house or vineyard—could not lawfully be challenged by the state in Mosaic Israel, even in wartime. The producer's initial claim on the fruits of his newly completed stream of income was superior to the state's claims on his life. This, in turn, reflected God's prior claim of firstfruits on agricultural output. The firstfruits offering of the vineyard would be paid to the priesthood, who in turn held a veto on the war (Num. 10:8; Deut. 20:2).

3. On seed laws, see Appendix J.

4. Chapter 35.

But why did a newly built home offer an exemption? There was no firstfruits offering required for dedicating a new home. Answer: an Israelite's home was analogous to God's home, which was the tabernacle-temple. Although no law required it, Solomon dedicated the newly constructed house of God by sacrificing 22,000 oxen and 20,000 sheep (1 Kings 8:63). Thus, a sacrifice of dedication, while not legally required, was appropriate when a man finished building his home. He could enjoy the fruits of his labor, just as God, in His capacity as a cosmic house-builder,⁵ enjoyed the blessings of dwelling in a new home.

The firstfruits were token payments to God: a kind of down payment on the future tithe. They were a man's statement of faith in God's long-term future bounty, as well as thanks for God's preliminary manifestation of blessing.

B. Inheritance and Battle

Chapter 20 deals with military affairs. Israel's inheritance of Canaan would be the result of military action. The physical disinheritance of the Canaanites through their execution on the battlefield was to be the operational means of claiming the inheritance. Military sanctions were to be the means of this long-prophesied inheritance/disinheritance. That is, point four of the biblical covenant model, sanctions, was the prerequisite of point five.

The laws in this passage applied to a settled population: settlement in the post-conquest world. This generation as yet had no houses, no vineyards. They had not become dwellers in the Promised Land. They were still outsiders. So, this passage presumed a forthcoming victory. These laws would go into effect in Israel's history only after the conquest. In this sense, this passage was prophetic. It assumed the transfer of the inheritance. More than this: these laws had to do with the maintenance of the individual's inheritance, i.e., enjoying the firstfruits of house, vineyard, or wife. The focus of these laws was on preserving an inheritance. One man sows; another man is therefore not to reap. This was to be the case in Israel for righteous men. He who sows is supposed to reap. Not even the needs of the military were to supersede this principle. Only unrighteousness is to break the legal pattern of sowing and reaping. Canaan was soon to become an example of such unrighteousness.

5. Meredith G. Kline, Images of the Spirit (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker, 1980), pp. 17–18, 20–21, 35–42.

And it shall be, when the LORD thy God shall have brought thee into the land which he swore unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give thee great and goodly cities, which thou buildedst not, And houses full of all good things, which thou filledst not, and wells digged, which thou diggedst not, vineyards and olive trees, which thou plantedst not; when thou shalt have eaten and be full; Then beware lest thou forget the LORD, which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage. Thou shalt fear the LORD thy God, and serve him, and shalt swear by his name. Ye shall not go after other gods, of the gods of the people which are round about you (Deut. 6:10–14).

There is a fundamental principle of individualism in the Deuteronomy 20 passage. The defense of the individual's legal right to enjoy the firstfruits of his labor was superior to the military defense of the nation.

God had not instructed Moses to convey these rules of post-conquest warfare to the exodus generation. There was no need. First, they were not the fourth generation that was scheduled to inherit (Gen. 15:16). Second, He knew that they were an army of slaves: fearful of everything. They were in no spiritual condition to conquer Canaan.

C. No Conscription

The tribes were supposed to respond to a call to military action. Yet it is clear from Deborah's song that some tribes had not responded (Jud. 5:16–17). This indicates that the Mosaic law offered no formal negative sanctions to the central government that would enable it pressure the tribes to assemble. The Levite whose concubine had been raped to death by the Benjaminites cut her corpse into pieces and sent them to the other tribes (Jud. 19:29). This was a form of moral suasion. There was no legal compulsion available to him.

Could a tribe compel each adult male to assemble in military formation? There was no law that mandated this. The exemption laws of Deuteronomy 20 mandated that the officers permit any member who qualified under the law to return home. Anyone could claim fear and thereby be exempted. Perhaps not many men would have done this, for fear of shaming themselves, but the other three exemptions were easy ways out. All three involved building toward the future, i.e., future-oriented activities. There was no shame involved in claiming one of these exemptions. What is important to understand here is the principle that a man's demonstrated but unfulfilled future-orientation— the figurative harvest sown but not reaped—was more important to Israel than his participation in the army. The building of familistic capital was more important than participation in war. The creation of streams of personal income was more important for the nation than adding numbers to the army.

If a man could be exempted immediately preceding the battle, was there compulsion in assembling? That is, with exemptions so easy, what would have pressured men to assemble and then march off to war? If there were no external, civil pressures available to the state, why would there have been these exemptions? One reason occurs: ecclesiastical pressure. Citizenship in Mosaic Israel was based on two things: circumcision and eligibility for service in God's holy army. If a man refused to answer the call to muster the troops, would he have lost his citizenship? Was mere military eligibility sufficient to maintain citizenship? Or was actual attendance at the mustering required?

Deborah did not declare that members of the tribes of Reuben, Asher, and Dan had lost their citizenship (Jud. 5:16–17). They suffered the negative sanction of being written into her song of victory in an unfavorable light. They would have had the option of going home on the basis of fear, but they never even showed up. They were not willing to admit in public at the time of battle that they were too afraid to fight. This is why Deborah criticized them: not for their fear but for their unwillingness to show up and admit in public as tribes that they were too afraid to fight.

The Mosaic law had no specified negative sanctions against non-appearance. Thus, there was no lawful military conscription under the Old Covenant. There was neither a written law nor specified sanctions that compelled anyone to answer the trumpets' call. The state had to rely on men's sense of duty to motivate them to answer the call. Even after responding, there was another opportunity to return home.

D. An Army of Holy Warriors

The goal of these exemption laws was two-fold. First, no fighting man should suffer second thoughts about having completed a long-term project that he did not have time to enjoy. Second, the army had to rely on God more than its numbers. I discuss the second concern in the next chapter.

The first concern had to do with a warrior's sense of commitment. Any warrior who had valid reasons to hold back in the heat of battle, especially offensive battle, was told to go home. These reasons had to do with the future. He had created a capital asset that was to provide him with a stream of income: home or vineyard. He had not enjoyed any benefits from that capital asset. He had not paid the priesthood its lawful firstfruits offering. A similar logic governed the third exemption: a wife back home. In the case of a new wife, the exemption was even more specific: a year's mandatory exemption. His wife's interests were also at stake. The presumption was that the man would have time to impregnate his wife in a year. The issue of biological heirs was a major one in Mosaic Israel. This had to do with the seed laws. The levirate's marriage provisions were associated with these laws: "If brethren dwell together, and one of them die, and have no child, the wife of the dead shall not marry without unto a stranger: her husband's brother shall go in unto her, and take her to him to wife, and perform the duty of an husband's brother unto her. And it shall be, that the firstborn which she beareth shall succeed in the name of his brother which is dead, that his name be not put out of Israel" (Deut. 25:5–6).⁶

Any civil leader who began making long-range plans for indulging himself in a war faced a potential veto by his army: prior capital formation. A man who expected to be called into battle could start building a house, planting a vineyard, or courting a woman if he wanted to avoid serving in the army. If he got the house built, the vineyard planted, or the girl married him before the silver trumpets were blown, he could come home after the mustering but before the battle. Preparations for unpopular wars would have increased capital formation in Israel, at least in the three areas of housing, wine, and families. While some men fought, others would be enjoying the fruits of their labors. This was a military anti-recruiting system designed to keep rulers from indulging in the sin of empire. Sitting at home by the fire, a glass of wine in hand, with your new wife on your lap surely beats slogging through the mud in a foreign war of empire. "Make love, not war" was a law governing Israelite marriage. Any call to the holiness of a cause would have to be believed by the holy warriors in order for the leaders to recruit an army. Mercenaries would not guarantee victory.

A wise king of Israel would have understood this threat to his plans. "Or what king, going to make war against another king, sitteth not down first, and consulteth whether he be able with ten thousand to meet him that cometh against him with twenty thousand? Or else, while the other is yet a great way off, he sendeth an ambassage, and desireth conditions of peace" (Luke 14:31–32).⁷ The military service exemption laws, when enforced, would have kept the kings honest. It would have kept them from high-risk international displays of their own power.

6. Chapter 64.

Conclusion

First, citizenship in Israel was based on eligibility for service in God's holy army.⁸ Second, the state did not possess final authority over priests and citizens. Warfare was made holy by acclamation by the priesthood. Without their support, the war was illegal. There could be no numbering and no atonement money, which had to be paid to the priests (Ex. 30:12).⁹ Third, mandatory military conscription was illegal. This was a major restriction on the expansion of state power, which increases dramatically in wartime and is rarely reversed after the war.¹⁰ The hierarchy of military authority in Mosaic Israel reflected the hierarchy of mandatory payments: priesthood, head of household, state.

Israel as a holy army was a judicially restricted army. The army had to be called into action by priests. There were two opportunities for the priesthood to veto a war: prior to assembling the army and immediately prior to the war (Num. 10:2–8). Individuals also had a right to return home. This placed the civil rulers at a disadvantage in any schemes for building an empire.

There were superior claims on every warrior's commitment. These were in part economic and in part covenantal. He did not owe a sacrifice for a newly dedicated house, but such sacrifice was appropriate for God's house, so presumably it was appropriate for a man's house. He did owe a firstfruits offering for his newly planted vineyard. Until that debt was paid at the next national feast, he was to depart from the battlefield. He was also to return to his new bride, for her sake (Deut. 24:5) and for his (Deut. 20:7). These commitments took precedence over the state's right to call citizens into battle.

These legitimate commitments, as well as the personal benefits as-

7. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 35.

8. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 2:C

9. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2011), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 58.

10. Robert Higgs, Crisis and Leviathan: Critical Episodes in the Growth of American Government (New York: Oxford University Press, 1987).

sociated with reaping the fruits of one's labor, did not threaten the cohesiveness of God's "leaner, meaner" holy army. The army's greater cohesion would have been the result of these exemptions. Holy warriors were supposed to be committed to victory. But some commitments could not be relegated to secondary status, either judicially or psychologically. These commitments became the legal basis of exemption from military duty.

The firstfruits offering was a priestly law. Priestly laws are no longer binding. The law of the new vineyard was a land law. Land laws are no longer binding. The care of a new wife was a seed law. Seed laws are no longer binding. The underlying principle of each was that a man is to enjoy a token payment on his productivity before his life is placed at risk militarily.

No civil sanctions are ever legitimate against men who refuse to serve in the military, for whatever reason. The state does not possess the right to draft anyone into military service, on threat of civil sanctions, in peacetime or war.

A FEW GOOD MEN

And the officers shall speak further unto the people, and they shall say, What man is there that is fearful and fainthearted? let him go and return unto his house, lest his brethren's heart faint as well as his heart (Deut. 20:8).

Deuteronomy 20 deals with military affairs. The laws in this section governed God's holy army. These are holiness laws: aspects of point three of the biblical covenant.¹

A. God's Holy Army

Moses announced this law to the generation of the conquest, but before this generation had marched into battle. He reminded them of the theocentric framework of their assignment. They were soldiers of a living God who is sovereign over history.

The section begins with a call to courage based on God's sovereignty: "When thou goest out to battle against thine enemies, and seest horses, and chariots, and a people more than thou, be not afraid of them: for the LORD thy God is with thee, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt" (v. 1). This law was not a land law or a seed law. It was not grounded in the Mosaic sacrifices or the tribal system: a priestly law. It was therefore a cross-boundary law: universal.² This law governed God's holy army, but the general principle upholding it—the removal of fearful men from the ranks—is a universal principle of covenantal warfare.

This holy army would fight under a dual chain of command:

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

2. On the four categories of the Mosaic law, see Appendix J.

officers and priests. The priests were not merely spiritual cheerleaders whose main task was to supply extra courage to men marching into battle. That is, they were not modern military chaplains. They actually held a veto over the war. When the army approached the battlefield, a priest was to approach the assembled warriors and announce: "Hear, O Israel, ye approach this day unto battle against your enemies: let not your hearts faint, fear not, and do not tremble, neither be ye terrified because of them; For the LORD your God is he that goeth with you, to fight for you against your enemies, to save you" (vv. 3–4). A holy army was to be motivated by the words of a holy priesthood. If the priesthood failed to support this military action, refusing to encourage the army by invoking covenantally the name of God, the army could not lawfully obey any order to go into battle. This meant that the priesthood three times had a veto over the entire campaign: before the army marched off to war (Num. 10:8); when the mustered men were to pay their atonement money (Ex. 30:12), which the priests could refuse to accept; and again immediately prior to the engagement.

There has been a debate in the West for a millenium over what constitutes righteous warfare. There is no doubt biblically how to answer this in theory. A holy war is a war fought by a nation whose Christian ministers exercise a lawful veto on the war and who nonetheless have promoted it. If the state imprisons Christian ministers for speaking out against a war, as the United States government sometimes did during World War I,³ then this war is not just.

B. Thinning the Ranks in Advance

The goal of this law was to thin the ranks of God's holy army. This is not the normal goal of any military planner. He always wants more men and equipment than he has.⁴ But Israel was told to trust in God, not in military strength. David, a warrior, wrote: "Some trust in chariots, and some in horses: but we will remember the name of the LORD our God" (Ps. 20:7). Isaiah wrote: "Woe to them that go down to Egypt for help; and stay on horses, and trust in chariots, because they are many; and in horsemen, because they are very strong; but they look not unto the Holy One of Israel, neither seek the LORD!" (Isa. 31:1). This outlook reflected Israel's theory of holy warfare. God told the nation that He would be with them in righteous military undertakings. Their faith would be tested by their willingness to thin the ranks by means of exemptions. The very smallness of the army was to increase the nation's faith in the coming victory. What would normally be regarded as a negative sanction was in fact a positive sanction.

3. H. C. Peterson and Gilbert C. Fite, Opponents of War, 1917–1918 (Seattle: University of Washington Press, [1957] 1968), ch. 11: "Disciplining the Clergy."

4. This is the fundamental law of scarcity: "At zero price, there will be greater demand than supply."

This Israelite practice rested on a psychological premise: a fearful man is not much of a warrior. Also, an Israelite who did not trust God's promise to be with His people in holy warfare was surely not very holy. He would not see the army as uniquely protected by God and set apart for victory. No warrior wants to fight alongside of a fearful man. He wants to know that his flanks are covered in the line. A fearful man who holds back thereby exposes those on either side of him to added risk. Furthermore, a fearful man has not internalized the opening words of this passage: "When thou goest out to battle against thine enemies, and seest horses, and chariots, and a people more than thou, be not afraid of them: for the LORD thy God is with thee, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt" (v. 1). His doubts call into question the army's corporate commitment to these words. God made provision for such a fear-burdened man to excuse himself and return home before the battle began.

There is always fear in battle: fear of the enemy, fear of senior officers, and fear of being labeled a coward. Different men respond differently to these fears. God told Israel not to fear the enemy. If a man feared the enemy, he was asked by an officer to go home.

The authority of the Israelite warrior to walk away from a war meant that the rulers had to be very careful in deciding what was worth fighting for. The priests held a veto on the decision of a civil ruler to take the nation into war. The individual warrior could not veto the war, but he could veto his participation in it. He could "vote with his feet." This placed a very serious limitation on political rulers. The rulers were to confine their military affairs to defensive wars and holy wars. The holy status of a war would be determined by the priesthood, not by the state. Any war begun by the ruler apart from the priests would not have the Ark of the Covenant present on the battlefield. The senior civil ruler could not demand that every holy warrior accompany him on his march into battle. Otherwise, it would be the leader's war, not the army of the Lord's war. He might persuade others to go into battle for the sake of spoils, but that would make his army a mercenary army. The motivation of mercenaries is personal gain. Mercenary armies are notoriously less successful than citizen armies defending their homelands. These restrictions on civil rulers meant that Israel could not become an empire while obeying God's law. Its rulers could not easily extend their military power beyond the original boundaries of the nation.

Just prior to the battle, there was to be a deliberate thinning of the ranks. The officers were to offer their men a way of escape. There were four ways out of the ranks: two were explicitly economic; one was marital; one was psychological. If a man had built a new home, planted a new vineyard, married a new wife, or was afraid, he could return home (Deut. 20:5–8).⁵ The classic biblical case of deliberately thinning the ranks was Gideon's series of screening devices (Jud. 7:3–8). The first screening device was fear. This was the most effective device; 22,000 Israelites voluntarily departed (v. 3). They swallowed their shame and went home. They probably knew that to fight while afraid was contrary to the Mosaic law. Fearful men were not allowed to serve. Fear, not small numbers, threatened the success of the military venture. They chose not to violate His law. It was better to acknowledge their fear publicly and go home than to break God's law and fight in fear.

The commander of Israel's army was not to rely on numbers. The army had to be numbered prior to a war because each man owed blood money—an atonement payment—to the priests (Ex. 30:12).⁶ This numbering was not to be used as a way for the commander to assess the likelihood of success in a military venture. Success on the battlefield, this passage informs us, was entirely dependent on God. This formal procedure of thinning the ranks was the way of affirming meaningful faith in God's presence with the nation in holy warfare.

C. Rational Calculation and Cowardice

This law made Israel's army different from any army in history. In all other armies, senior military commanders have had to devise ways to keep their troops in line.⁷ They have used the negative sanctions of shame, fear of superior officers, harsh discipline, and ultimately the threat of the firing squad or its equivalent to keep the ranks from breaking and running under fire. These sanctions are designed to offset the self-interested soldier's rational desire to run.

5. Chapter 46.

6. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 58.

7. Even the phrase "in line" suggests a military image: a line of troops that will not break and run under fire.

1. A Soldier Under Fire

Consider the decision-making process of a soldier under fire. He makes a cost-benefit analysis based on how his decision will affect him. The question here is the degree to which individual self-interest either supports or undermines a military formation. Here is a fundamental fact of infantry tactics: there is greater risk of being killed from behind while fleeing in open terrain than of being killed while standing and fighting, since the attacking troops are afraid of dying. Active resistance makes attackers less offensive-minded, less committed to destroying all those who resist them. Opponents who flee reduce the risk to their attackers, i.e., lower the cost of attacking. (This was especially true when infantry faced chariots.) With any scarce economic resource, the lower the cost, the more will be demanded. The lower the cost of attacking your enemy, the more you will be willing to do it, other things being equal. Nevertheless, defensive resistance is not the least dangerous personal decision. The least dangerous decision, apart from negative sanctions imposed by your own forces, is to run away early while your comrades are still fighting. They keep the enemy at bay; meanwhile, you distance yourself from danger.

Here are a soldier's options. First, if the line breaks and runs, he will be left standing nearly alone—a standing duck, so to speak. This is the most dangerous option. We can call this the Uriah option. "And it came to pass in the morning, that David wrote a letter to Joab, and sent it by the hand of Uriah. And he wrote in the letter, saying, Set ye Uriah in the forefront of the hottest battle, and retire ye from him, that he may be smitten, and die" (I Sam. 11:14–15). The more courageous the soldier, the more likely that he will die if his comrades flee. A brave man with cowards on his flanks will soon be a dead man. Second, if he runs early, he reduces his risk of dying during this encounter, whether or not his comrades run away later. The sooner he runs, the better for him: those who stay in the ranks longer before running are more likely to be cut down by the initial wave of charging troops. The attackers will be busy slaughtering those close at hand. Defense takes time; meanwhile, he keeps running. Third, he stands his ground until he sees his comrades running; then he tries to run faster than they do.

The least dangerous decision is to run early. The next-safe decision is to stand and fight, but only if all of your colleagues are standing and fighting. Your safety depends on the decisions of others in the line, just as theirs depends on you. Your survival therefore depends on your ability to time your flight so that you run away just slightly ahead of your colleagues. In a line that is about to break, your survival depends on your speed: deciding when to run and how fast you can run compared to your comrades. The next most dangerous decision is to run late and slow. The most dangerous decision is to stand and fight after your comrades have run. The cowardly early runner is least at risk. The brave man who stands his ground alone is most at risk. The others are in between. This is why it is so important to remove cowards from the line. Their decision to run jeopardizes everyone in the line.

The safety of the soldier depends on the willingness of his colleagues to stand and fight, or to march forward and fight, with him or without him. Some members of his unit predictably will die, whether it wins or loses. Immediate self-interest motivates each man to run away fast and early.⁸ The more fearful his comrades, the sooner he had better start running.⁹ The slower he runs, the earlier that he must begin running.

There is no question about it: in an offensive war, where your nation is not being invaded, the safest thing to do is go home. This is “running early,” before the line forms. This is why the Mosaic law screened out those who were the most likely troops to run when attacked. Fear is like a forest fire. One way to contain forest fires before they begin is to cut down and remove highly inflammable trees that might catch fire and serve as conduits for the flames.

2. Cowardice

Cowardice is a military evil second only to treason—worse even than disobeying a lawful order. Cowardice threatens every military tactic. Senior commanders employ tactics that persuade most troops to stand and fight most of the time. Military training instills the fear of suffering shame by imposing negative sanctions based on shame: the first man to run is branded as an unjustifiable coward. Military forma-

8. David Friedman, Hidden Order: The Economics of Everyday Life (New York: HarperBusiness, 1996), p. 7.

9. This is why esprit de corps is so important for an army. Men in arms must learn to trust their colleagues, and their colleagues must be worthy of this trust. The braver your comrades are, the safer you are. This is why an army must strive to eliminate the presence of cowards and to reduce the level of cowardice in all the other members. This is why armies award medals and activate firing squads.

tions have been designed to keep men from running.¹⁰ If everyone runs, the collective guilt is spread around. So, initial flight must be stopped, and the means of stopping it is to threaten negative sanctions. The smaller the number of those who run, the greater is the individual responsibility and individual punishment on those who run. "They won't court martial us all if we run as a unit," thinks the soldier, "but they may court martial me if I run and the others hold the line."

The more fearful the individual is, the more likely he will run. The more fearful that he knows his comrades to be, the sooner he will run. The sight of a man running away can set off a chain reaction along the line. So, the most effective way to keep men from running is to increase their courage rather than threaten them with shame. That was why God required Israel's commanders to let fearful men go home early. They "ran" before the war began.

D. Israel's Motivation

Israel's army was to operate in terms of the expectation of the positive sanction of victory rather than the negative sanction of defeat. Negative formal sanctions to overcome fear were less necessary in Israel's holy army because those who were afraid were asked to leave before the war began. Tactically, this meant a smaller but a more determined army. A commander knew the operational size of his battlefield forces before he went into battle. His forces expected victory, so they were less willing to run. Those who walked into battle expected to walk home victorious. The familiar negative sanctions to reduce the likelihood of flight under fire were less necessary.

An opposing commander was probably unaware of this aspect of Israel's tactics. A frontal assault on the line normally reduces most units' will to resist. But Israel's front lines would be different. Any foreign commander launching an assault on Israel's holy army in the expectation that normal defensive fear would work to his advantage would receive a lesson in defensive resistance. Israel's troops would be far less likely to break and run. The offensive army would suffer higher casualties than normal.

By fielding a smaller army of more determined troops, God would gain the glory. This is why he told Gideon to thin the ranks (Jud. 7:2). A smaller army was a better fighting force, man for man, than any rival army because of the Mosaic policy of allowing fearful men to go home before the battle began. The Israelite commander could better calculate the responses of his troops because the fear-ridden troops had gone home. This meant that the traditional problem for military tactics—how to keep non-rugged individualism from undermining the formation—was far less of a problem for Israel.

10. Ibid., p. 8.

Conclusion

The text makes it clear that the goal of sending the fearful man home was to keep fear from spreading in the ranks: “Let him go and return unto his house, lest his brethren’s heart faint as well as his heart” (v. 8). By removing the faint-hearted from the ranks before the battle began, the officers were able to minimize the spread of fear on the battlefield. They thereby increased the confidence of those under their authority. This increased the likelihood of victory . . . for a few good men and the God they represented. In a defensive war, it is far easier for the military to gain volunteers. Men know that their lives, their families, and their property are at stake. They are more likely to preserve their circumstances by joining the military than by fighting alone when the invaders arrive in force. In defensive wars, conscription is not necessary. In offensive wars, it is not legal.

LIMITS AGAINST EMPIRE

When thou comest nigh unto a city to fight against it, then proclaim peace unto it. And it shall be, if it make thee answer of peace, and open unto thee, then it shall be, that all the people that is found therein shall be tributaries unto thee, and they shall serve thee. And if it will make no peace with thee, but will make war against thee, then thou shalt besiege it: And when the LORD thy God hath delivered it into thine hands, thou shalt smite every male thereof with the edge of the sword: But the women, and the little ones, and the cattle, and all that is in the city, even all the spoil thereof, shalt thou take unto thyself; and thou shalt eat the spoil of thine enemies, which the LORD thy God hath given thee. Thus shalt thou do unto all the cities which are very far off from thee, which are not of the cities of these nations. But of the cities of these people, which the LORD thy God doth give thee for an inheritance, thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth: But thou shalt utterly destroy them; namely, the Hittites, and the Amorites, the Canaanites, and the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites; as the LORD thy God hath commanded thee: That they teach you not to do after all their abominations, which they have done unto their gods; so should ye sin against the LORD your God (Deut. 20:10–18).

The theocentric framework of these laws of military conquest is God's disinheritation of His enemies. This means God's dominion.

A. Disinheritance

This was a land law.¹ These rules of warfare no longer apply, because God's exclusive residence in one holy nation no longer applies. The temple is no more. Neither are captives to be brought back into the land as permanent slaves. The annulment of the jubilee land laws by the ministry of Jesus (Luke 4:17–21)² has annulled the permanent

1. On land laws, see Appendix J.

2. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

slaves law (Lev. 25:44–46).³

This passage is about disinheritance. First, the disinheritance of God's enemies could be by military action. It could involve their annihilation, as it was supposed to in Canaan, but that was a one-time event, as this passage also indicates. Those cities outside Canaan which made war against Israel would be dealt with differently from those cities inside Canaan which Israel made war against.

Second, disinheritance could be by subordination: a system of tribute, which can be monetary but can also be cultural. We see this in the modern West: a culture which once was confessionally Christian is now becoming increasingly pagan, yet it still sustains itself by drawing upon the ethical and cultural capital of Christianity. (The phrase “drawing down” might be more appropriate, as in drawing down a bank account.) The West pays covenantal tribute to God through its outward conformity to some of the laws of God. But as time goes on, it pays less and less tribute as it substitutes man's word for God's word. The problem it faces today is the same problem that faced a tributary in the ancient Near East: the vassal city that broke treaty with the regional monarch risked war, captivity, or annihilation. When the king's negative sanctions were finally imposed, they could be devastating.

Third, covenantal disinheritance could be by regeneration: bringing assets formerly devoted to other gods under the administration of a covenant-keeper. Ownership of the property does not change, but the legal status of the owner before God changes: from a disinherited son in Adam to an adopted son in Christ. This is the primary means of disinheritance in the New Testament era. It is the covenantal disinheritance of the old Adam and simultaneously the covenantal inheritance of the second Adam, Jesus Christ (I Cor. 15:45). It is the reclaiming of the world through the covenantal reclamation of the world's lawful owners. Whatever is under the legal authority of a regenerated individual is thereby brought under the hierarchical administration of Jesus Christ. This comprehensive reclamation project is what has been assigned to Christians by the Great Commission (Matt. 28:18–20).⁴

3. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 30.

4. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

B. The Whole Burnt Offering and Disinheritance

The Israelites were told to show no mercy to the nations inside Canaan's boundaries (Deut. 7:16). These nations had practiced such great evil that they had become abominations in the sight of God. "For all that do these things are an abomination unto the LORD: and because of these abominations the LORD thy God doth drive them out from before thee" (Deut. 18:12). The language of Deuteronomy 20:10–18 indicates that every domesticated animal inside the boundaries of Canaan was to be killed: "thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth." With respect to the first city to fall, Jericho, this law applied literally (Josh. 6:15–21). It did not apply literally to the other cities of Canaan. After the destruction of Jericho, the first city inside Canaan to be defeated, cattle became lawful spoils for the Israelites. "And thou shalt do to Ai and her king as thou didst unto Jericho and her king: only the spoil thereof, and the cattle thereof, shall ye take for a prey unto yourselves: lay thee an ambush for the city behind it" (Josh. 8:2). The word "breatheth" did not apply to Canaan's cattle; it applied to the human population. "And all the spoil of these cities, and the cattle, the children of Israel took for a prey unto themselves; but every man they smote with the edge of the sword, until they had destroyed them, neither left they any to breathe" (Josh. 11:14).

Jericho was the representative example of God's total wrath against covenant-breakers who follow their religious presuppositions to their ultimate conclusion: death.⁵ Jericho came under God's total ban: hormah.⁶ This was the equivalent of a whole burnt offering: almost all of it had to be consumed by fire. In the whole burnt offering, all of the beast was consumed on the altar (Lev. 1:9, 13) except for the skin, which went to the officiating priest (Lev. 7:8). Similarly, all of Jericho was burnt except for the precious metals, which went to the tabernacle as firstfruits (Josh. 6:24).⁷ Nevertheless, because God want-

5. King Solomon observed: "But he that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul: all they that hate me love death" (Prov. 8:36).

6. James B. Jordan, Judges: God's War Against Humanism (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Ministries, 1985), pp. 10–11. (<http://bit.ly/jjjudges>)

7. Achan had secretly appropriated some precious goods in Jericho. For this, he and his family was executed. This was also the equivalent of a whole burnt offering. Everything under his jurisdiction was burned at God's command (Josh. 7:15). This included even the precious metals that would otherwise have gone to the tabernacle (v. 24). The men were killed by stoning; then their remains were burned (v. 25). This points to the execution as a whole burnt offering: the animal had to be slain before it was placed on the altar. The remains of Jericho were a whole burnt offering; Achan

ed His people to reap the inheritance of the Canaanites, He allowed them to confiscate the cattle and precious goods of the other conquered Canaanite cities. This illustrated another important biblical principle of inheritance: “A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children’s children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just” (Prov. 13:22).⁸ Canaan’s capital, except in Jericho, was part of Israel’s lawful inheritance. The Canaanites had accumulated wealth; the Israelites were to inherit all of it. This comprehensive inheritance was to become a model of God’s total victory at the end of history. Their failure to exterminate the Canaanites, placing some of them under tribute instead (Josh. 16:10; 17:13), eventually led to the apostasy of Israel and the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities, just as Moses prophesied in this passage (vv. 17–18; cf. 7:1–5; 12:30–31).

The annihilation of every living soul in Canaan was mandatory. “And thou shalt consume all the people which the LORD thy God shall deliver thee; thine eye shall have no pity upon them: neither shalt thou serve their gods; for that will be a snare unto thee” (Deut. 7:16). This was a model of God’s final judgment. But it was a model in the same way that Jericho was a model: a one-time event. Jericho was to be totally destroyed, including the animals; this was not true of the other cities of Canaan. Similarly, the Canaanites were to be totally annihilated; this was not true of residents of cities outside Canaan. In this sense, Jericho was to Canaan what Canaan was to cities outside the land: a down payment (“earnest”) on God’s final judgment—final disinheritance—at the end of time. This earnest payment in history on the final disinheritance is matched by the earnest payment in history on the final inheritance. This is surely the case in spiritual affairs.⁹ Debates over eschatology are debates over the extent to which these earn-had covenanted with Jericho by preserving the remnants of Jericho’s capital. On the execution of Achan, see North, Boundaries and Dominion, Appendix A: “Sacrilege and Sanctions.”

8. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007]2012), ch. 41.

9. “That in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth; even in him: In whom also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will: That we should be to the praise of his glory, who first trusted in Christ. In whom ye also trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation: in whom also after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of promise, Which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of his glory” (Eph. 1:10–14).

est payments in history are also cultural and civilizational, and whether they image the final judgment, i.e., to what extent history is an earnest on eternity.¹⁰

C. Mosaic Law vs. Theocratic Empire

Those living outside the land were under different Mosaic rules of warfare. Their judgment in history would not have to be final. The Israelites had to offer a peace treaty to any foreign city prior to laying siege to it (v. 10). The theocentric principle here was that God offers a peace treaty to all men who are not yet formally under His authority. If men refuse to submit while this grace period is in force, they are doomed. This period of grace is history. “And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment” (Heb. 9:27).

Once Israel began its siege, history had run out for that city. It would no longer be able to extend the dominion of its gods. The gods of that city were placed under preliminary judgment by the siege. After the defeat, the gods of that city were buried. Some of the women and children would survive, but the city, its gods, and its culture would not. Once the siege began, God’s handwriting was figuratively on the city’s walls: it had been weighed in the balance and found wanting (Dan. 5:27). If Israel won, the city died. Once the siege began, it was not to be called off until the city was defeated. There might be temporary cease-fire agreements because of Israel’s temporary weakness, but once the treaty of tribute was rejected by a city, that city was doomed, according to God’s rules of warfare. Once the siege began, there could be no partial surrender, i.e., survival through paying tribute.¹¹

10. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

11. Biblically, God began His final siege of Satan’s city of man at Calvary. The church now lays siege to the city of man in history, for the latter represents the gates of hell. “And I say also unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it” (Matt. 16:18). The imagery of hell is that of a city under siege whose walls cannot indefinitely hold off the attackers. Because of the failure of the church constantly to maintain this siege, the city of man is occasionally offered temporary cease-fires. But once begun, Christianity’s siege against the city of man can never be called off. If it is incompletely sustained because of the Christians’ sin and weakness, it will later be strengthened. There is now no tributary peace treaty possible for the city of man, which refused to surrender while Christ walked the earth. The city of man will never be offered another opportunity to surrender and survive through paying tribute. Only one thing can bring relief: surrender through conversion, which is another way to destroy the city of man. The city’s final annihilation takes place after the final judgment (Rev. 20:14–15). Sin retards the ability of the church to complete the operation in history. Nevertheless, the city of man will

1. Tributary Surrender

Conditional mercy was initially offered to all those inside the walls if they surrendered before the siege began. The men could avoid a death sentence by surrendering, but there was a condition: tribute (v. 11). This is analogous to the restitution penalty owed by a thief. A lying thief who confesses before the trial begins pays a 20% penalty to the victim (Lev. 6:5);¹² if he waits until after it begins, he pays double (Ex. 22:4).¹³ Prior confession lowers the costs of civil justice; similarly, prior surrender lowers the cost of conflict on both sides of the city's walls, especially for the losing army.

This surrender by the men would bring all those under their authority under the same covenant of surrender. The tributary peace treaty would henceforth apply to all those inside the gates of the city. This treaty secured the survival of the foreign city's culture, for residents were not required to confess faith in God as a condition of the treaty. The Old Covenant principle of circumcision was that every male under the covenantal, household authority of an Israelite had to be circumcised (Gen. 17:12–13). Under the tributary treaty, foreign males did not have to be circumcised; this indicates that their defeat as a city-state did not place them under Abrahamic covenantal authority. They would merely pay tribute to Israel's civil government,¹⁴ as historically defeated sons of Adam, but they would not pay a tithe to Israel's priests.

There is no evidence from Scripture that such foreign military campaigns were recommended by the prophets. They were legal when governed by Mosaic law, but they were not to become high-priority activities in the life of Israel. The most famous case of a tributary nation to Israel was Moab, which revolted against Israel after Ahab died. But Ahab had been more of a foreign king than an Israelite king, with his priests of rival gods. His son Jehoram was evil, although he destroyed his father's image of Baal (II Kings 3:2). When Moab revolted against him, Jehoram called the king of Judah to help him subdue Moab. When the king of Judah asked Elisha to bless the campaign, Elisha said it was only for Judah's sake that he would do so (v. 14). The be visibly subdued in the final days, only to launch one final counter-attack (Rev. 20:7–9). Like Germany's Battle of the Bulge in late 1944, this counter-attack will fail.

12. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 7.

13. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion, ch. 45:E:2.

14. Solomon collected tribute as tax money (I Kings 4:6; 5:13–15).

campaign was initially successful, but when the king of Moab sacrificed his oldest son as a burnt offering on the wall of the city, this created indignation against Israel within the ranks of the alliance. The invading army broke up and went home (v. 27).

2. Survival Through Circumcision

This raises a major question regarding the siege: Could the men of a besieged city escape the final sanction of death by affirming the covenant and becoming circumcised? If they could, this raises the question regarding the creation of a theocratic empire through military expansion. I argue that a foreign city, once placed under siege, could surrender covenantally and thereby escape annihilation. The Mosaic law does not say this explicitly, but it does not authorize the destruction of an Israelite city unless that city had begun to worship foreign gods (Deut. 13:12–15). How could Israel lawfully annihilate a city of circumcised men who had thereby publicly affirmed their covenantal allegiance to God? By mass circumcision, the city would have been incorporated into God's covenant. On what legal basis could the siege be continued? Thus, I see no alternative but to conclude that Israel could have increased its borders through military action, or at least through defensive military action: chasing an invading army all the way home and then laying siege to its cities. There was a way of escape for a besieged city: surrender to the God of Israel through circumcision. Tithes and offerings to God's temple would then be substituted for the original offer of peace: tribute to Israel's civil government. But the city would not be what it had been. The old city, like the old Adam, would have been destroyed. Covenantal absorption into Israel was another way of destroying a foreign city's gods and culture.

Yet God did not tell Israel to extend His covenantal reign by means of war across boundaries, once Canaan had been conquered. The possibility existed that some cities might surrender through conversion, but the Mosaic law did not encourage this. In fact, it discouraged this. Israel faced three major barriers to the creation of a theocratic empire. The first was judicial: a foreign city could stop the creation of such an empire merely by surrendering before the siege began. The second was cultural: if it failed to surrender on these terms, after its defeat it would no longer survive as a city. The women and children who survived the siege were then brought under the authority of Israel's households (v. 14). In both cases, the city avoided becoming part of a theocratic empire. The third barrier was economic: to engage in a siege, Israelites had accepted the economic burden of the future victory: supporting large numbers of captive women and children. Furthermore, their wives would have to be willing to go along with this: new wives, new adopted children, new concubines, all of whom would dilute the inheritance of their own children. Israel was polygamous; a foreign war bride, conspicuous for her beauty (Deut. 21:11), would not have been welcomed with open arms by the wife back home. Built into Israel's social system was an unofficial veto of foreign wars. Furthermore, the economies and social systems of the ancient Near East did not support widespread slavery.¹⁵ Without Israel's permanent occupation of foreign cities, where the real estate could be used to fund the women and children taken captive, Israel could not afford to engage in foreign military conquests. The requirement that adult Israelite males attend all three annual feasts placed geographical limits on the extent of the conquest. The farther away a conquered city was from Jerusalem, the more expensive the trips to the annual feasts would be for its Israelite residents.

The issue of geography posed a major problem for the Mosaic law. The festival laws would have to be reworked if the theocratic kingdom expanded; otherwise, theocratic expansion would have been impossible. How could Jews residing in a distant city have attended the festivals every year? They couldn't. The larger the theocratic empire grew, the more impossible it would have been for all of the faithful to have walked to Jerusalem, let alone to have lodged there for a week. It seems likely that sometime after the Babylonian captivity, from which comparatively few Jews returned to Israel, the synagogue system replaced annual attendance at Passover. The Mosaic law's festival requirements no longer were enforced rigorously on faithful men as a condition of covenantal faithfulness. There was no longer a holy army in Israel; the nation was under the administration of foreign pluralistic empires.

I have argued in my commentary on Numbers that missionary activity always superseded the requirement that every Israelite male appear at Passover annually, let alone the other two annual feasts. Righteousness was more important than ritual precision in Mosaic Israel (I Chron. 30:18–20).¹⁶ Consider Paul's absence from the feasts. He

15. Isaac Mendelsohn, Slavery In the Ancient Near East (New York: Oxford University Press, 1949), p. 119.

16. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, stayed in Corinth for a year and a half, teaching in the synagogue (Acts 18:8–11). The author of Acts records that “we sailed away from Philippi after the days of unleavened bread, and came unto them to Troas in five days; where we abode seven days” (Acts 20:6). They had not been in Jerusalem for the Passover. They did not make it back to Jerusalem in time for the second Passover celebration for those who had been on journeys (Num. 9:11). Paul did try to get back to Jerusalem by Pentecost (Acts 20:16). Nevertheless, in front of the Jewish assembly, Paul announced: “Men and brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before God until this day” (Acts 23:1). No one called his assertion a lie on the basis of his failure to attend Passover.

3. Public Theology

Israel’s theology was public as no other ancient religion’s theology ever was. Foreign residents living inside Israel were invited to go to a central city every seventh year and hear the reading of the law (Deut. 31:10–12).¹⁷ Foreigners would have been in contact with their home cities, especially if they were involved in trade inside Israel. There would have been widespread international dissemination of knowledge regarding Israel’s legal order. Any foreign city that was unwise enough to goad Israel into an attack would have known in advance about Israel’s rules of siege warfare. Foreign rulers would have known two things: (1) it was suicide not to surrender before a siege began; (2) it was very expensive for Israel to lay a siege, both for time lost and the costs of assimilating the captives.

This system of constrained warfare would have created incentives for foreign rulers to find ways other than military invasion to get what they wanted out of Israel’s rulers. Israel would be unlikely to attack a foreign city without extreme provocation, such as an invasion of Israel’s territory. This fact would have tended to place a protective barrier around Israel’s borders in times of its military strength, yet at the same time, Israel’s military strength would not have become a major threat to foreign nations. Israel was under restrictions—military, marital, economic, and geographical-ritual—that would keep it a defensive power only. This meant that Israel’s military strength would have promoted foreign trade rather than foreign wars. Israel would have been too dangerous to invade militarily, yet too restricted by the Mosaic law 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), p. 122.

17. Chapter 75.

to invade on its own initiative. Israel was the original incarnation of President Theodore Roosevelt's famous rule of American foreign policy: "Speak softly and carry a big stick."¹⁸

This meant that in times when Israel was mighty, these laws reduced the likelihood that Israel would engage in a systematic program of territorial conquest. It was too difficult for Israel to retain captured territory. Israelites were required to keep separate from gentiles. Their food laws and other laws of ritual cleanliness forced this separation. Foreign cities were not places where Israelites who kept the Mosaic law would normally want to dwell. They might retain their separate identity as a captive people who were allowed to live under their own rules and leaders in ghettos, which most of them did from the Babylonian captivity until the nineteenth century, but they could not easily rule in foreign cities without breaking the Mosaic holiness laws, let alone the far more rigorous rabbinic holiness laws. Interaction with local gentiles was too restricted. So, their empire, if any, would have to be based on a system of tribute, not local law enforcement by resident Israelites. It would have been an empire of trade and taxes. Such far-flung empires are difficult to maintain without a strong military presence, or the threat of military reprisals, in the captive lands.¹⁹ This kind of foreign military presence was made difficult by the festival laws. It took their captivity outside the land to restructure the laws of the festivals. It took life in a foreign ghetto and submission to the civil laws of other gods. This restructuring was not the product of an Israelite empire; it was the product of non-Israelite empires.

A city in the ancient Near East, with its local gods, could become an empire only through the pluralism of idols. Israel alone could survive as a nation apart from a homeland without succumbing to pluralism, for Israel's God claimed universality and exclusivity. Such a claim negated the possibility of a common pantheon (all gods) of idols. But Israel could not become an empire because of the Mosaic laws of ritual separation; it could at most survive as a ghetto subculture in foreign lands. Only in nineteenth-century Europe (and always in the United States) did Jews escape life in the ghetto, entering into a world of Protestant religious pluralism, two centuries after Protestantism had faded

18. His aggressive foreign policy belied his words: America spoke loudly under his administration (1901–1909).

19. The British Empire was the greatest exception to this rule in the history of man. But if every British official had been forced to return to London every year to attend the equivalent of Passover, it is highly unlikely that the British Empire would have survived long.

as a theocratic ideal. In this world, few men spoke authoritatively in civil affairs in the name of a supernatural god, and those few who did, such as Holland's Abraham Kuyper, asked only for equal access for confessional Christians to state subsidies and privileges, such as tuition-free, state-certified education.²⁰ The gods of modernism have reigned nearly supreme in this culture, and Judaism went liberal and humanistic with unprecedented speed. By the mid-twentieth century, Reform Judaism could accurately be described as "Unitarianism, but with better business connections."

D. Women and Children

The siege law required that women and children be spared after the fall of the foreign city. All of the men were to be killed. There could be no mercy for male heads of household. Their execution would have automatically placed the surviving women and children under the Mosaic covenant. There was no way for widows and orphans to build a society. The children needed protection. Their mothers were in no position to provide this.²¹ The law did not allow defenseless survivors to be left behind by the Israelite army, to fend for themselves or die.

The text says that all the males were to be slain. Did this mean only the adults? Or were male children slain, too? Consider Israel's defeat of the Midianites, which took place outside Canaan. "And Moses said unto them, Have ye saved all the women alive? Behold, these caused the children of Israel, through the counsel of Balaam, to commit trespass against the LORD in the matter of Peor, and there was a plague among the congregation of the LORD. Now therefore kill every male among the little ones, and kill every woman that hath known man by lying with him. But all the women children, that have not known a man by lying with him, keep alive for yourselves" (Num. 31:15–18). The text here does not say. My assumption is that the text would require this if God demanded it.

The outcome of the siege had disinherited that society. Without any surviving male leadership, there could be no transfer of covenantal civil authority to the next generation. The war had destroyed generational continuity. Thus, all of the captives had to be integrated into Israel. This meant either adoption, including marriage, or enslavement on a massive scale. Deuteronomy 21:10–14 sets forth the laws of marital adoption for foreign military widows. Those who became permanent slaves (Lev. 25:44–46) and those who became wives were brought under the household authority of their new husbands. In lieu of being circumcised, the prospective wives first had to shave their heads (Deut. 21:12). This was a sign of their enforced transfer of authority from their old households to new ones. It marked a covenantal transformation. This transformation was not necessarily confessional; it was geographical and institutional. The woman was removed from her surroundings and taken back to Israel (v. 12), where she was to mourn her father (dead) and mother (dead or taken captive)—but not her late husband—for a month (v. 13). Her former gods had perished in the total defeat of her city and the death of her husband and father. These gods had no jurisdiction apart from the city that had been built in their name.

20. Frank Vanden Berg, Abraham Kuyper: A Biography (St. Catharines, Ontario: Paideia, [1960] 1978), ch. 20.

21. This is why widows, orphans, and strangers were the three groups repeatedly identified in the Mosaic law as deserving of legal protection and special consideration.

By carrying women and children back to Israel, the warriors either enslaved or adopted the survivors. In both instances, the survivors came under the jurisdiction of an Israelite household. The survivors would henceforth live under a hierarchy that confessed the God of Moses. There was no religious pluralism allowed in any Israelite household (Deut. 13:6–11). Thus, warfare was a form of evangelism through household subordination. The victorious warriors had no choice in this matter. They were not allowed to kill defenseless women and children. To leave them behind to starve in a city without husbands would have been a form of impersonal execution. Such a deserted city would have become a target for invasion, rape, and enslavement to other cities' gods. This was not allowed. If women and children were to be enslaved, the God of the Bible would be the master of their new households. Counting the costs of warfare meant counting the costs of victory.

E. Immigration and Assimilation

The gods of the fallen city had been definitively disinherited, but traces of their cultural influence would survive in the captives' outlook and practices. War brides and older children would bring memories and habits formed under the covenantal administration of idols. Many aspects of this covenantal legacy would have to be modified or completely overcome. This would not be an overnight transformation.

The primary means of breaking these habits was language. Immigrants had to learn a new tongue. Cultures are maintained and developed through language. The final death of a culture occurs only when no one is left who speaks its language and confesses its doctrines. The immigrant must think in new patterns and categories. He must learn a new grammar and vocabulary. A subtle transformation of a person's thought takes place through language. An immigrant speaks with an accent; young children raised in a new society do not. The mark of assimilation is their lack of an accent. Accents are more than inflections of the tongue; they are ways of thinking and acting. The goal was to remove every trace of foreign accents in the cultural-confessional sense. In this sense, assimilation meant conversion.

Discipline was the second major area of transformation. This would have manifested itself most continually in work. The immigrant's daily schedules would have changed, although in an agricultural economy with a low division of labor, most of life's basic tasks would have been familiar across national borders. There would be different ways of getting things done, but the same sorts of things would have to get done as had to get done in the old country. By working differently, people adapt to new environments. The cause-and-effect pattern of work—planting and reaping—is a major form of discipline, to which are added the institutional carrot and stick.

The third area of transformation was dietary. The newcomers would be forced to change the eating habits of a lifetime. This is a discontinuity so great that few people can ever achieve it voluntarily, as evidenced by myriads of diet plans that produce only handfuls of permanently thin people in the West. The newcomers' diets would remind them daily that they were in a new land and living a new way of life. The clean-unclean distinctions in Israel would have forced the newcomers to regard some of their familiar delicacies as abominations—abominations that testified to theological and moral abominations in the world they had left behind. Their former way of life could not be manifested at mealtime. Most of their former foods would have been present in Israel, but not the meat-based specialties. The taste of food is governed by preparation. Men express their cultures through taste. Things would never taste the same again. Like the sense of smell, we cannot remember what things taste like until we actually place them in our mouths. New tastes, especially for children, would daily block out old memories.

Celebration and liturgy were also important. Play and formal worship are not full-time endeavors. They are scheduled for certain special times. They mark a society.²² But in an agricultural society, the law and its sanctions are more readily assimilated through work than through play or liturgy.

The subtle nuances of a culture reflect an identifiable outlook. Work, eating, celebration, and formal worship are the primary activities of life, especially in an economy with a low division of labor. The newcomers would have to learn a new language, learn to enjoy new foods, learn new songs, and learn new confessions and laws. Language and work—word and deed—would have encompassed most of the daily life of the immigrant. It was here that the assimilation process would have been most comprehensive and rapid.

F. Evangelism After the Captivity

The development of a theocratic empire was virtually impossible for Israel under the Mosaic law. The annual festivals would have limited the geographical scope of the empire. The festivals made impossible the full-time occupation of distant foreign cities. Only after the return from Babylon, when Israel no longer was an armed holy army, could dispersion of the Israelite population take place. Evangelism by word and deed was to replace evangelism by post-war enslavement.

The fact that attendance at the annual festivals was no longer enforced by excommunication after the return from Babylon is prima facie evidence that the required festivals had something to do with Israel as a holy army. Annual attendance was no longer enforced because it was no longer required. This indicates that the mandatory nature of the festivals was God's deliberate restraint on the creation of an empire. When that threat disappeared in history, so did the requirement of attendance at each of the festivals. Israel could then evangelize by word and deed. Evangelism was clearly more important than the original Mosaic requirement of annual attendance. Until Israel sheathed its sword, it could not evangelize the world. This judicial alteration has been formalized by the New Covenant: "And, behold, one of them which were with Jesus stretched out his hand, and drew his sword, and struck a servant of the high priest's, and smote off his ear. Then said Jesus unto him, Put up again thy sword into his place: for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword" (Matt.

22. Modern Western society is so heavily entertainment-oriented and so minimally liturgical that entertainment has virtually replaced liturgy in the lives of millions of people. Not without cause is the television set referred to as the one-eyed god.

26:51–52).

The laws mandating the annual festivals were suspended during the Babylonian captivity and then permanently modified after the partial return of the remnant of Israel to the land. We do not know what the new laws of the festivals were, but we know that the rigorous Mosaic festival laws were no longer enforced. This lack of enforcement made possible evangelism through the Jews' resettlement. The religious pluralism of the pagan empires made possible Israel's evangelization of gentiles, for it opened the gates of every city to citizens of every other city. To take advantage of this opportunity, God silently accepted the priesthood's revocation of mandatory attendance at each annual feast. He did not bring negative sanctions against either the priests or the nation for non-attendance at some festivals.

After the return from Babylon, Israel's evangelism—proselytizing—involved the establishment of local synagogues throughout the cities of the successive empires. There was no longer any holy army in Israel; therefore, its troops would no longer march to Jerusalem three times a year. With no army, there was no way for Jews to besiege a city. Therefore, the laws of the siege treaty were silently annulled. Instead, Jews invaded foreign cities through trade, relocation, and synagogue-building. They penetrated enemy strongholds by means of the new pluralism of the empires: Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Hellenistic, and Roman. Cities would henceforth be penetrated by walking through open gates. The saving message of the God of Abraham could be preached openly. With economic footholds inside foreign cities, there was no longer any need to threaten annihilation of a foreign city's army should the city not surrender in advance of the siege by agreeing to pay tribute. Israel no longer had either the military power or the ecclesiastical need to issue such a threat. Evangelism by trade, preaching, and synagogue-building replaced evangelism by siege, enslavement, and war-bride adoption. The New Testament church inherited these post-Babylonian techniques of evangelism. The Mosaic laws authorizing the siege treaty had long since been annulled by the Babylonian captivity and its aftermath. The old laws were not formally annulled. But accepted practices in Jesus' day indicate the extent of the changes.²³

Conclusion

A foreign war was to be a rare occurrence in the life of Mosaic Israel. The costs of such warfare, which included the costs of victory, were high. The benefits, apart from tribute, were low. Warfare could be Israel's means of evangelizing the survivors of a siege, but this would not have included males. It was only partial evangelism. The foreign war was a form of inheritance/disinheritance. The city itself would have to be destroyed unless left intact for other nations to inherit, since the festival laws made occupation by Israel unlikely. The wives and children of the disinherited city would become part of the inheritance of Israel. But this living inheritance had to be capitalized to make it productive: by providing training, food, shelter, and even adoption through marriage. There were high costs for warrior families in the assimilation process. Slavery was not a widespread institution in the ancient Near East, unlike classical Greece and Rome.

23. A major one: the absence of family members at the Last Supper.

The creation of pluralistic pagan empires made possible the peaceful extension of God's kingdom in history. Their pluralism gave equal access to all submissive religions. In these covenantal conflicts among competing religions, biblical religion triumphed. The cacophony of competing religious and philosophical claims, coupled with the breakdown of classical ethics and philosophy, eventually undermined the moral confession of the Roman empire, and in so doing, undermined the civil authority of Rome.²⁴ Christian civilization, with its non-pluralistic confession, replaced Rome's pluralism²⁵ in the West. This new civilization came into existence in the fourth century and lasted for over a thousand years until the Renaissance's revival of classical religion's occultism²⁶ and its art and literature,²⁷ followed by the Enlightenment's revival of religious pluralism.

This revival of paganism's religious pluralism represents a revival of the civil religion of the Near Eastern and European empires: "all nations under god"—the god of the centralized bureaucratic state. Its promised new world order challenges Christ's new world order. It cannot succeed: "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom

24. Charles Norris Cochrane, Christianity and Classical Culture: A Study of Thought and Action from Augustus to Augustine (New York: Oxford University Press, [1944] 1957). (<http://bit.ly/cnccacc>)

25. Appendix C.

26. Frances Yates, Giordano Bruno and the Hermetic Tradition (University of Chicago Press, 1964); Stephen McKnight, Sacralizing the Secular: The Renaissance Origins of Modernity (Baton Rouge, Louisiana: LSU Press, 1989).

27. Jacob Burckhardt, The Civilization of the Renaissance in Italy (New York: Penguin, [1860] 1990), Part 3.

shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever. Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it brake in pieces the iron, the brass, the clay, the silver, and the gold; the great God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter: and the dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure" (Dan. 2:44–45).

If a besieged city visibly converted to God through circumcision, would its inhabitants then have been required to march to the festivals? Only if its adult males became citizens of Israel, meaning that they became eligible to join Israel's holy army. They could not become eligible to serve as judges if they did not make these annual marches. If proselytes who lived outside the land were not part of Israel's holy army, then they were not required to attend the annual feasts. This was the case of Jews living outside the land during and after the captivity. This meant that Israel could not create an empire through military action. Cities outside the land that converted to faith in the God of Abraham did not thereby become a part of Israel's army or of Israel's civil structure. They could not subsequently march against other cities and thereby pull national Israel into a conflict far from its original borders. These proselyte cities would pay their tithes to the Levites, but they could not legally extend Israel's authority beyond the boundaries of the land which God had promised Abraham. They could extend God's authority, but not national Israel's. The distance from the official festival city made empire impossible.

FRUIT TREES AS COVENANTAL TESTIMONIES

When thou shalt besiege a city a long time, in making war against it to take it, thou shalt not destroy the trees thereof by forcing an axe against them: for thou mayest eat of them, and thou shalt not cut them down (for the tree of the field is man's life) to employ them in the siege: Only the trees which thou knowest that they be not trees for meat, thou shalt destroy and cut them down; and thou shalt build bulwarks against the city that maketh war with thee, until it be subdued (Deut. 20:19–20).

This was a law governing holy warfare. The theocentric issue here is related to the forbidden tree in the garden: boundaries. Boundaries are an aspect of point three of the biblical covenant.¹

A. Trees and the Dominion Covenant

This law applied to the people of Israel when they were operating as an army outside the boundaries of the Promised Land. This creates a problem of interpretation. Was this law bounded by the Mosaic covenant? Yes. Does it still apply today? Not strategically. This makes it a land law.² Armies today are not required by God to maintain a siege until the enemy surrenders. Under the Mosaic covenant, they were. “And if it will make no peace with thee, but will make war against thee, then thou shalt besiege it: And when the LORD thy God hath delivered it into thine hands, thou shalt smite every male thereof with the edge of the sword” (Deut. 20:12–13).³ Also, this law no longer applies tactically. Enemy nations no longer can hide inside walled cities. There are no more walled cities. Gunpowder removed them centuries ago.

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012).

2. On land laws, see Appendix J.

3. Chapter 48.

But there is one aspect of this law that does still hold: the role of fruit-bearing trees in the dominion covenant.

There is a hierarchy in the dominion covenant: God > man > nature. In this hierarchy, man serves God, while nature serves man. God is not dependent on either man or nature. Man is dependent on both God and nature. Man reflects God as a unique creature who is made in God's image. He rules over nature because he is different from nature: made in God's image. But he is also a creature. He is part of an interdependent creation. He is required by God to acknowledge his two-way dependence and his two-way responsibility: upward and downward.

This law of warfare reminded man that fruit-bearing trees sustain man's life. For this reason, they must not be used to impose man's death. Man relies on fruit-bearing trees to sustain his life and make his life more pleasant; they, in turn, are heavily dependent on man for their cultivation. They can exist apart from man in some environments, but man's care makes them flourish. There is mutual interdependence between man and fruit-bearing trees.

This law makes it clear that holy warfare is not just a means of inflicting death and destruction. It is a means of extending life. Holy warfare is not destruction for destruction's sake. It is destruction for God's sake. There is an element of disinheritance in war, but it is always to be offset by an element of inheritance.

B. Laying Siege

Once begun, the siege of a foreign city was supposed to be completed. "Only the trees which thou knowest that they be not trees for meat, thou shalt destroy and cut them down; and thou shalt build bulwarks against the city that maketh war with thee, until it be subdued" (v. 20). When a city refused to covenant with God by surrendering to Israel's holy army, it was doomed unless it covenanted with God by surrendering to Israel's holy priesthood. Unless the men surrendered to God through mass circumcision, all of them would be executed after their defense ended (Deut. 20:13).⁴ Once they had been placed under the formal negative sanctions of God, the men of a besieged city were not to be allowed to escape this judgment apart from their complete covenantal surrender. Partial surrender was no longer an option.

4. Chapter 48:C:2.

This meant that the Israelite army had no choice: it had to maintain the siege until the city fell. This placed a great deal of pressure on the army's commander to find techniques to break through the city's defenses. He might be tempted to cut down all of the trees in the region to use as siege implements. They could be used as siege implements in five ways: as battering rams, as siege towers, as scraping implements to undermine the walls from tunnels dug beneath the walls, as tunnel supports, and to build ladders to scale the walls. Military historian Horst de la Croix wrote that "the basic siege methods—battering, sapping, mining, scaling—. . . will remain the same throughout the ages."⁵ Trees could be used as firewood. The longer that the siege went on, the more depleted the countryside would become. Fruit-bearing trees would become more valuable.

The language of the text is clear: the reason why the fruit-bearing trees were protected was that man's life is maintained by these trees. These trees would provide food for Israel's troops. This pointed to the possibility that the siege might last for several seasons. The commander was to acknowledge that he and his men might be there a long time. They were allowed to eat from these trees. A commander who was conducting a winter campaign knew that his army might still be there in spring and summer. Israel's army was to acknowledge that the extension of God's kingdom sometimes takes longer than covenant-keepers would prefer. The siege might take years. The fruit trees would provide a blessing in the time of the harvest. It would be short-sighted to cut them down. It would contribute to a short-run mentality: "If we can't starve these people out in one season or less, it will be time to go home." God was telling the army that they had to stay there and wait until that city surrendered.

The fruit trees would sometimes have been visible from the walls of the city. The defenders watching on the walls could report back to their officers that the Israelites still had not cut down the fruit trees. This information would have undermined confidence in the leaders of the city. The Israelites were not intending to go home soon. They were prepared to sit and wait for as long as it took to defeat the city. This meant that the Israelites were determined to win. They were willing to invest whatever amount of time it would take to starve out the city. Meanwhile, they would feast on the fruit of the field.

5. Horst de la Croix, Military Considerations in City Planning: Fortifications (New York: George Braziller, 1972), p. 18.

C. The Imagery of the Siege

The trees were outside the boundaries of the city's wall. This wall kept the residents of the city from feasting on the trees that provided life. In relation to the trees, the city's wall was a defensive boundary for the Israelite army. Israel used swords to keep the defiant residents of the city away from the fruit trees that had once sustained them and delighted them. Because the city had not surrendered to Israel when the peace treaty was offered, the men of that city would never again taste the fruit of those trees. The symbolism is obvious: this was analogous to the fiery sword that kept men away from the tree of life in the garden.

Yet the tree of life will again grow in the midst of a garden: the city-garden of the new heaven and new earth. "In the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river, was there the tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month: and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations" (Rev. 22:3). The barrier between covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers will become absolute. "And beside all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed: so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us, that would come from thence" (Luke 16:26). The question facing covenant-breaking man is this: Can he somehow cross the barrier to gain access to the tree of life? That was the question facing the men of the besieged city. The answer was yes, but only through covenantal conformity to God through circumcision. They could bring the city under God's protection. They could become Israelites: adopted sons. There was no other way that they would ever again feast on the fruit of the trees that lay outside the walls if Israel obeyed God's laws of warfare.

The imagery here was not of a circumscribed garden separated from the world by a wall. On the contrary, the imagery was a walled enclosure in which death was sure, surrounded by a world in which fruit was sweet. The kingdom of God lay outside the walls of the city; it was defended by the army of God. The kingdom of covenant-breaking man was surrounded. It was under siege. It was strictly defensive. Life lay beyond the walls of the city. The men enclosed by those walls could not gain access to life. The walls that temporarily sustained them from death by the sword also kept them away from the trees of life. Their enemies would feast on the fruit while they, determined not to surrender on terms acceptable to God, would not again taste such fruit.

Their enemies would inherit.

D. Hope in the Future

Trees that were visible from the walls testified to those inside the walls that there was hope available, but not on their covenantal terms. There was one way of surrender. The men could circumcise themselves and their sons. They would then throw open the gates of the city to the holy army. They would plead immunity through self-inflicted covenantal wounds. There was risk, of course. The Shechemites had done this, and they had been slaughtered by two sons of Israel (Gen. 34:25). But this had been a great evil for which Jacob was greatly upset. “And Jacob said to Simeon and Levi, Ye have troubled me to make me to stink among the inhabitants of the land, among the Canaanites and the Perizzites: and I being few in number, they shall gather themselves together against me, and slay me; and I shall be destroyed, I and my house” (v. 30).

Could those people inside the boundary provided by the wall trust the Israelites not to take advantage of them? Would Israel obey God’s law? There was a visible test of Israel’s commitment to God’s law: fruit trees. If the fruit trees were still standing, then Israel was still honoring God’s law. This meant two things: (1) the army of God was dug in for the long haul; (2) there was still hope for the city. Mass circumcision could still gain mercy from the invaders. But the men of the city would have to undergo pain. They would also have to surrender: open gates. They could no longer safely put their trust in walls and gates.

On the other hand, if the fruit trees had been cut down, there was hope of survival in terms of the city’s old covenant. This Israelite army was visibly a short-term army. It had not honored God’s law. It was willing to consume the trees that would feed it in due season. Here was a reason for those inside the walls to continue their resistance. Why surrender to an army that was there only for the short haul? Resistance offered hope. Surrendering to such an army would be foolish. Such an army was ruthless with life-giving trees; it would probably be ruthless with defenders. Every man inside the city would die. Better to resist to the last man. Better to threaten unacceptable losses for an army that was not there for the long haul, one that was not committed to victory in terms of God’s law.

Which would it be: surrender to God or continued resistance? Which was the wiser course of action? Circumcision might bring permanent peace or it might bring a slaughter. Resistance might bring a military slaughter or it might bring terms of surrender for tribute's sake, the way that some of the Canaanites survived Israel's program of genocide (Josh. 16:10; 17:13). Fruit-bearing trees provided evidence. If they were still standing, this army was serious about God's law. If they had been cut down, this army was not serious about obeying God. It would then be too risky to surrender by mass circumcision. It might be safer to resist longer, hoping for terms of peace based on tribute.

E. Inheritance and Foreign Policy

By allowing the fruit-bearing trees to survive, the army was maintaining the value of the land. For land located close to Israel's borders, this decision would have capitalized Israel's inheritance. It left intact an agricultural inheritance. But for land located far from Israel, the income stream provided by the trees could not be capitalized by Israel. The trees were too far from Jerusalem. The journey to the festivals would be too long. The army dared not annex the city.

The adult male residents of the besieged city had to be executed, apart from conversion through circumcision. The women and children had to be brought back to Israel. Who would then take care of the trees? After all, the trees were wealth. If left undefended, such wealth would serve as a beacon: "Come and get it!" A neighboring nation would not leave such wealth to rot. It would invade the empty region. The trees would provide capital for the invaders. This meant that another nation with other gods would inherit what Israel had temporarily conquered. This would bring the invading nation closer to Israel's borders. Therefore, a major foreign policy consideration in deciding whether to place a city under siege was who its neighbors were. If the city bordered a strong nation that could pose a threat to Israel, it would be unwise for Israel to lay siege to it. Why waste Israel's resources in a military operation that might expose the nation to greater danger later on? A short-term military success might be followed by a long-term military disaster. Why strengthen your enemies? Solution: call off the siege before beginning it.

Such a foreign policy would have reduced the risks to short-term raiders who could raid the fringes of Israel's borders without the threat of a siege of their cities, but it would also have reduced the likelihood of full-scale invasion. Weaker cities would have bordered Israel. They might constitute an annoyance to those tribes whose land was on the borders, but these invaders would not have constituted a major threat to the nation.

The preservation of the besieged city's fruit-bearing trees forced foreign policy considerations on Israel. It forced Israel's leaders to count the long-term costs of war. The farther away the city, the less economic incentive there was to conquer it. The more powerful the city's neighbors, the less economic incentive for Israel to lay siege to it. Only if the city submitted to God through circumcision would beginning a siege make sense, and then only in retrospect. This was a high-risk military decision: once the siege began, the decision-making authority to determine who would inherit the fruit trees would move from Israel to the besieged city. Even if Israel won, knocked down the walls, and burned the city, those trees would still be standing: a standing testimony to the fruitfulness of a now-empty land. The land would not stay empty for long.

F. Ecology and Inheritance

This law had ecological implications. The presence of fruit-bearing trees had implications for birds and other fruit-eating beasts of the field. The ecology of the land was to be honored by the invading Israelite army; they were not to become destroyers.

As far as the adult male residents of the besieged city were concerned, the ecological care shown by the Israelites constituted a guaranteed death sentence on the city. The Israelites' care for God's land meant annihilation for the men of the city. The Israelites were caring for God's land, which meant that they would obey God's law. God's law told them not to pull back from the siege: "Thou shalt build bulwarks against the city that maketh war with thee, until it be subdued" (v. 20b). By extending life to the fruit-bearing trees, Israel's army was extending a death sentence on the city's adult males.

The general ecological principle announced by this text, namely, that "the tree of the field is man's life," becomes narrowly applied in the context of a siege. The tree of the field is not covenant-breaking man's life. Covenant-breaking man is now locked inside the walls of his city. He may be able to see life from the walls of the city, but he cannot gain access to it. The trees of the field would become life for the covenant-keeping army that was laying siege. The trees would sustain life for the city's executioners. The life-sustaining properties of the fruit would increase the likelihood of the death of the trees' former owners. That which had sustained life would now indirectly threaten life. This was a matter of inheritance. The Israelite army had inherited the means of life. The forthcoming disinheritance of the men inside the city's walls would now be made even more likely.

A preservationist ecology in the context of God's covenant lawsuit against evil offers life to covenant-keepers and death to covenant-breakers. The benefits of a preservationist ecology must therefore be discussed within the covenantal framework of history. This raises the issue of eschatology. If history brings progressive defeat to covenant-keepers and victory to covenant-breakers, then a preservationist ecology leaves God's enemies as the inheritors. By sustaining the productivity of the earth, the covenant-keeper provides an inheritance to future generations. But if these future generations maintain the ethics of the pre-Flood world or pre-conquest Canaan, then God, through ecological preservation and capitalization by covenant-keepers, will someday offer to His enemies "houses full of all good things, which thou filledst not, and wells digged, which thou diggedst not, vineyards and olive trees, which thou plantedst not; when thou shalt have eaten and be full" (Deut. 6:11). The displacement of covenant-keepers can happen, of course, but only as God's covenantal curse on His people: "Thou shalt plant vineyards, and dress them, but shalt neither drink of the wine, nor gather the grapes; for the worms shall eat them" (Deut. 28:39). But is such a curse permanent in history? Does it characterize covenantal inheritance and disinheritance in history? No.

And it shall come to pass, when all these things are come upon thee, the blessing and the curse, which I have set before thee, and thou shalt call them to mind among all the nations, whither the LORD thy God hath driven thee, And shalt return unto the LORD thy God, and shalt obey his voice according to all that I command thee this day, thou and thy children, with all thine heart, and with all thy soul; That then the LORD thy God will turn thy captivity, and have compassion upon thee, and will return and gather thee from all the nations, whither the LORD thy God hath scattered thee. If any of thine be driven out unto the outmost parts of heaven, from thence will the LORD thy God gather thee, and from thence will he fetch thee: And the LORD thy God will bring thee into the land which thy fathers possessed, and thou shalt possess it; and he will do thee good, and multiply thee above thy fathers. And the LORD thy God will circumcise thine heart, and the heart of thy seed, to love the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, that thou mayest live. And the LORD thy God will put all these curses upon thine en- emies, and on them that hate thee, which persecuted thee. And thou shalt return and obey the voice of the LORD, and do all his commandments which I command thee this day. And the LORD thy God will make thee plenteous in every work of thine hand, in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy land, for good: for the LORD will again rejoice over thee for good, as he rejoiced over thy fathers: If thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to keep his commandments and his statutes which are written in this book of the law, and if thou turn unto the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul (Deut. 30:1–10).⁶

G. New Testament Applications

Unlike all other Mosaic laws, this law was applicable only outside the boundaries of the land. Inside, there could be no mercy shown. This law was not a cross-boundary law;⁷ it was a law governing Israel's relations with gentiles in their land. The general principle of this law holds true in every era: "The tree of the field is man's life." Because the general principle is true, this law continues to be in force. What is no longer in force, however, is siege warfare. New technologies have replaced it. Men no longer lay siege to walled cities. The West's importation of Chinese gunpowder ended that ancient military strategy in the fifteenth century: artillery ended the military benefits of city walls. Walled communities have become popular inside crime-ridden cities, but no organized enemy lays continuous siege to them. Also, military units may build defensive barriers, but these units are not cities.

This law is not a law governing the use of explosives. Fruit trees may be destroyed by an artillery barrage or a bombing raid, but this is not the same as using the trees as weapons of war. Also, this is not a law against using chemical defoliants that open up terrain so that enemies cannot hide. The context of the Mosaic law of the siege was an immobile city facing a dug-in army.

In the medieval era, this law would have applied to a siege. There were walled cities and castles. Armies did come and lay siege to them. They did cut down trees to use as weapons of war. These invading armies should have honored the Mosaic law of the fruit trees.

6. If taken literally, this implies that the Islam's conquest of North Africa in the seventh century will not be maintained indefinitely. I take it literally.

7. On cross-boundary laws, see Appendix J.

Conclusion

The invading Israelite army was to honor God's law of ecology. This was not for the benefit of the covenant-breakers who were trapped inside their own defensive walls, nor was it for their heirs, who would be carried back to Israel. This was for the benefit of the army itself during the siege and also for those foreign invaders who would occupy the land after the Israelites returned home. These inheritors would be one of three groups, if the Israelite army obeyed God's law: (1) the Israelites themselves, but only if the city was close to Israel's border; (2) the city's existing inhabitants, but only if they submitted to circumcision, becoming Israelites through adoption; (3) the invading army that would march into the unoccupied land after Israel's army had departed. Which outcome was best for Israel? The covenantal surrender of the city was best. The residents would henceforth pay a tithe to the Levites. Better that men worship God than that they die in their sins. Better that they surrender unconditionally to God while His siege is still in progress than that they die in the post-siege mass execution. God told Ezekiel: "But if the wicked will turn from all his sins that he hath committed, and keep all my statutes, and do that which is lawful and right, he shall surely live, he shall not die. All his transgressions that he hath committed, they shall not be mentioned unto him: in his righteousness that he hath done he shall live. Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die? saith the Lord GOD: and not that he should return from his ways, and live?" (Ezek. 18:21–23).

This Mosaic law of the siege is still in force. The invading army is not to cut down productive trees or, by extension, burn the crops. Warriors are supposed to battle warriors. The idea that warriors are deliberately to wage war on undefended civilians as a way to weaken the opposing army is a perverse strategy. It is also a basic strategy of modern warfare, beginning with the American Civil War: General Sherman's march to the sea in 1864–65 and General Sheridan's burning of crops in the Shenandoah Valley. These were evil precedents that led to the horrors of World War II's bombing of civilian populations.

DOUBLE PORTION, DOUBLE BURDEN

If a man have two wives, one beloved, and another hated, and they have born him children, both the beloved and the hated; and if the firstborn son be hers that was hated: Then it shall be, when he maketh his sons to inherit that which he hath, that he may not make the son of the beloved firstborn before the son of the hated, which is indeed the firstborn: But he shall acknowledge the son of the hated for the firstborn, by giving him a double portion of all that he hath: for he is the beginning of his strength; the right of the firstborn is his (Deut. 21:15–17).

The theocentric focus of this law is inheritance: point five of the biblical covenant. It also has to do with boundaries: point three of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. Legitimate Disinheritance: Full or Partial

How much property should specific heirs inherit? What can one heir lawfully lay claim to? What can he exclude from the other heir's possession? The judicial issue here is boundaries. The eldest son inherited a double portion. Why? If we can discover the underlying moral principle here, we can better understand inheritance.

The degree of service owed by someone to another person or group is always proportional to the amount of capital provided for him by the person or group to whom the service is owed. Jesus warned: "And that servant, which knew his lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia, [1994] 2012).

much, of him they will ask the more" (Luke 12:47–48).²

1. Inheritance and Responsibility

The fact that more was given to the firstborn son meant that more would be required from him. Capital was promised to him by his father; thus, I conclude that he would owe his father and mother services proportional to the promised inheritance. No biblical text says this specifically, but it can be inferred from the principle of mutual obligation.

How did this inheritance system work? Rushdoony described it: "The general rule of inheritance was limited primogeniture, i.e., the oldest son, who had the duty of providing for the entire family in case of need, or of governing the clan, receiving a double portion. If there were two sons, the estate was divided into three portions, the younger son receiving one-third."³

The immediate context of this law was the law governing war brides, although the principle of inheritance that is stated here applied beyond the war bride. It applied to Israel as a society that allowed polygamy. It was a land law.⁴

An Israelite warrior was allowed to bring home a woman from a defeated foreign city. In fact, these women had to be brought home. They would not be able to defend themselves if they stayed behind. The question was: Would they become permanent slaves or wives? That is, would they be adopted through marriage? If the captive woman consented to marry an Israelite by paring her fingernails, shaving her head, and mourning for her parents for a month (Deut. 21:12–13), it was legal for him to marry her.⁵ Immediately following these laws is the law of the double portion.

The eldest son had to receive the double portion under Mosaic law. This implied that he was to bear a double portion of responsibility in caring for his aged parents. But a father could lawfully disinherit a rebellious son if he had the backing of a covenantal authority. This disinheritance could be accomplished through the civil imposition of physical death, as the very next section of Deuteronomy indicates

2. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

3. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 180.

4. On land laws, see Appendix J.

5. Chapter 48:C.

(21:18–23).⁶ It could also be accomplished through the ecclesiastical imposition of covenantal death. Excommunication under the Mosaic law removed a man's eligibility to serve in God's holy army. This, in turn, removed his citizenship and his inheritance in the land. Strangers could not inherit rural land, and an excommunicated man was a stranger, i.e., cut off from God's people.

2. Disinherited Firstborn Sons

The eldest son was to inherit a double portion. Nevertheless, the history of the patriarchs reveals something very different in practice: either full disinheritance or a single-portion inheritance of the first-born son. This began with Adam, who rebelled against God, his father. Adam covenanted with Satan through the serpent by sharing a forbidden covenantal meal with his wife. He violated the boundary of death that God had placed around the forbidden tree. This covenantal act cost him his life. Through grace, however, God granted Adam and Eve time on earth to work out the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:26–28).⁷

Adam had two sons, Cain and Abel. Cain was the firstborn (Gen. 4:1). He was evil. His sacrifice was not acceptable to God (v. 5). He then slew his younger brother. Through grace, God extended Cain's life (v. 15), but He removed Cain from the covenant line. A third son, Seth, youngest of all, replaced Cain as the heir through which the promised seed (Gen. 3:15) would come (Luke 3:38).

Noah had three sons. The eldest was Shem (Gen. 6:10). Shem's line was the covenant line. This indicates that he had been a righteous man who did not warrant disinheritance. But Shem's first two sons did not extend the covenant line; Arphaxad, the third son, did (Gen. 10:24).

Abraham had two sons. The elder, Ishmael, was disinherited by Abraham because he mocked Isaac (Gen. 21:9), who was the true heir of God's promise (Gen. 17:16). Isaac was the second-born son.

Isaac had two sons. The elder, Esau, sold his inheritance to his brother, Jacob, for a mess of pottage (Gen. 25:33).⁸ God had already promised Rebekah that the heirs of the elder son would serve the heirs of the younger (v. 23). That is, the covenant line would be through Jacob, not Esau.⁹ Jacob gained his deserved inheritance-blessing from

6. Chapter 51.

7. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 2, 3.

8. Ibid., ch. 26.

9. This prophecy extended down to the days of Christ. Herod was an Edomite, an Isaac (Gen. 27:28–29). Isaac later blessed Esau through a prophesy of Esau's greatness, but he had nothing left of substance to give Esau (vv. 37, 39). He had given Jacob the full inheritance, leaving nothing for Esau. By giving Jacob the full inheritance, believing that Jacob was Esau, Isaac had necessarily disinherited Esau, thinking that he was disinheriting Jacob. Esau was the ethically rebellious son. He had married Canaanite wives, against his parents' wishes (Gen. 26:34–35). After he lost his blessing, his father told him not to marry other Canaanite wives (28:9). His obedience was partial: he married a daughter of Ishmael (28:9), the disinherited son of Abraham. Esau's pattern of rebellion was continual in the key area of covenantal inheritance: marriage. Isaac had sought to escape his responsibility to disinherit his rebellious son by disinheriting Jacob instead. This tactic backfired on Isaac. It led to Esau's complete disinheritance.

The inheritance law helps us to answer the ethical and judicial question: Was it wrong for Rebekah and Jacob to deceive Isaac? The answer is no, it was not wrong. Isaac's physical blindness reflected his moral judgment. Jacob and Rebekah took advantage of his physical weakness in order to overcome his moral weakness. They were facing a morally blind old man who would not acknowledge the legitimacy of God's prophecy to Rebekah concerning the two sons and their respective covenant lines, nor would he honor Esau's sale of his birthright to Jacob. Isaac was willing to defy God for the sake of his delight in the taste of venison stew (Gen. 27:3–4). In this, Isaac was as short-sighted as Esau had been when he sold his birthright for a pot of stew. Rebekah was morally and legally justified in undermining her husband's evil plan to disinherit Jacob, and, through this act of rebellion, disinherit God's promised covenant seed.¹⁰ God had specified to her which son should inherit. Isaac was in rebellion.

Jacob's first four sons were Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah. All were born of Leah, the unloved wife (Gen. 29:32–35). One aspect of the double portion was rulership. Jacob gave permanent civil rulership to Judah (Gen. 49:10). He had legitimate covenantal reasons for skipping Reuben, Simeon, and Levi. Reuben had defiled his father's bed by having sex with Jacob's concubine, Billah (Gen. 35:22). Simeon and Levi had slain the Shechemites after the Shechemites had submitted to heir of Esau: Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews, XIV:I:3. He sought to destroy the promised seed. He failed. Joseph and Mary had removed themselves and their son from Herod's jurisdiction (Matt. 2:13–15). They returned when Herod had died (v. 19).

10. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 27.

circumcision (Gen. 34:25). This ruthless act of revenge had brought reproach on their father (v. 30). These sons inherited single portions. This left Judah as the primary heir, which involved exercising rulership. The promised seed's covenant line would come through Judah (Luke 3:33).¹¹

The case of Judah's sons is the most convoluted of all. His first son, Er, was wicked. God killed him before he conceived a son of his own through Tamar (Gen. 38:7). That is, God cut off Er's covenant line. To restore it biblically, Onan his brother had to marry her.¹² But Onan was also wicked; he married her, but then refused to bear a child with her in his brother's name (v. 9). God killed him, too. The third son was too young to marry. It is clear that Tamar was the victim of her two husbands' evil ways. She was being denied legitimate seed. Tamar then tricked Judah into fathering twin sons with her after the death of Judah's wife. Her son Zarah was the second-born, yet he had very nearly become the firstborn (vv. 28–30). In this case, the promised seed came through the firstborn son, Pharez (Luke 3:33). Yet Pharez was not legally the firstborn son. Shelah, the third son of Judah's first wife, should have been the heir through Judah. But the evil of his two older brothers, coupled with his young age, as well as the evil of his father in lying with Tamar before marriage, thinking she was a prostitute, transferred the covenant line to the surviving second-born son, Pharez. This was done by God for Tamar's sake, who had twice been cheated by evil husbands. Through her the promised seed would come.

11. It is not clear from the text that Judah received a double portion. It is also not clear from the allocation of land listed in the Book of Joshua. Rushdoony argued that Jacob awarded a double portion to Joseph, for he gave a blessing to Joseph's two sons. The reason for this, he said, is that Jacob was under Joseph's care in Egypt. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 180. The problem with this argument is that Joshua did not recognize this claim to a double portion in allocating land in Canaan. When the two tribes came to him claiming a right to the double portion—a right based on their numerical strength, not a promised double portion—Joshua told them that they would have to prove their claim on the battlefield by defeating Canaanites who were armed with iron chariots (Josh. 17:13–18). That is, they would have to disinherit the Canaanites, not their brethren, to gain their double portion. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 14:C.

12. "If brethren dwell together, and one of them die, and have no child, the wife of the dead shall not marry without unto a stranger: her husband's brother shall go in unto her, and take her to him to wife, and perform the duty of an husband's brother unto her. And it shall be, that the firstborn which she beareth shall succeed in the name of his brother which is dead, that his name be not put out of Israel" (Deut. 25:5–6). See Chapter 63.

In the case of Joseph, the firstborn son of Jacob's beloved wife, Jacob transferred Joseph's single-unit inheritance to Joseph's two sons. Jacob did this prior to his final accounting with his other sons. Manasseh was the firstborn, but Jacob gave the blessing to Ephraim. Joseph tried to correct this, but without success. "And his father refused, and said, I know it, my son, I know it: he also shall become a people, and he also shall be great: but truly his younger brother shall be greater than he, and his seed shall become a multitude of nations" (Gen. 48:19). Jacob offered no reason for this. The second-born son would receive the double portion of Jacob's blessing: authority and population. But this did not necessarily imply that Ephraim would receive a double portion of Joseph's inheritance. In the land distribution under Joshua, the two sons received separate portions based on their military prowess. There is no indication in the text that Ephraim's inheritance was double the size of Manasseh's.

Mosaic law was not formally in force prior to Moses. The patriarchs did not go to priests and civil rulers to legitimize their decisions regarding their sons' inheritance. They made these decisions on their own authority as household priests and rulers. After Moses, the law mandated a system of confirmation for the father's disinheritance of a particular son, which the next section of Deuteronomy reveals. The parents had to bring their rebellious son before the civil magistrate.

The New Testament provides a reason for the persistence of this pattern of inheritance among the patriarchs. Paul referred to Jesus as the last Adam. "And so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit" (I Cor. 15:45). The first Adam had forfeited his lawful claim on the inheritance from his father, God. Adam was disinherited. But God then showed grace to Adam. On what legal basis? Because of the perfect righteousness of Jesus Christ. On this basis, God gives common grace to all mankind and special grace to His chosen people: a common salvation (healing) and a special salvation. "For therefore we both labour and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, specially of those that believe" (I Tim. 4:10).¹³ Adam and his heirs have received the gift of life on the basis of the work of the second Adam. Yet even here, the true pattern exists: the firstborn son inherits. Jesus

13. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 6; Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/gndcog>)

Christ is the incarnation of the second person of the Trinity. He is the only begotten son of God. “But he held his peace, and answered nothing. Again the high priest asked him, and said unto him, Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed? And Jesus said, I am: and ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven” (Mark 14:61–62).

B. Sons and Daughters

Mosaic covenant fathers had the responsibility of assessing the moral character of their sons. Their allocation of the inheritance had to conform to the law of the double portion. They could not, on their own authority, depart from this law. But the law gave no autonomous claim to rebellious sons. God’s law does not subsidize evil. Either of the other two covenantal authorities could confirm a father’s decision to disinherit a rebellious son. The civil government could enforce such a claim through execution of other, lesser, penalties for lesser infractions; the ecclesiastical government could enforce it through excommunication.

1. Adoption

This law said nothing about daughters. It assumed that daughters would not inherit if a son was still alive at their father’s death. Why? To find the answer, we must understand the principle of economic support. Daughters married into another family. Their office as helpers of their husbands meant that their efforts would go to provide support for their husbands’ parents. Wives were adopted into their husbands’ families.

A father provided a dowry for his daughter in marriage. If he failed to do this, she was a concubine, not a free wife. But a son-in-law provided a bride price to the family of the bride. This kept the dowry from depleting the inheritance of her brothers. This payment exempted the bride from any obligation to support her aged parents. This obligation was her brothers’ obligation. By forfeiting any claim on an inheritance, the daughter escaped any future economic burden for supporting her parents.¹⁴ There was a balance to the Mosaic inheritance system.

The traditional description of wives as “barefoot and pregnant” implicitly justifies a system of inheritance that passes all of the parents' assets to sons and their wives. Daughters for millennia did not receive dowries in the form of formal education. But on the day that a family hired a tutor to teach a daughter to read, that family began to alter the economics of inheritance. As soon as the ability to read meant access to income-producing occupations, an investment in a girl's education began to undermine the traditional system of inheritance. Those traditionalists who long ago opposed formal education for daughters may have sensed the revolutionary social and economic implications of what it meant to have literate women in a society. But that resistance is long gone. From the Reformation until the late nineteenth century, the ability to read in the West meant the ability to read the Bible. The Protestant religion's individualism and its biblicism, coupled with the mass production of printed materials, made literacy cost-effective for the masses. This change in the investment-return ratio for basic education inevitably undermined the traditional system of sons-only inheritance. The daughters received a dowry through education. They were thereby brought under the biblical obligations for supplying a proportional share of parental support if their husbands failed to supply a bride price comparable to the cost of their wives' educations.

14. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 32:B:1.

2. Modern Times

Prior to the nineteenth century, women had few options to work for money outside the home. Labor was more clearly allocated in terms of physical strength, with the resulting division of labor within the household and within society. This has changed dramatically with the extension of the division of labor and the substitution of mechanical and especially electrical power for human and animal power.¹⁵ When a woman can flip a switch as easily as a man can, the ability to use electrical tools to perform specialized labor then becomes more a matter of skill and temperament than physical strength. Also, there is not much evidence, if any, that indicates that women as a class cannot perform such highly skilled tasks as eye surgery as readily as men can.

Women have entered the work force by the hundreds of millions in the West since World War II. This has been a matter of social convention. This social transformation has been going at least on since the early nineteenth century, when unmarried women were brought into the textile industry as seamstresses. They had been involved in this industry as wool spinners from ancient times. The division of labor provided by mechanized sewing equipment moved the location of their work. This was part of a social revolution, no doubt, but it was not a revolution in basic skills. It was a revolution in capital formation.

15. To this should be added the advent of popular contraception techniques. With fewer children, women have reduced their household management burdens. While they fill up their days with activities, no doubt, they bear fewer children because they believe they could not bear the added household burdens.

As women have become a source of family monetary income, their ability to support aged parents financially has raised the question of inheritance. Should all of their income go into their husband's family? This raises the question of education. Who paid for their educations? Mass education has enabled women to enter occupations that had been closed to them. More to the point, mass education has created new occupations that did not exist a century ago. If parents pay for a daughter's education, they provide a dowry. If the son-in-law provides no bride price comparable in value to this investment in the bride's education, compounded at a market rate of interest as if it had been a student loan, then her parents have a moral claim on a portion of her wealth and time. To argue otherwise is to argue for the disinheritance of her brothers. If she gets equal funding in her education, but they are alone legally and morally responsible for the support of their aged parents, then the biblical principle of proportional responsibility is violated. Brothers have been decapitalized by sisters.

The tax authorities recognize this relationship between capital invested and payments owed. The state pays for the education of daughters. It therefore taxes daughters when they enter the work force. The state collects taxes to support existing retirees. The system of proportional responsibility is honored to some degree by this system. But, as taxes for retirement systems and state health care rise, the wives become, in effect, the supporters of the aged parents—and not so aged parents—of other families. The share of national income going to pay taxes today is close to the share of income earned by women in the work force. To fund the faceless aged, husbands have sent their wives out to work. This is not the way that husbands and wives think of this financial arrangement, but the numbers reveal that this is essentially the nature of the bargain. The state has paid for the education of women—the wife's dowry—so it collects money from women for the support of the aged. We can call this process the statist bureaucratization of the dowry.

C. New Testament Applications

Is the allocation of a man's inheritance still governed by Deuteronomy 21:15–17? To answer this question, we consider the fact that there have been judicial alterations. First and foremost, there is no longer polygamy under the New Covenant.¹⁶ The church has rejected the idea that polygamy is a valid form of marriage except under highly unusual circumstances.¹⁷ Second, the Mosaic seed laws and land laws have been annulled by the coming of Jesus Christ. Land no longer has a covenantal-prophetic role to play in the history of salvation. Third, the state no longer enforces the laws against rebellious children. Whether it should or not is an issue I deal with in the next chapter. But the fact that the mandated civil sanction of execution no longer threatens a rebellious son has had effects on the administration of this law. Fourth, as we have seen, daughters now inherit.

Daughters have a new legal status under the New Covenant. Females are baptized in the church. The formal mark of covenant blessings and covenant cursings is placed on both sexes. This means that, covenantally speaking, the benefits of inheritance and the threat of disinheritance are presented formally to both sexes. Covenant sanctions ultimately are sanctions of inheritance and disinheritance: in eternity, but also in history.

Then what remains of Deuteronomy's inheritance law? Only the principle of proportionality. Of those assets bequeathed to the children, there should be a double portion for the heir who accepts primary responsibility for the care of the aged parents. If all of them accept equal responsibility, then all should inherit equal portions. Similarly, the son or daughter who abandons every aspect of this family obligation thereby abandons any moral claim on a share of the inheritance. In a biblical commonwealth, this would also mean abandoning a legal claim.

Parents need to make this principle clear to their children. Before the parents are infirm, they should know which children have agreed to accept which burden. This is analogous to an insurance policy. The

16. By extending the right of unilateral divorce to wives (Mark 10:2–12), Jesus annulled the right of polygamy to husbands. The negative sanction—no right of remarriage—must apply equally to men and women. North, Hierarchy and Dominion, Appendix A.

17. When a man is converted to Christ in a polygamous culture, if he renounces his marriages to all but the first wife, these abandoned wives would become pariahs in the society. They would have nowhere to go. I know of no denomination or missionary group which requires that a new convert do this to his wives.

death benefits paid to the survivors are proportional to the premiums paid. The common Western practice of parents who refuse to talk about the size of the inheritance, the details of the will and the obligations of the children is biblically perverse. God has set forth this rule of inheritance: rewards are determined by performance. This rule applies to each man's eternal inheritance, too. "Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward" (I Cor. 3:12–14).¹⁸ "Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting" (Gal. 6:7–8).¹⁹

D. Disinheritance by the State

In my discussion of the fifth commandment, "Honour thy father and thy mother" (Ex. 20:12a), I pointed out that the modern messianic state has substituted its claims on men's inheritance for the claims of the true sons. The state has become a pseudo-family, educating children according to its standards and presuppositions, funding health care, paying for men's retirement, and so forth. To do this, the state must decapitalize the family through taxation. The state, unlike a biblically defined family, does not create wealth. It consumes wealth as it redistributes it from one group to another.²⁰

The state is an interloper in the lawful system of inheritance. It had presented a false claim, and beginning early in the twentieth century, men have believed this claim. Through graduated taxation schemes (called "progressive"), the state places an ever-greater economic burden on the more productive members of society. The principle of the tithe is denied. The principle of theft by majority vote is substituted. The state demands the double portion or more, in the name of its compulsory programs of healing.

This process of disinheritance rests on the covenantal principle that the state is the true son. This disinheritance honors fathers and mothers in the name of the state. It releases children from the burdens of supporting aged and sick parents. But, having been persuaded of the legitimacy of this new hierarchy of responsibility, voters cannot morally resist the claim of inheritance. Who is the son who deserves the double portion? The one who provides the double portion of support for the aged parents. This means the state. The greater the percentage of support provided by the state, the greater the proportion of the nation's inheritance that is demanded by the state. Why should men expect anything different? The principle of the double portion sets forth the relationship between support and inheritance.

18. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 3.

19. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 13.

20. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 25.

For a son to argue that he is completely responsible for his aged parents is to assert a legal and moral claim on the parents' inheritance. The younger brothers who accept the oldest brother's offer have thereby acquiesced to the implication: a forfeited inheritance. Voters do not recognize the cause-and-effect relationship between the state's offer of support for the aged. They do not recognize the implicit legal claim which the state is making: reducing the ability of economically successful men to pass on wealth to their heirs. As voters transfer more and more responsibility to the state for the care of the aged, the state steadily becomes the substitute heir.

Conclusion

The Mosaic law of inheritance specified that the allocation of the inheritance was by legal right, not by parental discretion. The firstborn son inherited the double portion. This did not mean that a rebellious firstborn son would inherit a double portion or any portion at all. Both the church and the state had the authority to alter an inheritance through covenantal sanctions: excommunication and execution, respectively. This law restricted the right of a father, on his own authority, to alter the inheritance to his sons.

The biblical principle of proportional rewards and the biblical principle of proportional obligations were combined in this law. There were reciprocal obligations between fathers and sons. The promise of a double portion of the inheritance imposed the obligation of a double burden of responsibility to care for aged parents.

The general principle that the firstborn son should inherit a double portion was honored in the breach from Adam to Jacob's twelve sons. Firstborn sons did not inherit in many instances. This indicates that there was covenantal rebellion among the oldest sons, generation after generation. This pattern of the rebellious older son who had to be disinherited was continual in Old Covenant history. It culminated with the Jews of Jesus' day, who resented the heart-felt welcome and celebration given by the Father for the rebellious but repentant younger brother (Luke 15:29–30). The younger brother in the parable represented the gentiles.²¹ The result of this hard-hearted rebellion was the disinheritance of the eldest son. As God's covenant-keeping firstborn son, Jesus prophetically announced the coming disinheritance of the covenant-breaking firstborn son, Old Covenant Israel: "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43). The gentiles would soon inherit the kingdom. The church as the gathering of the saints would soon replace Old Covenant Israel as the true son of the covenant.

In our day, the state has begun to replace the family as the provider of welfare, from womb to tomb. The state asserts its right to educate the children according to its covenant-breaking religious presuppositions. It has gained this authority by offering parents free education, i.e., taxpayer-funded education, for their children. The state offers food for the poor, medical care for the young and the aged, and pensions for all. To fund this comprehensive messianic program of social healing, the state has taxed its subjects vastly beyond the limits of the tithe (I Sam. 8:15, 17).²² Men pay the state a quadruple tithe or more, while Christians pay the church far less than a tithe.

One result of the rise of messianic politics has been the disinheritance of covenant-keeping children, as the state has de-capitalized the covenantal family. Another result since the 1940s has been the wife who works outside the home: forced into the labor market in order to pay these taxes. Without the taxes provided by these working wives, state-run pension systems would already have collapsed in bankruptcy. These retirement programs will be revised by the politicians, but then they will collapse later, when the economy itself breaks down, or when working wives retire and demand to collect their pensions. These working women have borne few children—below the demographic replacement rate of 2.1 children per family—so a shrinking work force will be called upon to support these long-lived pensioners.²³ The overburdened taxpaying heirs will eventually rebel politically. This system of messianic politics has led to the emasculation of the church, which has turned into a beggar.²⁴

21. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 38.

22. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary of the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 14.

23. Peter G. Peterson, Gray Dawn: How the Coming Age Wave Will Transform America—and the World (New York: Times Books, 1999).

24. Gary North, Tithing and the Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/gntithing>)

51

EXECUTING A REBELLIOUS ADULT SON

If a man have a stubborn and rebellious son, which will not obey the voice of his father, or the voice of his mother, and that, when they have chastened him, will not hearken unto them: Then shall his father and his mother lay hold on him, and bring him out unto the elders of his city, and unto the gate of his place; And they shall say unto the elders of his city, This our son is stubborn and rebellious, he will not obey our voice; he is a glutton, and a drunkard. And all the men of his city shall stone him with stones, that he die: so shalt thou put evil away from among you; and all Israel shall hear, and fear (Deut. 21:18–21).

The theocentric basis of this law is God's threat of execution against Adam for rebelling against Him. The passage has to do with sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹ But all Mosaic capital sanctions had to do with putting evil out of the land: exclusion.² This law also relates to inheritance: exclusion. In these two ways, this law is an aspect of point three.³

A. Adam's Rebellion

Adam was under God's authority because God was his Creator, his Father. Adam was an adult. He was living on his Father's property. The mark of his Father's ownership of both Adam and the world in which Adam dwelled was the forbidden tree. God declared this tree off-limits for Adam. It was not Adam's property, even though Adam was God's heir.

Adam knew that this world belongs to God. As a resident of this

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Deuteronomy 13:5; 17:7; 21:21; 22:21; 22:24.

3. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 3. North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 3.

world, Adam was required to acknowledge God's total ownership and universal authority, but Adam rebelled against this arrangement. He would not acknowledge God's sovereign ownership.

Consider the way in which his rebellion took place. He rebelled by eating the forbidden fruit. Consumption in this case was a sin for Adam. The modern free market doctrine known as consumers' sovereignty, first articulated in the mid-1930s by W. H. Hutt,⁴ in this instance applied to God, not Adam. God, as the tree's owner, was a consumer: He had separated the tree and its output for Himself. This form of consumer demand is sometimes called reservation demand: demand by the present owner.⁵ Whatever income the tree might produce in the future belonged exclusively to God. God was absolutely sovereign over this tree. He was absolutely sovereign over all of the trees, of course, but by placing a verbal "no trespassing" sign around one representative tree, God announced His absolute ownership of the earth and its fruits. By authorizing Adam to eat from all other trees, herbs, and animals (Gen. 2:29–30), He announced His sovereign ownership: His right to share His property with others. God's right to include Adam as a minority shareholder in the creation was publicly revealed by His exclusion of Adam from access to the tree. Adam did not accept his position as a minority shareholder. He wanted exclusive control.⁶

The tree was forbidden to Adam; so, eating from it was Adam's way of expressing his rejection of God's self-asserted authority over Adam and the creation. God tried Adam in a court of civil law, convicted him, and pronounced the death sentence. Nevertheless, God then showed mercy to him by allowing him time to repent, time to bear sons of his own, and time to train them. Time had not yet run out for Adam. But this was all a matter of grace: gifts of God that Adam did not deserve. As the injured party, God had the right to extend mercy to Adam: the biblical judicial principle of victim's rights.⁷

4. W. H. Hutt, "The Nature of Aggressive Selling" (1935), in Individual Freedom: Selected Works of William H. Hutt, eds. Svetozar Pejovich and David Klingaman (Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood, 1975), p. 185.

5. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State: A Treatise on Economic Principles, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), pp. 247–48, 253.

6. He could not gain majority control. Man serves one of two masters, God or Mammon, i.e., God or Satan. Adam elected as his representative the representative of Satan, i.e., the serpent. Even when covenant-breaking man believes that he is the President of the corporation, he is in fact operating under a would-be chairman of the board: Satan.

7. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1990] 2012), Appendix M; cf. North, Victim's

B. A Matter of Disinheritance

Deuteronomy 21:18–21 reveals many of the same characteristics as the account of Adam’s rebellion. There is a hierarchy of parental authority, and a son breaks it. His ethical rebellion is visible in his gluttony: rebellion through undisciplined eating. Adam ate without self-discipline. God tolerated Adam’s rebellion for a while; so do the parents in this passage. Judgment finally came on Adam: he died, just as God had promised. So does this rebellious son. Most important for a clear understanding of this passage, Adam was an adult. So is the son in this passage.

This law was not a seed law, relating to the preservation of the tribal system, nor was it a land law. It has to do with universal principles of civil justice and crime prevention. Yet some aspects of it were based on its land law status.⁸

This law was a law of disinheritance. Because a father in Mosaic Israel could not legally disinherit a son on his own authority as the head of the household (Deut. 21:15–17), the family had no autonomous means of disinheritance.⁹ This was because of the jubilee land law regarding inheritance. One or both of the other two covenantal institutions had to validate the decision of a parent or parents to disinherit a son: church or state. There had to be a joint institutional declaration against him. No single person or institution possessed the exclusive voice of authority in God’s name. There was a balance of authority in Mosaic Israel regarding disinheritance.

First, there is reversible disinheritance: ecclesiastical excommunication. The excommunicated son lost his citizenship in Israel. He no longer had legal access to service as a warrior in God’s holy army. He therefore could not be a judge, bringing negative covenantal sanctions in God’s name. In this sense, the excommunicated man had become a covenantal stranger. A stranger could not inherit rural land in Mosaic Israel prior to the return from the Assyrian-Babylonian captivity (Ezek. 47:21–23).¹⁰ This is why excommunication was a form of disinheritance. Because excommunication extends into eternity, this was the most threatening form of disinheritance. Death would seal the priest-

Rights: The Biblical View of Civil Justice (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnvictim>)

8. On the categories of the Mosaic law, see Appendix J.

9. Chapter 50.

10. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 22.

hood's eternal death sentence. But excommunication is reversible through the excommunicant's public repentance.

Second, there is irreversible disinheritance: civil execution. This is the most threatening form of disinheritance in history, but it has no eternal implications. Israelite parents and the state could not speak authoritatively regarding a man's eternal judicial status; only the Levites could do this. Two-fold disinheritance was eternally permanent: excommunication pronounced judicial sentence historically and eternally, but with the possibility of repentance and the restoration of the forfeited inheritance; execution removes the common grace of time that could lead to the special grace of repentance.¹¹ The sentence of execution reduces the time available for repentance: from the judges' announcement of the death sentence until its enforcement. For the rebellious son who was brought before the civil authorities by his parents, time had just about run out. There would be no further common grace extended to him by God through his parents.

C. What Was the Son's Crime?

A crime is a matter of civil sanctions. Sin may not be. The negative sanction in this case was death: the supreme civil sanction. What, then, was the son's crime? He was a sinner, surely, but were these sins crimes? If they were crimes, why did the parents have to file charges against him? Why hadn't the civil authorities taken independent action against him?

To find the answers, let us go through the steps in this case. The father and mother took their rebellious son before the civil authorities. They informed the authorities of the nature of his infractions: gluttony,¹² drunkenness, and disobedience to parents. Hearing this formal covenant lawsuit against the son, the authorities were required by this law to decide in favor of the parents. While they retained the right of

11. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

12. In the most popular Bible in the English-speaking fundamentalist world, the trademarked Scofield Reference Bible (Oxford University Press, 1909), there is no reference in its concordance to gluttony. There are three categories for alcohol abuse: drunk, drunkard, and drunkenness. This reveals a great deal about fundamentalism's priorities of evil-doing. A 1997 report on the health of Southern Baptist ministers and leaders reported that of some 1,000 attendees at the 1997 Southern Baptist Convention national meeting, 60% of them were at least 20% overweight, compared with 26% of the general public. This was not a random sample, but it was large enough to reveal the presence of a problem. Dallas Morning News (Sept. 6, 1997), p. 6 G.

cross-examination to verify the facts, the presumption of this law was that the parents had not testified falsely against their son. Parents may be expected to testify falsely on a son's behalf, but they rarely bring false charges against him, especially when the penalty is death. This law assumed that parental love was operating as a disincentive to a false accusation. The accusers therefore had been driven to this extreme remedy by the behavior of their son.

1. An Adult Son

The son was an adult. We know this because of the nature of his sins. He was a drunkard and a glutton. Drunkenness is an adult's sin. In no society that I am aware of has the state ever legalized continual drunkenness for minors. It is clear from the text that the state had no authority to keep him from drinking excessively or eating excessively apart from this formal complaint by his parents—a complaint that necessarily invoked the death penalty. This means that the son was an adult. He would not control himself, and his parents could no longer control him.

His refusal to obey them indicates that their threats no longer scared him. It also indicates that they had run out of threats. Physical punishment by his parents was no longer possible because he was an adult. Disinheritance was not much of a threat, as I shall argue, because he had already been disinherited. Another meaningful threat was for them to throw him out of the house, and I shall argue that they were unwilling to do this for a socially valid reason: their fear that he was unsafe to be in society as an autonomous agent. This leaves only the threat of execution. This, too, had failed. Judgment day had come.

This son was not a criminal. If he had been, the state could have acted independently of the parents. He had not behaved violently against his parents. Had he done so, he would already have been executed. The case laws of Exodus set forth the laws of battery and verbal assault against parents: "And he that smiteth his father, or his mother, shall be surely put to death" (Ex. 21:15). "And he that curseth his father, or his mother, shall surely be put to death" (Ex 21:17).¹³ So, his rebellion involved a dissolute life style and disobedience to parents. This behavior had become criminal behavior, but only within the context of the family. It was the covenant lawsuit brought by his parents that transformed his sins into crimes.

13. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 33.

2. Criminal Acts

The actions of the son were judicially criminal, for they called forth the death penalty. Yet drunkenness and gluttony are “victimless crimes.” They do not inflict physical damage on contemporaries. But they do inflict damage on the covenant line: the dissipation of the inheritance. Gluttony and drunkenness are assaults on the family’s economic future because they involve the squandering of present resources. These sins of excess transfer wealth from the family that has accumulated it to families that sell food and drink to the wastrel. The son’s addiction to wine and food threatens the continuity of family capital. His parents seek a way to put a stop to this.

Why was this transfer of capital a criminal matter? This son was an embarrassment to his parents, but why were his actions matters for the civil court? Why did the court have to execute him? Disobedience to parents is a negative response to positive commands. There had been no parental victim of a verbal assault. He had not stolen from them, beaten them, or in any way threatened him. He had merely ignored their instructions. He was an adult. Was he still required to obey them? On what legal basis could the state execute him? There is a two-fold general principle of biblical civil law: (1) there must be a victim; (2) the state is to prohibit public evil, not seek to make men good. In what way were these parents victims of positive evil? In what way were the sins of drunkenness and gluttony deserving of public execution?

The deciding legal issue here was continual disobedience to parents. There is no indication that drunkenness as such was a capital crime in the Mosaic covenant, nor is it a capital crime today. In fact, there is no indication that it is a crime at all. The state has no jurisdiction over drunks who are not threatening other people with bodily injury.¹⁴ The same is true of gluttony. It was not illegal to eat too much, nor is it today. Yet this son was to be executed by stoning, the sign of God’s judgment against evil men.

If we eliminate drunkenness and gluttony as the joint basis of his conviction, we are left with disobedience to parents. They could not control him. He was a threat to their authority in the household. He was therefore deserving of death. His gluttony and drunkenness were evidence of his disobedience, not the judicial basis of his execution. The issue here was disinheritance: irreversible disinheritance. The parents were so convinced that he was beyond redemption that they were willing to bring him before the civil court for execution. While there is no text that required them first to seek and gain ecclesiastical excommunication, it is likely that they had already done so. This sanction had failed to gain his obedience to them. They were now bringing him to the final court of appeal in history in order to transport him into God's final court of appeal in eternity. In short, they were acting on behalf of God as lawful covenantal authorities. They were bringing a covenant lawsuit against their son.

14. In today’s world, a drunk driver does threaten others.

2. Covenantal Authorities

A parent is required by God to inflict pain on rebellious young children. "He that spareth his rod hateth his son: but he that loveth him chasteneth him betimes" (Prov. 13:24). "Chasten thy son while there is hope, and let not thy soul spare for his crying" (Prov. 19:18). The parent's authority to inflict pain on a disobedient child is basic to the family covenant.¹⁵ The parent possesses the legal right to impose physical sanctions. That is, he is not to be threatened with civil or ecclesiastical sanctions for beating his child, so long as the degree of punishment fits the infraction. This is a fundamental principle of biblical law: the punishment must fit the infraction.

The family covenant does not authorize the imposition of capital punishment by a parent.¹⁶ This is why the Mosaic law required parents to take their rebellious adult son to the officers in the gate, i.e., the civil judges. Under the Mosaic covenant, the state clearly had the right to impose the sanction of execution on a son who was brought before it by the parents. More than this: it had an obligation to do so. Yet the son had not committed any physical violence against his parents. If he had, he would have been subject to execution independent of his parents' formal accusations (Ex. 21:15, 17). Cursing a parent or striking a parent is considered an attack on God and His authority. For the son to escape judgment, his victimized parent would have had to publicly forgive the son for this action. But the son would have been marked as

15. This is why modern statist law places legal sanctions on parents who physically beat their children. The messianic state seeks to reserve this monopoly for itself, as the would-be parent of all mankind.

16. Roman law did authorize a father to kill his children. In this sense, legalized abortion is more Roman than Christian. The practice of exposing infants was made illegal in Rome only after a Christian emperor came to the throne, in 374 A.D. The practice nevertheless continued. Alan Watson, Roman Slave Law (Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1987), p. 17.

a rebel. Repeated violations would have classified him as a habitual criminal. As we shall see, this passage implies that habitual criminals in Israel were executed. So, the mandatory execution of Deuteronomy 21 was not for a positive assault by the rebellious son. It was for his disobedience to his parents, as revealed publicly by his drunkenness and his gluttony.

His crime was contumacy: a refusal to obey lawful authority. The parents had lost control over their son, as they admitted publicly: “he will not obey our voice.” In some fundamental way, this man threatened the social order. If the primary agents of discipline had failed, and were willing publicly to acknowledge this, then the state had to intervene. But was execution mandatory? The text indicates that it was. There seems to be no room for mercy. I have argued that this was not a means of disinheriting him economically. The Levites could have cut him off from his people. In fact, it seems probable that this would already have been done prior to bringing him before the civil government. The church would have cut him off from access to service in God’s holy army. This would have effectively removed his citizenship. He would have had no further rights of economic inheritance. This was a matter of the inheritance of the family name.

Then why bring him before the judges? Wasn’t execution a form of judicial overkill? No; it was a means of making permanent his judicial disinheritance in history. It was a means of persuading him to come to grips with the judicial meaning of his prior excommunication: the threat of eternal disinheritance. He had run out of time. He could no longer delay the day of reckoning. By bringing him before the civil court, his parents were telling him: “Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation” (II Cor. 6:2b).

Note: this law did not apply to daughters. Daughters were not carriers of the family name. This was a family matter that involved the judicial issue of inheritance: the continuity of the family name.

D. Family Name

Both parents had to bring charges against him. This was a capital charge. “At the mouth of two witnesses, or three witnesses, shall he that is worthy of death be put to death; but at the mouth of one witness he shall not be put to death” (Deut. 17:6). In ecclesiastical proceedings for excommunication, the father had the right to bring the son to the Levites for judgment. The preceding passage deals with the eldest son of the first wife, the unloved wife. Reuben, the rebellious son of Leah, was the model.¹⁷ Mosaic law was concerned about inheritance. There had to be a valid reason for any disinheritance. The reason was covenant-breaking. A father did not possess the independent authority to make this determination with respect to the family covenant. Excommunication had to be pronounced by an authorized ecclesiastical officer.

Under such circumstances, the mother of the accused son might have opposed her husband's judgment. She might not have been willing to bring formal charges against her son. The father still had the right to bring such charges for the sake of preserving the inheritance, but it was not for him unilaterally to decide judicially whether his son would inherit family wealth under the Mosaic law.

In contrast to the laws governing excommunication, it took a double witness to invoke the capital sanction. This was a matter of the right of inheritance: irreversible disinheritance. The parents had decided to cut off further mercy. The principle of victim's rights identifies them as the ones who had the right to be merciful. They decided to be merciful to future victims of their son's dissipation.

This son was still under their household jurisdiction. Presumably, he had already been excommunicated. He was no longer a citizen of Israel. He was judicially a stranger in the land. But his parents still allowed him to live in their household. In other words, they were showing mercy to him, just as God had continued to show mercy to his disinherited son, Adam. The son could no longer inherit, but he might repent. The parents had not thrown him out of their household. This was a prodigal son who had not gone into another nation to spend his inheritance, for he possessed no inheritance. He was nonetheless a prodigal. Whatever assets he gained through working he spent on strong drink and food.

This son was not merely a slow learner; he was a non-learner. He was not merely a son of Adam; he was a son of Cain. This was a threat to the parents: because their son was a resident in their household, they would have been liable for his actions outside the home. Household authority in a patriarchy was very great under the Old Covenant. The father was considered the head of his household. Thus, those who lived under his lawful authority placed him at economic risk. Their law-breaking might result in legal claims against him. The son's drunk- en behavior might threaten the non-landed inheritance of the other children. The parents of an excommunicated son had two ways of reducing their legal liability: send him out of their household or have him removed through execution. Presumably, sending him away was the easiest way. This granted him time for his possible repentance. It would also have severed the legal tie to him which his continued presence in their household created.

17. Jacob made this determination on his own authority as both father and household priest, since this was before there was a separate tribe of priests (Gen. 49).

In this instance, however, the parents decided that he was too rebellious to be sent into society. It was therefore not just a matter of their legal liability for his actions, which could be removed by sending him away. Something more crucial than economic liability was involved. He was a potential threat to society. He was a disgrace to the family name. To preserve the integrity of the family's name, they could take him before the judges, present their case against him, and have him executed.

The parents made a joint decision: this son deserved to die. His rebellion against them had become a way of life. His rebelliousness was a pattern of behavior. He was a habitual rebel. His drinking and eating habits testified to this. He was in bondage to sin. He was not fit to be sent into society. As his parents, they had the joint authority to make this determination. The civil magistrates were required to enforce this decision. The civil magistrates had to accept the testimony of the parents when supported by independent evidence: the son's eating and drinking habits. They had to acknowledge the authority of the parents to protect society and the family name by removing their rebellious son from any further mercy. If parents believed that their son was both incorrigible and a threat to society, their assessment had to be honored by the state.

E. Supporting Family Authority

Heads of household in Israel were not allowed to impose the covenantal sanctions of excommunication or execution. These covenant sanctions were outside of their lawful sphere of authority. Because the ultimate physical sanction of execution was prohibited to them, they lacked a powerful negative sanction. They also could not impose the maximum sanction of excommunication. Presumably, the Levites had already done this. Nevertheless, their son was still a rebel. They still could not control him. If the three sanctions of excommunication, revocation of citizenship, and reversible disinheritance had not thrown the fear of God into him, what would? The fear of execution: irreversible disinheritance. Without this, he could not be controlled.

The parents could not impose this sanction on their own authority. But without this threat, they could not maintain control in their own household. They had to be backed up by the civil government, which possessed the authority to impose this sanction. So, in this case, the state became the supporting agency of parental authority. The parents were restrained by law from imposing the ultimate remaining sanction. But somebody had to.

The parents had decided that this son was not fit to be released into society without being under family jurisdiction, and they were no longer willing to accept this responsibility. He was too great a liability. They could no longer control him, and they also could no longer risk keeping them under their legal authority. The church could not control him. Who could? The state. The state had to be called in to support the judgment of his parents: he was not fit to stay alive. If parents were willing to say this in public, their judgment had to be honored. The state had to execute him. This was a two-fold matter of preserving family authority and preserving public safety.

What was his crime? Contumacy. He had rebelled so continually against family authority that this constituted a threat to society. His family possessed the authority to tell him to quit practicing evils that fell short of public actions that were subject to civil sanctions. The state could do nothing on its own authority to stop him from excessive drinking and eating apart from this formal accusation by his parents. To keep state authority on a tight chain, the Mosaic law did not authorize the state to execute people for drunkenness and gluttony. Therefore, in order to reinforce family authority, the Mosaic law granted to parents the right to invoke the permanent civil sanction against their son. Neither covenantal institution could impose this sanction on its own authority. This kept both forms of authority in check. It took joint action on the part of both covenantal authorities to remove a rebellious son.

Because of the nature of authority in Mosaic Israel, the church presumably had already imposed its ultimate sanction: excommunication. The text does not reveal this, but we can safely presume that the parents would not have resorted to this final declaration of their inability to control their son unless the church had also failed in its attempt to support family authority.

The heads of a household had an enormous responsibility in Mosaic Israel. They were asked to subordinate the traditional and nearly universal bonds of parental affection to the larger purpose of defending God's law. One aspect of this defense was the preservation of family capital. A wastrel son was dissipating family capital and, by implication, the family line. The parents were called on by God to put an end to this destruction of the family line.¹⁸ They were to call on the state to destroy the destroyer.

This meant that there had to be another heir through whom family capital could be extended. This family was in a situation analogous to Adam and Eve after Cain killed Abel. While God protected Cain from execution, He also removed him from his parents' presence. A new son, Seth, became the heir of his parents. Through Seth came the covenant line (Luke 3:38). A similar problem faced the parents of a rebellious son. If they had no other son, then they would either have to pray for one or else adopt one. The point is, it took faith in God's plan for parents to bring a rebellious son before the civil rulers. It took faith in God's provision of a replacement heir. Parents would have to place obedience to God's law over bloodline inheritance in the extension of the family's legacy through time.

F. Family, Society, and State

This degree of religious faith is rarely present in any family. Families are normally highly protective of their members. They place members inside a shield of toleration and protection from outside criticism. They resist the intrusion of outsiders who would bring a covenant lawsuit against a member. But God's law requires parents not only to avoid such defensive arrangements but actually initiate the covenant lawsuit against a wastrel son. This act of covenantal judgment visibly places the family under God's law. The state has no independent authority to initiate this covenant lawsuit. It must wait on the parents to do their duty. The magistrates must order the execution of the son on the word of the parents. The authority of the two witnesses must be respected. The witnesses act as agents of the court.

Parents in Israel who refused to do their duty faced a choice: (1) continue to protect the wastrel, thereby placing family capital at risk, either through his dissipating ways or through lawsuits brought against them as responsible agents over him when he commits a crime; or (2) send him out into society on his own, thereby placing others at risk. Parents may have decided that the former decision was too risky for family capital, but the second choice shifted the risk to outsiders. The law was clear: parents were not to do this. They were to protect society by delivering their son up for execution. They were to subordinate family ties to the glory of God and the needs of law-abiding society.

18. The heirs of such a man would likely become covenant-breakers. They would die in their sins.

Apart from a radical transformation of men's allegiance and understanding, it is unlikely that most family heads will ever do their duty in this regard. Rather, they will subordinate society to family ties. But when they do this, they transfer power to the state. They defer to the state the responsibility of bringing a covenant lawsuit against a known wastrel. But before the state can lawfully bring a covenant lawsuit against him, there must be a victim. He must harm someone. Thus, the unwillingness of families to subordinate their interests to God's law leads to an increase of crime and social disorder. Those who know that a wastrel is dangerous to society have nonetheless sent him out into society. They have washed their hands of him by sending a potential wolf among sheep. In doing so, they have raised the risk of harm to others. Parents are a godly society's first line of defense against evil. This law makes it clear just how important parental responsibility is, and just how burdensome. Parents must subordinate their love for their son to the law of God and the needs of society. They must place God's interest above family interests. Jesus said: "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me: and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me" (Matt. 10:37). This law indicates that Jesus was drawing upon an Old Covenant principle when he announced His judgment against the cult of the family.¹⁹

G. Rushdoony's Interpretation: Juvenile Delinquency

Rushdoony discussed this passage in several places in The Institutes of Biblical Law. He says that this passage refers to "incorrigible juvenile delinquents."²⁰ He repeats this in a section dealing with the Fifth Commandment: "The Economics of the Family."²¹ He discusses

19. Cf. Gary North, Baptized Patriarchalism: The Cult of the Family (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994), pp. 1–3. (<http://bit.ly/gnbap>)

20. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 77.

21. Ibid., p. 180.

this law at length in the section on "The Family and Delinquency."²² He cited it when discussing family authority and law enforcement.

The family very clearly has a serious role in law enforcement. The family is a law-order and disciplines its members. The nature and extent of the family's punishing power can be seen by looking again at a text previously considered, Deuteronomy 21:18–21, the death penalty for juvenile delinquents. There are certain very important aspects to this law. First, the parents are to be complaining witnesses against their criminal son. The loyalty of the parents must thus be to God's law-order, not to ties of blood. If the parents do not assist in the prosecution of a criminal child, they are then accessories to the crime. Second, contrary to the usual custom, whereby witnesses led in the execution, in this case, "the men of the city" did. Thus, where the death penalty was involved, the family was excluded from the execution of the law.²³

But this law went beyond mere family authority, he said. It extended to society at large: the prevention of the creation of a criminal class. He wrote:

Third, as we have seen, incorrigible juvenile delinquents were to be executed (Deut. 21:18–21), and also all habitual criminals. Such persons were thus blotted out of the commonwealth. When and if this law is observed, ungodly families who are given to lawlessness are denied a place in the nation. The law thus clearly works to eliminate all but the godly families.²⁴

Clearly, then, the intent of this law is that all incorrigible and habitual criminals be executed. If a criminal son is to be executed, how much more so a neighbor or fellow Hebrew who has become an incorrigible criminal? If the family must align itself with the execution of an incorrigibly delinquent son, will it not demand the death penalty of an habitual criminal in the community? . . . The purpose of this law is to eliminate entirely a criminal element from the nation, a professional criminal class. . . . Biblical law does not recognize a professional criminal element: the potentially habitual criminal must be executed as soon as he gives plain evidence of this fact.²⁵

The breakdown of family authority in the inner cities in the United States has led to a replacement institution: the gang. The gang pro-

22. Ibid., pp. 185–99.

23. Ibid., pp. 359–60.

24. Ibid., p. 380.

25. Ibid., pp. 187–88.

vides community, authority, commitment, and income. It is bound by a self-maledictory covenant oath. The gang has become the primary agency of physical sanctions in the predominantly non-white inner cities. Gangs of teenage boys have become the single major source of crime. These gangs are masters of the illegal drug trade. They are spreading across the nation, replacing the Mafia and other traditional criminal syndicates. They are well organized and difficult for law enforcement authorities to penetrate.

These developments were implied in Rushdoony's analysis of this passage, which he offered a decade prior to the public's recognition of the plague of gang life. Yet his actual exposition is ignored by ignorant or willfully perverse Christian critics of theonomy who imagine that they are more humane than God, let alone Rushdoony. "Theonomists would execute little children!" they cry in horror, never bothering to read Rushdoony's clear statements regarding this law, never considering the threat of juvenile delinquency to residents of inner cities. In the white middle-class safety of the suburbs,²⁶ critics issue smug dismissals of theonomy in the name of tender little children. (When they are mugged in a parking lot, however, they call on the state to imprison these teenage thugs and throw away the key.) They impugn God by impugning Rushdoony. They ridicule God's law by ridiculing their version of what they think Rushdoony said. They do not attempt to exegete Deuteronomy 21:18–21; they just continue to cry out, "The theonomists would execute little children." The ancient heresy of Marcionism is with us still: the belief that an evil God gave us the Old Covenant, but a loving God gave us the New Testament. The critics of theonomy never put things quite this bluntly, but what they write and say about the capital crimes and sanctions of the Mosaic law indicates that they believe it.

H. Adult Contumacy

My interpretation is different from Rushdoony's. I do not think the son was a juvenile delinquent. He was a delinquent, but he was no juvenile. In today's usage, "juvenile delinquent" means "a convicted criminal who is not old enough to be dealt with by civil law as an adult, and who is therefore under milder civil sanctions." This was not the legal status of the son in this passage. He was not yet an identifiable criminal. He had not broken any civil laws. He had not been convicted of any crime. Here was his legal status: he was under his parents' legal authority; he was a glutton and a drunkard; he would not obey his parents; and they could not control him by means of family sanctions. Presumably, he was also an excommunicant. He was on the road to perdition, and he was a disgrace to the family name. His parents believed that he was too dangerous to be sent into society as a disinherited stranger. Before he committed any crime, his parents brought him to the civil authorities to have him executed.

26. Possibly a temporary condition of safety.

This means that merely by his continual refusal to obey them, coupled with the marks of uncontrollable behavior—gluttony and drunkenness—he had committed a capital crime. This in turn means that open, wilful, publicly visible rebellion against joint parental authority was a crime equal to murder, for the civil sanction was the same. It was not gluttony and drunkenness that constituted his crime; it was his long-term rebellion against family authority while living under that authority. This was Adam's crime, too: eating what his Father had prohibited. He died for this sin. So will you, apart from God's adoption. Man's mortality is the result of original sin.

This was an adult who was still living in his parents' household. Rushdoony was correct: this law, when enforced, restricts the formation of a criminal class. This law and its capital sanction serves as a model of the biblically mandatory hostility that a godly society must have against habitual criminal behavior. If parents are not to tolerate continual rebellion against family authority, to the point of demanding that their son be executed by stoning, then how much less toleration should a society show toward incorrigible breakers of the civil law! If parents must be willing to bring a capital covenant lawsuit against their own flesh and blood, how much more ready must citizens be to rid society of habitual criminals! If it is a capital crime for a man to drink too much and eat too much and disobey his parents in the privacy of their home, then it surely is a capital crime to be convicted of a third or fourth felony. The civil government should not lock up incorrigible felons and throw away the keys. It should execute them. As the Bible says about the rebellious son, "And all the men of his city shall stone him with stones, that he die: so shalt thou put evil away from among you; and all Israel shall hear, and fear" (Deut. 21:21). If all Israel was to fear becoming a rebellious son, surely every Israelite was to fear becoming a habitual felon.

I. Illegal Drugs and the Messianic State

Today, men and women around the world call upon the state to deal with drug dealers. They do so in the name of their children. They cry out to the state: “We cannot control our children. They are addicted. They steal from us. They lie to us. They rebel against our authority continually. Therefore, we must arrest drug dealers, convict them, imprison them, and throw away the key!” What they do not say is this: “This our son is stubborn and rebellious; he will not obey our voice. He is a drug addict. Stone him to death. So shall other people’s sons learn to fear.”

The state responds to political pressure by passing innumerable laws against addictive drugs. Nevertheless, the addiction spreads. The state takes away more and more civil liberties, especially privacy, in the name of the war on drugs. Nevertheless, this war is visibly being lost. The public believes that the sale of addictive drugs should be made illegal. What the public does not believe is that their own sons and daughters are making self-conscious decisions to spend money on substances that will addict them, knowing full well that these drugs are dangerously addictive. They see their children as ill-informed. But it is the parents who are ill-informed; their children know a great deal about drugs. This is not an information problem. It is a moral problem. It is also an incentive problem: lack of fear of the legal consequences.

Children in the West have wealth at their disposal greater than what the rebellious Israelite son possessed. Sons and daughters in today’s world of unprecedented wealth have great purchasing power. They are nevertheless wilfully destroying themselves, squandering their inheritance, not in some far country, as the prodigal son did, but in the bedrooms of their parents’ homes. They are perfect examples of the rebellious son of Deuteronomy 21.

Here is why the drug trade flourishes: parents have given their children enormous wealth without guidance or restrictions and have sent them into the government’s tax-funded schools, which have become the primary marketplace for drugs, especially in the early stages of addiction. The modern public school is a state-funded illegal drug emporium. Students have accepted the religion of humanism that the public schools proclaim: the Darwinian story of man as the heir of beasts and meaningless cosmic chance. They have learned their school lessons well. They celebrate the religion of humanism with the high-efficiency tools of the “cool” drunkard: mind-altering drugs.

Instead of cutting off their children’s funds, pulling them out of the public schools, and monitoring their daily activities from morning to night, parents call for more government spending on drug rehabilitation programs, more government money for drug education programs in the public schools, and more government money for drug enforcement programs. In short, they call for more of the same: more humanism, more statism, and more prisons. The parents believe in the religious precept of classical Greece, which is taught in the public schools, namely, that man’s problem is educational rather than moral, that man can be saved through law and legislation. The parents worship at the altar of the messianic state and then wonder why their children are tempted by drugs.

The key issue here is not the question of the legalization of drugs. The question here is the primary locus of enforcement. The biblical locus of primary law enforcement is the family. The Bible acknowledges that the institution with the lowest cost of obtaining accurate information should be the initial law enforcing agent. This is obviously the family in cases of gluttony, drunkenness, and drug addiction. Any attempt by parents to shift the locus of primary responsibility to either school or state is illegitimate.

Similarly, if we differentiate between the teenage child and the adult child, calling for reduced penalties for the child because of the child’s lack of maturity—as we do with tobacco sales—then the penalty could be less than stoning. It might be public whipping; more lashes for students who had sold drugs to finance their habits than for final users. The point is, there has to be a severe public sanction against such rebellious behavior as drug addiction. If parents are unwilling to bring their rebellious children before the magistrates in the name of God, the family’s name, and the protection of society, then we can expect the drug plague to continue and the steady disappearance of our freedoms.

This passage in Deuteronomy offers a solution: execution of rebellious heirs. But modern man is too humane for this. Too human. Too humanistic. He prefers living under the messianic state to living under biblical law. He prefers statism to family responsibility. He prefers a growing international criminal class built on drug profits to bringing a capital covenant lawsuit against his own rebellious child. He is ready to send all drug dealers to prison for decades until the day he is told that his child supported his or her habit by luring other men’s children into the heartless addiction; then he cries out for a tax-financed drug rehabilitation program rather than prison for his supposedly victimized child. He prefers a massive and costly prison system that clearly is not working to low-budget whipping or stoning that would work very well. In the final analysis, he would rather see his adult child stoned on drugs than stoned by citizens. He ignores the Bible's warnings: "Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap" (Gal. 6:7).

Conclusion

The law governing the rebellious adult son was a law supporting family authority. The magnitude of the civil sanction indicates the severity of the crime and the importance of preserving family authority. But this law had social implications as well. It was a law that offered protection to society from an organized criminal class.

This law was a step beyond the negative sanction of excommunication, which governed citizenship and therefore inheritance. Inheritance in Mosaic Israel was an aspect of the seed laws and the land laws. It also had to do with eligibility to serve in God's holy army. This law seems to have been a law governing an excommunicated, disinherited son, although no text explicitly says this. The parents had run out of negative sanctions other than sending him away from the household, which they regarded as too risky for society. They had to appeal to the state to impose the maximum negative sanction that remained to be imposed on rebels. This law had to do with three things: family authority, disinheritance, and the protection of the general public. The parents, who were legally able to remove him both geographically and legally from the economic benefits of their household, refused to do this. They must have believed that it was not safe to remove him from their judicial authority as a member of their household. They feared that he would become a threat to society. Thus, to preserve the integrity of the family name and to protect society from a lawless rebel who had not yet become a habitual criminal, but who probably would if he was out from under their authority, they brought charges against him in a civil court. The court had to impose the death penalty, given the testimony of the parents and the evidence of both his gluttony and drunkenness.

There is no indication that this law has been annulled by the New Covenant. It was neither a seed law (tribal) nor a land law. There was a need for his execution in order to preserve the family's good name and to protect society. Without the willingness of a few parents to take this extreme measure, rebellious adult sons would learn not to fear their parents. These dedicated parents, who placed God's law, family authority, family reputation, covenantal inheritance, and social safety above their own emotional commitment to their son's biological survival, would serve as representatives for the whole society. The actual execution of a rebellious son would reinforce parental authority in many families. These goals have not changed with the coming of the New Covenant. In today's world, the son might be a drug addict rather than a drunken glutton. The point is, he must be visibly out of control. But there must be a two-fold witness against his rebellion. It is not sufficient that he be out of control, though not a law-breaker, for the state to execute him. It is also not sufficient for the parents to bring charges against him. There must be a two-fold witness against him: (1) two parents testifying to his rebellion and (2) publicly verifiable evidence of either his unwillingness or inability to control his own actions.

There has been one major alteration in the application of this law, however. The New Covenant has increased the responsibility of daughters. Daughters are baptized. They are placed under the covenant's dual sanctions: blessing and cursing. Daughters can inherit if they agree to bear the responsibility of caring for aged parents.²⁷ To limit the application of this law to sons is illegitimate today. If daughters are rebellious, financially able to become drunkards and gluttons or crack-cocaine addicts, and are still living under their parents' household jurisdiction, then there is no judicial reason for them not to come under this law.

Ever since the publication of Rushdoony's Institutes of Biblical Law in 1973, critics of biblical law have repeatedly focused on this law as the sign that theonomy is perverse. In private conversations, I have heard this biblical passage invoked more often than any other as evidence that theonomy is heartless and cruel. Yet the critics never cite Rushdoony's argument that this was a law against the formation of a criminal class. Instead, they cite—and condemn—only the law itself. The critics' theological problem is this: their belief that the Old Covenant God must have been heartless and cruel. They hold the Marcionite dogma. Again and again, we hear the refrain: "Theonomists would execute little children!"²⁸ It is time for this misinterpretation to end. But

27. Chapter 50:B.

28. I once received a letter from a Westminster Seminary graduate who had not it won't. It is too convenient a rhetorical device for modern-day Marcionites to resist.

been offered a job. He wanted me to hire him. He also wanted Bahnsen to hire him. He misspelled Rushdoony's name in his affirmation that he was familiar with theonomy, although not yet willing to subscribe to theonomy. I mentioned the possibility that I might be willing to hire him and his wife to run a day care facility. He wrote back that his wife found it odd that anyone who believed in stoning children was ready to start a day care. Needless to say, I did not hire him. His verbally clever but theologically ill-informed wife cost them an opportunity to begin a potentially lucrative and satisfying career with my money. His wife was simply repeating what has become a common misrepresentation of the theonomic interpretation of this passage.

LOST AND FOUND

Thou shalt not see thy brother's ox or his sheep go astray, and hide thyself from them: thou shalt in any case bring them again unto thy brother. And if thy brother be not nigh unto thee, or if thou know him not, then thou shalt bring it unto thine own house, and it shall be with thee until thy brother seek after it, and thou shalt restore it to him again. In like manner shalt thou do with his ass; and so shalt thou do with his raiment; and with all lost things of thy brother's, which he hath lost, and thou hast found, shalt thou do likewise: thou mayest not hide thyself. Thou shalt not see thy brother's ass or his ox fall down by the way, and hide thyself from them: thou shalt surely help him to lift them up again (Deut. 22:1–4).

The theocentric issue here is God's primary ownership. He places boundaries around what is His, beginning with the forbidden tree. Boundaries are an aspect of point three of the biblical covenant.¹ God delegates temporary control over His property. This relates to point two: hierarchy.²

A. Delegated Ownership

These laws governing lost property were extensions of Exodus 23:4–5: “If thou meet thine enemy's ox or his ass going astray, thou shalt surely bring it back to him again. If thou see the ass of him that hateth thee lying under his burden, and wouldest forbear to help him, thou shalt surely help with him.” Extending what I wrote in chapter 51 of Authority and Dominion regarding the Exodus passage, these laws,

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: The Economics of Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012).

2. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

since they deal with property, were governed by the theocentric principle of God as the cosmic Owner. He has delegated ownership of selected portions of His property to individuals and organizations, so that they might work out their salvation or damnation with fear and trembling (Phil. 2:12). Because God has delegated responsibility for the care and use of His property to specific individuals or organizations, who are held responsible for its management, non-owners are required by God to honor this distribution of ownership and its associated responsibilities.³ This includes even the return of lost property to its owner.

These were neither seed laws nor land laws. They were cross-boundary laws.⁴ These laws mandate the public's recognition that all ownership is delegated and therefore representative. Ownership means lawful delegated control over the use of a scarce economic resource. The stranger who finds a lost item becomes a delegated owner working on behalf of the property's two owners: God and the delegated owner. There is a new hierarchy of ownership: God > legally responsible title holder > discoverer. The discoverer is under the greatest legal constraints governing the use of the property because he does not hold title, yet he now possesses physical control over the property. The fundamental principle of all biblical government is this: with power comes responsibility. The discoverer cannot legally escape responsibility before God, for God has transferred to the discoverer a temporary, though highly restrictive, administrative legal title. This is why the law does not identify the discoverer as a thief.

Because these laws are so similar to the Exodus laws, I reproduce here much of chapter 51 of Authority and Dominion. Some readers may not own a copy of my earlier book. It may be inconvenient for them to locate a copy. It is easy for me to reprint what I wrote there, but with a few modifications. The Exodus case laws single out enemies. These do not. The Exodus law regarding the lost animal is the stronger law because it deals with an animal owned by an enemy. The Deuteronomy version is more general: the finder may not know who owns the wandering beast. Because of his lack of information, he is required to expend resources to care for the animal until the owner claims them. The finder's lack of information leads to expenses associated with caretaking. In this regard, this case law is also an extension of the care-

3. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 51.

4. On the categories of the Mosaic law, see Appendix J.

taking law.⁵

I focus here on the law regarding the lost animal, although the same principles of responsible administration govern all forms of lost property. Consider the law of the fallen animal (Ex. 23:5). This is a simple case law: help the animal. It does not matter who its owner is. This assistance is a charitable subsidy to both the animal and its owner. It creates good feelings. A good deed done on behalf of the fallen animal should be seen by the owner as a sign of the helper's righteousness. It testifies to the helper's commitment to God's law. Because the law of the fallen animal is an uncomplicated law, I do not devote much space to discussing it.

Let us consider more carefully the law governing the lost animal. There are several beneficial results of this moral law whenever it is widely obeyed. First, it upholds the sanctity of the legal rights of property owners. Second, it reasserts man's legitimate control over the animal creation. Third, it increases the bonds of friendship among men with a common confession of faith. Fourth, the passage of time makes it easier to identify thieves. Fifth, it provides an incentive to develop marks of private ownership, such as brands on animals.

This law is not a civil law. Biblical civil law invokes only negative sanctions against public evil. This is because the state is not an agent of salvation. It cannot lawfully seek to make men good. It is limited to imposing negative sanctions that will make men's evil acts more expensive, thereby reducing the number of evil acts. When the state mandates charity, civil law becomes a source of positive sanctions. But these laws, like the laws of Exodus 23:4–5, are positive, charitable injunctions.

B. The Owner's Right to Exclude

There is a rhyme that English-speaking children chant: "Finders, keepers; losers, weepers." When one child finds a toy or possession of another, he torments the owner with this chant. Yet his very chanting testifies to the fact that the tormenter really does not believe in his own ethical position. If he really wanted to keep the object, he would not admit to the victim that he had found it. He would forego the joys of tormenting the victim for the pleasure of keeping the object. The tormented owner can always appeal to his own parents, who will then go to the parents of the tormenter. In Western society, most parents know that the discovered object is owned by the loser.

5. Ibid., ch. 46.

From time to time, someone discovers a very valuable lost object, such as a sack of paper money that dropped out of an armored car. When he returns it to the owner, the newspapers record the story. Invariably, the doer of the good deed receives a series of telephone calls and letters from anonymous people who inform him that he was a fool, that he should have kept the money. Again, this is evidence of the West's dominant ethical position: the critics prefer to remain anonymous.

From a legal standpoint, the reason why the law requires the finder to return the lost item to the owner is that the owner owns the rights of use and disposal of the property. What is owned is the right to exclude other people from using the property. This "bundle of rights" is the essence of ownership. The capitalist system is not based on "property rights"; it is based on some person's legal right to control the use and disposal of property. Nothing inheres in the property that gives these rights.

There is another familiar phrase, "possession is nine-tenths of the law." This is incorrectly stated, if by "possession" we mean physical control over some object. The possession which is nine-tenths of the law is the possession of the legal right to exclude, not possession of the physical object itself. The object does not carry this legal right with it when it wanders off or is lost by the owner.

We can see this easily when we consider the case of a lost child. The fact that someone discovers a lost child obviously transfers no legal right to keep the child. The child is to be returned to the parents or to the civil authorities, who act as legal agents of the parents. Possession is clearly not nine-tenths of the law. If anything, possession of a long-lost child subjects a person to the threat of being charged with kidnapping. Because God is the ultimate owner of mankind, He has delegated the legal right to control children to parents, except in cases of physical abuse by parents which threatens the life of the child. In short, parental sovereignty is nine-tenths of the law, not merely possession of physical control over a particular child.

When someone who discovers another person's property is required by God to return it to its owner, there can be no doubt concerning the Bible's commitment to the private ownership of the means of production. Biblical moral law, when obeyed, produces a capitalist economic order. Socialism is anti-biblical. Where biblical moral law is self-enforced, and biblical civil law is publicly enforced, capitalism must develop. One reason why so many modern Christian college professors in the social sciences are vocal in their opposition to biblical law is that they are deeply influenced by socialist economic thought. They recognize clearly that their socialist conclusions are incompatible with biblical law, so they have abandoned biblical law.⁶

C. Dominion Through Judgment

This case law extends man's dominion over nature: domesticated animals are not to "run wild." They are under man's care and protection. This reasserts man's place under God but above the animals: point two of the biblical covenant model, hierarchy.

A lost animal can damage other people's property (Ex. 22:5).⁷ It can wander into a pit and get hurt or killed (Ex. 21:33–34).⁸ It can injure men or other animals (Ex. 21:35–36).⁹ To have a domesticated lost animal wandering without any form of supervision testifies against the dominion covenant. It is a sign that God's required moral and hierarchical order has broken down. It is an aspect of God's curse when beasts inherit the land (Ex. 23:29). In short, animals that are capable of being domesticated require supervision by man.

No man's knowledge is perfect. Men can lose control over their domestic work animals. When they do, it becomes a moral responsibility for other men to intervene and restore hierarchical order. This is done for the sake of biblical social order: (1) for the individual who has lost control over his animal and who is legally responsible for any damage that it might perform, and (2) for the sake of the animal.

A domesticated animal such as an ox is a capital asset, a tool of production. Mankind's development of tools of production is the basis of economic growth. The loss of a trained work animal reduces its owner's ability to subdue his portion of the earth. This sets back the fulfillment of God's dominion covenant with mankind. This loss of production reduces the per capita economic growth of the whole community, even though this corporate loss may not be large enough to be perceived by men. The person who finds a lost animal is required to

6. A good example of such antinomian socialist reasoning is John Gladwin, "Centralist Economics," in Robert Clouse (ed.), Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views of Economics (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1984), ch. 4. See also my response, ibid., pp. 198–203. (<http://bit.ly/ClouseWAP>)

7. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 44.

8. Ibid., ch. 41.

9. Ibid., ch. 42.

restore it to the owner, even though this involves economic sacrifice on his part. In the long run, this implicit sanctioning of privately owned capital will produce increased wealth for all.

The biblical imagery of the lost sheep of Israel is indicative of the central concern of the Bible: the restoration of moral and legal order, the overcoming of sin and its effects. Lost sheep in history need a shepherd. They are wandering toward destruction. God intervenes and brings them home. The New Testament imagery of Jesus as the good shepherd points to the theme of restoration.

Even if biblical civil law mandated private charity—negative sanctions on one person for the sake of positive sanctions to another—it would be close to impossible to gain a court’s conviction against anyone who ignored this law and let the animal continue to wander. There would have to be at least two witnesses. The accused person could claim that he had never noticed the animal or any other lost object. It is also difficult to imagine what civil penalties might be attached to this law. We therefore should conclude that the enforcement of this law is based on self-government under God’s law. The person who returns a lost object to its owner is demonstrating that he has acted out of concern for God’s law, not out of concern for civil sanctions. He is a person who exercises self-government under God’s law. Again, it becomes more difficult to entertain suspicions about his overall ulterior motives.

Let us assume that the discoverer has found the animal in his garden or his fields. He wants to get it away from his crops. He is not allowed by law to kill it. It is not responsible for its actions. To get it away from his crops, he must either take it down to the edge of his property and shoo it away, or else he must place it in a pen or other restrictive area. To keep from losing wealth because of its unrestricted access to his crops, he must go to the trouble of placing it under restraints. If he wants to be reimbursed for the crops it consumed or any damage it caused, he must locate its owner. The economics of a wandering beast in a biblical commonwealth provides incentives, both positive and negative, for the righteous man to become a caretaker of the lost animal.

The person who steals an animal and is immediately arrested could offer this excuse: “I found this animal wandering in the area, and I was simply returning it to its owner. I did not know who owned it, so I was taking it home until I could make further inquiries.” This excuse might work once or twice. It would not be a suitable excuse three or four times. A person who lives in a society that has developed an information reporting system, in order to avoid suspicion, must report the whereabouts of lost articles to the civil authorities if he does not know who the owner is. Thus, as time passes, the “excuse of the wandering animal” fades. The owner who discovers his animal in another’s possession has a far stronger legal case than if this case law were not in God’s law-order. A lost animal is not supposed to remain indefinitely in another person’s possession, especially after the person who lost it announces its absence publicly. “Thou shalt bring it unto thine own house, and it shall be with thee until thy brother seek after it.”

D. Marks of Ownership and Reduced Search Costs

This case law makes it far more likely that lost property will be immediately returned to a known owner. Thus, obeying this law increases the economic return from marking property. This is an economic incentive to extend the principle of owner’s rights. A person’s legal claim to property is secured at a lower cost through a mark of ownership. When anything can be obtained at a lower price, more of it will be demanded than before. This is why marks of ownership are important factors in extending the free market social order. When more people own property and thereby secure the stream of income that assets provide, they will find it in their self-interest to defend the principle of owner’s rights.

By marking property, the owner reduces future search costs, both his search for the animal and the finder’s search for the owner. The mark also reduces search costs for a neighbor whose crops have been eaten or ruined by a wandering beast. He can then gain restitution from the owner (Ex. 22:5).¹⁰ Branding also reduces search costs for the civil authorities if the animal should be stolen. By burning an identifying mark into an animal’s flesh, or by attaching a tag to its ear or other flesh, the owner increases risks for a thief. This also decreases risks for those who might buy from the thief. The buyer is able to verify whether the seller possesses title to the mark and therefore title to the beast.

God’s use of circumcision in the Old Testament era is an obvious parallel to the brand. So was the hole punched in the ear of a voluntary lifetime servant (Ex. 21:6). These were both marks of ownership. The New Testament practice of baptism leaves no visible mark, but it leaves a legal description in the records of a continuing third-party institution, the church. Baptism is also a mark of God's primary ownership. The same is true of property registration generally. Titles, deeds, and other marks of legal ownership have developed over the centuries, thereby extending the dominion of mankind through the development of the institution of private property. By identifying legal owners, a society increases the level of personal responsibility. This, too, is a fundamental biblical goal.

10. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 44.

E. Not a Case of State-Enforced Charity

The discoverer must sacrifice time and effort to see to it that the property is returned to its owner. This might be seen as a form of judicially mandated charity, one of the few examples of compulsory charity in the Bible. Compulsory charity, however, is a contradiction. Charity must always be legally voluntary. It is governed by the legal principle that the recipient has no judicially enforceable earthly entitlement to the gift. This is why the modern welfare state is careful to label its compulsory wealth-redistribution programs as entitlements. The creators of these programs want to avoid any suggestion of voluntarism, which implies that the donor has the right to refuse to make the gift. Thus, this case law is not related to charity. The owner has a legal claim on the property. He has an entitlement. The person who finds the lost property is expected to honor this legal claim, even though it costs him money or time to do so.

This law requires a form of wealth-redistribution. The person who discovers lost property owes it to the owner to return it or care for it. This is a positive injunction. Yet biblical civil law, as I have argued repeatedly, does not issue positive injunctions. It does not compel anyone to do good; it merely prohibits people from doing public evil. Thus, I conclude that this law is not a civil law, but is rather a moral injunction. There is no civil sanction attached to it, nor is there any general judicial principle of restitution that would enable the judges to determine a proper sanction. The civil government therefore has no role to play in the enforcement of this law.

The civil government can become involved if the person who owns the property discovers it in someone else's possession. The suspicion of theft immediately arises. This risk is an incentive for the discoverer to return it to its owner, in order to avoid future criminal prosecution for theft. But this is a separate issue. The case law in question should be seen as a moral responsibility placed on the individual directly by God, not as a civil statute.

In all likelihood, however, the individual who finds a wandering animal owned by no known person will report this to some authority. He does not want to be found in possession of another man's beast. To insure himself from a future lawsuit, he tells someone in authority, or at least local witnesses, that he has found a wandering animal. This shared information serves as a means of lowering the costs of finding lost animals. Because of the laws governing theft, this caretaker law increases the likelihood that the finder will expend extra effort to inform the authorities of his discovery. The local civil magistrate or Levite would then serve as a lost-and-found agency. Someone whose animal had wandered off would go to someone in authority and enquire regarding any report of lost animal of a particular description.

We can presume that the animal would not be too far from home. Even though this law of mandatory caretaking was not enforceable by a civil court, it was enforceable in God's court. God's court involves sanctions, positive and negative, in history. The covenant-keeper who found a lost animal would have felt moral pressure to take it to his home. He would then have had to take care of it. This was an expense that he might not have wanted. He would therefore have had another incentive to inform the authorities or in other ways get word into the community about the stray beast.

What about the output of the animal? The finder was entitled to shear the sheep if he cared for it. He could sell the wool or use it. There is no indication in this text or any other that his expense in caring for a lost animal could not be recovered by the productivity of the animal. If it ate his grass, if he had to hire extra help in caring for it, if he put it in a barn to shelter it, and no man claimed it, then he was entitled to use it. If anything happened to it while he was working it, he would have been responsible. It was not his property. It was, in this sense, on loan to him. He could not misuse it, but he could use it.

Whenever this law was honored in Israel, an animal could not have strayed far from its owner. Sooner rather than later, an Israelite would have done his duty and taken it home. The more faithful to God's law Israel was as a nation, the sooner that someone would have taken responsibility for this lost, wandering beast. The more righteous the society was, the less distance the animal could have wandered. Widespread personal righteousness in this case meant lower search costs for the owner. This was another example of the great respect for private property in the Mosaic law.

F. Treasure Hidden in a Field

This law seems to be contradictory to Jesus' parable of the kingdom of heaven: "Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto treasure hid in a field; the which when a man hath found, he hideth, and for joy thereof goeth and selleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field" (Matt. 13:44). Why isn't Jesus' example a case of lost property? Why isn't the finder required to report it to the presumed owner, i.e., the owner of the field? Because the treasure had been deliberately hidden. The finder had the right to play along with the deception.¹¹

Jesus was challenging Old Covenant Israel to cease hiding the treasure of salvation from the gentiles.¹² The kingdom of heaven is not supposed to be hidden; it is to be shared with all the world. But someone had taken the treasure and had hidden it, He said. This was similar to the action taken by the responsibility-averse wicked servant who refused to multiply his master's resources that had been entrusted to him. This was another kingdom parable.

Then he which had received the one talent came and said, Lord, I knew thee that thou art an hard man, reaping where thou hast not sown, and gathering where thou hast not strawed: And I was afraid, and went and hid thy talent in the earth: lo, there thou hast that is thine. His lord answered and said unto him, Thou wicked and slothful servant, thou knewest that I reap where I sowed not, and gather where I have not strawed: Thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers, and then at my coming I should have received mine own with usury. Take therefore the talent from him, and give it unto him which hath ten talents. For unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance: but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath. And cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth (Matt. 25:24–30).¹³

The person who discovers a hidden treasure is not under any ob-

11. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 31.

12. Paul wrote: "For ye, brethren, became followers of the churches of God which in Judaea are in Christ Jesus: for ye also have suffered like things of your own countrymen, even as they have of the Jews: Who both killed the Lord Jesus, and their own prophets, and have persecuted us; and they please not God, and are contrary to all men: Forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles that they might be saved, to fill up their sins alway: for the wrath is come upon them to the uttermost" (1 Thess. 2:14–16).

13. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 47.

ligation to inform the owner of the field of its existence (Matt. 13:44).¹⁴ Someone had taken steps to hide the asset. The original owner had decided to invest the treasure by hiding it. This is not the best way to increase wealth except in times of warfare or widespread theft. It is better to put the asset to work. The hidden asset is not being used productively.

The finder takes a great risk by selling everything he owns to make a bid on the field. The field's owner, if he knows about the treasure, may dig it up and then sell the field—now far overpriced—to the finder. But if the field's owner does not know about the hidden treasure, the buyer is not under any moral obligation to tell him about it. The field's buyer is reclaiming the asset from the heirs of the original treasure-hider, who know nothing about the whereabouts of the treasure and who did not hide it. They have no legal claims on this property. They are not like the owner of lost property, who does have a legal claim. The treasure in the field is not marked. It is not the responsibility of the discoverer to seek out the heirs, who may be scattered across the face of the earth, depending on how long the treasure has been hidden. The person most likely to put the hidden treasure to productive use is the treasure-finder who is willing to sell all that he has to buy the field.

The Jews had hidden God's kingdom in Jesus' era. They were hoarding it. They were not taking it in its pure form to the gentiles. They had encrusted it with layers of man-made law, thereby hiding it. This was hampering the growth of the kingdom. This is why Jesus also said: "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43). Jesus was telling His listeners that they had found the hidden treasure: the kingdom of heaven. It was time for them to commit everything they owned to the spread of the good news of redemption: to gentiles as well as to Jews. The Jews refused to admit that what they had done by way of legalism and nationalism had concealed the kingdom from gentiles. Thus, the kingdom was rightfully the property of the church, which stripped the message of redemption of its legalism and then shared it with the world. It was not that the kingdom had been lost; it had been deliberately hidden and kept out of plain sight. Thus, the law of lost property did not apply in the parable.

The economic principle governing hidden treasure is what W. H.

14. Ibid., ch. 31.

Hutt called the theory of idle resources. Hidden treasure is not idle if it is the object of human decision-making. It is invested in a particular way. When resources are deliberately not being used to produce goods and services, this may be because of the owners' lack of information about how to maximize the value of the unused asset, i.e., to make it worth more in production than it is sitting idle.¹⁵ When an idle resource is idle because no one recognizes it as valuable, or because the owner has forgotten where it is hidden, then the least costly way to get it back into production is to allow a finder to buy it. This is an application of the Austrian school's theory of entrepreneurship: profit as the result of the decision of an entrepreneur who bears the economic uncertainty associated with production.¹⁶ The entrepreneur believes that he possesses better knowledge regarding future consumer demand than his competitors do. He buys a productive good at a price that is lower than it would be if all producers recognized its highest-value future use. If his forecast is correct, and if he puts the underpriced asset to consumer-satisfying use, then he gains his reward: an above-average rate of return on his investment. If his forecast is incorrect, or if he misallocates the resource, then he reaps losses.

To maximize the spread of accurate information and the consumer benefits associated with this information, the free market social order allows entrepreneurs to buy fields containing "hidden treasure." These fields are in the form of scarce resources that are not priced as high as they would be if other entrepreneurs knew the truth: hidden treasures are buried here, i.e., there are benefits that consumers will be willing to pay for. These treasures are not lost resources; rather, they are forgotten or ignored resources that are not being put to their maximum consumer-satisfying uses. In short, accurate information regarding the future is not the equivalent of a lost sheep that has wandered off and will be missed by the owner. It is the equivalent of a treasure buried and therefore taken out of production by a previous owner, and then forgotten. There is no moral reason why someone who finds a way to serve the public better through putting this treasure back into production should be required to broadcast this information to anyone. But he must not steal it; he must buy the field in which it is hidden. He must bear the costs of gaining ownership.

15. W. H. Hutt, The Theory of Idle Resources: A Study in Definition, 2nd ed. (Indianapolis: LibertyPress, 1977).

16. Israel M. Kirzner, Competition and Entrepreneurship (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1973; Kirzner, Perception, Opportunity, and Profit: Studies in the Theory of Entrepreneurship (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979).

Conclusion

The lost domesticated animal is a valuable asset. To preserve the principle of private ownership, God's law assigns responsibility to the person who finds lost property. He is required by God to care for it until its owner arrives to claim it. Because of the laws against theft, it is likely that the finder will report his discovery to someone in authority. This increases the spread of knowledge. It also tends to create a lost-and-found office in society. The person who lost his property in Israel had two likely sources of information regarding his lost property: the elders in the gate and the local Levite.

This law was neither a seed law nor a land law. There is no more reason to assume that it no longer applies in the New Covenant than it would be to assume that the same principle of caretaking does not apply to lost children. The person who finds a lost beast is no more entitled to become its owner than he is entitled to become the lawful guardian of a lost child. In the case of a lost child, the judicial incentive to report the existence of the lost child is greater. Kidnapping is a capital crime (Ex. 21:16).¹⁷ But the same interpretive principle holds true: the finder is not allowed to become a keeper. The finder has an obligation to care for the lost beast as he would to care for a lost child. He has an analogous obligation to report his discovery, though not an equally intense obligation, given the disparity of the civil penalties for theft vs. kidnapping.

This law created incentives for owners to brand their beasts. By marking them, the owner made it more likely that the beast would be returned to him by the finder. The brand made it less likely that a finder would be able to claim that the animal was his rather than the owner's. In other words, the brand reduced the likelihood of either a permanently lost animal or a stolen animal. With the owner's mark on the animal, the owner could claim his right of ownership.¹⁸ This was why circumcision marked Israel. God's legal claim was on the male Israelite. The fact is, the image of God in man is God's universal claim of ownership, but the covenant mark in the Mosaic law made this ownership visible to the person so marked. God's unique claim of ownership was on an Israelite. This was the meaning of circumcision; it is also the meaning of baptism. No matter how far a “branded” covenant-keeper strays from both the protection and restraint of the institutional church, God’s mark of baptism identifies him as owned by God.

17. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 34.

18. For a child today, hand prints on a birth certificate provide even stronger evidence of original authority over the child.

NATURE'S ROOTS AND FRUITS

If a bird's nest chance to be before thee in the way in any tree, or on the ground, whether they be young ones, or eggs, and the dam sitting upon the young, or upon the eggs, thou shalt not take the dam with the young; But thou shalt in any wise let the dam go, and take the young to thee; that it may be well with thee, and that thou mayest prolong thy days (Deut. 22:6–7).

The theocentric aspect of this law is the creation. God rules over nature because He created the universe. He establishes the human rules that are to govern man's governing of nature. He places boundaries around His property.

A. Preserving Nature's Organic Productivity

This is not a seed law or a land law. It is a cross-boundary law.¹ It applies to nature in general, not just to Canaan. God gave to mankind the responsibility of ruling over the creation (Gen. 1:26).² God recapitulated this covenant with Noah and his sons (Gen. 9:1–3).³

Because this is a covenant under God, there is hierarchy. The hierarchy of the dominion covenant is this: God > man > woman > minor children > nature. Because it is a covenant, there are sanctions attached. This law announces a personal blessing for obedience: long life. The blessing itself points to point five of the biblical covenant model: continuity, i.e., greater time on earth in order to extend one's dominion over nature. The positive sanction, long life, is an aspect of inheritance: building up a capital base to leaves to one's children.

Man's dominion over nature extends God's grace to the creation.

1. On the categories of the Mosaic law, see Appendix J.

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 3.

3. Ibid., ch. 18.

The implementation of this grace is governed by God's law. The principle undergirding this Mosaic case law is that the productivity of nature must be preserved by man. The individual who finds a mother bird is allowed to claim her offspring as his lawful possession, but he must set free the mother. The mother is an instrument of productivity. She has reached adulthood. She has survived nature's challenges to youth. Animals that were further up the food chain did not catch her. Also, she did not starve. Because this animal is a skilled survivor, she is worth more as a productive asset than the newborns are. Man can do what he wishes with the newborns, but he must let the adult go free to reproduce again. In this, we can see a pattern for man-directed ecology in general. Adult mothers of wild species that are valuable to man are to be allowed to continue to reproduce.

The setting of this case law is not organized agriculture. A man comes across a bird's nest. The bird has built it where it decided, not where man decided. The Hebrew word translated "by chance" refers to an encounter. It is frequently translated "befall." A man has come upon the nest. This discovery was unplanned by the man. The bird was operating under the laws of humanly unplanned nature. This was not a chicken farm.

This law secures life for the mother because of the presence of the offspring. A man may lawfully claim an isolated female bird for his own. If it is not immediately caring for its young, it is "fair game." But what about mammals? The principle of this law is that a female with offspring under her immediate care, and therefore dependent for survival on her care, must be set free. Modern hunting laws that protect female deer are extensions of the principle that mothers caring for their young are off-limits to hunters. Young mammals are different from young birds. They can wander off. So, the fact that a female is visibly alone is not proof that she has no young under her authority. She is therefore protected from hunters. But the hunting laws also protect the young; so, these laws are in violation of this case law. Biblically, the offspring are fair game.⁴

This law protects a productive female while she is caring for her young. Her productivity in bringing offspring into the world and caring for them must be honored. This case law protects her life. It does not do so for the sake of the existing offspring, which may be law-

4. It is considered "unsporting" to shoot immature deer. The problem here is that civil laws should not be enacted which go beyond the meaning and intent of biblical law. The boundaries protecting young animals in the wild should not be civil.

fully harvested by the discoverer. My conclusion is that it protects the mother for the sake of future offspring. A demonstrably productive asset in nature must be allowed to continue its productivity. This interpretation is consistent with the law of fruit-bearing trees during a siege: the invading army may eat the fruit of nearby trees, but not cut them down (Deut. 20:19).⁵ Orchards planted by the enemy were treated as if they had grown on their own. They had not been planted by the invading Israelites; they were therefore to be left standing.

B. The Tragedy of the Commons

This law governs animals found in the wild. There is no comparable law governing domesticated animals. The owner of a farm is in charge of breeding his animals. He feeds them, shelters them, and cares for them directly. They are not survivors in the wild; they are survivors in a sheltered environment. In this setting, the owner is not under any restriction regarding mothers and offspring. He may lawfully kill the mother and eat her eggs. But will he? Probably not. After all, the mother is his property. She may not lay golden eggs, but she does lay consumable, marketable eggs. She is a capital asset that produces a stream of income. She is a proven producer. The owner probably will not kill her in her years of productivity.

Nevertheless, this female may be growing less fertile. The owner may decide that she is now fit for eating. After he collects her eggs, he is entitled to wring her neck. This is not an animal that survives in the competitive environment of nature. It is an owned resource. The owner has authority over it.

The differentiating characteristic is ownership. Animals found in the wild are unowned. In such cases, these animals may become victims of annihilation by non-owners who see them as free resources. When men are in control of free resources, they tend to overconsume them. They do not bear the costs of ownership, yet they can reap the benefits of ownership. The high benefit-cost ratio encourages them to consume the resource. After all, they are not able to collect an income stream from an animal which they encounter in a field. It is a “now or never” situation. They can now gain the benefits of owning the asset. If they wait, they will be unlikely to appropriate this particular fruit of nature. Thus, there is an economic incentive to “overharvest” the resource. They will kill the mother and take the eggs.

5. Chapter 49.

This result is sometimes called the tragedy of the commons.⁶ No one owns the wild. No one owns this particular family of animals. The costs of production are almost nonexistent to the harvester; the benefits of harvesting are high. So, he takes all of the resource. This leads to overuse of the asset: overgrazing, overpolluting, or over-whatever. Ownership provides an economic disincentive against immediate consumption. But ownership of a long-term capital asset does not exist in nature. Thus, unowned, ungoverned nature must be protected by civil law. Men, in their legal capacity as God's corporate agents over nature, must place legal restraints on the misuse of temporarily unowned nature.⁷ This is for the benefit of nature and also for the benefit of men in the future, who will be able to harvest nature's bounty. Those animals that are under mankind's covenantal authority are to be protected against the otherwise rational economic decision by a non-owning individual to overconsume nature's resources.

Because this law authorizes the discoverer to harvest the offspring, it clearly recognizes man's legal authority over nature. The fruits of nature—in this case, the offspring—are fair game for man. Man is not to be kept completely out of unowned nature for the sake of nature. Unowned nature is a challenge to man's mandated dominion over nature. It testifies to the incomplete dominion of man in history.⁸ Nature under the autonomous dominion of beasts is so repulsive to God that He allowed Canaanites to remain in the land until the Israelites could either exterminate them or drive them out. "I will not drive them out from before thee in one year; lest the land become desolate, and the beast of the field multiply against thee" (Ex. 23:29). This is why the idea that a jungle is to be preserved for the jungle's sake is an anti-

6. Garrett Hardin, "The Tragedy of the Commons," Science (Dec. 13, 1968); reprinted in Garrett de Bell (ed.), The Environmental Handbook (New York: Ballentine, 1970). For a critique, see C. R. Batten, "The Tragedy of the Commons," The Freeman (Oct. 1970). (<http://bit.ly/BatCom>) Cf. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 31:B.

7. Nature is not to remain unowned. Nature should not be owned by the state. The biblical case for state ownership must be made in terms of the principle of hierarchical responsibility. The defender of state ownership must show from the Bible either that the state has been authorized by God to serve as His dominion agent or that inherent in the arrangement are conditions that mandate bureaucratic administration. The judicial issue is God's hierarchy of ownership, not some theory of nature's rights. Nature has no rights. The idea that nature has rights independent of man as God's dominion agent is pagan to the core. Nature has no rights, in the same sense that property has no rights. It is ironic that environmentalists who decry property rights also cry for nature's rights.

8. This includes the oceans. The problem with oceans is that they are unowned. They are part of the commons. The result is an overharvesting of some species.

biblical idea. The man-killing insects of a jungle are to be treated by man with no more leniency than a plague-carrying mosquito is, unless there is some clear ecological benefit to mankind by sparing the killer.⁹

This law places restraints on the tragedy of the commons. Nature's independent productivity is to be preserved by civil law until such time as man can domesticate nature. Man subdues nature through private ownership. When land is privately owned, when animals are penned in, and when man provides a protective environment for the animals under his authority, then this law ceases to have any relevance. When the commons—commonly owned land or unowned land—disappears, so does the related tragedy of overconsumption. While it is incorrect to argue that “the only good rain forest is a dead rain forest,” it is biblically correct to say that the best rain forest is a privately owned rain forest. (By the way, “rain forest” is a term that usually refers to a jungle, a far less compelling word rhetorically in public policy debates.) While a privately owned rain forest can become the victim of inappropriate ecological management, this is also true of a politically owned rain forest. But there is this difference: private owners have greater personal economic incentives to preserve the productivity of an asset, as determined by consumers' use of the asset, than a government's salaried managers have. Also, by decentralizing ownership, the free market social order increases the likelihood that an ecological mistake will not be imposed on all of nature at the same time, which is not the case when a centralized civil government exercises direct control over the property. In short, fewer commons mean fewer and less wasteful tragedies.

Conclusion

The fruits of nature belong to man. This biblical principle undergirds this case law: the offspring can lawfully be harvested by the finder. But the roots of presently unowned nature belong to God. His delegated intermediary is nature itself until men establish direct ownership over tracts of nature and begin to manage them. Until then,

9. If burning down a forest or a jungle creates an environment in which mosquitoes multiply, and if society is unwilling or too poor to allow the use of chemicals such as DDT, then leaving the forest or jungle standing may be the best ecological policy. The mosquito historically has been man's greatest enemy in nature. Man's seeming victory over malaria-carrying mosquitoes by the mid-1960s has been rolled back by laws against DDT. Gordon Harrison, Mosquitoes, Malaria and Man: A History of the Hostilities Since 1880 (New York: Dutton, 1978).

God exercises His control over the mother hen through the operations of nature. God demonstrates His ownership by placing legal restrictions on the use of nature's capital assets. This is why the mother hen must be set free to breed another day. Man is not to overharvest un-owned, unmanaged nature. Because man is not providing the scarce means of sustaining life for nature's wild animals, he is not to be given free reign over both the roots and fruits of nature. Unless he extends a full-time system of management over nature, including the care and feeding of mother hens and their species equivalents, he is not allowed to take both the mother and her offspring in the same harvesting operation. God has placed another "no trespassing" sign around His property.

It is obvious why the state cannot easily enforce this law of the unplanned encounter: bureaucrats possess insufficient information regarding any infractions. The state's negative sanctions cannot easily be applied to those who break this law. Thus, God has attached a positive sanction to this law, one which applies to the individual. He who honors this law will receive long life. The individual reaps this reward because he is the primary locus of sovereignty for this law's enforcement. He has exclusive information regarding his encounter; he therefore is the recipient of the blessing of obedience.

This is neither a seed law nor a land law. It is a cross-boundary law. In fact, it is precisely because nature has no internal ownership boundaries that this law must be enforced: primarily by the individual; secondarily by state anti-poaching laws.

THE ROOFTOP RAILING LAW

When thou buildest a new house, then thou shalt make a battlement for thy roof, that thou bring not blood upon thine house, if any man fall from thence (Deut. 22:8).

The theocentric reference point of this law is man as God's image: the doctrine of representation, which is point two of the biblical covenant.¹ Why representation? Because the language of blood appears in the text. Man's blood must not be deliberately shed, because man is made in God's image. When a person does something which significantly threatens the lives of others, he is to be held legally liable (Ex. 21:18–19),² except in wartime or crime prevention by an officer of the law. By extension, if he builds a structure which significantly threatens the life of another person in the normal course of affairs, he is to be held legally liable for any injury suffered as a consequence. In this case, the text is concerned with the death of the victim. The language of blood points back to the law prohibiting murder in Genesis 9. "And surely your blood of your lives will I require; at the hand of every beast will I require it, and at the hand of man; at the hand of every man's brother will I require the life of man. Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made he man" (Gen. 9:5–6).

A. New Homes

The language of blood places this case law under the general cat-

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/tymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary of Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 35.

egory of murder. Thus, this law is not strictly a land law, yet is it also not strictly a cross-boundary law, as we shall see.³ It is unique.

This law has to do with a boundary around a home's roof. This boundary protects human life. A death caused by the absence of a railing around a roof is not accidental manslaughter, as it would have been under the law of the cities of refuge (Num. 35:9–29).⁴ It was murder. The civil penalty was the execution of the head of the household: eye for eye. The mere absence of a restraining device would automatically have condemned the householder judicially. There was no legally valid excuse. The risk of building a new house without a roof railing was high.

1. The Inheritance Principle

The context of the law was new construction. This law did not apply to existing houses. This law governed homes that were built in Israel after the conquest. The inheritance associated with the conquest of Canaan was not under this law. The original inheritor and his heirs were not burdened by the costs of constructing a railing on a roof. The person who bought a home that had been built by a Canaanite was not required to build a protective railing. The principle of inheritance from Canaan was more important than the principle of safe housing. When the Israelites took Canaan, the Canaanites left their houses standing. Their houses became part of Israel's lawful inheritance. An Israelite who was too poor to afford to build a railing on his roof was not to be prohibited from claiming ownership of a house with an unprotected roof. Those who ventured onto the roof of such a house did so at their own risk. The owner was not to be forced to sell the house just because he could not afford to build a railing on the roof. This law balances safety with economics. If a man has the wealth to pay for building a new home, then he is not a poor man. He has capital. He is exchanging one form of capital for another. In such cases, this law announces, the builder must go to the extra expense of building a railing on his roof. The additional cost—the marginal cost—of building a railing is small in comparison to the total cost of building the house. For a little more money, the owner secures an added measure of safety for his family and guests. As a man of means, he owes this to them. It is not a great

3. On land laws and cross-boundary laws, see Appendix J.

4. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 21.

added expense.

What about a buyer of an existing home that has no roof railing? He can afford to build a new home or buy an existing home. He chooses to buy an existing home. The text applies to a newly built house. But why shouldn't the law apply to him? One reason might be that the added marginal expense of adding a railing reduces the profit from selling the house. The law would force the seller to pay for it, thereby reducing the profit from the sale, or else force the buyer to pay,⁵ thereby reducing the market for used homes. In the case of the conquest of Canaan, the inheriting owner or his heirs would have faced reduced demand—lower value—for the sale of an asset which they inherited when the first owner participated in the conquest of Canaan. That is, such a legal requirement would have reduced the net worth of the original Israelite owner or his heirs. Mosaic law did not impose such a confiscation of inherited wealth on the owner or his heirs. This law indicates how highly the principle of inheritance was regarded by the Mosaic law.

This law does impose costs on new home construction. A new home was not part of the original inheritance of Canaan. It was part of the fruits of life in the land. For the sake of protecting the life of man, this law mandated that new-home builders pay attention to the risk of a cultural phenomenon: social gatherings on roofs. The law warned the man paying to have a home built: if you do not go to the added expense of building a protective railing around the roof, and someone falls from the roof and dies, this law designates the head of the household as a murderer. The risk of having such an event take place in one's home would have to be borne by the home owner. This added cost could be avoided by putting up a railing. The new-home owner had to make his decision in terms of costs either way.

What if the home's builder decides to sell the house immediately upon its completion? This raises the question of the transfer of legal liability. If the next buyer can escape the liability because he did not personally build the house, this would subsidize the construction of homes by professional home builders who have no intention of ever occupying them. This would place a competitive disadvantage on the individual who builds his own home or who pays to have it built. The professional contractor who builds a house before he has a contract from a buyer could build it less expensively. The buyer would be buying a home that he neither had built himself nor had agreed to have built for him. This would subsidize the building of less expensive, more risky homes. This would increase the likelihood of accidents. So, the buyer of a newly constructed house would become legally liable. He would have to pay to install a railing in order to remove this liability.

5. This applies in cases where the supply is inelastic, i.e., not price sensitive.

2. A Flat Roof

The flat roof of the ancient Near East and the Mediterranean was a place where people gathered for celebrations. It was not the tapered roof of Northern Europe, which focuses the weight of snow in such a way that it slides off the roof rather than breaking through the roof. The tapered roof has the same effect on people as it has on snow: it increases the likelihood that people will slide off the roof. People do not gather together on a tapered roof to hold parties. Climbing up a tapered roof is not part of the average person's normal daily activities. Anyone who goes onto a tapered roof does so at his own risk. He may fall off the roof accidentally, in the sense that he does not plan to fall off the roof, but knows that he may fall if he fails to take normal precautions, such as wearing shoes with non-slip soles. He may fall even with such precautions. He knows that he is doing something abnormal. He does not fall off a tapered roof accidentally in the sense of a careless act that takes place in the normal course of events.

A house designer who puts a safety railing around a tapered roof is adding to the risk of dwelling inside. Snow would be retained by such a barrier. Instead of sliding off the roof, snow may crash through it, endangering those inside the building. Thus, this safety law governing Near Eastern roofs would be a dangerous law to enforce in, say, Scandinavia. A literal application of this law in Scandinavia would not decrease risk; it would increase risk. The biblical goal of this law is to increase personal safety. If this law were applied literally without respect for geography, it would sometimes produce the opposite result: a decrease in safety.

This leads us to a principle of interpretation: we must search for the intent of a law. It is not sufficient merely to obey it. To obey a law unquestioningly is to risk misapplying it. A biblical law must be obeyed until such time as skilled interpreters find a biblical reason to apply it in some other way for the sake of the law's intent. The spirit of the law must govern the letter of the law. This case law illustrates this hermen-eutical principle better than most.

B. Self-Government Under Biblical Law

This law does not mandate the creation of a civil government bureaucracy that enforces home safety laws. It announces that the person who builds a new home must go to the expense of building a protective railing around the roof. Any owner of a newly constructed house who fails to do this faces the ultimate penalty: execution. If someone falls from a roof and is killed, the dwelling's owner must die. This enforcement of this law rests on self-government, not bureaucratic government. It relies on the self-interested decisions of home builders and new home buyers to defend themselves against the negative civil sanctions associated with harm. There is no indication from this law that the state is authorized to create a regulatory agency that writes safety codes that apply to home builders before they can legally offer their homes for sale. On the contrary, this law places decision-making authority in the hands of the home builder or new home buyer. It is his decision as to how much legal risk he is willing to bear. If he wishes to avoid legal risk but also avoid the expense of building a railing, he will have to keep people off his roof. He will lose the square footage available for entertaining. He decides.

There is a role for civil government: the enforcement of penalties after the event takes place. There is another role: announcing in advance that this penalty will be imposed. A court must convict; then the state must apply sanctions after the witnesses have testified and the court has reached a decision. The state legitimately declares in advance safety standards and the penalty for violating them, but it does not compel anyone to abide by them. We are dealing here with a discrete event: one roof, one victim of a fall. We are not dealing with a phenomenon such as pollution, in which each polluter contributes a nearly immeasurable quantity of pollution, but polluters as a group create an unpleasant or dangerous environment.

The modern world is bureaucratic as no previous society ever has been, with the possible exception of ancient Egypt.⁶ The government regulatory agency is a ubiquitous feature of modern political and economic life. Administrative law has steadily replaced legislative law.

6. "Max Weber on Bureaucratization" (1909), in J. P. Meyer, Max Weber and German Politics: A Study in Political Sociology (London: Faber & Faber, [1943] 1956), p. 127.

This constitutes a legal revolution that is undermining the Western legal tradition.⁷ If this trend is not reversed, probably by some disaster that bankrupts most civil governments, it will put an end to freedom. The top-down bureaucratic social order—Satan’s model, given his lack of omniscience and his need for tight control over rebellious subordinates—will replace the bottom-up appeals court system of biblical law (Ex. 18).⁸ The centralization of economic life will continue.

If God still brings negative sanctions in history against rebellious societies, then we can expect a great reversal, either through a religious transformation that steadily produces decentralization, or else through an unexpected cataclysmic social breakdown. The state will see its regulatory powers removed or drastically shrunk. The centralizing tendencies of political power will eventually be thwarted by the market or by the voters, though more probably the market.

C. The Price of Perfect Safety

A modern application of this law would impose personal liability on someone who places an abandoned refrigerator with a lock-latch in the alley behind his home without first removing the door or the latch. A child might play hide and seek by climbing into the refrigerator and shutting the door. He would suffocate to death. Such stories were familiar throughout the 1940s and 1950s. Courts did not always impose harsh penalties on the owners.

Had the authorities wanted to reduce the number of accidental deaths by suffocation of small children, they would have passed a law that mandated the execution of the owner of any discarded refrigerator that still had pins in its hinges. A discarded refrigerator with its hinge pins still installed would have been the judicial equivalent of an uncovered pit (Ex. 21:22–25).⁹ But politicians would not have voted for anything so drastic as execution for death-producing liability. This would have been too risky politically. Instead, they passed laws against the manufacture of lock-latch refrigerators. The sale of lock-latch refrigerators was banned in 1958 in the United States. Doors that can be pushed open from the inside were made mandatory for producers of refrigerators.

Such laws are passed primarily because judges have refused to honor the principle of holding owners personally responsible for “roofs without railings” or “uncovered pits.” In contrast, the Mosaic law did not require the civil government to impose fines on people who dug pits and then failed to cover them, nor did it mandate roof inspectors. It did not create an army of administrative law enforcers. Instead, it assigned individual responsibility to owners of dangerous property. The civil government let men’s fear of their legal liability serve as their incentive to make their property safer.

7. Harold J. Berman, Law and Revolution: The Formation of the Western Legal Tradition (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983), pp. 34–41.

8. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 19.

9. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 38.

1. Economic Effects of Legislation

There are economic effects of any legislation that assesses economic penalties before an accident occurs. These effects are seldom taken seriously by legislators or by the special-interest groups that lobby for such legislation. In the case of lock-latch refrigerators, the original product had definite advantages. When the door was closed, it audibly snapped shut. The new no-lock doors sometimes fail to close tightly, but users are not always alerted when this happens because of the absence of the old snap sound. These doors are less efficient than older doors in this respect. Unlatched doors are more easily left open by children, who find them more difficult to close than doors of the older design, which snapped shut easily. As a result, food rots from time to time, or at least cold air escapes, and these costs are borne by the owner.

It seems certain that a few lives are saved each year by this legislation, but there never were hundreds of cases of smothered children in any year. A case was a newspaper-worthy occasional event. Millions of refrigerator owners are today subjected to the statistical risk of occasionally leaving a door open and rotting a week’s food. Predictably, this cost is more difficult to bear for lower-income families, since expenses for food account for a higher proportion of their household budgets.

It may seem callous to compare the cost of spoiled food, no matter how much food gets spoiled, with the lives of children, no matter how few die of suffocation, but there are always inescapable costs with every desirable benefit. Legislation creates benefits; therefore, in a cursed, scarcity-bound world, it necessarily imposes costs. “Who benefits? How much? Who pays? How much?” These questions should always be asked before any piece of legislation is voted on. Guido Calabresi summarizes the range of decisions available to voters, legislators, and judges in deciding who should be made financially responsible for accidents: "The question of who should bear the costs of a particular accident, or of all accidents, is to be decided on the basis of the goals we wish accident law to accomplish." In short, the decision is politically open-ended.

Thus it is a policy question whether costs should be (1) borne by particular victims; (2) paid on a one-to-one basis by those who injure a particular victim; (3) borne by those broad categories of people who are likely to be victims; (4) paid by those broad categories of people who are likely to be injurers; (5) paid by those who in some way violate our moral codes (in some sense are at fault) according to the degree of their wrongdoing, whether or not they are involved in accidents; (6) paid by those who are in some actuarial sense most likely to violate our moral codes; (7) paid from the general coffers of the state by particular industry groups in accordance with criteria (such as wealth) that may be totally unrelated to accident involvement; (8) paid by some combination of these methods.¹⁰

Humanism offers no simple moral, legal, or economic rule book which governs the state's decision to impose legal liability: "... in considering the bases of accident law, there are virtually no limits on how we can allocate or divide the costs of accidents."¹¹

2. Utopian Legislation

When society adopts a utopian legal code which proclaims "better millions of extra dollars spent by consumers on a safer product design than just one child dead from an accident," it thereby places an impossibly expensive burden on society—the expense of seeking an impossible goal, risk-free existence.¹² Besides, legislators honor the principle of "better millions of dollars than just one . . ." only when it is cost-effective for them as politicians, that is, only when adversely affected voters will not be numerous enough, or not sufficiently well organized, to threaten them at the next election. For example, far more children are killed yearly in home fires than ever died in abandoned refrigerators. Many lives could be saved by legislating and continually enforcing the installation of smoke detectors in every home.

10. Guido Calabresi, The Costs of Accidents: A Legal and Economic Analysis (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1970), p. 22.

11. Ibid., p. 23.

12. Mary Douglas and Aaron Wildavsky, Risk and Culture: An Essay on the Selection of Technological and Environmental Dangers (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982).

Legislators could also require fire escape drills twice a year, with penalties on parents for violating this law. Voters today refuse to accept the level of interference in their lives by the state that the enforcement of such a fire safety law would require. So, legislators in this case ignore the principle of "better millions of dollars than just one . . ." They honor it only when comparatively few lives are threatened (e.g., asphyxiated children in abandoned refrigerators), and only a few companies need be monitored (e.g., appliance manufacturers).

A similar analysis can be made of speed limits on highways. There is no doubt that highway deaths could be reduced drastically if legislators would pass a maximum speed law of 25 miles (40 kilometers) per hour and then allocate large sums of money each year to enforce the law. The same could also be said if they would establish the death penalty for any drunk driver who kills another person in an auto accident. But the public seems unwilling to tolerate such legislation.

Conclusion

The law of the roof railing applied only to houses constructed after the conquest. The law of original inheritance was superior in Mosaic Israel to the safety law of the roof. The inheritor of a home built by a Canaanite was not under the civil sanctions of this law. He who went onto a flat roof built by a Canaanite did so at his own risk. If there was no railing, he had to be extra careful. This transferred legal liability to the guests. This was a consequence of the Mosaic law's defense of original inheritance. The conquest of Canaan was Israel's original inheritance, and it was defended by law.

The railing law transferred legal liability to the owners of post-Canaanite homes. The original owner of such a home had to consider the risk of hosting a party on his roof. If he failed to build a railing, he would lose his life in the case of a fatal fall by another person. This law therefore provided an incentive to owners to have documentation regarding original ownership. If the owner could not prove that his home had been built before the conquest, he became legally liable. A detailed record-keeping system was not mandated by this law, but it was surely encouraged.

This law was not intended to create an administrative bureaucracy of building inspectors. It was not a system of government licensing. It transferred legal liability to owners. In this sense, it reinforced the authority of the court system at the expense of the regulatory administrative law system. This indicates the presence in Mosaic legal order of an impulse hostile to administrative law.

This law may make no sense in a different environment, such as tapered roofs or thatched roofs. It applies only to a society that has flat roofs. This law teaches us that we must consider the judicial and moral principles undergirding a particular law. In this case, the primary principle was the inviolability of Israel's original inheritance; the secondary principle was cost-effective safety in a high-risk environment. The primary principle disappeared with the disappearance of the original housing. The secondary principle remains.

This was a unique law: partially a land law—original inheritance—and partially a cross-boundary law. Once the original housing wore out, it remained a cross-boundary law, but of a peculiar kind: one which could not be applied literally in every weather environment and still maintain its goal, i.e., personal safety.

LAWS PROHIBITING MIXTURES

Thou shalt not sow thy vineyard with divers seeds: lest the fruit of thy seed which thou hast sown, and the fruit of thy vineyard, be defiled. Thou shalt not plow with an ox and an ass together. Thou shalt not wear a garment of divers sorts, as of woollen and linen together (Deut. 22:9–11).

The theocentric principle here is God's holiness: ethical boundaries.¹ God separates Himself from evil.

A. Boundaries and Holiness

The land of Israel was holy, i.e., sanctified. This is a typical explanation for laws of separation.²

The first prohibition was a law governing ritual pollution: defilement. What was the basis of this defilement? The text does not say. There is no doubt that the theological issue is holiness: boundaries.

The law of the plowing team and the law of mixed clothing seem to be in some way related to the first law. They are laws of separation: boundaries. Separation had something to do with ritual pollution, but what? Why was a field of mixed seeds evil? What did this symbolize? Israel's separation from Canaan? Israel's separation from the nations around her? Or one tribe's separation from another?

I have already analyzed the parallel verse in Leviticus: "Ye shall keep my statutes. Thou shalt not let thy cattle gender with a diverse kind: thou shalt not sow thy field with mingled seed; neither shall a garment mingled of linen and woollen come upon thee" (Lev. 19:19). I have decided to reprint portions of that chapter in this volume, since

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012).

2. Samson Raphael Hirsch, The Pentateuch, 5 vols. (Gateshead, London: Judaica, 1989), V, p. 438.

some readers will not have a copy of my Leviticus commentary.³

The theocentric meaning of this passage is the meaning of the entire Book of Leviticus: God's boundaries must be respected. This case law established three boundaries, each referring to a specific economic activity: animal husbandry, agriculture, and textiles. Except for the products of mining and metalworking, these were the primary categories of economic goods in the ancient world. Leviticus 19:19 established rules for all three industries.

That world is long gone. Beginning no later than the fifteenth century, A.D., and accelerating rapidly in the late eighteenth century, a series of improvements in all three industries transformed the traditional economy of Europe. The modern capitalist system, with its emphasis on private ownership, the specialization of production, and the division of labor, steadily replaced the older medieval world of the common fields. This comprehensive economic transformation was accompanied by the violation of at least the first two of the statutes of Leviticus 19:19, and seemingly all three.

The question I need to answer is this: Was this law annulled by the New Covenant, or was the Agricultural/Industrial Revolution illegitimate biblically? I argue that the law was annulled.⁴

This raises the question of biblical interpretation: hermeneutics. I cover this in the next section.

B. Hermeneutics

A hermeneutic⁵ is the principle of interpretation. My theonomic hermeneutic enables me to do three things that every system of biblical hermeneutics should do: (1) identify the primary function of an Old Covenant law, (2) discover whether it is universal in a redemptive (healing) sense, or whether (3) it was conditioned by its redemptive-historical context (i.e., annulled by the New Covenant). In short: What did the law mean, how did it apply inside and outside Mosaic Israel, and how should it apply today? This exegetical task is not always easy, but it is mandatory. It is a task that has been ignored or denied by the vast majority of Christian theologians for almost two millennia.

The question here is the hermeneutical problem of identifying

3. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 17.

4. An earlier version of this chapter appears in Theonomy: An Informed Response, ed. Gary North (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991), ch. 10. (<http://bit.ly/gntheon>)

5. The singular can also be “hermeneutics.”

covenantal continuity and covenantal discontinuity. First, in questions of covenantal continuity, we need to ask: What is the underlying ethical principle? God does not change ethically. The moral law is still binding, but its application may not be. Second, this raises the question of covenantal discontinuity. What has changed as a result of the New Testament era's fulfillment of Old Covenant prophecy and the inauguration of the New Covenant? A continuity—prophetic-judicial fulfillment—has in some cases produced a judicial discontinuity: the annulment of a case law's application.

I begin any investigation of any suspected judicial discontinuity with the following questions. First, is the case law related to the priesthood, which has changed (Heb. 7:11–12)? Second, is it related to the sacraments, which have changed? Third, is it related to the jubilee land laws (e.g., inheritance), which Christ announced that He had fulfilled (Luke 4:18–21)?⁶ Fourth, is it related to the tribes (e.g., the seed laws),⁷ which Christ fulfilled in His office as Shiloh, the promised Seed (Gal. 3:16)? Fifth, is it related to the “middle wall of partition” between Jew and gentile, which Jesus Christ's gospel has broken down (Gal. 3:28; Eph. 2:14–20)?⁸ These five principles prove fruitful in analyzing Leviticus 19:19 and Deuteronomy 22:9–11.⁹

Let us consider another question: Has a change in the New Covenant's priesthood (Heb. 7) also been accompanied by a change in the laws governing the family covenant? I can think of one. The church from the beginning has denied the legality of polygamy, even though there is no explicit rejection of polygamy in the New Testament except for church officers: husbands of one wife (I Tim. 3:2, 12).¹⁰ The church

6. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

7. On seed laws, see Appendix J.

8. This application is especially important in dealing with Rushdoony's theory of “hybridization.” See North, Boundaries and Dominion, Appendix F: “Rushdoony on ‘Hybridization’: From Genetic Separation to Racial Separation.”

9. There are several other hermeneutical questions that we can ask that relate to covenantal discontinuity. Sixth, is it an aspect of the weakness of the Israelites, which Christ's ministry has overcome, thereby intensifying the rigors of an Old Covenant law (Matt. 5:21–48)? Seventh, is it an aspect of the Old Covenant's cursed six day-one day work week rather than the one day-six day pattern of the New Covenant's now-redeemed week (Heb. 4:1–11)? Eighth, is it part of legal order of the once ritually polluted earth, which has now been cleansed by Christ (Acts 10; I Cor. 8)?

10. There is a valid theological reason for the rejection of polygamy, but it is rarely discussed: Jesus' extension of the right of unilateral divorce to wives (Mark 10:2–12). Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 3, Appendix A.

has never been clear on the exegetical reason for abandoning polygamy. Christians are hard-pressed to defend the change biblically. They invoke common sense or church tradition. There is a biblical reason for the change, but it is indirect, and I may be the only person who has discovered it. The reason for the change is Christ's change in the divorce law. A woman today can lawfully divorce her husband for reasons other than adultery (Mark 10:12). In the Mosaic law, only the husband could lawfully do this (Deut. 24:1). In the New Covenant, neither the divorcing wife nor the divorcing husband may remarry after a no-fault divorce. To marry such a person is to commit adultery (Mark 10:12). Because of the New Testament's principle of gender equality under ecclesiastical law—an equality based on baptism of males and females—a husband may not lawfully have more than one wife. If he did, this would make no-fault divorce far less of a sexual burden for a husband.¹¹

Did other changes in the family accompany the New Covenant's change in the priesthood? Specifically, have changes in inheritance taken place? Have these changes resulted in the annulment of the jubilee land laws of the Mosaic economy?¹² Finally, has an annulment of the jubilee land laws annulled the laws of tribal administration?

C. Case Laws and Underlying Principles

Laws governing agriculture, plowing, and textile production had to be taken very seriously under the Mosaic covenant. The expositor's initial presumption should be that these three laws constitute a judicial unit. If they are a unit, there has to be some underlying judicial principle common to all three. All three prohibitions deal with mixing. The first question we need to ask is the crucial one: What was the covenantal meaning of these laws? The second question is: What was their economic effect?

I argue here that the fundamental judicial principle undergirding the passage is the requirement of separation. Two kinds of separation were involved: tribal and covenantal. The first two clauses were agricultural applications of the mandatory segregation of the tribes inside Israel until a unique prophesied Seed would appear in history: the Messiah. We know who the Seed is: Jesus Christ. Paul wrote: "Now unto Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not,

11. North, Hierarchy and Dominion, Appendix A.

12. On land laws, see Appendix J.

And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, and to thy seed, which is Christ" (Gal. 3:16). The context of Paul's discussion is inheritance. Inheritance is by promise, he said. The Mosaic law applied "till the seed should come to whom the promise was made" (Gal. 3:18). Two-thirds of Leviticus 19:19 relates to the inheritance laws of national Israel, as we shall see. When the Levitical land inheritance laws (Lev. 25) ended with the establishment of a new priesthood, so did the authority of Leviticus 19:19.

The final clause of both Leviticus 19:19 and Deuteronomy 22:11 deals with prohibited clothing. This prohibition related not to separation among the tribes of Israel—separation within a covenant—but rather the separation of national Israel from other nations. The principle undergirding second form of separation—clothing—is more familiar to us: covenantal separation.

D. Boundary of Blood: Seed and Land

The preservation of Israel's unique covenantal status was required by the Mosaic law. The physical manifestation of this separation was circumcision. A boundary of blood was imposed on the male organ of reproduction. It was a sign that covenantal life is not obtained by either physical birth or through one's male heirs. Rushdoony wrote about the meaning of circumcision as a denial of faith in man's ability to reproduce himself bilogically. "Circumcision witnesses to the fact that man's hope is not in generation but in regeneration. . . ." ¹³ To escape Adam's legal status as a covenant-breaker, a man must re-covenant with God, a human response made possible by God's absolutely sovereign act of regeneration. The mark of this covenant in ancient Israel was circumcision. Ultimately, this separation was confessional. It involved an affirmation of the sovereignty of Israel's God. This was a different kind of boundary from those that divided the tribes, for the tribes were united confessionally: "Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God is one LORD: And thou shalt love the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might" (Deut. 6:4–5). ¹⁴ The nation of Israel was separated from non-covenanted nations by geographical boundaries, but most of all, by covenantal boundaries.

Tribal and family units separated the covenant people within Israel. This separation was always to be geographical, usually familial,¹⁵ but never confessional. Again, every tribe confessed the same confession (Deut. 6:4). They were divided tribally because they would have different heirs. Only one tribe would bring forth the promised Seed. Tribal separation was therefore based on differences in prophetic inheritance.

13. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 43.

14. Chapter 15.

Israel's tribal divisions had political implications. They guaranteed localism. This localism of tribal inheritance was the judicial complement of the unity of national covenantal confession. Tribal boundaries were part of an overall structure of covenantal unity.

Family membership and rural land ownership in Israel were tied together by the laws of inheritance. A rural Israelite—and most Israelites were rural¹⁶—was the heir of a specific plot of ground because of his family membership. There was no rural landed inheritance apart from family membership. Unlike the laws of ancient Greece, Mosaic law allowed a daughter to inherit the family's land if there was no son. But there was a condition: she had to marry within the tribal unit (Num. 36:8). The landed inheritance could not lawfully move from one tribe to another (Num. 36:9).¹⁷ A man's primary inheritance in Israel was his legal status (freemanship). He had the right to serve in God's holy army. He also inherited rural land (Lev. 25:10) or, if he was a Levite, land in Levitical cities (Lev. 25:32–33). The Promised Land was tied to name. The land of Israel was God's; His name was on it. The family's land was tied to the family's name.¹⁸ Jacob had promised Judah that his blood line would rule until the promised heir (Shiloh) should come (Gen. 49:10). Thus, the integrity of each of the seed lines in Israel—family by family, tribe by tribe—was maintained by the Mosaic law until this promise was fulfilled. The mandatory separation among the tribes was symbolized by the prohibition against mixing seeds. The prohibition applied to the mixing of seeds in one field (Lev. 19:19). The field did not represent the whole world under the Mosaic covenant; the field represented the Promised Land. The husbandman or farmer had to create boundaries between his specialized breeds and between 15. There could be inter-tribal marriages. Daughters received dowries rather than landed inheritance. Dowries could cross tribal boundaries.

16. This is not to say that God intended them to remain rural. On the contrary, the covenantal blessing of God in the form of population growth was to move most Israelites into the cities as time went on. See Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 24:F.

17. The exception was when rural land that had been pledged to a priest went to him in the jubilee year if the pledge was violated (Lev. 27:20–21). Ibid., ch. 36.

18. Ibid., ch. 17:G:2.

his crops.

So closely were seed and land connected in the Mosaic law that the foreign eunuch, having no possibility of seed, was not allowed to become a citizen in Israel (Deut. 23:1). (The New Testament's system of adoption has annulled this law: Acts 8:26–38.)

Leviticus 19:19 is part of the Mosaic covenant's laws governing the preservation of the family's seed (name) during a particular period of history. It was an aspect of inheritance: the necessary preservation of genetic Israel. The preservation of the separate seeds of Israel's families was basic to the preservation of the nation's legal status as a set-apart, separated, holy covenantal entity. This principle of separation applied to domesticated animals, crops, and clothing.

E. Covenantal Separation

Let us now consider the law prohibiting the linking an ox and a donkey in plowing (Deut. 22:10). In Leviticus 19:19, the prohibition was against the mixing of breeds in order to develop specialized breeds. This was a seed law: there was a possibility of interbreeding. Such was not the case in the law against joint plowing.

The ox and the donkey work differently. They are not beasts with the same strengths and habits. To use them in a joint plowing effort is to reduce the productivity of both. Neither can achieve its proper calling before God if they are linked by a yoke in the same work effort. The yoke makes each of them a poorer servant. This prohibition was not a seed law; it was a covenantal law. Paul wrote: "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness? And what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? for ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people. Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you, And will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty" (II Cor. 6:14–18). The law against joint plowing is a law against putting covenanted people with noncovenanted people in the same covenantal institution. The issue here is theological confession. A common theological confession is the biblical yoke. Those who refuse to take a covenantal oath are not to be joined in a common covenantal task with those who take it. There are three institutions to which this principle applies: church, family, and state.

This law was symbolic of all three covenantal relationships in society: church, family, and state. Israel was not to join with other nations in a covenantal bond; neither were Israelites to marry foreigners. The church was to be kept pure. Modern humanistic political theory denies that this principle of separation applies to the civil covenant, but clearly it applied in Mosaic Israel. Where Israelites exercised lawful civil authority, they were not voluntarily to share political power with covenant-breakers. Those Christians who invoke Paul's authority to prohibit marriages between Christians and non-Christians are necessarily invoking Deuteronomy 22:10. No one should assume that Paul annulled the principle of unequal yoking in the civil covenant while affirming it in the church and family covenants. The case for Paul's supposed annulment of the civil covenant's yoke must be proven exegetically. It must not merely be assumed. Israel was under civil bondage during the captivity and after, so this law could not be applied in civil government, but this is not proof that this law has been partially annulled. Christian political pluralists assume that the law of unequal yoking has been partially annulled, but they do not offer an exegetical defense.¹⁹

F. Clothing

Mixed clothing made of linen and wool was under a different kind of prohibition. It was illegal to wear clothing produced by mixing these two fibers. There was no law against producing mixed cloth for export, however. Why was wearing it wrong but exporting it allowed?²⁰

No other form of mixed-fiber clothing was prohibited by the Mosaic law. Did this case law by implication or extension prohibit all mixed fibers? This seems doubtful. It would have been easy to specify the more general prohibition rather than single out these two fibers. Then what was the nature of the offense? Answer: to wear clothing of this mixture was to proclaim symbolically the equality of Israel with all other nations. This could not be done lawfully by Israelites. It could be done by non-Israelites outside Israel, for there, no such opinion had any covenantal authority.

19. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

20. In biblical law, if something is not prohibited, it is allowed.

Linen was the priestly cloth. The priests were required to wear linen on the day of atonement (Lev. 16:30–34). Linen was to be worn by the priest in the sacrifice of the burnt offering (Lev. 6:10). During and after the Babylonian captivity, because of their rebellion in Israel, the Levites and priests were placed under a new requirement that kept them separate from the people: they had to wear linen whenever they served before the table of the Lord. They had to put on linen garments when they entered God's presence in the inner court, and remove them when they returned to the outer court. No wool was to come upon them (Ezek. 44:15–19). The text says, "they shall not sanctify the people with their garments" (Ezek. 44:19). Priestly holiness was associated with linen.

Inside a priestly nation, such a mixture was a threat to the holiness of the priests when they brought sacrifices before God. As between a priestly nation and a non-priestly nation, this section of Leviticus 19:19 symbolized the national separation of believers from unbelievers. Deuteronomy 22:11 is the parallel passage: "Thou shalt not wear a garment of divers sorts: [as] of wool and linen together."

Inside the boundaries of Israel, this law symbolized sacrificial separation: the tribe of Levi was set apart as a legal representative before God. In this intra-national sense, this law did have a role to play in the separation of the tribes. This is why it was connected to the two seed laws in Leviticus 19:19.

It is still prohibited to mix covenantal (confessional) opposites in a single covenant: in church, state, and family. But is the wearing of this mixture of these two fabrics still prohibited? No. Why not? Because of the change in the priesthood (Gal. 3). Our new covering is Jesus Christ. Paul wrote: "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus. And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. 3:27–29). Here it is again: inheritance is by God's promise to Abraham. The sign of this inheritance is no longer circumcision; it is baptism. This is our new clothing. The old prohibition against mixing wool and linen in our clothing is annulled. The new priesthood is under a new covering: Jesus Christ.

G. The Question of Jurisdiction

Was this a civil law or an ecclesiastical law? To identify it as a civil law, we should be able to specify appropriate civil sanctions. The text mentions none. The civil magistrate might have confiscated the progeny of the interbreeding activities, but then what? Sell the animals? Export them? Kill them and sell the meat? These were possible sanctions, but the text is silent. What about mingled seed? Was the entire crop to be confiscated by the state? Could it lawfully be sold? Was it unclean? The text is silent. This silence establishes a prima facie case for the law as ecclesiastical.

The mixed clothing law refers to a fact of covenantal separation: a nation of priests. The Israelites were not to wear clothing made of linen and wool. Mixing testified symbolically to the legitimacy of mixing a nation of priests and a common nation. This is why wearing such mixed cloth was prohibited. This aspect of the case law's meaning was primarily priestly. Again, the prima facie case is that this was an ecclesiastical law and therefore to be enforced by the priesthood.

The maximum ecclesiastical sanction was excommunication. This would have marked the law-breaker as being outside the civil covenant. He faced the loss of his citizenship as well as the disinheritance of his sons unless they broke with him publicly. Instead of a mere economic loss, he faced a far greater penalty. This penalty was consistent with the status of this law as a seed law. The prohibition of mixed seeds was an affirmation of tribal separation until Shiloh came. An attack on tribal separation was an attack on Jacob's messianic prophecy. The appropriate penalty was ecclesiastical: removal from both inheritance and citizenship within the tribe.

Conclusion

In this chapter I have attempted to answer three questions: What did these verses mean? How were they applied? How should they be applied today? This is the three-part challenge of biblical hermeneutics.

The prohibition against the mixing of seeds—animals and crops—was symbolic of the mandatory separation of the tribes. This separation was eschatologically based: till Shiloh came (Gen. 49:10). The prohibition against wearing a mixed cloth of linen and wool was a priestly prohibition: separation of the tribe of Levi within Israel and symbolic of the separation of the priestly nation of Israel from other nations, i.e., a confessional separation.

The law prohibiting mixed seeds was temporary because it was tribal. It ended with the death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ, or, at the latest, at Pentecost. Spiritual adoption has overcome tribalism as the basis of inheritance in the kingdom of God. The gift of the Spirit, not physical reproduction, is the basis of Christians' inheritance. National Israel was disinherited in A.D. 70.²¹ The kingdom of God was taken from national Israel and given to a new nation, the church (Matt. 21:43). The jubilee land laws (Lev. 25) have ended forever. So have the prohibitions against genetic mixing and mixed crops. When people are baptized into Christ through the Spirit, this new priesthood puts on Christ. The older requirements or prohibitions regarding certain types of garments have ended forever. What remains is the judicial boundary between covenant-breakers and covenant-keepers. This separation is eternal (Rev. 20:14–15).

The biblical principle of not mixing seeds, whether of animals or crops, in a single field applies to us only indirectly. The basic judicial application is that we must be faithful to Jesus Christ, the promised Seed, who has come in history. In Him alone is true inheritance. But there is no application with respect to tribal boundaries. The tribes of Israel are gone forever. Thus, there is no application of this verse genetically. We are allowed to breed animals and plant various crops in the same field at the same time.

The other applications of the principle of separation prohibited (1) plowing with both an ox and a donkey, (2) the wearing of mixed fiber garments: linen and wool. The prohibition against plowing with different species reflects the biblical principle of covenantal relationships: the prohibition against unequal yoking. Israel was to have no covenantal relationships with the nations around her. That law is still in force.

The prohibition against mixed clothing applies to us today through baptism, for by baptism we have received our new clothing in Christ. This principle of separation still holds nationally, for it is covenantal, not tribal. It refers to the distinctions between priests and non-priests, between priestly nations (confessionally Christian) and non-priestly nations. It refers to the distinction between Christendom and every other world system. But it has nothing to do with fabrics any longer.

21. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW

Thou shalt not deliver unto his master the servant which is escaped from his master unto thee: He shall dwell with thee, even among you, in that place which he shall choose in one of thy gates, where it liketh him best: thou shalt not oppress him (Deut. 23:15–16).

The theocentric principle that undergirded this law is the principle of God’s sanctuary. The meaning of “sanctuary,” as with “sanctification,” is related to holiness. A sanctuary is a place formally marked by boundaries for the worship of God. This does not mean that everyone who enters a sanctuary is there to worship God. It does mean that everyone inside its boundaries has unique access to God.

A. Slaves from Abroad

This law seems to be contrary to the Mosaic law’s defense of private property in slaves. Foreign slaves in Israel were the permanent possession of their Israelite owners, generation after generation (Lev. 25:44–46).¹ Furthermore, Israelite bondservants were not free to come and go as they pleased. A debtor who had forfeited payment on a zero-interest charitable loan had to serve his creditor until the next year of release—up to six years (Ex. 21:2).² If an Israelite had been sold into bondage to another Israelite in order to repay a non-charitable loan, he had to serve until the next jubilee—up to 49 years (Lev. 25:39–40).³ If an Israelite sold himself into bondservitude to a resident alien, he had to serve until the next jubilee or until one of his relatives bought him out of servitude (Lev. 25:47–52).⁴ In short, the Mosaic law upheld the right

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 30.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 31.

3. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 29.

4. Ibid., ch. 31.

of a foreigner to retain ownership of an Israelite. This was a strong defense of private property. Contrary to Rushdoony, there was nothing even remotely voluntary about remaining in temporary bondservice, let alone permanent slavery.⁵ This is why it took an act of extreme violence by a master to authorize a civil court to award a slave his freedom, e.g., poking out an eye or knocking out a tooth (Ex. 21:26–27).⁶

This was not a land law.⁷ If the jubilee land law authorizing foreign servitude could not be invoked by a foreign slave owner to get back his slave, surely a foreigner cannot invoke it today, after Christ has annulled the jubilee law (Luke 4:17–21),⁸ including the law authorizing inter-generational slavery.

1. An Immigrant

The key words that unlock the meaning of this passage are among and gates. The escaped slave described in this passage had come to dwell among them. The words “with thee” were added by the translators. The Hebrew word for among immediately follows dwell. The Hebrew word could also be translated within, meaning within a jurisdiction. The escaped slave also had the right to choose where he would live. He could choose one gate from many gates, meaning any city.

To understand this law better, we must first consider the fact that Mosaic civil law did not compel anyone to offer positive sanctions.⁹ Rather, it imposed negative sanctions for evil acts. It should be the ideal for every system of civil law to remove all positive sanctions by the state and impose only those negative sanctions authorized by, or implied by, biblical law. The state is to impose negative sanctions only: punishing public evil. It is not a wealth-creator; it is a wealth-redistributor. It is not safe to entrust to the state the power of making one man rich at the expense of another. It is also not moral. A welfare state is a covenant-breaking state.

5. He wrote: “Thus, the only kind of slavery permitted is voluntary slavery, as Deuteronomy 23:15, 16 makes very clear.” R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 286.

6. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 39.

7. On land laws, see Appendix J.

8. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

9. Restitution payments by the convicted criminal are the restoration of what is owed to the victim. The state coercively redistributes wealth back to the lawful owner. The legal owner was the victim of a crime. Under biblical law, no one has a legal claim on another person’s wealth merely because the other person is richer.

Second, we should recognize that slaves do not “dwell among” an individual. The language indicates that this law was addressed to a corporate group, the nation. It was a civil law. It did not compel any Israelite to grant a positive sanction to the escaped slave. What it did was to prohibit Israel’s civil authorities from imposing a specific negative sanction on him, namely, returning him to his owner or forbidding him the right to take up residence in a city. The locus of jurisdiction was the nation, from which the slave could choose any city as his place of residence. This indicates that he had not previously been a resident of Israel. He was an escapee from servitude in a foreign household in a foreign nation.

2. Idolatry

The key covenantal issue here is hierarchy. This former slave had been in bondage to a foreign master, who in turn was in bondage to a foreign god. The slave had sought deliverance from his former master. He had decided to come to Israel because it was the nation in which former slaves could be free men. Men were free in Israel because they were not in bondage to idols. This is the heart of the Bible’s message: deliverance from evil. This deliverance begins with deliverance from idolatry. In the Old Covenant, idolatry was almost universal outside of Israel.¹⁰ There was little likelihood that this slave would bring along an idol from the household of his former master. Such an idol would have been the mark of his former servitude. In any case, household or civic idols in the ancient Near East were exclusively local gods. The fugitive slave’s presence inside the boundaries of Israel testified to their limited jurisdiction.

My interpretation of this law as applying to foreign slaves has ancient precedents. The Talmud declared this fugitive to be a non-Jewish slave of a Jewish master living outside the land (Gittin 45a). There is no exegetical evidence for identifying the owner as a Hebrew, but the rabbis did identify the fugitive as having immigrated into Israel. Nachmanides argued that this slave had been in bondage to a foreigner. The key issue was idolatry, he said. “The reason for this commandment is that with us he will worship God and it is not proper that we return him to his master to worship idols.”¹¹ This statement is incor-

10. The one major exception was Greek rationalism, a millennium after this law was declared. But Greek rationalism was the religion of very few classical Greeks, as Socrates’ execution indicates.

11. Nachmanides, Commentary on the Torah, 5 vols. (New York: Shiloh, [1267?])

rect with respect to worshipping God, for worship was not required of any foreigner residing in Israel. He was required only to obey God's civil laws, which did not include formal worship. But it is true that the slave had been delivered from the idolatrous rituals of his former household, in which a slave would probably have been compelled to participate.

Nachmanides also argued that the slave probably had fled into the camp of the Israelites during an offensive military campaign by Israel against a foreign city.¹² The previous section of Deuteronomy sets forth laws governing foreign campaigns (vv. 9–14). This is a plausible argument. A foreign slave would have had a much greater opportunity to flee from a foreign master during a defensive war against Israel. But this law stands on its own, irrespective of war. Any slave who could get to Israel—the Promised Land—could escape bondage. This fact would have become well known among slaves in the ancient Near East, as word of this sanctuary spread from slave to slave. Israel would have attracted other men's slaves.

3. Private Property

Israel honored private property. Property is an extension of the kingdom of God in history. Private property is an owner's legal immunity from fraud and violence, both private and public, which is granted by God and is supposed to be enforced by the state. God's authority to grant such a legal immunity is based on His original ownership of the creation and His delegation of stewardship tasks to individuals. Every individual is responsible to God for the management of whatever it is that God has put under his authority, as Jesus' parable of the three stewards indicates (Matt. 25:14–30)¹³—the parable that immediately precedes His description of the final judgment: sheep and goats. In short, private property is legally grounded in the doctrine of God's absolute sovereignty.

The foreign slave master did not acknowledge God's authority. Therefore, his rights of property were inferior to the fugitive slave's right to asylum in Israel. The Promised Land was to be a place of refuge, a sanctuary—a set-apart place, i.e., a holy place. Immigrant fugitive slaves were not compelled to worship God, but they did have to 1976), V, p. 288.

12. Idem.

13. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 47.

obey God's civil laws. They had to honor God to this extent. Foreign gods could no longer claim jurisdiction over these ex-slaves. The power of foreign gods was broken to this extent.

The former slave master was disinherited by this law. His living inheritance had fled to a sanctuary. The legal defense of his inheritance under the authority of an idol was sacrificed to the principle of defending Israel's boundaries and its sanctuary status. The biblical covenantal principles of God's sovereignty, His hierarchical authority, and Israel's boundaries were superior to pagan covenantal principles: local god or gods, an alternative hierarchy, and local jurisdiction.

In effect, the Mosaic law acknowledged the right of a foreign slave master to proclaim his local god's local authority. If he chose to live under such tyranny, he was entitled to do so. But this idolatrous tyranny would not extend its authority across Israel's borders. This case law mandated that Israel's civil government not return immigrant slaves to their foreign masters. It announced to foreign masters: "You want to worship a local god? Very well, have your own way. Your god's jurisdiction does not extend across Israel's boundaries. Your property rights in people's lives do not extend across these boundaries."

This means that a foreign slave who had been purchased by an Israelite in a foreign nation would henceforth live inside a sanctuary established by God: a covenant-keeping household in a covenant-keeping nation. He could hear God's word there. He would be circumcised (Gen. 17:2). He would attend Passover with the family. Through lawful purchase, he had been separated from the idolatry of his nation. Legally, the head of his new household had become his kinsman redeemer. This practice pointed forward to Jesus Christ's purchase of the gentiles through His death on Calvary. Covenanted gentiles now live in His household, not merely as servants but as adopted sons. Christ has become their kinsman redeemer.

Whether a slave's new household was located in a foreign nation or in Israel, he was the property of his owner. Prior to the annulment of the law of permanent slavery by Jesus Christ's fulfillment of the jubilee law, the principle of the covenant-keeping household as a foreign slave's sanctuary superseded the principle of the Israelite city as the foreign slave's sanctuary.¹⁴

14. In the New Covenant, the principle of the covenanted Trinitarian nation as a sanctuary for oppressed foreign slaves is still in effect. This includes the escaped slaves of messianic states.

B. Oppression

The Mosaic law repeatedly mentions three classes of people who deserved special consideration as deserving of justice: widows, orphans, and strangers. The immigrant fugitive slave was in a vulnerable position—indeed, the most vulnerable position in Israel. He could not return home without becoming enslaved again. Worse; he was a man who had run away. He would be subject to harsh penalties. Masters would have made him an example to other would-be fugitive slaves. The fugitive slave in Israel had no local family, no access to landed inheritance, no citizenship, and no place to return. He had been at the bottom of the social ladder in his home country. Except for the foreign slave permanently owned by an Israelite family, he was at the bottom of the social scale in Israel. But, economically speaking, he was potentially in worse shape than the permanent slave, who was part of an Israelite household. He had no economic safety net.

What did it mean to oppress a person? Oppression as defined by the Bible is a judicial act. It involves using civil law to steal from or otherwise restrict an honest person. Oppression is a misuse of the civil law. There is no economic definition available to civil judges to identify oppression. There is only a judicial standard.¹⁵ The biblical principle of civil justice is expressed in Exodus 12:49: “One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you.” The rule of law is at the heart of civil justice.¹⁶ To use the civil law to shape the outcome of another person’s economic output is a form of oppression. When the state shapes economic results by applying the law to one group in a way not applied to all men, someone is being oppressed.

The judicial defenselessness of the immigrant ex-slave was not supposed to become an opportunity for oppression. He was not to be targeted as a likely candidate for theft through judicial manipulation. His property rights were to be upheld in Israel, unlike his former master’s property rights. His former master had gained authority over him by means of another god’s laws. The God of Israel had become his liberator. Liberation in Israel was a symbol of liberation by God. It meant liberation from corrupt civil laws. The rule of God’s law gave him his liberty. It also warned him regarding the final judgment: all men are under the same law and sanctions. All men need the mercy of God as the judicial basis of their liberation from sin and its eternal consequences: negative sanctions.

15. North, Authority and Dominion, chaps. 48:C, 52.

16. Ibid., ch. 14.

Conclusion

Economics is subordinate to biblically revealed religion. So is everything else. Private property is not an absolute principle. Neither is any other principle. No arrangement or institution is absolute in history. Only the written word of God possesses unchangeable, comprehensive authority in history.¹⁷ No institution can legitimately claim total allegiance. Any institution that does so will fail. The more secular it is, the sooner it will fail. This is why the Communist Party failed, despite its extraordinary international expansion under Lenin and Stalin. It claimed total allegiance.¹⁸ It could not enforce this. One by one, the most eloquent of Communism's disaffected former disciples recognized it as the god that had failed, decades before it visibly failed.¹⁹

Is this case law still in force? Yes. Christian societies should be sanctuary societies, where liberty is available to all residents: liberty under biblical law. The sanctuary is bounded; these boundaries must be defended by the sword. This means that Christian societies must be defended by confessionally Christian civil governments. In short, biblical sanctuary means Trinitarian theocracy. There can be no permanent sanctuary state in history apart from Christian theocracy,²⁰ just as there is no sanctuary in eternity apart from subordination to the King of kings.

No magistrate in a Christian nation should ever send an immigrant fugitive slave back to his master. His master may be the state. Modern nations do not admit to being slave societies, even when they are. The reality of slavery, whatever it is called, should be acknowledged by the civil authorities in free societies. Immigration laws should offer sanctuary to all those who are suffering from the judicial

17. "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away" (Matt. 24:35).

18. Benjamin Gitlow, The Whole of Their Lives (New York: Scribner's, 1948).

19. Richard Crossman (ed.), The God That Failed (New York: Harper, 1949).

20. The United States was the most open sanctuary society in history. It was also socially Protestant throughout most of its history. California began to erect immigration barriers against the Chinese toward the end of the nineteenth century, when the Darwinian Progressive movement was beginning to gain political strength. The 1924 national immigration law was passed in the middle of the humanistic Roaring Twenties.

equivalent of slavery.²¹

The covenantal problem here is that open borders into a confessionally pluralistic nation offer ripe fruit to dedicated disciples of non-pluralistic foreign religions. They bring their gods with them. These gods are not local gods; they make universal claims, just as the God of the Bible does. Their disciples want to extend the authority of their non-pluralistic religions. Islam is the obvious example. When citizenship is not grounded in a public confession of faith in the God of the Bible, immigrants can work to change the pluralistic confession of the nation after they become naturalized citizens. The religion of pluralism offers most of these immigrants equal access to the public square, once they become citizens. The result is the weakening of Christian faith in the public square and the undermining of the remnants of Christian civilization. In secular democratic nations, the war for the national confession will be fought in the nation's bedrooms. Apart from a massive revival, comparative birth rates will determine the future national confession. In Western Europe, Islam is winning this demographic war.²²

This is not to deny the legitimacy of open borders. Open borders were basic to Mosaic Israel. If fugitive slaves were welcomed in Israel, how much more were free men welcomed! If people who were lowest on the social scale outside the land had legal access to residency inside the land, how much more did capital-owning immigrants have access! This case law offers additional evidence that Israel had an open doors immigration policy. People who were willing to submit to the civil laws of Israel's God were offered freedom inside the holy nation's boundaries. Israel was a true sanctuary.²³

21. Gary North, "The Sanctuary Society and Its Enemies," The Journal of Libertarian Studies, XII (Summer 1998), pp. 205–19. (<http://bit.ly/SanctuarySociety>)

22. Pat Buchanan, The Death of the West: How Dying Populations and Immigrant Invasions Threaten the West (New York: St. Martin's, 2001).

23. In 1850, the government of the United States passed a fugitive slave law. This law mandated that officers of the United States government extradite fleeing slaves to southern states. These officers were empowered to appoint local commissioners to assist them. These commissioners in turn were empowered to compel private citizens to join a posse comitatus to chase down fugitive slaves. No jury trials on the alleged slave's judicial status were allowed in North; none was authorized in the South, either. The accused was not allowed to present testimony in the North regarding his free status. A fine of $1,000—a huge sum in 1850—was imposed on anyone who aided a slave in escaping. "The Compromise of 1850," in The Annals of America, 18 vols. (Chicago: Encyclopedia Britannica, 1968), VIII, pp. 55–57. In short, the government of the United States compelled residents in the North to cooperate with slave owners in the South whose forefathers had purchased kidnapped Africans from slave traders (mainly

The deciding civil issue was confession of faith. Citizenship was open only to circumcised men and their wives who confessed faith in the God of Israel and who participated in Passover. Israel was not pluralistic. Long-term residence did not mean the right to vote. It meant only the right to participate without discrimination in Israel's economy. It meant justice; it did not mean judgeship.

Northerners) prior to 1808, when the import of slaves was outlawed inside the United States. After 1808, Southern slave owners bred them for sale, cutting the North out of the lucrative industry. The fugitive slave law of 1850 forced Northern moralists to break the law and help those slaves who broke it. The enforcement of this law over the next decade steadily separated the United States into two nations: a sanctuary nation and a slave nation. The politicians found no way to reconcile these two nations. This law created the mentality of "two nations in one," which in turn led to the Civil War (1861–65). After the South's states seceded in late 1860 and early 1861, the newly inaugurated President, Abraham Lincoln, decided to force them back into the Union militarily.

USURY: YES AND NO

Thou shalt not lend upon usury to thy brother; usury of money, usury of victuals [food], usury of any thing that is lent upon usury: Unto a stranger thou mayest lend upon usury; but unto thy brother thou shalt not lend upon usury: that the LORD thy God may bless thee in all that thou settest thine hand to in the land whither thou goest to possess it (Deut. 23:19–20).

The theocentric principle here is that God protects His people as a shepherd protects his flock. He places boundaries around them.

A. Subordination and Debt

The text specified that the covenant-keeping lender was to imitate God by not lending at interest to a brother in the faith, i.e., a person who publicly confesses faith in the God of the Bible and who had subordinated himself to the covenanted ecclesiastical community by means of an oath-sign.¹ Those who were outside of the covenanted ecclesiastical community could be lawfully treated as a shepherd would treat sheep outside his flock. These sheep did not recognize his voice. These sheep were not under his authority; therefore, they were not under his protection.

What is judicially crucial here is the biblical concept of becoming a brother's protector. The shepherd-sheep relationship implies subordination by the sheep. "The rich ruleth over the poor, and the borrower is servant to the lender" (Prov. 22:7).² The Mosaic law recognized that a sheep enters the debt relationship as a subordinate. As we shall see, the cause of this subordination was to be a factor in the lender's

1. Under the Old Covenant, circumcision; under the New Covenant, baptism. See Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), pp. 86–89. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) decision as to which kind of loan is involved: charitable or business. The poor brother who had fallen on hard times through no moral fault of his own was morally entitled to a zero-interest charitable loan (Deut. 15:1–7).³ This subordination aspect of a loan is universal. This law was therefore not a land law.⁴ It had implications for the Israelites' maintenance of the kingdom grant, but its legitimacy was not based on this grant.

2. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 67.

This law indicates that God protects covenant-keepers in a way that He does not protect covenant-breakers. He regards the former as deserving of special consideration. This is a matter of inheritance.

The wicked borroweth, and payeth not again: but the righteous sheweth mercy, and giveth. For such as be blessed of him shall inherit the earth; and they that be cursed of him shall be cut off. The steps of a good man are ordered by the LORD: and he delighteth in his way. Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast down: for the LORD upholdeth him with his hand. I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread. He is ever merciful, and lendeth; and his seed is blessed. Depart from evil, and do good; and dwell for evermore. For the LORD loveth judgment, and forsaketh not his saints; they are preserved for ever: but the seed of the wicked shall be cut off. The righteous shall inherit the land, and dwell therein for ever (Ps. 37:21–29).

There was a positive sanction attached to this law: "that the LORD thy God may bless thee in all that thou settest thine hand to in the land whither thou goest to possess it." Moses promised that God would provide visible blessings in the land. The land was not the positive sanction attached to this law, for it would soon be their inheritance. But comprehensive blessings inside the land's boundaries would be the result of honoring this law. There can be no doubt about this law's importance. This law was highly specific, but the blessings attached to it were so comprehensive that they were unspecified.

B. Two Kinds of Loans

In the other case laws dealing with zero-interest loans, it was the poor brother who was to be benefited. "If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as an usurer,

3. Chapter 35.

4. On land laws, see Appendix J.

neither shalt thou lay upon him usury" (Ex. 22:25).⁵ This protection extended to the resident alien. "And if thy brother be waxen poor, and fallen in decay with thee; then thou shalt relieve him: yea, though he be a stranger [geyr], or a sojourner [toshawb]; that he may live with thee. Take thou no usury of him, or increase: but fear thy God; that thy brother may live with thee. Thou shalt not give him thy money upon usury, nor lend him thy victuals for increase" (Lev. 25:35–37).⁶ There were two deciding factors in making a zero-interest loan: the would-be borrower's poverty and his status as legally protected.

One biblical principle of interpretation is this: the more narrowly specified text is considered authoritative over the more broadly specified text. That which is narrowly defined is clearer. It provides more data on how the text is to be understood. We should move from the clear to the less clear, from the specific to the general.

In the interpretation of this case law, we conclude that if God had prohibited covenant-keepers from charging interest to everyone, He would not have excluded the stranger from the prohibition. Similarly, if He had prohibited covenant-keepers from charging interest to other covenant-keepers, He would not have specified poor brethren as coming under the prohibition. There would have been no need for God to identify a smaller group among the brethren as deserving of special treatment if all brethren were equally deserving of such treatment.

Not only was the economic status of the circumcised brother a criterion, so was the kind of loan. A charitable loan was morally compulsory. "If there be among you a poor man of one of thy brethren within any of thy gates in thy land which the LORD thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not harden thine heart, nor shut thine hand from thy poor brother: But thou shalt open thine hand wide unto him, and shalt surely lend him sufficient for his need, in that which he wanteth" (Deut. 15:7–8).⁷ To this type of loan was attached a negative civil sanction for a debtor's failure to repay: a period of bondage that lasted until the next

5. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 49.

6. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 28.

7. Moral compulsion is not legal compulsion. The state was not to impose negative sanctions on anyone who refused to lend. God would provide positive sanctions on those with open wallets: "Thou shalt surely give him, and thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him: because that for this thing the LORD thy God shall bless thee in all thy works, and in all that thou puttest thine hand unto" (Deut. 15:10).

national year of release (Deut. 15:12). This could be up to six years of bondage. Yet it was also possible for a debtor to be enslaved for a much longer period for a failure to repay a debt: until the next jubilee year (Lev. 25:39–41).⁸ This could be up to 49 years of bondage. This raises a major question: What criteria distinguished sabbatical-year debt servitude from jubilee-year debt servitude?

The first criterion was the presence of an interest rate. If a poor man sought a morally compulsory zero-interest loan from his brother in the faith, he placed himself at risk for up to six years. At the end of that time, either the loan was automatically cancelled by law or else he, having previously forfeited repayment, was released from bondage and sent out with food and drink by his creditor (Deut. 15:13–14). A second criterion was that a charitable loan did not require a man's landed inheritance as collateral. Collateral was either goods or else his willingness to become a bondservant for defaulting. The text does not indicate that he was required to pledge his family's landed inheritance in order to collateralize a charitable loan.

If a man who possessed a rural inheritance that he could use as collateral decided to seek a non-charitable loan, he had no moral claim on the lender, nor could he reasonably expect to receive an interest rate of zero. This loan would have been either a business loan or a consumer loan. This would-be debtor was not truly poor unless his land holdings were too small to support him. The presence of jubilee-bondage loans in addition to sabbatical year-bondage loans indicates that there were commercial loans in Israel. If the interest-bearing commercial debt contract placed him at risk of bondage, then by forfeiting payment on the loan, the debtor placed himself in a much longer term of bondage. This is evidence that commercial loans were much larger than charitable loans. Such loans could be made for longer periods of time than six years. The collateral was the income stream of the land and even the individual for up to forty-nine years. In short, a commercial loan could place at risk the fruit of a man's inheritance until the next jubilee.

C. Two Kinds of Aliens

The alien or stranger [nokree] was eligible for an interest-bearing loan at any time. Loans to him were permanent; the year of release did not benefit him. "And this is the manner of the release: Every creditor that lendeth ought unto his neighbor shall release it; he shall not exact it of his neighbor, or of his brother; because it is called the LORD'S release. Of a foreigner [nokree] thou mayest exact it again: but that which is thine with thy brother thine hand shall release" (Deut. 15:2–3). The foreigner here was an alien who either was not a property-owning resident in Israel or was not circumcised. He was not a permanent resident who had settled in a city, i.e., a sojourner.

8. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 29.

The Mosaic law distinguished between the two kinds of aliens in other ways. In the law governing unclean meat, we read: "Ye shall not eat of any thing that dieth of itself: thou shalt give it unto the stranger [geyr] that is in thy gates, that he may eat it; or thou mayest sell it unto an alien [nokree]: for thou art an holy people unto the LORD thy God" (Deut. 14:21a). The permanent resident could receive the unclean meat as a gift, but it could not be sold to him, i.e., it offered no profit for the Israelite. In contrast, it was lawful to sell ritually unclean meat to a foreigner [nokree].⁹

The permanent resident [geyr] was to be treated as a brother: he was not to be charged interest on a charitable loan, as we have seen (Lev. 25:35–37).¹⁰ He was a kind of honorary Israelite. Not being a citizen of Israel—a member of the congregation—he could not serve as a judge. If he was not circumcised, he could not enter the temple or eat a Passover meal. But as a man voluntarily living permanently under biblical civil law, he was entitled to the civil law's protection, including the prohibition against interest-bearing charitable loans. Permanently residing voluntarily under the law's authority, he was under its protection.

Lending at interest was one of God's means of bringing foreigners under the authority of Israel. "For the LORD thy God blesseth thee, as he promised thee: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow; and thou shalt reign over many nations, but they shall not reign over thee" (Deut. 15:6).¹¹ This was an aspect of dominion through hierarchy: "The rich ruleth over the poor, and the borrower is servant to the lender" (Prov. 22:7).¹² The foreigner was fair game for a program of profitable money-lending. This included loans to poor foreigners. When a foreigner was desperate for money, an Israel-

9. Chapter 34.

10. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 28.

11. Chapter 37.

12. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 67.

ite was allowed to take advantage of the situation and lend to him at interest. In contrast, the resident alien was legally protected; he was to be treated as a brother. He was already voluntarily under God's civil law and some of the ritual laws, such as ritual washing after eating meat that had died of natural causes (Lev. 17:15). There was no need to bring him under dominion through debt. He had already acknowledged his debt to God.

D. Which Jurisdiction?

The negative sanction for forfeiture was a period of bondage. This placed the Mosaic debt laws under the civil government. But there were no stated penalties for a lender's refusal to lend, despite the moral compulsion aspect of the charitable loan. God promised to bring negative sanctions against the individual who refused to honor this aspect of the law (Deut. 15:9) and positive sanctions for the man who honored it (v. 10). The state is not a legitimate agency for bringing positive sanctions. The state lawfully imposes only negative sanctions. It enforced bondage on those debtors who defaulted, but it did not compel lenders to make loans.

This means that the lender was under God's sanctions directly, while the debtor was under God's sanctions indirectly. The lender might give him the positive sanction of a charitable loan, and the state would enforce the penalty for non-repayment. The debtor's obligations were specific: pay back so much money by a specific date or suffer the consequences. The lender's obligations were not specific: lend a reasonable amount of money and subsequently receive unspecified blessings from God. There was no earthly institution that could lawfully enforce specific penalties on such unspecific transactions.

Biblical civil law prohibits specific acts. The state lawfully enforces contracts, but these contracts are narrowly specified in advance by the parties. The state enforces justice, which includes imposing negative sanctions on those who violate contracts. But it is not the state's responsibility to mandate that potential lenders provide loans of a specific size and duration to borrowers.

E. Not Restricted to Money Loans

"Thou shalt not lend upon usury to thy brother; usury of money, usury of victuals [food], usury of any thing that is lent upon usury" (v. 19). This clause in the law makes it plain that usury, meaning a positive interest rate, applies across the board to all items lent. The phenomenon of interest is not limited to money loans. It is a universal aspect of lending, which is why the law specifies that the prohibition applies to loans in general, not merely money loans.

1. Interest and Rent

There is an ancient and widespread error going back at least to Aristotle that interest on money loans is unproductive because money, unlike animals, does not reproduce itself. In other words, money is sterile. Therefore, Aristotle concluded, "of all modes of acquisition, usury is the most unnatural."¹³ Yet the critics of usury have generally viewed rent on land as legitimate.¹⁴ If I loan someone 20 ounces of gold and charge him one ounce per year in interest, I am viewed as a usurer and somehow morally questionable. If, on the other hand, I let the same person use my farm land, which is worth 20 ounces of gold, and I charge him one ounce of gold per year as rent, I come under no criticism. Why this difference in opinion? In both cases, I give up something valuable for a period of time. I can either spend the gold or invest it in a business venture. Similarly, I can either sell the farm or plow it, plant it, and reap a crop. In both cases, I allow someone else to use my asset for a year, with which he can then pursue his own goals. I charge him for this privilege of gaining temporary control over a valuable asset. I charge either interest or rent because I do not choose to give away the income which my asset could generate during the period in which the other person controls it.

To expect me to loan someone my 20 ounces of gold at no interest is the same, economically speaking, as to expect me to loan him the use of my farm on a rent-free basis. In fact, the thing which people conventionally call rental income is analytically interest income. Because a payment for the use of land is seen as morally neutral, men describe the interest income generated by land by means of a morally neutral term: rent. Because a payment for the use of money is seen as morally reprehensible, men describe the interest income generated by money loans by means of a morally loaded term: usury. But the transactions are analytically identical. Interest income and rental income are the same thing: payment for the use of a marketable asset over time.

13. Aristotle, Politics, I:X, trans. Ernest Barker (New York: Oxford University Press, [1946] 1958), p. 29.

14. This would be an extension of Aristotle's argument: "acquisition of fruits and animals." Ibid., p. 28.

There is a tendency to see interest as something exploitative and rent as something legitimate. Interest income is not seen as productive; rental income is seen as productive. Why the difference? Probably because people think that the creation of value is limited to the creation of goods and services. This outlook is incorrect, and the best example is the discovery of a new idea. It is not physical. We can see this analytical error at work in a series of examples.

2. The Deciding Factor Is Not Material

Example number one. I sell a one-year lease to my abandoned gold mine, which no longer produces any gold. I charge one ounce of gold for this opportunity, payable at the end of one year. The lease-holder discovers a new deposit, digs out two hundred ounces of gold in one year, and pays me one ounce of gold. Nobody thinks this arrangement is exploitative on my part. He gets rich, and I get my agreed-upon ounce of gold. Even if he fails to find any gold, most people would regard my net income of one ounce of gold as legitimate. After all, I let him use my abandoned gold mine for a year. He made a mistake, but he might have struck it rich.

Example number two. An inventor comes to me. He thinks that he has discovered a way to increase the output of gold mines—say, a chemical method of extracting more gold out of the ore. He does not have the money to complete his final experiment and file for a patent. I lend him 20 ounces of gold for a year at one ounce of gold interest. During this year, he completes the testing, files the patent, and sells the patent for a fortune. He returns my 20 ounces plus one ounce of gold. Have I exploited him? No. But what if his final test proves that the process does not work? Or what if he files the patent incorrectly and someone steals his idea, leaving him without anything to show for his effort? Am I an exploiter because I demand the return of my 20 ounces plus one? I was not a co-investor in the process. I would not have shared in his wealth had everything gone well. His use of my gold did allow him to follow his dream to its conclusion, whether profitable to him or not.

Example number three. What if he borrows my 20 ounces of gold to complete tests on another invention that is unrelated to gold mining? Has the economic analysis changed? No. The borrower seeks his own ends by means of the 20 ounces of gold. Meanwhile, the lender seeks his ends: an interest payment. Each party to the transaction pursues his own individual goals. Each believes that he can benefit from the transaction.

Conclusion: the physical nature of the asset lent for a fixed payment over time has nothing to do with the analytical basis of the transaction, but it has a lot to do with people's confusion about interest. The heart of the matter¹⁵ is not material; it is temporal. The lender gives up something of value for a period of time, and he will not do this voluntarily without compensation unless he believes that his refusal to make a zero-interest loan to a poor brother will result in negative sanctions from God, which it did in Mosaic Israel. "Beware that there be not a thought in thy wicked heart, saying, The seventh year, the year of release, is at hand; and thine eye be evil against thy poor brother, and thou givest him nought; and he cry unto the LORD against thee, and it be sin unto thee" (Deut. 15:9).

Deuteronomy 23:19–20 acknowledges the identical nature of these lending transactions irrespective of the physical composition of the items lent: money, food, or anything else. An interest payment was not to be charged on the kind of loan described here: a charitable loan to a brother in the faith. The charitable aspect of the loan was the interest income foregone by the lender. He could have used the asset to generate income for himself; instead, he lent freely and asked only that what he has lent be returned to him. He was charitable because he forfeited the income which his asset would have generated for him in the business loan market. He gave away this income to the borrower, who paid nothing for it.

F. Compensation for Risk

It is not simply that the lender forfeits income that others would otherwise pay him to use his asset for a year. The lender also bears risk. First, he bears the risk that the loan will not be repaid. The text governing charitable loans makes this clear: "Beware that there be not a thought in thy wicked heart, saying, The seventh year, the year of release, is at hand; and thine eye be evil against thy poor brother, and thou givest him nought; and he cry unto the LORD against thee, and it be sin unto thee" (Deut. 15:9). Charitable debts became unenforceable in Israel in the seventh year. All those who were in debt bondage for having failed to repay a charitable loan went free (Deut. 15:12), so the loan's collateral in the form of the borrower's future work would not be available to the lender as compensation for a default.

15. We call a mental concept "matter" when we really mean "issue" or "question." We refer "central importance" as "heart." The language of the material invades the mental.

Second, the lender today bears the risk that, if he lends money, the government or the central bank may inflate the nation's domestic money supply, thereby lowering the value of the money which he receives at the end of the loan period. To compensate him for this risk, the lender adds an inflation premium to the interest rate. The threat of price inflation due to monetary inflation is one reason why self-interested lenders should organize politically to pressure the government: (1) not to increase the money supply; (2) to prohibit the central bank from doing so.¹⁶

The lender must be compensated for known risk; otherwise, he will not make the loan. In commercial loans, borrowers compensate the lender for this risk. The risk of one borrower's default is paid for by a risk premium factor in the interest rate which is charged to all borrowers within the same risk classification. In the case of the charitable loan to the poor brother, God becomes the risk-bearer. He offers the lender the same shepherd-like protection in hard times that the lender offers the poor brother in hard times. The lender's faith in God's protecting hand is revealed by his willingness to lend at no interest to a righteous poor brother. Also, he thereby acknowledges that God has given him his wealth: "For the LORD thy God blesseth thee, as he promised thee: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow; and thou shalt reign over many nations, but they shall not reign over thee" (Deut. 15:6).¹⁷

G. Uncertainty vs. Risk

The free market economist offers a distinction between uncertainty and risk. Risk is a statistically calculable negative event. Certain classes of events can be forecasted accurately, i.e., within statistical limits. The discovery of this social fact made possible the modern eco-

16. If the money is gold or silver, and there is no fractional reserve banking, there will be a slow decline in prices over time in a productive economy, since increasing economic output (supply of goods and services) will lower prices in the face of the relatively fixed money supply. The price of goods approaches zero as a limit: the reversal of God's curse in Eden. In such a world, the lender of money reaps a small return: the money returned to him will buy slightly more than it would have bought when he lent it. In such a monetary environment, the borrower would be better off to borrow consumer goods rather than money.

17. Chapter 37.

conomic world.¹⁸ In contrast, uncertainty cannot be measured in advance. Some kinds of events cannot be forecasted by means of statistical techniques, e.g., inventions or the discovery of a gem or a gem of an idea. Risk is different from uncertainty.¹⁹

While we all are to some degree both risk-bearers and uncertainty-bearers, there are only a few people who are professional uncertainty-bearers. We call them entrepreneurs. These people forecast the economic future and then buy and sell goods and services in terms of their forecasts in order to profit from their hoped-for accurate knowledge. When successful, they reap profits. When unsuccessful, they reap losses. Because the kinds of events they deal with have not yet been successfully converted into risk events, the market does not enable investors to deal with these events in a scientific, analytical manner. We call such events high-risk events, but this is incorrect analytically. They are uncertain events.

Lenders who seek a legally predictable rate of return lend money at interest. In contrast, investors who are willing to put their money “at risk”—really, at uncertainty—in order to share in any profits must also share in any losses. The gains and losses of entrepreneurial ventures are not predictable, or at least not predictable by most people.²⁰ People who are uncertainty-averse but not equally risk-averse lend to people who are willing to bear uncertainty, but who prefer to gain the capital necessary to develop a venture by promising lenders a legally enforceable fixed rate of return. The distribution of risk and uncertainty to those who are willing to bear each of these is made possible through the market for loans. Those entrepreneurs who make statistically unpredictable breakthroughs that benefit society can be funded in their ventures by others who are unwilling to bear uncertainty but who are willing to bear some degree of risk. Without such a social institution, only two kinds of entrepreneurs could fund their ventures: (1) those with capital of their own to invest; (2) those who are willing to share their profits with co-owners of any discovery, and who also have the ability to persuade these investor-owners to put their money into the venture.

18. Peter L. Bernstein, Against the Gods: The Remarkable Story of Risk (New York: Wiley, 1996).

19. Frank H. Knight, Risk, Uncertainty and Profit (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1921), (<http://bit.ly/KnightRUP>); Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

20. An entrepreneur who has discovered a way to deal with formerly uncertain events by means of proprietary or as yet not widely recognized statistical techniques is in a position to make a great deal of money until others discover or steal these techniques.

Conclusion

The more general language of this case law—brothers in the faith—has misled commentators for two millennia. This law must be interpreted in terms of the more narrowly focused reference point of the other laws governing interest: poor brothers in the faith, as well as poor resident aliens, who have fallen on hard times through no moral fault of their own. This case law applied to charitable loans made to brothers in the faith and resident aliens who lived voluntarily under God's civil laws. It did not prohibit interest-bearing commercial loans. It did not apply to charitable loans to foreigners [nokree].

By failing to understand the context of the Mosaic laws against interest-taking, the medieval church placed prohibitions on all interest-bearing loans.²¹ This drastically restricted the market for loans. It restricted the legal ability of people who were averse to entrepreneurial uncertainty from making loans at interest. It thereby restricted the ability of entrepreneurs to obtain capital for their ventures. The result was lower economic growth for the entire society.

A New Testament principle broadens the restriction to all borrowers who are in trouble through no fault of their own. We must loan to those who may not be able to repay. "And if ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye? for sinners also lend to sinners, to receive as much again. But love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again; and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be the children of the Highest: for he is kind unto the unthankful and to the evil. Be ye therefore merciful, as your Father also is merciful" (Luke 6:34–36).²² The context is the merciful charitable loan, not the legitimate business loan. This is another example that explodes the myth of the Old Covenant as more rigorous than the New. In this case, 21 20. J. Gilchrist, The Church and Economic Development Activity in the Middle Ages (New York: St. Martins, 1969), Documents. Gilchrist provided translations of numerous texts, from Nicea (325) on, that dealt with usury. The premier study of the late medieval church's position is John T. Noonan, The Scholastic Analysis of Usury (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1957). For a summary, see Noonan, "The Amendment of Papal Teaching by Theologians," in Charles E. Curran (ed.), Contraception: Authority and Dissent (New York: Herder & Herder, 1965), pp. 41–75.

22. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 10.

the New Testament is far more rigorous than the Old.

Because of the broadening of this law to include covenantal enemies of God, the New Covenant lender must see to it that the borrower is truly in need. At zero interest, there is greater demand for loans than supply of them. At zero repayment, the demand is nearly infinite. So, the lender must exercise good ethical judgment in allocating charitable loans. The goal is to assist desperate people in their hour of need, not gain the money back. Even if a borrower may not be able to repay, he is still entitled to consideration. But the lender must not lend money to subsidize evil. He must lend to those in desperate need. Otherwise, he will be out of loanable funds by the end of the day.

VOWS, CONTRACTS, AND PRODUCTIVITY

When thou shalt vow a vow unto the LORD thy God, thou shalt not slack to pay it: for the LORD thy God will surely require it of thee; and it would be sin in thee. But if thou shalt forbear to vow, it shall be no sin in thee. That which is gone out of thy lips thou shalt keep and perform; even a freewill offering, according as thou hast vowed unto the LORD thy God, which thou hast promised with thy mouth (Deut. 23:21–23).

The theocentric principle illustrated here is the predictability of God's sworn promises. A vow is an oath. This law is therefore governed by an aspect of point four of the biblical covenant model. But, as I hope to show, to the extent that this law relates to contracts, it is not governed by point four, but by point three: boundaries. It sets forth stipulations of what is agreed to among equals.¹ A contract is not the same as a vow. It is not invoked by an oath before God.

A. God's Predictable Word

God announced in Isaiah 45, a passage devoted to His sovereignty: "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth: for I am God, and there is none else. I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, That unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear" (Isa. 45:22–23). The New American Standard Version adds "allegiance" to the final sentence. There is no escape from God's sworn word. The reliability of God's word is absolute. He swears by His own authority. There is no higher authority.

Isaiah compared the predictability of God's word with both the predictability and productivity of the seasons. "For as the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater: So shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth: it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it" (Isa. 55:10–11). The element of productivity in God's reliable word should not be ignored. Nor should the hierarchical aspect of His word, which can be seen in the words that introduce this section: "For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts" (v. 9).

1. Legal equals: the right of contract between people with legal control over property, including labor. Economic equals: each wants what the other has to offer.

A sovereign God speaks an authoritative, hierarchical word, and this word accomplishes all that God proposes. God's spoken words are productive in history. More than this: they are the basis of progress in history. Cause and effect in history are grounded in God's covenants with men. Historical sanctions are applied by God in history in terms of men's responses to His authoritative word. Dominion is by covenant.² Covenants are established by judicial oath. The binding oath becomes the model for legally binding contracts. Contracts are also tools of dominion, but they are not established by an oath between God and men.

B. Productive Words

This was not a land law. It is a universal law, i.e., a cross-boundary law.³ The law of the vow is still binding. God speaks, and the world responds. He spoke the universe into existence (Gen. 1). It is not enough to affirm that His word is absolutely sovereign from the creation to the final judgment and beyond.⁴ We must also affirm that His word is productive. There was more to this world at the end of the creation week

2. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992). (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

3. On the categories of the Mosaic law, see Appendix J.

4. It is surely not enough to affirm that His word is relatively sovereign, i.e., sovereign except for substantial gaps of historical indeterminacy commonly known as man's free will. Pharaoh had no free will in opposing Moses: "For the scripture saith unto Pharaoh, Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might shew my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth" (Rom. 9:17–18). Judas had no free will in betraying Christ: "And truly the Son of man goeth, as it was determined: but woe unto that man by whom he is betrayed!" (Luke 22:22).

than there had been at the beginning. There is progress in history because of His sovereign word, which He speaks prior to the events of history and above the processes of history. What God says He will do, He brings to pass. What He brings to pass is progress. History moves toward the final judgment, not randomly but according to God's sovereign decree. Nothing happens that is outside His decree.

In their public prayer to God, the disciples cited Psalm 2's description of the hopeless rebellion of the kings of the earth against God, and then applied this text to the crucifixion: "For of a truth against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod, and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles, and the people of Israel, were gathered together, For to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done" (Acts 4:27–28). Even in evil events there is progress in history. "The LORD hath made all things for himself: yea, even the wicked for the day of evil" (Prov. 16:4). Progress in history rests on God's absolutely sovereign, absolutely comprehensive decree. The kingdom of God advances in terms of His prior spoken word and His present sustaining providence, which corresponds in all details to His original word.

Man is made in God's image. He speaks as God speaks, but in a creaturely, representative way. The covenantal question is this: In the name of which god does he speak? Just as he is required to think God's thoughts after Him, so is he required to speak God's words after Him. After a man speaks, his subsequent actions are supposed to confirm his words, for God's actions invariably confirm His words. A man's actions are to testify to the reliability of his words. The more reliably he speaks, the greater his productivity because of his greater value to others. Other men can make plans confidently in terms of his words. Greater predictability makes cooperation less expensive. Where the price of something drops, more of it will be demanded. The social division of labor increases as a result of the predictability of men's words. Individual output per unit of input increases. Men grow wealthier. Greater wealth makes the tools of dominion more affordable.

The vow serves as the model of a contract. The words in a vow have greater authority than the words in a promise. The vow is made before God by means of an oath which implicitly or explicitly invokes the sanctions of God in history. The individual takes the vow on his own authority. There is no intermediary institution in between God and the vow-taker. It is not like a church vow, a civil vow, or a marital vow. A covenantal relationship between God and man is confirmed by the presence of a vow to God. The oath's sanctions serve as the link between heaven's throne and history. This is why the person who vows before God must be sure that he fulfills the stipulations of his vow. God is the direct enforcer of negative sanctions against the vow-taker who defaults.

C. The Judicially Binding Authority of the Oath

"For the LORD thy God will surely require it of thee": this is an assertion of a threatened negative sanction. This threatening language identifies a promise to God as a vow. A vow is taken to God and then is enforced by God. The vow has covenantal authority. It is not the judicial equivalent of a contract made between men. It is a hierarchical, oath-bound contract between God and a person. He brings sanctions directly, for the oath invokes God's sanctions. The oath is self-maledictory ("bad-speaking"), calling down God's negative sanctions on the oath-taker should he fail to abide by the covenant's stipulations.⁵ Thus, the vow has greater authority than a contract does, which invokes the state as the contract's sanctions-bringer. A contract is not lawfully sealed with a self-maledictory oath before God.

This case law is an extension of an earlier case law: "If a man vow a vow unto the LORD, or swear an oath to bind his soul with a bond; he shall not break his word, he shall do according to all that proceedeth out of his mouth" (Num. 30:2).⁶ The word for "bind" is the same one used to describe what the Philistines did to Samson. The word is also used to describe harnessing a horse to a chariot. It is as if one's soul—the breath of life—could be tied down to a physical implement. Word and deed are bound together judicially. This bond is two-fold: verbal and historical. What a man says must correspond to the promised external deeds which he is subsequently required by God to perform. These deeds invoke God's deeds: sanctions, either positive and negative.

Cause and effect relationships in history are covenantal. This is why the structure of the covenant is the basis of biblical social theory. Biblical social theory is inescapably judicial. Having spent four decades in the wilderness under the negative sanctions that God had applied to their fathers, the Israelites of Joshua's generation should have begun to understand this. (Three thousand five hundred years later, so should Christian intellectuals, but they rarely do.)

5. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 4.

6. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 16.

A promise made to God is more binding legally than a promise made to man. It is sometimes lawful to break a promise to a man, for there is no absolute authority in a relationship of a man to another man, unless that promise is a covenantal vow, as in marriage. A good example of breaking a promise was Solomon's promise to his mother:

Bath-sheba therefore went unto king Solomon, to speak unto him for Adonijah. And the king rose up to meet her, and bowed himself unto her, and sat down on his throne, and caused a seat to be set for the king's mother; and she sat on his right hand. Then she said, I desire one small petition of thee; I pray thee, say me not nay. And the king said unto her, Ask on, my mother: for I will not say thee nay. And she said, Let Abishag the Shunammite be given to Adonijah thy brother to wife. And king Solomon answered and said unto his mother, And why dost thou ask Abishag the Shunammite for Adonijah? ask for him the kingdom also; for he is mine elder brother; even for him, and for Abiathar the priest, and for Joab the son of Zeruiah. Then king Solomon swore by the LORD, saying, God do so to me, and more also, if Adonijah have not spoken this word against his own life" (1 Kings 2:19–23).

Solomon realized that Adonijah was claiming the political inheritance for himself, for he was seeking marriage with the woman who had slept by King David to warm him. Adonijah was claiming continuity. He was attempting a political rebellion. Not only did Solomon break his word to his mother, he executed his older half-brother for this insurrection against his throne.

Solomon recognized this misuse of his civil authority by Adonijah. He humiliated his misused mother by breaking his promise to her, and then he executed his conniving half-brother. Adonijah had misused Bathsheba and intended to misuse the Shunamite girl. He was imitating Satan, who had used the serpent to deceive the woman in order to undermine her husband's lawful authority. Solomon recognized this tactic for what it was, and therefore had his brother executed.

Other kings were not equally wise—pagan kings. Darius, king of Medo-Persia, was tricked into promising to execute any man who prayed openly to God within a 30-day period. His advisors had devised this tactic in order to trap Daniel, who was immediately arrested and brought before the king. "Then the king, when he heard these words, was sore displeased with himself, and set his heart on Daniel to deliver him: and he laboured till the going down of the sun to deliver him. Then these men assembled unto the king, and said unto the king, Know, O king, that the law of the Medes and Persians is, That no decree nor statute which the king establisheth may be changed" (Dan. 6:14–15). Centuries later, Herod followed in this pagan tradition with respect to his stepdaughter: "But when Herod's birthday was kept, the daughter of Herodias danced before them, and pleased Herod. Whereupon he promised with an oath to give her whatsoever she would ask. And she, being before instructed of her mother, said, Give me here John Baptist's head in a charger. And the king was sorry: nevertheless for the oath's sake, and them which sat with him at meat, he commanded it to be given her" (Matt. 14:6–9). Both men should have broken their promises. They had been misused by those under their jurisdiction. They became vulnerable to manipulators.

A king's word was not God's word. Only when God was invoked to confirm a lawful vow did the vow of a king take on the character of an unbreakable covenantal oath. What was true of a king was true for a lesser man. After the Israelites had made a covenant with the Gibeonites, who had tricked them, they upheld their words. First the vow: "And Joshua made peace with them, and made a league with them, to let them live: and the princes of the congregation sware unto them" (Josh. 9:15). Then the fulfillment: "And the children of Israel smote them not, because the princes of the congregation had sworn unto them by the LORD God of Israel. And all the congregation murmured against the princes. But all the princes said unto all the congregation, We have sworn unto them by the LORD God of Israel: now therefore we may not touch them. This we will do to them; we will even let them live, lest wrath be upon us, because of the oath which we sware unto them. And the princes said unto them, Let them live; but let them be hewers of wood and drawers of water unto all the congregation; as the princes had promised them" (Josh. 9:18–21).

God did not bring sanctions against Israel for having allowed a Canaanitic tribe to survive. On the contrary, He allowed the Gibeonites to serve the priests in the work of the temple. "And Joshua made them that day hewers of wood and drawers of water for the congregation, and for the altar of the LORD, even unto this day, in the place which he should choose" (9:27). When an alliance of Canaanite nations attacked Gibeon, presumably to make them an example for having surrendered to Israel, Gibeon called on Israel to defend them. Israel came to Gibeon's defense and routed the Canaanites (Josh. 10). God had told the Israelites not to spare any nation in the land. "And thou shalt consume all the people which the LORD thy God shall deliver thee; thine eye shall have no pity upon them: neither shalt thou serve their gods; for that will be a snare unto thee” (Deut. 7:16). Yet Israel was oath-bound to spare Gibeon and even come to Gibeon’s defense. This was the power of the covenantal oath under the Mosaic law. This was the authority of God’s name, lawfully invoked.

D. Invoking God’s Name

A covenantal oath has great authority because God’s name has great authority. This was what the rulers of Israel told the murmuring congregation. “We have sworn unto them by the LORD God of Israel.” That was supposed to settle the matter. The matter was supposed to remain settled. Saul broke this oath with Gibeon some four centuries later. The Israelites living under David paid the consequences.

Then there was a famine in the days of David three years, year after year; and David enquired of the LORD. And the LORD answered, It is for Saul, and for his bloody house, because he slew the Gibeonites. And the king called the Gibeonites, and said unto them; (now the Gibeonites were not of the children of Israel, but of the remnant of the Amorites; and the children of Israel had sworn unto them: and Saul sought to slay them in his zeal to the children of Israel and Judah.) Wherefore David said unto the Gibeonites, What shall I do for you? and wherewith shall I make the atonement, that ye may bless the inheritance of the LORD? And the Gibeonites said unto him, We will have no silver nor gold of Saul, nor of his house; neither for us shalt thou kill any man in Israel. And he said, What ye shall say, that will I do for you. And they answered the king, The man that consumed us, and that devised against us that we should be destroyed from remaining in any of the coasts of Israel, Let seven men of his sons be delivered unto us, and we will hang them up unto the LORD in Gibeah of Saul, whom the LORD did choose. And the king said, I will give them. But the king spared Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan the son of Saul, because of the LORD’S oath that was between them, between David and Jonathan the son of Saul. But the king took the two sons of Rizpah the daughter of Aiah, whom she bare unto Saul, Armoni and Mephibosheth; and the five sons of Michal the daughter of Saul, whom she brought up for Adriel the son of Barzillai the Meholahite: And he delivered them into the hands of the Gibeonites, and they hanged them in the hill before the LORD: and they fell all seven together, and were put to death in the days of harvest, in the first days, in the beginning of barley harvest (II Sam. 21:1–9).

God had not forgotten the oath made by Joshua and the rulers of Israel. Saul either forgot or believed that God would no longer hold him responsible for honoring it. God did not forget what Saul did. Negative sanctions—three years of famine—came on Israel many years after Saul was dead. This was consistent with God's law: "The LORD shall make the rain of thy land powder and dust: from heaven shall it come down upon thee, until thou be destroyed" (Deut. 28:24). Atonement was required. David offered blood atonement: the execution of the seven heirs of Saul by means of hanging or crucifixion.⁷ There were two sons (of Rizpah) and five grandsons (born to Merab—not Michal, who died childless: II Sam. 6:23).⁸ He spared Saul's grandson because of David's prior oath to the man's father (II Sam. 21:7). The Gibeonites counted the matter closed with the execution of Saul's heirs. The blood of their father was on the sons' heads, for their father was dead and beyond historical sanctions.

Then what about this Mosaic case law? "The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers: every man shall be put to death for his own sin" (Deut. 24:16). Bahnsen dismissed it as not relevant here.⁹ But how could it not be relevant? What circumstance rendered it inapplicable? Bahnsen appealed to the precedent of Achan: the sons died for the sin of their father. I agree with this line of reasoning. Bahnsen argues that the issue was the defilement of the land. I have taken a different approach. The judicial issue was sacrilege.¹⁰ In Achan's case, the required sanction applied to the entire family. Why? Because none of them had broken publicly with their father. They were accomplices. The same applied to Saul's sons. They had not publicly disavowed their forefather, Saul, which would have required them to forfeit their non-landed inheritance. By renouncing their economic inheritance, they would have also renounced their guilt.

There is no biblical indication that the Mosaic laws of the vow have been annulled by the New Covenant. The New Testament strengthens the authority of the vow: the Son of God has confirmed the vow. "Also I say unto you, Whosoever shall confess me before men, him shall the Son of man also confess before the angels of God: But he that

7. Greg L. Bahnsen, "Law and Atonement in the Execution of Saul's Seven Sons," Journal of Christian Reconstruction, II (Winter 1975–76), p. 105.

8. Idem.

9. Ibid., p. 103.

10. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), Appendix A.

denieth me before men shall be denied before the angels of God” (Luke 12:8–9). To deny Christ is to disavow Him. Paul warns: “It is a faithful saying: For if we be dead with him, we shall also live with him: If we suffer, we shall also reign with him: if we deny him, he also will deny us: If we believe not, yet he abideth faithful: he cannot deny himself” (II Tim. 2:11–13). The promised eternal sanctions—positive and negative—are grounded judicially on Christ’s inability to deny Himself, His words, and His authority.

E. A Contract

A contract does not have the same degree of authority that a lawful covenantal oath possesses. A lawful covenantal oath invokes God as the sanctions-bringer. A contract invokes the state as the sanctions-bringer. The state does not possess the same degree of authority that God does. To elevate a contract to the status of a covenant is to elevate the authority of the state over God. Any assertion of equality here is a hidden assertion of superiority.¹¹ There cannot be equality with God; there is therefore no equality of a contract with a lawful covenant. Jesus warned about invoking God or the sacred implements of God to sanction a non-covenantal affirmation: “But I say unto you, Swear not at all; neither by heaven; for it is God’s throne: Nor by the earth; for it is his footstool: neither by Jerusalem; for it is the city of the great King. Neither shalt thou swear by thy head, because thou canst not make one hair white or black. But let your communication be, Yea, yea; Nay, nay: for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil” (Matt. 5:34–37).

The West’s social contract theory since the late seventeenth century has placed the state at the pinnacle of power. Some versions invoke God; others do not. In none of them does the Bible gain authority over the terms of the social contract. This places some version of neutral civil law in authority, which in turn rests on a theory of mankind’s rational corporate mind and also on a theory of the existence of universally acknowledged and binding moral standards, irrespective of the content of rival religious confessions. It also makes the state the sovereign interpreter and enforcer of the social contract’s stipulations.

In Rousseau’s contractual theory, this statism is more pronounced than in Locke’s version.¹² In Locke’s contractualism, there can be a

11. Consider bigamy. The second wife asserts equality with the first wife. The first wife knows better. She is the loser. She has become “used goods.” She is Leah; the new wife is Rachel.

12. Robert A. Nisbet, Tradition and Revolt: Historical and Sociological Essays

theoretical appeal to God, or to a higher law, or to the sovereign people. But there is a theoretical question here: Who lawfully represents God or the higher law? The doctrine of contractual representation is necessarily a doctrine of historical representation. This is the question of the voice of authority. If the king does not hear a grievance from the people, Locke wrote, "the appeal then lies nowhere but to heaven . . . and in that state the injured party must judge for himself when he will think fit to make use of that appeal and put himself into it."¹³ This does not settle the issue of conflicting voices in history. It merely defers it. Locke's god in the Second Treatise is not part of a covenantal relationship which is established in terms of revealed law and predictable corporate sanctions. How, then, does the aggrieved party know if he is in the right or if God will defend his cause?

By invoking the state, the aggrieved party to a voluntary private contract seeks to reduce the costs of enforcing the stipulations of the contract, but only in a society in which the civil authorities predictably uphold private contracts. The state enforces contracts as a way to reduce violence. It limits vendettas and families or clans in their quest for autonomous justice.

The state's enforcement of contracts has a side positive effect: a reduction in the costs of cooperation. This reduction in the costs of cooperation increases the likelihood of on-going cooperation among the parties to the contract. By lowering the parties' costs of enforcing compliance, the state encourages cooperation. It increases the predictability of men's outcomes. It thereby reduces personal risk (statistically predictable loss) in society by lowering the costs for men to pool risk and reduce risk's burden on any single participant to the contract. The insurance contract is the obvious example, but the same process of dispersing risk applies to contracts in general.

When the costs of gaining predictable law enforcement increase to such an extent that invoking the state's sanctions is more expensive than the value of the expected income stream offered by the contract, cooperation breaks down. This is why self-government is crucial for sustaining a contractual society. If the participants must resort to the state continually to gain mutual compliance, the legal costs and delays will increase so much that their cooperative venture fails. If any society relies exclusively on lawyers to interpret the law, the lawyers' guild will make full use of this monopoly. The society will fail to obtain predictable justice. It will fall.

(New York: Knopf, 1968), ch. 1.

13. John Locke, Of Civil Government: Second Treatise (1690), section 242.

Conclusion

Covenant-keepers are under the confessional vow of subordination as members of the church covenant. They are under an implicit vow to the state. In cases regarding courts and judgeship, they may be under an explicit vow. Beyond this, they are not asked by God to take personal vows of service. They may lawfully do this, but they are not required to. Once a person takes a personal vow to God, he is bound by it. He must fulfill its terms. "If a man vow a vow unto the LORD, or swear an oath to bind his soul with a bond; he shall not break his word, he shall do according to all that proceedeth out of his mouth. If a woman also vow a vow unto the LORD, and bind herself by a bond, being in her father's house in her youth" (Num. 30:2–3). "When thou vowest a vow unto God, defer not to pay it; for he hath no pleasure in fools: pay that which thou hast vowed. Better is it that thou shouldest not vow, than that thou shouldest vow and not pay" (Eccl. 5:4–5). This is what Jesus told the Pharisees, pointing to Israel's rebellion and the Jews' looming loss of God's kingdom.¹⁴ As with a covenantal oath, the vow is legally binding. God brings negative sanctions to those who do not comply with its terms.

A contract has less authority than a vow, but it has similar aspects: a sovereign enforcer (the state), a hierarchy of enforcement (representatives), stipulations, sanctions, and continuity. This means that a contract's terms are supposed to be honored by the participants. This theological aspect adds an element of authority to private contracts. A biblical covenantal society will eventually develop into a contractual society. Late medieval Christianity developed the legal institutions that established and have maintained the Western legal tradition.¹⁵ This should come as no surprise.

Oath-bound covenantal vows before God make possible social cooperation by establishing the church, state, and family. A contract is

14. "But what think ye? A certain man had two sons; and he came to the first, and said, Son, go work to day in my vineyard. He answered and said, I will not: but afterward he repented, and went. And he came to the second, and said likewise. And he answered and said, I go, sir: and went not. Whether of them twain did the will of his father? They say unto him, The first. Jesus saith unto them, Verily I say unto you, That the publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you" (Matt. 21:28–31; cf. 21:43).

15. Harold J. Berman, Law and Revolution: The Formation of the Western Legal Tradition (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983).

analogous to a covenant. It has analogous effects. A contract increases the likelihood of social cooperation among men by lowering the costs of cooperating. It increases the precision of the agreed-upon deeds which men promise to perform. It makes it legal for the state to impose negative sanctions against those parties to the contract who fail to fulfill the terms of the contract. Contracts lower the costs of cooperation, thereby increasing the amount of cooperation demanded. Increased social cooperation increases the division of labor and therefore increases men's individual productivity and income.

FREE FOR THE PICKING

When thou comest into thy neighbour's vineyard, then thou mayest eat grapes thy fill at thine own pleasure; but thou shalt not put any in thy vessel. When thou comest into the standing corn of thy neighbour, then thou mayest pluck the ears with thine hand; but thou shalt not move a sickle unto thy neighbour's standing corn (Deut. 23:24–25).

The theocentric principle undergirding this law is that God, as the owner of the creation, has the exclusive right to specify the terms of the leases that He offers to his stewards. He establishes boundaries.

A. Rural Leaseholds in Israel

This law announced certain terms of God's rural leasehold. It announced to the land owner: "You do not possess absolute sovereignty over this land. Your neighbor has the right to pick a handful of grain or grapes from this field. Your right to exclude others by law or force is limited." In this sense, God delegated to a farmer's neighbors the right to enforce God's claim of exclusive control over a symbolic portion of every field. The land owner could not lawfully exclude God's delegated representatives from access to his crops. The fact that he could not lawfully exclude them testified to his lack of absolute sovereignty over his property.

In the garden of Eden, God placed a judicial boundary around one tree. A symbolic portion of the garden was reserved by God. This boundary was there to remind Adam that he could not legitimately assert control over the entire garden. Over most of it, Adam did exercise full authority. But over one small part, he did not. It was off-limits to him. Adam's acceptance of this limitation on his authority was basic to his continued residence in the garden. More than this: it was basic to his life.

God interacted with man on a face-to-face basis in the garden. He no longer deals with man in this way. Instead, God has established a system of representative authority that substitutes for a verbal “no trespassing” sign around a designated tree. The neighbor is God’s agent who comes into another man’s field and announces, in effect: “This field does not belong exclusively to you. As the original owner, God has a valid legal claim on it. So do I, as God’s agent.”

In this text, God forbade land owners from excluding visitors from their fields. A visitor had the right to pick something to eat during the harvest season. He lawfully reaped the fruits of another person’s land, labor, and capital. The legal boundaries that delineated the ownership of a field did not restrict access by the visitor. The visitor had a legal claim on a small portion of the harvest. He had to appear in person to collect this portion. Put a different way, outsiders were co-owners of a portion of every field’s pickable crop.

One question that I deal with later in this chapter is whether this law was a cross-boundary law rather than a seed law or land law.¹ If it was a cross-boundary law, then God was making this law universal in its jurisdiction. He was announcing this system of land tenure in His capacity as the owner of the whole earth, not just as the owner of the Promised Land.

B. Exclusion by Conquest

The Israelites were about to inherit the Promised Land through military conquest. Their forthcoming inheritance would be based on the disinheritance of the Canaanites. The specified means of this transfer of ownership was genocide. It was not merely that the Canaanites were to be excluded from the land; they were to be excluded from history. More to the point, theologically speaking, their gods were to be excluded from history (Josh. 23:5–7).

The Israelites would soon enjoy a military victory after a generation of miraculous wandering in the wilderness (Deut. 8:4). There could be no legitimate doubt in the future that God had arranged this transfer of the inheritance. He was therefore the land’s original owner. They would henceforth hold their land as sharecroppers: 10% percent of the net increase in the crop was to go to God through the Levitical priesthood. This was Levi’s inheritance (Num. 18:21).²

1. On the difference, see Appendix J.

2. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 10.

Before the conquest began, God placed certain restrictions on the use of His holy land: the formal terms of the lease. As the owner of both the land and the people who occupied it, God's restrictions were designed to protect the long-term productivity of His assets. Yet He imposed these laws for their sakes, too. Land-owning Israelites had to rest the land every seventh year (Lev. 25:4).³ They had to allow poverty-stricken gleaners to come onto their land and pick up the leftovers of the crops (Lev. 19:9–10;⁴ 23:22;⁵ Deut. 24:21).

This passage further erased the legal boundary between the land's owners and non-owners. Whatever a neighbor could pick and hold in his hands was his to take prior to the harvest. He had legal title to this share of his neighbor's crop. This portion did not belong to the land owner. Ownership of land, seeds, and prior labor did not entitle him to that portion of the crop which a neighbor could pick and hold in his hands. That is, his prior investment was not the legal basis of his ownership.

God's promise to Abraham and the nation's military conquest of Canaan were the joint legal basis of Israel's rural land ownership. Legal title in Israel had nothing to do with some hypothetical original owner who had gained legal title because he had mixed his labor with un-owned land—John Locke's theory of original ownership.⁶ There had once been Canaanites in the land, whose legal title was visibly overturned by the conquest. The Canaanites were to be disinherited, Moses announced. They would not be allowed to inherit, because they could not lawfully be neighbors. The conquest's dispossession of the gods of Canaan definitively overturned any theory of private ownership that rested on a story of man's original ownership based on his own labor. The kingdom grant preceded any man's work. The promise preceded the inheritance. In short, grace preceded law.

The neighbor in Mosaic Israel was a legal co-participant in the kingdom grant. He lived under the authority of God. His presence in the land helped to extend the kingdom in history. The land was being subdued by men who were willing to work under God's law. The exclusion of the Canaanites had been followed by the inclusion of the Israelites and even resident aliens. Canaan was more than Canaanites. It

3. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 23.

4. Ibid., ch. 11.

5. Ibid., ch. 22.

6. John Locke, On Civil Government: Second Treatise (1690), section 27.

was also the land. The conquest of Canaan was more than a military victory; it was a process of kingdom extension. The fruits of the land belonged to all residents in the land. The bulk of these fruits belonged to land owners, but not all of the fruits.

In this sense, the resident who owned no land, but who had legal access to the land, was analogous to the beast that was employed to plow the land. “Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn” (Deut. 25:4).⁷ Although the neighbor was not employed by the land owner, he was part of the overall dominion process inside Israel. The fact that God had included him inside Canaan made it more difficult for those who served other gods to occupy the land. A man’s access to the civil courts and to the fruits of the field gave him a stake in the land, something worth defending. Israel was no pluralistic democracy. It was a theocracy. No law but God’s could lawfully be enforced by the state. Only God’s name could be lawfully invoked publicly inside Israel’s boundaries (Ex. 23:13). By remaining inside the land, a resident was publicly acknowledging his allegiance to Israel’s God rather than to another god. He was acknowledging God’s legal claim on him. God in turn gave him a legal claim on a small portion of the output of the land.

C. Jesus and the Corn

Verse 25 is the partial background for one of Jesus’ more perplexing confrontations with the Pharisees.

And it came to pass on the second sabbath after the first, that he went through the corn fields; and his disciples plucked the ears of corn, and did eat, rubbing them in their hands. And certain of the Pharisees said unto them, Why do ye that which is not lawful to do on the sabbath days? And Jesus answering them said, Have ye not read so much as this, what David did, when himself was an hungred, and they which were with him; How he went into the house of God, and did take and eat the shewbread, and gave also to them that were with him; which it is not lawful to eat but for the priests alone? And he said unto them, That the Son of man is Lord also of the sabbath (Luke 6:1–5).⁸

The Pharisees did not accuse the disciples of theft; rather, they accused the disciples of not keeping the sabbath. Had the disciples been guilty of theft, their critics would have taken advantage of this opportunity to embarrass Jesus through His disciples' actions, which the disciples had done right in front of Him. The reason why they did not accuse the disciples of theft was that in terms of the Mosaic law, the disciples had not committed theft. Their infraction, according to the Pharisees, was picking grain on the sabbath. Picking grain was a form of work.

7. Chapter 63.

8. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 8.

1. David and the Showbread

Jesus' response was to cite an obscure Old Testament incident: David's confiscation of the showbread. The circumstances surrounding that incident are even more perplexing to the commentators than Jesus' walk through the field. David was fleeing from Saul. David lied to a priest and confiscated the showbread, which was always to be on the table of the Lord (Ex. 25:30).⁹

Then came David to Nob to Ahimelech the priest: and Ahimelech was afraid at the meeting of David, and said unto him, Why art thou alone, and no man with thee? And David said unto Ahimelech the priest, The king hath commanded me a business, and hath said unto me, Let no man know any thing of the business whereabout I send thee, and what I have commanded thee: and I have appointed my servants to such and such a place. Now therefore what is under thine hand? give me five loaves of bread in mine hand, or what there is present. And the priest answered David, and said, There is no common bread under mine hand, but there is hallowed bread; if the young men have kept themselves at least from women. And David answered the priest, and said unto him, Of a truth women have been kept from us about these three days, since I came out, and the vessels of the young men are holy, and the bread is in a manner common, yea, though it were sanctified this day in the vessel. So the priest gave him hallowed bread: for there was no bread there but the shewbread, that was taken from before the LORD, to put hot bread in the day when it was taken away (I Sam. 21:1–6).

Jesus was implying that David had not done anything wrong in this incident, either by lying to a priest about his mission or by taking what

9. There was not enough bread to save their lives from starvation. These loaves were not, in and of themselves, crucial for David's survival. But as one meal among many, the bread was part of a program of survival. These loaves might not be the last ones confiscated by David.

belonged to God. David invoked the status of his men as holy warriors on the king's official business, which was why the priest raised the issue of their contact with women. David's answer—they had had no contact with women for three days—pointed back to the three days of abstinence prior to the giving of the law at Sinai (Ex. 19:15). David, as God's anointed heir of the throne of Israel (I Sam. 16), possessed kingly authority. Jonathan, Saul's formally lawful heir, had just re-confirmed his inheritance-transferring oath with David (I Sam. 20:42).¹⁰ Because of this oath, David had the authority to lie to a priest and to take the showbread for himself and his men, even though Saul was still on the throne. David acted lawfully. David acted as Jacob had acted when he tricked Isaac into giving him the blessing which was lawfully his by revelation and voluntary transfer by Esau (Gen. 27).

The priest said that there was no common bread available. This indicates that this was a sabbath day: no cooking. There was no fresh bread or hot bread, which was why the showbread was still there: it had not been replaced by hot bread. So, David asked for holy bread on a sabbath. There was no question about it: he was asking for holy bread on a holy day in the name of the king. The priest gave it to him. On what legal basis? The text does not say, but David's invoking of Saul's authority indicates that a man on a king's mission possessed lawful authority to receive bread set aside for God if there was no other bread available. God had said, "thou shalt set upon the table shewbread before me alway" (Ex. 25:30). But this situation was an exception which the priest acknowledged as valid. The desire of the king's men superseded this ritual requirement.

Down through the centuries, Protestant Bible commentators have struggled with the story of David and the showbread. They have accused David of being a sinful liar. Puritan commentator Matthew Poole called David's lie to the priest a "plain lie."¹¹ John Gill, a Calvinistic Baptist and master of rabbinic literature, referred to David's lie as a "downright lie, and was aggravated by its being told only for the sake of getting a little food; and especially to a high priest, and at the tabernacle of God. . . . This shows the weakness of the best men, when left to themselves. . . ."¹² Neither commentator criticized David for taking

10. The original covenant had been marked by Jonathan's gift of his robe to David, symbolizing the robe of authority, as well as his sword (I Sam. 18:3–4).

11. Matthew Poole, A Commentary on the Holy Bible, 3 vols. (London: Banner of Truth Trust, [1683] 1962), I, p. 565.

12. John Gill, An Exposition of the Old Testament, 4 vols. (London: William Hill Collingridge, [1764] 1853), II, pp. 196–97.

the showbread on the sabbath, which was the judicial heart of the matter. Christ sanctioned this action retroactively, which puts Christian commentators in a bind. So, they focus instead on David's lie, just as commentators focus on Rahab's lie, while refusing to raise their voices in protest against the significant ethical issue: her treason. This is a common blindness among pietistic commentators: straining at ethical gnats and swallowing what appear to be ethical camels.¹³

The Pharisees did not criticize David's actions. Jesus cited this incident in defense of His actions. His answer indicates that He was declaring His own kingly authority. As surely as David's anointing by Samuel on God's behalf had authorized him to deceive a priest and take the showbread on the sabbath, so had the Holy Spirit's anointing of Jesus authorized Him to have His disciples pick grain on the sabbath. As surely as the king's men were authorized to eat the showbread on the sabbath, so were Christ's disciples authorized to eat raw grain on the sabbath.

2. Lord of the Sabbath

Jesus then took the matter a step further: He announced that He was Lord of the Mosaic sabbath. This meant that He was announcing more than kingly authority. He was declaring His messianic heirship at this point: the son of man, Lord of the Mosaic sabbath. If David, as the prophetically anointed but not-yet publicly sanctioned king of Israel, possessed temporary authority over a priest for the sake of his lawful inheritance of the throne, far more did Jesus Christ, as messianic heir of the kingdom of God, possess authority over the sabbath in Israel.

One thing is certain: the judicial issue was not grain-stealing.

D. A Foretaste of Bread and Wine

A visitor eats grapes in the vineyard, but he cannot lawfully carry them off his neighbor's property. He cannot make wine with what he eats. Neither can two hands full of grain make a loaf of bread. This case law does not open a neighbor's field to all those who seek a finished meal. A free sample of the raw materials of such a meal is offered to visitors, but not the feast itself. This is not a harvest in preparation for a feast; it is merely a symbol of a feast to come. To prepare a feast, productive and successful people must bring to the kitchen sufficient fruits of the field. The full blessings of God are displayed at a feast. This case law does not offer a feast to the visitor. It offers a full stomach to a person walking in a field, but not a feast in a home or communion hall. It offers sufficient food to a hungry man to quiet the rumblings of his stomach, but it does not provide the means of celebration. It offers a token of a future feast. It is symbolic of blessings to come, a down payment or earnest of a future feast.

13. Cf. Gary North, "In Defense of Biblical Bribery," in R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), especially pp. 838–42.

Grapes and grain point to the sacramental nature of the coming feast: a communion meal. The two crops singled out in this law are corn (grain) and grapes. The disciples picked corn, not wheat. Corn can be eaten raw; wheat cannot. The fact that these two crops are the raw materials for bread and wine is not some random aspect of this case law. This law pointed forward to the communion feast of the New Covenant. The Mosaic covenant was, in effect, the grain and grapes that pointed forward to the New Covenant's bread and wine. The New Covenant's bread and wine in turn point forward to the marriage supper of the lamb (Rev. 19:9). The communion table of God brings together people of a common confession and a common community who look forward to the eschatological consummation of the kingdom of God in history at the end of time. So it was also in Mosaic Israel. The eschatological aspect of Deuteronomy, as the Pentateuch's book of the inheritance, provides a framework for interpreting this case law.

God gives to every man in history a foretaste of a holy meal to come: common grace. Not every man accepts God's invitation. Not every man is given access to God's table, either in history or eternity. The fellowship of God is closed to outsiders by means of a common confession that restricts strangers from lawful access to the table. But a free foretaste of the bounty of God's table at the consummate marriage supper of the Lamb is given to all those who walk in the open field and pick a handful of grain. A handful of this bounty is the common blessing of all mankind. This is the doctrine of common grace.¹⁴

The visitor is not allowed to bring a vessel to gather up the bounty of his neighbor's field. Neither is the covenant-breaker allowed access to the Lord's Supper. The visitor is allowed access to the makings of bread and wine. Similarly, the covenant-breaker is allowed into the church to hear the message of redemption. He may gain great benefits from his presence in the congregation, or he may leave spiritually unfed. So it is with the visitor in the field. "I take no man's charity," says

14. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcgr>)

one visitor to a field. “Religion is a crutch,” says a visitor to a church.¹⁵ Such a willful rejection of either blessing indicates a spirit of autonomy, a lack of community spirit, and a lack of a shared environment.

E. Neighborhood and Neighborliness

Grapes and grain remain ripe enough to eat in the field only for relatively short periods of time. Either they are not yet ripe or they have just been harvested. The neighbor in Israel was not allowed to bring a vessel to carry away the produce. The presumption was that the neighbor was visiting, became hungry, and ate his fill right there in the field. This is what Jesus’ disciples did. The neighbor, unless very hungry, did not walk over to the neighbor’s house three times a day to get a quick meal. He had his own crop to harvest. If he was landless, he might come into a field and eat. He could even bring his family. The landless person would have gained access to free food, but only briefly, during the harvest season.

The two crops explicitly eligible for picking were above-ground crops. This law did not authorize someone to dig a root crop out of the ground. The eligible food was there, as we say in English, “for the picking.” Were these two crops symbolic for all picked crops, or did the law authorize only grapes and grain? I think the two crops were symbols of every crop that can be picked in a field. The neighbor was like an ox that treaded out corn; he could not lawfully be muzzled (Deut. 25:4).¹⁶ This meant that the hungry neighbor had a limited range of crops at his disposal. If he was also a local farmer, then his own crop was similarly exposed. His concerted effort to harm a neighbor by a misuse of this law would have exposed him to a tit-for-tat response. If he used this law as a weapon, it could be used against him.

Who was the neighbor? The Hebrew word, rayah, is most commonly used to describe a close friend or someone in the neighborhood. “Neither shalt thou desire thy neighbour’s wife, neither shalt thou covet thy neighbour’s house, his field, or his manservant, or his maid-servant, his ox, or his ass, or any thing that is thy neighbour’s” (Deut. 5:21). It can be translated as friend. “If thy brother, the son of thy mother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend, which is as thine own soul, entice thee secretly, saying, Let us

15. A good reason for not passing a collection plate in church is that visitors may believe that a token payment will pay for “services rendered.” So, for that matter, may non-tithing members.

16. Chapter 63.

go and serve other gods, which thou hast not known, thou, nor thy fathers" (Deut. 13:6). It was a next-door neighbor: "Thou shalt not remove thy neighbour's landmark, which they of old time have set in thine inheritance, which thou shalt inherit in the land that the LORD thy God giveth thee to possess it" (Deut. 19:14).¹⁷

But did it always mean this? In Jesus' answer to this question by the clever lawyer, He used the story of the Samaritan on a journey through Israel who helped a beaten man, in contrast to the priest and the Levite who ignored him (Luke 10). Jesus was arguing that ethics, not friendship, confession, or place of residence, defines the true neighbor. The Samaritan was the injured man's true neighbor because he helped him in his time of need.¹⁸ The lawyer did not disagree with Jesus' assessment. He understood that this interpretation was consistent with the intent of the Mosaic law. This means that a law-abiding man on the road in Mosaic Israel was a neighbor. The crop owner had to treat a man on a journey as if he were a local resident. This included even a foreigner.

The Greek word used to translate rayah in the Septuagint Greek translation of the Old Testament is pleision, which means "near, close by."¹⁹ This indicates that the Jewish translators regarded the neighbor as a local resident. The neighbor was statistically most likely to be a fellow member of the tribe. Rural land could not be sold permanently. It could not be alienated: sold to an alien. The jubilee law regulated the inheritance of rural land (Lev. 25). This means that the neighbor in Mosaic Israel was statistically most likely a permanent resident of the community.

Nevertheless, this law opened the fields to people on a journey, just as the Samaritan was on a journey. As surely as the Samaritan was the injured man's neighbor, so was the land owner the hungry traveler's neighbor. This law was a reminder to the Israelites that God had been neighborly to them in their time of need. After the exile, such permanent geographical boundaries were maintained only if the occupying foreign army so decided. Jesus walked through the field under Rome's civil authority, not Israel's.

Why would God have designated these two above-ground crops as

17. Chapter 44.

18. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 21.

19. Walter Bauer, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, trans. William F. Arndt and F. Wilbur Gingrich (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1957), p. 678.

open to neighborly picking? This law made neighbors co-owners of the fruits of a man's land, labor, time, and capital. The land owner was legally unable to protect his wealth from the grasping hands of non-owners. He was left without legal recourse. Why? What judicial principle undergirded this case law? What benefit to the community did this law bring which offset the negative effects of a limitation of the protection of private property? To answer this accurately, we must first determine whether this case law was a temporary law governing only Mosaic Israel or a permanent legal statute for all Trinitarian covenantal societies.

F. Seed Laws and Land Laws

Seed laws and land laws were temporary statutes that applied only to Mosaic Israel.²⁰ I have argued previously that the seed laws of the Mosaic covenant were tied to Jacob's messianic prophecy regarding Judah: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be" (Gen. 49:10). Seed laws and land laws served as means of separating the tribes, thereby maintaining the continuity of each tribe until the fulfillment of Jacob's prophecy, which rested on tribal separation.²¹ The jubilee inheritance laws were land laws that were designed by God to accomplish this task.

One aspect of tribal separation was the creation of a sense of unity and participation in a larger family unit. Members of each tribe were linked together as descendants of one of Jacob's sons. There was an aspect of brotherliness within a tribe that was not shared across the tribe's boundaries. There is a social distinction between brotherhood and otherhood. Boundaries mark this distinction. The main boundary for Israel was circumcision, but tribal boundaries also had their nationally separating and locally unifying effects.

By allowing the neighbor to pick mature fruit, the Mosaic law encouraged a sense of mutual solidarity. The local resident was entitled to reap the rewards of land and labor. The land belonged ultimately to God. It was a holy land, set apart by God for his historical purposes. To dwell in the land involved benefits and costs. One of the benefits was access to food, however temporary. The staff of life in effect was free. In harvest season, men in Israel would not die of starvation. But their source of sustenance was local: their neighbor's field. Would this have created animosity? Sometimes. Everything in a fallen world is capable of creating animosity. But what about the owner's sense of justice? It was his land, his effort, his time, and his seeds that had made this wealth possible. Why should another man have lawful access to the fruits of his labor?

20. Appendix J.

21. Appendix J.

One possible answer ties this law to the Promised Land. Israel was a holy land that had been set aside by God through a program of partial genocide. (God had specified total genocide, but the Israelites had failed.) The land was exclusively God's. It was His dwelling place. He fed His people on His land. God, not their own efforts, was the source of their wealth (Deut. 8:17).²² Israel's holy status was still true in Jesus' day because of the temple and its sacrifices. But there is a problem with this explanation: strangers in Jesus' day dwelled in the land, and in fact ruled over the land. Furthermore, Jesus identified the Good Samaritan as a neighbor. The Samaritan therefore would have qualified as a man with lawful access to an Israelite's field. The Promised Land fails as the basis of this case law.

A second possible explanation is this: the tribes existed in order to complete God's plan for Israel. Local solidarity was important for maintaining the continuity of the tribes. Problem: this law was still in force in Jesus' day, yet the tribes no longer occupied the land as separate tribal units. The seed laws have nothing to do with this law.

Third, it could be argued that Israel was a holy army. An army does not operate in terms of the free market's principle of "high bid wins." In every military conflict in which a city is besieged, martial law replaces market contracts as the basis of feeding the population. The free market's principle of high bid wins is replaced by food rationing. Solidarity during wartime must not be undermined by a loss of morale. A nation's defenders are not all rich. The closer we get to the priestly function of ensuring life, the less applicable market pricing becomes. Problem: Israel was not a holy army after the exile. It was an occupied nation. Yet this case law was still in force. There was no discontinuity in this case between the Mosaic covenant and the post-exilic covenant.

If a Mosaic law was not a land law, a seed law, or a priestly law, then it was a cross-boundary law. This means that it remains in force in the New Covenant era. The problem is to identify in what ways this law can be applied in a relevant way in the New Covenant era.

22. Chapter 21.

G. The Farmer and the Grocer

The Mosaic law authorized a neighbor to pick grapes or grain from another man's field. It did not authorize a man to pick up a free piece of fruit from a grocer's table. What is the difference? What underlying moral or organizational principle enables us to distinguish between the two acts? In both cases, the "picker" wanted to eat a piece of fruit for free. He was not allowed to do this in the second case.

Let us consider the economic aspects of this law. Both the farmer and the grocer sought a positive return on their investments. The farmer planted seeds in the ground, nurtured the seedlings, and sold the crop to someone, possibly the grocer or his economic agent. The grocer made his money by purchasing a crop in bulk from the farmer or his economic agent, transporting it to a central location, and displaying it in a way pleasing to buyers. What was the differentiating factor? Time? Soil? Location? Money?

The difference seems to have been this: control over rural land. The farmer in Mosaic Israel worked the land. He cared for it directly. The grocer did not. The farmer profited directly from the output of this land. The grocer profited indirectly. The farmer had a unique dependence on the land. The grocer did so only indirectly, insofar as food that was imported from abroad was much more expensive for him to buy, except in Mediterranean coastal areas and regions close to the borders of the nation. The distinction between grocers and land owners may also have had something to do with the jubilee land laws.²³ Rural land was governed by the jubilee law. Urban real estate was not. Unlike urban land, prior to the exile, rural land was the exclusive property of the heirs of the conquest, though not after the return (Ezek. 47:21–23).

Those who lived on the land and profited from it as farmers were required to share a portion of the land's productivity with others, as we have seen. To this extent, the fruit of the land was the inheritance of those who dwelled close by. This law would have strengthened the sense of community in a society that was bound by a national covenant that was tied to land. The local poor would have had something to eat in the harvest—a sense of participation in the blessings of God. A brief safety net was in place. To gain access to a full safety net—a lawful bag in which to put the picked produce—the poor had to work as gleaners

23. As I shall argue below, I do not think this was covenantally relevant: "Has This Law Been Annulled?"

(Deut. 24:19–22).²⁴ While the state was not authorized to send crop collectors into the fields to collect food to redistribute to the poor, the Mosaic civil law did not enforce sanctions against those who came into a field to eat a handful of food. It was not legal for land owners to impose physical sanctions against neighbors who took advantage of this law. The civil law did not compel wealth redistribution in Mosaic Israel, but it defined the land owner's property rights in such a way that the state was prohibited from bringing negative sanctions against those who entered the field to pick a handful of the crop.

H. A Shared Environment

Let us consider a difficult application of this case law. Did this law open every man's fields to wandering hordes during a famine? Times of famine have been times of great disruption of the social order. Wandering bands of hungry people fan out across the countryside. Whole populations move from region to region in search of food. This happened repeatedly in Europe from the late medieval era until the late seventeenth century, and well into the twentieth century in Russia.²⁵ Similar famines have occurred in China in modern times.²⁶ Before the advent of modern capitalism, famines were a regular occurrence. Even within capitalist society, Ireland suffered a nearly decade-long famine in the 1840s. The absentee landlords in England did not foresee the threat to the potato crop posed by the blight at its first appearance in 1841. Over the next decade, these landlords paid for their lack of foresight with huge capital losses; a million Irish paid with their lives.²⁷

Are wandering strangers in search of food the judicial equivalent of a neighbor? Is a desperate family on the road in search of food entitled fill their stomachs with a farmer's corn or apples? If enough of these people were to show up at harvest time, their economic effect would be comparable to a swarm of locusts. Locusts in the Bible are seen as the judgment of God (Ex. 10:4–6; Deut. 28:38). The land owner planted a crop and cared for it in the expectation that his family would eat for another season. Was he now required to sit idly by and watch strangers consume his family's future? Was the state prohibited by this

24. Chapter 62.

25. For a list of dozens of these famines, see Pitirim A. Sorokin, Man and Society in Calamity (New York: Dutton, 1942), p. 132.

26. Pearl S. Buck's novel, The Good Earth (1931), tells this story.

27. A good summary of the story is Christine Kinealy, The Great Hunger in Ireland (Chicago: Pluto, 1997).

case law from defending his interests? If so, then what would be his incentive to go to the expense of planting and nurturing his next crop? Would he even survive to plant again? Was Israel's society benefited by opening the fields to all comers in every economic situation? Was the nation's future agricultural output threatened by a definition of "neighbor" that includes an open-ended number of strangers in search of free food?

The goal of this law was the preservation of community. Its context was a local neighborhood in which families shared the same environment. A crop failure for one family was probably accompanied by a crop failure for all. Mutual aid and comfort in times of adversity were likely in a community in which every person has a symbolic stake in the community's success. These people shared a common destiny. This law was an aspect of that common destiny.

As for the Samaritan in the parable, he was not on the road for the purpose of stripping fields along the way. The Samaritan assisted the beaten man; he did not eat the last grape on the man's vine. The Samaritan found another man on the same road. They were both on a journey. They shared a similar environment. They were both subject to the risks of travel. The threat of robbery threatened all men walking down that road. What had befallen the victim might have befallen the Samaritan. It might yet befall him. Perhaps the same band of robbers was still in the "neighborhood": the road to Jericho.

Men who share a common environment also share common risks. When men who share common risks are voluntarily bound by a shared ethical system to help each other in bad times, a kind of social insurance policy goes into effect. Risks are pooled. The costs that would otherwise befall a victim are reduced by men's willingness to defray part of each other's burdens. But, unlike an insurance policy, there is no formal agreement, nor does the victim have any legal claim on the non-victim. The beaten man had no legal claim on the Samaritan, the Levite, or the priest. Two of the three ignored him. They broke no civil law, but their act of deliberately passing by on the other side of the road revealed their lack of commitment to the principle of community: shared burdens and blessings.

The ethics of neighborliness is mutual sharing when the resources are available. The ethics of neighborliness did not mandate that the state remain inactive when hordes of men whose only goal is obtaining food sweep down on a rural community. The harvest was shared locally because men have struggled with the same obstacles to produce it.

The original struggle was the conquest of Canaan, which was a tribal effort in each region. This law assumed a context of mutual obligations, not the asymmetric conditions in a famine, when the producers face an invasion from outside the community by those who did not share in the productive effort.

I. Community and Economy

One of the favorite contrasts of sociologists is community vs. economy. The most famous example of this in sociological literature is Ferdinand Tönnies' Gemeinschaft und Gesellschaft (1887), which he wrote at age 32. In this pioneering work, the author contrasted the small, medieval-type village with the modern city. He argued that the demise of the personal relationships of village life has led to the impersonal rationalism and calculation of the modern city.²⁸ He used the now-familiar analogies of organic life and mechanical structure to describe these two forms of human association.²⁹ He viewed the family as the model or ideal type of Gemeinschaft.³⁰ The business firm, which is a voluntary association established for a limited, rational purpose (profit), would seem to serve well as a model for Gesellschaft.³¹

In American history, there have been few defenders of Gemeinschaft. Thomas Jefferson heralded the independent yeoman farmer, but Jefferson was no advocate of village life. A group of intellectuals and poets known as the Nashville agrarians in 1930 wrote a brief defense of southern agrarian life in contrast to modern urbanism, but they have long been regarded at best as regional utopians, even in the South.³² Karl Marx and Frederick Engels were contemptuous of "the idiocy of rural life,"³³ and most commentators have agreed with them. Most

28. He did not argue, as Marx and other sociologists and economists have argued, that it was the rise of capitalism that undermined the village life. Robert A. Nisbet, The Sociological Tradition (New York: Basic Books, 1966), p. 78.

29. Ferdinand Tönnies, Community & Society (Gemeinschaft und Gesellschaft) (New York: Harper Torchbooks, [1887] 1957), pp. 33–37.

30. Nisbet, Sociological Tradition, p. 75.

31. His theme—the transition from Gemeinschaft to Gesellschaft, from communalism to rationalism—became an integrating theme in the works of the great German sociologist, Max Weber. Ibid., p. 79.

32. I'll Take My Stand: The South and the Agrarian Tradition (Baton Rouge: University of Louisiana Press, [1930] 1977). Cf. Alexander Karanikas, Tillers of a Myth: Southern Agrarians as Social and Literary Critics (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1966).

33. Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Manifesto of the Communist Party (1848), in Collected Works (New York: International Publishers, 1976), 6, p. 488.

commentators have been urban.

The movement of vast populations from the farms to cities has been a continuing phenomenon worldwide, beginning no later than the Industrial Revolution in the late eighteenth century. The advancing division of labor was made possible by close contact in urban areas, the transportation revolution, the mechanization of agriculture, the revolution in electrical power, and government-funded road systems. This has concentrated populations in vast urban complexes.

The Bible promotes both cultures. The farms of Israel were held together as a civilization by the Ark of the Covenant, which was housed in a city. The New Heaven and New Earth is described as a city in which the tree of life grows (Rev. 22:2).³⁴ In the Old Covenant, the city was supported by the farms. In the New Covenant's imagery of the final state, the image is different: the city contains the tree. The tree feeds the inhabitants. The symbolism seems to be from farm to city. This was also the thrust of the jubilee legislation: ever-smaller farms for an ever-growing population.³⁵ Yet, covenantally, an heir of the conquest always had his historical roots in the land. The land was his inheritance. His name was associated with the land.

This judicial link to the soil ended with the New Covenant. The land ceased to be a holy place after the fall of Jerusalem. But the imagery of the tree of life, like the imagery of bread and wine, ties members of the New Covenant community to the soil. The preference of suburban Americans for carefully mowed lawns, of Englishmen and Japanese for gardens, of the Swiss and Austrians for flowers growing in window gardens and for vegetable gardens all testify to man's desire to retain his links to the soil from which he came.

There is a story told about the German free market economist Wilhelm Röpke. He was living in Geneva at the time. He invited another free market economist (said by some to be Ludwig von Mises) to his home near Geneva. He kept a vegetable garden plot near his home. The visitor remarked that this was an inefficient way to produce food. He countered that it was an efficient way to produce happiness.³⁶

34. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 21. (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

35. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 24.

36. Russell Kirk said that Röpke said that it was Mises. In 1975, I heard the same story from another economist, Röpke's translator, Patrick Boorman. I do not recall that Mises was the target of the remark, but he may have been. See Kirk's 1992 Foreword to Wilhelm Röpke, The Social Crisis of Our Time (New Brunswick, New Jersey: Transaction, [1942] 1992), p. ix.

The division of labor is a powerful social arrangement. Specialization increases our economic output as individuals. We can earn more money per hour by specializing than by performing low division of labor tasks. But we also increase our dependence on the social institutions that have promoted the division of labor. Above all, we increase our reliance on banks, transportation systems, and other arrangements run by computers. We have delivered our lives into the hands and minds of computer programmers. The payments system is governed by fractional reserve banking. This is risky. There is an economic case for investing in a lower division of labor lifestyle with a portion of our assets and our time.

There is more to community than efficiency. Community is more than property rights. Community in Mosaic Israel was based on a series of covenants. The right of private property was defended by the commandment not to steal, but the definition of theft did not include eating from a neighbor's unharvested crop. This exception was unique to the land. It applied to a form of property that was not part of the free market system of buying and selling (Lev. 25). God was the owner of the land in Mosaic Israel. He set unique requirements for ownership of Mosaic Israel's rural land. These rules were designed to provide a brief safety net in an area of the economy in which it was illegal to transfer family ownership down through the generations.

In the final analysis, this law was far more symbolic than economic, for the harvest time would not have lasted very long. The sense of community had to be preserved in a system that restricted buying and selling. Those who did not own the best land or even any land at all had a stake in the success of local land owners, despite the law's restrictions of the permanent sale of inherited property. This symbol of participation in the fruits of the land was important for a society whose members celebrated the fulfillment of God's prophecy regarding the inheritance of a Promised Land.

J. Has This Law Been Annulled?

Is there any Mosaic covenantal principle whose annulment also annulled this law? We know that a similar law is still in force. Paul cited the law prohibiting the muzzling of the working ox, applying it to the payment of ministers. "Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour, especially they who labour in the word and doctrine. For the scripture saith, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn. And, The labourer is worthy of his reward” (I Tim. 5:17–18).³⁷ But this case law applied more generally to the Christian walk. “For it is written in the law of Moses, Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn. Doth God take care for oxen? Or saith he it altogether for our sakes? For our sakes, no doubt, this is written: that he that ploweth should plow in hope; and that he that thresheth in hope should be partaker of his hope” (I Cor. 9:9–10).³⁸ There is a down payment in history—an earnest—of the covenant-keeper’s kingdom victory in eternity. This down payment is an aspect of the inheritance (Eph. 1:10–14).

The tribal system was annulled in A.D. 70. Was this law exclusively tribal? The same kinds of psychological benefits seem to apply outside the tribal context: commitment to the community, a sense of participation in the blessings of this community, a willingness to defend it against invaders. What is missing today is Mosaic Israel’s public exclusion of the names of other gods. A man’s presence in the land does not, in and of itself, testify publicly to his willingness to serve under the law of God. The mobility of rival gods is like the mobility of the God of the Bible in the Old Covenant. The universality of their claims makes them different from the gods of the ancient Near East in Moses’ day. To this extent, the situation has changed. But religions that claimed allegiance to universal gods appeared in the Near East and Far East at about the time of the Babylonian exile. Nevertheless, people in Israel in Jesus’ day were still allowed to pick grain in their neighbors’ fields.

This law seems to be a cross-boundary law. The neighbor, defined biblically, has a legal claim to a handful of any crop that he can pick. The biblical hermeneutical principle is that any Old Covenant law not annulled explicitly or implicitly by a New Covenant law is still valid. There seems to be no principle of judicial discontinuity that would annul this law.³⁹

37. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 7.

38. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 11.

39. Because I see no judicial discontinuity between the covenants regarding this law, I conclude that the distinction between the grocer and the farmer was not based on the jubilee law, which has been annulled (Luke 4:18–22). North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 6.

Conclusion

This law applies to rural land during the harvest season, but before the harvest takes place. The goal of this law was to increase the sense of community. Residents are supposed to know that they have a small stake—a symbolic stake—in the prosperity of the land.

There seems to be no discontinuity between the two covenants with regard to this law. It was a theocratic law, but whenever a nation covenants with the Trinitarian God of the Bible, this Mosaic law is still binding. Its principles of ownership are morally binding.

The modern world is politically polytheistic. It denies legitimacy to the principle of civil theocracy. It also passes legislation that excludes neighbors from any man's field. It then extends the principle of exclusion to the nation itself. It creates "no trespassing" boundaries around the nation. Access to a man's field is analogous to access to the nation; the modern state is consistent in this regard. Immigration legislation excludes outsiders because they may become a threat to a national covenant that is not confessional. Immigrants may gain the vote and use the state to redistribute wealth. The same kind of exclusivism operates in laws legalizing abortion, which is another barrier to entry into the land.

This law testifies against geographical exclusivism because this law is part of a system of covenantal order that is confessionally exclusivist. Open borders are the rule for biblical theocracy: access to the visible kingdom of God in history. Here is the logic of "open borders openly arrived at." You may freely walk into a local church; therefore, you may also freely walk into the nation in which that church operates. Any Christian who promotes closed national borders is saying, in effect, "Until some church sends a missionary to your nation, or until your entire population has access to the Internet, you must content yourself with going to hell. Sorry about that."

The message of this law is clear: access to God's promised land is to be accompanied by access to the fields of the promised land at harvest time. This gives non-owners and non-citizens a stake in the maintenance of a biblically theocratic society. This law makes it clear that private property is not an absolute value in human society. Private property is an absolute right for God, as the boundary placed around the forbidden tree in Eden reveals; it is not, however, an absolute right for man. Nothing is an absolute right for man, for man is not absolute. This case law breaches the boundaries of rural land. Owners are not allowed to use force to exclude a neighbor from picking a handful of the crop to eat in the field. The state may not defend owners' legal title to this token portion of the crop. This means that they have no legal title to all of it. This is clearly a violation of libertarian definitions of private ownership.

Like the tree in the midst of the garden, this limitation on exclusive ownership is minimal. It does not amount to much, economically speaking. God originally opened the entire world to Adam. He restricted only one tiny area of the creation as His own exclusive property. Adam may have concluded regarding this restriction on his authority, "It's not the money; it's the principle of the thing." Surely, this is how his fallen heirs think. They do not want God to interfere in their economic lives, except to give them more wealth, even at the expense of their neighbors.

There is no question: it is the principle of the matter that counts. The principle is this: God is sovereign; man is not. God has the final legal right to exclude access to His property; man does not. By means of this law, God tells owners of rural property that He, not they, has the final say regarding who has legal access to their land. The neighbor is God's representative agent in this declaration of sovereignty. He has the right to walk onto a neighbor's property and pick a handful of corn during the harvest season. The value of this corn is minimal. The judicial principle is fundamental. In this sense, this law is a recapitulation of the law governing the forbidden tree in Eden.

There are dedicated Christian defenders of some version of socialism or Keynesian interventionism who are always in search of a passage that restricts private ownership. They have yet to latch onto this passage. To them, I say: "Beware. This is a very hot potato." This law does not authorize open access for every occupation. It is limited to rural property. The principle of ownership here is not that the community at large has lawful title to a portion of every resident's output. The principle of ownership is that God is the cosmic Owner. Because He does not intervene visibly in history, unlike in Eden, He singles out representative agents who act in His name on behalf of the fundamental principle of ownership: God owns all things. To demonstrate His cosmic ownership, God restricts a landowner's right of exclusion. In doing this, He demonstrates His own right of exclusion. He excludes rural land owners' absolute right of exclusion. A neighbor's lawful access to a handful of corn judicially represents God's right to set the terms of exclusion, i.e., ownership.

What is significant judicially is this law's insignificance economically. There is nothing of great economic value involved, any more than the fruit of the forbidden tree was economically valuable in comparison to the wealth available to Adam in Eden. It really is the principle involved. It did not take much of value in Eden to sort out the judicial issue involved: God's absolute right of ownership. Similarly, neither does it take much of value in the law of the open field to sort out the same judicial principle.

A Christian socialist may lawfully pick a handful of ideological corn from this law, but this will not sustain him for very long. At best, it is a snack. If his point is that there is no absolute right of private ownership in a godly society, he is correct. If his point is that a handful of neighborly corn is a valid representative case justifying the state's ownership of society's means of production, or taxation at a rate that would have made the Pharaoh of the oppression feel guilty, then our straws-grasping scholar is guilty of bringing in a mechanical reaper and stripping the field clean. He has moved from being a neighbor to being a thief. In this sense, he reflects the modern state.

End of Volume 2

INHERITANCE AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON DEUTERONOMY

VOLUME 3

Other Books by Gary North

An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)

Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)

An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)

Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)

Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)

Government by Emergency (1983)

Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)

75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)

Coined Freedom (1984)

Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)

Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)

Honest Money (1986)

Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)

Dominion and Common Grace (1987)

Inherit the Earth (1987)

Liberating Planet Earth (1987)

Healer of the Nations (1987)

The Pirate Economy (1987)

Is the World Running Down? (1988)

When Justice Is Aborted (1989)

Political Polytheism (1989)

The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)

Victim's Rights (1990)

Westminster's Confession (1991)

Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar

The Coase Theorem (1992)

Salvation Through Inflation (1993)

Rapture Fever (1993)

Tithing and the Church (1994)

Crossed Fingers (1996)

The Covenantal Tithe (2010)

INHERITANCE AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON DEUTERONOMY

VOLUME 3

GARY NORTH

Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy
Volume 3

Copyright © Gary North, 2012

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Volume 1

| | |
|--|------|
| Foreword | xi |
| Preface | xxxi |
| Introduction | 1 |
| Part I: Transcendence/Presence (1:1–5) | |
| 1. The God Who Brings Judgment in History (Deut. 1:1–5) . | 17 |
| Part II: Hierarchy/Representation (1:6–4:49) | |
| 2. A Delayed Inheritance (Deut 1:6–8) | 23 |
| 3. Delegated Authority and Social Order (Deut. 1:9–13) | 36 |
| 4. The Face of Man (Deut. 1:17) | 44 |
| 5. Bureaucratic Counsel (Deut. 1:21–23) | 52 |
| 6. The Skills of Foreign Trade (Deut. 2:4–6) | 63 |
| 7. Transferring the Inheritance (Deut. 3:27–28) | 71 |
| 8. Evangelism Through Law (Deut. 4:5–8) | 78 |
| 9. Hear, Fear, and Testify (Deut. 4:9–10) | 84 |
| 10. Removing the Inheritance (Deut. 4:25–28) | 96 |
| Part III: Ethics/Law/Boundaries (5–26) | |
| 11. Judicial Continuity (Deut. 5:1–5) | 108 |
| 12. Sabbath and Liberation (Deut. 5:14–15) | 116 |
| 13. Law and Sanctions (Deut. 5:32–33) | 125 |
| 14. The Wealth of Nations (Deut. 6:1–3) | 133 |
| 15. Law and Inheritance (Deut. 6:4–9) | 145 |
| 16. Genocide and Inheritance (Deut. 7:1–5) | 161 |
| 17. By Law or By Promise? (Deut. 8:1) | 182 |
| 18. Miracles, Entropy, and Social Theory (Deut. 8:2–4) | 191 |
| 19. Chastening and Inheritance (Deut. 8:5–7) | 209 |
| 20. Overcoming Poverty (Deut. 8:9) | 215 |
| 21. The Assertion of Autonomy (Deut. 8:10–17) | 223 |
| 22. Economic Growth (Deut. 8:18) | 228 |
| 23. Disinheriting the Heirs (Deut. 8:19–20) | 251 |

| | |
|--|-----|
| 24. Overcoming the Visible Odds (Deut. 9:1–6) | 263 |
| 25. Sonship, Servitude, and Inheritance (Deut. 9:26–29) | 283 |
| 26. Sonship, Obedience, and Immigration (Deut. 10:12–16) | 291 |
| 27. Oath, Sanctions, and Inheritance (Deut. 10:20–22) | 306 |
| 28. Rain and Inheritance (Deut. 11:10–14) | 313 |
| 29. Law, Sanctions, and Inheritance (Deut. 11:18–21) | 323 |

Volume 2

| | |
|---|-----|
| 30. Common Grace (Deut. 12:1–3) | 339 |
| 31. Communal Meals (Deut. 12:5–10) | 358 |
| 32. The Murderous Gods of Canaan (Deut. 12:28–31) | 369 |
| 33. The Lure of Magic (Deut. 13:1–5) | 376 |
| 34. Commerce and Covenant (Deut. 14:21) | 395 |
| 35. Tithes of Celebration (Deut. 14:22–29) | 407 |
| 36. The Charitable Loan (Deut. 15:1–5) | 429 |
| 37. Lending and Dominion (Deut. 15:6) | 445 |
| 38. Consuming Capital in Good Faith (Deut. 15:19–22) | 453 |
| 39. Individual Blessing (Deut. 16:14–17) | 461 |
| 40. Casuistry and Inheritance (Deut. 16:18–20) | 468 |
| 41. Israel's Supreme Court (Deut. 17:8–13) | 483 |
| 42. Boundaries on Kingship (Deut. 17:14) | 500 |
| 43. Levitical Inheritance Through Separation (Deut. 18:1–2) | 517 |
| 44. Landmarks and Social Cooperation (Deut. 19:14) | 526 |
| 45. The Penalty for Perjury (Deut. 19:15–19) | 536 |
| 46. A Hierarchy of Commitments (Deut. 20:5–7) | 551 |
| 47. A Few Good Men (Deut. 20:8) | 559 |
| 48. Limits against Empire (Deut. 20:10–18) | 567 |
| 49. Fruit Trees as Covenantal Testimonies (Deut. 20:19–20) | 584 |
| 50. Double Portion, Double Burden (Deut. 21:15–17) | 594 |
| 51. Executing a Rebellious Adult Son (Deut. 21:18–21) | 608 |
| 52. Lost and Found (Deut. 22:1–4) | 629 |
| 53. Nature's Roots and Fruits (Deut. 22:6–7) | 643 |
| 54. The Rooftop Railing Law (Deut. 22:8) | 649 |
| 55. Laws Prohibiting Mixtures (Deut. 22:9–11) | 659 |
| 56. The Fugitive Slave Law (Deut. 23:15–16) | 670 |
| 57. Usury: Yes and No (Deut. 23:19–20) | 679 |
| 58. Vows, Contracts, and Productivity (Deut. 23:21–23) | 692 |
| 59. Free for the Picking (Deut. 23:24–25) | 704 |

Volume 3

| | |
|---|-----|
| 60. Collateral, Servitude, and Dignity (Deut. 24:6) | 727 |
| 61. Wages and Oppression (Deut. 24:14–15) | 744 |
| 62. Gleaning: Charitable Efficiency (Deut. 24:19–22) | 766 |
| 63. Unmuzzling the Working Ox (Deut. 25:4) | 782 |
| 64. Levirate Marriage and Family Name (Deut. 25:5–6) | 796 |
| 65. Just Weights and Justice (Deut. 25:13–16) | 812 |
| 66. The Firstfruits Offering (Deut. 26:1–3) | 844 |
| 67. Positive Confession (Deut. 26:12–15) | 850 |
| Part IV: Oath/Sanctions (27–30) | |
| 68. Landmark and Curse (Deut. 27:17) | 857 |
| 69. Objective Wealth and historical Progress (Deut. 28:4–5) . . | 865 |
| 70. Credit as a Tool of Dominion (Deut. 28:12–13, 43–44) . . | 884 |
| 71. The Covenant of Prosperity (Deut. 29:9–15) | 896 |
| 72. Captivity and Restoration (Deut. 30:1–5) | 901 |
| 73. Life and Dominion (Deut. 30:19–20) | 908 |
| Part V: Succession/Inheritance (31–33) | |
| 74. Courage and Dominion (Deut. 31:4–8) | 914 |
| 75. Law and Liberty (Deut. 31:9–13) | 921 |
| 76. A Covenantal Song (Deut. 31:16–18) | 930 |
| Conclusion | 933 |

Volume 4

| | |
|---|------|
| APPENDIX A—Modern Economics as a Form of Magic | 983 |
| APPENDIX B—Individualism, Holism, and Covenantalism | 971 |
| APPENDIX C—Syncretism, Pluralism, and Empire | 984 |
| APPENDIX D—The Demographics of American Judaism | 998 |
| APPENDIX E—Free Market Capitalism | 1017 |
| APPENDIX F—The Economic Re-education of Ronald J. Sider . . | 1052 |
| APPENDIX G—Strong Drink | 1068 |
| APPENDIX H—Weak Reed: The Politics of Compromise | 1075 |
| APPENDIX I—Eschatology, Law, and Pietism | 1084 |
| APPENDIX J—Categories of the Mosaic Law | 1111 |

COLLATERAL, SERVITUDE, AND DIGNITY

No man shall take the nether or the upper millstone to pledge: for he taketh a man's life to pledge. . . . When thou dost lend thy brother any thing, thou shalt not go into his house to fetch his pledge. Thou shalt stand abroad, and the man to whom thou dost lend shall bring out the pledge abroad unto thee. And if the man be poor, thou shalt not sleep with his pledge: In any case thou shalt deliver him the pledge again when the sun goeth down, that he may sleep in his own raiment, and bless thee: and it shall be righteousness unto thee before the LORD thy God. . . . Thou shalt not pervert the judgment of the stranger, nor of the fatherless; nor take a widow's raiment to pledge: But thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in Egypt, and the LORD thy God redeemed thee thence: therefore I command thee to do this thing (Deut. 24:6, 10–13, 17–18).

The theocentric focus of this pledge law is the existence of legal boundaries. God, as the redeemer (point four), establishes legal boundaries (point three) around property delegated to men (point two).

A. The Pledge

At the very heart of the debt relationship is the pledge. The pledge serves as collateral: the debtor's economic motivation to repay. If he fails to repay, he loses ownership of the pledge. Until he fails to repay, he retains possession of it. He can exclude others from access to it. But his failure to keep his promises (stipulations) leads to the transfer of control to the creditor, who defends his right to exclude the debtor by means of the stipulations of the loan contract.

The theocentric model of the pledge is God's promise. By means of a pledge, He places His reputation on the line. If He fails to fulfill His pledge, He loses His reputation. He therefore loses His judicial status as God. This, of course, cannot be; this is why God fulfills His verbal pledges. He has too much at stake not to. Moses reminded God of this fact when God threatened to destroy Israel and make Moses the patriarch of a new nation (Ex. 32:11–13).

The first pledge recorded in the Bible is God's promise to Adam that in the day that Adam ate of the forbidden tree, he would die (Gen. 2:17). This promise was fulfilled: Adam did die that day, judicially speaking. He died definitively. The curse of death came on him and his heirs. Adam was a dead man walking. Death and damnation, as with life and salvation, are definitive, progressive, and final. The final death is the second death of the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14). Had it not been for God's willingness to sacrifice His son on behalf of Adam and Adam's heirs (Heb. 2:17), man's temporal existence from that time on would have been a working out of this definitive judicial status of death. God announced the grace of this future substitutionary atonement in His pledge to Adam regarding the coming of an heir who would crush the head of the serpent (Gen. 3:15). This grace is both common and special. That Adam still walked was proof of God's common grace. That his son Abel offered an acceptable sacrifice to God was proof of God's special grace.

Man's pledge, unless in the form of a vow before God, does not partake in the character of an oath.¹ It has stipulations, but it does not invoke God's direct sanctions in order to validate the promise. It therefore has more to do with law and boundaries than with either oath or hierarchy. It has to do with contract rather than covenant.

A pledge is a tool of dominion. It enhances its owner's ability to extend his dominion. A tool lowers the cost of achieving one's goals. The pledge or collateral may sometimes be so closely associated with the individual that to remove it from him completely can undermine his definition of himself. As a dominion law, it was not a seed law or a land law. It was a cross-boundary law.²

Man's word is not God's word. Man's promise is not God's promise. Man does not lawfully defend his words and his promises with the same degree of commitment with which God defends His. "It is a faithful saying: For if we be dead with him, we shall also live with him: If we suffer, we shall also reign with him: if we deny him, he also will deny us: If we believe not, yet he abideth faithful: he cannot deny himself" (II Tim. 2:11–13). In short, man is a greater risk than God. Believing in man's word is far more risky than believing in God's word. Therefore, a wise creditor asks for collateral, or else he imposes a higher rate of interest on a loan before he extends it. A man's promise to repay may be merely verbal or contractual, such as with a "signature loan" or a credit card loan. Such uncollateralized loans command higher interest rates than collateralized loans because they are more risky. Borrowers are statistically more likely to default on such loans. This is why they must offer to pay lenders a higher rate of interest in order to obtain loans. All borrowers in this statistical classification of borrowers pay a higher rate because a higher percentage of borrowers in this class will default. The lender must be compensated for this additional risk.

1. Chapter 58.

2. On these legal categories, see Appendix J.

A collateralized loan adds security to the loan, i.e., it increases the statistical likelihood that the borrower will repay the debt. The pledge is a valuable item—at least to the borrower—that the borrower agrees to transfer to the lender, should he default on the loan. The pledge could be a tool of production. This case law specifies that if this tool is basic to the borrower's life or productivity, it must remain with him. His means of escaping debt bondage must not be taken from him by the creditor.

These pledge laws are extensions of the laws governing collateral: "If thou at all take thy neighbour's raiment to pledge, thou shalt deliver it unto him by that the sun goeth down: For that is his covering only, it is his raiment for his skin: wherein shall he sleep? and it shall come to pass, when he crieth unto me, that I will hear; for I am gracious" (Ex. 22:26–27). A poor brother's life is not to be endangered by having to surrender his coat as a pledge against debt.

This law does not protect the covenant-breaker. It is not a general equity law. The covenant-keeper is to be subdued economically for the glory of God. "The LORD shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his season, and to bless all the work of thine hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow. And the LORD shall make thee the head, and not the tail; and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath; if that thou hearken unto the commandments of the LORD thy God, which I command thee this day, to observe and to do them" (Deut. 28:12–13).³

B. Tools of Dominion

The millstone is a miller's source of livelihood, but it is not his source of biological life. He can make a living doing something else, but he believes that cannot make as good a living. A man is versatile. He can do many kinds of work. But a man is also limited. Each man performs certain tasks with greater skill than he performs others. Because some men are more skilled than their fellows in particular areas of production, they can perform these services less expensively than their competitors. This set of circumstances makes possible the social division of labor.

3. Chapter 70.

1. The Social Division of Labor

The range of skills across the human race is stupendous. A man who has one set of skills can learn different skills. A man is not a machine. A machine can perform one task well. The more complex the machine, the fewer uses to which it can be put profitably. A machine that makes one item falls to scrap value if demand for that one item falls to zero and is expected to stay there by all entrepreneurs. This condition is not true of a man. He can learn new skills if the demand for his present specialized abilities should fall.

Because of the highly diverse and unspecific nature of human labor, men can gain income by exchanging their specialized labor services for other specialized services or goods. Because of the highly specific abilities which some men possess, they can gain a higher price than their competitors for their labor services. But selling these specialized labor services is risky. If demand for a specific labor service declines, the seller will lose income faster than another man whose more general skills rarely face an equally large decline in demand. An across-the-boards decline in demand is far less likely statistically than a decline in demand for a specialized service or product.

In times of economic growth through capital investment, income rises faster for those who supply specialized labor. Why? Because their unique abilities have been made more productive by specialized tools of production. This income advantage persuades additional people to specialize. *The social division of labor increases when capital investment increases.*⁴ Conversely, in times of economic decline, when the division of labor shrinks because of a shortening of the structure of production,⁵ the specialist producer may find that his income falls rapidly. He must then abandon his specialty. The man who uses a specialized tool of production to gain his income is therefore more vulnerable to shifts in demand than his less capitalized neighbor. He gains his income by producing a specialized service or product. He builds his way of life—his pattern of expenditures—in terms of the income generated by his tool. If he demand falls for his output, or if he loses access to this tool, his way of life will be disrupted.

4. Friedrich A. Hayek, Prices and Production, 2nd ed. (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, [1935] 1960), ch. 2. Cf. Mark Skousen, The Structure of Production (New York: New York University Press, 1990), ch. 3.

5. Ibid., ch. 3. Skousen, ibid., ch. 9.

2. No Tools, Low Output

The miller has invested capital and time in mastering the tools of his trade, which in this case are a pair of millstones. He then seeks a loan. The lender demands one of the millstones as a pledge. Without his complementary tools of production, his output falls rapidly. He must revert to selling less specialized forms of labor. These services bring a lower return because there are more competitors who can underbid him in this new field than there had been in his old field. He has lost his competitive advantage. His ability to repay the loan falls. His self-definition as a participant in society is undermined by the loss of his tool of production. Both his self-image and his productive role in society are threatened by the loss of his tool.

This case law prohibits the lender from taking a millstone as a pledge. He is restricted in two ways. First, the lender may not legally collect this pledge in advance of repayment, which would increase the likelihood that the loan will not be repaid, thereby forcing the miller into servitude. Second, the language indicates that he must not accept the millstone as a default pledge, i.e., a transfer of ownership to the lender should the borrower default. God says: “Hands off!” To reduce the risk of the debtor’s default in the absence of the millstone as a pledge, the lender must therefore either ask for a higher rate of interest (if this is a profit-seeking loan) or else content himself with some other form of pledge, including the man’s willingness to be sold into indentured servitude.

Wouldn’t the debtor’s self-image be threatened by indentured servitude? Yes. I conclude that this prohibition against taking a millstone as a pledge must have more to do with his life as a producer than his life as a free man. Under the Mosaic economy, a lender was allowed to sell the debtor into servitude or force him or his children (II Kings 4:1–7) to come and work for him until the debt was paid off. But the lender was not allowed to take away the man’s tools of production. Without these, the debtor could not readily buy his way out of servitude. Furthermore, society would lose his output as a tool-endowed, specialized producer. To enhance the debtor's ability to pay off the loan and, if necessary, buy his way out of debt servitude, this law allowed him to retain ownership of his tools of production. As a secondary benefit to society, this law kept the producer in the work force as a specialist.

To put this law into a modern setting, there is no doubt that taking an automobile tire as collateral can be a high motivational technique to get repayment from a man with only one car with only four tires (no spare). He cannot drive into town without it on Saturday night. But he also cannot drive to work or do odd jobs that would earn him extra money. Without the use of his car, he falls under the threat of permanent debt, meaning permanent bondage. This case law rejects as illegitimate the use of such collateral during working hours. The required collateral is not to be part of a man's tool kit of dominion. If a debtor owns a sports car that is his pride and joy, as well as an old car for pulling loads of hay, it would be legitimate to take one or more tires of the sports car. The sports car testifies to his misplaced sense of priorities. Humbling his pride is different from breaking his spirit by bankrupting him.

C. The Good Life

A specialized producer can shift to a less specialized occupation and still put food on his family's table. The man without a pair of millstones is not facing starvation. Yet the language of this text indicates that the millstone was the man's life. I conclude that the language must be referring to something other than biological life. What does this text mean? While the Hebrew word here is often used in the sense of biological life, it has other meanings. It often means a man's chief desire. "And Hamor communed with them, saying, The soul of my son Shechem longeth for your daughter: I pray you give her him to wife" (Gen. 34:8). "The enemy said, I will pursue, I will overtake, I will divide the spoil; my lust shall be satisfied upon them; I will draw my sword, my hand shall destroy them" (Ex. 15:9). "Also thou shalt not oppress a stranger: for ye know the heart of a stranger, seeing ye were strangers in the land of Egypt" (Ex. 23:9). "But now our soul is dried away: there is nothing at all, beside this manna, before our eyes" (Num. 11:6). The use of the word in the passage that preserves open fields, is close to the meaning in this text: "When thou comest into thy neighbour's vineyard, then thou mayest eat grapes thy fill at thine own pleasure; but thou shalt not put any in thy vessel” (Deut. 23:24).⁶ A man’s heart and soul define his life in his own eyes. “But if from thence thou shalt seek the LORD thy God, thou shalt find him, if thou seek him with all thy heart and with all thy soul” (Deut. 4:29). “Chief desire” seems to be the meaning in this text.

A millstone is a tool of bread-making, but owning one is not a matter of life and death. It is possible to eat grain without grinding it into bread. Corn can be eaten on the cob. Wheat can be sprouted or cooked as cereal. A man need not starve because he does not own a pair of millstones to grind his grain.

Bread is more than nutrition; it is symbolic of the full life. “Give us this day our daily bread” (Matt. 6:11)⁷ refers to a comfortable way of life, a good life. As such, bread is one of the sacraments.⁸ Where there is no millstone, there will be something important lacking: bread, which provides a sense of personal and social fulfillment. This condition of dearth is a mark of God’s judgment: “Moreover I will take from them the voice of mirth, and the voice of gladness, the voice of the bridegroom, and the voice of the bride, the sound of the millstones, and the light of the candle” (Jer. 25:10). A society in which millstones are not grinding is a society under God’s wrath.

This case law forbade a creditor from taking away one of the means of the good life. This law was not restricted to millers. It was more comprehensive than that. A poverty-stricken family enjoys its daily bread. It should not have this enjoyment cut off by a creditor. A covenant-keeper is not deliberately to reduce another covenant-keeper to beggary. “I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread” (Ps. 37:25).⁹

D. Household Authority

The independent head of the household should not have his authority undermined. The very term “breadwinner” indicates the im-

6. Chapter 58.

7. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2003] 2012), ch. 12.

8. This is why fermented wine is also one of the sacraments. It is part of the full life, the good life. Being without it is a curse of God for sin. “Forasmuch therefore as your treading is upon the poor, and ye take from him burdens of wheat: ye have built houses of hewn stone, but ye shall not dwell in them; ye have planted pleasant vineyards, but ye shall not drink wine of them” (Amos 5:11).

9. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 6.

portance of bread. It is a mark of authority, of productivity, to provide bread. A breadwinner who is reduced by another man's deliberate actions to eating wheat sprouts and cereal has been stripped of his authority. The covenant-keeper is not to strip his fellow covenant member of his dignity. This is why the lender does not have lawful access to the debtor's house. He must stand outside the boundaries of the debtor's house and wait for the debtor to bring out the pledge.

Basic to dominion is confidence in oneself and one's future. Anything that degrades a man is a threat to his ability to fulfill the terms of the dominion covenant. This applies even to corporal punishment: "Forty stripes he may give him, and not exceed: lest, if he should exceed, and beat him above these with many stripes, then thy brother should seem vile unto thee" (Deut. 25:3). A man must not be deliberately humiliated. The prohibition against taking a man's millstone is related to this concern. A man who has been stripped of the marks of authority in his own household is not in a strong position to recover his lost productivity. He is less likely to "bounce back" from adversity. The lender is to refrain from actions that would needlessly inhibit the recovery of the covenant-keeping debtor. The extension of God's kingdom through the corporate efforts of the covenant-keeping community must not be needlessly inhibited.

The creditor knows that the debtor will be motivated to repay the debt if the creditor owns something of value. But there is a difference between owning something of economic value and something of psychological value. The debtor wants to have his pledge returned, so he works to replay the loan. But an item that is vital psychologically for a normal man's ability to repay, such as a millstone used to put bread on his own table, is not to be taken as collateral. His loss of collateral is not to threaten his ability to repay. The goal is repayment through liberty, not perpetual subordination.

E. Sanctions

What is the state's role in enforcing this law? First, it must refuse to enforce the terms of a contract if the contract uses the crucial tools of a man's trade as his pledge. But should the state bring negative sanctions against a lender who actually collects such a pledge? That is, should the state require the lender to pay double restitution to the victim of the prohibited contract? In this case, should the lender be required to return to the debtor his upper millstone, plus an additional one?

One of the goals of biblical law is to protect people from the rise of an arbitrary state. If the lender who has collected his collateral from a defaulting borrower cannot predict with a high degree of accuracy whether a judge or jury will regard this collateral as an indispensable tool of the borrower's trade, then the greater the potential penalty that can be assessed by the court, the less likely the creditor will make the loan in the first place. If he may be retroactively required to return the pledge, he will consider this possibility when counting the cost of making the loan. The threat of double restitution increases this cost. The very unpredictability of the court reduces the size of the credit market. The court's decision regarding the crucial nature of the pledge is inherently difficult to predict. If the lender might be compelled to pay double restitution as a criminal penalty, he may choose not to make the loan.

On the other hand, if the state is not allowed to enforce this law, this law loses its status as a civil law. Society's wealth will be threatened by the possibility that millers will lose their upper millstones—and not merely millers.

How can the two goals be reconciled, so that would-be debtors can obtain loans, and society will also retain the services of skilled craftsmen?

One way is for magistrates to refuse to enforce the terms of a biblically prohibited debt contract. Surely, a magistrate should not enforce a murder contract. This situation is analogous. A magistrate would require the lender to return the tool-based collateral to the borrower. But no criminal sanctions are imposed because no criminal intent can be proven. Perhaps the lender did not understand that this tool was truly crucial to the borrower's productivity. Besides, the borrower must not be thought of as without information about his own occupation. If he failed to inform the lender about this, he must bear some of the responsibility. So, this is not a criminal matter.

Society needs protection from an arbitrary state far more than it needs protection from grasping creditors who drive hard bargains. An arbitrary state is dangerous to men's freedom and society's wealth. It is not only lenders who must be placed on a tight leash; it is also state bureaucrats. To allow the state to impose criminal sanctions against a creditor who has taken a tool of production as collateral from a borrower is to foster the expansion of state power. God provides a positive sanction: "it shall be righteousness unto thee before the LORD thy God" (v. 13). That is, God has made a pledge. Men can count on this. God has given His word.

F. The Boundaries of a Man's Home

The lender must not violate the boundaries of a debtor's home. When the debtor brings out his pledge, either before the loan is made or after he has defaulted, the lender must wait outside the doors of the household. This makes it clear to all parties that the obligation has been met by the payment of the pledge. The lender exercises authority over the pledge. He does not exercise authority over the debtor. The hierarchy of the contract extends from the lender to the pledge. It does not extend to the debtor.

This means that the debt relationship, when collateralized by a marketable asset, is limited in scope. It is, in this restricted legal sense, an impersonal relationship. The lender must content himself with collecting the pledge. He is not given authority to transgress the boundaries of the debtor's house.

The dignity of the debtor is preserved by this law. He is not to be humiliated. For a lender to march across the door of the debtor's home is to humiliate the debtor. This is not lawful. There is a limit on the debtor's obligation. One limit is the door of his household. This is a judicial boundary.

This does not mean that the state is similarly restricted. If the debtor refuses to transfer the contract's pledged item to the lender, then the lender has the authority to appeal his case to the state. The boundaries of the home protect the borrower from an invasion by the lender. They do not protect against the invasion of the state in defense of a lawful contract. The state, in its capacity as God's delegated agent, possesses the authority to enforce lawful contracts. The lender has become the victim. The state must defend the victim's rights.¹⁰

G. Burdensome Collateral

The text continues: "And if the man be poor, thou shalt not sleep with his pledge: In any case thou shalt deliver him the pledge again when the sun goeth down, that he may sleep in his own raiment, and bless thee: and it shall be righteousness unto thee before the LORD thy God." This is a recapitulation of the earlier law of collateral: "If thou at all take thy neighbour's raiment to pledge, thou shalt deliver it unto him by that the sun goeth down: For that is his covering only, it is his raiment for his skin: wherein shall he sleep? and it shall come to pass, when he crieth unto me, that I will hear; for I am gracious" (Ex. 22:26–27).¹¹ The law in Exodus pledges a negative sanction: "I will hear," meaning judgment in history.¹² This pledge by God must be acknowledged by men and honored in word and deed.

10. Gary North, Victim's Rights: The Biblical View of Civil Justice (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnvictim>)

The lender must return life-preserving collateral every evening. This form of collateral is not a tool of production. Demanding a tool of production as a pledge is altogether prohibited. This collateral is an asset that is necessary to sustain life for part of the day. If it is cold outside, day and night, then such collateral is prohibited by the language of verse 6, "for he taketh a man's life to pledge." So, this asset must be life-preserving in the sense of not humiliating a man by making him shiver through the night, i.e., removing from him the good life. Shivering through the night is the functional equivalent of not eating bread. Returning the collateral every night is a major burden on him. It is bothersome. The lower the market value of the loan and its collateral, the less willing a lender will be to demand this item as collateral. The time wasted is worth more to the lender than the loan is worth to him. He has the option of not collecting the collateral daily. But he also has the option on any morning of claiming it. This right of the lender lowers the possibility of a form of fraud on the part of the borrower which I call multiple indebtedness.

H. The Restriction on Multiple Indebtedness

I have covered this aspect of the laws governing collateral in another place.¹³ Here I expand on my earlier analysis. If his cloak is his collateral, then he can lawfully pledge it for only one loan. He can use the collateral to keep warm at night, but he must not use it to secure another loan. He cannot lawfully offer a pledge of his cloak to half a dozen lenders, none of whom is aware that the cloak has been pledged to five other lenders. Multiple pledges secured against the same collateral are fraudulent. Each of the lenders believes that his loan is secured

11. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 49.

12. "If thou afflict them in any wise, and they cry at all unto me, I will surely hear their cry; And my wrath shall wax hot, and I will kill you with the sword; and your wives shall be widows, and your children fatherless" (Ex. 22:23–24).

13. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 49:J.

by an item that is important to the borrower, an item that the borrower does not want to lose. But if it is being used to secure six loans, the debtor at some point may decide: "I can't earn enough money to pay off all of my creditors. I am too far in debt. Why should I bother to repay any of these people?" The magnitude of his debt becomes a motivation to stop repaying. The debtor gives up. This defrauds the lenders, who believed that the pledge was an incentive for him to repay. Instead, because of multiple pledges, it became an incentive for him to go so far into debt that the loans could not be repaid. This is a misuse of the concept of collateral. Multiple indebtedness is a lure into greater debt and greater risk.

By allowing the creditor to take possession of the pledge during the day, this law discourages the practice of multiple indebtedness. The pledge is still useful to the debtor, but it is also useful to the lender, not as an income-producing asset but as a chain that limits the debtor's opportunity to go too deeply into debt.

1. Fractional Reserve Banking

The modern banking system is a fractional reserve system.¹⁴ Depositors (lenders) are encouraged by bankers (debtors) to deposit funds in banks. The bank offers a rate of interest to its depositors. The banker then lends out all but a small fraction of the money deposited. He makes an interest rate return on the money lent out. He pays a lower rate to depositors. The bank earns income through the spread between these two rates. The small percentage of the deposits kept in reserve can be used to pay to depositors who come in and withdraw their money. The banker assumes (correctly) that on most days, the amount of money deposited will be close to the amount of money withdrawn. The bank keeps a small reserve to make up any excess of withdrawals over deposits.

The system rests on a lie. The bank offers all of the depositors a guarantee: you may withdraw your money on demand. Yet it then lends the deposits to debtors who by contract need not repay for months or years. The bank is, in the investment world's phrase, "borrowed short and lent long." The bank cannot make good its promise of "withdrawal on demand" if too many depositors come in and demand their money on the same day.

14. Gary North, Honest Money: The Biblical Blueprint for Money and Banking (Ft. Worth: Dominion Press, 1986), ch. 8. (<http://bit.ly/gnmoney>)

If depositors believe that a bank is in trouble—suffering from either excessive withdrawals or risky loans—fear spreads. A bank run begins. When this happens, a line of would-be withdrawers forms in front of a bank. Lines spread to many banks. Even if one bank can be bailed out by other banks, or the nation's central bank, a large number of banks cannot be bailed out at once, except by printing money to hand out to depositors.

The banks' guarantee is then exposed for what it was from the beginning: no better than the banking system's ability to fool depositors about the inherent risk in a payments system that rests on a statistical impossibility. The banking system as a whole cannot fulfill its guarantee of sufficient funds for depositors to withdraw at any time. The banking system can fulfill it only when most depositors believe that the banking system can fulfill it. When an inherently unpredictable number of depositors simultaneously reach the conclusion that the guarantee is not only impossible to fulfill (logic should have told them this), but is about to be defaulted on, the bank run begins.

When an inherently unpredictable number of banks cannot meet their obligations, the domino effect begins. The payments system begins to collapse. An economy rests heavily on promises to buy or sell, to pay and deliver. This highly complex system of mutually interrelated obligations rests on the central promise of the banks regarding money: "You can get your money out of this institution on demand." If the banks default on this promise, all of the other promises in the economy are at risk. When the banks cease making payments to their depositors and to each other, almost every economic promise is called into question. It is not just the banks that have made promises; everyone has made promises. Employers have made promises to employees. Suppliers have made promises to deliver goods and services. Producers have invested resources in making available goods and services that cannot be sold under the new conditions. They stop making any further investments. They fire employees.

The social division of labor rests on a reliable means of payment. But the fractional reserve banking system is inherently unreliable. It rests on a known lie that is called into question by depositors periodically. When this happens, the payments system breaks down. As a result, the social division of labor shrinks rapidly. This destroys the market for specialized production. The greater the degree of his specialization, the more vulnerable the seller is to falling demand. Unemployment increases. Fear spreads. The downward spiral accelerates.

2. The Payments System

The breakdown in the payments system has an effect very much like the effect caused by a creditor who takes the debtor's upper millstone. In a breakdown in the payments system, the miller still owns the upper and lower millstone, but he cannot sell the output of these stones at the previous high price. There is insufficient demand at the previous price, or perhaps at any price. Yet he has built his way of life—his pattern of expenditures—on the expectation of a particular stream of income. The breakdown in the payments system dries up his stream of income. He must now seek other forms of income. This usually means producing less specialized goods or services. Yet he enters this less specialized market at a time when large numbers of other specialized producers are abandoning their occupations in an attempt to replace their dried-up income streams. We call this event an economic depression. It can come in one of three forms: (1) a collapse of the banking system and a reduction in the supply of credit (deflation); (2) a vast increase in the money supply through the printing press (inflation); or (3) inflation with legislated price ceilings (shortages and rationing).

The breakdown in the payments system destroys the accuracy of the array of prices that had been established under the older payment conditions. It is as if all the information in a computer became erroneous. The crucial information previously generated by the price system is undermined by the breakdown in payments. The intricate web of supply and demand is shredded. Forecasts made in terms of the previous array of prices are exposed as wasteful. Capital projects are exposed as loss-generating. Promises made to employees threaten the survival of their companies. Everyone's life style is threatened by the breakdown in promises caused by the breakdown in the payments system. This is the inevitable effect of the fractional reserve banking system. The banking system's lie is universally exposed as a lie. Statistically, this time of exposure—this day of reckoning—has to happen eventually.¹⁵ Yet most men are surprised when it does.

Because the credit money system applies to all participants in the market, its breakdown endangers everyone. It is not a case of one debtor's default. Such a default may temporarily undermine the payments system of those to whom he previously bought and sold, but this disruption is temporary and local. But when the banking system collapses, the effects are widespread. There is no fall-back position for the vast majority of the producers in the economy, i.e., no reserves. The reserves were in the banks. They are long gone. Only those people who enjoyed a debt-free way of life based on a low division of labor can go through the payments adjustment period without experiencing a potentially devastating psychological crisis. The Amish and especially the Hutterites may go through the payments crisis unscathed, assuming that their gun-owning neighbors and a well-armed local police force protect them from thieves. Residents in the deepest bayous of Louisiana may not experience a large change in their life style. Almost everyone one else will.

15. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. 20. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

I. The Dominion Covenant and Social Hierarchy

The doctrine of the covenant itself is point two of the biblical covenant model. We can see this in the very structure of the Pentateuch. The Book of Exodus is the book of the covenant.¹⁶ It is also the second book of the Pentateuch. The second point of the biblical covenant model is hierarchy.¹⁷ A covenant is necessarily hierarchical. God initiates it, and man responds, either as a covenant-keeper or a covenant-breaker. A covenant is not a contract between or among equals.¹⁸ There is always a superior involved: God.

In the dominion covenant, God is the archetype; man is made in His image. From this we draw a conclusion: because God is not a servant of Satan, covenant-keeping man should not become a servant to covenant-breaking man. On the contrary, the opposite is the biblical ideal: covenant-breaking man is to become a servant of covenant-keeping man. Covenant-keeping steadily puts covenant-keepers at the top in history. This process is built into the creation itself. It is recapitulated in God's law.

Sometimes covenant-keepers fall into dire straits through no fault

16. "And he took the book of the covenant, and read in the audience of the people: and they said, All that the LORD hath said will we do, and be obedient" (Ex. 24:7).

17. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

18. The great evil of social contract theory, whether Lockean or Rousseauvian, is that it is seen as a judicial bond among equals. These equals contract together to create a superior entity, the state. There is a hierarchy, but it is strictly a natural hierarchy. It is said to be governed by natural law, not supernatural law.

of their own and must become servants of other covenant-keepers. There were rules in the Mosaic law governing such servitude (Lev. 25:14–17).¹⁹ It was to be mild. The superior in the relationship was not to oppress the subordinate.

Poverty and debt produce a form of servitude. “The rich ruleth over the poor, and the borrower is servant to the lender” (Prov. 22:7).²⁰ It is best to be financially independent and out of debt. It goes against the biblical model of liberation when a covenant-keeper seeks to enslave fellow believers. The widow, the orphan, and the stranger were to be protected. This passage extended the Exodus passage: “Thou shalt neither vex a stranger, nor oppress him: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt. Ye shall not afflict any widow, or fatherless child” (Ex. 22:21–22).²¹ These three figures served in the Mosaic law as the chief examples of vulnerability. Their legitimate interests were to be upheld in civil courts and in economic transactions. The way that these groups were treated testified to the moral condition of society. The reference in both passages to Egypt pointed back to the era in which God’s people were unfairly oppressed. The exodus generation and the conquest generation were reminded: as sons of God, they had deserved liberation, and God had delivered them by destroying their evil oppressors. The lesson should have been plain enough: they should expect similar negative sanctions for similar transgressions.

Conclusion

The law prohibiting a creditor from taking a man’s tools of production as a pledge against the loan supports a higher social division of labor.²² By enabling the producer to stay in his chosen line of work, this law encourages him to supply the demand of customers more efficiently. The debtor does not forfeit his way of life, just so long as he repays his loan on time, as he promised. He retains the ability to repay his debt. A debt incurred on the basis of his previous level of income is more easily repaid when he keeps his tools of production.

The problem comes when everyone has made pledges, i.e., con-

19. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 25.

20. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 67.

21. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 48.

22. In the United States, a man who declares bankruptcy must turn over his assets to the court, which sells them to repay his creditors. But there is an exemption: the tools of his trade.

tracts. They have promised to buy or sell in the future at a specific price. They have become dependent on the promises of others to buy or sell at specific prices. Their way of life is based on the maintenance of an expected array of prices. The breakdown in the payments system destroys these expectations. It forces men to break their promises. The fractional reserve banking system cannot indefinitely fulfill its pledge to allow depositors to withdraw their funds at any time. At some point, the banking system's pledge will be broken: depositors will not be able to withdraw their money. Everyone's income falls because of the rapid and widespread shrinking of the division of labor.

When men move from a high level of income based on a high social division of labor to a low level of income based on a reduced social division of labor, they experience a loss of dignity. The economy's collective economic depression produces individual psychological depression. This is why fractional reserve banking is a threat to society. By violating the Mosaic law's restriction on multiple indebtedness, fractional reserve banking places society at great risk. At some point, the statistical risk of a breakdown in the payments system produces the event. Very few people are ever prepared for it. Personal self-esteem suffers a devastating attack. Men's dreams are wiped out. Some men work harder. Most men become fearful of risk. Dominion suffers.

The law prohibiting a lender from entering the home of a debtor to take possession of the debtor's pledge preserves the dignity of the debtor. It protects the boundaries of his home, which means the boundaries of his covenantal authority as the head of his household. Until he defaults on the loan, he maintains at least some degree of dignity. This is important for a man's productivity. It is therefore important for maintaining society's wealth. Men who have lost their self-confidence do not make effective entrepreneurs and workers.

61

WAGES AND OPPRESSION

Thou shalt not oppress an hired servant that is poor and needy, whether he be of thy brethren, or of thy strangers that are in thy land within thy gates: At his day thou shalt give him his hire, neither shall the sun go down upon it; for he is poor, and setteth his heart upon it: lest he cry against thee unto the LORD, and it be sin unto thee (Deut. 24:14–15).

The theocentric focus of this passage is two-fold. First, God pays us what He has agreed to pay us, and He pays us on time. His words are reliable—laws, in fact. Second, God is a protector of those who cannot protect themselves. He places protective boundaries around the defenseless. Both of these principles are aspects of point three of the biblical covenant model: boundaries.¹

A. Withholding Wages

This was not a seed law or a land law. It was a cross-boundary law.² This was an extension of Leviticus 19:13: “Thou shalt not defraud thy neighbour, neither rob him: the wages of him that is hired shall not abide with thee all night until the morning.”³ There, the practice of withholding wages overnight is described as robbery. Here, the sin is identified as oppression.

The previous section of Leviticus 19 deals with theft through fraud: the deliberately deceptive use of words (vv. 11–12).⁴ The first half of verse 13 repeats this warning. The second half adds another form of fraudulent wealth transfer: the withholding of a worker’s wages overnight. This act is specified as fraud, and it is also specified as

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012).

2. On the difference, see Appendix J.

3. Ibid., ch. 13.

4. Ibid., ch. 12.

robbery. The question is: Why? If the worker agrees in advance to wait longer than a day for his pay, why should the law of God prohibit the arrangement? Or does it? (Here, I reproduce the relevant sections of chapter 13 of Boundaries and Dominion.)

It is always helpful in understanding a case law if we can first identify the theocentric principle that undergirds it. Verse 13 deals with paying a debt. The employer-employee relationship reflects God's relationship to man. God provides us with an arena: life and capital. Similarly, the employer supplies an employee with capital that makes the employee more productive. Man is dependent on God. Similarly, the laborer has worked for a full day. The employer is required to pay to him at the end of the work day. The context is clear: rapid payment for services received. God employs us as His stewards. He gives us the tools that we need to serve Him and thereby serve ourselves. He always pays us on time. So should the employer.

The employer who withholds wages from his employees is making a symbolic statement about God's relationship to man: God supposedly delays paying man what is rightfully owed to him. This symbolism is incorrect. It testifies falsely about God's character. This case law makes it plain that the employer owes payment before the sun goes down, a reference back to the creation: the division of day and night (Gen. 1:16–18; cf. Matt. 20:8).

God delays settling all accounts with mankind until the end of man's week in history, the final Day of the Lord.⁵ Man is definitively in debt to God, for God did not slay Adam on the day of transgression. Man is progressively in debt to God, for God has given to man far more than man has given God. God's refusal to settle accounts with men in this life is testimony of His grace to each man—an undeserved extension of credit—and also of a final judgment to come. Man is finally in debt to God.

God graciously gives gifts to all men until the day of judgment: common grace to all and special grace to His elect.⁶ So, by implication, it is legitimate for an employer to pay his workers in advance, for this testifies to the true debt relationship of man to God. Man, the employee, owes much to God, the employer, who has advanced wages to man so that man may work out his salvation or damnation in fear and trem-

5. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 5.

6. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

bling. Understand: this grace on God's part places mankind increasingly in God's debt—a debt that is growing ever larger as time extends and God's common grace compounds. If men do not repent, there will be hell to pay, i.e., there will be God to pay in the ultimate debtor's prison (Matt. 18:23–35).⁷

B. A Position of Weakness

The wage earner is assumed by God to be in a weaker economic position than the individual who is paying his wages. This employer-employee relationship reflects God's supremacy as the sovereign employer and man's subordination as a dependent employee.

If the wage earner is not paid immediately, then he is being asked by the employer to extend credit to the employer. The employer gains a benefit—the value of the labor services performed—without having to pay for this benefit at the end of the work day. The Bible allows this extension of such credit during daylight hours, but not overnight.⁸ This law teaches that the weaker party should not be forced as part of his terms of employment to extend credit to the stronger party. God acknowledges that there are differences in bargaining power and bargaining skills, and He intervenes here to protect the weaker party. This is one of the rare cases in Scripture where God does prohibit a voluntary economic contract.

What if the worker says that he is willing to wait for his pay if he is given an extra payment at the end of the period to compensate him for the time value of his money (i.e., interest)? This would be an unusual transaction. The extra money earned from two weeks of interest would be minimal in comparison to the amount of the wage. In any case, to abide by the terms of this law, such a voluntary agreement would have to be a legal transaction publicly separate from wage earning as such. There would have to be a public record of its conditions. It would constitute an investment by the worker. But the worker would have to pay his tithe and taxes on this money before he could legally lend it to the employer. There is no biblical law that prohibits a poor man from earning interest on his money. Usury is defined as the taking of interest from a poor man who has requested a zero-interest charitable

7. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 37.

8. By implication, the night laborer is under the same protection: he must be paid before the sun rises. The idea is that he must be paid by the end of the work day.

loan.⁹ Usury is not the same as an interest-paying loan to a rich man from a poor man who wants to make some extra money.

The law here specifies that an employer who hires an individual to work for a period of time has to have the money available to pay that individual on a daily basis at the end of each work day. This is the employer's standard requirement. There would be no confusion about this in a Christian covenanted society.

There is no doubt that in the modern world, such an arrangement is not economically efficient. Checks must be written, checks must be delivered to individuals, account books must be kept, and so forth. If this had to be done daily, it would add to the expense of running a firm.¹⁰ The larger the firm, the more difficult such an arrangement would be. Nevertheless, the employer is required by God to abide by this law. The question is: Can he lawfully substitute a more convenient payment scheme and still meet the requirements of this law?

C. Debt and Credit: Inescapable Concepts

If the employer decides that it is too much trouble to pay each worker at the end of each work day, he must advance the funds for the period of employment prior to the next payday. Thus, if the average period of employment between paydays is two weeks, the employer must bear the risk of paying an individual for work not yet received. The employer must extend credit to the worker. The worker must assume a debt obligation: two weeks of agreed-upon labor services.

Payments for a stream of services are not simultaneous, although this limitation will change when the use of electronic cash becomes widespread. Therefore, one of the two parties in this transaction must go into debt in this system, while the other must extend credit. There is no escape from debt and credit without the digital technology of continuous payments. What this law authorizes is an extension of credit by the worker to the employer for a maximum of one work day. At the end of the work day, the account must be settled. Credit is no longer

9. Chapter 35. Cf. North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 49.

10. In the final stages of the German inflation in 1923, workers were sometimes paid cash in the morning. Wives would accompany them to work, take the cash, and rush to spend it on anything tangible before it depreciated during the day. This inflation devastated workers and employers alike. On the daily payment of wages in the second half of 1923, see Adam Ferguson, When Money Dies: The Nightmare of the Weimar Collapse (London: William Kimber, 1975), pp. 149, 191.

extended by the worker, so he receives his day's wage.

What if the transaction is different? What if the worker is paid in advance for a week or two of labor? He then necessarily becomes a debtor to the employer. He is required to deliver the work that he has been paid to perform. This places the worker in a debt position, but it is not a long-term debt. It is not considered a form of slavery, but there is no doubt that the worker has voluntarily accepted payment in advance, and this creates an obligation on his part. This debt position is limited, however. The law's presumption is that the employer is not going to pay a person in advance for months of work except in very rare circumstances.¹¹

It is clear that debt and credit are inevitable in an economy that is based on the division of labor. One party must extend credit to the other for some period of time. The other party therefore must become a debtor. The period of the debt in a labor contract may be brief, but it does exist. The inescapable questions are: (1) who will be the creditor, (2) who will be the debtor, and (3) for how long a period of time? The idea of a debt-free economy is utterly utopian. It is not economically possible to establish such an economy unless payments are simultaneous, moment by moment.¹² Such a payment system is too expensive for any organization to establish today. It would destroy the labor market if it were required by law.

The Bible teaches that we are not to become indebted to others: "Owe no man any thing, but to love one another: for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law" (Rom. 13:8).¹³ This must not be interpreted in an absolutist fashion. We know this because every person is in debt to God, and also to the perfect man, Jesus Christ, as a result of Christ's atoning work at Calvary.¹⁴ This rule of debt-free living should be interpreted in a non-utopian sense. It means that we are to avoid

11. One of these circumstances is found in the book publishing industry. An individual is sometimes paid in advance to write a book manuscript. This is one of the highest-risk transactions in the business world. The best way to keep an author from finishing a manuscript is to pay him in advance. As a publisher, I learned this lesson after much experience.

12. I am reminded of the scene in the film America, America (1963), where the suspicious Greek buys passage on a ship to the United States. He holds out his money to the ticket salesman behind the counter, but he refuses to release his grip until the salesman places the ticket in his other hand. They let go simultaneously.

13. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2002] 2022), ch. 12.

14. This debt always involves common grace; sometimes it also involves special grace. North, Dominion and Common Grace, op. cit.

debt contracts that threaten our continuing legal status as free men. It does not mean that we are to become hermits who separate ourselves from a division-of-labor economy. It surely does not mean that we are required to become household slaves. A Christian perfectionist, as a result of reading tracts against fractional reserve banking, once offered me the opportunity to hire him as a permanent indentured servant if I would agree to feed, clothe, and house him on a zero-cash basis. He recognized that Federal Reserve Notes and checking accounts are both money and debt instruments, and he wanted to be totally separated from any contact with either cash or checks. He felt too guilty to continue as a free man. He was willing to become a household slave to someone who was not equally concerned morally about using Federal Reserve Notes or checking accounts, and who would pay him in kind (i.e., goods). In short, he was willing to subordinate himself for life to someone whom he perceived as not being equally moral, so that he himself could live in technical moral purity. He wanted a protective boundary around him, and he was willing to give up his freedom to attain this. But this brought him into conflict with Paul's injunction to indentured servants to take freedom whenever it is offered (I Cor. 7:21). Problem: Who would want to employ such a guilt-ridden perfectionist? What productive services could he perform? Could anyone trust his promises? What would be his next paralysis-inducing interpretation?

Free men in Mosaic Israel were those who had not been sold into slavery to repay a debt. Free men had an inheritance in the land. This means that large debts today should be collateralized, e.g., a mortgage. A man can lose his home if he defaults on the mortgage, but he does not lose his freedom. The creditor reclaims the collateral rather than placing the debtor in bondage or selling him into bondage.

The restraining factor against the extension of too much credit by the stronger party is the employer's fear that the worker will either quit before his term of service ends or else not produce competent work. It is too expensive for the employer to sue the average worker for damages; court expenses plus his own time in court exceed the money owed. The economic judgment of the employer is the restraining factor. He suspects that he will not be repaid if he extends too much credit. Nevertheless, there is no biblical law that says that the employer must not extend credit in the form of wages paid in advance. He has to make the decision whether it is worth the risk to do this, given the organizational difficulties of making payments at the end of every work day.

This text specifies that the worker must not be asked to work for a week or two in order to receive his wage. There is always a risk of default by a debtor, whether he is the employer or the worker. This law specifies that the risk of default for this form of debt beyond one work day must be born by the employer, not by the worker.

The employer must not become a thief by withholding anyone's wages. By forcing the employer to make restitution to his employed workers who had seen their wages withheld, the law reduces the amount of oppression of those unseen by the judges: future workers who are too weak even to compete for the delayed-payment job.

D. Worker vs. Worker

There are some workers who might be willing to work for a period longer than a day before receiving their pay. In a modern capitalist economy, this procedure is accepted by all concerned, since it is the policy of employers to offer severance pay to dismissed workers.¹⁵ The worker who plans to quit usually informs his employer of the fact that he will soon be leaving. The employer knows that the worker may become somewhat distracted in the final days of employment. The employer may decide to allow the worker to take his paid vacation at the end of his term of employment. So, the modern worker is paid by the employer for services not rendered when he leaves the job, not at the beginning of the term of employment. At the beginning of the contractual relationship, the modern worker renders services to the employer for which he is not paid at the end of the work day. This practice is what the Bible prohibits.

In a poor nation, which the whole world was until the nineteenth century, an offer to accept delayed payment would have given these capital-owning workers a big competitive advantage over destitute workers who needed payment immediately. This law establishes that competition among workers must not involve the employer's acceptance of such an offer by any worker. The biblical standard of payment is specified: payment at the end of the day. There may be payment in advance but not delayed payment.

15. There are also state-run compulsory programs of workers' compensation; any worker who is fired can receive payments from the state. Employers are required to pay taxes into these insurance funds. This is a morally corrupt system that penalizes employers who want to fire inefficient workers in order to improve customer service and/or increase profits that can be used to reward its investors. It also subsidizes unemployed workers to stay out of work until the benefits run out.

Where this law is enforced, destitute workers in the community are not replaced in the labor force by less destitute workers who can afford to forego immediate payment. All workers are to be allowed to compete for jobs, irrespective of any worker's possession of reserves sufficient to tide him over until the next payday. So, one idea behind this law is to make job opportunities available to the destitute workers in the community. Everyone who is physically able to work is to be allowed to compete for a job on a basis independent of his asset reserves. The destitute man's poverty is not to become the basis of his exclusion from the labor market. His competitors are not allowed to use their ability to extend credit to an employer as a way to offset his only assets: his willingness and ability to work.

It should be clear that this law is far more applicable to a poor society than to a modern capitalist one. Very few people in a modern capitalist society are so poor that they cannot wait for a paycheck in two weeks. But the principle should still be honored. It is unfair for an employer to force workers to extend him credit as the price of getting that first job assignment. To do so is to offer the oppressing robber's option: "Your money or the job!" This law prohibits robbery and oppression: by the employer and also by the employer's implicit accomplice, i.e., the worker who can afford to accept a delayed-payment contract, thereby excluding the poorest workers from the labor market.

E. A Case of Theft and Non-Criminal Oppression

Whenever we analyze a voluntary contract from the point of view of the ethical question of "oppressor and oppressed," we need to ask the economic question: Who wins and who loses? Few moral analysts have had training in economic analysis. This is why they often miss the point. They incorrectly identify the oppressors and the oppressed.

This law prohibits two parties from profiting from delayed payment: the employer and the worker who possesses sufficient assets to survive a delay in payment. Why does the employer delay payment? One reason is that he is trying to avoid risk. He wants to be able to fire the worker without losing the value of the labor that the worker still owes him because of the money that he paid the worker in advance. God grants the employer the legal right to avoid this risk of default, but only if he pays wages daily. The employer may lawfully assess the worker's net productivity, work day by work day. If the worker is producing unacceptably low output, the employer does not have to hire him the next day. The worker's contract is good for only one day or less, depending on what he agreed to in advance. The employer goes into debt to the worker: a day's wages. But whenever the employer seeks to retain the worker for a longer period than one work day, he must either pay the worker at the end of each work day or else extend payment in advance. The worker then goes into debt to the employer: a labor obligation.

1. The Weaker Party

The worker needs protection. An employer might hire him for a period and then dismiss him without pay. Jacob's complaint against Laban was that Laban had changed his wages repeatedly, meaning retroactively (Gen. 31:7). To protect the worker from this sort of oppression, God requires the employer to bear the risk of longer-term default. The employer bears the risk that the worker may turn out to be inefficient and will have to be fired before he has fulfilled his contract. The worker might even cheat the employer by walking off the job before his term of employment is over. That is the employer's problem. He can minimize this risk by paying workers at the end of each day. In doing so, he does not allow them to become indebted to him. If he chooses to have more infrequent pay periods, then he must bear the risk of paying people in advance who turn out to be poor workers.

There are workers who are willing and able to bear the risk that they will be cheated by an employer. They will accept delayed wage payments. If there were not such workers, this law would not be necessary. The employer could not rationally expect to be able to pass on this risk of hiring people to the people being hired unless he believed that there were workers who were willing to accept a delayed payment work contract. We know that such workers exist by the millions today. They have always existed.

This case law prohibits such an arrangement, whether initiated by an employer or a worker. The law specifies in advance exactly what each worker should expect: payment at the end of the work day. This law discriminates against all those workers who are willing and able to compete against other workers by accepting delayed wages. It is not simply a law against the oppression of destitute workers by employers; it is also a law against the indirect, non-criminal oppression of destitute workers by other workers.

2. The Weakest Party

It is not immediately apparent that this law deals with the oppression of the poor by the somewhat less poor. This law seems to have only the employer in mind as the agent of theft. But the employer cannot act alone in this act of theft. He needs accomplices, even if they are unaware of their economic status as accomplices. An employer who wants to discriminate against destitute workers in this way cannot do so without the voluntary cooperation of other workers. He cannot hire people to work without daily wage payments unless some workers are willing to work on these terms. The text identifies this practice as illegal, but it is not merely the oppression of those workers who voluntarily agree to accept the terms of the contract; it is also the oppression of those workers who cannot afford to offer their labor services on these terms. It is above all the oppression of those who are excluded from the employer's work force, not those who are included. But it requires some knowledge of basic economics to discover this fact. This law's protection of the destitute worker's ability to bid for jobs is implicit in the text, not explicit.

On what legal basis does this law apply to the free market? Why should a voluntary contract—delayed payment—be prohibited by civil law? What makes the practice of delaying payment judicially unique, and therefore legitimately subject to interference by the civil government?

3. The Priestly Factor

It is the vulnerability of the weakest seller of labor that makes this law necessary. God imposes this law because of what I call the priestly factor in free market pricing. This factor is seldom if ever discussed by free market economists. When human life is at stake—beyond the modern economic principle of marginalism—unrestricted free market competition is in some instances not morally valid. All real-world societies recognize this fact, but free market economists rarely do, since they are committed to a supposedly value-free (ethically neutral) analysis.

Here is an example of priestly pricing: a physician who bargains sharply with a seriously injured man at the scene of an accident. He cannot lawfully charge "all the traffic will bear"¹⁶ under such conditions. He is not allowed to charge significantly more than what is customary for treating that kind of injury in cases where the patient can be taken to any of several emergency treatment facilities. If he does drastically overcharge the victim, a civil court will not enforce the contract. The medical profession has ethical rules against such uninhibited pricing practices. Most people, unlike trained economists, have at least a vague understanding that human life, like eternal salvation, is not to be sold to a dying man on the basis of the free market's familiar auction principle of "high bid wins" unless there is sufficient time for the injured person to seek a second opinion and negotiate a second price quote.¹⁷

16. The phrase is from Frank Norris' anti-capitalistic novel, The Octopus (1901). The phrase was uttered by the book's villain, railroad agent S. Behrman.

The law against delaying the payment of wages is an application of the ethics of priestly pricing. A destitute worker is not to be excluded from any labor market by an employer's policy of delaying payment. Delayed payment is a policy of excluding workers.

Why would an employer want to exclude workers from bidding for a job, i.e., lowering his labor costs? Normally, he would not want to exclude them, but it takes considerable familiarity with economics to understand why this policy discriminates against destitute workers. This law prohibits such a practice. God expects men to obey His law even when they do not understand all of its ramifications. Obedience is primary, not intellectual understanding. Men are to show good faith to God by obeying God's law as best they can, so that He will reward them. One of these rewards is greater understanding, thereby enabling men to obey God even better.

F. Competition: Discrimination = Exclusion

This law does not prohibit other forms of competition among wor-

17. Priestly pricing is based on ability to pay, e.g., the tithe. Economists call this practice price discrimination: one monetary price charged to members of one group; another price charged to members of a different group. The economist's standard explanation for this phenomenon is that there are government-imposed barriers to entry, e.g., licensing. The classic presentation of this view is Reuben A. Kessel, "Price Discrimination in Medicine," Journal of Law and Economics, I (Oct. 1958). I wrote to Kessel in the mid-1970s and suggested the priestly role of physicians as another factor in price discrimination. He wrote back politely and said this had never occurred to him. He did not say that he thought I had discovered anything significant. A legitimate question is this one: Why do civil governments create such barriers to entry? The political self-interest of the legislators is not the only possible explanation. Legislators and judges seem to recognize the priestly role of physicians. They understand that some kinds of voluntary but life-and-death contracts are not enforceable in the courts, and should not be.

kers. It prohibits only this one, which reflects the character of God in his gracious dealings with men in history. There is no law in the Bible against one worker's willingness and ability to offer to work for less per day or less per hour than another worker presently does. Any offer to serve another person on terms that are better for him than the terms presently being offered is an offer to discriminate, which is an act of exclusion. The offer discriminates against the person who has previously benefitted from the arrangement under the existing terms. The legal right¹⁸ to make a better offer is inherent in the biblical requirement that we become more profitable servants.

1. The Economics of Persuasion

We never know all of the available alternatives in life. We learn about better ways of achieving our goals through better offers that are made to us. We frequently need to be persuaded to do the wise thing. Wisdom is not automatic. Neither is accurate knowledge automatically acted upon.¹⁹ This is an epistemological application of Paul's ethical principle that knowing the good is not the same as doing it: "For the good that I would I do not: but the evil which I would not, that I do" (Rom. 7:19). This is why advertising must be persuasive; in fact, persuasiveness is more important for successful advertising than conveying technically accurate information.²⁰

There is market competition for accurate information and also for effective persuasion (i.e., motivation). Neither information nor persuasion is a free good. Both parties to a voluntary transaction are buyers of both information and persuasion. While we do not normally think of persuasion as something that buyers purchase, it must be purchased. We reward those specialists in motivational advertising who provide the techniques of persuasion by buying whatever it is they are selling. Professional advertisers pay for specialized courses on how to become more persuasive. Customers take specific action when they are persuaded to buy. Advertisers therefore respond accordingly. They adopt techniques of persuasion—what scholars have for millennia called rhetoric. Persuasion is not a free good. Customers voluntarily pay for it. They want persuasion. They will not buy without it. If the

18. By "right," I mean "immunity from legal challenge."

19. Israel M. Kirzner, Perception, Opportunity, and Profit: Studies in the Theory of Entrepreneurship (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979), ch. 9.

20. Israel M. Kirzner, Competition and Entrepreneurship (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1973), pp. 159–80.

would buy without it, advertisers would cease providing it.

The structure of competition for both information and persuasion is no different from any other form of market competition: buyers vs. buyers and sellers vs. sellers. A person who thinks that he can sell me an alternative approach to solving my problem comes to me and says, in effect: "Include me in your production process. Exclude someone else. I have discovered a better way." The offer to include him is inevitably an offer to exclude his competitors. There can be no possibility of inclusion inside a boundary without the possibility of exclusion; otherwise, there would be no boundary.

3. Competition Without Oppression

This should alert us to a biblical fact of economic life: economic oppression is in fact a form of discrimination. Economic oppression can also be used as a means of competition. Most forms of discrimination are morally valid and legal. Therefore, so are most forms of competition. This case is an exception. Why does God prohibit this form of competition among workers? I think it must be the all-or-nothing aspect of this form of competition. An excluded worker may be too destitute to survive as a free man without pay. He is at the bottom of the barrel financially. He might be able to work for a bit less money per day, but he cannot afford to work for nothing for several days or weeks. He is in a desperate situation, so God intervenes and gives him what he needs to compete: time. His skills are not to be removed permanently from the marketplace just because he is too destitute to accept a job that delays payment for work completed beyond one work day.

The Bible correctly assumes that the employer is in a stronger bargaining position than the destitute employee in the community. God's law therefore places limits on the time that the employer can withhold the wages of the employee. It says specifically that withholding wages beyond the end of the work day constitutes oppression. God establishes this formal standard, and Christians should acknowledge its existence and obey it. *There are biblical judicial limits on voluntarism.*²¹ No employment contract contrary to this law is legal in God's eyes. The civil laws of every nation should prohibit such delays in the payment of wages.

21. This fact does not constitute a legitimizing of an open-ended socialism, including some modernized version of medieval guild socialism. Biblical law, not socialist slogans, is the source of our knowledge of such limits on voluntary exchange.

G. Bargainers: Strong, Weak, and Weakest

Because so few people are trained to think economically, they do not perceive the “things hidden”: in this case, the identification of the primary victim and the primary beneficiary of this prohibited labor contract. We need to think through the effects of such a contract by means of “Levitical” reasoning, eaning boundary reasoning: inclusion and exclusion. The traditional pair of questions posed by economists —“Who wins?” and “Who loses?”—becomes: “Who is included?” and “Who is excluded?”

In the absence of this law, there is an implied threat to the potential worker who is unwilling or unable to extend this credit. If he refuses to extend credit to the employer, he will not get the job. This is a major threat. By contrast, the employer suffers very little by paying wages in advance. He loses a small interest return on his money. This interest presumably is not worth a great deal to him, especially if he is a small-scale employer, which most employers in history are.

Why only presumably? Because of an inescapable epistemological limit on economic science. Technically, the economist cannot make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility, so he cannot say scientifically that the employer’s gain is psychologically smaller than the worker’s loss. The psychological loss or gain of the two individuals cannot be computed. There is no scientific way to measure the psychological loss to the worker of forfeiting the interest by extending credit, nor is there a way to compute the psychological loss to the employer if he is required by law to forfeit the interest by extending credit.²² It is not necessary for us to make such a numerical computation; we can still identify the primary victim and the primary beneficiary whenever this law is violated.

We need to consider three parties in our economic analysis: the employer, the employed worker, and the excluded worker. The text does not speak of the excluded worker, nor is the average Bible commentator likely to consider him, but he is crucial to the analysis. A less destitute worker may decide to accept the terms of employment:

22. On the question of interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility, see Appendix A, section on “Value Theory at an Epistemological Impasse.” See also Appendix B. See also North, Dominion Covenant, ch. 4. Cf. Gary North, The Coase Theorem: A Study in Epistemology (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1992). (<http://bit.ly/gncoase>) delayed payment. A destitute worker cannot afford to accept it. The excluded worker becomes the primary victim of a delayed-wages contract. He cannot afford to take the job. The less destitute worker takes the job. He would of course rather be paid early, but his willingness to accept delayed payment is a form of competition on his part that gives him an advantage over very poor people in the community. The Bible calls this form of competition oppression.

The primary economic beneficiary of this form of oppression is not the employer, for whom the interest gained by delaying payment is minimal, but rather the worker who can afford to have his wages delayed, and who therefore gets the job. He excludes his competition through oppression. The employer here acts as the economic agent of the employed worker. This representational relationship is not readily understood. No one without economic training will blame the employed worker for the unemployment of the destitute worker. If anyone is blamed, it will be the employer. The employer is to blame, judicially speaking: he imposes the illegal terms of employment: robbery, a form of oppression. God's law designates the employer as the initiator of an evil contract, and hence judicially liable, as we shall see. The fact remains, however, that the worker who takes the job on these terms becomes the agent of economic oppression, while the excluded worker is the primary economic victim.²³ The person who appears to be the victim—the worker who takes the job—is in fact the primary economic beneficiary of this labor contract. He obtains what both of the competing workers needed: the job.

H. What Did the Employer Steal?

The appropriate civil sanction is not specified, as is also the case in other laws governing oppression. But in most other cases, the absence of any civil sanction points to the absence of civil jurisdiction because of excessive limits on the judges' knowledge. Not so in this instance. Restitution in this case is technically possible to compute. If victims prosecute and the courts convict, the practice will disappear from public view.

The primary judicial question is: How much does the convicted employer owe the victim? Answer: the victim's costs of prosecution plus the restitution penalty.²⁴ There are two approaches to establishing what restitution payment is owed by the employer: (1) by considering the forfeited interest; (2) by considering the forfeited daily wage. I believe the second approach is valid. We must examine the first approach in detail in order to see why it is not valid. The key question that we need to answer is this: What constitutes the thing stolen? Is it the interest or the wage?

23. One more time: the employer gains a small interest return and a small risk-avoidance return. The worker gains the promise of a wage, bears some risk of not being paid, and forfeits a small interest payment. The excluded worker, too poor to accept the contract, gains nothing.

1. Interest

A withheld wage requires a worker to extend credit to his employer. For a week or two, or perhaps even a month, the worker has extended credit, day by day, to the person employing him. The employee has therefore forfeited the interest that he might have earned day by day, had he been able to put this money in the bank rather than spending it on necessities. It is obvious that the interest payments foregone would not be very much money; nevertheless, it is possible to compute what double restitution of that forfeited interest would be. However, only a very skilled person could have made this computation prior to the widespread knowledge of mathematics. For example, consider how difficult this would be apart from the use of the zero (a decimal point followed by a zero is needed to compute percentages under 10%), which came to the medieval West only through contact with Islam. The Arabs in turn learned of it in India. There is no evidence that the zero was known to any culture prior to the ninth century, A.D.—the West's era of Charlemagne. (The Mayans and the Indians discovered it independently or else were in contact with each other). The average employer could not have computed this payment easily in Moses' time, let alone the average employee.

The cost to the worker of this forfeited interest would be higher to him than the cost to the employer. I am speaking here of the actual rate of interest, not subjective cost. The worker has to forfeit goods that the wages would have bought in the interim. There is no doubt that a modern worker can borrow the money to buy these goods, repaying the loan at the end of the working period. (Prior to World War I, small consumer loans from banks were unavailable to workers.) The difficulty is, a worker is not in a position to borrow money at the same low rate of interest that the employer can obtain. The poverty-stricken worker is a high-risk borrower. He can easily be trapped in a cycle of debt. When this law is honored, an employer has greater difficulty in forcing the employee into debt servitude.

24. If the victim's court costs are not paid by the convicted criminal, very few victims will be able to sue, so the practice of discrimination will not be reduced.

Computing the forfeited interest would be difficult even today. In Moses' day, it would have been very difficult. How many judges would have been able to establish this implied forfeited payment? Not many. So, we must look for a better solution. We must turn from the concept of forfeited interest to the concept of forfeited wages.

2. Wages

It is not implied in the text that double restitution of the forfeited interest should be paid, since this is not what is specified as the thing stolen. In fact, the text does not specify the thing stolen. What is identified in the text as an act of theft is the refusal of the employer to pay the agreed-upon wages in a timely manner. We conclude that the withheld wage is the thing stolen. Thus, a civil judge can rightfully impose a much higher penalty on the employer than double the employer's forfeited interest. The thief would not simply pay double restitution on the forfeited interest; he would pay double restitution on any wages unpaid at the end of each work day.

Why so high a penalty? After all, the worker forfeited only the interest that his money might have earned. Why impose double restitution based on the entire daily wage multiplied by the number of days of delayed payment? Because God's law defines the act as theft.

The act is also a form of oppression, but the oppressor here is the worker who accepts the contract. He is not identified as a thief. He is not subject to criminal charges by the invisible excluded workers who cannot afford to wait to be paid.

We need to examine the employer's motivation. If his primary goal is not to earn a little extra interest by delaying wages, then what is it? Most employers adopt a policy of delaying wages today because their rivals do. This policy is almost universal in modern advanced economies. Employers give little or no thought to the practice. For that matter, neither do most employees. But what if employers did give thought to it? What would their primary motivation likely be?

I. The Limits of Economic Knowledge

A Marxist—an endangered species these days—would probably argue that the employer's goal is to place local workers in a totally dependent position. The poorer these workers are, the more desperate their economic condition is likely to be. The more desperate their economic condition, the cheaper they will be willing to work. If the employer can maintain what Karl Marx once called the industrial reserve army,²⁵ i.e., the unemployed, he can force down local wages. His theft is therefore deliberate. One problem with this line of reasoning is that it assumes that the employer understands a complex chain of economic reasoning. He probably doesn't. Another problem is that employers like to have lots of qualified workers competing against each other.

The key word here is qualified. As a former employer, I believe that the typical employer is trying to minimize his risk when he hires competent workers rather than substandard workers. He delays payment because he wants to see each new worker prove himself before getting paid. This delay in payment pressures workers with little capital to quit early or never even apply for the job. The practice of delaying wages is therefore primarily a screening device. It favors workers who have capital in reserve. These capital reserves serve the employer as a substitute for other screening techniques. The employer's economic problem is the his lack of knowledge about the competence of the new worker. The employer uses a delayed payment scheme in order to minimize his search costs in estimating the competence of new workers. Accurate knowledge is not a zero-price resource. Employers try to obtain such knowledge as cheaply as possible. They use the new worker's willingness to accept delayed payments as a cost-effective substitute for more detailed information regarding the worker's abilities and his willingness to work.

J. The Limits of Judicial Knowledge

Here we have a situation where the law seems unjust. I have argued that the primary economic beneficiary of delayed payments is the worker who can afford to extend the credit and therefore gets the job. I have identified the primary economic victim as the excluded destitute worker. Yet the law identifies the employer as the oppressor-robber, and the only way for a judge to impose negative sanctions is for him to require the employer to pay the employee. In other words, the judicial victim is not the primary economic victim.

Why does God give the employee a lawful claim against the employer? Because this worker is the only judicially visible victim. He is a weak bargainer when compared to the employer. He is stronger than the destitute excluded workers, but he is still weak compared to the employer. This law is meant to protect the weak from the strong. It protects the weakest party only indirectly: by threatening the employer with penalties for robbing the weaker. Judges are not omniscient; they cannot identify the weakest workers, i.e., those who never even bothered to apply for the job because of their lack of capital. Judges provide protection to the weakest workers only indirectly.

25. Karl Marx, Capital: A Critique of Political Economy (1867), XXV:3 (New York: Modern Library, [1906] n.d.), pp. 689–703.

The judicial problem is this: How can the judges identify the actual victims of this form of discrimination? The primary economic victim of a delayed-wage contract was the excluded worker who could not afford to take the job. He has been oppressed by the worker who took the job on the illegal terms. Exactly which workers were the excluded ones? That is to say, which workers would have gained employment had the delayed-payment system not been in force? This is virtually impossible for civil judges to determine. Knowing the harsh terms of employment, some destitute workers may not have bothered to apply. Any seemingly destitute worker might later complain to the civil authorities that he had never bothered to apply for the job because of the delayed payment feature.

So, by what means can such a law be enforced while still maintaining justice? How can legitimate, predictable sanctions be imposed? What, if anything, should be done to indemnify the primary victim? This is why economic oppression is rarely a crime. The civil magistrate cannot specify the illegal criteria, the victims, or the appropriate restitution.

There is another issue. How can a restitution payment to the employed worker help a destitute worker who was too poor to accept the terms of employment in the first place? The judge does not restore anything to him. Nevertheless, the penalty does help the excluded worker: not as a payment to compensate him for past oppression, but as a threat against future oppression.

This law reduces future injustice to the weakest members of the work force by forcing the oppressing employer to pay the visible victim—the worker whose wages were withheld—instead of paying the invisible victims whose claims cannot be precisely identified or resolved judicially. The agent of oppression, namely, the worker who took the job, is rewarded by the court, not for being an oppressor (which he was) but because he was the victim of a criminal act.

K. Protecting the Weakest Party

First, there is no active assault. There is only a refusal to pay. Second, the weakest worker is the unemployed person who cannot afford to live without wages. He is being oppressed by both the employer and his employee. Judicially, it is not possible for a court to identify the specific worker who would have taken the job had the employer paid in advance. Therefore, in order to remove this form of indirect oppression from society, God grants to the weaker worker—the employed worker, who himself is an oppressor (though probably unknowingly)—the authority to press a covenant lawsuit in the courts on his own behalf.

A small portion of the wealth of the weak worker had been transferred to the employer. This wealth transfer can be calculated for purposes of judicial restitution. Because the defrauded worker presses charges, the weakest worker is indirectly protected. The weaker worker, acting on his own behalf judicially and economically, acts as an economic agent for the weakest workers. He probably does not perceive that he is in fact acting as the economic agent of his competition. A more economically sophisticated worker would probably not press charges against his employer, since the delayed payment system excludes his competition, but there are never very many economically sophisticated workers (or anyone else, for that matter). Some workers will press charges, so the oppressive practice will be reduced.

The courts can take action only when someone brings a lawsuit against a perceived law-breaker. This could be a rival employer. The weakest victims cannot act on their own behalf in these two types of cases. The excluded worker cannot prove that he was a victim. Similarly, the victimized blind or deaf person cannot prove that the crime took place. A biblical court system requires an agent to bring a lawsuit against the law-breaker. These case laws provide the necessary incentives for agents to bring these lawsuits.

There is another way for workers with capital to compete. They can offer to work for free for a period as apprentices. Then, when they have proven themselves reliable, the employer can begin to pay them. This is a legitimate strategy. Their donated time remains donated. They bear the risk of not getting hired. They do not place the employer in their debt. But employers cannot legally make compulsory such free service as a condition of employment. The offer is at the discretion of the worker. There must be an element of apprenticeship risk in order to legitimize this offer. The employer is under no obligation to hire the worker.

Conclusion

This case law deals with theft from economically weak workers and also indirect economic oppression of the most impoverished workers in the community. The most impoverished workers are those who cannot afford to extend credit to their employer. They need to be paid at the end of the work day. The employer is required to do this or else pay them in advance for a longer term of service.

This law proves that Mosaic Israel was not a debt-free society. There were creditors and debtors. A legitimate biblical goal is to reduce long-term debt, but God's civil law does not mandate absolutely debt-free living. Debt is basic to society, for society implies a division of labor. Debt will exist in a division of labor economy until such time as an economically efficient means of making moment-by-moment wage payments becomes universal.

The employer who delays payment to his workers is defrauding them. But to do this, he is inescapably providing an opportunity for some workers to oppress their competitors. The worker who can afford to work without pay for a period is given an opportunity by the employer to steal a job away from a worker so poverty-stricken that he cannot survive without payment at the end of the day. This form of competition is illegitimate, this passage says ("fraud, robbery"). It is unfair competition. God's civil law makes it illegal for an employer to act as the economic agent of any employee against a destitute competitor. There are very few cases of unfair competition specified in the Bible, but this is one of them.

This passage is not a biblical injunction for the state to become a welfare agent: a dispenser of positive sanctions. The delay of payment overnight is described in Leviticus 19:13 as robbery: a crime. A judge can impose a restitution penalty on the perpetrator. There is also a hidden element of oppression: the excluded workers.

To become subject to civil law, oppression must be identifiable as a criminal offense. There must be definable criteria that make the act a crime. The indirectly oppressed, excluded worker is not the victim of a crime. Ironically, the one who has oppressed him, the employed worker, is the victim of a crime: delayed payment. Even more ironically, if the oppressor brings a lawsuit against his assailant, the employer, he thereby makes it less likely that he and his employer will be able to oppress the weakest party: the excluded worker. This is why I think the excluded worker or the state acting on his behalf can bring a lawsuit against the employer to have the practice stopped. But he must not be awarded restitution. He cannot prove he was uniquely harmed, thereby excluding all other potential claimants.

The oppressive character of the contract should be recognized by the judges, and no legislation should ever be passed that imitates the “delayed payment” contract, with its exclusionary side effects.

GLEANNING: CHARITABLE INEFFICIENCY

When thou cuttest down thine harvest in thy field, and hast forgot a sheaf in the field, thou shalt not go again to fetch it: it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow: that the LORD thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hands. When thou beatest thine olive tree, thou shalt not go over the boughs again: it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow. When thou gatherest the grapes of thy vineyard, thou shalt not glean it afterward: it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow. And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt: therefore I command thee to do this thing (Deut. 24:19–22).

The theocentric principle undergirding this law is this: God shows grace by allowing mankind access to the fruit of God's field, i.e., His creation. God allows mankind inside the boundaries of His field. A fallen man is in the same judicial position as a poverty-stricken, landless Israelite or stranger was under the Mosaic economy. God does not exclude eternally cursed men from access to the means of life in history. Neither were land owners in post-conquest Mosaic Israel to exclude the economically poor and judicially excluded residents of the land. A fallen man is always a gleaner.¹ He comes into God's field as a petitioner. He is never the original owner. Ownership is therefore a form of stewardship. It is vertical: God > man > nature. It is also horizontal: owners representing other men (customers).

A. Ownership and Stewardship

God is the original land owner who sought to make the Promised Land's blessings available to every able-bodied worker who was willing to go into the fields at the time of the harvest. This was an aspect of the dominion covenant: man as God's steward who participates in the subduing of the earth (Gen. 1:26–28). Those people who were without either land or tools in Mosaic Israel nevertheless had an obligation to work. Because the Mosaic law assigned rural land to families that were heirs of the conquest generation, this case law opened up otherwise closed fields. The gleaners could not inherit these fields,² but they had a moral claim on a portion of the leftovers. This was both a land law and a seed law.³

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 11:M.

This passage expands on the gleaning laws of Leviticus: "And when ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not wholly reap the corners of thy field, neither shalt thou gather the gleanings of thy harvest. And thou shalt not glean thy vineyard, neither shalt thou gather every grape of thy vineyard; thou shalt leave them for the poor and stranger: I am the LORD your God" (Lev. 19:9–10).⁴ "And when ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not make clean riddance of the corners of thy field when thou reapest, neither shalt thou gather any gleaning of thy harvest: thou shalt leave them unto the poor, and to the stranger: I am the LORD your God" (Lev. 23:22).⁵ It identifies the three classes of vulnerable residents: widows, orphans, and strangers. It refers to Israel's years as a slave in Egypt. It offers positive sanction: "that the LORD thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hands." The negative sanction of bondage is contrasted with the positive sanction of God's blessings.

1. Gleaning as a Model

I have already covered gleaning in chapter 11 of Leviticus: An Economic Commentary. I am not reproducing that chapter here. Deuteronomy 24:19–22 identifies society's poor more specifically: stranger, orphan, and widow. It also adds a reason: Israel's time of bondage in Egypt. God had delivered Israel from this bondage. Israelite land owners were to offer similar deliverance to the poor.

Gleaning was a form of morally compulsory charity. It remains the primary moral model for biblical charity, but, as I hope to show, it is not a literal model for modern charity. In a non-agricultural society, gleaning cannot become a literal model for charity. Morally, however,

2. Conceivably, some poor gleaner might be the long-term heir of the property who had temporarily lost possession of his field.

3. On land laws and seed laws, see Appendix J.

4. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 11.

5. Ibid., ch. 22.

gleaning is to be our guideline for charity: those in the community who have been called in the West “the deserving poor” (charity-deserving) to be allowed to do hard work in order to support themselves and improve their condition. God expects the more successful members of a community to provide economic opportunities for such willing laborers—opportunities for service.

As with every biblical law, this law was ultimately theocentric. The beneficiaries of this law were God’s representatives in history, just as victims of crimes are representatives of God. Crime is primarily an assault on God by means of a crime against man, who is made in God’s image. Crime is man’s attempt to bring unlawful negative sanctions against God by bringing them against one of His representatives. Charity is analogous to crime in this respect, but with this difference: the sanctions are both lawful and positive. What a person does to the poor is counted as if he did it to Jesus (Matt. 25:32–40).

2. Inefficiency: Yes and No

The stated goal of modern economic science is to explain men’s actions in terms of the principle of income maximization, i.e., sanctions: profit and loss. For a given expenditure of scarce economic resources, how can a person maximize his personal return, however he defines “return”? Put another way, how can he avoid wasting valuable resources? How can he exchange his present circumstances for better circumstances in the future without surrendering ownership of benefits that need not be surrendered?

The farmer was warned by Moses not to seek to maximize his total return on his agricultural investment. He was not to go back to pick up the forgotten sheaf, or go through his olive orchard, beating the trees a second time, or glean the vineyard a second time. The three examples in the text apply to the raw materials for producing bread, wine, and oil. These were the vegetable sacrifices required by God (Lev. 2:4; 23:13). They were the best produce of a man’s field. They served here as representatives of all agricultural production. Moses told owners of these crops that they should leave behind some small percentage, so that gleaners could harvest them. This meant that the Mosaic law transferred partial ownership of these unharvested crops to those who did not own the land and had not made the investments necessary to produce them.

By the standards of modern economics, God was commanding land owners to be wasteful. He commanded them to leave behind for others a small portion of the fruits of their investment. He was saying clearly that members of three defenseless groups—strangers, widows, and orphans—had a moral claim on a small portion of the output of the land.⁶ They did not have a legal claim, but they had a moral claim. Here, the Bible's supreme example is Ruth, who was both a stranger and a widow. Boaz let her glean in his fields (Ruth 2).

This was an inefficient way to harvest crops. God was saying that it was an efficient way to harvest souls. Poverty-stricken people who gained access to the post-harvest fields would recognize in the land owner a willingness to forfeit a portion of his income for the sake of God's law, which recognized the plight of the righteous poor. Word would get out among the poor: here was a man to be imitated. Down the ladder of wealth, from the richest to the poorest, the goal was to provide a boost out of poverty to the people on the rung below. But in the case of the land owner, he was required by God to reach down two rungs and provide a poor person with a way to climb out of poverty. Sometimes poverty is well deserved. Some times it isn't. The goal of this Mosaic law was to pressure the land owner to identify the righteous poor in his community and provide both income and work experience for them.

An efficient man plans for the future. He counts the future costs of his present actions. A poor man is rarely an efficient man. He is too worried about his next meal to plan ahead very far. He is present-oriented. This law announced to the poor man: "If you are willing to work hard, you will not have to worry about where your next meal is coming from. You will then be able to plan ahead more easily." A man who was present-oriented because of an ethical failure would probably remain poor. In contrast, a future-oriented man whose time horizons had been shortened because of his poverty was given a way to rise in his class position. Class position is based more on time-perspective than money. The present-oriented man is lower class.⁷

6. In chapter 35, on the tithes of celebration, I identified these three groups as judicially undefended. This was because a fourth group, the Levites, were included in the list. The Levites were not necessarily poor. In this law, however, the Levites are not mentioned. Thus, I regard the classification here as economic rather than judicial.

7. Edward C. Banfield, The Unheavenly City: The Nature and Future of Our Urban Crisis (Boston: Little, Brown, 1970), pp. 53–59.

B. Sanctions

The motivation for obedience rested on a cause-and-effect system of sanctions. In this case, the motivating sanction was supernaturally based, historically manifested, and positive: “that the LORD thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hands” (v. 19). There was also an implied negative sanction: “And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt: therefore I command thee to do this thing” (v. 22). The oppression of Israel in Egypt was the Mosaic model for oppression. The unstated implication of this passage is that Israel’s deliverance from Egypt is the model of God’s corporate judgment in history. As God’s firstborn son (Ex. 4:22), Israel had gained the inheritance of the Egypt’s disinherited firstborn sons, who had died at Passover. The message: the oppressed will eventually inherit in history. To maintain the inheritance, a person or a nation must not become an oppressor.

This is a continuing theme in Deuteronomy: the ethically conditional nature of the inheritance. Without righteousness, Israel’s inheritance could not be permanently maintained. This is one of the crucial themes of the Bible. It undergirds inheritance by the New Covenant church: “Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof” (Matt. 21:43). The church inherited the kingdom because Israel did not remain obedient. The context of Jesus’ announcement of Israel’s coming disinheritance was His parable of the unjust stewards who refused to pay what they owed the land owner. He lured the chief priests and the elders into condemning themselves in public for disobeying God: “They say unto him, He will miserably destroy those wicked men, and will let out his vineyard unto other husbandmen, which shall render him the fruits in their seasons” (Matt. 21:41).⁸

Despite Jesus’ confirmation of the Mosaic covenant’s system of sanctions, Christians have ignored or downplayed this theme of historical inheritance and disinheritance. This is evidence of widespread antinomianism: hostility to biblical law and its mandated civil sanctions. Christians have asserted that the Mosaic law and its sanctions, both civil and historical, have been completely annulled by the New Covenant. This has led them to a dismal conclusion: there will be no unique cultural inheritance by Christians in church history; consequently, there will be no disinheritance of God's enemies. The meek will not inherit the earth. Jesus really did not teach Christians to expect such an inheritance, we are told. With respect to a future world wide cultural inheritance by covenant-keepers, perhaps He was speaking about the millennial "Jewish church" (dispensationalism's view). Or maybe He was speaking allegorically about eternity (amillennialism's view). But He could not possibly have meant that the covenantal heirs of those who are meek before God will exercise dominion in history. Such a "triumphalist" outlook rests on faith in a system of predictable, corporate, historical, covenantal cause and effect, which in turn rests on a revelational moral and legal order. In short, such an outlook rests on theonomy. This outlook is not acceptable to modern Christianity.

8. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 43.

C. A Lawful Claim: Moral or Legal?

God announced that the poor people and resident aliens in Israel were to be invited in by the land owner so that they could harvest the corners of the field and the fallen grain. This meant that, as a class, they had a moral claim on the "droppings" of production. This also meant that they had no legal claim on the primary sources of income of an agricultural community. They were invited in. There was no state-financed welfare in Israel.

It would have been difficult for a judge or a jury to identify which individuals in the community had a legal right, as victims of his refusal to honor the gleaning laws, to bring charges against the land owner. The text specifies no negative institutional sanction that had to be imposed on a land owner who refused to honor the gleaning laws. God is indirectly revealed as the agent who would bring negative sanctions against an individual land owner who refused to honor the gleaning laws. The state was therefore not authorized by the text to bring these sanctions against individuals on behalf of God. The sanctions were individual rather than corporate. Without the threat of God's negative sanctions against the entire covenanted community, there was no justification for civil sanctions. Civil sanctions were imposed in Israel in order to substitute the state's subordinate wrath for God's more direct wrath against the community. Furthermore, in case of a violation of the gleaning law, there would have been no easy way to determine legitimate restitution. Where there are no civil sanctions, there is no crime. To violate this law was a sin, not a crime. God would curse the owner directly, but the society was not at risk. Thus, civil sanctions were inappropriate.⁹

This law applied only to agriculture: field and vineyard. Field and vineyard are the sources of bread and wine: Melchizedek's meal for Abram (Gen. 14:18) and also the Lord's Supper.¹⁰

D. Who Paid, Who Benefitted?

What was the economics of the gleaning law? In a sense, the requirement that the land owner and professional harvesters leave behind a small portion of the crop for the gleaners made this portion analogous to the manna that God had supplied to the Israelites during the wilderness wandering. This miraculous though predictable food was a pure gift of God. Similarly, both the produce of the land and God's grace in establishing the requirement that the land owners and harvesters share with the gleaners were signs of God's continuing grace to the poor. The gleaners were visibly dependent on God's grace for their survival. This had also been the case for the nation in the wilderness. This law was mandatory to economic hierarchy.

Gleaning laws were exclusively agricultural laws. God commanded the harvesters of the field and the vineyard to be wasteful—wasteful in terms of their personal goals, but efficient in terms of God's goals. They were to leave behind part of the produce of both the vineyard and the grain field for gathering by the poor.

This law indicates that the leftovers of the Promised Land belonged to God. God transferred the ownership of these high harvesting cost assets from the land owner and the harvester to the poor and the stranger. The owner in one sense did benefit, at least those owners who paid their field hands wages rather than by the supply harvested, i.e., piece-rate payment. The obedient owner did not pay salaried harvesters to collect marginal pickings. This lowered his labor cost per harvested unit of crop. But the net income loss as a result of gleaning did lower his total return from his land and planting expenses. There is no doubt that this economic loss of net revenue constituted a form of compulsory charity. It was a mandated positive sanction. This should alert us to the fact that this law was not a civil law. It was rather a church-enforced law. The church, not the state, is to bring positive sanctions in history. The church, not the state, offers Holy Communion. This distinction is representative of the differing functions of the two institutions.

9. See my discussion in Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 11:B.

10. Ibid., ch. 11:C.

The gleaning law was also to some extent an advantage to the piece-rate harvester. He was able to achieve greater output per unit of time invested. He was not expected to spend time gathering the marginal left overs of the crop. Marginal returns on his labor invested were higher than they would have been had it not been for this law. Nevertheless, both the owner of the land and the piece-rate harvesters did suffer a reduction of total income because of this law. The harvesters saved time but gathered less. They did suffer a reduction of income compared to what they would have earned apart from this law.

How did piece-rate harvesters suffer a reduction of total income? Because they could not lawfully gather the total crop of the field or the vineyard. Each worker had to leave some produce behind, which means that his income suffered. This also means that the poor of the community were in part funded by the slightly less poor: the piece-rate harvesters. The harvesters were reminded of the burdens of poverty. This in effect became an unemployment insurance program for the harvesters. They knew that if they later fell into poverty, they would probably be allowed to participate as gleaners. They forfeited some income in the present, but they did so in the knowledge that in a future crisis, they would be able to gain income from gleaning. Both the land owner and the piece-rate worker financed a portion of this morally compulsory insurance program.

The law placed a burden on the land owner. Yet this burden was in fact a form of liberation if he acknowledged the covenantal nature of the expenditure. It was analogous to the tithe. By honoring it, he was acknowledging God's sovereign ownership of his land. This act of sharing placed him visibly in the service of the great King. That King was his protector, for he was a vassal. As with rest on the sabbath, the owner could rest confidently in the knowledge that the King would defend his interests as a vassal if he abided by the terms of the King's treaty.

There was another benefit to the faithful owner, according to Aaron Wildavsky, an expert on the history of taxation.¹¹ He was also a careful student of the Mosaic law. He wrote of the gleaning law that "Compulsiveness easily converts to fanaticism. The farmer who harvests not 99 percent of his crop but every last little bit becomes consumed by his compulsion. Soon enough excess—getting it all—becomes an overwhelming passion.”¹² He identified fanaticism as idolatry.¹³ The gleaning law restrained the idolatry of greed. It reminded rich men that they did not need to keep everything that they managed as God’s stewards in order to remain successful. It restrained them from the passion of autonomous man: defining themselves in terms of their wealth rather than their obedience to God.

11. Carolyn Webber and Aaron Wildavsky, A History of Taxation and Expenditure in the Western World (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1986).

E. Hard Work

The gleaner had to work harder than the average worker did in order to harvest the same quantity of crops. The “easy pickings” were gone by the time the gleaner was allowed into the fields. This means that he had high marginal labor costs. That is, he had to invest more labor per unit of crop harvested than the piece-rate harvester did. Assuming that the harvester’s goal was a high return on labor invested, it was preferable to be a piece-rate worker than to be a gleaner. To be a gleaner was to be in a nearly desperate condition.

In the case of both piece-rate work and gleaning, most of the labor costs of harvesting were borne by the poor. A rich man did not work in the fields. In modern terminology, this might be called a workfare program instead of a welfare program. The gleaner was not a passive recipient of someone else’s money. He had to work. Furthermore, marketing costs may actually have been borne by the poor. It would have been legal for the poor individual to take whatever pickings he gained from the field and go to a store owner or other purchaser of the crop. The owner of the land did not have the right to compel the gleaner to sell the gleanings to him. This means that the gleaner was enabled to obtain a competitive market price for the output of his labor. Of course, this would have been extra work and risk for the gleaner, and it involved specialized knowledge of markets. Nevertheless, it was a right before God that the gleaner possessed.

There was another great advantage to this form of morally enforced charity: it brings hard-working, efficient poor people to the attention of potential employers. In effect, employers in Mosaic Israel could “glean” future workers from society’s economic “leftovers.”

This system produced more food for the community than would have been produced apart from the law, although costs were higher 12. Aaron Wildavsky, The Nursing Father: Moses as a Political Leader (University, Alabama: University of Alabama Press, 1984), p. 30.

13. Idem.

than otherwise.¹⁴

F. Subsidizing Tribalism and Localism

Is becoming a low-paid field hand God's universally required on-the-job training system? No. God no longer expects poor people to learn how to become field laborers. In Old Covenant Israel, however, it was important that men learn to serve Him locally. God wanted to preserve localism and tribalism. The tribal system was important for the preservation of freedom in Israel. Tribalism and localism undermined attempts to centralize the nation politically. Thus, the gleaning law was part of the social order associated with Old Covenant Israel. It reinforced the tribal system. It also reinforced rural life at the expense of urban life—one of the few Mosaic laws to do so. The land owner was required by God to subsidize the rural way of life. Local poor people were offered subsidized employment on the farms. Had it not been for the gleaning system, the only rural alternatives would have been starvation or beggary. Hungry people would have moved to the cities, just as hungry people do all over the world today.

The jubilee land inheritance laws kept rural land within the Israelite family. If a daughter inherited land because there was no brother, she could not marry outside her tribe if she wanted to keep the land. "Neither shall the inheritance remove from one tribe to another tribe; but every one of the tribes of the children of Israel shall keep himself to his own inheritance" (Num. 36:9).¹⁵ While a rich man might move permanently to a city, the poor person was encouraged by the gleaning law to stay closer to home.

Cities would inevitably have become the primary dwelling places for most Israelites if they had obeyed God as a nation. Population growth would have forced most people into the cities. The size of family plots would have shrunk as each generation inherited its portion of the land. But until Israel's corporate covenantal faithfulness led to population growth and increased per capita wealth, each tribe's poor members were to be subsidized by the gleaning law to remain close to the tribe's food supplies. This law was a means of retarding the growth of an unemployed urban proletariat. The countryside was to be the place where the poor man received his daily bread. He would have to do simple agricultural labor to receive his food. This law also promoted localism rather than a distant bureaucracy.¹⁶

14. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 11:F.

15. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 22.

Another important reason for localism was the concern of God that His resources not be used for evil purposes. Either the provider of this agricultural charity had to reside locally or else his specified agent had to. Local residents in rural Mosaic Israel were more likely to be well known to the land owners. Presumably, the cause of their poverty was also well known to the land owners, or at least this could be discovered without much difficulty. The gleaning system reduced the subsidy of evil. The poor person who was poor as a result of his own bad habits did not have to be subsidized by the land owner and the professional harvesters who worked his fields. The land owner had the right to exclude some poor people from access to his fields. Gleaning was therefore a highly personal form of charity, since the person who was required to give this charity was also the person who screened access to the fruit of the land.

This means that the gleaning law was a form of conditional charity in each individual recipient's case, although the loss was compulsory from the point of view of the land owner. *Biblical charity is always conditional.*¹⁷ Charity is not to subsidize evil, for it is an act of grace. Unconditional charity is antinomian. In a fallen world, unconditional charity will eventually subsidize evil. This is even more true of legal entitlements to other people's wealth. Such wealth transfers are not a form of charity. They are legislated theft. They represent a perverse modification of the eighth commandment: "Thou shalt not steal, except by majority vote."

The local member of the land owner's tribe was the primary recipient of charity, but he was not the only one. The other recipient of the grace of gleaning was the stranger. These strangers were presumably resident aliens who had fallen on hard times. Some of them may have been hired servants who could not find employment. They were people who did not want to go back to their home country. They were therefore people who wanted to live under the civil law of God in the Promised Land. These people were morally entitled to the same consideration that the poor Israelite was morally entitled to. It is clear that this arrangement would have increased the emotional commitment of 16. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 11: G:1:(a).

17. Ray Sutton, "Whose Conditions for Charity?" in Theonomy: An Informed Response, ed. Gary North (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991), ch. 9. (<http://bit.ly/gntheon>)

the resident alien to the welfare of the community. He was treated justly. This law was agricultural only. It did not apply to urban businesses.¹⁸

G. Conditional Charity: Moral Boundaries

The owner of a farm had to acknowledge the sovereignty of God by obeying the gleaning laws. These laws were a reminder to him that biblical authority always has costs attached to it. The owner of rural land had been given capital that other people lacked. He therefore had an obligation to the local poor as God's agent, for the land itself was pictured as God's agent. His obligation was to supply the land's left overs to the poor.

In making this demand, the gleaning law placed decisive limits (boundaries) on both the poor rural resident and the state. It limited the moral demands that the poor could make on economically successful people in the community. The poor had no comparable moral claim against the successful non-agricultural businessman. This law also limited the demands that the state could make on the community in the name of the poor. Biblical law specified that the man with landed wealth should share his wealth with the deserving poor, not the poor in general. The deserving poor were those who were willing to work hard, but who could not find work in the normal labor markets. In short, the gleaning law had conditions attached to it. The idea of morally compulsory, non-conditional charity was foreign to the laws of the Mosaic covenant.¹⁹

The gleaner had to work very hard, for he reaped only the left-overs. This means that his income was lower than would have been the

18. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 11:H.

19. It is equally foreign to the law of the New Covenant. This assertion appalls Timothy Keller: "Theonomy and the Poor: Some Reflections," in William S. Barker and W. Robert Godfrey (eds.), Theonomy: A Reformed Critique (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan, 1990), pp. 273–79. He called initially for unconditional charity to all poor people. He argued that anyone in need anywhere on earth is my neighbor, thereby universalizing the moral claims of all poor people on the wealth of anyone who is slightly less poor. He wrote: "Anyone in need is my neighbor—that is the teaching of the Good Samaritan parable." Ibid., p. 275. He rejects the traditional Christian concept of the deserving poor (pp. 276–77). He concluded: "I am proposing that the reconstructionist approach to biblical charity is too conditional and restrictive." Ibid., p. 278. For my response, see North, Westminster's Confession: The Abandonment of Van Til's Legacy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991), pp. 271–73. (<http://bit.ly/gnwestcon>) See also Sutton, "Whose Conditions for Charity?" in North (ed.), Theonomy: An Informed Response, ch. 9.

case if he had been a professional harvester. Gleaning provides a lesson to the poor: there are no free lunches in life. Someone always has to pay. The economic terms of the gleaning system established that only destitute members of the community would have become gleaners. If there had been any other source of income besides begging, they would have taken it. The hard work and low pay of gleaning was an incentive for the individual to get out of poverty.

The gleaning laws operated within the framework of the jubilee land laws. The poorest Israelite in the community at some point would inherit a portion of the original family inheritance. The size of that portion of land depended on the number of male heirs. Its value depended on the economic productivity of local residents who could legally bid to lease it.²⁰ The more productive the heir, the more likely that he would be able to retain control over it.²¹ Gleaning gave the poor Israelite an opportunity to gain management skills and other skills as a land owner prior to the time that he or his children would be given back the original family land grant through the jubilee land law. The gleaning law provided training that could in the future be converted into family capital. The gleaning law was designed to keep poor people in the local agricultural community.

The gleaning law did not apply to non-agricultural businesses or professions. It originated from the fact that God declared Himself as the owner of the Promised Land. He did not verbally claim an equally special ownership of businesses. The land, not business, was identified as God's covenant agent that brought God's covenant lawsuits in Old Covenant Israel.²² Any attempt to derive a modern system of charity, public or private, from the gleaning law faces this crucial limitation. The gleaning law was not intended to apply out side a farm.

The modern welfare state is a perverse mirror image of the gleaning law. Everything is reversed. The modern welfare state is overwhelmingly urban. It disregards the moral criteria for charity and substitutes bureaucratic-numerical criteria. This has greatly expanded both the political boundaries of charity and the extent of poverty. People get paid by the state for being poor; the free market responds: more poor people. The welfare state now faces bankruptcy: the destruction of

20. The economist looks for a price to establish value. The highest market value is determined by the highest market bid by a potential buyer or long-term leaser.

21. This legal right to inherit the family's land did not extend to the stranger until after the exile (Ezek. 47:22–23). Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 22.

22. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 32.

those dependent on its support.²³

There are few modern applications of the gleaning law, which was a land law. Modern society is not agricultural.²⁴ But there is a theological principle that undergirds gleaning: fallen man is always a gleaner. But redeemed men will progressively escape their dependence on other men's charity as society advances through God's grace.

Conclusion

The gleaning law was part of an overall system of political economy. Many of the details of this political economy were tied to the Promised Land and the sacrificial system of that land. Localism and tribalism were both basic to the application of the gleaning law in Mosaic Israel. Consider localism. The authority of the local land owner to chose who would glean and who would not from among various candidates—the boundary principle of inclusion and exclusion—transferred great responsibility and authority into his hand. This kind of personalized charity is no longer taken seriously by those who legislate politically grounded welfare state policies in the modern world. Such a personalized system of charity transfers too much authority to property owners, in the eyes of the politicians, and not enough to the state and its functionaries.

It is not the principle of localism that changes in the New Testament era; it is only the landed tribalism that changes. When the kingdom of God was transferred to a new nation (Matt. 21:43), meaning the church, the Levitical land laws were abolished. Gleaning therefore no longer applies in the New Covenant era. The jubilee land law was annulled by Jesus through: (1) His ministry's fulfillment of the law (Luke 4:16–27);²⁵ (2) the transfer of the kingdom to the church at Pentecost (Matt. 21:43; Acts 2); and (3) the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.²⁶ Can we learn anything from the gleaning law? I think we can, but these lessons are essentially negative. They show us what should not be done, not what must be done, to avoid God's negative sanctions on us as individuals.

The lessons from gleaning are these: (1) all charity is based legally

23. Ibid., ch. 11:J.

24. Ibid., ch. 11:K.

25. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

26. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>) on the fundamental principle that God owns the earth (Ps. 24:1); (2) a third party has no legal civil claim on any asset that he does not own; (3) charity should not create permanent dependence on the part of the recipient; (4) charity should not subsidize evil; (5) charity should involve hard work except in cases where the recipient is physically incapacitated; (6) charity should not provide living standards that are higher than the poorest workers in society are able to earn.

The fundamental principle learned from the gleaning laws is this: charity in a biblical social order must not be based on the idea that the state is a legitimate institution of salvation. The state is not a biblically legitimate agency of social healing. It is an agency of public vengeance (Rom. 13:1–7).²⁷ It possesses a lawful monopoly of violence. It therefore cannot be entrusted with the authority to take the wealth of successful people in order to reward the poor. If it is allowed to do this, its agents become the primary beneficiaries of the confiscated wealth. Its political and bureaucratic agents will gain power over both the poor and the economically successful. These agents will become permanent spokesmen for the official beneficiaries of the wealth, namely, the poor. They will have no incentive to elevate poor people as a class permanently out of poverty. A system of legal entitlements for the poor becomes a system of legal entitlements to full-time jobs for those who administer the system. This is the antithesis of the gleaning system of the Mosaic covenant. In that system, participants had an economic incentive to get the poor back to work: the land owners, the piece-rate harvesters, and the poor themselves.

It is clear what God expects from all property owners: a willingness to forego maximum personal returns. They are to “leave something on the table” for the other party in any transaction between righteous people. Non-owners—the righteous poor—have a moral claim, though not a legal claim, on the output of the owners. Property owners serve as stewards of God, the original Owner. God provides the raw materials and the social order which provide wealth. In this sense, every owner is a “free rider” in the economic system, i.e., a person who has not paid for all of the services rendered to him. Grace precedes law. Man is always in debt to God. Every creature is a free rider in the creation. The owner who seeks to maximize output for himself and his family thereby announces his own autonomy: “My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth” (Deut. 8:17b). In a world sustained by God's grace, this is a graceless attitude. It is an efficient way to become disinherited.

27. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2003] 2012), ch. 11.

UNMUZZLING THE WORKING OX

Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn (Deut. 25:4).

The theocentric focus of this law is God as man's employer. God pays man whatever He has promised. The image relates to boundaries: boundaries around the ox's mouth and around the field.

A. Judicial Hermeneutics

This was not a land law or a seed law. Paul's citation of this law indicates that it was a cross-boundary law.¹ That which this verse reveals regarding God's requirements for employing an ox, it also reveals about God's relationship with man in man's covenantal office as an agent of dominion. A man works for God. Paul informs us that God allows a man to enjoy the fruits of his labor as he exercises dominion on behalf of God, whether or not he acknowledges the existence of, or the assignment by, his heavenly employer. What God allows to man, man should allow to his subordinates. This includes his animal subordinates.

1. Protecting an Ox

How a man treats his ox reflects how he treats workers in general. The ox is a symbol of dominion.² It serves man as a working agent. It therefore is entitled to special protection. This is why the penalty for stealing and then either selling or destroying an ox is five-fold restitution (Ex. 22:1).³ For other forms of theft (except sheep), as well as for

1. On the differences among these laws, see Appendix J.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 43:F.

3. Idem.

an ox or sheep found in the thief's possession, it is double restitution (Ex. 22:4).⁴

Man is not a beast. He possesses future-orientation. The ox is not future-oriented. He eats as he works. The farmer who expects an ox to work all day without eating is expecting too much. Even in the case of a hired man, biblical law does not expect him to wait beyond sunset to receive his wages (Deut. 24:15).⁵

Rushdoony adopts this verse as an explanatory model for biblical interpretation.⁶ He does so because Paul cited this passage in two epistles. In each case, Paul extended the narrow focus of this case law to a much broader concern: the payment of Christian workers who were laboring as teachers. In the first example, Paul reminded the Corinthians that He was an apostle. He was in authority over them. He was therefore entitled to financial support.

Am I not an apostle? am I not free? have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord? are not ye my work in the Lord? If I be not an apostle unto others, yet doubtless I am to you: for the seal of mine apostleship are ye in the Lord. Mine answer to them that do examine me is this, Have we not power to eat and to drink? Have we not power to lead about a sister, a wife, as well as other apostles, and as the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas? Or I only and Barnabas, have not we power to forbear working? Who goeth a warfare any time at his own charges? who planteth a vineyard, and eateth not of the fruit thereof? or who feedeth a flock, and eateth not of the milk of the flock? Say I these things as a man? or saith not the law the same also? For it is written in the law of Moses, Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn. Doth God take care for oxen? Or saith he it altogether for our sakes? For our sakes, no doubt, this is written: that he that ploweth should plow in hope; and that he that thresheth in hope should be partaker of his hope (I Cor. 9:1–10).

The field to be plowed in this case was the world. Paul was harvesting men. The Corinthians were part of his work of harvesting. Why were they resisting paying him? As surely as an ox was entitled to eat while he worked for another, so was Paul entitled to be paid as he worked on behalf of the Corinthians.⁷

4. Idem.

5. Chapter 61.

6. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 11, 506.

7. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 11.

In the second example, Paul defended the right of church rulers to a double portion. "Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour, especially they who labour in the word and doctrine. For the scripture saith, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn. And, The labourer is worthy of his reward" (I Tim. 5:17–18). Double honor in this context meant double payment, i.e., payment higher than what a comparably skilled workman would receive. The elder who devotes all of his time to serving the church should be well-compensated by the members.⁸

What was the biblical origin of the concept of double payment? It has to be the firstborn son's double inheritance (Deut. 21:15–17).⁹ A church elder is to be treated as a firstborn son. He performs double service; he should receive double honor and double payment.

2. From Minimal to Maximal Application

The law governing oxen is a Mosaic case law. These case laws are stated in a narrow context, but they are to be applied more broadly, as Paul's examples indicate. Rushdoony describes this case-law's hermeneutic: "These specific cases are often illustrations of the extent of the application of the law; that is, by citing a minimal type of case, the necessary jurisdictions are revealed. To prevent us from having any excuse for failing to understand and utilize this concept [of case law], the Bible gives us its own interpretation of such a law, and this illustration, being given by St. Paul, makes clear the New Testament undergirding of the law."¹⁰ Rushdoony uses Paul's application of this case law as a hermeneutical model which has been validated in the New Covenant.

Rushdoony classified the ox law as an application of the commandment against theft. "If it is a sin to defraud an ox of his livelihood, then it is also a sin to defraud a man of his wages; it is theft in both cases. If theft is God's classification of an offense against an animal, how much more so an offense against God's apostle and minister?"¹¹ Rushdoony used to say, "Americans want their religion, but they want it cheap." He regarded such an attitude as a violation of this case law.

The case laws apply the Ten Commandments in real-world situations. "Without case law, God's law would soon be reduced to an ex-

8. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 7.

9. Chapter 50.

10. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 11.

11. Ibid., p. 12.

tremely limited area of meaning. This, of course, is precisely what has happened. Those who deny the present validity of the law apart from the Ten Commandments have as a consequence a very limited definition of theft. Their definition usually follows the civil law of their own country, is humanistic, and is not radically different from the definitions given by Moslems, Buddhists, and humanists.”¹²

3. From Minimal Application to Zero Application

The hermeneutic that is typically used by Christian Bible commentators and expositors is this: “If a Mosaic law is not reaffirmed in the New Covenant, it is no longer binding.” In other words, a Mosaic law is guilty until proven innocent. This judicial presupposition raises the problem of bestiality, which is prohibited by the Mosaic law but is not mentioned in the New Covenant. If the person committing the act is not married, the “New Testament only” Christian faces a very difficult problem: On what judicial basis should the act be prohibited by the state? It was prohibited under the Mosaic covenant. Why not today? Furthermore, what is the appropriate civil penalty? It was execution under the Mosaic law (Lev. 20:15–16). Modern commentators handle this judicial problem by not considering it.¹³

An example of this hostility toward the Mosaic case laws is Dan G. McCartney’s essay in the Westminster Theological Seminary symposium, Theonomy: A Reformed Critique (1990). He is a professor at the Gordon-Conwell Divinity School. He forthrightly rejects all of the Mosaic case laws, thereby removing the covenantal status of civil government. “Therefore, the New Testament’s approach to the Old Testament is not an attempt to readapt or contemporize case law, in the way the Rabbis did. The law, or rather the Old Testament as an entirety, is focused on Christ, and through him it becomes applicable to believers. Thus case law is not directly applicable, even to believers; it is applicable only as a working out of God’s moral principles, an expression of God’s character revealed in Christ.”¹⁴ That is to say—and

12. Idem.

13. I have raised this issue before. Gary North, 75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won’t Ask (Tyler, Texas: Spurgeon Press, 1984), Q. 26. (<http://bit.ly/gn75bible>) Gary North, Westminster’s Confession: The Abandonment of Van Til’s Legacy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991), pp. 211–14. (<http://bit.ly/gnwestcon>) I have yet to see any critic of theonomy deal in print with this problem.

14. McCartney, “The New Testament Use of the Pentateuch: Implications for the Theonomic Movement,” in Theonomy: A Reformed Critique, eds. William S. Barker and Robert W. Godfrey (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan Academic, 1990), p. 146.

he says it—there is no binding authority of either the Mosaic case laws or their mandated civil sanctions. “Where legal questions arise, he [Jesus] is concerned with the law’s internal application, not its external enforcement.”¹⁵ “As we have noted, the New Testament gives no indication of the law’s sanctions as applicable to any except Christ and, through him, his people. . . . There may indeed be punishment for people within the church (2Co 10:6), but this does not involve civil authority or those outside the church (1Co 5:12), and its only form is various degrees of removal from fellowship (being ‘cut off’ from the people).”¹⁶ This is the theology of pietism: removing all biblical sanctions from the civil law.¹⁷ This in principle leaves Christians at the mercy of the non-Christians who write the civil laws and enforce them. The pietist prefers man’s civil law to God’s civil law. So does the covenant-breaker. *This agreement has become the basis of an implicit operating civil alliance between Christian pietists and covenant-breakers.*¹⁸ Only as the covenant-breakers extend the civil law’s jurisdiction to encompass, control, and then immobilize the church do the pietists protest. “That’s not fair! You guys promised to be neutral.”¹⁹ To which the covenant-breaker responds: “We are completely neutral in the area of religion. Our interpretation of neutrality says that the God of the Bible has no public authority in society. You are saying that God is relevant to some aspects of society, such as the church, or the family, or education, and that you have the right to impose economic or other sanctions in these areas. You discriminate against others who say that the God of the Bible may not lawfully be invoked as the basis of public decision-making. Understand, in our view, everything is public. Nothing is outside the realm of civil law.”²⁰ So, you are not being neutral as we define it. You are trying to legislate morality when you create zones of exclusivism in which your economic or membership sanctions apply. We will no longer allow you to be unneutral.”

Step by step, Christians surrender the doctrine of God’s authority in history. Step by step, their enemies push them into Christian ghettos. But ghettos are never permanent. Eventually, like the Jewish ghettos of northern Europe and Soviet Asia, the residents will be removed from these ghettos and sent into different ghettos: concentration

15. Ibid., p. 143.

16. Ibid., p. 147.

17. See Appendix I.

18. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 1:A.

19. See Appendix H: “Week Reed: The Politics of Compromise.”

20. Secular humanists do insist on one safety zone: sexual activity.

camps. They may not be called concentration camps. They may be called re-education camps. They may be called government schools.²¹ But life in the ghetto is always at the discretion of those who make the laws and enforce them. There is no neutrality. There is no immunity. Two kingdoms are at war. They cannot both be triumphant in history. Any alliance between the two kingdoms is temporary. One will eventually gain power over the other.

B. Wiser Than God

The vast majority of Christians have always believed that they can improve on the Mosaic law. On their own authority, they revise God's law by coming to conclusions in the name of God that deny the specific teachings of God's revealed law. Then they proclaim their annulment-through-interpretation as being in conformity with "the true spirit of God's law" or "the underlying principles of God's law." As part of this improvement, they reject the binding authority of God's law. In doing so, they necessarily become advocates of some system of law proposed by one or another group of covenant-breakers. They refuse to ask themselves the obvious question: "If not God's law, then what?" In short, "By what other standard?"²²

As an example, consider the assertion of Rev. John Gladwin, a defender of central planning, who later became a bishop in the Anglican Church and one of its leading social theologians. He became a member of the House of Lords in 1999.²³ In a chapter in a book devoted to Christian economics, he rejected the concept of the Bible as a source of authoritative economic guidelines or blueprints. In fact, he assured us, it is unbiblical to search for biblical guidelines for economics. "It is unhelpful as well as unbiblical to look to the Bible to give us a blueprint of economic theory or structure which we then apply to our contemporary life. We must rather work in a theological way, looking to the Bible to give us experience and insight into the kingdom of God in Jesus Christ. This then helps us discover values and methods of interpretation which we can use in understanding our present social experience."²⁴ Furthermore, "There is in Scripture no blueprint of the ideal 21. William F. Rickenbacker (ed.), The Twelve-Year Sentence: Radical Views of Compulsory Schooling (San Francisco: Fox & Wilkes, [1974] 1998).

22. Greg L. Bahnsen, No Other Standard: Theonomy and Its Critics (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991). (<http://bit.ly/gbnos>)

23. <http://bit.ly/GladwinWiki>

24. John Gladwin, "A Centralist Response," in Robert G. Clouse (ed.), Wealth and state or the ideal economy. We cannot turn to chapters of the Bible and find in them a model to copy or a plan for building the ideal biblical state and national economy."²⁵ He contrasted biblical law unfavorably with theology. He then goes on to praise the welfare state as an application of theological, rather than legal, insights.²⁶ Theology informs us that "there is no escape from the need for large-scale state activity if our society is to move into a more equitable future at social and economic levels."²⁷ Clearly, neither the Mosaic law nor the New Testament teaches this concept of economics, but theology supposedly does. Whose theology? Reinhold Niebuhr's, in his post-Marxist phase.²⁸

So, we are assured, there are no authoritative economic guidelines or economic blueprints in the Bible. On the other hand, there are numerous vague and non-specific ethical principles which just about any Christian social theorist can invoke when promoting his recommended reconstruction of society. All it requires to baptize socialism is a series of nice-sounding pat phrases taken from the book of theological liberalism, which Gladwin offers in profusion: "the bounds of Christian principles of human concern," "the righteousness revealed to us in God himself," "the good," "structural frame work of law and social values," "gross and deepening disparities in social experience," "spontaneity of love," "the light of the gospel," and "the most humane principles of social order."²⁹

Let's you imagine that Gladwin was an aberration, consider the fact that the two other anti-free market essayists in the book adopted the same anti-blueprint hermeneutic. William Diehl, a defender of academic Keynesianism's state-guided economy, confidently affirmed: "The fact that our Scriptures can be used to support or condemn any economic philosophy suggests that the Bible is not intended to lay out an economic plan which will apply for all times and places. If we are to

Poverty: Four Christian Views of Economics (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1984), p. 124. (<http://bit.ly/ClouseWAP>)

25. Gladwin, "Centralist Economics," ibid., p. 183.

26. Gladwin, "Centralist Response," ibid., pp. 125–26

27. Gladwin, "Centralist Economics," ibid., p. 193.

28. Ibid., p. 197. He cites Moral Man and Immoral Society (1932). It is an odd book to cite. It was written by the author in reaction against his youthful fling with Marxism, a book in which he proclaimed that Jesus "did not dwell upon the social consequences of these moral actions, because he viewed them from an inner and a transcendent perspective." Reinhold Niebuhr, Moral Man and Immoral Society (New York: Scribner's, [1932] 1960), p. 264.

29. See my critique in Wealth and Poverty, p. 200.

examine economic structures in the light of Christian teachings, we will have to do it in another way.”³⁰ Art Gish, a defender of small communities of Christians who hold property in common, informed us that “Since koinonia includes the participation of every one involved, there is no blueprint for what this would look like on a global scale. . . . We are talking about a process, not final answers.”³¹

The fact that these statements appear in a book on Christian economics should come as no surprise. These comments are typical of the opinions of humanist-educated Christian intellectuals. Christians who have spent their lives in humanist educational institutions, and who then have fed their minds on a diet of humanist publications, in most cases have adopted the worldview of one or another variety of humanism. They have felt emotionally compelled to baptize their adopted worldview with a few religious-sounding phrases. But just because someone keeps repeating “koinonia, koinonia” as a Christian mantra does not in any way prove that his recommended policies of common ownership will actually produce koinonia. What produces peace, harmony, and increasing per capita output is widespread faithfulness to God’s law.

Understand, I am not suggesting that voluntary common ownership is anti-Christian, any more than I am saying that voluntary celibacy is anti-Christian. Paul recommended celibacy (I Cor. 7:32–33). He did so, he said, because of “the present distress” (v. 26).³² Similarly, the Jerusalem church held property in common (Acts 2:44; 4:32). Shortly thereafter, a great persecution of the church began. The entire church fled the city, except for the apostles (Acts 8:1). This exodus created the first foreign missions program in church history: “Therefore they that were scattered abroad went every where preaching the word” (Acts 8:4). The fact that they had sold their property enabled them to leave the city without looking back, as Lot’s wife had looked back. So, for temporary purposes in times of great trial, voluntary celibacy and voluntary common ownership are legitimate, even wise. But to make either practice a recommended institutional model for all times and places is a misuse of historical events. The one institution where common ownership has been productive for longer than one generation is the monastery. However, it takes celibacy to make this system work for longer than a few years. As soon as there is a wife saying, "He's earning as much as you are, but you're far more productive," koinonia ends. In the modern state of Israel, the kibbutz collective farms faded rapidly as important sources of national production.

30. William Diehl, “The Guided-Market System,” ibid., p. 87.

31. Art Gish, “Decentralist Economics,” ibid., p. 154.

32. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 9.

It is unwise to attempt to become wiser than God. "Because the foolishness of God is wiser than men; and the weakness of God is stronger than men" (I Cor. 1:25).³³ This is why it is our job to become familiar with God's Bible-revealed law. It, not the latest academic fad, is to be our guide, generation after generation. David made this clear in Psalm 119.

Blessed are the undefiled in the way, who walk in the law of the LORD (v. 1).

Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law (v. 18).

So shall I keep thy law continually for ever and ever (v. 44).

Let thy tender mercies come unto me, that I may live: for thy law is my delight (v. 77).

O how love I thy law! it is my meditation all the day (v. 97).

My soul is continually in my hand: yet do I not forget thy law (v. 109).

I hate vain thoughts: but thy law do I love (v. 113).

It is time for thee, LORD, to work: for they have made void thy law (v. 126).

Great peace have they which love thy law: and nothing shall offend them (v. 165).

I have longed for thy salvation, O LORD; and thy law is my delight (v. 174).

Despite generations of Christians who have said that they believe in the Bible, word for word, they have not believed in the 119th psalm, the longest chapter in the Bible. This is David's praise of God's Bible-revealed law. They have spent their lives avoiding its plain teaching. The 119th psalm is a witness against the church. Nowhere is this clearer than in the academic field of economics, the original social science, which was self-consciously structured by its founders in terms of theo-

33. Ibid., ch. 1.

logical agnosticism.³⁴

C. Still in Force

The law against muzzling an ox is repeated twice in the New Testament, in the context of paying church officers. The person who defends a view of God's law that mandates a New Covenant recapitulation in order for a Mosaic law to be valid can hardly dismiss this case law. What he does dismiss as unproven is Rushdoony's insistence that this case law is a model for the others, i.e., that the Mosaic case laws have continuing validity in the New Covenant era unless annulled by the New Testament.

1. Hermeneutics (Interpretation)

Paul's application of this law provides commentators with an example of biblical casuistry: applying a biblical law to specific cases. The pietist prefers to operate on the assumption that unless a New Testament author applies a case law, the case law is no longer valid in the New Covenant. But Jesus' language does not validate this assumption: "Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled" (Matt. 5:17–18). The continuity of God's law is Jesus' hermeneutical presupposition. It is therefore the responsibility of the commentator to provide reasons for the annulment of a particular case law. He may not legitimately assume away judicial continuity. Yet commentators write as though it is somehow the burden of the defender of the case laws to prove each case law's continuing authority.

Beginning with Tools of Dominion, I have begun the discussion of each case law with a consideration of its theocentric focus. If we begin with God and His relationships with mankind, we are on more solid ground exegetically than if we begin with man, his desires, and needs. The Bible begins with "In the beginning God. . . ." not "In the beginning man. . . ." While it is possible to misconceive the theocentric focus of a law, it is also possible to misconceive the anthropocentric focus of a law. It is safer to begin with God, in whose image man is made, than to begin with man, who is continually tempted to see God as

34. William Letwin, The Origins of Scientific Economics (Cambridge, Massachusetts: M.I.T. Press, 1963).

made in man's image.³⁵

Because of the debate over hermeneutics, the debate over this case law raises several issues. First, must this law be applied literally? If the farmer feeds the animal a diet designed by scientists, should he still obey this law? Maybe the ox likes to eat corn on the cob, plus the cob, but isn't a scientifically designed diet better for him nutritionally? Second, to what extent is Paul's invocation of this law a model for all other Mosaic case laws? Is Paul's wider application of this case law to the affairs of men a model for other case laws? How can we know when we have extended the application of a law too broadly?

2. Literalism

In modern industrial nations, only Amish and Hutterite farmers use animals to do their plowing. The legal issue of muzzling the ox never arises in the context of mechanized agriculture. But Christian missionaries work with farmers who still use oxen. What should they tell these farmers? Should the farmers muzzle their oxen or not?

The ox should be paid as he works in the field as surely as the pastor should be paid for his labor. If the farmer wants to feed his animal before taking it into the field, that is legitimate. Perhaps then the animal will not eat so much in the field. What is not legitimate is forcing it to work while wearing a muzzle. The animal is used to eating throughout the day. The farmer is not to force new eating habits on a work animal. If he can train the animal without using compulsion to eat at scheduled times, this is not a violation of this law. What is convenient for the farmer may become convenient for the animal. This is for the animal to decide. In any case, the animal should not be muzzled while it is working in the field.

3. How Much More!

If this case law applies to oxen, then how much more does it apply to men! Another case law tells us that employers should pay their workers at the end of the day (Deut. 24:15).³⁶ This enables us to begin to apply this law in human affairs. But this is only the beginning. Paul

35. Ludwig Feuerbach is a classic example of this form of theological anthropocentrism. See his book, The Essence of Christianity (1841). Cf. Gary North, Marx's Religion of Revolution: Regeneration Through Chaos (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1968] 1989), pp. 28–30. (<http://bit.ly/gnmrror>) said that the muzzled ox law also governs the payments that churches owe to ministers. In other words, if it applies to day laborers, how much more to laborers in the word of God!

36. Chapter 61.

How do we know when we have extended a case law application too far? First, when we find another case law that places limits on us. Men are to be paid daily, by the end of the working day. So, they need not be paid hourly. Also, this law implies a lunch break. Men work with their hands, unlike an ox. They use their hands to feed themselves. So, they may not be able to work and eat at the same time. But if a man has food in his pocket and munches as he works, this is legitimate unless eating raises risks for others or himself. This law implies that he can lawfully eat a handful of uncooked corn from the stalks of the field. This is affirmed by another case law (Deut. 23:24–25).³⁷ These two laws also imply that he may eat the fruit of the tree or vine as he works.

The Bible comments on the Bible. The commentator must search the case laws to see if one modifies another. Searching the Bible for authoritative insights into the interpretation of any passage is the commentator's task in every area of exegesis, not just the case laws. The a fortiori (how much more) argument is used by New Testament writers to deal with subjects other than the Mosaic law.³⁸

D. God's Law: Formally Universalized by Christ

Paul cited this law in two letters: one to Timothy and the other to the church at Corinth. The recipients were gentiles. Questions:

Why did Paul think his audience would recognize this obscure Deuteronomic law?

If this Mosaic case law is not to apply to the New Covenant, why did Paul cite it?

What authority does this law have over gentiles?

If it was a land law, then why does it apply outside the Promised Land?

37. Chapter 59.

38. See, for example, Paul's discussion of the casting off of Israel and the resulting blessings to the gentiles, which he contrasts with the blessings the gentiles can expect when Israel is grafted back into the olive tree of faith (Rom. 11:12–15). John Murray, The Epistle to the Romans, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1965), II, pp. 77–84; cf. North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2003] 2012), ch. 8.

If a Mosaic case law is not to be broadened to apply to human relationships, then why did Paul apply it to pastoral financial support?

Antinomian critics of the Mosaic law have always had major problems with Paul's invocation of this law. They can hardly argue that this law possesses no authority today, but they also cannot readily explain why Paul cited it—at least not without calling into question their antinomian hermeneutic. Paul cited this law as judicially authoritative. He did not justify the law against muzzling oxen by invoking a previously unknown New Testament law to support pastors. On the contrary, he justified the New Testament's requirement for laymen to support pastors by invoking this Mosaic law.

Paul did not suggest that this law was a temporary historical intrusion in the development of salvation history. On the contrary, he explained the New Testament's requirement of pastoral support as an extension of this Mosaic law. Far from being a temporary intrusion³⁹ or judicial discontinuity in God's redemptive covenantal history, the law of the unmuzzled ox was an aspect of the continuity of God's Bible-revealed law in God's redemptive covenantal history: a covenantal stepping stone in the extension of this law's formal jurisdiction over the whole world. Today, unlike in Moses' day, the ascension of Jesus Christ has taken place, and God has sent the Holy Spirit. The law regarding muzzled oxen has been formally universalized by Paul, and men are now Spiritually empowered to obey it.

This law is a cross-boundary law. It has crossed the borders of Old Covenant Israel—a geographical border (e.g., Corinth) and the covenantal border (New Covenant). What repels antinomian commentators is the theonomists' suggestion that there are many cross-boundary laws in the Mosaic law. They resist admitting the existence of even one such Mosaic case law. But this law will not go away.

This law has always applied to gentiles, even before Moses. They should never have muzzled their oxen. They should not have refused to pay a laborer his wages. Paul asked the Corinthians: "Doth God take care for oxen? Or saith he it altogether for our sakes?" (I Cor. 9:9b–10b). He answered his own question: "For our sakes, no doubt, this is written: that he that ploweth should plow in hope; and that he that thresheth in hope should be partaker of his hope" (10b). This was equally true under the Old Covenant, even before Moses.

39. The term is Meredith G. Kline's, which he applied to the entire Mosaic covenant. Kline, "Intrusion and Decalogue," Westminster Theological Journal, XVI (1953/54); Kline, The Structure of Biblical Authority, rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1972), pp. 154–71.

Through Christ's New Covenant, the cross-boundary laws of the Mosaic covenant have been extended officially to the gentile world. As surely as Jonah brought a covenant lawsuit against Nineveh, so did the early church bring one against Old Covenant Israel and Rome. The church invokes God's law. Every covenant lawsuit rests on a system of law. The church is not supposed to invoke natural law, meaning a law-order common to all men., i.e., the work of the law written on all men's hearts (Rom. 2:14–15).⁴⁰ If it lawfully invoked only natural law, which rests the authority of fallen man's reason, then there would be nothing uniquely biblical about the church's covenant lawsuit. The lawsuit would merely be one more humanist appeal to covenant-breaking man to change his evil ways. In contrast, God's covenant lawsuit must always invoke God's Bible-revealed law—not the Mosaic land laws, seed laws, and priestly laws, but its cross-boundary laws. A church that had to adhere to natural law only would be like a Mosaic Israel that adhered only to natural law. But God required that the entire revelationally revealed law be read to the assembled nation once every seven years (Deut. 31:10–12).⁴¹

Conclusion

This case law governs men's treatment of their working oxen. It also governs churches' treatment of their ministers. In between these two applications of this law lies the general area of employers' relations with their employees. The governing hermeneutical principle here is this: "If this law governs men's relationships with subordinate animals, how much more does it govern their relationships with subordinate men." There is nothing in this case law to indicate that it had something to do with either a Mosaic seed law or a land law. Paul's extension of this law to the payment of full-time church workers indicates that it was a cross-boundary law. It applied outside the land of Israel in Moses' day, and it still applies today.

40. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 4.

41. Chapter 75.

LEVIRATE MARRIAGE AND FAMILY NAME

If brethren dwell together, and one of them die, and have no child, the wife of the dead shall not marry without unto a stranger: her husband's brother shall go in unto her, and take her to him to wife, and perform the duty of an husband's brother unto her. And it shall be, that the firstborn which she beareth shall succeed in the name of his brother which is dead, that his name be not put out of Israel (Deut. 25:5–6).

The theocentric focus of this law is God's protection of His own name. This aspect of this law is closely associated with the third commandment: "Thou shalt not take the name of the LORD thy God in vain; for the LORD will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain" (Ex. 20:7).¹ God places a boundary around His name.

A. Major Problems for Bible Commentators

This law was a seed law.² The preservation of a man's name is clearly stated here to be the reason for this law. So, the theocentric focus of this law is inheritance. But how? The preservation of God's name in history is not dependent on His biological issue. God is beyond the creation and history. Yet we know that every Old Covenant law had something to do with God's relationship to man.

What was the relationship in this case? It could not have anything to do with God's desire for biological heirs. God is not Zeus. This fact should warn us: this law had to do with covenantal inheritance, not biological inheritance. The dead brother had not produced an heir.

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012). Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 23.

2. On seed laws, see Appendix J.

This meant that his name would be put out of Israel unless his brother intervened biologically. Why was this necessary? As we shall see later in this chapter, this law had to do with adoption and the transfer of inheritance. This was its theocentric focus. This law had a great deal to do with the family, but the family considered as a covenantal institution rather than biological.

The Latin legal term, levir, refers to the brother of a husband. This Latin word has long been applied to the relationship described in this text. A brother was required to bond sexually with his sister-in-law under two limiting conditions: the two brothers had lived together, and a married brother had died without leaving an heir. The first limiting condition has not always been recognized by expositors. If the brothers did not dwell together, this case law was not applicable.

Commentators have trouble with this law, so different is it from today's practices. They rarely have disciplined themselves to think covenantally, so they have trouble identifying the central focus of a law that seems so different culturally. The author of the section on "Levirate" in the M'Clintock & Strong encyclopedia, a conservative late-nineteenth-century work, insisted that "A wise and just legislator could scarcely have been inclined to patronize any such law. . . ." ³ In writing this, the author revealed his own patronizing attitude toward God's law—an attitude common to most Christian expositors.

Many things that we would like to know about the application of this unique Mosaic office are not available in the text. We must surmise a great deal. For example, the text does not say that the levir had to be unmarried in order to marry the widow. Polygamy existed lawfully under the Old Covenant. On the one hand, this law was a positive ethical command; no exception based on polygamy appears in the text. On the other hand, if there was no exception based on the levir's status as a married man, then this law mandated polygamy in a unique situation. Is this likely?

We know that this law superseded the law forbidding a man to marry his deceased brother's wife (Lev. 18:6, 16). The penalty for such a union was childlessness (Lev. 20:21), implying God's personal intervention, but this law was given specifically so that there might be a child. There can be no doubt that this law superseded the law prohibiting a brother from marrying his dead brother's wife. It is possible that this law mandated polygamy in a unique situation. Yet this seems contrary to our understanding of God's standards for marriage. Because the text does not mention polygamy, the commentator must look for hints in the passage that may offer clues to an answer—hints that are not apparent on the first or second reading.⁴

3. John M'Clintock and James Strong (eds.), Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature, 12 vols. (New York: Harper & Bros., 1894), V, p. 389.

B. Seed and Name

Let us begin with God. Israel was God's son (Ex. 4:22). This meant that Israel bore God's name. The preservation of a man's name in Israel had something to do with the preservation of God's name in history. But what? God was not dependent on Israel to preserve His name, yet Israel's survival was important for God's reputation. After the exodus generation's attempt to stone Joshua and Caleb for having told them that God would give them victory over the Canaanites, God threatened to destroy Israel and raise up a new nation for Moses to lead. Moses reminded Him that His reputation was at stake: His promises to Israel. The issue was disinheritance: "I will smite them with the pestilence, and disinherit them, and will make of thee a greater nation and mightier than they" (Num. 14:12). Moses appealed to God's reputation, not Israel's legal claim: "Now if thou shalt kill all this people as one man, then the nations which have heard the fame of thee will speak, saying, Because the LORD was not able to bring this people into the land which he swore unto them, therefore he hath slain them in the wilderness" (vv. 15–16). God heeded Moses' argument. The decisive issue was God's reputation, not Israel's biological survival as a nation or son.

In contrast, Israel, not being God, was dependent on seed. The future of Israel was tied to God's promise to Abraham to preserve his seed. Paul wrote: "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ" (Gal. 3:16). Again, it was God's promise to Israel that was crucial to Israel, not God's dependence on Israel. To fulfill this promise, God had to provide inter-generational continuity, i.e., an inheritance down through the generations of Israel. So, to this extent, God's reputation was dependent on Israel's survival.

This raises the old theological problem of conditional vs. unconditional promises. If the promise was unconditional, then God had to see to it that Israel survived. If it was conditional, then He had the option of cutting off the nation if it rebelled. The resolution of this seeming antinomy is found in the doctrines of predestination and imputation. First, predestination: God made a promise to Abraham. To this promise were attached conditions, such as circumcision. Ultimately, all conditions were met by Christ. God predestined their complete fulfillment. Second, imputation: God imputed Christ's future righteousness to Israel by grace. The future advent of the promised Seed in history was therefore the basis of Israel's survival.⁵

4. See below: section F.

This places the promised Seed at the center of the life of Israel. This Seed would come through Judah (Gen. 49:10). Thus, the separation of the tribes and their continuity through time was basic to God's covenant with Israel. It was in this context that the levirate marriage law operated. It had to do with the preservation of a man's name. The deceased brother was part of a family. This family was part of a tribe. Tribal life in Old Covenant Israel was basic to the survival of the nation, not because of some inherent benefit of tribalism, but because of God's promise to Abraham regarding the coming Seed. This same promise of seed had been made to Adam (Gen. 3:15), but there was no element of nationalism or tribalism in this promise. There was a fundamental element of nationalism in God's promise to Abraham. There was a fundamental element of tribalism in Jacob's promise regarding Shiloh—an extension of the Abrahamic promise. So, the seed laws applied inside the boundaries of Israel, but not beyond. The Adamic promise of seed applied to the world outside Israel's borders. The same Seed—Jesus Christ—was the focus of all three promises (Gal. 3), but their fulfillment was achieved differently.

C. The Kinsman Redeemer

The Mosaic seed laws were inheritance laws. The levirate marriage law also regulated inheritance. The firstborn son⁶ would inherit the dead man's name. Why did this inheritance of a name matter so much in Israelite society? Because the preservation of a man's name meant that he had an inheritance in Israel's future. He was heir to the promises that God had given to Abraham and Moses. The preservation of a man's name was in this sense eschatological. It had to do with Jacob's promise to Judah: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a law-giver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be" (Gen. 49:10). An Israelite male was sup-

5. Chapter 13:B.

6. Or daughter, if he had no son.

posed to look forward to this messianic day of the Lord. Through his firstborn, he participated in Israel's eschatology. The Israelites' family name system was future-oriented. The firstborn seed was basic to a family's future, just as the promised messianic Seed was basic to Israel's future. Both forms of covenantal seed were linked eschatologically by Jacob's prophecy regarding Shiloh.

The brother who had enjoyed the use of the family's landed inheritance had a legal obligation: to marry his dead brother's wife and bring the brother's heir into the world. This law is clear: the two brothers had to have been living in close proximity. Their lives in this sense had to be intertwined. This close geographical proximity had made each brother the kinsman redeemer/blood avenger (go'el) of the other. If one of them had been killed by another man where there was no witness, the survivor had the responsibility of pursuing the perpetrator (Num. 35:19, 27).⁷ The nearest of kin judicially was the nearest of kin geographically. He would have been the person who had the greatest likelihood of overtaking the suspect on the highway as the latter raced toward a city of refuge. A brother who resided elsewhere was not the blood avenger.

The masculine relative who was the nearest of kin geographically was the kinsman redeemer. One of the responsibilities of the kinsman redeemer was to serve as the levir. He was required by the Mosaic law to redeem the name of his childless dead brother. This is what Onan refused to do for his dead brother, Er (Gen 38:9). God killed him for this sin (v. 10). Onan had enjoyed the fruits of his inheritance, which included citizenship and a name, but he was unwilling to accept the obligation associated with this inheritance, which was associated with the seed, i.e., the family's future.⁸ One branch of the family had been cut off biologically. This threatened the name of the whole family. No branch was to be cut off in this way when two brothers lived together.

D. A Matter of Inheritance

The laws governing inheritance were generally patriarchal, though

7. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 21.

8. The traditional interpretation of this verse by Roman Catholics insists that Onan's sin was not his refusal to consummate the marriage as such, but rather his enjoyment of sex without coitus. Onanism is the Church's euphemism for either masturbation or coitus interruptus. This interpretation of the passage is incorrect. God slew him because he had gone into Tamar and ritually defiled her, her husband's name, and his levirate obligation.

not exclusively. “And thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel, saying, If a man die, and have no son, then ye shall cause his inheritance to pass unto his daughter. And if he have no daughter, then ye shall give his inheritance unto his brethren. And if he have no brethren, then ye shall give his inheritance unto his father’s brethren. And if his father have no brethren, then ye shall give his inheritance unto his kinsman that is next to him of his family, and he shall possess it: and it shall be unto the children of Israel a statute of judgment, as the LORD commanded Moses” (Num. 27:8–11). A man’s land went to his male heirs at his death.⁹ If he had no male heirs, it went to his daughters (Num. 27:8).¹⁰ If he had no son or daughter, it went to his closest male relatives (Num. 27:9).

This information helps us to identify who the kinsman redeemer/blood avenger was in Mosaic Israel. There is no law that expressly says that the geographically closest adult male (though not a father) to the inheritance was a man’s kinsman redeemer, but the structure of biblical authority implies that this was the case. Biblically, the link between judicial responsibility and economic benefits is strong.¹¹ I conclude that the geographically adjacent relative who would inherit a childless man’s legacy was the first eligible man to marry his childless widow. He was the kinsman redeemer.

The Book of Ruth is the story of the levirate marriage in action. In the case of Ruth, no surviving brother had lived alongside her late husband. So, she had no levirate claim on her husband’s kinsman redeemer, who would have been a cousin back in Israel. When Naomi returned to Israel, she had legal standing as the widow of an Israelite. Boaz voluntarily agreed to marry Ruth if the nearest of kin to Elimelech refused.

The Bible’s account is important for our understanding of the Mosaic economics of inheritance. The negotiation between Boaz and Naomi’s kinsman redeemer began with a discussion of land, not marriage. Because Naomi had no surviving heirs, her husband’s nearest kinsman

9. North, Sanctions and Dominion, ch. 15.

10. Ibid., ch. 22.

11. “And that servant, which knew his lord’s will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more” (Luke 12:47–48). Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

was eligible to inherit her land. But since she was still alive, he would have to pay her for the use of the land until her death. He would pay a lease until her death, and then it would be his. He understood this. What he did not know was that there was a further requirement: marriage to Ruth, who could yet raise up seed in the name of Naomi's dead husband, Elimelech.

Then went Boaz up to the gate, and sat him down there: and, behold, the kinsman of whom Boaz spake came by; unto whom he said, Ho, such a one! turn aside, sit down here. And he turned aside, and sat down. And he took ten men of the elders of the city, and said, Sit ye down here. And they sat down. And he said unto the kinsman, Naomi, that is come again out of the country of Moab, selleth a parcel of land, which was our brother Elimelech's: And I thought to advertise thee, saying, Buy it before the inhabitants, and before the elders of my people. If thou wilt redeem it, redeem it: but if thou wilt not redeem it, then tell me, that I may know: for there is none to redeem it beside thee; and I am after thee. And he said, I will redeem it. Then said Boaz, What day thou buyest the field of the hand of Naomi, thou must buy it also of Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of the dead, to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance. And the kinsman said, I cannot redeem it for myself, lest I mar mine own inheritance: redeem thou my right to thyself; for I cannot redeem it.

Now this was the manner in former time in Israel concerning redeeming and concerning changing, for to confirm all things; a man plucked off his shoe, and gave it to his neighbour: and this was a testimony in Israel. Therefore the kinsman said unto Boaz, Buy it for thee. So he drew off his shoe. And Boaz said unto the elders, and unto all the people, Ye are witnesses this day, that I have bought all that was Elimelech's, and all that was Chilion's and Mahlon's, of the hand of Naomi. Moreover Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of Mahlon, have I purchased to be my wife, to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance, that the name of the dead be not cut off from among his brethren, and from the gate of his place: ye are witnesses this day. And all the people that were in the gate, and the elders, said, We are witnesses. The LORD make the woman that is come into thine house like Rachel and like Leah, which two did build the house of Israel: and do thou worthily in Ephratah, and be famous in Bethlehem: And let thy house be like the house of Pharez, whom Tamar bare unto Judah, of the seed which the LORD shall give thee of this young woman (Ruth 4:1–12).¹²

12. The text mentions Tamar, who had been cheated by Onan of her right to raise up seed in the name of her husband (Gen. 38:9). This is a clear reference to this land

The kinsman wanted to buy Naomi's land; he did not want marriage to her daughter-in-law. He did not have to marry Ruth, however. He had not lived close to Ruth's husband on the family's land. Elimelech's son Mahlon had resided in Moab, far from Israel. Neither Ruth nor Naomi had the right to spit in the man's face. He had the right not to marry Ruth in order to raise up seed in the name of his nephew.

Consider the reason offered by the kinsman for not marrying Ruth. It had to do with his own inheritance. "I cannot redeem it for myself, lest I mar mine own inheritance: redeem thou my right to thyself; for I cannot redeem it." He had hoped to inherit the land of his heirless deceased brother.¹³ His sister-in-law was too old to bear children. He was therefore willing to buy it from Naomi before she died. This would have given her money to live on. The land would have come to him eventually. But Boaz was proposing something else. If Boaz married Ruth, and if Ruth gave birth, then Elimelech's land would pass to the child of Ruth, who would become the family's firstborn son. This land would be part of the legacy of Ruth's dead husband.

Because of Boaz's willingness to become Ruth's husband, the existing kinsman could gain control over Naomi's land only by marrying Ruth. But if she bore him an heir, he could not pass this land to his own children. The land would pass to Ruth's firstborn. Assuming that he was single, and assuming that he married Ruth, the land owned by Elimelech could not become his namesake's land; it would become Elimelech's namesake's land: Ruth's firstborn. His own flesh and blood would inherit this land, but this biological heir would not be his judicial namesake. So powerful was the concept of family name in Israel that the man turned down an opportunity to purchase land that his biological heir would eventually inherit.

For the existing kinsman to lose the inheritance from Elimelech through Naomi, another kinsman had to marry Ruth. Ruth could never possess an inheritance in Israel to leave to her firstborn except through the decision of a kinsman of her late husband to adopt her as a wife. Without Ruth's marriage to a kinsman of Elimelech, the land would automatically pass at Naomi's death to Elimelech's nearest of kin, i.e., Elimelech's kinsman redeemer.

The existing kinsman redeemer had to approve of this transfer, which was why Boaz assembled elders as witnesses. The existing kinsman redeemer could retain his claim on the inheritance only by mar-transaction as an aspect of the levirate marriage law.

13. The brother had fathered two sons, but both had died without children.

rying Ruth and then having Ruth remain barren, as she had been in Moab. If she bore a child who lived long enough to bear children to inherit, the existing kinsman redeemer and his heirs could not inherit this land. He decided that this marriage was not worth the added economic risk. If he married Ruth, and she bore him a child, all of the capital that he would invest into the land would become part of another man's covenant line. It would be his biological child's family line, but not his family name's line. This is evidence that blood lines in Israel were regarded as less important than covenant lines. Family name was more important in Israel than biological generation.

E. Name Above Biology

This is an extremely important theological point. Rahab the former harlot and Ruth the Moabite were adopted into their husband's covenant lines. This adoption was by oath: a marriage oath. Through them came David the king and Jesus, who was a greater king than David. Through two foreign women, the covenant line was extended. More to the point, through these women the supreme covenant line in Israel was extended: Judah's. Most to the point, through them the promised Seed was born (Matt. 1:5, 16). The crucial covenant line was preserved through marriage, and, in Ruth's case, levirate marriage to the biological heir of Rahab: Boaz (Matt. 1:5).

Boaz became the kinsman redeemer of Elimelech's line. He did this by marrying Ruth, a gentile. Only through his marriage to Ruth could he serve as the kinsman redeemer of Elimelech's line. That is, Boaz, as an heir in the line of Judah and, as it turned out, progenitor of Jesus the redeemer, exercised this office by marrying a Moabite. Moabite males took 10 generations to become citizens (Deut. 23:3). As heirs of an incestuous relationship between Lot and his firstborn daughter (Gen. 19:37), Moabites were regarded as far more perverse covenantally than Egyptians, who could become citizens in three generations (Deut. 23:7–8). But because of Boaz's judicial role as kinsman redeemer through marriage, Ruth was adopted into the covenant line in just one generation. Of all legal relationships biblically, adoption is the most authoritative. Through adoption, the disinherited children of Adam re-enter the family of God. Adoption is the judicial basis of inheritance. Adoption is by covenant oath, not biology.

Ruth, a gentile, was adopted into Israel's supreme covenant line by the willingness of a man to become a kinsman redeemer to her late husband. “Moreover Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of Mahlon, have I purchased to be my wife, to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance, that the name of the dead be not cut off from among his brethren, and from the gate of his place: ye are witnesses this day” (Ruth 4:10). By lowering himself socially by marrying a Moabite, and by being willing to raise up seed for his kinsman Elimelech by way of Elimelech’s dead son, Boaz was granted an extraordinary blessing. He became the biological forefather of David and Jesus. Legally, these heirs were not part of his personal covenant line. Only through Elimelech’s name could he participate in the crucial covenant line. Only by being willing to raise up seed on behalf of another did he unknowingly place himself as the key figure in the extension of the key covenant line in Israel and, for that matter, in all of history. Boaz became the biggest covenantal somebody in his generation only because he was willing to become a covenantal nobody in the extension of Elimelech’s line. The land that he presumably bought from Naomi became the family inheritance in another man’s line. Any improvements that he made in this land became another family line’s property. By abandoning his own name covenantally, he thereby became the greatest name of his generation, a name that is listed in both of the messianic genealogies in the New Testament (Matt. 1:5; Luke 3:32).

This case law was a seed law. As a law governing inheritance, it was also a land law. The firstborn of a levirate marital union inherited the deceased father’s name. The text implies that later-born children would not inherit the deceased man’s name.¹⁴ The inheritance was above all covenantal: part of God’s promise to Abraham. The deceased man’s name was imputed to the heir by God and by law, even though he was born of the levir. The imputation of a man’s name was the essence of his inheritance: from his fathers and to his children. God had revealed this to Abraham: “And I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing; And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed” (Gen. 12:2–3).

What the levirate law tells us is that the imputation of a man’s name was more fundamental than either genetic inheritance or family discipline. In the context of the continuing academic debate between “nature” (genetics) and “nurture” (social environment), neither was fundamental in Israel. What was fundamental was judicial imputation. The levir performed a redemptive act on behalf of his brother's covenant line. This act was far more judicial than biological or social. He provided biological seed and family discipline, but the decisive factor was judicial-covenantal-eschatological, not biological or social. It was so decisive that the law prohibiting a brother from marrying his sister-in-law was suspended.

14. The brother would extend his name by means of the other children. If the first-born son died, then his office as name-carrier would have passed to the oldest surviving son.

Because of Boaz's grace to Naomi through Ruth, a unique and judicially unconventional thing took place: Boaz replaced Elimelech in Israelite history as part of the covenant line of David (I Chron. 2:11–12). In terms of the law of the levir, the family line through Ruth was Elimelech's, but Elimelech is never mentioned in relation to David. It was Boaz's marriage to Ruth in the name of Elimelech that secured Boaz's place in history. As the heir of Rahab, his act of mercy grafted Rahab into the kingly line retroactively. Judicially, Boaz's family line is irrelevant to the coming of David. Yet because of his grace shown to a gentile woman, his family name entered the most important family line in man's history. Boaz established his name and his family line's name in history by a merciful covenantal act which, in terms of the Mosaic law, submerged his name to Elimelech's. Boaz, who had not even been the closest of kin to Elimelech's son, and who had in no way been required to serve as levir, replaced Elimelech in Israel's family lists.

Jesus would imitate Boaz's judicial precedent, not by marrying, but by refusing to marry. By refusing to marry, He thereby transferred His inheritance to His kinsmen. He died on their behalf, so that they could be legally adopted into His covenant line.¹⁵ His death and resurrection have offered to the gentiles God's covenantal inheritance by means of adoption, just as Boaz's willingness to marry Ruth offered her covenantal inheritance through adoption. As the heir of Jacob's promise (Gen. 49:10), Jesus was the true heir in Israel, the son of David the king. But Jesus was not Joseph's biological heir. Here we see another act of mercy: Joseph's refusal to put Mary away for fornication with another man. Joseph adopted Jesus as his firstborn son, and in doing so, gained shame for himself: the birth of his firstborn son in fewer than nine months after marriage.

15. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ: According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love: Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will" (Eph. 1:3–5).

As David's namesake and heir, Jesus transferred His kingdom to the church (Matt. 21:43). He extended His kingdom grant, not by holding onto it in history but by relinquishing it. Like Boaz, by relinquishing His covenantal claim in Old Covenant Israel—His name—Jesus secured the inheritance for his kinsmen, thereby also securing His name in history. What Boaz had done on a small scale, Jesus did on a large scale. The judicial heart of what both of them did involved a transfer of inheritance by surrendering the family name. In doing this, Jesus, like Boaz, secured His name in history.

F. The Mosaic Family as a Tribal Unit

The seed laws and land laws existed because of Jacob's granting of blessings in Genesis 49, and specifically, his prophecy regarding the coming ruler, Shiloh.¹⁶ They were tribal laws, not laws governing the family unit as such. Had they been laws governing the family unit as such, they would have been cross-boundary laws, universal in scope then and now. The law of the levirate marriage would still be in force. This law is no longer in force because Jacob's prophecy was fulfilled by Jesus Christ.

Covenantal adoption has completely replaced the law of the levirate marriage in the New Covenant. Jesus established the model. His death, which ensured His lack of biological heirs, was inherent in His plan of adoption and the transfer of kingdom inheritance. Confession of faith has replaced tribal name as the basis of biblical inheritance. Confession of faith involves adopting a new family name. "And the disciples were called Christians first in Antioch" (Acts 11:26b). A man's legal claim to a portion of God's kingdom inheritance is based on his possession of Christ's name as an adopted son. The New Covenant's preservation of Christ's name through adoption by conversion has replaced the Old Covenant's preservation of family name through adop-

16. The practice of levirate marriage existed earlier than Genesis 49. Onan's rebellion indicates that the practice did exist, and it was a law, for God's negative sanction came on him. Without law, there is no legitimate sanction. This was not, however, a written law. Its application was tied to the tribal units of Jacob's family. Lot's daughters had used a perverse application of the levirate marriage. They had deceived their father when he was drunk. Tamar similarly deceived the widower Judah, her father-in-law, but Judah had not been drunk, and she did this only after Judah had demanded that she wait for the surviving youngest brother to grow up and fulfill his then-unwritten duty as a levir. She should have been released by Judah from any obligation to serve as the mother of Er's covenantal heir.

*tion by reproduction.*¹⁷ What has changed, above all, is the tribal basis of inheritance. Covenantally mandated tribes no longer exist. This is why the seed laws and land laws have been replaced by the laws governing confession of faith and church membership. The church is the new nation that has inherited God's kingdom (Matt. 21:43). It has no tribes.

G. What About Polygamy?

I have already said that the text says nothing about the possibility that the levir was a married man at the time of his brother's death. If he was married, was he required by law to obey this law?

Let us look for hints. Here is one. The law specified that the firstborn son would inherit the deceased brother's name. The language implies that the firstborn son inherited all of the deceased brother's land. Land and name were linked. Under normal circumstances, all of the sons bore their father's name. All had a claim on part of the inheritance, with the eldest brother gaining a double portion (Deut. 21:15–17).¹⁸ But in this case, the firstborn alone inherited the dead man's name.

That there was a firstborn implies that there could have been subsequent children. The marital union was an on-going union. Why were these later children cut out of the dead brother's inheritance? I conclude that the sons born later would have been part of the covenant line of the biological father. They would have divided up the inheritance which he had received from his father. They were not allowed to participate in the inheritance of the firstborn because this was his inheritance through his mother's dead husband.

